I was also accused in this article of trying to bring in Zionist propaganda. At issue was a Jewish student at Leningrad University, who had had most of her personal books confiscated, including numerous books on Jewish history. I had protested to the authorities that she had come to Leningrad as an American student, who had a perfect right to keep books for her personal use. It was not like the Jewish visitors who came to the USSR with quantities of Jewish literature for distribution to the Jewish dissidents. If the Soviets had really wanted to discredit me as a spy, they could have made a much stronger case. Their purpose rather was to warn Soviet citizens against having too close relations with the consulate.

I am afraid that the Soviets were not the only ones who became paranoid in Russia. It was a bit of a professional disease among old Soviet hands, as I will illustrate. I developed a hobby in Leningrad of looking for the properties that our former ministers and ambassadors had occupied there before the revolution. Since we had never owned property, each envoy had rented a residence that fitted his pocket book. I spent quite a bit of time at the Saltykov-Schedrin library looking into old maps and Baedekers to locate the addresses of the American chiefs of mission, and into old city maps to find the streets. Since both the names and the numbers of the streets had changed at least twice, this was quite an enterprise. At first they were very cooperative and prompt in the library, bringing me old books from 1813, containing maps. But when I went back to ask to see the same books, they seemed to take hours to find them. I suspect that certain people were convinced that I must be leaving messages in the books, using them as a sort of “drop,” and they were frustrated searching for the evidence. In any event, I worked late one weekend when the temperature outside was minus 42-45 degrees. I was driving myself, wearing an expensive mink fur hat to keep warm. When I came out of the library late in the evening, there was no sign of my hat. Since this was a time of considerable harassment, I concluded that the KGB wished to pass me a message not to play games in the library. So I made quite a stink, carrying my protest even to the Foreign Ministry in Moscow. The Soviets apparently decided eventually to get Buchanan off their back, and several months later I was presented with a new mink fur hat, better than the one I lost.

I came away with a new hat, but a bad conscience. In the meantime I had visited the library wearing another fur hat, but instead of giving it to the cloakroom on the left, I handed it to the old “dezhurnaya” in the cloakroom on the right. I told him that I expected to find my hat when I came out, telling him what had happened before. He was shocked, asked where I had left the hat, and told me that I should never leave things with the young dezhurnaya across the way, implying clearly that nothing was safe over there. I concluded that probably someone saw my warm hat on that very cold evening and made a deal, perhaps for a bottle of vodka. Given the story from Moscow of the guests who lost their fur coats at a Western Embassy reception, I should not have been surprised, or so quick to blame the goons we loved to hate.

Q: You left there in the summer of 1980. By the end of the 80s the Soviet Union was in the process of dissolving. What did you think about whither the Soviet Union at the time you left?

BUCHANAN: At the time I left I was quite disturbed about the thrust of our policy. I thought it had gotten too negative and shortsighted. I wrote a very long two-part cable regarding our policy toward the USSR as I had watched it evolve over the years. Marshall Shulman, who was then I recall Under Secretary for Political Affairs, described my cable as “sort of useful,” obviously concerned by its implied criticism of administration policy.

Q: The Carter Administration had gone in with great ideas of how sweetness and light would open up the Soviets and then had been hit in the face and it was almost like a lover rejected and turned things around too far.

BUCHANAN : Let’s see, when did I send that? Yes, it was before I left Leningrad because my deputy had to finish getting it out after I had already left.

In any case, many people liked it and my neighbor, Chalmer Roberts of the Washington Post, somehow heard about it and said I should write it up. In any case, I ended up writing an article for Foreign Policy called “The Real Russia,” (which was not my title and one I didn’t like), which came out in the spring of 1982.

I argued in the article that “detente” was a more subversive policy against the Soviets than a crude hard line. I wrote at the time out of concern that an ideologue like Romanov might come to power, who would seize on a hard-line American policy as justification for his own internal crackdown. In the longer term, I did postulate that reform might come to Russia, as it had historically, not as the result of any mass movement but as the result of the efforts of a reforming Tsar. But I certainly did not anticipate in the article that this reforming Tsar would come so soon, in the form of Gorbachev. It was Gorbachev’s ill-conceived program for reforming a system, which he understood was increasingly unable to compete on the world scale, that destroyed the Soviet system. Reagan’s military buildup did not bring down the Soviet Union, but it was seen by Gorbachev, I believe, as “objectively” helpful to his efforts to argue with his hardliners that the USSR could not compete with the US and required a quite different approach in Central Europe. Gorbachev apparently hoped to persuade the West that “We are no devils bent on aggression, but a civilized state with which you can negotiate in safety.” Shevardnadze claimed to have understood that the policies of concession and perestroika would lead to the unraveling of the Soviet empire. But Gorbachev apparently dreamed, like Khrushchev before him, that he could reform the Communist Party and revitalize the USSR and its alliance system, without fatally undermining the whole communist structure. History can only bless him for his huge miscalculation.

If I was unhappy about the trend of our policy toward Russia, I was equally unhappy with the trend in the Foreign Service itself. It no longer seemed the career service that I had been so proud to serve. I was admittedly influenced in my feeling by a nasty personnel quarrel at the consulate. Our GSO had organized a vendetta against the Administrative Officer, dividing the consulate into factions. In an earlier era, I would have sent the couple home, when it was clear that they would not control their feelings. But I was concerned that defending myself against a grievance suit from a minority woman would lead to endless litigation, and a drain on my time and energy. I should have simply soldiered on, knocking heads together, and forcing people to behave civilly to each other. Unwisely, I informed the EUR Executive Director, who visited Leningrad, of the problem. He concluded after talking to the parties that the GSO should be moved to other work. I was pleased to use her as an economist, but this required permission from the Director General. I accordingly "made waves," reflecting on my ability to manage personnel. The next thing I knew, the Director of Personnel, Bob Brewster, announced that he was coming to Leningrad on Sunday. Saturday night I got a call from the airport where Brewster was mad as a hatter because he had not been met. At the time I was giving a reception to which he refused to come. I showed him the incoming cable proving that it was his mistake, but he never had the manners or courage to apologize. If Brewster had had Eastern European experience, he would have known that there were always morale problems, particularly with non-Russian speaking members of the staff, and I had acquired a particularly cantankerous lady in place of her delightful predecessor. This was further proof to him that something was wrong. He could not understand how this could be, since he acknowledged that Nancy and I apparently went out of our way to do things for the staff. In my perhaps glamorized memory of the old Foreign Service in Moscow, officers did their duty without whining and complaining.

John Ausland, the former DCM in Norway, had tried to persuade me that I should have retired many years earlier, that I would quickly earn more in retirement than I was working. The fact that I had been frozen at the Class I level for years made the idea of retirement even more attractive. That, and an idea I had to write the history of the American diplomats and residents of St. Petersburg before the revolution. So when it was clear that there were no posts opening up in the foreseeable future, I applied for retirement in June 1981. At the time, I was doing research on Soviet policy in Africa at the National Defense University. In retrospect, I made a mistake. Not only was the salary ceiling broken shortly after my retirement, which would have helped my pension, but I was not really ready to retire. Impatience has always been a failing. That summer after retirement I got a message, while in Europe, asking if I wished to do some work on what they called Soviet "active measures" in Africa for INR. Active measures means political warfare. As a result, for several years, I did studies for INR, which were always very highly classified because they were based usually on CIA reporting of what the Soviets were doing in the way of political warfare in Africa. After several studies of Soviet behavior in various African states, I undertook to analyze the 60 or so Soviet officials, who had been sent as Ambassadors to Africa. What was their background? Why were they selected? How many of them were Communist Party officials in disgrace? The assignment of the number two in the KGB to Ouagadougou, for example, was hardly a promotion. Some Soviets were clearly Africanists in their Soviet foreign service, but others were clearly in political trouble. Certain key posts...Ethiopia, perhaps Algeria and Angola were reserved for trusted Party officials, usually with Central Committee status. This work as a WAE (when actually employed) kept up my security clearance and involved me, at least indirectly, in Soviet affairs.

I became more directly involved with Soviet affairs in 1986, outside the INR context. You will recall the flap over the Marine guard, Sergeant Lonetree, who supposedly allowed the KGB in Moscow to enter our Chancery building. This issue contributed to the decision to get rid of all our Soviet employees. Gene Boster, an old Moscow hand, and I were brought back to assess the potential damage of this suspected security leak. We read files for three months to determine what the Soviets might have read if they had had entry to our files, and finally we were sent to Moscow, and in my case on to Leningrad, to make the same assessment there with the Embassy and consulate files. We concluded that the worst damage would have been what they might have overheard if they had managed to put a bug in the secure "box." But the more that I looked at the likelihood that the KGB actually entered the Chancery, the more unlikely it seemed. I tended to agree with the analysis of some retired CIA "beltway bandits," who had briefed us before our departure, that the KGB would have needed to neutralize probably three, not two guards, to be sure they could enter without being caught. Of all the hours that Lonetree was on duty with his suspected accomplice, they were only together on duty a total of 8 hours. Burned by the Walker case, Naval Intelligence was apparently just too eager to demonstrate that it was "vigilant" and eventually concluded that no entry had taken place. Their mistake bought me a new Honda and a trip to Moscow, so I could not complain.

Jane Miller Floyd was born in Washington in 1954. She received a bachelor's degree from the University of Washington. She joined the Foreign Service in 1980. Her career included positions in the Former Soviet Union and Moscow. Mrs. Floyd was interviewed on December 6, 2004 by Charles S. Kennedy

Q: Did you have any idea what you were going to do with all of this?

FLOYD: Yes and no. I did not know probably until graduation whether it was going to be in government or in the commercial sphere. Finished up quickly so that I could take a job with the United States Information Agency.

Q: You were there for three years, right?

FLOYD: Three and a half. Took a job with the United States Information Agency as an exhibit guide, again going back to the former Soviet Union.

Q: You did this when?

FLOYD: Most of 77.

Q: How did that prepare you for this?

FLOYD: They bring you to Washington for two weeks and some of it is language preparation, depending on what the exhibit is on. Part of it is the substance of what you are going to do. The exhibit I was on was about American photography, so they took us up to New York and took us to the International Museum of Photography and we had professional photographers along with us. We went to their studios to see their work.

Q: Well I must say, I can't think of a more fascinating thing to get involved.

FLOYD: I think the U.S. government was wise for its own internal purposes. At the time, there was no Peace Corps operation in the former Soviet Union, but the exhibits became a very fertile breeding ground for future diplomats, just as a lot of Africanists have some experience with Peace Corps, or Latin America folks. It is statistically improbable the number of folks that came out of exhibits and went into the Foreign Service.

Q: Where did the exhibit go and what was your impression of some of the areas?

FLOYD: We went to three cities. Ufa, which is out in the Ural Mountains.

Q: What's the name?

FLOYD: U-F-A, ufa. Which we often joked that "Ufa was too far."

Q: Did it stand for something?

FLOYD: No, that's the name. Then we went to Novosibirsk, which means new Siberia, which is out in the middle of Siberia. And then our last city was Moscow.

Q: What was some of your experiences in doing this? I would imagine that this would really attract an awful lot of people.

FLOYD: We had about twelve to fifteen thousand visitors a day, which was a major affront to your olfactory senses, but also just fascinating to see the curiosity of these folks. The actual photography equipment, the photographs, were a tool. We could have had rocks. I think the real interest was in actually seeing Americans. Had incredible incidences of where – when we were in Ufa you would have people come up and say thank you, thank you, thank you, thank you, thank you. And it turned out that what they wanted to thank you for was that their family had survived on American spam through World War II.

As in any country, it was very interesting to get outside of the capital. Ufa is a reasonably good sized regional city. About four-hundred thousand people. But so distant from Moscow. There were any number of people who had never seen a real live American before. And the questions were – it was amazing how many of the questions were about prices. How much does bread cost? How much does a car cost? And just trying to convey to people the diversity of America, that I can't tell you how much a loaf of bread costs. Are we talking Wonder bread or gourmet wheat tops? Because for them, whether it was in Moscow or in Madagan, there were three different kinds of bread, and they were the same prices, regardless of where.

Q: I can remember when I was in Belgrade passing on to my Soviet colleagues elderly Sears and Roebucks catalogues. Well they just thought this was the greatest thing in the world.

FLOYD: Years later, when we were living in Siberia doing arms control, we had Sears and Penney catalogs, that's the way we kept the kids clothed. And one of the things people wanted to know was who could order from that catalog. There was a presumption that it was because I was a government employee that I had so much variety. And trying to tell them that anybody who had money, was one of those little things that just didn't fit in their gear case.

Q: Did you find that you were – particularly after hours – were the KGB types running herd on you and all? Or were there just too many of you?

FLOYD: Oh, they ran herd on us. And you could so clearly figure out who they were because the KGB had to import them to take care of us. They too were strangers. And the people you would meet locally would say "Who's that? He must be with you." "Yeah, he's with me, but he's not with us." So they did a very thorough job of following us. The concern was clearly always more for any Russian that would be prepared to talk to you. Worst case scenario for us was that we would be on the next plane out.

Q: How about the older generation? Did you find that there was a lot of interest there, or was it mainly younger people?

FLOYD: There were different interests. The younger people, for better or for worse, wanted something. They wanted your jeans, they wanted your magazines, they wanted something. The older generation really wanted to talk and in many ways were more interesting because they were more philosophical.

Q: This was the period of détente and you mentioned the Soyuz mission, the American-Soviet joint mission and all that. I mean it was a period of some optimism, I think. Were you picking this up from the Soviet people?

FLOYD: They were so glad to have us around. They loved the contact with the outside world.

They would search out any example of previous contact. They loved it.

Q: Did you get a chance to get out and around at all?

FLOYD: While the exhibit shipped from one city to the next, because we only had single entry visas, we had to remain within the former Soviet Union, and it gave us a chance to play tourist. Between Ufa and Novosibirsk, I went back to Leningrad, went off to Estonia and then took the trans-Siberian railroad from Moscow to Novosibirsk.

Q: Despite the difficulties and all, were you sort of falling in love with the Soviet studies and . . .

FLOYD: Oh sure. Oh absolutely.

Q: I probably shouldn't use the term Soviet anymore, because it was Russian.

FLOYD: Yes and no. One of the most fascinating parts about it is those people who grew up only knowing Soviet-ness. And that wasn't all bad, the commonality, the pride – coming out of World War II – pride in the space program. Pride in the ability to – by hook or crook, it wasn't all voluntary – unite a country as large as the former Soviet Union. So I would decline to say that Soviet is an inappropriate or no-longer-in-use adjective. It has its own place in history.

Q: As I'm doing this oral history program, I started out in the 80s and all, and we're getting close to the point where I'll have to ask somebody "Could you explain what you mean by Soviet?"

FLOYD: Well to a certain degree you can just look at the kernels of the discussion between "Is it Saint Petersburg or Leningrad?"

Q: Did you get any feel at that time for the ethnic differences. Did you get a feel for the differences?

FLOYD: In any economy of scarcity, which is what the Soviet Union was, you always look for somebody to blame, somebody to be beneath you. And in the former Soviet Union, it was definitely their Central Asian colleagues, who they called yellow and who they hated, beat up, looked down on. They wanted to compare it to our black ethnic issues at the time, but it was so much more visceral. With rare exception, I believe there are probably few Americans who would characterize our ethnic minorities using animal pronouns or animal allusions, but that . . .

Q: Black monkeys or something.

FLOYD: It's rare. You could find somebody.

Q: I got this from Ethiopian students who came out of Bulgaria in the 60s who were called (Bulgarian term), black monkeys.

FLOYD: Which is not to say that we didn't and don't have our issues, which is not to say that we've got it down perfectly, but it is the rare . . . The worst American racist is going to tell you about minorities' superior sports ability or they're not as smart or shouldn't get into university, but there's still a human equivalency. The Soviets' jokes, the allusions, were definitely to the animal kingdom.

Q: Of course the government wasn't really making much effort, as we've made a lot of effort.

FLOYD: The Soviet Government did try to use ethnicity too. They preserved symbols of ethnic identity and ethnic pride. Would have Uzbek caps at the central exhibit location where they would allow Uzbek caps to be sold in markets, but very falsely. We always used to think it was sort of like Disneyland. The Russian word is "pokazuka."

Q: Did you get any feel for the American foreign policy or Foreign Service apparatus?

FLOYD: Less so in Ufa and Novosibirsk, but when we got to Moscow and we were in contact with the embassy - the embassy people came out to the exhibit, they invited us to the embassy for events. I would say that was my first robust exposure to the day to day life of diplomats. And I came back and took the Foreign Service exam.

Q: You examined it and found it pleasing?

FLOYD: Absolutely. Just the thought that the U.S. government would pay me to go and do stuff that as a student I had paid for myself was very attractive.

Q: I know. I was one of those people who was giving the exam around that time. We tried to make it nice.

FLOYD: It was funny because I took that oral exam in the summer of 79, the summer between my two years in graduate school. And I was working as an intern on the Soviet desk at the State Department. So all my colleagues had talked to me and tried to prep me for this, and when I came back and had to tell them that I had failed, I was disappointed, and so were they. But I had another candidacy running and was successful in that one.

Q: When you were interning on the Soviet desk, what sort of things were you handling?

FLOYD: I worked in the exchanges office and dealt with visa matters for Soviets coming to the United States as exchange students.

Q: What was the feeling about – I've heard people that were involved with that say that the Soviets were sending 40 year old scientists to the United States and we were sending Byzantine scholars to the Soviet Union. They were interested in science and we were interested in orthography or something like that. But was there a sort of general feeling of what the hell?

FLOYD: Yes. Exactly. Because the scientists did not spend all day in the lab. Had to go to Giant at some point to realize that food was available and that anybody could walk into the store. And that the American orthographer also sat around and drank tea with people talking about their lives. It's one of the reasons that those things came under the category of cultural exchange. If one looked at it narrowly in terms of the development of specific subject matter expertise, probably the Soviets got more than we did. But the collapse of the Berlin Wall would indicate that we actually won that one.

Q: Yeah. I mean, as an exchange program over all, it has been such a tremendous success and I think it is not given the credit that it should be by the powers that be.

FLOYD: I suspect that it will get more attention as we look ahead to what is likely to be our needed course of action in dealing with other worlds and cultures that have been not part of our day to day operations, specifically the Arabic and Islamic world. We need the same type of long term commitment, the same strategic view to be able to say not how many scientists versus how many literature professors we exchange. It's going to take that degree of time to appreciate the complexity and the resources.

Q: Were you pretty well concentrated on the Soviet thing or were you trying to get some experience outside of the Soviet Union?

FLOYD: Oh, I was more than happy to explore that. However, the Soviet desk called me the day after I told them that I had made it into an A-100 class and said "Do you want to go to Moscow?" I said yes. And even though Moscow did not appear on the open assignments bid list – surprise - and even though they did not like sending unmarried officers to Moscow, they didn't really like sending first tour officers to Moscow, I was in Moscow by June.

Q: Did you have a mentor or a couple of mentors?

FLOYD: Absolutely.

Q: Who were they?

FLOYD: Jack Matlock, Sherrod McCall, more recently John Tefft.

Q: How did you find the A-100 course?

FLOYD: I don't know whether I was simply so excited finally to be in the Foreign Service or what. There was way too much time at old FSI sitting and listening to people talk and still at that time the delightful multi-hour discussion of when you bend the corner of your business card as to whether or not you have actually seen somebody or if you just left it at their calling card. Some of the political stuff was considerably overblown for a changing diplomatic world.

Q: I have to say that I had all that and I came in in 55. And I don't think we ever paid much attention to the card business, except if you were there you tried to see everybody, which wasn't a bad idea.

FLOYD: I never served in Paris or Rome or London or Brussels or someplace where that might have been the standard.

Q: To me it was something kind of funny.

FLOYD: In Moscow it was much more important that your card be bilingual than anything else.

Q: You went to Moscow and you were there from when to when?

FLOYD: First time was 80 to 82, as a Foreign Service officer, which was already my third time.

Q: In Moscow, this was after the Afghan invasion in 79.

FLOYD: This was the summer that we didn't show up at the Olympics.

Q: So what was the situation when you got there?

FLOYD: We were not well liked. The Olympics was a really strange set up. There was some advantage to being a junior officer because the embassy was under instructions to not provide senior level representation at events, which was just fine for the junior officers. It was amazing, the Soviet Government's ability to control its population and the general functioning of the capital city. Sending kids and criminals and drunks out of the city. In the case of drunks and criminals, they took them out about a hundred miles and dumped them, figuring that by the time they walked back, the Olympics would be over.

Q: Were you all, you know, finding out where they went and reporting on that?

FLOYD: That it happened. We didn't want to share that experience.

Q: What type of job did you have? Did you have a multitude of jobs?

FLOYD: Yes. I was a junior officer rotational position. I served in the consular section, in American citizen services, doing a lot of work involving dead Americans, lost or hurt Americans – because Americans certainly still came to the Olympics. Also did two curious other programs. There were two Soviet medical programs, one dealing with retinitis pigmentosa the other one dealing with spinal cord injuries, in which the Soviets were well ahead of us. And we had many Americans who wanted to take advantage of that. The other group of people I worked with was an office at the Department of Justice that looked for war criminals.

Q: On the Americans and the people that dropped dead or had problems, how were the Soviets? I mean the Soviets were pretty pissed.

FLOYD: I don't think any amount of Soviet-ism would ever be able to totally conquer Russian hospitality. When Americans died in the former Soviet Union, the government had a very efficient system. They knew our requirements in terms of documentation. The Americans who came to the Soviet Union for medical treatment obviously gave them a bit of a propaganda boost, gave them some money, so they were treated reasonably well. We always had to warn people who came for such treatment that Soviet medical facilities did not provide adequate support to patients. That you could not come and be admitted and left alone. You were going to need somebody to feed you and bathe you. The nursing care was not that present. Even despite the American boycott of the Olympics, on a person to person, level the Soviets greeted any guest fairly well.

Q: How did you find the embassy, your working environment and all, when you first got there?

FLOYD: During the early 80s, there was still enough of a siege mentality that it was a very close knit group of folks. Because people could not work on the economy, spouses were all throughout the embassy and that had the great advantage of providing immediate cross-cutting of section isolation. You may have a boss, but his wife works in GSO or someplace so that there was good circulation. This was still the era when they would turn off the hot water for a month in the summer and we would have shower parties because different people at different times were without hot water. So you would quite casually bop over to somebody else's apartment with your towel because they had hot water and you didn't. I went from the consular section to working as the ambassador's staff aide and therefore came into contact with everybody over all sorts of things.

Q: Who was the ambassador when you were there?

FLOYD: Jack Matlock was the charge for the majority of my time as the staff assistant. Ambassador Tom Watson was confirmed and came into country towards the end of that.

Q: How did you find Ambassador Watson?

FLOYD: Very interesting character, very savvy person. Willing to listen and follow suggestions from his staff. Only ever once saw him get excited and that was when his and America's humanity was challenged by a not very pleasant individual who we all had to deal with anyway. And he dealt with him as many of us would have wished to have dealt with him ourselves.

Q: Who was that?

FLOYD: An American. A person by the name of Abe Stolar who had gone to the former Soviet Union in the 1930s, had been a bit of a Tokyo Rose on Radio Moscow. He retained his American citizenship, passed it along to his children, and primarily used it to come to diplomatic flea markets. But was quite happy to otherwise bash the United States.

Q: I can't remember where – was it Sergeant Lake?

FLOYD: Lonetree.

Q: Had that experience happened?

FLOYD: Later.

Q: So it wasn't during that period. So the embassy was able to use Foreign Service nationals?

FLOYD: Oh, by the truckload.

Q: How did one deal with it? I mean the security requirements?

FLOYD: You dealt with them as humans, minimizing social contact, focus on day-to-day operations and assume that anything and everything that you told them was recorded.

Q: Well at a certain point one makes the calculation of “what the hell difference does it make?”

FLOYD: Exactly. If you are talking to the driver who takes you to the MFA for a meeting, you just tell him when and where you need to be, you don't discuss what your talking points are going to be with the driver. When you need opera tickets, you go get them from an FSN. Does that mean that the FSN knows you are going to be going to the opera? Yes. So. It was a balancing act, particularly for those like the consular section or GSO who had a lot of FSN assistance. You became conscious of the limits to your relationship. And in subsequent years when you dealt with more normal FSN relationships, either in other countries or as the Soviet Union evolved, you recognized the falseness, the strained nature of it.

Q: Were there any demonstrations during this period you were there?

FLOYD: I have difficulty saying whether it was during this tour or other tours, but there were always periodically organized demonstrations against the United States. I've got to believe that there was a demonstration sometime that summer over the American boycott of the Olympics. I can't put my finger on one. I can't say how many. But every so often you would have a group of 30 or 40 jump off of a government bus in front of the embassy, do their thing, have the American media show up, and they'd get back on the bus and go their way.

Q: Did you find - both by the time you were on the desk and when you went out to Moscow - any feeling one way or the other about our boycotting the Olympics because of the Afghan business?

FLOYD: Depended whether you talked to someone officially or . . .

Q: I'm thinking of informally, within the embassy.

FLOYD: I think the greatest regret that people voiced was that the U.S. Government enforced the boycott, meaning what the government chose to do was the government's business, but to impose that political will on athletes – it was that connection. Not that the U.S. Government was opposed to the invasion of Afghanistan. That was understood. That was no problem. The greatest hostility came from the Americans who came and the rare American athlete who remembered his British grandmother and participated on the British team.

Q: Well looking at it, it probably wasn't one of our greater moments.

FLOYD: Most Russians are amazingly apolitical. Whether it has been beaten into them or scared out of them, I don't know. But they are much more interested in the day-to-day survival issues.

Q: Was there a change in political life, living conditions and all, between the time you were with USIA and when you went back?

FLOYD: Clearly my living conditions were a totally different order of magnitude, going from Soviet hotels to embassy housing was amazing. The Russian difference was less palpable. They were going through their own bit of questioning. Brezhnev's health was in decline. It was the time of stagnations to a great extent.

Q: Did you have much contact, going over to the ministry of foreign affairs? Did you get much contact, as a junior officer, with the Soviet foreign affairs apparatus?

FLOYD: Yes. Clearly the Consular Administration purely for my work. But as the ambassador's staff assistant, I would go with him for some of his meetings. As the protocol assistant, would go for formal diplomatic document exchanges.

Q: How did you find Jack Matlock? I knew him before and . . .

FLOYD: He had been director of the Soviet desk when I was an intern, and then was out there as the charge. For any number of reasons, probably many of which I never knew and wouldn't understand, we didn't have an ambassador for a significant amount of time in that period and he was there as the charge.

Q: Were there any major incidents when you were in Moscow during this time? Between the United States and the Soviet Union?

FLOYD: KL 007 was later. Invasion of Afghanistan was before I got there.

Q: Was there any feeling at the time you were there that Afghanistan was going to be firmly in the Soviet camp, or was there a feeling that maybe things aren't going so well for the Soviets?

FLOYD: Remember this was very, very early days. So officially it was their right to do, that if they had been invited in, they were helping, all of that line. For the general population the only concern was, "Don't send my son."

Q: Was the embassy, Tom Watson, Matlock and all, was there talk about this aging gerontocracy?

FLOYD: Oh constantly. We quickly went from Brezhnev to Chernenko to Andropov. It became the "who died today?" period. It was clear, from looking at May Day or Revolution Day line ups on the mausoleum, these guys were decrepit.

Q: There must have been a lot of speculation of who was going to come out on top in the long run?

FLOYD: Oh, absolutely. Again, as it panned out, there weren't many options out there. The Central Committee of the Communist Party was very much internally controlled. This was not a “riotous people in the street” turnover.

Q: You said you got assigned there despite the concerns about single officers, women officers, very junior officers. Did you have any attempts at compromise or difficulty because you fit into all three categories?

FLOYD: Whether through proper maintenance of security standards or naiveté, it never got far enough that I would identify it as such.

Q: Naiveté really is very useful many times.

FLOYD: If you went to a reception and the American jazz quartet was there and their local escort said “Well gee, we are having an after party, why don’t you come and join us?” You made sure that it was a group thing. When you got the note that said “Meet me out back,” you gave it to the RSO. I suspect that some of these might have been approaches that would have led down that path, but you just don’t start and you don’t get in trouble. It tends to be after a couple of feeders, after a couple of lures. The first approach usually isn’t the killer.

Q: How are living conditions?

FLOYD: I started out living in a one bedroom apartment off campus, which also had twelve or fifteen other American diplomats there, recently renovated by some Austrians. Very pleasant. Commute was okay because the Soviets had not yet discovered private vehicle ownership, so we were pretty much the only cars on the road. When I became the ambassador’s staff aide, they moved me into Spaso House, the ambassador’s residence. Because Jack Matlock was only the charge, he chose not to live in the ambassador’s residence, so it was me and an ancient Chinese butler who were the only ones living in this mansion, which was a bit spooky. But the ambassador’s cook loved me. So when I would come home late, even though I had my own kitchen, there would usually be dinner waiting for me. That was very pleasant.

We didn’t let go of the ambassador’s staff because you still needed to dust for receptions. So they just also dusted my apartment. That was pleasant enough. When I rotated out of that position to the political section, I went back out to an off campus apartment in an older building. It was a little more awkward. The Soviet apartments usually were, because we would take one or two of them and your kitchen would be at one end and your dining room at the other. No one designed them. You took what you could get.

Q: When you were in the political section, what piece of the pie were you given?

FLOYD: I did protocol and internal political reporting.

Q: What sort of things were we looking at internal-wise?

FLOYD: Reaction to Afghanistan. Did a lot of the biographic who’s in, who’s out, regional party secretaries.

Q: Was Gorbachev a name at that time?

FLOYD: No. Not in the early 80s. Might have been to somebody in the central committee, but it was not on the embassy's radar. Yeltsin was for his role in Moscow.

Q: How was Yeltsin perceived at that time?

FLOYD: My memory capacity is not yet honed enough to tell you when it was then, when it was later, and when it is now. My memories of Yeltsin's image were simply as an efficient administrator who was building like mad in Moscow.

Q: One of the greatest, I won't call it an intelligence blunder, but here we had the best and the brightest concentrated and looking at the Soviet Union and yet they weren't predicting the collapse? Were you part of the looking? Were we seeing what we thought we should see?

FLOYD: I would have told you that the Soviet Union was headed for more internal independence. That the republics would be able to have more control, particularly over their economy. That the centralized nature of planning was in collapse. I would never, ever had predicted that it would literally fall into pieces. The Ukrainians today are challenged today by the question whether they can make it in an international economy dominated by globalization and competition. It was no easier at that point, and we are talking about the early 80s, we're talking before glasnost.

Q: How was your Russian?

FLOYD: I got up to 4+/4.

Q: So basically you were very comfortable.

FLOYD: Yes. I can do pretty much anything in Russian I can do in English. I can't discuss quantum physics in either.

Q: You were there until 85?

FLOYD: And then I went back to the Soviet Union.

Q: Did you feel that by this time you were part of the Eastern European, particularly Soviet, clique?

FLOYD: Oh absolutely. To the extend that when I went back to the former Soviet Union - so much for open assignments - I put in one bid on my bid list. It was out of cone and out of grade, and I got it.

Q: What was that?

FLOYD: GSO in Leningrad.

Q: GSO in the Soviet Union?

FLOYD: Yes. The US Navy had assigned my husband back to the Naval Support Unit and he was sent to Leningrad. And I said if you don't send me and let me work, I will go on leave without pay.

Q: Were you getting a feeling by this time that there was a change in the Soviet hands? I mean we had had this thing – goes back to George Kennan, Chip Bohlen, Tommy Thompson and all that. I mean this is an elite of an elite.

FLOYD: I remember that Ambassador Bohlen's daughter worked with me on the Soviet desk. Avis was in multilateral affairs. So there is a certain passing from generation to generation.

Q: I'm interviewing Avis. I've been doing that. I'm going back to her I think it's next week.

FLOYD: There was not so much a change, but I would just say it was more preparation of the next generation. There were certainly some folks – I point to Sherrod McCall – as a tremendous example of someone who was conscious of needing to develop the next generation of American diplomats and Soviet experts.

Q: Did you feel yourself part of an elite?

FLOYD: The Soviet desk, the Soviet specialists in the State Department, particularly back then, were into and of themselves. May have been technically part of the European bureau, but couldn't have convinced them of that.

Q: You all knew each other. Looking at this later, was there almost too much group think, do you think? I keep asking questions of people who served in the Soviet Union trying to unwrap the puzzle, what happened that we didn't see the collapse of the authority there?

FLOYD: I think you would probably have better luck if you talked to a sociologist, not even a political scientist. Humans tend to identify patterns in predictability. The type of break that happened in part was only possible in a country like the Soviet Union because the change was not societal, it was not that deep. When you've got one, two, three, four, five percent in the party who constitute the ruling class, you really only have to convince them. And they were not the ones that were immediately accessible. And I would suggest they didn't know themselves exactly where they were taking this.

Q: Oh quite obviously Gorbachev had no conception of what he would bring about.

FLOYD: And it was the strangest little things that convinced me that something was really going to happen. When we left Leningrad in 87, we had a going away party. During my tour there, we had gone through the tit for tat of kicking Russian diplomats out of the UN and they kicked some of our guys out and then they ended up pulling all of the FSNs. So as the GSO I had learned to do a whole bunch of new things I never thought I was going to have to do and came in contact with a lot more Soviet officials than normally was the case. Meaning we had to deliver our own invitations, so ran into an awful lot of door keepers. We had to go pick up our own shipments. So ran into customs officials and port officials. And when we left, the consul general had a farewell reception and we sent out invitations to all the officials we came into contact with. And they showed up, and they showed up with spouses. It was the first time that I knew of that Soviet officials had been able to make a social decision based entirely on their own concerns. It was so strange to see, primarily wives, coming out of the woodwork, and to see a real cross section, a real mix, of Soviet officials. They usually came in blocks. It was the first time I ever saw them act as individuals, not on instructions. They were allowed to engage in normal human relations without direction, and that was revolutionary.

Press Officer
Moscow (1979-1980)

Soviet Union Desk Office
Washington, DC (1980-1982)

William P. Kiehl was born in Pennsylvania in 1945. He received a BS from the University of Scranton in 1967 and an MA from the University of Virginia in 1970. Upon entering the Foreign Service in 1970, he was posted in Belgrade, Zagreb, Colombo, Moscow, Prague, Helsinki, London and Bangkok. Mr. Kiehl was interviewed in 2003 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: So I think this is a good place to stop. Where did you go in '77?

KIEHL: Where did I go in '77? If you remember, Jock Shirley always promised me Moscow. So I went back for a year of Russian language training.

Q: All right, we'll pick that up at that point then.

Q: Today is the fifteenth of December, 2003. Bill, where'd you take Russian language training?

KIEHL: I returned to Washington and started at the Foreign Service Institute, which was then over in Rosslyn, at what we used to call the "high-rise slum." I think it was 12 to 15 stories, but it was a pretty run-down building, one of the legacies of the Pomponio brothers, who developed that whole area. Of course, FSI (Foreign Service Institute) at that time, I don't think it was even contemplating a move, so people were quite content to be there.

Q: You did this from when to when?

KIEHL: Let's see. I came back in June of '77, so I started in August. I must have had home leave, although it's one of those home leaves I don't recall, but in 1977, in August, we started language class. We were in temporary lodging in Washington because we came back with the intention of buying a place to live, since it had been quite some time (six years) since we had been here.

I remember splitting my first couple of weeks between trying to comprehend, re-comprehend, Cyrillic, slightly different Cyrillic from the Serbian, of course, and trying to absorb Russian, and chasing around with real estate agents and looking at houses, most of which were not in our price range, all over the District of Columbia. Why DC? At that time it was an advantage to stay in DC as a Foreign Service officer because as such you weren't subject to DC income tax.

Unfortunately, Jesse Helms put an end to that little perk for the Foreign Service—congressional staff and the military still retain it as far as I know.--, I think back in 1986 or so, or sometime thereafter. We were determined to live in DC. We looked at everything from Logan Circle, north and west basically from there, and ended up getting a place on Connecticut Avenue, a condominium, in the old Harry Truman building at Chesapeake and Connecticut, where Harry Truman lived when he was vice president.

Q: Oh, yeah? Now, you took Serbian, so you would have gotten out in '78, I guess, is that it?

KIEHL: Russian.

Q: I mean Russian.

KIEHL: Sure, it was a 10 month course, with the eclectic Russian teacher, Nina Delacruz, who probably taught more people Russian than everyone else combined.

Q: How did you find the transfer between Russian and Serbian?

KIEHL: Well, Russian is a far more complicated language. Serbian is kind of the country cousin, you might say, to Russian. Russian is much more sophisticated, much richer vocabulary, I suppose because of the influence of literature, and just the large numbers of people, makes for a more complicated language. Serbian was easy. Of course, I was younger when I learned Serbian, although I had studied Russian in college, but it didn't make much of an impact. It was that kind of language study which was in one ear, out the other. So I'd say it was difficult for the first couple of months, to make the transference. One of the problems, particularly in the first couple of months, was the fact that three of us, who all had some Slavic language background, were in class with an officer's wife who had another language background, but it was Chinese. She was native Chinese, so she spoke, or tried to speak, Russian with a Chinese accent, which actually drove us all absolutely crazy, because we didn't know what was what, what was accurate and what wasn't.

One fellow's Polish interfered with his Russian, and for two of us, the Serbian interfered a bit with the Russian, but nothing compared to the Chinese. With some guilt on our part, we got together and went to the linguist and said, "Look, you've got to get that lady out of our class, because we can't handle this. We hear it wrong, pretty consistently, more than we hear it right, so we'll never learn the language." They did jiggle around a bit, and then they jiggled it around to the point where they did something that I don't think they should ever do, and that is to put two married couples together in the same language class. There were four of us, my wife and I and another married couple, were in the class together. Now, we all had some Slavic language background, so there was some rationale for it, but putting two husbands and wives together in the same language class is not a good idea.

Q: You got out of there in when?

KIEHL: I got out in June of '78, and went right out to the Soviet Union, and I was originally going to go out as the Assistant Cultural Affairs Officer to run the speakers program in Russia, but an opportunity came up to do the exhibits, which was an Assistant Cultural Affairs Officer just for exhibits, which meant that you would travel around the country for a year which was a unique opportunity. I was young enough and crazy enough to think it was a good deal. The only thing I said was, "Well, you've got to make some position for my wife, because she can work in Moscow but what's she going to do in the middle of Kazakhstan? So there was a provision figured out for that, she was going to run the library for the exhibit. It was a $4,000 or $5,000 library, with three specialists attached to it, and another guide, Russian-speaking American guide, that would be available to specialists who'd come to the exhibit, could be steered in that direction.

Of course the theme of the exhibit was not particularly my favorite, I would have liked it to have been on photography in the USA or even technology for the American home, the themes of the previous two exhibits but that was not to be. It was Selska Hosaistva v SSha—"Agriculture USA." [End Side]

KIEHL: As I said, I grew up in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, but my experience with farms mainly was speeding by them on the highway. "Agriculture USA" was a learning experience. I got to learn an awful lot about agriculture in the United States, just by osmosis, if nothing else. Of course, the specialists who came out, there were three agricultural specialists who came out to each city that we traveled were very useful. They were interesting people, they were professors of agriculture and viniculture or animal husbandry or you name it, at various universities around the United States. They were all knowledgeable people and they all had a wealth of information about some aspect of agriculture which you couldn't help but pick up from them.

The exhibit was a real experience, I'm glad that I made that decision to go that route rather than just going to Moscow. So we went out, we had a few days in Moscow to settle all the rigmarole about this and to discover that they hadn't really made a provision for my wife's employment, so I had go into a rather tough negotiation with the public affairs officer at the time, Ray Benson. I remember we were sort of chin to chin, almost, about this, because I felt it was pretty important for my wife to have something meaningful to do for a year and not just sit around in the middle of central Asia. Fortunately, reason prevailed and she was hired and off we went.

We just missed Kiev, the first stop on the exhibit because of the language schedule, and it probably was a good idea we missed it, because two of the exhibit guides were expelled from the country for activities incompatible with their status. In fact, they very well might have done things that were incompatible with their status. I wasn't there at the time so I have no first hand knowledge.

Q: What did you gather? What were they doing that would have been incompatible?

KIEHL: The one fellow was Ukrainian by birth, and he worked for the Voice of America, at one time. He was a very nice guy. I think he was put in a position where his latent nationalism rose to the surface because of what he saw and tales that he heard from people, and the fact that he, as a native speaker of Ukrainian, was a focus for the Ukrainian-speaking nationalists who would come to the exhibit. As a consequence, the intelligence authorities, the KGB, was on his tail all the time, and probably, I would imagine, was trying to get him to do or say something that would require them to expel him. Whether he did or not is, frankly, immaterial. They were bound to get him eventually.

The other guy, I think, was just psychologically unfit to be an exhibit guide. He did some strange things and I think he was just a person who wasn't screened carefully enough for such a high pressure situation.

Q: This period, while you were on this tour, '78 to '79, how would you describe the relations between the Soviet Union and the United States?

KIEHL: At that time, of course, relations were warming. If you recall, there was the Carter-Brezhnev embrace in Vienna, in fact, a kiss on both cheeks, which, however distasteful it was to some people, nevertheless indicated that the Russians and Americans were trying to come to some terms on things. All in all, the overall relationship was on the upswing throughout that entire period, although it wasn't particularly reflected by our work on the exhibit. You have to understand that those exhibits were negotiated with a lot of blood, sweat, and toil over many years. They first of them was the famous Kitchen Debate in '59, the Nixon-Khrushchev Kitchen Debate, and so on. That exhibit had 70 American guides with it. It was only in one city, but it was there, I think, for three or four months.

Then eventually they became traveling exhibits, usually six cities over the course of a year, with about 25 to 30 Russian-speaking American guides and staff, usually one American embassy officer attached to the exhibit as the protocol officer for the exhibit, that was the job I had. There were a couple of exhibit specialists, who actually ran the exhibit, there was an exhibit director, a deputy director, who was usually a pretty good Russian-speaker, who had had previous exhibit experience, a couple of technicians to help, getting the sound system and the lights and the video and all that to work. It was a pretty complicated undertaking, and in fact, in smaller places, where there wasn't a large exhibition hall, the guides, under instruction from these technicians, would build a geodesic dome, a Bucky Fuller geodesic dome, with Mylar fabric over it, and the exhibit would be put into that. It was a pretty complicated technological, or technical, undertaking. These technicians were usually out of the regional exhibits office in Vienna. They traveled on all the exhibits.

Q: Agriculture, of course, is ...

KIEHL: Culture.

Q: Yes, but it's almost goes to the guts of a country, particularly a country such as the Soviet Union, and they had, apparently, at that time anyway, by all accounts, they had an abysmal delivery system.

KIEHL: Oh, they did. It was a failed system.

Q: It was a system that wasn't working. Did you feel that we were showing people a system that could work, or were we just showing sort of bits of equipment and all that?

KIEHL: Well, that was the whole object, to point out that in a free society and a market economy, a smaller number of people can feed many more people and have a decent standard of living in the process, and everybody benefits by that, as opposed to, of course, the system the Soviet Union had, where everything was a wreck. I think the focus of the exhibit was very much in the vein of the family farm. There were a lot of photographs of family farms, there was a lot of anecdotal information there about family farms, et cetera, when the real success of American agriculture today, of course, are corporate farms, these gigantic things that resemble nothing more than state farms of the old Soviet Union, except that they are privately held rather than state held, and they have a profit motive, and they have an efficiency that the Soviet Union never had.

Anyway, it was the family farm. There were a series of black and white photographs that the exhibit designers loved, but which we felt, and we knew from the Russians who were there, were boring propaganda pictures that were kind of insulting in them. What they were interested in was the tractor and the combine and the color pictures of county fairs and all that sort of thing, because that's something that they didn't have. They had lots of black and white pictures, artsy pictures, I mean, they could produce those themselves, but exhibit designers were rather detached from the reality, they were artists and they wanted their artistic license. We ended up removing a lot of that and changing it to get some more pizzazz in the exhibit, in fact.

These exhibits were monumental undertakings. Even in those days the exhibit cost about $6 million. It was seen by about a million people over the course of the year, so it's about $6 a person, to have an experience like that, which was usually a day long experience, from the time they got in line to the time they got home again, and an opportunity to talk to Russian-speaking Americans. For most Russians, outside of large cities, and tourist areas, they never would have such an opportunity. So it was money well spent. It was a way to get into these isolated parts of the former Soviet Union.

Q: What were you getting from the guides and all, the reactions to what we were doing there?

KIEHL: It was fascinating. It was a little bit of everything. You had professional provocateurs sent in by the KGB, obviously, to either create tension in the crowd and to try to make one of the guides lose their cool so that they could be complained about. You also had all manner of honey-traps and that sort of thing lying in wait in most places ...

Q: You ought to explain what honey trap is.

KIEHL: These are seemingly innocent, beautiful young women, or men, in the case of the girls there, who would essentially give you a come-on, try to ensnare you in some kind of sexual liaison, and then, of course, that would be useful for blackmail purposes, allegedly. So we had to constantly remind the guys, particularly, "Be alert for this kind of thing. Not every innocent-looking Russian who bats her eyes at you is innocent, in fact."

We had no security people with us on the exhibit. That's another interesting aspect of it. There was no regional security officer attached to the exhibit. So we had to basically keep an eye on each other, in a sense, and keep people out of trouble, and of course, all our files were probably gone through every night. So there was no way you could keep even a cryptic note about somebody who, say, wanted to defect, or who wanted to provide some information that would be anything but innocent and put that in a file, or a folder or anything, because you could assume that it would be in the hands of the KGB before morning. If you ever had anything like that, you had to really keep it on your person at all times.

I remember many times I was carrying around notes on my person for a couple of weeks before I could get it out to Moscow, either myself, or to give it to a courier to take back to Moscow for reporting purposes. I did a lot of reporting while I was there, for INR, basically, on everything from the conditions in the marketplace and the prices of goods to acquiring phone books for provincial cities, which were as good as gold because there was no way to get them otherwise, except to physically get one from the kiosk when the five or six copies that were available a month would come out, or to borrow them from somebody, photocopy the entire book, which perhaps wasn't in print for five or 10 years, and then send it back to Moscow and on to INR. Very crude HUMINT (human intelligence), you might say, but it was the only way, because we were the only people who ever traveled to these places.

The first place we went on the exhibit was Tselinograd, in northern Kazakhstan, which of course now, under the new name Astana, is the new capital of Kazakhstan, but in those days it was the Virgin Lands, and it was populated by displaced Ukrainians, a few Russians, lots of Volga Germans, and the indigenous Kazakhs, none of whom liked each other, by the way, or got along very well. They all had their own newspapers and they all went their own ways when the factory whistle blew, but it was a vast steppe of Russia, and there was absolutely nothing to do, but we were plunked down there in this little town, because, for one thing, they had an exhibit hall, and it was the first time we could have an exhibit there, and it was the Virgin Lands, so agriculture was a logical choice. After much negotiation, we managed to get in there. We were the first Americans to spend the night in Tselinograd since, I suppose – actually, for any amount of time, because it only began to be populated about 1954, 1955.

Q: With Khrushchev's Virgin Lands program and all – by that time had it pretty well run its course, I mean as far as not working or not, or ...

KIEHL: It never really worked, it was always marginal, it was always to give a little bit of a cushion to the big wheat deals and grain deals that Ukraine and the more agriculturally rich parts of Russia can produce. They were always the breadbasket of Russia, of the Soviet Union.

This area was marginal. It was relatively arid, it was a lot like the Great Plains, the western Great Plains, which tend to be drier, the soil is poorer. It's great for growing grasses, native grasses, and we actually took a bus trip to go to see some Virgin Land. It was the only little plot left. It was perhaps a couple of hundred meters by a couple of hundred meters of vegetation that was the originally steppe, untouched by human hands. The rest of it was stunted wheat – that's what it was, stunted wheat. Yields were perhaps a third of what they were in a place that was more suited to agriculture.

Q: The day is over in these little towns – the guys were all young, weren't they, practically?

KIEHL: You'd be surprised. A lot of these people were kicked out there during the war, because they couldn't trust them in Ukraine, or they were Volga Germans and other displaced types. They would put them on a rail car and send them out and then said, "OK, you're out here," and drop them off at the rail head like so many cattle, and they had to survive out there. So, some of the people were relatively – well, I shouldn't say really old, there weren't very many really old people because the life was so hard that people didn't live that long, but there were certainly a lot of middle-aged people, as well as young kids.

Q: I was wondering, I mean, your crew were mostly young people?

KIEHL: Oh, yes, they were all mostly graduate students.

Q: The exhibit's over in the evening. Did they go to the equivalent of the local taverna and get together or ...

KIEHL: Well, in Tselinograd they didn't have tavernas, unfortunately. They had one or two pevo [beer] bars. Pevni bars, or beer bars, were pretty rough places. There were constant fights, people getting cut with broken bottles, people were just drunk out of their minds in there. They would drink shots of vodka and beer chasers and you could go by these places in mid-afternoon and people would be drunk out of their minds. They were very violent places, so that wasn't really a good option.

What most people in Tselinograd did, they would get blind drunk every night on vodka, and beer, or beer and vodka together, but mainly vodka. That's basically what they did. That was the only real entertainment there. I think there was one movie house – we're talking about a city of probably 30,000 to 40,000 people. One movie house, two or three pevni bars, no theatre, real theatre at all, almost no cultural life. People would hang beef cows in their – we were there in the summer, or I guess you might say beginning of summer. This is a place where it's 40 and 40, 40 degrees Celsius in the summer, and -40 Celsius in the winter. There's not much difference. It goes from summer to winter to summer again. There's almost no spring or fall.

People would get a cow, in the summertime, and slaughter it, and hang it in their balcony at the beginning of the fall, and it would pretty well freeze over the winter, and they would hack pieces of that cow off during the winter and bring it inside and cook it. This is the level of sophistication you had in Tselinograd.

We experienced some incredible things. Of course, we ate pretty well. They shipped in special food when we were there. People would come up to us and say, "Thank God you Americans came, we've seen butter for the first time in three years because you're here!" They brought in, one afternoon, a truckload of frozen chickens, all sort of frozen together like a modern sculpture, and they took this and threw it onto the floor where it would sort of break apart. They kept throwing them down until the pieces would start breaking off. Before long, there was a riot, women punching and kicking each other to get the pieces of chicken, because this was a once a year treat. The Soviets put 200 cases of Bulgarian cabernet red wine in the little grocery store across the square from our hotel. We were the only people who bought it, because even though it was the equivalent of a dollar a bottle it was too expensive for Russians to waste their hard-earned rubles on this when they could get vodka or spirit, (190-proof alcohol) and drink that and become oblivious in a matter of minutes. The wine would take forever to get to that stage, I'm sure, so we were the only customers of that wine, as far as I know, and in two months we made a pretty good run on it, I have to say.

Tselinograd was a city where very rarely were we actually invited to someone's home, unlike many other parts of the former Soviet Union. I think, in Kishinev, for example, in the two months we were in Kishinev I must have been in 50 different Soviet citizen's apartments for dinner, or for drinks, or just to see it and to talk, because there was a tremendous curiosity about America, but also almost a compulsion to tell someone what their life was like, just so that somebody else would know. Why, I'm not quite sure, the psychology of that is somewhat complex. I think there are a lot of reasons why people do that. It wasn't necessarily that these people were dissidents, or were people who are dissatisfied with the regime. They were just ordinary people. They felt a need to express themselves to someone because they couldn't really talk to other people without possibly being reported as being anti-Soviet, or a troublemaker or something. I got the feeling that outside the very close friends and family, people didn't really communicate about anything important, but they could communicate to us because we were a kind of magic slate. Once we went away, that slate was lifted and, you know, it was all right.

Q: I assume that, of the countryside, this is not – this was pretty primitive, wasn't it?

KIEHL: It was pretty primitive. We were in an unusual situation. They took a hotel right on the square there, and they cut it in half, or roughly in half, and they put, literally, cement-block walls halfway down the corridors so that you couldn't go from one wing of the hotel to the other. The one part of the hotel remained pretty much decrepit as it was, the other wing of the hotel was spruced up and painted and some sort of surface that I swear had diamonds in it, it glittered, and if you touched it would cut your hand, it was sharp. They had this all over the walls, some kind of really crude stucco. This hotel was all fixed up, as best as they could fix it up. One could even get a small refrigerator in the room. It was really elaborate, the kind of thing that most Russians would never be able to see.

That's where we were housed. There were, in all, perhaps with a few spouses and the technicians who came in and out and so on, perhaps anywhere between 35 and 50 people at any given time, Americans, a couple of Austrians, a German or two, the technicians, housed in this wing of the hotel. We were kept, particularly in Tselinograd, very isolated. One time we invited a couple of young Russians that we met to join us for dinner in the hotel, and we managed to sneak them into the hotel. We were having drinks and when they left, an amazing scene ensued, because we could watch out one of the windows. They had an instant meeting of all the watchers at the end of the square, which they didn't think we could see but we could see, and there were people there of all descriptions, babushkas, teenagers, or at least people who looked like teenagers, war veterans, you name it, they were all congregated, and they were given instructions, because they lost these two or three Russians that had come in to see us. They didn't apprehend them when they left the hotel, so they had to get all these people together and go for a search to try to find these people. There must have been 50 people out there, surrounding the hotel in various guises to keep an eye on the hotel and to apprehend the young Russians who were leaving our company. That gives you an idea of the kind of oppressive situation we were under.

Q: How long were you in this first place?

KIEHL: Two months.

Q: Where did the people come from? You've got 30,000 living in the city.

KIEHL: The collective farms in the countryside.

Q: Did we bus them in?

KIEHL: They bused them in, and they bused themselves in, because the exhibit was advertised on Voice of America, and Radio Liberty, and so word did get around that this exhibit was there. We had Germans who came to the exhibit, dressed in a rather old-fashioned way, whose only book was the Bible, in German, lived on collective farms, 100 to 150 miles away from Tselinograd, who the last leader of the Soviet Union that they knew was Stalin. They really didn't have any connection with anybody, they were really in the middle of nowhere, and yet some of them found their way to our exhibit.

We had a couple German speakers with us as well, and so we talked with the Germans quite a lot as well, whenever they would come in, because they were close to being the majority population in northern Kazakhstan, all of whom were displaced from the Ukraine and the Volga, and about a year after that exhibit was there, reports reached Moscow of riots in northern Kazakhstan. The Germans wanted an independent, autonomous area in northern Kazakhstan, and some of the people that we met there were people who were mentioned in this movement. There was a newspaper, kind of a volksstimme, a "Voice of the People", a German-language newspaper, and that became more nationalistic after we left. I don't say we had any direct influence on it, but it was part of the simmering undercurrent, even in northern Kazakhstan there was this undercurrent that finally broke to the surface about a year later.

Q: Where did you go after that?

KIEHL: Well, let's see. From Kazakhstan we went to – let me think – Dushanbe.

Q: Dushanbe being...

KIEHL: Tajikistan.

Q: Tajikistan.

KIEHL: We got there – of course we did August and September, or September and October, in that area. It was 40 degrees, 45 degrees Celsius some days. I think it got up to 48 or 50 on occasion. I remember that was one of the places where we had to put down a kind of parking lot surface – the Russians actually did that for us on a contract, and then the geodesic dome was built over this parking lot, and stretched with Mylar and the exhibit was housed inside there. There were a couple of out-buildings, as well, where the library was,.

That was memorable for a couple of reasons. For one thing, it was so bloody hot that we had to run hoses over the top of the dome all the time to cool it down and all the guides were given smelling salts in case anyone fainted, because if they fainted, the crowds were such a crush of humanity, they could be trampled quite easily. Anyone who fell to the floor could be trampled quite easily. It was essential for the guides to have smelling salts with them at all times in order to revive people who fainted because of the heat the closeness of the crowds. The exhibit was closing in a couple days, and it was the last day before all the students had to leave school and go help with the cotton harvest, and so there was such a crush of humanity that day. I don't think we ever got an accurate count of how many people came in. I mean, they literally stampeded into the building, and so at one point we all had to link arms and make a human chain in front of the building to keep them back and threaten to close the exhibit if they didn't stay back and come in in orderly groups of 100 or 150. What we had to do was funnel them through, as soon as a 150 people left another 150 were allowed in. We stayed open late just to get the crowd through.

That was a really scary moment. You really wonder, I mean you're standing there linking arms, and there's a crowd of God knows, 100,000 people, pushing in, wanting to get in to that exhibit.

Q: What interest did they have? Was it just that you were foreigners?

KIEHL: Well, Americans. Not all foreigners are of interest to these people. We were Americans, we were the country that was so on their minds, for good or ill. America was the only country that Russia wanted to compare itself to. A continental power, diverse nationalities of a couple hundred million people, who else are they going to compare themselves to? Certainly the Russians and Ukrainians in central Asia were almost obsessed with the idea of an invasion by China, the "yellow peril," another Genghis Khan, and that sort of thing, and they were almost pathetic in their appeal to us as fellow Christians, Caucasians, as a bulwark against the "yellow peril." It was so, evidentially, racist, but it was – I don't think that they even rose to that level, it was almost kind of a gut reaction of their history, that they lived in constant fear that the Chinese would come back, or the Asians would take them over again.

This was evident among the Russians and Ukrainians in central Asia, but obviously the indigenous people there had no interest in this kind of philosophy at all. They felt themselves subjugated by the Russians and Ukrainians.

Q: When they would come in, you had to respond of course, to them. Were they interested in the farm equipment?

KIEHL: They were, they loved it, and they couldn't believe that a tractor would have air-conditioning and a radio. They said, "Ah, pakazuya, this is just for show." But in fact, most tractors in the Midwest have to have radios and air-conditioning. Nobody would go out in a tractor all day without it.

A lot of the video and film presentations about a glass of orange juice in the morning, in New York City, how it came there in 24 hours from Florida, the processing and all that sort of thing, the trans-shipping and suddenly the guy walks down to the grocery store and get a jug of orange juice and has it for breakfast, this was a revelation. This was magic to most of these people.

Q: Was there a problem of trying to be concerned about the pride of the people and all that. We were saying, "God, we can do this a lot better than you can."

KIEHL: In fact, it was the other way around. The Russian expression is U nas luchshe. "We have it better." That was the immediate response to anything that they saw. U nas luchshe, we have it better. Of course it was just a way of trying to save face.

We tried to go out of our way not to rub this in the faces of the people visiting the exhibit, that the societies were so unequal in terms of wealth and quality of life, particularly in these backwaters in central Asia. We tried to do that, but the whole exhibit was designed to make America look good, let's face it, and to make our system look good, particularly, and as I say, in the one area that I think it was probably to excess, the focus on the family farm, because in America today, the family farm is not doing all that well, and wasn't doing all that well then, either. Of course, that fit into the ideology of a free society and free market.

Q: Where else did you hit?

KIEHL: After Dushanbe – and by the way, Dushanbe was an interesting place, too, in that we really got to know a lot of the Tajiks. We were able to interact with people a lot more. Now, a lot of these young Tajiks were Komsomol members ...

Q: That's the ...

KIEHL: Young Communist League. So they were establishment, young establishment people, but they, still, their attitudes were so obviously anti-Russian. When they could get away from the Russians and talk with us they were entirely different people. They became really quite different people, and maybe the best example of that – one of the things I used to do is, because I was the embassy protocol officer, was try to call on local officials and talk to them and see what their concerns were, and what their life was like and get a little biographic information on all these people, of course, and then report it back to INR. So I was constantly pecking away at our

Russian keyboard typewriter to make little notes of requests for meetings, and calling people, getting a hold of a phone book so I could call officials and say, “Hello, I’m so-and-so, from the American embassy, I’m here with the exhibit, which I hope you will attend, and we’ll be happy to give you a special tour, et cetera, and I’d like to call on you, and blah blah blah.” Sometimes I was successful, sometimes I wasn’t, it was really hard slogging, and of course it was all at the whim of the local KGB guy, my opposite member was always the local KGB guy,

The exhibit directors’ opposite member was KGB also who traveled with the exhibit as a “fixer” for the exhibit. He was the opposite number, a Belarusian, Ilya Nosev was his name, and he was with us the whole year, and then there were some transportation people for the Russian railway system, because all of this stuff had to be shipped by rail. You think about this, how this evolved, could we ever do this again, anywhere?

My local guy was always the local KGB guy, Moldavia was the little Moldovan guy with a little pencil thin moustache, and in Tajikistan it was this Ukrainian guy who was my opposite member, he was the local KGB guy, et cetera.

We got pretty close to the Tajiks there, even the KGB local was a Tajik, although the young people from the Komsomol wouldn’t talk with him around. They told us how resentful they were of the Russians and Ukrainians running everything. I managed to call on the first secretary of the city and the second secretary of the city Communist party, in Dushanbe, but both Tajiks. I walk in, the two Tajiks are there, and a Russian minder. So, we’re talking, and it’s very stilted, truly stilted, and they pretended not to speak Russian so everything had to go through the Russian as an “interpreter,” and for some reason or another he got up to get tea for us. The moment his back was turned, these guys started talking a mile a minute in Russian to me, kind of trying to be friendly and nice instead of officious idiots, which is what they were when the Russian was there. Since he was coming back they pulled back again. That was the clearest – really, you rarely get such a clear indication of how things really work.

In most of the cases in central Asia, the first secretary was always a local person, and the second secretary usually was a Russian or a Ukrainian. The real power was the second secretary of the party. You could sense at even at that high level, they were big shots in the local communist party, they too were resentful of these Ukrainians and Russians running things, so it was even more evident among the Komsomol, and then something that even the casual observer would immediately notice, at 3:30 or 4:00, when everything let out, people would come pouring out of the buildings, a mix of Russians, Ukrainians, Uzbeks, Tajiks, et cetera, all come streaming out of these government buildings, they would all form up separately.

All the Tajiks would be in one place, all the Russians and Ukrainians in another, it would be almost like the South in the days of segregation, but it was segregation by choice for these people. First of all, they would live in different parts of town, most of the center-city area was Russian-Ukrainian, most of the Tajiks lived on the periphery of the city, so they had different bus lines and trolley lines to go to. They’d never talk to each other. You’d almost never see a Tajik and a Russian together, a husband and wife or friends, male friends, or female friends, except in the business place. As soon as they left the building they’d split, and it just seemed so – even from a very casual observer, you could see that there was something wrong here in this society.

Then, of course, that proved to be the case later, there were a number of riots between the Tajiks and the Slavs in later years, and of course, since the dissolution of the Soviet Union there are precious few Slavs left in Tajikistan, I'm sure.

Q: You went to Moldavia, and where else?

KIEHL: After Dushanbe we went to Moldavia, then up to Moscow, for the showing of the exhibit in Moscow, where we actually moved into our apartment, which was waiting for us up there, one of those Soviet-style apartments, and then the last was Rostov na Donu Don, Rostov on the Don [River], in southern Russia, which was probably most notable for "RosSelMach", the Rostov agricultural machine kombinat, which made the sort of caterpillar-tractor type agricultural machine, and they even had their big theatre there, was even in the shape of caterpillar tractor, it was amazing piece of constructivist style architecture.

Q: Well, actually, caterpillar was sent over during the '20s and '30s, they built factories for the ...

KIEHL: So each of the agricultural areas had a point to it, obviously there was grain, wheat in Tselinograd – well, in Ukraine it was really fruits and vegetables – but in Tselinograd it was wheat, Dushanbe it was cotton, in Kishinev it was all viniculture, so we drank a lot of wine and a lot of brandy there. In Moscow, it was kind of general, obviously, and then Rostov was mechanized agriculture.

Q: Were you picking it up – you know, one goes back to the '20s and '30s and those Soviet films where boy meets girl, boy sees tractor, boy meet girl and falls in love with tractor-type things. Has that romance sort of gone – I mean, were you picking up the spirit of the collective farm at this point?

KIEHL: Oh, yeah, but the spirit of the collective farm was dispirited, to say the least. Most collective farms were really in pathetic condition. Young people left them, so most of the people were, if not middle-aged, older than middle-aged, very ineffective and inefficient agriculture, essentially. People just were very poor, they spent all their money on vodka to forget about it all, I mean, it was really the worst kind of grinding, rural poverty.

Some of the state farms were in better shape because they were basically factories, and the people were wage-earners, and they got wages for their work, but in the collective farm you didn't get wages for your work, you shared the profit of the collective farm, and the collective farms rarely made anything close to a profit. So people essentially ate what they grew and bartered for other things like vodka.

Q: By the time you finished this whole thing, did you find that you were coming back with a perspective on the core of the Soviet Union that your colleagues in the embassy just didn't have?

KIEHL: I would say I had a more realistic view of the Soviet Union than my colleagues who stayed in Moscow. Now, I went from the exhibit to Moscow, to pick up my tour as a press officer thereafter, but most of my colleagues at the embassy, except for relatively few who were able to work with the dissident movement and so on, or the Jewish community, or the religious dissidents, Pentecostals and so on.

They didn't have the opportunities to meet ordinary Russians very much. They led a pretty prescribed life in that embassy, and in the foreign residential compounds that were there. Those of us who were with the exhibit, even though there was a lot of watchfulness over us, and a number of provocations and that sort of thing, we were able to get out and about. The Russians had figured it out, that if they met you in a public place, at a restaurant or on the floor of the exhibit, and they spontaneously invited you home for dinner, and you went, and you talked, and you had a good time or whatever, and you never saw each other again, it was OK, because when they got called in by the secret police, and said, "What were you doing with that guy?" they could say, "Well, I spontaneously invited him, out of hospitality, to join us, and we had an inconsequential conversation," and they could relate the conversation or whatever, and that was it. There was no follow-up; nothing would have to happen to them.

In fact, that's really, literally what occurred with a lot of the people with whom we met. Unless they habitually met with a foreigner--then they could get themselves in big trouble, where they would have to become a provocateur, or become an agent of the secret police in order to survive, but if they just did this once, one evening, kind of a fling, somehow the Russians understood that, that the spontaneity of human beings is such that how could you help but, just out of curiosity, want to talk with this foreigner? And then, of course, never see them again.

Q: Did you have our agricultural attachés pay visits to you, to find out what you had, and sample what you were seeing?

KIEHL: There were three agricultural attachés, three Americans in the agricultural attaché office in Moscow. One would come out for the opening of the exhibit in each city, but they really couldn't cover a whole country like that, three people in Moscow, and they were essentially, like the science attaché's office, travel agents for visiting firemen of all descriptions. I mean, the science office was actually a joke. They were five officers who were the science attachés; there was one real science attaché, who actually had a degree in something scientific. All the others were Foreign Service officers who didn't have a clue about science, but they were essentially a tourist office for the enormous numbers of American scientists who would come on exchange programs with Russian scientific organizations.

The science attaches would set it up the visits and they would dutifully attend the meetings and take notes and do reporting. That's all they could do. There really wasn't enough time or manpower to do anything else. The agricultural attaches, to some extent, were trapped by that, too, because there were exchange visits and programs with which they also had to deal.

The agricultural attaches would, of course, go on drives out to look at the crops, and they actually could understand whether a crop was stunted or not, unlike us. We'd have to say, "Well, it was that high, that's stunted," or "What color was it?" "Well, it was kind of a grayish-brown," we'd have to describe these things, and they would understand what that meant. They were on top of that.

The agriculture office was quite interested in the market-basket reports that we would do. Every city we went to, and between the various cities where we were for two months, the time it took to ship the exhibit to the next city, we were free to travel, and so it would cost the government just as much to keep me in a hotel in Moscow as to pay me to travel around the former Soviet Union. So we would travel all the time, for a couple of weeks or even a month, it took about a month for the exhibit to be transported from Dushanbe to Kishinev by rail. Every city we went to, I would do the same thing. I would see if I could get a phone book, do a market-basket report, and write up my impressions of the city and the people I talked to, and again, we'd be in hotels and people would figure out we were foreigners and Americans. As soon as they knew that, they say "Oh, come home and I will give you uzbeski plov [Uzbek pilaf] like you have never eaten." OK, sure, we were up for anything, why not? Off we'd go and take endless trolleys to the periphery of town and go up into the tenement, and there the husband and I would cook plov together, on a stove about the size of a modern microwave-- all cooked with lard, spices and all kinds of junk. My wife and the Soviet wife would talk about the children and schools and things like that, and we would talk about more manly things in the kitchen, while chugging down some brandy and then we'd all get together for dinner and they would show us their wedding pictures and that was the end of the evening.

I remember one time in Tashkent, the husband was showing me his wedding pictures and then out comes a photo of the Soviet Union's equivalent of a 747 and then I learned that he's a foreman in the factory that makes these, this is the new Russian plane which nobody had seen yet, the jumbo, the Russian jumbo jet. I thought to myself, "Well, the door is going to fly open right now and they're going to have camera's flashing for proof of my "doing something incompatible with my diplomatic status." But it didn't happen. So I could, say that I was probably one of the first Americans ever to see the Russian jumbo jet, because the foreman in the factory had shown me a copy of the picture.

This kind of thing would happen fairly consistently throughout the whole year, in some cities more often than others. I mean, central Asia was kind of fun. Kazakhstan was probably the worst experience. It was the first city we'd been to, we'd gone through -- the people on the exhibit were traumatized by the Kiev experience, which was really quite nasty. It was very confining there, the way they had set it up, we were really prisoners in that hotel, but in the other cities, by and large, we could go where we wanted and we were constantly meeting people and going to peoples' flats and having a meal or eating some pickles or drinking vodka. So we'd have a chance to talk with a large variety of people, something which most of our colleagues in Moscow couldn't hope to achieve. And I also saw what was out there in the countryside. So I think I had a more realistic impression of the Soviet Union, how poor it really was. I mean, it wasn't Moscow. Moscow was the best of everything, and St. Petersburg was the second best of everything. Well, we were at the ninth best, terrible conditions, and most of the country was like that. It wasn't a rich country; it wasn't a very efficient country. We saw the trucks breaking down, military vehicles breaking down on the roads, all the time. The ones in Moscow didn't break down, because they were the show pieces.

I think in that sense I had a lower estimation of the power of the Soviet Union than I would have had, had I spent the entire tour in Moscow. I'm not so sure that anybody would have been any different.

Q: What about provocations while you were there? You had these young guides and all, Americans, did people fall in love ...

KIEHL: Yes. We had to send a couple of people back over the course of the exhibit, but the first, the city of Kiev was really the worst, and after that – the guides were pretty intelligent, they weren't nineteen years old, they were graduate students. They had seen what could happen in Kiev. They were, I think, mostly very well-disposed toward Russia. They loved the Russian language and culture. They only lasted six months, we had two groups of guides, one would switch out and the new one would come in, the second half. The staff would remain the same, however.

By the time the guides were in their third city, they were pretty cynical, and awfully antisocial. So what it did is it took eastern establishment liberals and turned them into right-wing fanatics, after three cities of the KGB trying their best to mess up your mind and get you in trouble. But by and large it was a wonderful training ground. Not only for the foreign service, because a lot of these guides are in the foreign service now, but also the intelligence agencies and the academic world. I'm thinking offhand, with our group, the guy was the GSO (General Services Officer) for the exhibit is now the DCM in Moscow. One of the other staff members is in Senior Assignments in the Department right now. Another is married to the DCM in Moscow and is a Foreign Service officer also. I can just sort of go through the list, and if they're not in the Foreign Service or the intelligence community, they're in something to do with Russia in business or in commerce or something. Another guide is the head of the Russian desk at the Department of Agriculture. He was actually a Russian speaker who was also a farm kid, so he was the perfect guy for that. Two or three of the guides went their way into the foreign agricultural service.

So the exhibits were wonderful training grounds for young, potential recruits for the Foreign Service.

Q: How did your wife find this whole experience?

KIEHL: Oh, she loved it. She's, I suppose, more interested in Russia than I am today, if that's possible. She did her Russian at FSI also – she wasn't a Foreign Service officer then, although she joined later, and she did her exhibit duty in the exhibit's library. She and one of the guides ran the exhibit library, where the three agricultural specialists hung out, and so she actually met a better class of person, in other words, the people who would get a pass to go to the library were people who the guides – each guide had a limited number of these passes and so they were told, "Give these passes to legitimate researches and people who are interested in agriculture on an academic level, or people that we needed to talk to for other reasons." If that were the case, then we would kind of talk to them – in other words, if they had some story to tell or something really important to convey. If the guide could get a flavor of that on the floor of the exhibit, he would give them a pass to the government library where there weren't any Russians overhearing the conversation.

Q: Speaking of that, how did you find the hand of our station, the CIA group in Moscow, I mean, for what you were doing?

KIEHL: There was no connection that I could discern between the station and the exhibit. For one thing, it was a USIA exhibit, and USIA was almost paranoid about cozying up with the other agency, as you know, I mean, it was an agreement that was brokered at the White House in the mid 1960s, to keep the two agencies apart, because it would destroy our credibility if any connection were ever shown there. Of course, in the early days of USIA that was less of a concern. The intel people could brief us on what the Russians were doing with us. In fact, in our exhibit, they had a list of us and what our alleged intelligence connections were, according to the Russians. The KGB had put together a little list – I was CIA, of course, but other people were ascribed to military intelligence, or the National Security Agency, or whatever. So that was noted after each of our names, and they also told us, in fact, that they had gotten information that they were now using fiber optics in our hotel rooms so they could have video, as well as audio, of everything that went on in our hotel rooms.

Other than that kind of debriefing there was never a request from the station, or from Washington, on behalf of the intelligence community to collect anything, or to do anything. Now, it isn't beyond the realm of possibility that one or two of the guides were undercover which I didn't know about. That's perfectly conceivable and frankly would make a lot of sense if that were the case, but because I didn't know about it, I can't tell you.

Q: Your guides, were they all men?

KIEHL: No. Men and women, both. Probably, my guess is probably something like 65-35, two to one male to female, maybe.

Q: Then you went back ...

KIEHL: My wife accompanied me, and the director of the exhibit, who was an exhibit professional, and his wife accompanied the exhibit as well. I don't think there were any others.

Q: You finished this when, '79?

KIEHL: Yes, '79. Summer of, let's see, it would have been in the beginning of June of '79, in Rostov.

Q: And then you did what?

KIEHL: Then we took a month's vacation on the Adriatic coast because I had not had a day off for an entire year. The exhibit worked six days a week and we were off on Tuesdays, but on Tuesdays I programmed the agricultural specialist to lecture at various universities, and I would go with them to the universities. So I was working seven days a week for a solid year, and while in retrospect I can't believe I was so stupid, it didn't bother me at all. It was an interesting life and what would I do differently on a day off in Rostov?

But at the end of that time I had nothing to do for a month and we just went to the Yugoslav coast and vegged out and ate a lot of fish and relaxed for a month and then went back to Moscow and picked up right where we left off in our apartment, got into the embassy routine. I was a press officer there.

Q: So you were press officer from '79 to '80?

KIEHL: Yes, I stayed through the non-Olympics.

Q: I was going to say, this was a really critical time.

KIEHL: Well, exactly. You see, very shortly after I returned to Moscow, all that upward momentum in U.S.-Soviet relations came to a crashing fall with the Soviet invasion.

Q: Prior to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in December of '79, were events in Iran resonating at all, or was this just another country far away?

KIEHL: No, they were resonating a lot. If you remember that was the period when there was – I mean, it was kind of an early warning of what could happen in that part of the world. You had events in Iran, you had the attack in Mecca, if you recall, you had the burning of the American embassy in Pakistan, you had the assassination of Spike Dubs, all this was at about that same time. I'll never forget the room just outside my office is where all the wire tickers would come into the embassy, and I remember one day in particular, it was that coincidence of three of these things happening at the same time, I never heard the bells ringing on those tickers like that ever before or since. Of course, they don't have those kind of tickers anymore, so I guess I couldn't, but in the days when they had wire tickers, I never experienced hearing those bells ...

Q: The bells would ring if it was important, breaking news.

KIEHL: Yes, that's right, breaking news. Right. And the more rapid the bells would ring the more urgent – well, it was almost constant. In a sense, being in Moscow, which we all considered the center of the universe, of course, the most important embassy in the world, et cetera, we immediately looked at this at how it would related to U.S.-Soviet relations. Everything was centered around U.S.-Soviet relations.

To some extent, that was a little foolhardy, because obviously the Dubs assassination had a U.S.-Soviet connection.

Q: It was a really strong Soviet connection ...

KIEHL: Because it was the Russians who precipitated Spike Dobbs's death by attacking that hotel room. But in the case of Pakistan and the burning of the embassy there, I'm not so sure that you could really say there was any kind of Soviet connection to that, and the attack on Mecca – these were indigenous elements. It was early terrorism, basically.

Q: When you got back – this is prior to the Afghanistan business – when you got back, in the first place, who was the ambassador and how did you find the embassy as such, and how USIA fit into it?

KIEHL: USIA was not USIA in Moscow. As in most of Eastern Europe, it was the press and cultural section of the American embassy, because the U.S. Information Service was expelled from all these countries in the early '50s as a subversive organization. So while technically we no longer had to do a paper transfer to the State Department, and our paychecks were really USIA paychecks, to the world, we were the press and cultural section of the American embassy, whether it was in Prague or Warsaw or Moscow.

In Moscow, we had a pretty big operation there, because from '56 on, when we had officers there, it was the beginning of things like the exhibits, exchange programs, the magazine, America magazine, and of course the radios, which were the most expensive part of the USIA operation to that part of the world. So those operations got to be fairly large. In Moscow, we were called P&C up and P&C down. P&C up was largely on the 7th floor of the main building, of the embassy building, which was beyond the vault door, essentially, and that's where the press operation and the public affairs operation was. P&C down was essentially the cultural office in the North wing, near the consular section, if you remember the layout. That North wing was the consular section and the cultural section, P&C down, as they called it. And P&C up and P&C down rarely talked to each other, by the way.

P&C down was cultural exchanges, speakers programs, that kind of thing. When I went to Moscow, I was in P&C up, of course, as the press officer. My job was the Russian press and America magazine. That was basically my daily duty. There was another officer who was the embassy spokesman and dealt with the foreign press. There was another officer who dealt with radio and TV. The cultural section was summarily split up. My wife actually then got a job in the cultural section, working with the Fulbright program as a local hire.

Of course at that time, if you remember, that was the time a consular officer made, I should say, a big mistake, and allowed someone to come into the consular section with a bomb. That was in that same building. It didn't affect the cultural section too much. That was before we got there.

Anyway, the two section were ostensibly under the same boss, the Public Affairs officer, but because they were in two separate wings of the embassy, and one was essentially closed to any visitors and the other was open to visitors, particularly American exchange students and grantees and Fulbrighters and journalists picked up their mail there, so you had 50 American correspondents permanently stationed in Moscow coming in for their mail all the time. And occasionally Russians would be able to get into the building and talk to people, and that's where they would go, either there or the consular section. My wife and I often said we were the link between P&C up and P&C down because we talked to each other. So she would tell me what was going on there, and I would tell her what was going on up here.

The other thing that was kind of interesting is that my office was one of the few that had a balcony right over Ulitsa Chaikovskaya. It was on that balcony that the microwave measuring device was installed, because I was the embassy officer that the media would call – the Associated Press, routine as anything, every month, would call and say, "What can you tell me about the microwaves?" And I would say, "The level is constant," or "There's increased activity.” I was authorized to give that kind of vague information, and it was based on the little device outside my office.

Q: What was the feeling about these microwaves?

KIEHL: Nobody really took it that seriously. They had these aluminum, well, screens, essentially, for our windows which allegedly kept the microwaves out. Everybody had heard all kind of stories. They knew where site A was, they knew where site B was. I mean, I could look across the street at site A. That’s where they were beaming the microwaves from. Of course, that went up in flames just before I left Moscow, you know. An accident, of course, and site B was over near the commercial section, which was in another building down the street a little bit.

People didn’t take it that seriously. Some people probably were worried for their health, but frankly, most people didn’t consider it really a serious matter.

Q: Who was ambassador at the time?

KIEHL: When I first arrived, Mack Toon was the ambassador. In fact, when I got there, the first week, before shipping off to Tselinograd, I just sat in the back of his press conference. He had, occasionally, press conferences in an old auditorium down at the commercial section – he was ambassador when I was in Belgrade, also – so he looked out, and you have an idea of what a friendly fellow he was, he said, “Kiehl! What the hell are you doing here?” And I said, “Well, Mr. Ambassador, I’m assigned here.” He said, “Nobody ever tells me anything.” That was the greeting I got from him. But anyway, I didn’t see much of him thereafter. By the time I got back to Moscow they were about to change, and in fact, Mack Toon, who was Mr. Hard as Nails, chew you up and spit you out for breakfast, was probably the wrong ambassador to have at a time of increasingly close relations between the two countries, because he made no bones about his distaste for the Soviets.

Tom Watson replaced him. Avuncular Tom Watson of IBM, whose memories of the Soviet Union stemmed from World War II, when he flew B-17s into Mirmansk. Of course, he arrived just before the invasion, when relations went to hell, and of course he was just the wrong person to be in that situation, too.

Q: Prior to the invasion what were you doing?

KIEHL: Prior to the invasion, what was I doing? Well, I was distributing America magazines, I was working with Soyuz Pechat’ – actually, Soyuz Pechat’ was the outfit that ran all the kiosks, a lot of kiosks – to get our magazines distributed. That was a beautiful correlation between the state of U.S.-Soviet relations and the number of America magazines that were sold. In fact, I tried to prove this point by plotting out a chart of our circulation and indicating pluses and minuses in U.S.-Soviet relations, and they tracked beautifully. All you had to do to figure out what our rating was, as a country, with the leadership of the Soviet Union, was to find out how many newsstand returns we got of America magazine. A lot of people just didn’t understand that, no matter how many times you could prove it. And so, in those days, for example, when our relations were good, we were averaging about 1200 or fewer newsstand returns out of 60,000 copies. Post-Afghanistan, of course, there were over 10,000 returns. Of course the Soyuz Pechat' people with their dead pan humor would tell me that people just simply wouldn't buy this rag.

I spent a lot of time working on that, but my main job was the Russian press. So I was cultivating people in the Russian press, going out to lunch with Izvestiya and Pravda commentators and getting to know them. Of course, they were important conduits of information passed to the embassy through them, to us. That was the whole point of these lunches. I wasn't going to convince them of anything, and they weren't going to convince me of anything, but it was a way of getting messages across, and it worked pretty nicely. I had a lot of good lunches with interesting people.

Q: Did you find that – I mean, there's the one side of the Communist press, which was just all this gobbledygook, political talk ...

KIEHL: Right. It made it easy to read, because they're all formulas.

Q: Yes, I mean, the whole idea was to rate the code, which I guess was really quite easy to break, basically. You come up to whatever paragraph the guts of the thing was in, but how about for the rest? What was your impression? Was there a fairly good news system within the Soviet Union?

KIEHL: There was a very good news system, it just wasn't available to the general public. There was, just as in Yugoslavia there was a thing called Black Tanjug, which was the external wire, and Red Tanjug had the internal wire of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia, which had all the news that they couldn't put in the papers in Borba and Politika. So, too, they adopted that from the TASS wire, internal TASS, which was full of important news. Occasionally, I would get copies of this, through just dumb luck, maybe, or perhaps to show me that something was in that issue. But in any event – I mean, it was a substantial document, and full of the major news of the world, from American media, from French, German, and so on, all in translation, so that the leadership of the Communist party and the government would be up to the minute on world news and world happenings and commentaries. So they were very well-served in terms of news. It was the general public that got a much more restricted diet, of course.

Q: When, at just about Christmastime of '79, the Soviets moved into Afghanistan, what was the reaction within the embassy?

KIEHL: Outrage, of course. Not that there was any shock and disbelief, because most people in the embassy had the feeling that the Russians were capable of doing anything, but I think the timing was kind of surprising for a lot of people. There really was a feeling that relations could get a lot better, but they didn't, obviously, and this was the central issue of why they didn't. Most people were surprised by it, and I wouldn't think disappointed so much as outraged. A lot of people sort of gave in to the underlying anti-Soviet feeling that they had, because unlike almost any other place in the world, the "clientitis" that people used to talk about in Foreign Service posts abroad, which there is some credence to, didn't ever exist in Russia. Everybody who came to Russia was essentially anti-Soviet, and the people who taught Russian studies in America were anti-Soviet. So they had a lot of hard work to do to try to convince people that they weren't the devil.

Q: Were people trying to speculate – I had never really had a –

KIEHL: You mean why did the Russians do this?

Q: Why they did it, I mean, even today I talk to people, and it doesn't seem to parse very well.

KIEHL: Of course the ostensible reason, a lot of people speculated, was that the Russians were using Afghanistan as a stepping stone to Pakistan and India and warm-water ports in the Indian Ocean. Well, of course they already had an alliance in everything but the formal sense with India. So they could use Indian ports for their navy anyway, and they didn't have a big enough navy to handle a third ocean.

Q: And they could use Cameron Bay, too.

KIEHL: That's right. They eventually did for a while. But they didn't have enough navy, actually, to make it worthwhile, and anybody who knows the geography of the area knows that Afghanistan is a place you're going to get bogged down in. Why use that as a stepping stone to Pakistan? It didn't make any sense. I think it was a miscalculation. I think that they got themselves in a situation where they had supported indigenous local Communists and they were ready to take power and they took power and they couldn't handle it and the Russians just started helping them out and helping them out, and the slippery slope. I think they just didn't realize what they were getting themselves into, and they trapped themselves in Afghanistan. Not the first people to do it and probably not the last.

Q: What were you doing after this, up through – I mean, all of a sudden we started putting the squeeze on Carter and what were you doing and so was the rest of the embassy? What changed?

KIEHL: Of course, there was again, a big propaganda offensive, worldwide, about the Russians in Afghanistan. Obviously there was a limited amount of that you could do in Russia. We found that, very quickly, most of our contacts dried up, as relations went south. Everybody sensed that this was not the time to be chummy with Americans and so, very quickly, all the marginal people that you'd want to have contact with went away. I was stuck with the Pravda and Izvestiya correspondents, the guys who were supposed to feed me information and get the line from me, to report back. It worked fine for both of us because we both had a good lunch on the government, whichever government had to pay for it. But essentially, that's what it restricted itself to. And, very soon, the numbers of newsstand returns from our America magazine escalated.

It became pretty grim. I remember one time, it was winter, it was freezing cold, and a spontaneous march on the embassy was about to happen. 10,000 Arab students, and Muslims of various stripes, were going to march on the American embassy and present a petition and perhaps stone the embassy. At least this was the word we got. So a couple of us, who actually could speak Russian at the time, were positioned to liaise with the police. We were put outside the gates. The gates were closed behind us, and we were there with local cops and we had a signal to get back in if we needed to, but we were out there liaising with the local cops out on the street, Ulitsa Chaikovskaya, in the freezing cold, for a couple of hours. I'm thinking to myself, “How did I end up doing this?” I’m a press officer, what am I doing here, standing with this cop?

Anyway, again, it was a language problem. As much money as we spend on training people in languages, people who are stuck in the embassy in Moscow weren’t able to speak. They could read the papers beautifully, but they couldn’t speak with a cop coherently and quickly. Whereas those of us who were bouncing around with exhibits, around central Asia, we picked up that facility. So those of us who could do that were out there with the cops. I’m thinking to myself, “Here I am, it’s beginning to snow, I’m here on the wrong side of the gate with this cop, and he’s not going to protect me and 10,000 Arab students are coming to stone the building. This is beautiful.” I’m thinking, “Well, maybe it’s about time I hit the doorbell and get inside,” when one of the cop’s associates comes running over and says, “Oh, you Americans always luck out--it’s starting to snow so heavily they all ran home.” They were afraid of the snow. The crowd was melted away by the snow! That was nice.

Basically, it was a very tense time. Nobody was willing to extend any friendship to the U.S. among the Russians, and our contacts shriveled back to the core, the kind of Cold War core, where I had a couple of people that I would be exchanging signals with, and the same would be true of other people in the embassy, and the people who were associated or close to people in the embassy, who were Jewish dissidents or Pentecostals and so on, they really got the pressure put on them. Essentially it drove the embassy in upon itself.

Q: Did the KGB pick on Americans at that time more than they usually did?

KIEHL: It depended. In Leningrad, in particular, they were very nasty. A colleague I went to language school with, who was in a branch office up there at the consulate ...

Q: Who was that?

KIEHL: Chris Arcos. He later became a political appointee and Ambassador to Honduras. He’s over at Homeland Defense now. He’s Tex-Mex but his wife’s Cuban-American, and so he got very friendly with the Cubans in Leningrad, St. Petersburg, so he came to the attention of the KGB and they assumed that he was CIA. They almost ran him off the road a couple of times, with his wife and kids in the car. It was pretty nasty. One of the people that I was in language class with, that quartet that I was talking about, was punched in the face in a hotel in Kiev, and her bag was taken from her, because they thought she might have something in it of use that had been passed to her. A dead-drop type thing.

So they did occasionally push the buttons. I didn’t have any great things happen to me. I had probably 30 flat tires on my car, all four at a time. They just let the air out, they wouldn’t slash the tires, so it was just a matter of pumping it up again. That’s how they let you know that they didn’t like what you were doing. One of the things that was interesting, when we were in Moscow, is that we had made friends with people out in these various central Asian places and so on, but when they came to Moscow, we were perhaps the only people they knew in Moscow, so they called me up, and I’d have them over. I’d have to pick them up at a subway stop or something, and then drive past the mili-man [Militiaman] who was glaring at them. We’d go into the apartment and we’d have dinner and drinks and they would be wowed by our apartment which I can tell you was really a dump, and they'd be fascinated by the bright lights of Moscow. Actually, after about six months out in the boonies, when you came to Moscow, you were looking around at the lights because you didn't have of that out there. That was their big trip, coming to Moscow. I would take them out again, and fingers crossed, we'd pull up to a subway and then they got out and into the subway and I'd hope that they wouldn't face any repercussions about it, but you never knew.

It was nice to catch up with people like that, but then again, they were taking a great chance, particularly in those days, when things were ratcheting down, and probably your average Soviet citizen really wouldn't be aware that things were much more dangerous for them to see an American now as opposed to six months before. They weren't, I don't think they were as sensitive to that as we were, because we worried about it more than they did, most of the time.

Q: As things went – particularly the Olympics, and the fact that we were ...

KIEHL: Oh, yes, the non-Olympics.

Q: That must have really seared the soul of the Soviets.

KIEHL: That really upset them about America, the average Russian. They were really hurt about that. They didn't really understand this Afghanistan stuff, but that's something that they really felt, that the U.S. was gratuitously hurting them. We did a lot of stupid things, I say we, the U.S. government. One of the things we did is that we had a cover and a whole issue of America Magazine devoted to the Olympics, and American athletes of the Olympics, when the Olympics was on. Of course, nobody stopped it. It was moving along and it was being printed, and then shipped to us, and then it went on Soyuz Pechat automatically. And then we got our copies and we saw that, "Oh, the Olympics, I wonder..." No sooner had we gotten these copies than a rocket came in from Washington, saying, "Do not distribute that magazine! Get all the copies back from the Russians!" We looked at each other and we said, "What a stupid idea that is. All we're going to do is make a big deal of it, and we'll never get all the issues back. Are you kidding? It's already out, and what difference does it make, it just tells the Russians about all these great athletes who aren't going to be coming to the Olympics."

So we went back and we said, "This is a bad idea, for the following reasons." And they said, "We don't care. Do it." So we did it. We went to Soyuz Pechat and we said, "You know those 60,000 magazines that were delivered, except for the dozen or so that we have, we'd like those back, please." And they said, "What?" "Oh, yes, there's a printing error, we'd like to pulp those." Arrangements were being made to ship these to Belgium, so they could be pulped in Belgium, because they wouldn't trust anybody there to do it. We had to send these to Belgium to pulp 60,000 copies of the magazine. They said, "Well, we'll let you know." Of course the next day a commentator for Novosti was on Russian television – Novosti [APN] being the most obvious KGB outlet--with a copy of the magazine, saying, "Look what the Americans are trying to do now. Idiots! We have obtained a copy of this magazine, here's the pictures," et cetera. So the cat is out of the bag, right? We then said, "Since the cat's out of the bag, what's the point of getting 60,000 copies of the magazine back, going through all these conniptions, then putting them on rail cars and shipping them to Belgium and having them pulped?"

[End Side]

Q: You were saying is, that what's the point?

KIEHL: Yes. Actually, this would serve our interests. It would show to the Russians that we have all these great, talented athletes that we're telling can't compete for higher national interest, right? We're not about to lose the Olympics. It's not because we're too inept to play the sports, it's because of political reasons we're doing it. Well, it didn't work.

I spent a thoroughly miserable couple of days at Soyuz Pechat', sipping tea with a couple of barnacled old Soyuz Pechat' bureaucrats as the conveyer belt went by with boxes of magazines, up and onto the truck. 60,000 magazines, and I had to count every box to make sure these boxes, I think, each contained 25 copies, I had to make sure that every single magazine was returned. We were not worried about newsstands returns, you see. I spent a couple of days doing that, then they were on the truck, then they went to a railcar which was to be sealed, then we sealed the railcar and the railcar went off to Belgium where the magazine were, presumably, pulped.

Then, of course, the next issue coming had the wrong number and date on it. So they had to ship them all to Belgium again – I don't know what the deal was with Belgium, that they were very good with glue, or what, but all the stuff was shipped to Belgium, where someone with some team of ladies, I suppose, laboriously pasted on a new date and number on the next issue of the magazine, so that we wouldn't lose an issue, you see. Then that was shipped out to us. Of course by that time we were getting 10,000 or 12,000 returns because, according to Soyuz Pechat', the "Soviet citizens could not stomach this magazine any longer", even though a copy of American Magazine would bring 25 to 30 rubles, the equivalent of $40 on the black market. That's the way it was.

Things were pretty grim, so we then figured, "OK, now we have to figure out what we're going to do with the Olympics." When the Olympics was going to be the Olympics, a couple of us were assigned the Olympic coordination team, when there was going to be an Olympics. So the front office immediately said, "OK, now you're the Olympic dis-coordination team, and what you need to do is see what's going on with the Olympics, in other words, talk to the other embassies, find out from the sports committee and under committee who was participating, at what levels and why, and all this kind of thing, and then you guys need to monitor the Olympics. Talk to people who are coming to the Olympics and find out why they're coming there and what their feelings are, et cetera, et cetera." All this ancillary reporting, which I'm sure is lost in a vault somewhere, and that's what we had to do, and that's why, instead of leaving, as I normally would have, in July, or staying around to watch the Olympics and getting a pass for it, we didn't go into the sports events, of course, because that would be construed as supporting the Olympics, we had to hang around outside the events and talk to Polish tourists about what they saw inside. That's what we did, through – I guess that was the middle of September it was over. Then I went back to Washington.

Q: When you went back to Washington what did you do?

KIEHL: I went back as the Soviet Union desk officer for USIA, in charge of the Soviet desk, which I rapidly had changed to the Soviet and Baltic Affairs desk, because nobody was handling the Baltic states in USIA. They were handling them pretty well at VOA, because they were broadcasting to them all the time, but USIA's headquarters didn't have anybody specifically with a Baltic portfolio. Having just come from there and realizing how important that would be, I petitioned to include that as part of the Soviet desk, so we did. So it was Soviet and Baltic affairs, which got me two nice national days, the addition to the Soviet national day. The State Department, I think, traditionally has the Balts with the Hungarians. The Hungarian desk, in EUR, also handled the Baltic states, but in USIA, nobody handled the Baltic states, which really didn't make sense, especially since we were investing a lot of money in the radio broadcasts, and there were a lot of Balts on exchange programs with the Soviet Union, and we did still recognize them as independent. I made the case, and it was a pretty easy case. No one had ever thought of it, I guess, or hadn't thought of it in many years.

So, yes, I came back to do that.

Q: You did this for how long? From '79 to ...

KIEHL: No, September of '80 to September of '82.

Q: Well, one of the things that I've noted on interviewing people who worked for USIA is that overseas is seen to as very active and very much involved in policy matters. When you get to Washington, you're kind of a personnel guy, there isn't much policy. How did you find that?

KIEHL: It was a little different, I think because of the Soviet Union. I came back, you remember, just as the Reagan administration came on board, so obviously I wasn't seen as the Soviet desk officer, Charlie Wick was the Soviet desk officer, and a guy named Ron Trowbridge, who was the head of the education exchange bureau was the deputy Soviet desk officer because he was probably the most right-wing person in the administration, and then eventually, it trickled down to the Soviet desk. So there was a lot of focus on the USSR Desk and because there was a lot of focus on it, it probably did have a lot of policy issues. Because of the U.S.-Soviet relationship having been soured by Afghanistan, we had very strict instructions as to who could visit the Soviet Union and who could – what kind of programs could be mounted there, et cetera, which came down, unfortunately, to me, having to clear every cable that went – every USIA cable that went to Moscow or Leningrad, literally. That's a lot of cables, so that was a very time-consuming thing.

Now, I wasn't the only Soviet desk officer, I was the Soviet desk officer, but I had a deputy. I also had a Russian émigré named Juri Jelagin, who was a Russian musician, who used to play violin for the Houston Symphony, who was then the editor of the Russian dialogue magazine (Dialog). He was also part of the Soviet desk. I also had an intern, who was in Russian studies, who ran the distribution and records system for Moscow, the computerized list of contacts, out of Washington. So we had a little coterie of four of us to handle this portfolio, whereas most other desk officers, one person handled Poland and Hungary, for example, handled two or more countries. We had some luxury of backup, but there was a lot of cable traffic to clear. And anybody who had to go there, we had to interview them, to see if they would pass muster to go.

That was a very time-consuming deal. The other thing was that once martial law was declared in Poland, for example, the, shall we say, the real right of center folks in the government wanted to shut down all the exchange programs with Russia, which we saw as about the only lifeline open in order to have access and understand what the Russians were up to. So it came down to a point where I was called by the director's office to say that associate director Trowbridge, who was the head of the e-bureau, was acting USIA Director that day, and he had determined that the Russians activities were so incompatible that we would immediately end the Fulbright program with Russia, and all exchange programs would cease with the Soviet Union. I put down the phone, and I said, "This is really stupid." I talked to my boss, and he said, "Yes, you're right. It's really stupid." He was the director of the bureau, and I said, "Well, look, maybe there's a chance we can stop this, if I get the State Department to say that it's a bad idea."

I called the Soviet desk, I was pretty close to the people over there, I was the only non-State person who was allowed to go to their meetings, so I was adopted, I suppose, in that sense. I called them and I said, "Look, this is the situation. What I need from you is something which would say that this is not in the national interest, and so it shouldn't be done." They said, "Good idea. Why don't we do that? Why don't we say that?" I hung up with them, and I went down to Trowbridge's office and I said, "Well, I can understand your feelings, sir, but I've just been on the phone with the State Department, and they say that it would not be in the national interest to do this, and so we should not do it." He said, "Oh. All right, well, I'll wait until Charlie [Charles Z. Wick, USIA Director] gets back, back from California." I said, "OK."

Well, of course, Charlie Wick was smarter than this guy and he knew that this would have been a disaster – he actually was a pretty intelligent guy. He understood that this would have been really counter-productive. So that little initiative died, but if that guy hadn't been told not to do it, he would have sent out a press release ending the exchange programs, and then, of course, he couldn't have reversed it. It would have been very difficult. This is what you had to put up with if you were a Soviet desk officer in those days.

Q: Of course the exchange programs were probably one of our most effective tools all around the world.

KIEHL: Oh, absolutely, absolutely. I think that's still true, that it's the single most important thing. Now, in the case of the Soviet Union, the exchange programs were relatively small. The Soviets wouldn't allow too much, compared to the size they became after 1991, 1992. They became enormous. So I would say probably the exchange programs, and the radios, and the things like America Magazine and the exhibits were all very important in a place like Russia, which was a closed society. But certainly, the value of exchange programs has certainly become obvious since the collapse of the Soviet Union, with those enormous numbers of young Russians who have been able to travel here and back again, and the networks that they've formed throughout the former Soviet Union. It's the one thing that's made a return to Communism almost – certainly, in my view, an impossibility, because there's now a network of people who would actively fight against that.

Q: Is there anything else we should discuss before moving – while you were doing this Soviet job?

KIEHL: Oh, you mean in the Soviet Union?

Q: No, in the desk back in Washington.

KIEHL: It was probably the ideal time to be in that position, because there was a lot happening, and it was very interesting to experience it. I think probably one of the key things, aside from this incident with the exchanges, and martial law in Poland, was the program that Charlie Wick had dreamt up, "Let Poland Be Poland," have you ever heard of that?

Q: Yes, I'm trying to think – yes.

KIEHL: There was a worldwide television special transmitted via satellite around the world, with components from all over the world on the theme, "Let Poland Be Poland." In other words, release your iron grip over poor Poland, Russia. This was the brainchild of – the brainstorm of Charlie Wick. I think, at the time, those of us who were professionals in public diplomacy or whatever you wanted to call it in those days, probably thought this was absolutely ludicrous, but Charlie Wick was convinced of it, and I think, actually, it was probably valuable for the Poles, because they got the feeling that the world was behind them. In the long run, it probably was positive. So the conventional wisdom was wrong, and the upstart from California, Three Stooges movies, actually proved to be a genius at this.

Q: There is a problem of the Washington conventional wisdom, which feeds on itself, and sometimes it takes an amateur or a maverick to break through. Normally conventional wisdom is more or less on track.

KIEHL: It's more wisdom than convention. In this case, it was more convention than wisdom. Anyway, of course, one of the things that was a little ridiculous is that people had to call the various posts and say, "Well, how many people would you say saw the program?" and that kind of thing, and then come these wild estimates of millions and millions of people, 30 million people in Italy saw the program, and all this data was packaged and sent over to the White House.

All that aside, which was so much internal brouhaha, the fact that it was done and the fact that all these people put something together and it was broadcast around the world, probably did a lot for the Poles. It didn't do much for the rest of the world, I don't think. In other words, people who thought the Soviets were beasts before thought they were beasts after. People who didn't, didn't, but the Poles got a charge from that, that in fact, the world was paying attention. The world was listening. So it really probably was worthwhile. That was one of, I think, the sidelights of that time in Washington.

Two years goes pretty quickly. I remember when martial law was declared I was down in North Carolina, and they tried to reach me down there and couldn't, I was staying at my sister-in-law's, but in the morning I opened the door and the New York Times had the headline, "Martial Law Declared in Poland." So I called our operations center and they said, "Oh, yes, we've been trying to reach you. Get up here, right away.” I said, “You realize I’m in North Carolina?” “Well, yes, but...” So I barreled up 95, collected my wife and we hurriedly said our goodbyes and barreled up 95 at a record speed, no doubt, and got there, and pulled up, and got out and went up to the operations center USIA, up on the 8th floor of the old USIA headquarters. I said, “OK, I’m here!” and they said, “Oh, it’s OK now.” I said, “Well, thank you.” This was before cell phones, they couldn’t have called back. They said, “It’s OK, we’ve got everything under control right now, but you need to come back first thing tomorrow morning, we have a meeting scheduled.”

It seemed like an awful lot of dashing about for nothing, but as it turned out they were really kind of shorthanded because the Soviet desk officer was away and the Polish desk officer was away, and they were the two principal countries involved in martial law in Poland. They had no expertise on hand for USIA, but I guess the world survived it, as it would.

MARSHALL BREMENT
Soviet Desk, National Security Council, White House
Washington, DC (1978-1980)

Ambassador Marshall Brement was born in New York in 1932. He received a bachelor’s degree from Brooklyn College and a master’s degree from the University of Maryland. He served in the U.S. Air Force from 1952-1955. Ambassador Brement’s career in the Foreign Service included positions in Hong Kong, Moscow, Singapore, Djakarta, and Saigon, and an ambassadorship to Iceland. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on April 11, 1990.

Q: I am going to skip over your Madrid period and go right to your NSC days because I realize time is running out. You were with the National Security Council from ‘79 to ‘81. What were you doing there?

BREMENT: I was in charge of Soviet affairs.

Q: And this was under the Carter administration?

BREMENT: The Carter administration, Brzezinski was the National Security Advisor.

Q: How did you get the job?

BREMENT: I was in Madrid and Brzezinski called me on the phone one day and said would you like to do this? And I said that it was an offer I couldn’t refuse.

Q: Would you talk about Zbigniew Brzezinski. He is a very controversial figure, and how did he operate and how effective was he do you think?

BREMENT: First of all, I would say he is a very quick mind, one of the quickest minds I have ever come across. And indeed it was sometimes frustrating to deal with him, just to talk with him, because he was always turning the corner before you reached the corner. And sometimes he was turning the corner the wrong way. I found the best way to communicate with him was in writing. He is very conscientious and, unlike some people, makes a point of reading what his staff sends him. He is a speed reader, and got through his in-box every day, so that you could send him a note and get an answer back the next day. So in terms of somebody to work for, he was a jewel, a joy, because I think the most frustrating thing that you can have as an employee in any bureaucracy is to keep dropping things with your boss and having the feeling they are going down a deep well, never getting read and never getting acted on.

He would turn material around. If you had ideas they would get to the President very quickly. I have often had the experience of, say, writing a memo on a Thursday afternoon, and indeed if Brzezinski thought it was worth his while he would hand it to the President the next morning at 7 a.m. and so by 9 a.m. I would have Presidential marginalia on the memo already.

Carter also was a workaholic, and one who got through his in-box. So in that sense you really had a feeling you were doing something when you were working on the staff. Indeed there is something about being in the Executive Office Building -- my office was the same one that Franklin Roosevelt had had when he was Assistant Secretary of the Navy. And when you are looking out the window you are looking at the West wing of the White House -- where the action is. So I found it an extraordinarily stimulating, and worthwhile place to work. I enjoyed it very much.

In terms of Zbig's effectiveness, he had great skills as a National Security Advisor. He was meticulously fair. He had strong opinions, but he was meticulously fair about presenting other people's opinions. And he is the best person I have ever encountered at summarizing what already has taken place. I've been at several meetings where the President walked in and the meeting had been going on for as much as an hour, and he would say, "Zbig what's happened?" And in three minutes Zbig would summarize beautifully exactly what it was about, the position of everybody at the table and so forth. He has that wonderful academic quality of being able to take what is happening and put it into paragraphs and sub-paragraphs, in an outline form, like the outline button on a computer. He gets it in outline form in his mind and he remembers the three points and the four sub-points. So he is very good at that. Being so quick, he has the drawback of being somewhat flip on non- important matters occasionally. I think he can go off the reservation sometimes. But by and large I think he was a very effective National Security Advisor.

The real thing that you learn by working on the NSC staff, and one should really learn it around Washington but few people do, is that it is the President who calls the tune, it is not the National Security Advisor or the Secretary of State. If you want to find out what is happening and why it is happening, look at the President. Brzezinski working for Carter is a very different person than he would have been working for Nixon, say, and it would have been a very different NSC staff.

Q: But what in your field, Soviet affairs which was obviously the keystone, what was Carter interested in?

BREMENT: My own criticism of Carter is that he didn't have a grand design. Brzezinski did. But Carter didn't. I don't think he had a world view of the Soviets. And I don't think he was after anything. He had a clear short term view of what he wanted from the Soviets. He wanted certain things. He wanted the SALT agreement. Arms control was a good thing, according to Carter, and therefore we should move ahead with the SALT II agreement. But the Soviets throughout the period were doing things that should have evoked a much sharper response from the President, from the State Department, but did not. That in my view was very unfortunate.

Q: Obviously the war in Afghanistan was the big one, you arrived there...

BREMENT: I arrived there before Afghanistan. I arrived there just in time for the Soviet brigade in Cuba mini-crisis, which everyone has forgotten now.

Q: That was a non-crisis really, wasn't it?

BREMENT: It should have been a non-crisis. But it was a crisis.

Q: Would you explain what that was?

BREMENT: Essentially the U.S. government went public with the allegation that the Soviets introduced a brigade into Cuba, and that this brigade indeed had to be removed because this act contravened certain gentlemen's agreements between us. And several Senators indicated that if this brigade was not removed, they would not ratify the SALT II treaty, which was a cornerstone of Carter's foreign policy. So the aim of the government was to try and get the Soviets to remove the brigade. The unfortunate fact was that the Soviets had not introduced a new brigade at all. They had had that brigade there for twenty years ever since the Cuban missile crisis. But the United States government simply forgot about it. We didn't know it was there.

Q: This is part of the problem of no institutional memory.

BREMENT: That is definitely a problem of no institutional memory. And, oddly enough, we had the photographs. It is not as though we didn't have photographs. But we just simply didn't have any analysts who were looking at those photographs with any real interest because the doings of a small brigade of 4,000 men was of no military consequence and no intelligence interest.

Q: How was Carter responding to this as far as you were seeing from reports or requests to you?

BREMENT: Carter was talking continually to various Senators and other politicians, including foreign leaders, about it. But he did not get into substance much. On that I simply think Carter said, let's settle this damn thing. And he left it up to Vance and Dobrynin to figure out some kind of solution.

Q: How was the thing worked out?

BREMENT: Well, finally, we sort of had to just put it aside. There was a limit on what the Soviets could be expected to do. That is essentially what Carter did. He made a speech saying that this is a bad thing and we have to worry about it. And indeed we are going to establish a Rapid Deployment Force to deal with threats such as the Soviet Brigade. But it is not important enough to gainsay the important work we are doing on the SALT II treaty. I am still for the ratification of SALT. This is just the way it is and we have to live with it. That's the bottom line on that one. But an awful lot of work went into that. It certainly wasn't the line I was recommending.

Q: Well, let me ask how. Here you are in charge of Soviet affairs on the NSC. How did you get your information and how did you work with the other agencies, including State and Defense?

BREMENT: I got all the cables that the State Department gets and I had contacts with people in various positions in the various agencies. There was an NIO for Soviet affairs in the CIA, Arnold Horelick; Assistant Secretary for Europe in the State Department, George Vest; there wasn't one person in the Defense Department who was an exact counterpart, but I would deal quite a bit with Walt Slocum on the brigade crisis. We formed a group at the Under Secretary level of the various departments. It included David Newsom, the Under Secretary for Political Affairs at the State Department, Deputy Director of the CIA Carlucci, Under Secretary of Defense Walt Slocum and we would deal with it. I would call meetings and we would go over it almost day by day to make sure we were all reading from the same script. I can't think of anything special that we did that would be surprising, but using the NSC position is the natural way to get various agencies together.

Q: What I am trying to get is the picture. This is not saying, "Oh my God we've got a crisis here in Afghanistan" so you would run and sit down at your typewriter and type out something...

BREMENT: Well, what would happen when you say "Oh my God we've got a crisis in Afghanistan" is that there will be a meeting of the real National Security Council, chaired by the President. To prepare the President for the meeting I would write a memo from Brzezinski to the President and a covering memo from me to Brzezinski, getting the President and Brzezinski ready for that National Security Council meeting. Then, growing out of that National Security Council meeting, there would be decisions taken of various kinds. Since they were Presidential decisions it would be my function to see that those decisions are indeed implemented, which would mean in some cases, if it was clearly a State Department function, I would simply liaise with the Assistant Secretary of State who dealt with the matter. Or if it was an inter-agency question, as in say Afghanistan, then I would call a group together and we would deal with certain basic questions on how we are going to handle it. And then indeed if some special committee grows out of this work, like I ran an inter-agency committee on getting the word out on what was happening in Afghanistan, that would be a different group of people, at a lower level, but always making sure that everybody was aware of what was going on.

Q: Were there any injunctions on you all, not you specifically but anyone within the National Security Council staff, Brzezinski or anyone saying "Don't go around and say the President wants this or the President wants that." You know this idea that other departments get somebody sometimes from the National Security Council staff speaking as though this were a direct order from the President. Were you under caveats to watch out for this or not?

BREMENT: I can't recall any specifically, but it is quite possible that he may have said something like that in a general staff meeting. I am pretty careful about things like that myself.

But it is true that a lot of people on the staff suffer from White House sickness, and just can't get over the awe they feel at being there. And they indeed try to make anything they do sound like the President just told them to do this. It comes from a certain inferiority complex, because you are dealing in almost all cases with people who are well above you in seniority.

I was certainly doing that as a Foreign Service Officer, because the people I dealt with were usually more or less at the same level. But on important matters I dealt with the Assistant Secretary for Europe, or the Under Secretary. These were people who were very eminent within the Foreign Service and I was just another senior officer at the time. And so you have got to get used to that. But indeed when some people are placed in that kind of a position, they tend to not handle it with grace. But it was a very thin staff. I really had nobody working for me. So I would go to these interagency meetings and if there were tasks to do, everybody else would go back and have somebody to do it, whereas if I had to do it I had to do it by myself.

Q: Probably a healthy inhibitor sometimes.

BREMENT: It is, yes. I am convinced of the importance to the United States of having a strong and very capable NSC staff with really top people in it. That is absolutely essential to our system of government. But I think the staff should be small.

Q: I've heard that he was suspicious of the Foreign Service. Did you find this?

BREMENT: I don't think Zbig was suspicious particularly, of the Foreign Service. He had a number of Foreign Service Officers working for him. I think he was pretty contemptuous of the State Department. And indeed I think that even if you are a Foreign Service Officer, when you sit over there in the White House and see what comes out of the State Department for the President of the United States, you grow pretty contemptuous of the State Department.

Q: What's the problem?

BREMENT: It's a repeated problem. It is just that the State Department functions for the Secretary of State and they will send something over to the White House uncleared by anyone of importance that they would never send to the Secretary of State. It's a question of overloaded staff work. I am talking about routine stuff. The problem is roughly this: you are coming up to an Economic Summit and you get a request for a talking paper from the State Department. The President is going to see the Japanese Prime Minister, and what should the President say to the Japanese Prime Minister? So the request goes to the junior guy on the Japan desk who has just joined the government and he sits down and writes his idea of what the President should say to the Japanese Prime Minister. And then he sends it out to 38 offices for clearance and they all come back with their own particular axe to grind. He should definitely raise the question of the Honda plant in Harlingen, Texas, or whatever, where they are not using union labor or some such thing. He dutifully puts it all in there. And so by the time he is finished he has a whole tome on U.S.-Japanese relations, which runs 7 or 8 pages single spaced.

Unfortunately, what happens is that this then makes its way through the bureaucracy, through everybody who is busy with other things, particularly if there is a Summit coming on. And you get it over there on the NSC staff, and you have this 8 page single spaced document and you look at the schedule and you find that the President is only going to be talking to the Japanese Prime Minister on a drive from the Canadian Embassy to the British Embassy.

And so you file it in the wastepaper basket and write your own memo saying you are going to be seeing Nomura on a ten minute drive to the British Embassy and the only thing you should really raise with him is the question of supporting the exchange rate which you talked about the last time, because the Japanese really haven't been doing anything about this other than putting us off. And then you send that in to the President. And if you feel nasty you send the State Department's memo in to Brzezinski, with a little note saying this is what the State Department thinks the President should say to the Japanese Prime Minister in a 13-minute limousine ride.

The State Department simply doesn't function well. President after President feels, with good reason, that the State Department has its own agenda. It is not there to support him. It spends its time explaining and is supporting the other side. And that's often the State Department position. They feel obligated to present the Canadian position, say, which is fine. You should present the Canadian position. But then you shouldn't defend it. If the Secretary gets captured by the State Department, then he begins to be seen that way.

Q: How was Vance seen by you all in the NSC?

BREMENT: One of the real problems of the Carter administration was that Vance and Brzezinski both had world views and these world views were diametrically opposite. Carter, I think, thought this was a good thing because it gave him the chance to judge between them. But the net result was that the United States position on issue after issue would be decided by Carter based on how he felt that particular morning. Since he didn't have any grand world view, there was never any consistency in what was being conveyed, so that the Soviet Union for one, simply shrugged their shoulders and gave up. They couldn't figure out what the United States was up to. I mean when the Soviets sent a Soviet general to Ethiopia to command Ethiopian troops using great hunks of Soviet military equipment to combat the Eritrean rebels and to go up against the Somalians, we didn't say boo. We didn't say a word; we didn't do anything when Sharansky was sent to Siberia.

Q: The well known dissident...

BREMENT: The well known Jewish dissident, we indeed made representations and we cut off a few exchanges just to show our displeasure. Well what the hell are the Soviets going to make out of that one? They are going to make out of that they could do whatever they wanted in Ethiopia and the United States really didn't care. But that is a mistake, that is terrible. It sends the wrong signal. In that sense we have a heavy responsibility ourselves for the Soviet decision to invade Afghanistan. The Soviets could not appreciate what the American reaction was going to be.

Q: This was a period of expanded adventurism in Africa.

BREMENT: Yes, indeed, and we'll get to Afghanistan in a minute.

Q: but ...

BREMENT: Also Southeast Asia.

Q: How were you responding, you were writing up things for Brzezinski...

BREMENT: Well I came at the end of it. So much really happened before my time on the job. The Vietnamese invasion of Cambodia was in the spring of '79 and I didn't get there until June of '79. So all that, the various things in Africa and Ethiopia, Angola, and so forth had taken place from '75 to '78 really.

Q: Well, where was Brzezinski standing on these?

BREMENT: Brzezinski was saying that the Soviets ought to be talked to about this. Vance was essentially saying we don't want to get into this kind of thing with the Soviets.

Q: When you were there what were the major...I suppose the major thing was Afghanistan?

BREMENT: Yes, the Soviet brigade in Cuba, followed by Afghanistan.

Q: Would you tell how you saw the Afghan thing and our reaction to it? And some of the players from your vantage point?

BREMENT: Well, the thing is we had enough indicators to see the Afghan thing developing. It looked pretty ominous, to the point that at the beginning of December we actually made some representations to the Soviets, but in a halfhearted way.

Marshall Shulman, who was Vance's advisor on Soviet affairs, was very much of the school that what we should be doing with the Soviets was increasing exchanges and trying to increase our links to the greatest extent possible; and that we shouldn't care what they do in the third world, which really wasn't of any major importance to us, shouldn't let it get in the way. These are bad people and they are going to keep doing bad things. We all know that. But there is a whole society out there that we have to reach. I think that was the general philosophy. I hope I am not misstating that. But the whole focus of the Carter administration in the fall of 1979 was on getting SALT ratified. So we were really under great pressure not to enlarge the Soviet threat unnecessarily. And the brigade in Cuba thing had been a fiasco, and made SALT II ratification almost impossible. Everybody understood that. So we were concentrating on playing down anything that might be happening with the Soviets other than making some representations when we caught the various indicators that they were building up along the border and it looked like they might be up to something. They indeed had sent Pavlovsky, the head of their infantry forces on a 10 week visit to Afghanistan during that period. And he was clearly looking around very carefully at the ground. But we couldn't really read that one and we weren't suppose to know about it so we couldn't complain. But it was too late. That was only a week or two before the adventure started.

Q: How was Carter responding to these developments?

BREMENT: I don't know if he was really being kept abreast of them or not. Essentially, that would be the function of his intelligence briefings, which I was not privy to. We certainly had enough indicators so he must have gotten some whiff that something might be in the offing. A full-scale invasion of Afghanistan clearly took him by surprise, as it did the CIA. In fact, he made a famous statement -- "I learned more about the Soviets last night than I did in my three previous years in office." This wasn't greeted by his Soviet advisor with great applause.

Q: Did you feel after this...Christmas eve wasn't it? that this was a whole new ball game as far as what you would be sending up?

BREMENT: Yes, it was clear right away that, first of all, the major aim of the administration, the SALT II agreement, was dead, and that it would have to be withdrawn from the Senate. That was the first thing. But it is an interesting example of the way the government functions that when I was looking around for ways for Carter to respond -- because there was a political necessity for the President of the United States to respond to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. It was too important an act for the President of the United States to simply shrug off. Yet when you started to look around at what the President of the United States could do about it, the answer was not too damn much. And so I spent the next couple of months fighting the battle of grain embargoes, and the battle of the Olympics, and those were the only two ways we thought we could respond to this horrendous development in an appropriate manner.

Q: You were looking around, these were think sessions, or what do you do? How to be beastly to the Russians?

BREMENT: Well, for instance, in December of 1980, when we thought they were going to invade Poland, as soon as something like this happens you think about every possible contingency and you make a list of thirty things that the President can do, which includes various military deployments, demarches, speeches at the UN, and so forth, but only very few had any teeth, would make any difference. And indeed when we thought about Afghanistan, we knew the things that were available right away. It didn't take any great imagination because you really can't come up with new ideas that have not been thought of before. A grain embargo was one thing. So we stopped selling grain to the Soviets and tried to get others to join us in an embargo to express international displeasure. We were singularly unsuccessful in doing that. Then we boycotted the Moscow Olympics. And indeed we put great pressure on various people to do that as well, to Helmut Schmidt's great displeasure. He claims that Warren Christopher had told him when he went through Europe that the United States was not going to boycott the Olympics and so Schmidt announced that the Germans wouldn't boycott them. And then he was told that we would. It made him feel very uncomfortable with the U.S. government. Of course Schmidt hated Brzezinski, and felt great contempt for Jimmy Carter.

Q: This was almost visceral would you say?

BREMENT: Visceral, yes.

Q: One last thing and then I will let you go. You mentioned concern over the invasion of Poland.

I recall this. This was 1980 when it looked like the Brezhnev doctrine was going to be re-done. How were you seeing it from your point of view?

BREMENT: From the intelligence coming in it seemed clear that they were going to invade. And we...I can't remember what I can say about this because it was all Top Secret at the time. I know that Brzezinski has sort of opened this up because he has written an article about it. But essentially we reacted in a way that led Brzezinski to claim that we stopped it. And this was of course at a period when Carter was very much a lame duck President.

Q: Did you have the feeling that Brzezinski was more Polish than American? I mean I'm not talking about loyalty, but I mean as far as his instincts, and all this, that he thought as a Pole and was centered on the Soviet Union?

BREMENT: I think Brzezinski was very conscious of the fact that he was Polish born, that he had an accent. And the fact that he was in the White House doing this job was a very important thing for him personally and a matter of great honor and trust that he would never treat lightly. But he was certainly a Polish-American and he used to have long conversations with the Pope in Polish. I remember being in his outer office listening to him talk to the Pope, but I think his focus was completely American. I think his Polish heritage influenced him in his view of the Russians. Yes, I think there was a certain visceral feeling there and I think they cordially returned it but I don't think it got in the way of policy decisions or judgments.

Q: One last thing, how do we view Brzezinski, he wasn't quite doddering...this was towards the end, but this was '79 to '81 did you feel that Brzezinski was pretty much in command of things?

BREMENT: Oh very much so, yes. Very few people in the government were as in command of their in-box, if any, as Brzezinski.

Q: Excuse me, I have said this completely wrong, I meant Brezhnev.

BREMENT: I was wondering about doddering. Yes, Brezhnev was in bad shape. We knew from intelligence that he was working two or three hours a day and even at that he was having trouble concentrating. When he met with Carter in Vienna, in June '79, when Carter would raise something, one of Brezhnev's aids would hand him an index card, and he would read the answer. He was not capable of handling it by himself. He was sort of the living dead.

Q: Was this sort of disturbing to everyone, because who was in charge? Where do you...?

BREMENT: It really was disturbing. And indeed I think the invasion of Afghanistan might well have been different if the Soviets had had a leader who was fully in command of the situation and the entire broad picture. I am always curious to know what Gromyko did about that. He presumably should have had the function of arguing against it, because of the way it would affect relations not only with the United States, but with the West, the third world. It was an absolutely disastrous decision for the Soviets, the beginning of the end of the Brezhnev security system, that Gromyko had worked so hard to set up.

THOMAS R. HUTSON

Thomas R. Hutson was born in Nebraska in 1939. After receiving his bachelor's degree from the University of Nebraska in 1962 he served in the US Army from 1962-1967. His career has included positions in Teheran, Belgrade, Winnipeg, Moscow, Lagos, Taipei, Belgrade, Bishkek, and Mazar-e-Sharif. Mr. Hutson was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in April 1999.

HUTSON: Finally, I should mention that I was assigned to Winnipeg for three years. One day I received a call from Bob Barry who was then the head of EUR/SOV. He told that Ambassador Toon would like to have me in Moscow to be his consul-general. I told Barry that I would be delighted with the assignment; I then asked whether he had checked with the Office for Security. I mentioned that because I had been nominated twice for assignment in the Soviet Union and SY had turned me down because my Latvian wife had relatives there. Barry thought he could take care of that problem and indeed he did. Later I saw my records and this transaction was straightforward. The ambassador had been asked; he was aware of the issue, but didn't think it should be a barrier to my assignment.

Q: We are now talking about 1978. Did you take any Russian training before leaving for Moscow?

HUTSON: Having studied Russian extensively previously, I went to FSI for just some brushing up for about six weeks and then left for Moscow, arriving in September, 1978. I stayed there until February, 1980. As I said, I was the consul general.

Q: What was your impression of the Soviet Union when you arrived? What was the state of U.S.-Soviet relations in 1978?

HUTSON: I had learned to have a great fondness for the "Great Russian Soul." I got largely from the White Russians with whom I had studied in Monterey. I had learned all the old Russian songs, etc. So I really was looking forward to my tour in Moscow. I had considerable sympathy for the people - not the system. I was immediately struck by the system. I changed my views in a hurry from someone who thought that eventually the system would change drastically to one who came to believe that the system had be terminated. It could never change enough. I agreed with Reagan's description of the Soviet Union as an "evil empire." I saw so many people who had been adversely affected by the system. Of course, that is the nature of a consular office; it sees many more dissatisfied people then any other embassy section.

The embassy was a "zoo." We did not manage the work; it managed us. During my tour, we witnessed the greatest emigration of Russian Jews in history. It was arranged by the Dutch, who set up a route through Rome and Vienna which eventually brought many of the emigrants to the U.S. In 1979, there were 50,000 Jewish emigrants. What is not well known is that in the same year, 10,000 Armenians also left the Soviet Union. Included were a number of "undesirables" that the Soviet authorities added to the flow.

It was also the year in which the seven Pentecostal Christians took refuge in the basement of the embassy. President Carter had given specific approval to giving this group political asylum. There were also three Armenians with them. Ambassador Toon called me and told me that he did not want any more refugees in the embassy. He was one of the best ambassadors I ever worked for. So we managed to get the three Armenians out. I worked assiduously to find another “home” for the Pentecostal Christians. That took five years! (Long after I had left).

Q: What did you try to do to get them out of the country?

HUTSON: I talked to them to try to convince them to leave. I talked and talked and talked to them. We negotiated with the Soviets who maintained that these were Soviet citizens and therefore subject to Soviet laws. They gave us no assurances not to prosecute. They would not tell us whether the Christians had violated any Soviet laws, which gave us concern. This group turned out to be a major work-load. We had two staffers who essentially spent all of their time taking care of them; they were also responsible for answering the large volume of mail that we received about the Pentecostals; the letters came from all over the world and were unanimously supporting them. I had been exposed to Pentecostal Christians in other parts of the world. They are essentially strong believers in their faith; the ones who took refuge in the embassy had literally walked across the Soviet Union and managed to slip by the Soviet militiamen guarding the embassy. And they refused to leave the embassy to return to their country. They were convinced that anyone who entered their room - and there were many who wanted to help and talk to them - had been sent by God to help them. So they trusted all their visitors. We had other devout believers who came from the U.S. to see them. Among the seven were three teen age daughters. We even heard that some of these people might try to impregnate them so that the children could be born on U.S. territory and therefore be able to claim American citizenship. That, some thought, would have increased the humanitarian rationale for letting them emigrate.

Then of course we had major attention from the press. I remember one time when Dan Fisher, the correspondent for Los Angeles Times wrote a scurrilous piece suggesting that we had deprived the Pentecostals of a Christmas tree and toilet paper. We did try to prevent these people from receiving items that might be considered illegal or contraband by the Soviets. They didn't have diplomatic privileges so that we tried to stick by the rules as much as we could. But the newspaper article was completely false and even though I was very friendly with Dan, I told him that I thought he had done a terrible thing.

So these people were a major work-load for the embassy. Toon, whom as I said, I greatly respected, used to vent periodically and insist that I get the Pentecostals out of the embassy. He used to say, “This is my embassy. Get them out of there!” I would then go to talk to them, without avail. Toon was replaced by Thomas J. Watson, Jr. - the retired chairman of IBM - ; he spent a lot of time with the Pentecostals talking to them, unlike Toon who didn't want to see them. He did agree to meet with them on a couple of occasions. Also to no avail I must say that their stay in the embassy was quite an educational experience for me. After I left the Foreign Service, I moved to Texas. There I ran into one of the organizations who criticized us the most for the way we handled the Pentecostals. It was called “Christ for the Nations Institute,” headquartered in Dallas. The Vashchenkos and Chymykhalovs have a world-wide following, particularly in Switzerland and the UK. During the 1978-83 period, they wanted to know why we cooperated with those God-hating heathens - the Soviets. They suggested we put the seven into diplomatic pouches and fly them out that way. So when I was living in Houston, I called the executive director of this organization - a woman by the name of Freda Lindsay. I called her in 1982 on the fourth anniversary of their asylum which this organization was celebrating. Ms. Lindsay invited me to come to Dallas; she said she would give me three minutes to speak in their celebration program.

She didn't realize that I was a former gospel singer. I had also done a fair amount of preaching in my life. So I took 33 minutes. I may not have spoken "in tongues" but they did tape my sermon and sent me a copy. I have never let anyone else listen to it; it was so far out of my normal speech that it would almost be unrecognizable. But since this is my oral history, I will mention that episode. It was a unique experience.

Q: When you arrived in 1978, what did you conclude about the state of U.S.-Soviet relations?

HUTSON: That was the number issue on the U.S. agenda. I remember Senator Baker visiting Moscow; he was heading a very large CODEL. They were interested in assessing prospects for the SALT treaties. I should mention an interesting aspect of this visit. One of the members of the delegation was Senator Jacob Javits of New York. He was a brilliant man. He was part of the delegation, but didn't travel with it. He came in his own private plane. I was the nominal control officer, although the real "control" officer was Armand Hammer, the head of Occidental Oil. All the details of the visit were handled by Hammer personally. I used to call him frequently to check and get his approval on every move the delegation might make. One of the meetings was with Yevgenii Primakov who was then heading an economic research think tank. I remember Javits commenting during the meeting that he thought that someday the Soviet Union would have to deal with international economic and financial institutions, perhaps to seek their assistance. He told Primakov that the Soviets better figure out how they would approach those institutions. I was reminded of that comment when later Prime Minister Primakov was flying to the U.S. to seek the assistance of the IMF. He never got here because in mid-flight he had to return to Moscow because we started the idiotic bombing of Yugoslavia.

The relationship between the two countries was as good as it could be. Brezhnev was still in charge. I will never forget the first Marine ball that we attended. It was held in Spaso House. It was attended by at least a thousand people. Soviets came and one could feel the warmth of detente, despite some tensions. A Marine colonel, the assistant naval attaché, was at odds with the ambassador. He was a great supporter of the Pentecostals. In fact, on my own, I had taken him privately into the "tank" - the secure conference room in the embassy - to talk to him about the issue. He was giving information to British Pentecostal organizations in England which he would not give to the embassy. He was obviously conflicted by his faith and his official duties. I told him that and suggested that he decide where his loyalties lay. His wife went after me during the Reagan administration in an attempt to blemish my record. I heard that she lobbied against me having a political appointment in the Reagan Administration because I allegedly tried to defend the State Department in the Pentecostal affair. So we had this tension at the Marine ball which was obvious when the ambassador and this senior Marine colonel met at the ball.

I think the colonel, as well as others, thought that through our actions we were pushing for the emigration of Soviet Jewry, but didn't really care about the Christians. He kept pointing out what we had done for the Jews and asking why we weren't doing more for the Pentecostals. That was the tension. I think for a U.S. military officer not to share information with his own embassy which he will share with representatives of foreign governments is a little beyond the pale.

Q: Did you detect any bias in the U.S. policy which supported Jewish emigration more than Christian?

HUTSON: I think that slowly but surely a balance was being achieved. It was slow in coming, but there was a beginning. At the time, the Christian fundamentalists were not as strong politically in the U.S. as they are today. In retrospect, I do recall that Billy Graham was active as was Olin Robison, the president of Middlebury College, whom Carter sent as an envoy to assist the Pentecostals. The major difference is that Soviet Jewry had an established infrastructure in the Soviet Union. There were a number of well publicized cases, such as Sakharov, Ginsberg, etc. The consular section was the point of contact in the American embassy and the Jews could enter our facilities to discuss consular matters; they were not allowed into the chancery to discuss political matters. So we became quite familiar with these émigrés and talked to them regularly.

There was a Ukrainian priest, a Mr. Moroz, who got considerable help in his efforts to emigrate. But most of the assistance went to the Soviet Jews.

Q: Was there any sentiment among your contacts that we were giving preferential treatment to one group of Soviets and not others?

HUTSON: Not very much. I already mentioned to you the one case of tension in the embassy, but it was not a widespread view. There was an assistant air attaché who had views similar to the Marine colonel's, but I didn't sense that view in information we were receiving from the press or CODELs or other visitors.

Q: Tell us a little about your contact with Soviet officials.

HUTSON: The Soviets had known of me for quite a while, starting from my first assignment in Iran. They knew I spoke Russian. I had a "friend" who later became chief of the Soviet KGB station in Iran. So my dossier was quite full. I was a known commodity to them when I appeared in Moscow and I assume that they were not unhappy to see me since they knew so much about me already. I would describe my relations with the Soviet authorities as "correct." I had one close contact, who was probably a KGB agent, who was an expert of Soviet emigration. His wife was an administrator at the Bolshoi. That gave us an entry and enabled us to get tickets to the Bolshoi whenever we needed them. I used that route on a couple of occasions, but I knew that it was always available if needed. I had very frank discussions with the KGB officer about Soviet emigration policy. He was very frank with me which just reinforced my view that he was indeed a KGB agent.

At the time, I was writing a new policy paper which I called "the depoliticization of Soviet Jewish emigration.” I thought we should let them go to wherever they wanted to go rather than have having go through this tortured route through Rome and Vienna and then go to Israel.

Q: How was the process for getting people out of the Soviet Union?

HUTSON: For us it was relatively simple because the Dutch did all the paperwork. One year I visited the Dutch embassy on Christmas Day. I saw the cheerful Dutch consul - Geoffrey Van Fleet - personally issuing over three hundred visas on that day. For years, I have tried to get him to tell his story. He kept copious records on the applicants - where they came from, their family backgrounds, their histories. Eventually, the Dutch ambassador wrote a book - several years later - about this process; VanFleet contributed to this book, but never wrote a full exposition of his experiences. He always thought that the story was not his to tell; it was Israel's whose interests the Dutch were representing. I contacted a number of Jewish organizations to see whether they would not be interested in VanFleet's story. I thought he was a latter day Raoul Wallenberg; he did incredible things. He bribed people all over the Soviet government to help Jewish emigration. The political dimension of the emigration by this time had pretty well evaporated; now it was strictly a matter of income for the bureaucrats.

Q: Didn't the Soviets require reimbursement for the alleged education that these people had gotten?

HUTSON: Yes. It was a fig-leaf for collecting money. But most of the bribes went into the bureaucrats' pockets. Some must have gotten fabulously rich. I still think that Van Fleet's story would have been a great addition to the history of the times. The ambassador's tale was not first hand and was much too much an academic endeavor. Geoff's narrative would have been much more personal and emotional.

Q: Explain to us how the emigration system worked?

HUTSON: Israel had no diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union. The Dutch had been designated to represent Israeli interests. If a Soviet Jew wanted to leave his or her country, he or she would need an invitation from a relative living in Israel. Then the Soviets might issue an exit permit. That was the way most of Soviet Jewry left. In fact, that is how the Pentecostal Christians in our embassy eventually left. They had invitations from "relatives" (real or contrived) in Israel. So this process became the main avenue for Jewry to leave the USSR. Of course, the invitation was only the first step. A number of the Jews had security clearance from their employment in scientific or military activities, which prevented them from leaving for a period of time. The U.S. embassy became heavily involved in making representations to the Soviets on behalf of these cases. I don't think we made much of an impact, but we went through the steps. I think I can only recall a half-a-dozen cases where one could see our representation having a relatively immediate impact. For example, one such intervention was made by Vice President Mondale. When we took his views to the Soviets, there was an immediate positive response.

I took one of these cases up as a personal matter. I told the Soviet bureaucrat that I needed a favor. I was advocating an exit permit for the sister of one of our language instructors at FSI. She had mental problems; she had a daughter that essentially lived on the streets of Kiev in the Ukraine. Fortunately, the Soviets actually helped in this case. The irony of that case is when the sister and daughter arrived in the U.S., our teacher didn't want the daughter, who then started to live on the streets of Washington. Then the sister joined her daughter. Finally we had to ask the Soviets to take these two women back, which they did. So the Soviets every once in a while would make a humanitarian gesture.

Q: So in the case of the Soviets Jews, you were essentially there to help.

HUTSON: That is right. There were at least two officers in the political section who also worked on these cases. We certainly spent much more time on Soviet Jewry than on Soviet Christians.

Q: What other activities were you responsible for?

HUTSON: The work involving the Pentecostals and Soviet Jewry was largely informational. The political section reported on these issues; we worked on statistics and we maintained contact with the various players in these dramas.

Our heavy workload came from emigration cases that became headline material. There were at least twenty-five American correspondents in Moscow at the time. A man by the name of Yuriy Vashchenko blew himself up in my office; he was trying to leave the Soviet Union. There was an American woman formerly from Soviet Georgia who tried to smuggle out ancient ceramics. These were all front page material for the American press, but a heavy workload for us.

One other part of the job - which I hated - but I think did well was to prevent others from imitating the Pentecostals. My job was to talk them out of seeking refuge in the embassy. I hated doing that. Sometimes, this would take days - 24 hours per day. We managed to get all of them out. I succeeded in my assignment, but it was not a happy one. I didn't use physical force on any of potential asylum seekers, but we everything short of that. We had teams consisting of such stellar officers as Alexander "Sandy" Vershbow, Steve Mann, and Ben Fairfax who worked with these people. Some of the embassy staff were very good at this task. I think by this time it was more or less evident that the Pentecostals had not advanced their cause by staying. They were still in the basement. We used to say to new seekers that the longer they stayed in the embassy, the greater the ire they would generate in the Soviet government and correspondingly reduce their chances of ever leaving the USSR.

If they had a basis for an emigration visa - e.g. relatives in some foreign country - or if they had some other valid rationale for leaving, then we could urge to leave with some hope. There were other cases in which we just outright lied. We did whatever we could to get these "unwanted" visitors out of the embassy. Had we not done that, we would have been overwhelmed by such people. I was commended for my efforts in this process, but in retrospect, I think I should have refused to participate. But at the time, I saw no choice except to do the job as defined by my bosses. Even when Latvians came in - and as I mentioned, my wife was born in Latvia - I would talk them into leaving, even though I was sure in my own mind that they would have been better off in an embassy asylum than outside the gates. They had a better chance of emigrating by remaining in the embassy than by leaving.

Q: Describe the process that these refugees went through. I assume they had trouble just getting into the embassy grounds. Did you find out what happened to them after they left the embassy compound?

HUTSON: There were several ways these people sought refuge. There were people who had legitimate consular business; they would bring me documents necessary to transact some action. At the time, we had practically no embassy American security; we relied entirely on Soviet militiamen; they provided security services. At the beginning, we hoped that people could pass that Soviet screening; we were not anxious to have the militiamen serve as a barrier to people who wanted to deal with us. Later of course, we changed our views 180%. So if a Soviet citizen, or any other foreigner, had a valid document - a letter of invitation, some pension claim or an estate case, etc - they would be permitted to enter the consular section.

There were others who tried to run the Soviet gauntlet in masse. They would try to rush by the militiamen and enter the premises.

Those in the first group, which had some documentation that legitimized their visit to the embassy, who wanted to seek asylum gave us more time to discuss the issues with them. Those who rushed in were awaited by the militiamen who would grab them as soon as they left the embassy grounds and probably give them a thorough beating. That made it much more difficult for us to persuade them to leave, but we had to do it knowing that their future was going to be a very rough one for sometime to come. Those were our instructions.

Q: Earlier, you mentioned a case of a man who tried to blow himself up in your office. When was that?

HUTSON: March 28, 1979. A man came into the embassy; we had no metal detectors, and was not searched by the Soviet militiamen because he was escorted by one of the embassy's officers. The son of our Naval Attaché had taken a year off from his academic studies at Yale to learn and practice Russian. He lived in Moscow with his father and spent a lot of time with Soviet people of his age. That is how he practiced his Russian. In this way, he met a former seaman who had worked on a Soviet commercial fleet. He was homeless and lived illegally on the Moscow subway. That young man began to pester the American youth about getting help to leave the USSR. That was not unusual; I think most embassy staff had been approached at least once by someone wishing to leave the USSR. We would explain to these people what the general criteria were and what the individual's prospects for emigration really were. If prospects seemed a possibility, we would invite them for an interview. We might even do that for people who had no chance, but who were making pests of themselves with our colleagues.

This seaman really fell in that second category. He had given some letters in Russian to the American, who had shared them with his father. I think the letters clearly indicated that there was something wrong with the Russian; they were not what we would have considered "normal." So in an effort to help the young American out, my colleague went out to get the seaman and brought him into the embassy; thus bypassing any screening by the Soviet militiamen. This was not really exceptional; there was a lot of this going on. Once inside the building, the seaman was taken into the consular section's "little room" - an allegedly secret room where we listened to the stories of potential emigrants. My colleague listened to the seaman for 10 or 15 minutes and essentially said that at the moment there didn't seem to be any opportunity for emigration to the U.S., but that we would be in contact if any possibility arose.

This is now late winter in Moscow. Outside it was very cold. He was warmly dressed. He sat down in our waiting room and started to take off one layer of clothing after another. He finally came to a metal object that was strapped around his waist. That had a coat-hanger-like rod hanging from it. He then announced that unless he was allowed to emigrate, he would blow the embassy up. That was the beginning of a saga that went on for about nine hours. We cleared out the waiting room and eventually got the seaman inside escorted by two embassy officers - the one that interviewed him and another who was very good at handling people. The consular section which was on the first floor of the north wing of the embassy complex was cleared out. We got Soviet fire trucks to come stand by; television cameras were there in mass. After a couple of hours, I relieved my two colleagues and became the sole interlocutor for the Soviet seaman - as chief of the consular section, I thought that this was my responsibility. In retrospect, it was one of the few times in my life that I was glad I smoked cigarettes; that got me through a thoroughly draining seven hours. Between the two of us, we smoked all the cigarettes we had.

After many long conversations, we finally came to a bottom line: couldn't we just help the seaman out by his case considered by Moscow State University. He had been an officer in the merchant fleet and had applied to the university after he left the sea. He had not been accepted because, in his view, his family was not part of the nomeklatura. He viewed his turn down as the result of lack of political "strings."

We finally got a Soviet bomb expert to come into the embassy under the guise of being a Moscow State University official. He was supposed to look at the device that the seaman had, which looked like the metal back of a seat from a subway car. It had straps and was in the shape of such a seat. The expert looked at the device warily. I was sitting in the little room with the seaman. At the time, we were still using the heavy consular impression seal, which I was tempted to use as a weapon - hitting the seaman on his hand or arm before he could pull the wire to his device. However, that seal had a joint in it and that meant some different strategies than just a outright attack. I had envisioned several different scenarios.

The bomb expert seemed eager to be very helpful. He promised to help in whatever way he could. After studying the device for a while, he concluded that it may well be a bomb. As I said before, the seaman and I had smoked constantly until we ran out of cigarettes. I finally decided that we needed more cigarettes and I got up and left the room. I thought the seaman might then take the opportunity to pull the pin, but he didn't. So he was left in the room all by himself.

The Soviets wanted me to return to continue my efforts to get him out without an incident. Jerry Tolson, the security officer who was a good friend and Ambassador Toon said absolutely not. The Soviets then asked permission to take extraordinary measures to try to disable the seaman - sharpshooters or other deadly force. It would have been possible, given the location of the small room, to take shots into someone in that room. Ben Reed, the Department's executive secretary, was telling Toon by telephone from the Department not to allow any shooting in the embassy. Toon however took the position that this was his embassy and that the Soviets could do what they felt they had to do to their own citizen. And that is what the Soviets did. The seaman was sufficiently visible through a window that he could be shot and he was. He was hit a couple of times in his arms and legs. He ran out of this small room into my office and pulled the pin. Something went off and the area became a mess. It turned out that he had a flash bomb. The seaman died on the way to the hospital having been dragged out by the Soviet firemen who had entered our building to put down the flames. They also used lots and lots of tear gas - remnants of which stuck in the rooms for months. Our safes were still open; we were ill prepared from such an invasion. The seaman was burned; he was not blown to bits, but the Soviets maintained that he died on the way to the hospital.

At the time, we had a junior officer in Kiev by the name of Vladimir Sambaier - now in EB. He had been working in the General Services section of the embassy and then had been sent to Kiev. He had just returned to the embassy a few weeks earlier. He went to work on the wreckage and had us back working within 24 hours. He received all sorts of commendations for his work - mostly written by me. He did a superb job. When I later asked him how he managed to accomplish this feat, he just said that he had paid every off - he just bribed everyone and got the job done.

I must add an unfortunate footnote to this story. The officer who had gone to help the naval attaché's son was "hung out to dry" by Malcolm Toon in an uncharacteristic way for that man. Mac Toon wasn't very fond of the officer to start with. He then thought that he had violated standard operating procedures in what he had done with the seaman. In fact, there was no SOP for such a situation. What was done was based on precedent; that is the way cases like this had been handled before and that was the way this case was managed. But Toon took advantage of the situation and made the officer accountable for something that had precedent. He was transferred to South Africa. The New York Times correspondent reported that this poor fellow had been sent to the U.S. equivalent of "Siberia." Eventually, this officer left the FS. I had to write his last Moscow efficiency report, in which I criticized him primarily for his lack of drafting skills. I probably would have written the same report had the seaman incident not occurred. He then went to work for the CIA; he was very bitter about his Moscow experience. I think he was a good officer who had been treated unfairly. It was not one of Toon's finest hours; he was wrong. Toon having been a Navy officer should have recognized that the embassy was his "ship"; he was responsible for its operations and not some lowly officer. He should have taken responsibility on his own shoulders! The lower level officer should not have been punished for what he did.

Q: Tell us more about the woman who "hid" her jewels on her way out of the USSR.

HUTSON: She was an American citizen from Chicago. She was born in Soviet Georgia. She had visited her family in Georgia. They gave her some very valuable ceramics -- real antiquities -- that she was supposed to smuggle out. As she went through customs at the airport, Soviet authorities discovered the antiquities. She was arrested. I went to visit her. I'll never forget that episode.

I met the Soviet official and the woman in his office. When the American found out what the penalty might be, she literally vomited on the official's desk and on him. It was either the greatest act I have ever witnessed or the damsel was in real distress. It was a sight! The official screamed. It was at about this time that Senators Adlai Stevenson and Charles Percy were coming to the USSR -- both from Illinois. Both knew Soviet policy well. They helped us to work on this case which we finally resolved.

There was never anything routine. The moment something unusual happened, the press was all over it. That meant that we would be devoting our time almost exclusively to that event, until a resolution was found.

Q: There must have been a number of cases of people trying to smuggle out information, or people handing other people letters, or people trying to smuggle Bibles in, etc. How did you deal with such cases and how were they eventually resolved?

HUTSON: We dealt with each in a “full court press” mode. We would go to the Foreign Ministry - the consular department-which often would refer the issue to the political department, which meant that the DCM or the political counselor would have to get involved. Occasionally, even the ambassador would have to get involved. Mac Toon was very familiar with consular processes, having negotiated the consular convention between the USSR and the U.S. Mac knew his stuff; he didn’t need much prepping. That was one of the reason he was great to work for.

That changed considerably when Thomas Watson became ambassador. All consular work was new to him. He had the aura of being a “captain of industry” who had flown lend-lease planes across the Soviet Union. The theory was that the Soviets liked to talk to a “captain of industry”; that he could cut a better deal with them because of his reputation. That didn’t seem to pan out.

Q: I think that appointment was made by President Carter in an effort to change the relationships between the two countries.

HUTSON: Of course, it didn’t help that soon after his arrival the ambassador had to face the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. That pretty much soured the atmosphere for arms control negotiations.

Q: Let me go back to the issue of what happened to people who broke the customs laws and regulations. What happened to them? Was it a problem for you?

HUTSON: These really were “run of the mill” violations, but they used to escalate because of the press interest. Most of them were kept in confinement for a while and then were released, sometimes because of political pressure coming from the U.S. Probably the more effective means of exerting that pressure was through the Soviet embassy in Washington. None of these violators stayed in confinement too long. People who were put in prison were usually not kept in Moscow, but rather were sent to prison camps outside the city - usually far away which might then take 26 or 48 hours to reach. At one time, we had three Americans in one of those camps. They were caught smuggling 38 kilos of heroin from Malaysia to the Netherlands. They took a cheap flight on Aeroflot which stopped in Moscow en route. The Soviet authorities may have been tipped off or it was just circumstances - allegedly there was a malfunction on the aircraft which required a change of planes requiring going through customs at which time the heroin was found. The three Americans were sentenced to five, seven and eight years in prison camp. This happened before I got to Moscow.

We were required to visit the Americans at least once each quarter. The Soviets would bring them to Moscow and we would visit with them in a prison there. In fact, one of them tried to write a book together with George Feiffer -- a well known writer on Soviet matters. The book would have been called "The King of Thieves." The American who would have been at the center of this book claimed that he had almost taken over the camp beating the Soviets at their own corruption game. He became a super-patriot while in this prison camp and apparently converted from being a thug to being a hero. It was a great story in which I invested both in the writing of the book and the supposed follow-on movie. I lost my house and most of my savings on that investment although the project is still alive.

There were many, many minor cases, but they were usually resolved in four or five days.

Q: I guess you were playing the customary consular game in which officials of both sides are interested in getting the violators out of the country. They are just too much trouble for both sides as long as the foreigner is kept in jail.

HUTSON: I think that was true in the USSR. In Yugoslavia, on the other hand, the officials liked to put Americans into jail. I may have mentioned earlier the story of George Sodić, a man from Chicago. He was sentenced to five years in jail for anti-regime comments. We worked and worked on this case and eventually got him released after six months. That was the toughest case I ever handled.

Q: Did you get a chance to travel around the Soviet Union on business?

HUTSON: To my great regret, no. That was because I worked seven days per week - 24/7. There was just no relief. I did go to Leningrad a couple of times, largely to go to Helsinki. The only time I managed to go on a personal trip to Riga, Latvia. We specifically did not see my wife's relatives. It turned out that while we were there the Latvians celebrated the 60th anniversary of the independence of Free Latvia. That reinforced our - and my wife's especially - disdain for what the Soviets had done in Latvia. That was my only trip within the USSR. I did fly to Washington on several occasions; we had annual consular negotiations with the Soviets and then there were some other work-related matters. The publications procurement office had a travel program and were looking for people to send to various parts of the Soviet Union. But I never had the time.

I would have liked to see the Soviet Union. Initially, I was supposed to be on a three year assignment. I certainly hoped that before the end of my tour, I would be able to do a little traveling. But I ended up resigning after about 18 months.

Q: What speculation was there in the embassy in December 1979 on why the Soviets invaded Afghanistan?

HUTSON: I think there was great dismay when that happened. There were many embassy officers who were hopeful that U.S.-USSR relations were about to improve considerably. This is when I stopped using “hope” as a basis for relationships between countries and used the word “expectations” instead. People were hopeful that detente and the SALT agreements would work. We all joined the Foreign Service - especially those who had studied the Soviet Union - in the hope of being to contribute to an amelioration of tensions in the relationships and to the “humanization” of the Soviet empire. The Afghan invasion was a major setback for the “hopeful” people. One just had to watch Ambassador Watson; he was sent to Moscow with a very lofty goal and all of a sudden, he had no reason for being there. All prospects for improvement in relations evaporated.

We had many discussions about this event among ourselves. I had just finished a metamorphose of my own, from being willing to give the Soviets a chance to a very hard liner who felt that the whole Soviet establishment had to change - with our support. I therefore found the Carter’s administration policy to be toothless. It was nothing. Anthony Lake would hem and haw on the issue. I happened to be back on home leave when the attempt to rescue our hostages in Iran failed miserably. That was a disaster; you don’t rescue people with eight helicopters flying long stretches over a desert. That was just poor judgment by the administration. I thought at the time that we should have done with Iran what we did later in the Gulf war - use maximum force.

So when the Soviets invaded Afghanistan and provoked a toothless response from the Carter administration, I mentioned my views to the ambassador. He was similarly dismayed. With Malcolm Toon, I used to discuss consular affairs especially when we played deck tennis - which was not as frequently as we played tennis in Belgrade. But Toon certainly did not need my advice on political issues. Watson, on the other hand, listened to everyone. He used to boast that as chairman of IBM he used to spend 60% of his time talking to his people. I am a talker and have all kinds of ideas about policies. I used to think that Watson should take a page from a book written by Tom Enders, who was one of the best ambassadors I ever saw. He was the most brilliant and the most effective ambassador to Canada that we ever had.

I suggested that Thomas Watson, seen by the public as an unblemished captain of industry, go on a speaking tour in the U.S. so that the American public could hear what we understood to have happened. It was obvious to me that we were in for some heavy sledding ahead. We could not bank our hopes for better relations on disarmament and arms control. We had to confront the Soviet Union; it only understood raw power. I thought that we would have to put a lot on money into such an aggressive program, which eventually the Reagan administration did in order to seem militarily credible at a negotiating table. I tried to convince Ambassador Watson to take this approach. He did make a commitment when he was confirmed that he would return in six months time and make a report to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

At one stage, he suggested that I undertake this speaking tour around the U.S. So, in fact, I did go on a speaking tour - I was a “hot” product. I am not sure that this program is used much more anymore. I spoke to the World Affair Councils in Seattle, California, Omaha and a couple of other places. I gave the Omaha “World Herald” a big interview - this being my home town newspaper, I knew a lot of the staff. I found myself in an immediate conflict of interest. The grain embargo to the USSR had just been invoked. I thought I would get the usual questions about living in Moscow, the conditions in the USSR, etc. But NO; the first question had to do with my views of the grain embargo. I asked whether this interview was “on the record.” They asked me to say what ever I could. So I said that the grain embargo wouldn’t work. That was the view of the agricultural attaché, a wonderful man from South Dakota. At a country team meeting he told the ambassador that it wouldn’t work. After the meeting, the attaché was pulled aside and it was suggested that he keep comments like that to himself because his views would leak to the press greatly expanding the debate. In Omaha, I explained the administration’s position and rationale, but then off the record I reflected the views of the agricultural attaché. So, having to defend the administration while having serious reservations gave rise to major conflicts of interest.

This conflict eventually resulted in a major debate with my wife towards the end of home leave while we were staying with her brother in Kansas City. I had been in San Francisco where I had taken it upon myself to see Laurence Silberman - former ambassador to Yugoslavia and now an appeals court judge in Washington, DC. He was part of the Reagan foreign policy team, along with Fred Iklé and Richard Allen. I had actually left Belgrade before Silberman arrived, but my wife and children had remained behind to finish school. The Silbermans had been very kind to my family; our two youngest daughters were best of friends. He was a very blunt critic of the whole Yugoslav policy -- not being tough enough.

In any case, I went to see him to seek his advice. He was very kind and frank. He asked me what I intended to do if I resigned. He asked whether I was independently wealthy. Not even close!!! I told him about some of my business ideas and even a movie concept. His advice to me was that I select a field in which I could progress and stick to that and not dabble in a number of various fields. He didn’t encourage me to resign, but encouraged me to think a lot more about the future.

While on this home-leave speaking tour, I also served a couple of weeks as a reserve officer at DIA, updating biographies on Yugoslav military officers.

My family joined me in this home leave a few weeks later. By this time, I had come to the conclusion that I had to resign from the Foreign Service because I could not support our Soviet policy. As I said, my wife had a very active argument about my views, both in Seattle and Vancouver, where we were visiting some Canadian friends. But we came to no conclusion. But we did end up in Kansas City at Easter time, with my whole family and the major argument started again. I was still convinced that I had to leave the Foreign Service in light of U.S. policy.

After my interview with the “Omaha World-Herald”, the editor suggested that I resign from the FS and run for the U.S. Senate. I looked at him open mouthed, but understood that the “Herald” could be a king-maker in that part of the country. Eventually, I bit the bullet and told my wife that I was going to resign from the FS; then I told my mother. My plan was to go on the airwaves and announce my resignation and the reasons therefore. The “World Herald” was going to print my whole radio commentary. After my mother heard the broadcast, she called and asked me not to come home; she was canceling the family reunion. She had lived through the depression; she could not understand how anyone in their right mind could give up a government job. She called me just a “little fish in the ocean” whose views would not make an iota of difference. That was certainly one of the most difficult times in my life. If I had to do it over again, I would have resigned but done so quietly.

Q: What happened?

HUTSON: I had one very strong personal obligation - and that was to end it correctly. I had been shown in Washington a copy of what Anthony Lake - then the director of the State Department policy planning staff - had drafted as testimony for Cyrus Vance which he was to deliver to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee - after the Soviets had invaded Afghanistan. This statement went on at some length about U.S.-Soviet relations in 1980. As far as I was concerned, it was a "nothing" statement - full of platitudes reflecting the administration's view that the tension caused by Afghanistan would soon blow away. It is true that drafts go through a lot of hands before they become a finished product and do change in that process, but what I saw infuriated me. I went around and talked to people in the department; I talked to Marshal Shulman, an academic well known as a Soviet expert. I talked to Tom Enders, then the assistant secretary for Latin American Affairs. I talked to Marc Palmer who was well known in the Soviet field. People heard me out but I suspect I left a number wondering what I was doing. I spent a lot of time doing this and then I quit - I slammed the door behind me.

I went out to seek my fortune in the real world. I changed party registration (to Republican), I worked as a speaker for the National Republican Committee. I really didn't have the "dirt" that the Committee was really looking for; I had just a strong disagreement with the administration's policy. That made me somewhat less than an attractive speaker. I always tried to explain the administration's position as honestly and strongly and I could and then I would point out where I differed with it. I remember my mother, after getting over the shock of my decision, asking me what I intended to do. I told her that I did not intend to get a job; I was going to make a movie - among other dreams.

So I set out to make a movie and other things - e.g. backing some musicians. I returned to Nebraska and started a consulting firm. I got five people to invest $1,000 each in this effort. I managed to get a line of credit using a house that I owned in Maryland, even though it still had a mortgage on it. Everyone thought I was either crazy or the next genius. People in Washington generally turned their backs to me; I was too controversial.

There was some glamour. I was interviewed by "CBS Evening News"; I was on the front page of "The Washington Post" and "The Philadelphia Inquirer." Stories about me appeared in foreign newspapers; my daughter Bessie read about me in the "Manchester Guardian". She called to ask what was going on. Israeli friends told me that "The Jerusalem Post" had carried a story about me. This was just a "five minutes" of fame; it faded soon. Then I had to do something.

I tried to do some consulting with an agricultural corporation in Omaha. The timing was not very good because it was at this time that our relationship with the Soviet Union deteriorated badly. I witnessed often, in the USSR, Yugoslavia or Iran, people being dispatched by their American firm, even though they had absolutely no qualifications for such an assignment. Anyone who knew the situation would have been able to tell in a half an hour whether the candidate would be able to navigate in an overseas environment. So I was hired in part to participate in such a screening process. I was also supposed to "open doors" although at the time my name was not a real asset in the Soviet Union since I was advocating its destruction.

Interestingly enough, a lot of what I said was reported in the Soviet press although they were given such a spin that some of my friends in the Soviet diplomatic corps thought of me more as a hero than a villain.

MICHAEL A. BOORSTEIN
Administrative Officer
Moscow (1978-1980)

Supervisory General Services Officer

Mr. Boorstein was born in Washington, DC and was raised in that area. He was educated at Beloit College, the University of Colorado, Harvard University and the University of Turku in Finland. Entering the Foreign Service in 1970, Mr. Boorstein specialized in administration and personnel, serving in Palermo, Rome, Ottawa, Warsaw Curacao, Moscow and Beijing. In addition, Mr. Boorstein played a major role in the planning and construction of US embassies in Moscow and Beijing and in the renovation of consulates and embassies throughout the globe. He spoke six foreign languages. Mr. Boorstein was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005.

BOORSTEIN: Off I went to Washington, left my family in Ottawa. I went to Washington and rented a sublet, rented a second story walk up apartment off the Georgetown campus above a dry cleaning store. Walked across the river every morning. I basically had one on one Russian tutoring and got to a 0+ to a 2+ in about 12 weeks. Nina De La Cruz, who was the dean of the Russian language teachers, became my teacher and it was just wonderful. My wife came down and I went up to help them pack out and came to Washington. She took a little bit of Russian in August of 1978 and we went to Moscow. That's a good place to break.

Q: Okay, we'll pick this up when you went to Moscow when?

BOORSTEIN: August 1978.

Q: You were there from '78 to when?

BOORSTEIN: July of '81, three years.

Q: Okay, we'll pick it up then, great.

All right. Today is the 11th of October, 2005. Mike, what was the situation in Moscow when you got there in 1978?

BOORSTEIN: In 1978, we were in basically the high point of detente. We were somewhere in, I forget whether it was Salt I or Salt II. Malcolm Toon was the ambassador, one of our more distinguished career people at the time. He went out to Geneva. That would have been I believe the fall of 1978 to be there for arms control discussions between Secretary Vance and Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko. I went on that trip not because I was part of the party, but one of the interesting benefits that people in Moscow had was that the American ambassador had rights to draw on the airfield out of Rhein Main air base for basically a plane that was part of the medevac medical evacuation wing two or three times a year basically under the rubric of resupplying the ambassador's residence. Someone from the embassy would be a designated shopper and fly out commercially one way with a big shopping list from the ambassador's wife for basically non-perishables to put into the storage areas of the residence. If there were things that were needed from the PX or the commissary to help service the residence that shopper would buy those, too. It also became on a space available basis a rest and recreation means at no cost for embassy staff and their families to fly to Western Europe. On that particular trip my wife, daughter and I went to Geneva, just simply hitched a ride and went to Geneva and stayed in the Intercontinental Hotel at a good rate and then when the talks were over, four or five days later, we showed up at the airport and flew home. It was an interesting benefit that obviously there was some agreement between the USSR and the United States that allowed that to happen. Perhaps the Russians or the Soviets had some similar privilege in Washington, but be that as it may.

Our relations were for Cold War adversaries; they probably were at their best for that particular era in the late '70s. Malcolm Toon left in the fall of 1979 and as an indicator of the warming of relations, President Carter appointed Thomas J. Watson, Jr., the retired CEO of IBM, to be the ambassador. Watson was one of these people who obviously was very wealthy. He had very much been involved in the U.S.- Soviet relations from the standpoint of someone who was a big promoter of Detente and big business development and what have you and because he also, I believe, was involved in arms control. I'm not quite sure what capacity, but because of his success in nurturing the better part of our relationship, he was appointed as the ambassador. Well, be careful of a good thing because again, he arrived in mid-October of 1979 and two months and two weeks later, the Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan. Then the warmth quickly deteriorated into a deep freeze, but I'm sort of getting ahead of myself.

Q: Yes, but at the time you went out things were pretty good?

BOORSTEIN: Yes and as a matter of fact one of the things that I got involved in very early in my tour, I was the number two in the administrative section. The administrative counselor was John Condayan, who was a highly regarded senior officer and he had come out of Washington I believe. I basically was his deputy. I did all the things that you do in a large administrative section in an embassy that is in an environment such as the Soviet Union where you have government housing, government furnishing, a lot of interface with the host government to provide you with services. All of our foreign national staff was provided to us by the Soviet arm of the Foreign Ministry called Agency for Services to the Diplomatic Corps. It was a difficult relationship because basically we had to treat all of those staff as being spies. They were effective, obviously because a lot of them spoke English quite well. They knew how to work through the bureaucracy, but at the same token, we had to keep a great deal of distance in terms of the information they dealt with.

It was a busy period in that in the fall of 1978 October and November the Secretary of State visited Moscow and in the ensuing 10 to 12 months we had a series of high Congressional delegations. We had the Joint U.S. USSR Trade Council, which basically brought together at the same time our Secretary of the Treasury and Secretary of Commerce for meetings with their Soviet counterparts, so that involved separate control rooms, separate delegations. As a matter of fact, I recall that for the post inspection that occurred a year after I was there, one of the things I had put in the questionnaire was what percentage of time did you spend in handling and supporting high level visits. I added up all the time and the effort and I think it was 40% of my time that first year I was in Moscow dealing with the Secretary of State's visit, two other Cabinet level visits and one high level senatorial delegation, you know, John Glenn was on it, Senator Ribicoff, Senator Dole, Senator Javits. I figured the crème de la crème of the Senate of that era; they were on that trip. Then later on that spring of 1979 there was a high level visit by Congressman Wolfe who I believe at the time was the chairman of the House International Relations Committee. That was a very large delegation. It was just a huge effort to support all these things and I was in charge of all of them in terms of the job that I had.

Q: Tell me, what Moscow being sort of unique in the diplomatic world as far as living there goes, what were the challenges that you and the rest of the, particularly on the administrative side had with operating and living there?

BOORSTEIN: Well, you're quite correct. I mean because it was such a controlled society and because the Soviet government wanted to control the comings and the goings of the diplomats, they, in the name of that control, they provided a lot of services that in effect forced you into certain patterns of behavior when they control your activities. For example, the best sources for your food stocks; particularly the perishables, were at stores that were only open to diplomats. These were diplomatic gastronomes. They would sell the goods to you for coupons that were called D-coupons "D" meaning for diplomats. You could buy them at the embassy cashier at the official exchange rate. Now, there was an active black market and the ruble to the dollar at the time, was it cost $1.50 to buy one ruble. On the black market I think you could get four rubles to the dollar. A ruble was worth about a quarter, so it was worth roughly one-sixth of what it was officially. We were counseled strongly over and over again in terms of our own embassy policy, not to buy on the black market. I certainly was faithful to that during the time I was there.

Q: How about other embassies?

BOORSTEIN: Other embassies were looser in their moral code, if you will, in their sanctions against their people. There was a little bit of disparity. Some of your colleagues and I don't know if I want to name any countries in particular, none really come to mind readily. There were also shops that only accepted hard currency, but if you paid in dollars, you might get your change in French Francs, German Marks, Japanese Yen, and so forth. At the end of our tour, wanting to buy little gifts for relatives and friends, particularly if you were staying with people, we shopped at the hard currency store and I said to my wife, "It is payback time". We took this big jar filled with all these coins divided by currency in individual baggies and went to the dollar gastronome and got a couple of hundred dollars worth of things, went to the checkout counter and she gave me the total in U.S. dollars and I proceeded to put all the various coins in baggies from the jar on the counter. The Russian woman said to me, "you can't do that." I said "I am only paying in what you see here. This is a collection of hard currency coins that over the course of three years we collected from you and now I want to return it and this is actual money and if you want me to buy these things and get credit for the sale this is what you're going to accept." Well, she did and it was a great feeling to be able to return all of those coins, most of which would have been totally useless to us taking them out of the country. That was again one of the more challenging aspects of shopping.

We had a whole regime. Moscow and Leningrad were designated as posts that were authorized consumables shipment, which means that you could go and shop at one of these warehouses in the Washington area, tax-free and have the things available for pickup by the moving company, and those things were added to your household shipment from Washington to Moscow and these would be a two or three year supply of toilet paper, paper towels, aluminum foil, coffee, dry cereal, canned fruits and vegetables, things that you knew you would store. Once you received these things, you would have usually a little closet with shelves in your apartment, but it wouldn't be nearly big enough, so wherever you found a square inch of space that was hidden from you like under beds or inside other closets, you would store things there because it was certainly cheaper if you could indeed find it, than buying them locally. The embassy would also sponsor probably about every three months a frozen food shipment from the commissary in Berlin. That was in conjunction also with a bulk order of non-perishable goods that you could order from the commissary in Berlin and it would be brought in overland by truck. When it came for your to get your perishables you had to be there whatever time the truck arrived, whether it was 5:00 in the morning or 11:00 at night. You had to be there, and you had to stake out your own little area and you had a number and that had been coordinated with the people in Berlin to pack it and you would go and pick up your stuff as it came off the truck with your number on it and put it in your area, and then you'd settle up and write a check right there on the spot, or you'd put it on your bill and take it home because there was no room in the main commissary in the embassy because it was just in the basement and was a very small shop given the size of the mission, but that was the only space we had.

There were also things like whether it was quarterly or semi-annually a fresh meat air shipment from the United Kingdom. You would order ground beef and steak and lamb chops and fresh chickens and things like that that would be flown in and it would arrive fresh. It was refrigerated and you would pick it up and immediately take it up and typically wrap it up and put it in your freezer.

Q: This was from the UK?

BOORSTEIN: Yes.

Q: You can't give blood now because of that.

BOORSTEIN: Really?

Q: Maybe they haven't caught you if you give blood. I've been giving blood religiously three or four times a year, but if you've been getting because of Mad Cow. Maybe this was.

BOORSTEIN: This was 28 years ago.

Q: Yes, well, they're still playing with it.

BOORSTEIN: Well, I'll keep that in mind. That was more on the quality of life side. In terms of the embassy operations, the Soviet Union, they were very sensitive about where diplomats could travel. You had a regime that if you traveled by overnight train or by air I think there was a 24-hour notification if you were going to another city where you had a consular post. In the case of the Soviet Union that was only Leningrad when I arrived. You could not, for example, take the day train between Moscow and Leningrad. You could take the overnight train because it was thought you couldn't see everything out the window. If you would travel elsewhere for political reporting to pay a call on a provincial mayor or governor or whatever, the people in the political section did, that required, I don't recall exactly, the 48 or 72 hour notice via diplomatic note. You were given a map by the Foreign Ministry of the entire Soviet Union that showed what areas are closed and what areas are open. Sometimes, you would have open cities within closed areas which meant the only way to get there was to fly. Now, on the basis of reciprocity, we had a similar map of the United States. I really wish I had taken that map as a souvenir because it showed what cities are open and what cities are closed to Soviet diplomats. Later on, after I left Moscow I had a tour on the Soviet desk and I was often involved in telling primarily their journalists and their visiting scientists where they could go and where they couldn't go. It was great fun.

Often, sometimes without warning they would declare an open city closed because there was a particular reason why they didn't want us to go there at the time or it was done in retaliation that we had done on this side if we caught a Soviet diplomat doing something in a place he or she should not have been or done something in a place, done something even if it was in a place that they were allowed to be in. That was a big problem that you had to sort of watch where you went. You did all your planning. You couldn't just go to your local American Express office and book a ticket to any place. You had to go to the embassy's Miscellaneous Services Unit. To do anything you had to go through the official channels. If you wanted a ticket to the Bolshoi Ballet, you had to go to Miscellaneous Services. If you wanted to take a day train trip to Zagorsk or one of the other areas in and around Moscow for the day, you had to do that through the local services place. The same thing, you couldn't exactly put an ad in the newspaper saying you wanted to hire a plumber for the embassy. You wanted a maid; you had to do it through official channels and pay their rates, which were exorbitant. Needless to say very few people other than the ambassador and the deputy chief of mission had household help.

Q: How about au pairs coming from somewhere?

BOORSTEIN: Those were mostly brought in by the military attaches, mainly because by nature of what military attaches do, they spent a lot of time traveling and because of the rule the embassy imposed where you could not travel by yourself, you would travel in pairs as a way of protecting yourself, the attaches would often travel with their spouses and the spouse would have their way paid to travel around. Even if they had kids the au pair, the nanny would stay there and take care of the kids. It really wasn't a problem for the nanny to get a visa to come in. Typically, the nannies came from Finland. They were a great source of female companionship to the Marines, many of whom married Finnish girls who were nannies.

Q: How about while you were there, let's say, was there a dividing line, but problems of the people that you were involved with were the KGB harassment, that sort of thing.

BOORSTEIN: Not me personally. I was never deemed a threat or a target even though obviously I had a full clearance and I sat in on the meetings and I was privy to a lot of information that obviously I could not, would not and did not share with anybody else. If you were undercover and either in the rubric of how we operate overseas often our intelligence assets are declared to those countries because there's a degree of intelligence cooperation even with countries that are considered our adversaries. If you were not a declared intelligence asset, you obviously were undercover and you sometimes were doing things that I didn't even know about and other people that were not part of that group would not know about and if they were caught they were often asked to leave the country. When that happened there was a period of tension. Sometimes there was some additional harassment. You heard stories of earlier times in the mid '70s where people would have their tires slashed or they would find their windshield wipers bent or there would be little gifts of human excrement left in apartments or people would come home and find windows opened or papers strewn about because the KGB wanted people to know that they could get into their places. We were told if we had any sensitive personal papers, bank statements, personal correspondence that might make us vulnerable for compromise that those things should be kept in your safe in the embassy. I personally have no issues with that, but there was a lot of sensitivity to that and as part of the in brief from the security officer that these things were emphasized quite a bit. We were even told if you're having a very difficult argument with your spouse and you don't want other people to hear it, to be picked up by bugs, you can arrange to come in and go in a particular protected room in the embassy and go at it. I never took advantage of that. My wife and I just kept our arguments above board or we'd go outside for a walk, but again there was that level of awareness in the community and looking back on it and I commented on it after we left that there was a degree of stress and tension because of all of these factors that I mentioned. You didn't necessarily know that it was there until you had reason to leave Moscow and go to the West. If you went to Berlin or you went to Helsinki or you went anywhere else and you were in an environment where these things were not on you, you felt the absence of those oppressive stressful factors. When you went back to Moscow the weight returned. That's why we got the hardship pay.

Q: Since you were dealing with the major Soviet Russian workforce, how did you find it?

BOORSTEIN: They were quite efficient as a matter of fact. As a matter of fact there's a number of interesting incidents that happened while I was there that are worth mentioning here. I believe it was the fall of 1979. There was a group of Pentecostals from Siberia who came to the embassy seeking immigrant visas. I don't know whether they had any appointments or they got through the gauntlet to get to where they were. My recollection is that the militia guards in front of the embassy wouldn't let them through and so they as a group, there were seven or eight of them, they rushed through the embassy past the militia guard and sought refuge in the consular section and we let them stay and while they were rushing into the embassy, an Armenian woman with one or two children took advantage of that and just on the spur of the moment decided to rush in the embassy also. Here we were with these two families that didn't know each other figuring out what to do. The Pentecostal group and the Armenian group, I don't know remember whether they were kept together or separate, but they were kept on the compound. Again this compound had a lot of housing units for embassy staff. The deputy chief of mission's apartment was there. All the major counselors' apartments were on the compound and then at the opposite end of the spectrum we had the Marine house, we had the Navy Seabees who were part of the maintenance of the secure area of the embassy. They had their own housing. We had a number of single communicators and secretarial staff who had housing. In that wing that housed the secretarial and communications staff in the basement we very quickly put together a couple of apartments for these people and of course the Soviet authorities wanted us to release them. What ensued and again I don't know exactly why we treated the two families differently; we were able to cut a deal with the Soviet immigration authorities. The acronym was OVIR, O-V-I-R. We persuaded the Armenian woman and her children to fly back to Yerevan and to go into the local immigration office there and they would be given permission to leave.

I got involved in helping with the travel arrangements for this woman and her children to fly from Moscow to Europe. I had to go to the travel clerk; Nina was her name, to make the arrangements. Nina was extremely helpful. She made all kinds of calls. Traveling in the Soviet Union was a nightmare to begin with. I mean flights were canceled, they were late, it was a whole mess. She was just hell bent on getting it right and so she did. The Pentecostal family on the other hand, they refused to leave, they felt they were going to be shipped to Siberia, probably put in some Gulag and persecuted. Through negotiations and they were there for several months, we finally got them immigrant visas, so they came over to the United States the winter of 1980 sometime and I think most of them went to Montana. Maybe that's where they still are. Again, the facilitation of that, the people in the administrative unit were very helpful by and large. There was a Soviet woman. Her name was Galia and she manned the main telephone in the general services office. If you had a problem in your apartment and you submitted a work order, you submitted it to Galia. She would take in the work order and she would mark it in and distribute it to the plumbers, or the electricians or the carpenters or whatever and she was a real powerhouse, power force and we nicknamed her the colonel because we felt she had a high rank in the KGB. I remember one day for whatever reason our phone in the apartment didn't work. I came into the office and went to Galia and I wrote a work order and I said the phone doesn't work. She said to me, "Well, have you been playing around with it trying to fix it?" I looked at her and I said, "Your people are the ones who play around with the phone. I don't touch it." She laughed. That was basically the supposition. She arranged for it to be fixed. Sometimes you'd have an emergency after hours and you would have to call the duty plumber or electrician and they were quite effective.

Q: On these things there were two sort of administrative nightmares that happened. I don't know whether they happened on your watch and all. One was the Sergeant Lonetree episode with the Marine guard.

BOORSTEIN: That was after I was gone.

Q: And the fire.

BOORSTEIN: Well, I tell you, there was a big fire in Moscow in 1977, the year before I arrived and the people that were still there in 1978 sort of had this red badge of courage almost like they had a "we survived the great Moscow fire tee shirt," and we newcomers clearly didn't know what suffering was. So, there was a bit of a rift to the community until finally all those people left. I mean I remember actually going up to the attic and seeing the charred timbers. It was a serious thing and fortunately nobody was hurt or killed. The ambassador had to make a judgment to let people in. By the time we arrived, most of the renovations were in the upper offices. It was mainly offices that were affected, not apartments. That work was still going on a year later and finished everything a few months after I arrived. There were other fires afterwards, but none during the three years that I was there.

Q: How much did, in the first place was there microwave business going on or not?

BOORSTEIN: That also predated my arrival, but not by much. That was very sad because there were some people who contracted cancer. There was an officer named Gordon Shouse who was in the junior officer class right after mine who died of cancer. His wife, Eloise, also had breast cancer. She entered the Foreign Service I believe after her husband died and Johns Hopkins did all of these epidemiological studies to see if there was truly a link and they found that it was moderate, but there was some statistical aberration. We knew exactly where the microwaves were coming from. As a matter of fact during my tour there was a big fire in the place where the microwaves emanated from and then they just stopped.

While I was there they discovered that the Soviets were successful in implanting some sort of a listening device capability into the electric typewriters that were not shipped securely. We used to be able to figure out if they were okay. You would take an IBM Selectric typewriter and when you turned off the electricity and pushed the spacebar, if the electric current continued to let the carriage go across a few more seconds you knew it was okay. If it stopped immediately it alerted you that there was a problem. We would often test our typewriters in that way. We had to ship them out and get replacements in. The incident with Lonetree in '86, '87. I was in Poland at the time and when I get to Warsaw I'll tell you stories about that, the impact of that, but we and then of course in 1986, there were some problems, the Soviet government withdrew all of their Russian staff of the embassy and that was another huge problem that impacted the American staff..

Q: What did happen, was there a change in as you saw it in your work and all after was it December of 1978?

BOORSTEIN: Oh, '79. Yes, as I was saying earlier, that first year I was there I was really busy with high level congressional delegations. All these bilateral cabinet level visits that included the Secretary of State. The Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan and it all stopped. There was a big debate that went on between Washington and the embassy about whether we should remove some staff. We had at the time one of the largest USIS contingents in the world. I think they were in excess of 15 USIS officers. Exchanges, cultural scientific exchanges, all kinds of stuff going on. I remember going to a wonderful production of The Gin Game with Jessica Tandy and Hume Cronyn, the husband and wife.

Q: Yes, great actors.

BOORSTEIN: It was just wonderful. There were traveling exhibits Agricultural USA where we had our own Foreign Service people acting as guides, helped them with the language, they did a lot of traveling. They would spend the first year doing that and the second year they'd come into the embassy for a job. It was a great training means for some of our junior political and economic officers. Things were booming. After the invasion of Afghanistan, it all stopped and as a matter of fact, the other main activity of that was during that first year that I was there we were making efforts to open up a new consulate in Kiev. It was a reciprocal deal because the Soviets wanted to open a consulate in New York. Obviously, they had their mission to the UN, but their only consulate in the United States was in San Francisco so again it was one for one. We had Leningrad, they had San Francisco, we wanted Kiev, they wanted New York.

We had the beginnings of a consulate, it was called the Kiev Advance Party and the head of that operation was David Swarz. I don't know if you ever met David with his oral history. He's been retired now for six or eight years. S-W-A-R-Z. David I believe is working somewhere in the Soviet Union under the auspices of the OSCE, but maybe you could track him down somewhere. Anyway, David was the head of the Kiev Advance Party and we had an administrative officer, we had a consular officer, a few other assorted people down there. We had property and were renovating an office building and were renovating housing and we were all prepared to put in a communications unit and open it up sometime in the spring of 1980. There were teams and I was part of a team that went down to Kiev in the spring of 1979, the first time I visited their place and went down with someone from the foreign buildings office and there were negotiations and discussions were being, the Ukrainian provincial people on different things. After the invasion of Afghanistan as part of the sanctions, President Carter said we're not going to open Kiev and the Soviets cannot open New York so we closed it all down. That was a complete flip-flop and for the rest of the time that I was there for a year and a half, the only Washington visitor outside the State Department to my knowledge that came to Moscow was Congressman Solarz, Steve Solarz. He came by himself and he had no appointments with any Soviet officials. He simply wanted to have some consultations with the ambassador and embassy staff. It was the deep freeze. It didn't impact on me in the administrative section other than it freed up a lot of my time. I didn't have to deal with these official visits anymore. My third year in Moscow I actually switched jobs. I went from being number two in the administrative section to being the supervisory general services officer, handling the motor pool, transportation, housing and furniture, supplies. It was a big job. I wouldn't say that I was bored, but it was not as frenzied a place. The people who were bored were all the officers from USIS what we called the press and culture section. They had nothing to do. For optics reasons it was decided that they wouldn't be moved.

Q: How did you find in your varying jobs living in Moscow? There was a high rate of divorce, and things of this nature, children.

BOORSTEIN: Well, surprisingly little. In the late 1970s the medical division started recruiting and hiring psychiatrists and Ph.D. clinical psychologist. Now of course we have them at a number of regional places around the world. The first embassy to have a resident psychiatrist who traveled around regionally was Vienna of course. Paul Eggertsen was assigned there as the regional psychiatrist. He traveled 70% to 80% of the time. Every six weeks he was in Moscow, every six to eight weeks. He had a lot of clients. I didn't have any particular huge problems, but I found it comforting to talk with him, just one on one, talk about the stresses in the family, talk about the stresses at work. It was all of course very confidential. It wasn't done in any secure environment, so whatever the Soviets learned, they learned. He would do workshops on stress management, looking for signs of alcoholism. He would consult a lot at the Anglo American School. There were kids that were having some particular problems that were emotionally related, he would talk to the teachers and talk to the administration, perhaps even observe the youngsters in the classroom. It was an enormous benefit to have that asset. He was just a good guy. Moscow was the post he visited the most. His territory included Poland, Hungary, Romania, Czechoslovakia, so he was on the road a lot. I can't think of any marriages that broke up while we were there. Nothing comes to mind. Maybe I'll have to ask my wife if she remembers.

Q: Well, no, some posts do and I think probably Paris and Rio de Janeiro had their problems, too.

BOORSTEIN: Yes, I'll get to my time in Caracas. That was the Peyton Place of my Foreign Service career, but you would kind of wonder why, but it was just the people who were there. I don't recall Moscow having, if there were issues they were kept pretty quiet.

Q: How about our post in Leningrad, were there any particular problems that you saw with keeping it going?

BOORSTEIN: Well, you know, I visited Leningrad maybe a half a dozen times during my tour. It required a lot of attention from Moscow. Leningrad had the benefit of being geographically close to Finland. You could literally go up for the day, cross the border, do some shopping and then drive back to Leningrad and that was great morale booster for people there. The local secret police or whatever, the KGB, were more active up there. There were a lot of efforts to attack the embassy in terms of implanting bugs and doing things. We devoted a lot of attention to the internal security posture. Those problems continued well after I left. There were constantly renovation projects going on there. There was a very small number of school age children. There was a branch of the Anglo American School of Moscow that operated up there that may have had 10 kids. They had an American teacher and his wife. They both were teachers. They were credentialed and they had a small group of kids that they taught. Nothing really stands out as to anything that happened while I was there.

Q: What about the bugging? Did one just say well its there and relax or what did you do about it?

BOORSTEIN: Well, you know, we had secure conference rooms, which we used a lot. Now, you know, I was there as we, one of the main things I wanted to convey, I was there as we were ramping up to start the construction of our new embassy in Moscow. The notoriously failed project. So, the first year I was there the foreign buildings office at the State Department hired a cadre of native Russian speaking top secret cleared American engineers and architects. These were people that, as I said, Russian was their native language. They predominantly were people who were either born or grew up in Yugoslavia. I don't know whether after the revolution their parents went from Russia to Yugoslavia.

BOORSTEIN: Yes, that's probably where they came from. They were recruited. Like I said they were American citizens, they had top secret clearance and they represented a series of the trade expertise in electrical, mechanical, civil engineering, architectural security aspects and there were probably 12 of them. There was a project director named Vic Vespertino. He's now retired. It would be marvelous if you could talk to him, too. I really think the State Department should commission its own history on that project. They're afraid to do it, I don't know. They had an administrative officer. They rented actually apartment units for them in a new building, brought in new sets of furniture from Denmark and they were all set to go. This was all tied in to the history of the effort for us to build a new embassy in Moscow which was done on the basis of reciprocity because the Soviet Union wanted to build a new embassy here and they had their site at Mount Alto and this dates back to the signed agreement that provided the sites in Moscow and Washington was signed in 1969. Then there were three years of negotiations between the Soviets and the Americans on what are called "Conditions of Construction." In other words, how were materials going to be imported? What kind of security would be guaranteed by each party? What was the regime to approve the drawings inspect the facility. Everything that you can think of that goes into this, but to do it in a way where we on the American side felt that we would have a secure facility. Now, we were looking back on it we were incredibly naïve and had a degree of hubris that ended up being very harmful to us because we allowed the Soviet authorities to say: "You know, we have a lot of experience of foreign governments building embassies in Moscow and here's what we do for all of them. We can't treat you any differently." They insisted that their state corporation have the contract for the construction and that we could provide our own people to observe how the concrete was poured, how the bricks were put together, how the wiring was done, etc. for the main super structure of the building. In those areas that were secure then we of course could then take it over and without any use of any Soviet people do the final fit out ourselves. That basic contract I believe was $55 million and a mere pittance of what it costs us to build an embassy that size and scope today. It was a comprehensive project. It included 125 apartments, 10 representational townhouses, a school, a Marine House, an indoor swimming pool and gymnasium, a bowling alley and as I said a huge project. It took three years to negotiate the conditions of construction and these talks would have dragged on longer, but Nixon apparently was scheduling a trip to the Soviet Union and he told Henry Kissinger "I want these talks concluded, I don't want this to be an impediment to my visit." So, whatever concessions we were resisting I can't tell you which ones they were, but the lore is that we sort of caved in and signed the agreement in 1972.

From '72 to '78 we were developing the design, we were getting funding from Congress. We were arranging for all the logistics. In the meantime at a faster pace the Soviet Union was moving forward with their project on Mount Alto. They had an American contractor and they did whatever they did. The stories came out years later that the CIA and the FBI were keeping a pretty good eye on what was happening. It was a tunnel that they discovered later, this was all in the open press. I knew nothing about it at the time, but in the spring or the summer of 1979 there was a formal ground breaking for our project and the senior U.S. government representative who was there for the groundbreaking was Daniel Boorstin the person who everybody thinks I'm related to. He was the Librarian of Congress at the time. He flew out and he was the senior American official for the cutting of the ribbon. I still have my invitation for that event. So, for the rest of the time that I was there, there was a lot of earth moving and pouring of concrete and this, that and the other thing. I left in the summer of 1981 and of course the project came to a screeching halt in 1985 when the bugs were discovered in the concrete super structure. That is a whole other story, but that was the major focus of my section and what I was doing during the time I was there, building up to that.

Q: Just to give in a fill in later, but you were not hearing any people say, oh, God we shouldn't be doing this?

BOORSTEIN: No, absolutely not.

Q: There were no sort of warning bells coming from others?

BOORSTEIN: I mean, look, even though I was in the administrative section because the foreign buildings office had their own unit, it was pretty self-contained and if there were discussions they were handled at a higher level.

Q: I'm just saying that there were no warning flags going up?

BOORSTEIN: No, not that I heard of and I certainly didn't think any of it myself. Again, that group was a big presence and there was a big focus on that project as it got underway.

Q: Did you get any reflections about the hostage taking in Iran?

BOORSTEIN: Yes, thank you for mentioning that. It happened obviously while I was there and that was a source of considerable tension. We were on high alert. I remember riding on the school bus with some concerns that the Iranian militants that might have a presence in Moscow were going to highjack a bus of American school children. For several days parents and I had a daughter, at the time she was fifth or sixth grade, I rode the bus in my official capacity. Obviously nothing ever happened, but there was obviously heightened concerns and major concerns that our people were vulnerable. Our security posture was beefed up. The embassy was right on the street. There were no threats. We felt, again the good side of being in a totalitarian state like the Soviet Union, if anybody was going to move against it was going to be their own people.

Q: '81. That's a fairly long tour there isn't it?

BOORSTEIN: Yes, that was the longest time I had spent at any one post. As a matter of fact, I went there on a direct transfer from Ottawa and took home leave after being in Moscow for a year and then went back for two more years. One of the things that was an added dimension to my job was that I was the ambassador's representative on the school board of the Anglo-American School in Moscow and that was an added feature. My wife taught second grade at the school and my daughter was there as well. I was the treasurer of the school board and the chairmanship would rotate. The three main embassies that had an interest in the school were the British, American and Canadian embassies. The chairman was always either British, American or Canadian. The deputy chief of mission's wife Betty Garrison was the chairwoman for one year. The British cultural attaché was the chairman for one year and the Canadian was the third year I was there. Just very active, the cadre of the teachers came primarily from those three countries as overseas hires. It was an excellent school. It probably had about no more than 150 students and the way the Soviet government dealt with the education for foreigners first of all they didn't let any of their own children go to this school. They also did not acknowledge that the school existed as its own entity so in effect what they said was that these were three schools. There was the American school, the British school and the Canadian school. It so happened that the building they gave us had three stories to it and so there were three leases. One was with the British Embassy, one was with the American Embassy and one was with the Canadian Embassy. Now, for purposes of accreditation by an American association and accredited schools, the school was an entity and it was called the Anglo American School of Moscow and actually was formed in 1949. Because of the way under the Soviet system that they wanted to again control the kind of things that were taking place in their midst, they structured it in such a way that its clout and its authority was limited.

There were no real incidents that I can think of that happened other than there typically was a flea market that the school would sponsor once or twice a year and eventually it got out of hand because what it was a place where embassy people and sometimes even Third World people would basically bring all of their second hand clothes, socks, underwear and have them up for sale. The Soviet citizens would come in and swarm the place and buy things either to use them themselves or to resell them. While we were there the Soviet authorities said, "look this is getting out of hand; you can't do this anymore." After that the annual fund-raiser and you could raise maybe $5,000 or $10,000, not a lot of money. It was handled more as a fun fair and you would do things like be able to sling a water balloon at the principal or pay a certain fee. I remember my wife organized that one year and we had fun because the night before we had bought this huge supply of these huge bricks of vanilla ice cream, which were delicious in the Soviet Union. That's all you could get was vanilla ice cream, but what we did we had a whole array of flavors. We would add chocolate and strawberry and this and that and we'd invent the names of these ice creams. We had Lenin Lime and Khrushchev Chocolate and Stalin Strawberry and we would mix them all together and sell them. That was the time Baskin Robbins had just decided they were going to come in, they came in after we left. We basically were doing a little play on having a Baskin Robbins, 31 flavors, but we really had about five and for the other ones we had names for, we wrote up in Russian "Nyet," which means is not available which often happened when you went out to a restaurant. So, we had a lot of fun with that.

The school group was a big source of social entertainment for my wife and me that sort of augmented what we had within the embassy. It was a lot of fun. I remember twice going up with the school director to drive back a new van the school ordered in Helsinki. The school paid my way to fly to Helsinki and the director and I would drive back and it was a two-day trip to come back in the overnight in Leningrad. I enjoyed it immensely and I ended up doing a lot of stuff the school board subsequently in Warsaw in my tour, but that was the first time I had served on a school board so it added flavor.

Q: Well, I'm just looking at the time. It's probably a good place to stop Mike. Where did you go in '81?

BOORSTEIN: Yes. I came back to Washington and had a tour on the Soviet desk. I think there are some more things I can talk about in Moscow.

Q: All right, well, sort of make note and next time we'll do that.

BOORSTEIN: All right. Now, let me give you a call when I get home either today or.

Q: Okay, today is the 20th of October, 2005. Mike, before we get to '91 where you went to.

BOORSTEIN: '81.

Q: What?

BOORSTEIN: '81.

Q: '81 I mean, if you want to you said you wanted to talk a little bit about the relationship business.

BOORSTEIN: Yes, as I said earlier, my parents had emigrated from pre-revolutionary Russia and met in the United States and married. On my father's side he had two older sisters who remained behind. He actually had four, two of them died in the '20s in a typhoid fever epidemic, but the other two married and had children and whatever and these were all people that I listed when I got into this, when I was applying for the State Department and they were doing my security clearance and they also, the State Department was aware of them when I went for my assignment and I reported to the security officer on arrival that I had these family members both in Moscow and in Leningrad and I had an expectation that I would see them because I had seen them as a teenager when I traveled there with my parents. He said, "fine, you can see them, but you have to abide by certain ground rules and they are don't go alone, take your wife, take your daughter, take an embassy colleague, you take a colleague from a friendly embassy, the Canadians, the Brits, the Aussies or whatever and if there's ever any hint of difficulty either towards you or towards your family you have to report it to me as the security officer and you have to break off the relationship until the matter is deemed to be okay." So, I followed those ground rules scrupulously. There really were no incidents regarding well in Moscow I had a first cousin and she was a widow and she had a married daughter and that married daughter had a husband who had just returned from military service in Afghanistan, the Soviet army and they had two young children. I would see them on the average of about once a month. We would bring them into our apartment on the diplomatic compound. I'd have to meet them there and it was a very enriching part of the experience because they were family. None of them spoke any English so it was a matter of another dimension to my Russian language use because it was very much family and home oriented. During my assignment there my mother came to visit. Two of my sisters and their family came to visit. It was a great opportunity to acquaint. You know, my mother had met, these were actually on my father's side, but she had met them before on other trips. That was a good element, aspect of the assignment.

The family in Leningrad also one of my aunts was still living and she had two children, a son who had completed a career in the Red Army and he after retirement was working as an instructor at a military academy in Leningrad and the daughter was a Ph.D. chemical engineer and she worked in the defense industry as did her husband and they had one daughter. They were a little nervous seeing me. They wanted to see me and my family and I made fairly frequent visits to Leningrad and occasionally she would come down to Moscow. We did spend time in their apartment and again when my mother and sisters came out a variety of visits we saw them as well.

There was one occasion where I flew to Helsinki with the director of the Anglo American School to pick up a new van for the school and drive it back to Moscow, which was a two day trip. The first day was by road from Helsinki across the border into Leningrad and we had arranged to stay in a consulate apartment. When I got settled in I called my cousin in Leningrad and said I was in town and had not called ahead of time and would it be possible to see her. She responded looking back on it now or afterwards with quite a nervous voice saying, well you know our apartment is really kind of a mess. It's undergoing renovation. In Russian they use the word "remont" all the time for anything that's undergoing renovation. She could meet me outside a particular metro stop and we could have a chat. I thought this was a little strange, but nonetheless I listened. I got to the metro station and typically as a family member and a close relative we would hug and kiss each other when we would see each other. She greeted and said in Russian with her eyes not making contact with me, don't hug me, don't kiss me, just walk with me. So, we walked and obviously I knew something was amiss and she proceeded to tell me with a great deal of emotion that her husband had gotten into trouble at work because he was confronted by his superior who said he had knowledge of the fact that against his signed contract as a security cleared chemical engineer in the defense industry he had had contact with foreigners and relatives to boot, even though it was his wife's relatives. As a result he was told he could not see these relatives any longer, nor can his wife who also was employed and that he was going to be watched very carefully about his loyalty and so on. It was a great deal of emotion when my cousin told me this and I said, well, does this apply to your brother? Does this apply to your mother? The answer was "no, you could still see them," but I could have no contact, no phone calls, nothing with them until further notice. This was, I still had about a year left in my assignment. That was disturbing and I reported this to the embassy and nothing further happened and I did not see my cousin again until I was back on a temporary duty trip to Moscow when I was assigned in Washington following my tour in Moscow and she actually was visiting my other cousin in Moscow and I saw her there. Subsequently, this family, unlike my family in Moscow, had been quite vocal in trying to find a way to immigrate to Israel. They wanted me to help and this was in the late '70s, early '80s and I said, "this is not the time to do this. It's very rare. They're cracking down on the dissidents and you just have to lie low." Well, ultimately by the late '80s when the situation improved they did immigrate to Israel and they are still there now. That was a bit of a troublesome aspect of the tour, but we all survived it unscathed. Again it is sort of representative of the way that the Soviet government looked at relations with foreigners. I wanted to mention that, but at the same time, primarily with the family in Moscow, it really was a very satisfying part of the assignment.

I remember taking my cousin to at the time USIS had a traveling exhibit called Agriculture USA and my cousin in Moscow was just absolutely floored at the slideshow that showed a supermarket in Minneapolis with all the array in winter of fruits and vegetables. She basically said, "this is American propaganda." I kept assuring her saying "it is not at all." The other interesting vignette was that in those days the embassy had access to a film circuit, these 35-millimeter big rolls of film would come in. Depending on your position in the embassy or whatever you would have a projector at home that you could use and we had one and I remember on the film circuit the movie The Russians are Coming, the Russians are Coming with Theodore Bikel, came in and I showed it to my Russian cousin and her family and there was a line in there where the young sailor says to the girl in I think its Nantucket.

Q: Yes, it was Nantucket I think.

BOORSTEIN: That he was surprised at how warm and friendly she was because they had learned in school how much Americans hated the Russians and I'm translating this all along to my cousin and she just looked shocked and said, they never taught us that in school. They were never taught how much the Russians hated us and whatever. Anyway, or Americans hated the Russians, but anyway it was kind of amusing. I learned a great deal about Russian cooking and culture and just their way of life. It was good. I did talk the previous time about the nature of the work and what the environment was like in the embassy and the embassy projects. Let's move on.

In July of 1981 I left Moscow and my family traveled ahead and actually went to a beach in the Adriatic in Italy and I stayed behind for about two weeks and then on the way out as part of the development of the embassy dacha project that I was in charge of, the second summer house, I traveled via Helsinki to consult with the architects and then from there flew down to Italy to join my family. We had a wonderful vacation in a little town called Pesaro on the Adriatic and then from there I think we pretty much flew straight back to the States. We settled into a, we rented a house in the Virginia suburbs. My daughter entered the eighth grade and my wife got a job just by answering an ad in the Washington Post at a small Episcopal day school called St. Patrick's off of Foxhall Road in Washington, not as a teacher, but as a program director. She was in charge of fundraising bazaars and other kinds of things that supported the education programs. She had that job for five years and enjoyed it quite a bit. We had entrée into a whole range of sort of upper crust Washington society.

For example, when Kenneth Dam became the Deputy Secretary of State, his son went to the school and I remember when he first moved to the area and every morning my wife dropped me off at the State Department and Kenneth Dam would deliver his son to our car and she would then take him to school until they got settled in. George Will the columnist his child went to the school, so it was quite a socially prominent school population.

PHILIP C. BROWN
Information Officer/Press Attaché, USIS

Moscow (1978-1981)

Mr. Brown was born in Massachusetts and raised primarily in Pennsylvania. He was educated at College of Wooster (Ohio) and the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy. After serving with the Voice of America, in 1965 he joined the United States Information Agency Foreign Service (USIS), where he served several assignments at its headquarters in Washington DC. His foreign posts include Dakar, Douala, Yaoundé, Paris, Vienna and Moscow, where he served twice. At these posts his assignments ranged from Assistant Branch Public Affairs Officer to Counselor for Information, Press and Cultural Affairs. Mr. Brown was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2012.

Q: You stayed there until '81.

BROWN: I would be there for three years. Today I can talk about the first year.

Q: Who was the ambassador there?

BROWN: The ambassador was the late Malcolm Toon. This was his fourth ambassadorial post. He had been ambassador in Prague, Belgrade, Tel Aviv and Moscow, a true career ambassador.

I had a career ambassador in Yaoundé, Cameroon but this was the first time I had really encountered someone who was as steeped in the Foreign Service as Malcolm Toon.

The general impression of Mac Toon was that he ate young or even mid-level Foreign Service officers for breakfast and that the first time I screwed up, I would be out on my ear. I was in a very exposed position. My title was Information Officer but really I was the press attaché. I was the first point of contact for journalists. The first time I did badly, I would be tossed out on my ear.

I think I was introduced to the ambassador in a very perfunctory way. It was not long after I got there but there was no formal introduction.

I don't want this to sound boastful but I connected with Mac Toon. I did a job that he liked and I really liked working for him. I really felt comfortable. To get to him, I often had to go through the PAO and the DCM who were both fine individuals, very professional, but they had to clear on my memos or whatever. When I got to Ambassador Toon, I felt a degree of comfort, professional comfort that I could then do my press attaché job well.

He took a liking to my wife and me. I knew that when, early in our first year, we found ourselves invited to Spaso House for a family dinner on the second floor along with the British ambassador, his wife and one of the correspondents and his wife. I knew Mac Toon liked me both professionally and personally. It was a source of satisfaction.

He was renowned for his briefings, generally done on Friday afternoon, for the American press corps. These were background briefings and to be attributed to a "senior Western diplomat."

Back in Washington, on Saturday, if they read anything that said “senior Western diplomat,” they all knew this was Mac Toon speaking. If they knew that in Washington, I am sure everyone else knew it.

He was pretty candid but to be honest, we had limited exposure, limited first-hand exposure to Soviets. I can remember one time he came into one of these briefings and he had actually seen at some sort of activity a member of the politburo and the journalists must have spent half an hour just asking him questions about this individual. It wasn't a high member of the politburo but just what he looked like, what clothes he was wearing, what his health was, how he comported himself. Mac Toon had no sympathy for the Soviet Union and he came up with some wonderful quotes that the journalists liked and he didn't mind seeing himself quoted in the press.

There was a time when he said something that got him in a little trouble in Washington, a little hot water. Something I had then said maybe compounded it. He said to me later on, “Did you see that back in Washington they don't like what I said?”

And I said, “Uh huh” thinking I was then going to get in trouble myself. He smiled and said, “I could care less.” The way he confided in me was great for my ego and, of course, made me feel very loyal to him.

In 1979, he went to the summit meeting in Vienna between Jimmy Carter and Brezhnev where they signed a SALT agreement. At the end, I don't know what led him to do it but Ambassador Toon did a special briefing for the American press corps. He said, “I haven't yet decided whether I will support the SALT treaty.”

Well, that was pretty much out on a limb, shall we say? It later came to the attention of Secretary Vance and Mac Toon back in Moscow had to say yes, he had now studied it and he would support the SALT treaty because there was adequate verification. He didn't mind being an independent operator.

I will mention him more because I really liked Mac Toon. Just another anecdote:

Early on, there was a fire in a building directly across the street from the embassy -- the embassy was located on the Ring Road in Moscow -- from where it was believed the Soviets directed their radiation at the embassy. This was an ongoing subject when I arrived, that the Soviets were directing radiation at our embassy, whether to foul up our communications or as a health issue, it was an ongoing issue and to this day, I would like to see some in depth reporting on that subject.

I went in on Saturday morning and there were fire trucks across the street; it must have been cold weather because there were icicles dripping and we quickly learned that the fire had taken place on a Friday night up on that level where we knew the Soviets had their equipment to direct radiation at the embassy.

So I started getting phone calls. What's happening? Is the radiation continuing? I worked my way up through the two levels I had to go through to Ambassador Toon's office and the question was posed there.

The simple answer was “we don’t know whether anything has changed because they operate their radiation equipment Monday through Friday and we won’t know if this fire had any impact until Monday morning.”

Toon said, “Let’s just say that.”

And I thought, “Oh, goodness. What a wonderful way to deal with a press issue. A straightforward, honest answer” and that’s what I was authorized to say to the press. “We don’t know because they operate that equipment Monday through Friday and we won’t know until Monday. Check back with us then.” They checked back with us on Monday and I was authorized to say there is apparently no radiation coming at us from that building. The fire has damaged their equipment.

That’s a long, convoluted way of saying I really felt comfortable dealing with Ambassador Toon. He was honest and direct and didn’t mind being quoted.

Q: How would you say relations were with the Soviet Union in 1978?

BROWN: On the day we arrived from Munich via Frankfurt, we were met at the airport and taken to our apartment. I say we because we arrived as a family of four plus dog and cat. We were taken to our apartment and the next morning my children got up and went across this big highway to the school and my wife set about doing what she needed to do to make our life there, to make our apartment there livable.

I rode to work with my colleague Dick Combs for my first day on the job. There were three issues already that were of interest to the press. They would say something about the nature of our relations.

Number one: We had a big delegation in for SALT talks headed by Paul Warnke and General Ed Rowney. They were meeting with the Soviets; part of the negotiation that would lead to the signing of a SALT treaty the next summer. From that point of view, relations were pretty good. These were serious negotiations. I wasn’t the spokesman for the group of anything but I was immediately dealing with journalists if there were any statement to be provided, I was the source of that statement.

At the same time, issue number two involved an American businessman whose name was Jay Crawford and who had been arrested on some phony charges; his verdict was announced on my first day, September 7, my first full day at work. You can Google Jay Crawford, businessman verdict and see more about that issue.

The third issue. Senator Edward Kennedy was in Moscow en route to Central Asia, to Alma Ata, for an international meeting on health care. I don’t recall that journalists were going with him but he was a source of news as well.

So you had the good, the bad and the in between. But for the most part, we were in a fairly upbeat mood that year.

Q: Brezhnev was

BROWN: It was Brezhnev, Kosygin and Gromyko. There was also a nominal president but the ones we would be dealing with would be Brezhnev, Kosygin and Gromyko. This was Cold War.

We were largely out of direct contact with friends and family back home. It was a family experience. My children were at a good age (Sarah was 12 and Christine was 10 the year we arrived). They were not so young that they required babysitters or constant tending. Nor were they weren't so old that they were restless and I will say proudly that we fully integrated them into our lives there. There were many opportunities to interact with Soviets or with others and we fully involved our children in that.

They went across this huge highway, Leninsky Prospekt, that we lived on to the Anglo American Canadian School. There were minimal opportunities, almost zero opportunities to send your children to Russian school. I know that some of the correspondents sent their children to Russian schools but it really wasn't an easy alternative and the Anglo American Canadian School was excellent.

Our apartment was on the 12th floor of a standard Soviet apartment building, Leninsky Prospekt, number 83. All the various compounds where people lived had shorthand descriptions. We were L – 83. Someone else would live at L-45 or K-7 or SadSam.

We were on the 12th floor of a 14-story building. Two Russian apartments put together so we could look out at three directions. It was an extraordinary apartment. You put that apartment with that view in Manhattan today and it would sell for three million dollars. On a clear day, in the distance, we could see the gold from the bell tower at the Kremlin. And a creaky old elevator, we always hoped it would keep functioning.

It was occupied by foreigners but not only Americans. There were Brits, New Zealanders, Syrians, Japanese; a wide variety of foreigners lived in the building. All around us, the other apartment buildings were occupied by Russians; it was a Russian neighborhood. We had the dog and that dog needed to be walked and when we would walk we would quite often have conversations with Russians through the dog. One of the first phrases I learned was “kakaya eta paroda?” What is the breed of your dog?

This gave us a window, literal and figurative, on the way Russians lived; we could see their apartment buildings, see them going home from work. Right up the street was a store that a lot of Russians frequented. It was called the Leipzig and apparently had goods from East Germany and so if you were talking to a Russian or a Soviet, you would say we live not far from the Leipzig store. They all knew where you were talking about.

We weren't close to a metro. The metro was over near the university. Early on, I bought a little Russian car called a Zhiguli, basically a Fiat, and I would drive that little Zhiguli from the L-83 into the embassy; there was also an embassy shuttle.

From our balconies -- we had little balconies on three sides; I hate to think how sturdy they were -- we had this great view in three directions. Soon after we arrived, there was a Russian holiday and they spent thousands of dollars on fireworks, launching them from multiple sites. This experience, early on, of looking out and seeing the fireworks displays in all directions was great fun for us and for the children.

Not too far away was the Russian circus. We spent an early evening there. The embassy had a dacha, an hour's drive or so from where we lived, in Tarasovka. We would make frequent trips out there. The way it operated, during the course of a year, you would actually have a dacha weekend and that was sacrosanct. You went out there with your family, invited anyone else you wanted and you stayed in the dacha.

When I say sacrosanct, I can remember that my boss, even when we had some high level visitor, said, "No, this is my dacha weekend. I am going to be there."

There was also a smaller ambassador's dacha and a tennis court. It was a real plus as far as making yourself comfortable with this lifestyle. Behind the ambassador's residence, the famous Spaso House, there was a paddle tennis court. I got introduced to paddle tennis and learned that Mac Toon was also an avid paddle tennis player. At 11 o'clock in the morning, you might get a call from the ambassador's secretary saying, "The ambassador is playing paddle. Do you want to come?" I loved that invitation. You never cut Mac Toon any slack. He knew if you were making a call that favored him; he wanted to be treated like one of the guys on the paddle tennis court.

During that first winter, I learned 40 degrees below zero is the same on both the Centigrade and Fahrenheit scale. We had minus 40 degrees and I learned what really true cold weather is. That was the coldest winter we had. Many times, people would ask "how you stand those cold winters in Moscow?" By the end of three years, I knew the biggest climate issue I had to deal with was the hot weather in the embassy; this horrible building where there was no air conditioning and temperatures in the office where you were trying to work must have been in the 80s and 90s.

My birthday is November 7th which was also the anniversary of the great October Revolution. The kids and my Soviet friends always got a kick out of the fact that on my birthday, there was a great parade across Red Square and fireworks. It was a source of a lot of laughter and jokes and fun. "Slava Philu," people would say.

These were things that made life enjoyable for us. There wasn't a PX. There were no movie theaters. There were none of those things that you sometimes associate with life overseas but we found a lot of ways to make life there fun and enjoyable. Films would come in from Frankfurt in the pouch. The army could bring them in and they were on these big reels. People would sign up as soon as the films arrived. To carry home a movie, you'd carry this very heavy suitcase with maybe three or four reels. Various people had projectors.

In our building, where there were quite a number of American families, we did something called hot reeling. The family downstairs would start the movie and when they came to the end of the first reel, they would bring it up to another floor where another group of people would watch the first reel and when they were done, they'd take it to another level. The movie might start at 7:30 in one apartment and 8 o'clock in another apartment, 8:30 in another. We called it hot reeling, moving movies from one floor to another.

Q: I learned to thread a projector very, very nicely.

BROWN: I learned that in Africa and it stood me in good stead in Moscow. These were Bell and Howell projectors with a big reel on top and a take-up reel on the bottom.

But we were not by any means confined to the American community for our entertainment. Early on, through various means, I had a lot of Soviet contacts or more precisely, Russian and specifically Jewish friends. We got to know any number of them. I will go into detail later. We enjoyed our American and other expatriate friends living in Moscow but we had a lot of other friends in the Russian community.

My job was information officer and there were two assistant information officers. In addition to the press corps, we had responsibility for the monthly magazine called America Illustrated, a Life magazine size magazine we were allowed to "sell" through Russian kiosks. I think the number was something like 63,000; they had a magazine called Soviet Life that they sold in the United States, the same number. Everything was controlled by formal, written cultural exchange agreement.

We also had these large-scale, thematic exhibits. They went back to the Nixon-Khrushchev kitchen debate. They would go to six cities for about a month each with 25 to 30 Russian speaking American guides. The cities would be chosen in negotiations with the Soviets and would take us all over the country – to Central Asia, the Caucasus, Ukraine, major Russian cities.

The opening was always the occasion for a high-level American visitor along with the ambassador and local officials. In addition to the guides, American specialists would go out and interact with counterparts or do lectures. During my time in Washington, 1974 to 1976, I had actually interviewed and recruited some of these guides.

Russians, or other nationalities, would line up for hours to go through the exhibit. Inevitably, there would be problems and issues that arose and that required negotiations with the Soviets. My office was the primary point of contact with the exhibits.

There were occasional journalists who went on exchanges programs to the United States, part of the international exchange program.

But my primary duty or responsibility as press attaché involved interaction with the press corps. There were 25 American journalists representing something like 15 American news media. To this day, I could probably recall of the top of my head the names of 20 of those 25 journalists.

The two news agencies, AP and UPI, each had five correspondents. Reuters was also always represented and we always had a debate whether they were an American news agency or not. That came up when you had pools or when the ambassador did his press briefing. The New York Times had two correspondents and the other major American newspapers had one -- The Washington Post, Baltimore Sun, Los Angeles Times, Chicago Tribune, Christian Science Monitor.

The magazines all had correspondents -- Time, Newsweek, U. S. News, and Business Week. The three TV networks -- and there were only three then, NBC, CBS and ABC -- had correspondents. They also had a cameraman who was quite often an American or non-Soviet.

Then you had a couple of special correspondents, an American who worked for The Financial Times and a man named Ed Stevens, who had been there for years and years and had won a Pulitzer Prize and was a free lancer at the time. A whole book has been written about Ed Stevens.

I knew the American journalists in many different ways. There was first of all the standard professional relationship of the press attaché to the journalist. They ask questions. We try to answer. That goes without saying.

But we also knew them almost as clients under the Helsinki Accords and the basket three provisions which included working conditions for journalists. I don't think anyone at the time realized how important this was going to be but the Soviets committed themselves to minimal working conditions for journalists and we were constantly going to the foreign ministry press division to raise an issue of an American journalist who had his film seized at Red Square, who wanted to go on vacation, whose replacement could not get a visa. One kind of indignity or another, we would go in and raise the issue under the broad heading of working conditions for journalists.

We also knew them because journalists had privileges at the embassy that they didn't have anywhere else in the world. I think it would surprise journalists these days to know they had these kinds of privileges. They were allowed to receive their mail through the diplomatic pouch. They were not allowed to receive personal packages but they could receive letter mail and business packages. The mail came in by pouch twice a week and one of the big moments was to go down and dump all the mail on the floor and sort it out. The journalists got their mail that way. Occasionally some of them received packages and we had to go through these and say "Oops, well, we will give it to you this time but remember you guys are not supposed to get packages." It would sometimes be cookies from their mother for Christmas or something like that.

The journalists also had access to the embassy doctor and to the snack bar; in the little compound right behind the embassy was the famous snack bar. There were a couple of Italians who had come to work, I believe, in the Fiat factory. They left there and came to work with the Americans. One named Clemente ended up as the major domo at Spaso House and another, Alfredo, ran the snack bar. It was such a convenience to go to the snack bar and have lunch. It was also a place to do business. The American journalists had access but it was understood that things talked about down there were off the record. This was a time we didn't have any rapid means of communication so when you wanted to get out a message, you sat down at your phone and you dialed the numbers consecutively of all these people and communicated with them; there was no email or other easy communication so the snack bar was a great opportunity for quick communications.

Lastly, these journalists were our age, they had families and their kids were in the American School with one or two exceptions. We very much integrated them into our social life. To this day, some of the journalists that we met in Moscow are among our closest friends. Bernard Redmont was the CBS correspondent. He and his wife are in their 90s now and in a retirement community outside Boston. Bernie and his wife were a generation older than my wife and me. He was a highly respected journalist and to this day they are very close friends.

There was a correspondent for The Christian Science Monitor named David Willis who had three children, two daughters about the ages of our daughters. It is a very long and complicated story but we went with them on a vacation to Sri Lanka. We flew Aeroflot from Moscow to Sri Lanka. David wrote a story about that vacation. My kids loved reading it because they could understand it. David said he got more comments about that story than about any of the deep thoughtful, thumb sucking pieces that he did about internal Soviet political affairs.

One of those daughters of the now late David Willis of The Christian Science Monitor is now a French horn player with the Berlin Philharmonic, one of the finest orchestras in the world. She is performing tonight at Carnegie Hall, on the stage of Carnegie Hall. We have stayed in touch with many of the journalists and with their families.

On one occasion, we were at a party that was mostly journalists and I noticed my wife and one of the journalists, Charles Bierbauer of ABC, were laughing uncontrollably; they had discovered they had gone to elementary school together.

So we had the professional relationship with the journalists but we also knew them, then and many of them to this day, as close personal friends.

Q: What would you say was the mood of the correspondents there? Were they able to do their job or were they working under siege or what?

BROWN: I think they were like the rest of us foreign services officers. Some had better Russian than others. Some managed to delve more deeply into what was going on than others. There were some really fine correspondents, some who went on to write books, people who went on to very distinguished careers in journalism and beyond.

Just to name a few: Craig Whitney of The New York Times, still one of their senior executive editors. David Shipler of The New York Times. Kevin Klose of the Washington Post. Dan Fisher of the Los Angeles Times. David Satter who wrote for the Financial Times. Tom Kent and Serge Schmemmann of AP.

They all had their own qualities. Some had better Russian. Some were better writers. They used to joke about Dan Fisher. He didn't have the best Russian. He wasn't the best writer but they always say if we could only have Dan's ability of ferreting out facts. He was a fact finder. He would come up with the little details the others wouldn't find.

I can't say I read everything they wrote but I do know in dealing with them that they were enterprising, they had good language, and they had no illusions about the country they were dealing with. I think we owe a debt to these people for putting on the front pages of our newspapers really fine insightful reporting on the Soviet Union.

What was their attitude? They were as frustrated I suppose as everybody in trying to gain access to Soviet officials but on the other hand, the really good ones didn't let that stand in their way. They found ways to interact with other people. They were perhaps frustrated because the Soviets imposed restrictions on travel but the really good ones found ways to travel. I guess what I am getting at is that journalists, like anybody else, could use these restrictions as a peg to say "I really just can't do my job because the Soviets impose all these restrictions" or they could say, "the restrictions are there but I am going to find ways to get around them and do a good job in spite of that."

Q: Did you or did you get stories from the journalists about harassment from the KGB?

BROWN: Yes, and that fell under the issue of working conditions for journalists. They assumed their conversations were monitored. They knew when they met with people they had to be careful about compromising the safety of their Soviet counterparts.

Even before we got there, two of the journalists, Craig Whitney of The New York Times and Hal Piper of The Baltimore Sun, were put on trial for slander. I am just going to mention the broad issue and for anyone who wants to a lot more detail, it is all on the record. They were put on trial for slander. It was called the Whitney – Piper affair by every news media except The Baltimore Sun which, we all jokingly noted, called it the Piper – Whitney affair, putting the name of their journalist first. It involved their contacts with Soviet dissidents and what they wrote. They were put on trial in a major form of harassment. So this was certainly a very ugly way in which the KGB, Soviet authorities, interfered with the abilities of American journalists to do their job.

During the course of that first year, in April, 1979, a journalist for U.S. News and World Report named Robin Knight was traveling in Central Asia, in Tashkent in particular. We got a call at the embassy from his wife saying that Robin "is deathly ill. We don't know what has happened." The ultimate conclusion was he had been slipped some sort of drug by the KGB and was very ill, incoherent. His wife had to virtually carry him back to Moscow. He recovered. We protested. The Soviets claimed no responsibility for it.

I might as well take that story right through to the last stage. That summer in Vienna at the Carter-Brezhnev summit, Ambassador Toon met with Marvin Stone who was the publisher of U.S. News and World Report, accompanied by Robin. I sat in on the meeting as note taker.

The question was should Robin go back to Moscow to finish out his assignment or is it too dangerous? Might he be further compromised? I was really surprised to hear Mac Toon say, "I don't think he should go back. I think it is probably risky for him to return."

This seemed uncharacteristic for Mac Toon because he was a stick-his-finger-in-their-eye kind of guy. I realized afterwards that he was giving that advice on the record to protect himself. If

Robin Knight had gone back and something had happened and Mac Toon had been on record saying, "Oh, I don't think there is any problem. Sure, let him go back," he, Mac Toon, would have been vulnerable. As a matter of fact, Robin Knight did go back. He completed his assignment and there was no problem.

This same Marvin Stone later on became deputy director of USIA and came out to Moscow in the late '80s. He was a really good guy, a man I liked very much. I met him first when he was publisher of U.S. News and World Report and at that meeting in the summer of 1979 in Vienna.

Robin Knight recently wrote an article in the Foreign Service Journal about Mac Toon and his press briefings, a very thoughtful article. I would agree with almost everything he wrote except for one phrase and I will quote that phrase: "The embassy and the American media were locked in a tight embrace to the mutual satisfaction of everyone except possibly Toon's superiors in the State Department and his long suffering press attachés." By that "tight embrace," he was referring to Ambassador Toon's weekly background briefing for the American press corps. "To the mutual satisfaction of everyone except possibly Toon's superiors in the State Department . . ." Well, I can believe that. They must have wondered what they were going to read the next day attributed to a senior Western diplomat.

But not "his long suffering press attachés." There he was wrong. I was that press attaché and I loved Ambassador Toon's accessibility to the press. I looked forward to those press briefings.

Yes, at the end we had to type the notes on an old mechanical typewriter. The ambassador was asked this and he answered thus. You had to get those notes up to the ambassador by Monday, a lot of work, but if I hadn't done them, my life would have been much less interesting. I was not "long suffering." I was a very privileged.

Another thing Ambassador Toon did -- I keep coming back to him -- was to meet one-on-one with the itinerant journalist or maybe with one of the resident press guys. You couldn't abuse the privilege but you could ask for a one-on-one or two-on-one interview with the ambassador; I would sit in on those meetings and take notes.

After having done that any number of times, probably somewhere between 10 and 20 times, I heard from my boss that Ambassador Toon commented favorably on my notes. "How does he do it? Does he take shorthand? He's not taping these, is he?" No, I wasn't taping them. I said, in all honesty, that "I have heard you asked the same questions and give pretty much the basic answers so many times that I can hear it coming."

Sure, I'd take notes but I could almost do the briefings as well as the ambassador could because I had heard the same question answered a number of times. I couldn't do them as well as he could just because of the way he answered the questions, they loved that. They loved his rather gruff personality and his little turns of phrase. I was pretty familiar with what he was going to say.

Q: In your relations with the media and all, were you getting things say from the political sector saying, gee. The Soviet politburo is doing this or that. You wonder how this was playing with the Soviet public and ask the journalists could they sort of monitor it? In other words, put them on jobs.

BROWN: No, I don't recall that kind of inquiry.

I was not the only one who had close working relationship and close personal friendship with some of these very fine journalists. I want to emphasize that point again. These were really top notch journalists. I have mentioned the names of a few; Craig Whitney, David Shipler, Kevin Klose, Dan Fisher of The Los Angeles Times, Tom Kent of AP, Serge Schmemmann of AP. People who follow the world of journalism know that this was a cream of the crop group of journalists.

There is another subject for a book; the American press corps of the late '70s in Moscow.

People in the political section undoubtedly had personal friendships. They would do background briefings with these guys and they'd probably bat ideas back and forth but I don't ever recall anything suggesting that we try to task them. We would read their copy.

Q: Were any of the press people sort of complaining that their bosses back in their home offices really didn't understand them?

BROWN: If they weren't complaining, they weren't human beings. Exactly. Sure, it wasn't easy to have people back home understand the difficult working conditions.

I was back in Moscow a few years ago and I thought comparatively what would it be like? A lot of things were a lot simpler when we were there, you know? You never had to worry about parking. The first trip I made to Moscow, when I was there on TDY, a guy I had worked with on the Soviet desk named Dick Combs who was a really fine Foreign Service officer was a political officer and I mentioned something about Red Square and he said, "Oh, I haven't been down to Red Square for quite a while. Why don't we go down?"

We drove down somewhere close to Red Square, parked and walked around. You never really had to worry about parking when I was there in 1978 to 1981, didn't have to worry much about it ten years later. Today I don't know how you get around Moscow in the traffic and how you would park anywhere.

On the other hand, we didn't have email or cell phones or any of the modern means of communication. Maybe that made life simpler in some ways, too. You weren't constantly being tasked or constantly being expected to do things you are expected to do today.

I am sure the journalists complained that people back home didn't understand.

One thing we didn't have too much of, and I don't think the journalists had too much of, was people from back in the States coming out. We occasionally had to hand hold and organize dinners but it wasn't overwhelming. I can't recall too many times when the journalists had to do handholding for visiting firemen from Washington.

I think that maybe this is the time I could turn to some of the things during that first year that made news. Hardly a week went by when there wasn't some activity, event or newsmaker. I mentioned what transpired on my very first day with the SALT negotiators, the American businessman released from prison and Senator Kennedy.

From 1978 on, we had a group of people living in the embassy called the Pentecostals. This was basically two families, close to a dozen people, who had dashed into the embassy compound to seek asylum. The way the embassy was structured, we had a couple of militia men out front but if they weren't looking, there were no gates or barriers to go through and these fundamentalist Pentecostals had come into the embassy seeking religious freedom, refuge. And in this period of human rights, we were not going to throw them out. They were given refuge in a small underground, below street level apartment where they lived for years. They were known as the Pentecostals. Books have written about them.

They were off limits to the press and the journalists who came into the snack bar understood that they were not allowed to interview them; that was one of the rules of the road. Finally, towards the end of my first year, the Ambassador decided we would allow the journalists to come in on a Saturday and film them. They were not allowed to interview but they could at least film these two different families, parents and children walking around the courtyard of the embassy. Of course, the ground rules broke down because the Pentecostals did decide to talk and present documents and everything else. That was just one of the ongoing issues. Ambassador Toon was not going to throw these people out on the street so they were always on the minds.

We had the fire across the street that I described earlier.

On March 28, 1979, the same day that I had lunch to meet the new Baltimore Sun correspondent, I got the word that there was a man, a Soviet citizen, in the consular section threatening to blow himself up; he would not leave. The issue dragged on and on throughout the late afternoon and into the evening. Eventually, it was resolved by, I believe, Ambassador Toon allowing Soviet officials to come into the consular section. The man did blow himself up. He died. From my 8th floor balcony, I saw his body being carried out late in the evening.

Prior to that, I had never experienced the smell of teargas but the smell of teargas in my office, which was quite some distance from the consular section, made a big impression on me. Our consular officer was a good friend named Tom Hutson. You always knew when Tom was coming. You could hear him singing and whistling through the corridors and after that incident, I never again did hear him singing and whistling. That one night incident, that man blowing himself up in the consular section affected all of us but no one more than Tom.

Q: What did he do? Did he have a . . .

BROWN: I don't think anyone ever really knew, because his body was taken away, whether he was just a lunatic or whether he had some serious cause. According to some news articles, his name was Yuri Vlasenko but in my little bit of research, I haven't ever found very much about and who he was and what happened. I believe one of the consular officers was faulted for bringing the man into the embassy. Perhaps some cables would shed more light.

Q: Tom Hutson has made himself sort of a name for himself as sort of a dissident. He, I think at one point, made some sort of statements when he was at the embassy.

BROWN: He was, I don't know how to describe him. He was opinionated. He has very close ties to the American Serbian community.

Q: I knew Tom when I was in Yugoslavia.

BROWN: We saw his daughter last summer, the same age as our daughter, Amy Hutson, a lovely woman.

Q: The Helsinki Accords had been signed fairly recently, hadn't they?

BROWN: In Vladivostok in 1976. Gerald Ford went to Vladivostok and signed the Helsinki Accords.

Q: I realize we were using them as sort of an instrument with the press corps. Did you realize how powerful these things were because they did turn out to be a major instrument in ending the Cold War?

BROWN: If someone claims to have realized how important those documents were, ask him or her to show you that in writing in 1976. Ford and others took a beating that this was just another Yalta type agreement.

Q: And this ended some of the disputes over territory with the Soviets wanted.

BROWN: You had the three baskets: political, economic and human rights. People said and wrote things like "We all know the Soviets don't respect human rights. Sure, they will sign anything. This is just another giveaway." The part I focused on was working conditions for journalists but freedom of movement and similar rights were covered.

I think it is pretty well agreed on right and left today that these were very important documents in the whole history of the Cold War.

I think that the people who realized most how important these documents were the dissidents themselves. They said, "Well, if our government signed these documents, then we are going to take them as true." They risked their lives and their liberty but many of them said "we are going to claim these rights." They wouldn't have had much meaning if people like the dissidents hadn't taken them seriously.

Going back to that visit by Secretary Vance in spring of 1978 when I was there on TDY, a Soviet woman who had married an American and who was seeking permission to emigrate chained herself to the fence around the embassy. She didn't set herself on fire or anything but she chose that moment to call attention to herself. She got a lot more attention that day than any of the news on the SALT negotiations or whatever Vance was doing.

Back to my first full year, we had a visit from two cabinet members in December, 1978. Secretary of the Treasury Michael Blumenthal and Secretary of Commerce Juanita Kreps. That said something about the quality of the relationship at that time. They were received at a high level. I rode to the Kremlin with the press pool and got to see Brezhnev and Kosygin and Gromyko. I was back in the corner with the Soviet handlers but it was my chance to see the table with Ambassador Toon, the interpreters and the two delegations. It was the kind of stuff I enjoyed, one of the fun aspects of my job.

There was another side to it and it involved a lot of running around, preparing transcripts and other reports and you breathed a sigh of relief when they left town.

Q: Who was secretary of state then?

BROWN: That was entirely the Vance period.

Another subject that we dealt with regularly was shortwave broadcasting, especially in Russian and other languages. The Voice of America Russian service was jammed. During the course of my first year, we had a visit from the director of Voice of America, Peter Strauss. I used that occasion and other similar occasions for outreach. I would invite in American and West European journalists and make it a representational affair.

We had this nice apartment on the 12th floor of our building at L-83. So the guys, they were mostly guys, would come in and we'd do a buffet dinner and someone like Mr. Strauss would answer questions or, more often in a case like that, he would ask questions. It would be a business evening but enjoyable and I received a lot of positive feedback.

Q: What was your impression of the non-American press representation?

BROWN: Equally high. One of the names that pops right into mind was Michael Binyon with The Times of London who was then and later on a very distinguished British journalist. Sam Rachlin, a Danish journalist, had deep Russian connections, was virtually bilingual and knew a lot; he also had a lovely wife and small daughter. Bob Evans of Reuters had been many years in Moscow and had an encyclopedic knowledge. Daniel Vernet of Le Monde was another outstanding journalist whom I knew in Moscow and later in Paris. Within the French, German and Italian press corps, there were people who seemed equally well qualified, had language and were there as serious correspondents. I very much enjoyed having contact with these people.

But the American press corps was by far the dominant foreign group. No one else had as many journalists as we did nor as many top notch journalists.

Q: Were you able to pick up much information or contact with what later became known as 'the stans', all the various elements of the Soviet empire which eventually broke away?

BROWN: We had been in Moscow for only six weeks when my wife and I put our children in the charge of somebody else and flew off to Dushanbe, the capital of Tajikistan and just over the mountains from Afghanistan. This was the first trip we took outside Moscow. I can remember walking out to the airplane, seeing the pilot checking out his plane, looking at the bald tires but it gave my wife some degree of comfort when she saw the pilot because he looked like what a pilot should look like.

That was the first of many trips we took to Central Asia and they were wonderful experiences. During my first three years, I visited every one of the republic capitals except for the Baltic States. I went to every one of the Central Asian capitals.

What made it interesting, among the many reasons for going out there, we had this exhibit called "Agriculture, USA" with American guides, staff and specialists and so I went out to observe. It seemed like a totally different world. The Tajiks, Uzbeks, Turkmen and others were not native speakers of Russian so they were dealing with a foreign language just like I was. You would go to the markets and gape at these wonderful faces and these piles of fruits and vegetables that you'd never see in Moscow or only in very special places in Moscow. They'd hand fruit to you as a gift and they loved conversation. They loved having their picture being taken. There just didn't seem to be fear of communication with an American.

We were taken on that trip to a dam to a place called Nurek which was described as the largest earthen dam in the world. You would think this would be the kind of place that the Soviets would not allow you to go to but we went out there, spent a whole day going and coming back, traveled in and around this dam, felt dwarfed by this giant construction.

After several days, we came back to find that our children were well and that our Aeroflot planes had landed as many times as they had taken off. We were safe. It was an exciting first trip outside Moscow.

After the Soviets invaded Afghanistan, Brzezinski sent out instructions that any intelligence, any sort of reporting you could bring back from Central Asia was encouraged so we had a blank check to travel to that part of the world. I didn't go back to Dushanbe but I went frequently Central Asia -- to Tashkent, Bukhara, Samarkand, to Alma Ata, to Frunze, now called Bishkek. I think it was there I stayed in a yurt. I also went to Ashkhabad, so to all five Central Asian capitals.

Q: Did you get any feel of knowledge or coverage of the United States there?

BROWN: My recollection is that the exhibit we brought out there was a real eye-opener; anything they knew about the United States was primarily through Soviet filter. They probably disbelieved much of the propaganda they heard from their own government but our own little modest efforts, American magazines or the exhibit would be as much as they would have. Radios would be jammed but in Central Asia, especially away from urban areas, you could more easily avoid the jamming of both Radio Liberty and Voice of America. If you understood English you could hear Voice of America English unjammed. But their knowledge of the United States was superficial.

Q: America was very popular wasn't it, the magazine?

BROWN: Sure. Nevertheless, we regularly received back “unsold” copies but then we could take them on trips and give them away.

Q: There were these educational sessions open to the public of people getting up and giving lectures and all and many of our officers would go to find out. Some people would come up and say why the hell aren't you doing this?

BROWN: I don't have too much recollection of that; I didn't attend many of those events. I do remember going to one in particular about a year before the Olympics where a man stood up and talked. The countdown was on to the 1980 Olympics. I came away from that thinking what genuine pride he had that his country was going to host the Olympics. Certainly he was picked and primed to do this topic but there was a great sense of pride in the Soviet Union was going to host the Olympics. That of course, all became an issue.

I'd like to return to the year 1978 – '79 just to give a sense of how much activity there was.

As I've said, we did host representational events in our apartment whenever we had people come out from Washington. One time I hosted something for some journalists who had gone to the University of Indiana on an exchange program and one of the persons who popped in that night unannounced was a man named Vladimir Pozner. Vladimir Pozner grew up in Brooklyn.

Q: I listened to him on the radio, Radio Moscow.

BROWN: Yes, to this day is very well known, absolutely flawless English, very smooth, very gifted. I remember he went one time to the American School and spoke and the kids just came away thinking, “oh, my goodness. They are just like us” because he was so smooth, he was very candid. He would say: “We are just like your country; we have people who are smart, people who are dumb. We have people who are courteous and people who are discourteous, etcetera, etcetera.” He disarmed the kids a lot and he could do that equally well with adults but I liked him and I thought he was a very good man.

There was a problem and it goes back to that impression I spoke about our very first time. If you met somebody who either spoke English well or was willing to receive foreigners or spoke out candidly, there was an inclination on the part of some foreigners to immediately say “Oh, he's KGB. He's a colonel. You just can't trust that person.” Sometimes they would tap two fingers on their neck. I don't know how they felt so sure unless you concluded that everyone who had style was KGB; I think it sometimes gave people a sense of self-importance to say all-knowingly that someone was KGB.

I didn't know myself; maybe that was sometimes the case, but other times, these were genuinely interesting people. In any case, I didn't risk anything by interacting with them. I knew or know about a few of them to this day and I don't think they had close ties to the KGB. I think they were just willing to talk to foreigners.

New subject: One Friday night, I got a call at home from my boss, Ray Benson, who lived right in the embassy itself. The embassy building was in reality nothing but a converted Soviet apartment building and Ray lived in one of the apartments. Ray and his wife Shirley (friends to this day) were getting ready to take a trip along with the DCM Mark Garrison and his wife. Ray said, "You need to come in here, come in here right away."

He didn't say anymore, didn't tell me what it was but by the time I arrived, the incident had ended. Once again, an apparently deranged Soviet man had managed to walk right into the courtyard with a firearm and start shooting at the exterior of the building. You could see bullet marks or chips on the building. Don't get me wrong. This building had plenty of chips but these clearly were new ones.

David Shipler of The New York Times came by and covered it and picked up a quote from me and for the first time I was actually quoted by name. My family back home was excited to read in The New York Times "Philip Brown, spokesman for the American Embassy." I don't recall what great thought I had but it was rare that I was quoted by name. That incident was a little like the man who walked into the consular section. It was a mystery what was behind it.

We had during that year a visit by the attorney general, Griffin Bell. My notes say he spent two weeks in the Soviet Union. Can you imagine the attorney general being out of Washington for two weeks and in the Soviet Union? It concluded with a reception at Spaso House where I met some people I didn't normally encounter at Spaso House receptions, including a man somehow involved in the judicial system of the Soviet Union. I shook hands with him and I looked at his hands afterwards and these hands were not like mine, soft, office hands. These were the hands of a steel worker, a metallurgist, rough, big.

I thought to myself, because he had been one of the people dealing with the attorney general, that sometimes it is amazing these people are not more crude in their behavior than they are. These are not guys who studied at the counterpart of Yale or Princeton or who have been sitting at desk jobs. These are people came up like Brezhnev and the others through the school of hard knocks. Many of them are out of the heavy manufacturing, industrial world. This man, for all I knew, might have been a steel worker. I came away from that encounter thinking that we needed to be careful not judge Soviet officials the same way we would judge bureaucrats back in the system in the United States. I'm, of course, not suggesting that we should cut them slack when they abuse human rights or invade other countries. But it was helpful to remember where they came from.

One of the things I did for Ambassador Toon was to write his July 4th speech. Every year, the ambassador was invited to tape something for Soviet TV that might then be carried on July 4th. It would be carried if he said the right thing and there were times when the Soviets either censored it or refused it in its entirety. That year, I was very pleased that the speech I wrote was approved by the State Department, virtually without change. Ambassador Toon recorded it and it was carried on Soviet TV on July 4th. That would have been after we returned from Vienna.

I got the word -- and was very pleased -- that along with one of the other assistant press attachés, I would be invited (or assigned) to go to Vienna for the summit meeting. A lot of the Moscow-based American press corps from Vienna was going and I believe that Ambassador Toon recommended that I be present.

I remember getting together for a drink with some journalists on the first night in Vienna and the question among the Moscow-based people was “when did you come out?” We used that expression, “going back in,” or “coming out.” It was not an idle question. You were out in the West. It was a badge of pride. We were on the front lines in Moscow and now, we were coming out for some sachertorte and the joys of Vienna.

I had some relatively routine assignment in the press center in connection with the summit. I did try to associate myself as far as possible with Ambassador Toon, especially for his meeting with Marvin Stone to discuss the Robin Knight incident in Tashkent and also in setting up his briefing with the American press corps. I am sure Ambassador Toon did not clear that with Washington and I am sure that journalists not invited were envious. These two events made my visit to Vienna quite memorable.

I mentioned travel besides the trip to Dushanbe. We did a lot of little trips around Moscow. We could travel 40 kilometers from downtown Moscow without permission as long as it was an open area. We had these maps that showed open and closed areas. The point being we did a lot of travel. We’d go out to Peredelkino to the grave of Pasternak, to the American dacha, to some of the churches on the periphery of Moscow.

We took a family trip to Leningrad, took the train. I had some business there but my wife and daughters went along and we visited a lot of the standard tourist spots.

We also went back to Garmisch for a week. We traded apartments. Somebody from Garmisch came in, lived in our place and we went to Garmisch and did some skiing. We also had an experience there that I will talk about later.

I have been reading recently the biography of George Kennan and, it goes without saying, I don’t in any way compare myself to George Kennan. Still when he writes “It was my sixth winter in Moscow,” I couldn’t help but think that I spent six winters in Moscow and at least some of the experiences I had reminded me of experiences Kennan had. Kennan was there in 1945, ’46, not sure when it was. The British ambassador hosted a dinner for Winston Churchill to which he invited Stalin. George Kennan and his wife were not invited to that dinner. His wife ...

Q: Annelise.

BROWN: Annelise. She said that they were not invited to the dinner but they could go by afterwards to sort of stare and she wrote “At least I can tell my grandchildren that I have seen some of the people who made history.”

I feel exactly the same way. I can tell myself that I saw some of the people that made history. I know that I was just the press attaché at the American Embassy and later on the public affairs officer but I got to see some of the people who made history.

One of the persons I met early on (I didn’t fully appreciate who he was at the time) was a man named Valentin Berezhkov. He was editor of USA Magazine, published by the USA Institute. I also met him a second time on my second tour and knew by then that he had been the translator and interpreter for Stalin at Yalta. He was the counterpart to Chip Bohlen; the stories that man could have told.

Victor Louis was a story in himself and I won't take the time right now to go into detail. Russian-born, he became a British citizen, married a British woman named Jennifer Louis. He lived in great grand style in Moscow. He had a house. The obituary in The New York Times that Craig Whitney wrote in 1992 will tell you a lot about him. He probably was working for the KGB but nevertheless, interaction with Victor Louis was always an interesting experience.

There was a day when I came by the embassy and I cannot recall why but this man was standing out on the sidewalk wanting to go into the consular section but his entry was being delayed. I realized right away who he was and I helped André Sakharov walk past the Soviet militia and go into the consular section to do business. I can tell my grandchildren I saw André Sakharov and on more than one occasion.

It wasn't long after that, in January, 1980, that Sakharov was picked up on a Moscow street and sent into exile in the closed city of Gorky east of Moscow. It was a closed city so people could not visit him there. He had become too much of a thorn in the side of Soviet officials and so they detained him and sent him and his wife, Elena Bonner off to internal exile.

My little contribution at that time was to serve as a conduit for Sakharov's mail to a relative in Boston. What would happen was as follows. His wife, Elena Bonner, still had freedom to travel and she would come to Moscow with letters that she would give to a New York Times correspondent named Tony Austin. Tony Austin had arrived only fairly recently but of course, I knew him as I knew all the journalists there. Tony Austin and I worked out an arrangement whereby he would give these letters to me, I would put them in an envelope and send them off to my dad in Pittsburgh through the pouch. My dad would open the outer envelope and forward the contents to, I believe, a niece of Sakharov's in the Boston suburbs.

By my second tour, the Gorbachev period, Sakharov had been released and I saw him a couple times. Eventually, I would stand in line a long line on a cold winter day in 1980 to walk past his open casket.

In connection with the visit by Secretaries Blumenthal and Kreps, Averill Harriman came to Moscow. There was a meeting of something called the U.S. - USSR Trade and Economic council. I went to the airport when he arrived and because of his prominence and his history of working with the Soviets during the war, we were allowed to drive right onto the tarmac.

One day soon after, I got a phone call that I should gather up as many journalists as quickly as I could and go down to Novodevichy Cemetery where Khrushchev was buried; it is one of the great cemeteries of Moscow, the final resting place for prominent people from all walks to life, next to the Novodevichy Convent. It wasn't generally open to the public. I had a way of getting in which is a separate story. But I was to go there because Averill Harriman wanted to place a wreath on the grave of his wartime colleague, Anastas Mikoyan, who had died in October.

Sure enough, at the appointed hour, Averill Harriman and his wife, Pamela Harriman, came and placed a wreath on the grave of Mikoyan. We had half a dozen American journalists there. It was pretty much a photo event. Harriman was one of the towering figures of U.S. – Soviet relations. He didn't live too long after that.

And I can say I saw Brezhnev and Kosygin in the flesh. I don't think Brezhnev ever even mumbled a word in the photo sessions before the meetings. Kosygin would banter quite often with the people on the other side of the table. He seemed like a much "nicer" man than Brezhnev.

Early on, I got into the world of music, theater, arts. For me, this was one of two avenues for interacting with Soviets. This wasn't the primary example but Senator Mathias of Maryland came out.

Q: Mac Mathias.

BROWN: I think it was to one of our exhibits. The Soviets invited him to go to the Bolshoi for an opera. It happened to be Khovanshchina, a four hour opera. At first, it seemed long and tedious but I began to appreciate Russian opera and thereafter I would always advise people if you want to go to Bolshoi, don't go to see Verdi or Puccini. You could see that better in Western Europe. Go to see Eugene Onegin or Queen of Spades or Boris Godunov or Prince Igor, whatever. I became a devotee of Russian opera.

I got to meet a photographer named Vladimir Sichov. He later resettled in Paris. He had an amazing collection of black and white pictures, many of them published in a book called (in Russian) "The Russians seen by Vladimir Sichov." I read somewhere he had more than 100,000 pictures of ordinary life in the Soviet Union. Not just ordinary life but young military recruits in training. He also used his apartment to exhibit paintings by Russian artists and we scarfed up several of them. Of course they were delighted to sell these oil paintings so I have paintings by Vladimir Arkharov and various others.

One of the collectors was a woman named Tanya Kholodzei (or Kolodzei). She again was one of these mystery figures. She had a daughter -- I didn't know of any other family members -- and you would go to her apartment and under her bed and in closets and on walls and stacked up in corners were endless numbers of works of art by Russian painters. We acquired a few of those. In turn, we would invite her to film showings at Spaso House or events like that.

I discovered only recently through Facebook that her daughter Natasha now runs a gallery in New York. And Tanya Kholodzei still travels between Moscow and New York. I look forward to meeting her because we knew her very well in Moscow.

Facebook would have been fun and useful (and not allowed!) back in those times to stay in touch with a lot of these people.

BROWN: No, unless they had a particular slant.

Not movies but various works of American literature would be translated and very well known, particularly if they provided a picture of the United States that unfavorable. Streetcar Named Desire was performed quite often, Tramvay imeni Zhelaniye, literally Streetcar Called Desire would be shown in Soviet theaters because it provided a fairly negative image of the United States. I don't recall very many if any American movies.

Q: I understood The Grapes of Wrath was shown but then again, people say these people had cars.

BROWN: It was a double-edged sword for the Soviets. I don't think they could ever come out the winner on these things. They would let in American literature that had an unfavorable slant.

Somewhere along the line, probably through my boss, Ray Benson, the public affairs officer, I met a woman named Katya Shirman. She worked at Roskoncert, the Russian concert agency. She learned I liked music and boy, the phone started to ring and I knew right away who it was. "Phil", she would say (it always sounded like "Feel"), "You must come to this concert" so I would go or my wife and I would go to the concert. One of the first featured a young Russian violinist named Vladimir Spivakov. Today Vladimir Spivakov is one of the world's famous violinists and conductors; at that time he was young and fairly timid but also ambitious and extremely gifted. We went after one of his concerts to the apartment of Katya and her husband to meet Volodya. It was just the first of many social encounters we would have.

We went to concert one time featuring Spivakov and another brilliant, young violinist, Viktor Tretyakov. They were both students of the same teacher, Yuri Yankelevich. There was a joke, a gag. The Russians like these quick one liners. Question: Who is better, Spivakov or Tretyakov? Answer: Gidon Kremer. Kremer is a Latvian violinist.

The point being you've got these two really fine young violinists but there is an even better one up there in the Baltics. The Russians would just throw their heads back and laugh at that joke.

A few years ago I went to a concert by Spivakov at Strathmore in Bethesda. I assembled the concert programs from all the Spivakov concerts that I had gone to both in Moscow and later on in places like Munich and Paris. I took them along. He and some of the orchestra members were amazed to see this collection. By the way, in the closed society that was Moscow, it was very easy to walk back stage after a concert and greet the performers. It was even easier for Westerners because the performers liked the attention. By contrast, that night at Strathmore, I was barely able to talk my way back stage after the concert to greet my friend.

If the KGB was keeping a file on me, they certainly did learn early on that I loved to go to the Great Hall of the Conservatory and to Tchaikovsky Hall and hear orchestras and recitals and that I really appreciated music. I loved going. I would always have great front row seats and people knew that I was American and I enjoyed cultivating that image, that I was a devotee of classical music. I am not a music critic but we heard a wonderful cross section of performers and orchestras in a, for me, a very safe environment.

There were two problems. It was hard after a busy day at work to keep your mind on the music and not be thinking about what you needed to do the next morning and it took a little bit of time away from my children.

Q: You mentioned Ray Benson. I knew Ray. He was a 'red diaper baby'. During the '30s a number of people, leftist leaning, went to the Soviet Union to work in factories and to know the Soviet Union. As I recall Ray's parents took him there and they called him the 'red diaper baby'.

BROWN: Ray never let on at the time. All I knew was that he was born, I think, in New York City. He did not let on at the time but I believe he had a sister living in Moscow or a sister who had been born in Moscow. In any case, there were family members.

I did later learn more in detail about him. The point is that at the time, Ray was very, very discreet about this. I didn't ask and he didn't tell. He was my boss for my first year in Moscow, 1978-1979. And in 1987, I replaced him. Ray had two four-year assignments. I had two three-year assignments.

I mentioned going back to Garmisch for basically what was to be a vacation, skiing and other things. One evening, we went to the apartment of Mr. and Mrs. Posdeev where we met a Russian woman. This began what I will call the "saga of the Tanyas." We met a woman there named Tatyana Sergeovna Khodorovich. She had administered the Solzhenitsyn Fund in Moscow and was now living in Paris. I don't know exactly how she had ended up in Paris or why she was in Garmisch during our visit but she had emigrated or was in exile, a dissident. She said "you should get in touch back in Moscow with Tanya Ivanova."

So we went back to Moscow and on a Sunday afternoon a few weeks later, we drove and drove and finally found the apartment of Tanya Sergeovna Ivanova. We made two Sunday afternoon visits there and met a number of interesting people, including Tanya Velikanova who would later on spend time in Siberia, and Sergei Khodorovich, two of the directors of the Solzhenitsyn Fund. Tanya Velikanova urged us to go and meet someone named Tanya Zieman. This is why we call it the saga of the Tanyas.

Don't try to follow all that except on April 1, 1979, I walked not too far to the apartment of Tanya Zieman. Her husband, Yuri, was not there but their three-year old daughter, Vera, was. We learned they were refuseniks. Yuri had applied to emigrate and had been "refused," from whence the term in Russian.

I left Tanya Zieman's apartment that night entrusted with a package of letters – I held them under my coat -- that had been delivered to her by Tanya Velikanova. When I got back to the embassy, I pouched it, sent it out to people in the outside world. These were for people in the West who were active in the Helsinki human rights movement.

To make this long story short, Tanya and Yuri Zieman and family became our dearest friends. They now live in Boston. Vera, then three, is now a young mother living in Boston. She went to Amherst and the Fletcher School. Her sister Galina or Galka, Yuri's daughter, was ten years older. She and her husband Viktor and their children also emigrated and live in the Boston area. For the rest of our first assignment in Moscow, we were very, very close friends with Yuri and Tanya Zieman. We always told them that if "at any time being close to us jeopardizes you, puts you in danger, tell us and we will vanish from your lives." On the contrary, they wanted our friendship and felt a certain type of protection from it.

I took journalists, visiting firemen and later on, the Voice of America director, Richard Carlson, to visit them. He recalls it more vividly than I do, going to the Zieman apartment. They finally got permission to emigrate in 1988, right after the Ronald Reagan visit. In fact, there was even in the planning stage of the Reagan visit in 1988 the idea that en route from the airport, Reagan would go by the Zieman apartment and then go on to Spaso House. That didn't happen but I can tell you, it was in the planning stage.

So through Yuri and Tanya, we had many, many indelible experiences and our children were involved. We would go out to the woods in one of the open areas, maybe Votutinki, in the 40 kilometer zone around Moscow, and have a cookout. We would provide the chickens that we could purchase at the diplomatic gastronomie. Yuri would set up the spit and cook the chicken. You would have thought we were in Rock Creek Park on a wonderful spring day.

Or we would go to a little dacha they were able to rent. They babysat for our dog Tar one summer. It was a life-changing experience.

Q: Did you learn to identify mushrooms?

BROWN: I didn't learn to identify them but I certainly knew how important "gribi" are to Russians and I enjoyed tasting many varieties of mushrooms.

So through those two avenues -- the creative intelligentsia, particularly in the world of music but also theater, and our refusenik friends -- we had windows on Soviet society. To this day, people will ask, "Did you get to meet Russians?" We got to meet more Russians than we had time, even on our first tour.

Q: I sort of have the vision of sitting around a kitchen table drinking tea or vodka or what have you and talking about life, I mean, real discussions. This is very much the Russian spirit.

BROWN: Exactly. Much of our conversation was just as human beings, parents, sitting in a small kitchen, of course, all the time hoping that Yuri would not be arrested. He took a job as an orderly in a hospital because he had lost his job when he applied to emigrate. We were always hoping their health would be good and that they would not run afoul of Soviet authorities, which they didn't. They had almost 10 long years before they were able to emigrate. There is much more about that story I could tell but they could tell it much better.

I want to conclude memories of my first Moscow year by mentioning four world events that had an impact on our lives. I don't have them in order but one was the U.S. establishing diplomatic relations with the Chinese. All of a sudden, the Chinese Embassy was inviting us in for social events. It got to the point that Ambassador Toon I think had to say, "Look, we need to do this in an orderly, restrained fashion. We cannot look as if we are falling all over ourselves." So there was some sort of orderly structured way of accepting invitations but boy, did it produce very nice meals.

BROWN: It certainly did. They had a huge compound. It was very interesting. They raised a lot of their food right there on the compound. They were out on Friendship Street not too far from the university.

Then there was the murder of Ambassador Dubs in Kabul. I didn't know him but some of my colleagues did.

Q: I knew him fairly well.

BROWN: It sent a chill over the diplomatic community.

Q: We have an interesting account in our oral histories about somebody who was right outside when he was shot. The implication is very strong that the KGB was in on it.

BROWN: Of course he had served in Moscow too. That was very sad.

One day after this incident in the consular section, the man blowing him up, there was a major U.S. - Soviet prisoner exchange. I think it was a three-way exchange. We sometimes forget about how these things took place. At various points, a prisoner would be freed and walk across the no man's land. That was April of 1979.

And then lastly the Vienna summit. I talked about that. That culminated my first year in Moscow. I came back to Moscow and not too long after that we went on home leave.

Let me add one quick thing to the Vienna summit meeting. There had been a report that Thomas Watson, formerly of IBM, would replace Ambassador Toon. Ambassador Toon probably knew more about this than he let on but he didn't confirm it. Thomas Watson came to Vienna for that summit and he was interviewed by journalists Kevin Klose of The Washington Post and Dan Fisher of The Los Angeles Times. The agreement was they would not run the interview until and unless Thomas Watson was actually confirmed as ambassador to Moscow or presented his credentials. I can't remember which.

Of course, he was and the stories were published. There was nothing wrong with them but Ambassador Watson didn't like them. He would write personal notes on his hand. If he was going to be interviewed by Dan Fisher or Kevin Klose, he would write on his "Fisher/Klose" in pen on his hand. They picked this up and wrote about it in the story. It was just a little thing but Ambassador Watson was offended by it. So for that reason, he always felt very uneasy dealing with the press.

That summer, we went back to our beloved cabin in Maine for home leave. I knew all along that the Watson name was in Camden. But it was his brother who had a house in Camden. Along with a little more research, I realized that Tom Watson (I never would have called him that at the time) had a place on one of the islands in Penobscot Bay and it was he who had been named ambassador to Moscow.

I screwed up all my courage and with some trepidation called that number, introduced myself to Tom Watson and explained that my wife and I were vacationing there. We had just finished one year in Moscow, we would soon be going back and we were, whatever I said, excited and pleased to know he was going to be our new ambassador.

I am not quite sure he grasped who I was or what I was saying but he said, "Well, we will have to get together. Call me back." I called him back. When he said "get together," I assumed he meant that we would get together for lunch. I had to explain to my children that they were not going to be involved in this, that this was dad's new boss and that I would have to deal with this very carefully.

So I called him up on the given morning and he asked me on the phone, "Do you have children?" All my kids heard was, "Yes, we do, two. They are 11 and 9." He was inviting us all and he said, "You know where Lincolnville Beach is?"

I said, "Yes."

He said, "Well, get down there at 11 o'clock and I will pick you up in my helicopter." And he did.

Q: We will pick this up in the summer of 1979.

Today is the 20th of March, 2012 with Phil Brown. Phil you said you wanted to do something and then we are going to pick this up. We left it off you were going to meet the new Ambassador to the Soviet Union up in Maine.

BROWN: In my chronology, I have reached the summer of 1979. It has been almost a month since I was here last time. For anyone who ever happens to be listening to or reading this, please note that change. It is a little hard to keep a smooth continuity.

What I am doing in this interview is to talk about what my Foreign Service experience 30 years ago. What I have done between now and the last time I was here relates very much to my Foreign Service experience. When I was overseas, one of the things I was supposed to do was identify young, upcoming future leaders to send on the International Visitor Program. I was on the sending end. Today, I am still involved but on the receiving end. I contract periodically with the State Department to accompany groups of international visitors on their two-to-three week visits to the United States.

I am just back from a two-week trip around the United States with 19 IVs. In two weeks, I will be going on a three-week trip with another group of IVs.

Q: Could you describe your last trip? What was the composition and where were going and what were you seeing?

BROWN: The theme of the program was combating human trafficking. That's an issue that was hardly in anyone's mind ten years ago.

Q: It wasn't. We are talking about mostly prostitution.

BROWN: And forced labor. But it is an issue that has become a very important part of foreign policy. In 2000, the United States passed very important legislation on human trafficking. Hillary Clinton has put it at the top of her priorities. There is now an annual report that the State Department does, the Trafficking in Persons or TIP report, which evaluates the performance of every country around the world including the United States. Countries can be suppliers, transit countries or consumers of human trafficking so I was with a group of people from 19 different countries, from Trinidad to the Seychelles, from Estonia to Tunisia. We spent several days in Washington at the federal level and then we split up into three different groups and I went with a 1/3 of the group to Denver, Colorado. The others went to Minneapolis and Phoenix.

People ask "why Denver?" There are very engaged people there at the nongovernmental level dealing with this issue of human trafficking. But on any assignment, we leave the major cities of the east and west coast to visit some other cities in the interior – Chicago, Des Moines, Memphis, etc. From Denver, we gathered in Miami for a couple of days of programming.

Two weeks, very concentrated, but at the end of the time, I am almost a mini-expert on the subject. The people who came are all involved in the subject back home so they went back with a lot of new knowledge, contacts and so on.

Q: What were you talking about? Obviously, we are not immune from particularly prostitutes but not only that, the Chinese

BROWN: It could be Hispanics in Colorado, Chinese in New York City. Miami is a major transit point. Americans are addressing the subject from many different perspectives, from legislation to NGOs that are involved in working directly with victims. Human trafficking in the formal sense is people moving across borders but there are also people dealing with human trafficking where the victims have not been moved across borders. At the NGO level, you find quite a number of groups and people heavily involved.

My next project will be the U.S. judicial system. It does remind me of when I was overseas sending people on the IV program.

Q: What were you looking at in these places? Were you talking to police or judiciary?

BROWN: In Washington, it was four of the five federal agencies that are most involved; State, Justice, Labor and Health and Human Services. We also had a meeting with the Center for Missing and Exploited Children, which is an NGO and we had a talk by a woman from American University who is an expert in the field.

In Colorado, there is something there called the Laboratory for Combating Human Trafficking. It is an NGO. They have something called the Colorado Project and they are trying to do research on it because Denver is at the intersection of two interstate highways and Denver becomes a transit point for people being trafficked.

We went to a shelter for women who have been trafficked, prostitutes. Were they exactly, in a formal definition, victims of human trafficking? Perhaps not because they hadn't been moved across borders but it is a place where women who have been rescued, as it were, have a chance to start life over again.

We talked to a police officer there about awareness training. The police are prosecutors and they look at prostitutes as criminals and are trying to redefine this so that a prostitute is not simply a criminal but may be a victim. There are programs that provide assistance to victims of prostitution.

In Miami, we met with the other major federal agency, Homeland Security and with ICE, Immigration and Customs Enforcement and their taskforce there. There were perhaps too many meetings with taskforces and office visits and not enough occasions to talk to the victims but we did have a meeting with a Hispanic man, a Mexican American, I believe, who's involved with labor there. He made a very contentious case about what happens to migrant laborers. I say contentious because a lot of visitors didn't accept his point of view. He really presented his point of view quite forcefully.

Q: We are talking about the summer of '79 and you are going to meet with the new Ambassador, Tom Watson. How did that go?

BROWN: So back to Maine and Moscow more than 30 years ago. It was delightful. We were on home leave near Camden, Maine, and I knew the Watson name was associated with the area. I called Mr. Watson and at first, there was a little confusion about who I was but when I called back he said, "You have to come over and have lunch." I told my kids that dad was going to be meeting the new boss and they were going to be left behind.

On the morning we were supposed to go, I called again and it was clear to them from my conversation when I said, "Yes, we do. Two" that they were going to be invited as well and he said, "Get yourself down to Lincolnville Beach and I will pick you up there in my helicopter."

He picked us up and flew us over to North Haven, his end of the island, where they have a large family estate. He and his wife, Olive, were the most hospitable, warm, welcoming people, nothing pretentious about them and yet, we looked around at this vast estate and were reminded that he was a former chairman of IBM and was now going to be the American Ambassador to Moscow. He took me aside. We went walking and he started asking me questions about how we could solve the problems of U.S.-Soviet relations and nuclear weapons and I had to explain that this was a little above my competence.

Then we completed lunch and the kids went swimming in the pool. Somewhere along the line, I learned that not long before, Mr. Watson had had a heart attack and so I was somewhat relieved when he introduced us to his pilot; his pilot flew the helicopter back to Lincolnville Beach. It was an experience we will never forget.

When I went back to the embassy a month later and mentioned in the country team meeting that I had had lunch under these circumstances with Ambassador Watson, I certainly got people's attention. Everyone wanted to know who he was and what he was like.

It also meant that when Ambassador Watson came out in October, I had to make it fairly clear when he called me up to his office that I was not the person to talk to. He needed to talk to the head of the political section or the DCM. That eventually got straightened out but we always had a very personal friendship with the Watsons and it continued. Several summers thereafter, we would go to North Haven, be their guests for a meal or meet him somewhere along the Maine coast.

He wrote a book (Father, Son & Co: My Life at IBM and Beyond) and inscribed it to Bobbi and me "with admiration." The book has about 20 pages on his time as ambassador. He referred to it as "his short, unhappy tour as a diplomat." We felt a twinge when we read in the newspaper that he had passed away; we felt as though we had lost a close friend.

Q: You went back after leave to the Soviet Union in '79. What was the situation? Was there anything developing at that time?

BROWN: Let me repeat that I kept diaries during this time. As I go through them, preparation for this interview has been tedious. It is time-consuming. I am sometimes amazed at how I found the time to keep a diary and put in the details that I did.

That was then and this is now but as I see names and recall incidents, I look them up on the internet. I learn more about them now than I knew back then. I am not only reliving these experiences but I am rediscovering them and learning about people I met back then.

I am not even looking at various files and photo albums but only at my diaries. I kept diaries every day, probably 362 out of 365 days of the year. What I conclude is that we, and I deliberately say we, had an amazing experience, an amazing opportunity. This was an extremely interesting place to be in a Foreign Service career. Our professional and personal lives were intertwined and one was as interesting as the other. I will say we took full advantage of it.

Our experiences there were people-oriented. I am amazed at the energy we had. I am amazed at how we could go out night after night and be involved in some activity or other. We were in the prime of our lives. For me, it was age 37 to 40. I had a lot of energy then. We involved our children. Our children were a great age to be in Moscow. They were not so young that we had to have them taken care of and couldn't really understand the experience. If they had been a few years older, they might have been restless teenagers or we would have sent them off to boarding school. They were right in between. It was a good time for them to be involved.

It is fun for me even now to call them up and ask if they remember such and such an experience, like the day my 11-year old daughter and one of her friends, the daughter of a colleague in the political section, decided to get on the bus that goes around the Ring Road in Moscow. The only problem was they couldn't quite figure out where to get off and so they went all the way around the Ring Road -- Christine would have to recall the details -- before they realized where they needed to get off.

On the one hand you think, wow. You let your kid do that in Moscow in the midst of godless communism? On the other hand, I am reassured by the thought that Russians love children and they would have found somebody that would have helped them out. It was an adventure they talked about.

You asked what kind of mood we found when we went back. Summer of 1979 had been the Carter - Brezhnev summit meeting in Vienna. We did not know what lay in store in the next few months so September of 1979, when I went back was, or seemed to be, a pretty good period in U.S. - Soviet relations.

But there are a couple of things, some more detail, that I want to recall about the year 1978-79. I did talk about the fire across the street from the embassy and our belief that that was the building from which the Soviets directed radiation at the embassy.

What I forgot to mention last time was that in May, 1979, the embassy issued a statement saying that the Soviets had stopped directing radiation at the embassy. The New York Times published that in a four paragraph AP dispatch. I am really surprised that that issue did not gain more press attention and hasn't been looked at more.

It was an issue at the time because Johns Hopkins, at the bidding of the State Department, did a study about radiation at the American Embassy. But to this day, I remain convinced that that story has never been fully explored. They were directing radiation at us. My guess is that we, the CIA or whatever entity, was also directing radiation outwards. We were trying to listen to messages. There must something that explains the terrible heat in the embassy building, which was nothing more than a 12- or 14-story apartment building. There was strange heat in that building. It was just warmer than it needed to be.

Ambassador Stoessel, who had been there before I was, died of leukemia. There was speculation even then that he might have been a victim of that radiation. I sure would like to see a deep, thorough study of that issue.

Not long after I came back in 1979 -- it was still the time of Ambassador Toon, Ambassador Watson didn't come out until October -- we had a special event that I will never forget. It took place just down the hill behind our embassy on big plot of land that was to be the site of our new embassy. We had a ground breaking ceremony down there. I recall Ambassador Toon standing on a little podium and it reminded me of the Politburo on top of Lenin's tomb on November 7th. It was a very formal ceremony. Ground was broken for the new American Embassy, the NOB, the new office building, on the new embassy compound, the NEC.

That was 1979. If anyone had asked me on that date, if they had told me on that date, that I would come back to Moscow in 1987, I certainly would have assumed that I could look forward to working out of the new office building. Well, when I came back in 1987, we lived on that compound in a very nice townhouse. A lot of embassy support facilities had been relocated there but the new office building, the NOB, was alleged to have bugs in it and was being deconstructed; it was a work site for Americans trying to find and take out those bugs.

In my three years, 1987 to 1990, we never got into that new office building. We continued to work out of the old office building under abysmal working conditions. I mean abysmal, dangerous to your health. It was dirty, a fire trap, a hot, awful work environment. One of my regrets is that we didn't ever have a chance to work in proper working conditions. I might have stayed a fourth year in Moscow on my second tour if the working conditions had been better.

Let me turn to a different and happier subject. I am reminded that one of our senior FSNs, a fellow named Yuri Zarakhovich, wrote an article in 1979 for Ogonyok Magazine. Ogonyok was one of the more interesting magazines and the subject was the father of John Byerly. John Byerly was in our exhibits program. His father had been in the Second World War and had a very interesting experience with Soviet troops.

I never thought about that issue again until just a couple of years ago when John Byerly became the American Ambassador to Moscow. That subject, his father's World War II experience, was recalled just a couple of years ago in exhibits, newspaper articles and interviews. Those are the kinds of stories that Soviets, now we refer to them as Russians, love. U.S. - Russian cooperation during the Second World War.

Q: I don't know what it was like in those times but I think today Russian citizens don't live as long as most others; heavy smoking, heavy drinking, not much exercise. The population is actually shrinking. Was that, did we ever address it?

BROWN: A man named Murray Feshbach, an expert on Soviet demography at the Census Department, was pointing out way back in the '70s that Soviet population was not growing, was in decline from these very factors that you mentioned, alcoholism, diet, lack of exercise and perhaps just lack of incentive, given their living conditions, to have large families.

It was a problem that the Soviets, though they wouldn't come right out and say it, had to be aware of it as far back as the '70s and maybe before that. They are still dealing with it today.

Q: What was your impression of the Soviet press at that point? Was it strictly a tool of the Communist Party? Was there any movement there?

BROWN: The short answer is yes, strictly a tool of the Communist Party. We dealt with Soviet journalists but we dealt with them as very competent, very well trained polemicists. We would occasionally take an American visitor to call on one of them. For example, I recall going with a congressman to call on the editor of Pravda, Viktor Afanasyev. He was a very skilled spokesman for the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. Alexander Bovin of Izvestiya was another with whom we would meet. Vikentiy Matveyev was another. I sometimes thought “boy, I wish we had people who are as skilled both in expressing a particular point of view and perhaps doing it in Russian.” Our visitors such as the congressman were frequently outmatched.

There were people such as Vladimir Pozner (I mentioned him before) who had grown up in Brooklyn, who not only spoke unaccented English but could speak “Brooklynese” as well. He would go to the American School or somewhere like that and perhaps admit, “Yeah. We’ve got problems here. We are just like any country in the world. We have smart people and stupid people just like you do in your country.” This was a very disarming approach.

But when it came to the crunch, to the issues in foreign policy, all Soviet “journalists” sang the party line. And for good reason; their jobs, their livelihoods depended on it.

Q: Were you seeing a lack of enthusiasm for communism per se? In other words, they have lectures on communism and on and on. There must be a point where students are tuned off, certainly in Eastern Europe.

BROWN: No question. It is hard to make a distinction between my official life and my non official life in Moscow because everything was official. You were always an American diplomat. I was the press attaché and so I would take Washington visitors to meet journalists or I would have Soviet journalists to our apartment. I recall a number of them coming to watch a video of the Reagan-Carter presidential debate in 1980. They would watch this debate and would discuss it. They were always, as we would say today, on message. There would be no concessions; whether they were defending the invasion of Afghanistan or saying it was the U.S. fault that we had hostages in Iran, they were right on line.

But, as I have said, I also had a lot of unofficial contact with people in two different categories. The first were people in the creative world, the performing arts. I did this simply because I liked having those experiences. We also had an ever-growing number of friends in the world of Jewish refuseniks or dissidents. You’d talk to any of them and either by the look on their face or by what they would actually tell you, the message was that this is all a big lie. Whatever the Russians were claiming about their standard of living or their role in the world, they were basically a third world country with nuclear weapons. I am sure that the official spokespeople recognized that as well. It is just that a lot of them benefited from this system and so they were not going to undermine their own position.

The short answer to your question is people knew that they were being lied to. We often watched the television news at night, the program called “Vremya.” You would hear the reports on food production or the general level of contentment and you knew that very few people could have watched those and thought it was true.

Q: Was there any effort during this time to spice up the news or something? Tractor production is not exactly a gripper.

BROWN: No, it wasn’t but it was there every night along with the speeches. Was there an effort to spice up the news? The front page of every major newspaper would have exactly the same article with exactly the same words. Newspapers like Literary Gazette might have long, tedious pieces on some aspect of cultural life but I don't think Russians turned to newspapers or TV to spice up their lives, at least not TV news casts. They watched cultural events, sporting events, children's programming, that kind of thing.

They didn't look to the media for news and the media was not trying to make it look itself interesting. Its role was to be the official mouthpiece for the CPSU.

Q: Where did people get their news in those days?

BROWN: We used to say that the rumor mill could get stories across Moscow and around the country in no time; that's where news traveled fastest or most believably just through conversations.

Beyond that, where did people get their news? A certain number were able to listen to foreign broadcasts including the Voice of America. Radio Liberty was jammed but if you got in the right places you could hear it.

One of the things I did a great deal of was travel. When I traveled to places like Tbilisi, Tashkent or Irkutsk, one of the things I was supposed to do was listen to the Voice of America and see if I could monitor it despite the jamming. The answer was sometimes yes, sometimes no. International broadcasts were a source of news.

Beyond that, you had the intelligentsia or the few people who were able to travel abroad and see things differently or who had contact with foreigners. For most other people in the country outside the big cities, I don't think they really cared that much. They just went about their daily lives struggling to make ends meet.

Q: This could be true in Kansas.

BROWN: Yes.

Q: Did we see any differentiation or cracks between what you were seeing in the central part of Russia and Ukraine, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, you know the other parts of what eventually broke off from the Soviet Union?

BROWN: A city we visited frequently, and where you would find the greatest sense of skepticism, where you felt a total change of spirit, was Tbilisi, Georgia. There was just something about that part of the world. The first morning I awakened in Tbilisi, I felt as if I was in a Mediterranean country. Over the course of two tours in the Soviet Union, I went there numerous times, quite often with family members.

I didn't go to Belarus, to Minsk, until my second tour but I don't think you would have found much deviance from party line in those areas.

In Central Asia, there was a whole different look – the faces, a different way of living, the ready availability of fresh fruits and vegetables and that kind of thing. Again, I don't think they were thinking that much about political issues out there.

But aside from these specifics, there is another more important point. What these three years in Moscow from 1978 to 1981 did for me was to make 1987 to 1990, when I went back on my second tour, so amazing. From the first day back in 1987, I would start the day, probably at a staff meeting, saying or hearing "you can't believe what we just read, what we just saw, what we just experienced." How different it was from ten years earlier. It really did go from a tightly controlled, thought-controlled society to an amazingly open, vibrant new world.

Q: Let's take two issues that must have had quite an impact. One is the hostage issue in Tehran and Soviet reaction and the other of course is the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. How did the hostage crisis

BROWN: The hostage taking was terribly depressing. I didn't make a note in my diary about it until several days after it happened. Soon after, we had a meeting in the embassy to ask ourselves whether we were doing and what we should do. I am not exactly sure what we meant by that but it seemed important to address our concern over this issue. The Soviets were exploiting it fully, blaming the United States even though of course they had interests of their own as far as their diplomatic immunities but they showed no sympathy for us for that situation.

Then there was the day -- and again, remember how we got our news, news wasn't as instantaneous back then as it is now -- when I learned through, I think, an AP report of the failed rescue mission. That just made that whole experience all the more depressing.

Life went on, we didn't stop living. It was on your mind every day. We had no fear of that kind of thing in Moscow. If anything, the Soviets had more worries about the safety of their diplomats sometimes in places like New York and elsewhere. In Moscow, we didn't fear hostage taking or physical attacks but you had to think of those poor souls in Tehran.

Jumping ahead to February of 1980, we and another family took a vacation in Sri Lanka. We got there flying Aeroflot from Moscow nonstop to Colombo. Part way through our flight, the pilot told us we were flying over the Persian Gulf. People even looked out to see if they could see American warships. It occurred to me that we were flying right over that country where this was all going on.

I remember the beginning of negotiations in November of 1980 and the Algerians being involved. When the hostages were released in January, the Algerian Ambassador in Moscow came to an event at Spaso House. We had served in Algeria and there was some grudging thanks to the Algerians for some little role they played in resolving the issue.

Q: Let's go to the invasion of Afghanistan. Here were the Soviets invading essentially a communist country. It is sort of a peculiar thing. Do you recall when it first happened what the hell is happening here?

BROWN: I am sometimes struck as I read my diary to see that I didn't write on that day that the Soviets invaded Afghanistan, etcetera, etcetera. I guess I took it for granted that this was in the news so I didn't have to write it. I do have a note on December 28, 1979 that the Ambassador briefed the American press on what we called the Soviet led coup in Afghanistan. That's about the only note I made.

Of course, the consequences were immediate and had a profound effect on our lives there; the sanctions imposed by the Carter administration. Ambassador Watson was recalled. We were groping for sanctions and sanctions included closing what we called the Kiev Advance Party, KAP. We were going to open a consulate in Kiev and they would open a consulate in New York. We had an advance party in Kiev.

Well, one of the ways we were going to punish the Soviets was to close the Kiev advance party and I remember some of our very good people being withdrawn from Kiev. That was about the most stupid thing you could do, to close your eyes and ears to an important part of the country, to withdraw your diplomats but that was one of our sanctions.

Another one of our sanctions was to suspend grain sales. This played right into Soviet hands. All those ships would no longer be coming from New Orleans to the port of Odessa. Aside from the negative impact on American farmers, the Soviets managed to manipulate the embargo quite nicely. They assured their people that the supply of bread would not be affected. Tightening belts in a time of crisis was nothing new for Soviets. It simply reinforced the sense of nationalism and loyalty.

The other major sanction was the boycott of the Olympics. I well remember the summer of 1981. We were not allowed to go anywhere near the Olympic Park lest we appear to be in any way involved in the Olympics. I wished in retrospect that we had not done that. I think it would have been a wonderful way to poke our finger in the Soviet's eye by having American athletes there throwing a Frisbee on Red Square. We played into Soviet hands through that boycott which, of course, allowed the Soviets four years later to boycott the U.S.-hosted Olympics in Los Angeles.

I cite those three things off the top of my head -- closing our consulate in Kiev which never really opened, suspending grain sales and boycotting the Olympics -- that happened in the aftermath of the invasion of Afghanistan. There were also a few other "minor" things, cutbacks in cultural exchanges, that affected us most directly.

I mentioned that way back when I was in Princeton, I wrote a paper on U.S. -- Soviet cultural exchanges. I explained that when you wanted to show that you were happy with a country that you had tense relations with, you initiated a cultural project. You sent ping pong players to China or the New York Symphony to Moscow. And when you wanted to show you were unhappy, and didn't want to launch nuclear weapons as the first action, you suspended cultural programs and so that's what we did. We suspended many cultural programs.

But it sometimes went to extremes. A young American pianist came to perform in Moscow. He wasn't even there officially. His father had arranged for him to come out. I was told I should not go to his performance at the Conservatory because it would look as though I was somehow endorsing the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan by going to hear an American pianist at the Conservatory.

That young pianist was Andrew Litton, now a noted conductor; his father was George Litton. George Litton asked me afterwards if I could get a copy of Andrew Litton's tape of his concert that night. I turned to our senior Foreign Service employee, Yuri Zarakhovitch, and Yuri by some miracle got the tape from Gosteleradio, state television and radio. I passed it on to George Litton. A few years later, I was in Paris and Andrew Litton was there, either to perform as a pianist or maybe as an orchestra conductor. Anyway, he was in Paris and I got hold of his father because I wanted to go to the concert. I said, "You probably don't remember me. My name is Phil Brown. You were in Moscow . . ."

He responded, "How could I ever forget you? You got me that tape of my son's concert in Moscow."

I didn't want to say it wasn't I who did it, it was Yuri, but anyway I will take the credit and get the tickets. He said, "You do me a favor. I will be grateful. If you do my son a favor. I will never forget you." George Litton lives in Manhattan. To this day, every time I see him or go to one of his son's performances, he remembers that concert in Moscow in 1980.

Q: Did the atmosphere of the embassy change after the Afghan invasion?

BROWN: Yes and no. The bloom was off the rose. No one felt that more than Ambassador Watson. Ambassador Watson goes out to Moscow and he wants to preside over a period of good feelings created by the Vienna summit; within six months, that is all down the drain.

Did the atmosphere change? Indeed. On the other hand, did we still go about our work day to day? Did we still have a full plate of activities? Very much so. We weren't going to have exhibits and speakers and cultural presentations. That had a demoralizing effect for people in the cultural section. I was in the press section. I still had a full platter, particularly in my role as press attaché, but the assistant IOs who dealt with exhibits, magazines and the like had a vastly reduced work load.

Q: You are press attaché and here the press is a complete creature of the political apparatus. What did you do?

BROWN: Let me explain once again that we had an active American press corps and as press attaché, I dealt a lot with the American press corps. They were asking questions on various issues. And under the Helsinki Agreements, working conditions for journalists were an issue we were always dealing with. Anytime an American journalist couldn't get a visa, had his film seized, felt that his working conditions were being compromised, we were into the foreign ministry to raise that issue.

It was tedious. I never really enjoyed doing this but we would go to the foreign ministry press division to defend the rights of the American press corps constantly.

We also had a very interesting and ambitious group of journalists from Western Europe and I found it very important to work with them. I had no sense that after the invasion of Afghanistan I had any less on my platter than I did before.

I mentioned that Ambassador Toon was very comfortable dealing with the press. He had a weekly, Friday afternoon background briefing for the American press corps. He almost seemed to revel in being contentious and getting a rise out of Washington. Ambassador Toon left in the fall of 1979 prior to the hostage crisis and the invasion of Afghanistan. In connection with Ambassador Toon's departure, we had a whole series of activities, social events that were not merely social events. They were part of the whole fabric of living in Moscow. One such party for Ambassador Toon, held in the snack bar, was in October of 1979, and I offered a toast that was a variation on the toast he said that he had offered to Secretary Kissinger.

Toon said his toast to Kissinger was "you have been a great secretary of state but an SOB to work for." I recalled this and I remember people nervously shuffling thinking I was going to say the same thing about Toon but my variation was "you have been a great Ambassador and a delight to work for." I went to Moscow being told to watch out for Toon. He has press attachés for breakfast. And now that he was leaving, I felt so comfortable that I could make him the potential target of a joke.

Q: He had a reputation as a curmudgeon.

BROWN: A tough guy to work for, a demanding boss but he certainly made my life interesting and more comfortable because he was honest with the press. He was candid with them. He occasionally got himself in trouble doing it but, to me he was a role model in how to deal with the press.

Ambassador Watson undoubtedly heard how comfortable Toon was with the press and it reminded me of when Ambassador Payton was replaced by Ambassador Hoffacker during my tour in Cameroon. The one came from outside the Foreign Service and the next was a career man. I wondered "how can this new guy replace his predecessor?" In fact, he didn't try to replace; he went about doing what he knew how to do best.

By the same token, I don't think Ambassador Watson felt he was trying to replace Toon. He was going to come out and do what he knew how to do best but dealing with the press was not what he knew how to do best. He was always uneasy and his DCM, Mark Garrison, and his political counselor, Bob German, shared that uneasiness and so it was like walking on eggshells when we dealt with the American press. We tried some of the Friday afternoon background briefings but that was trying to do what your predecessor was comfortable doing and Ambassador Watson was not comfortable doing that. I have example after example where it was a very awkward relationship, complicated of course by the fact we quickly went from relatively good times to relatively bad times.

Just one more anecdote about Ambassador Toon that is too good and too memorable for me not to mention. Besides the snack bar farewell, there was another more formal affair at Spaso House. But the best farewell for Ambassador Toon was hosted by a correspondent named Ed Stevens. Ed Stevens won a Pulitzer Prize with the Christian Science Monitor in 1950 but by 1979, he was a character nobody fully understood. He was probably in his 70s then. He was afflicted by a physical problem where his head hung down. He couldn't stand erect. He and his wife Nina had a lovely, multi-story home in central Moscow that was full of icons. Ed hosted a party for just the American press corps. I was invited along with my wife to say farewell to Ambassador Toon.

The first event of the evening involved Gene Pell, the NBC correspondent. I can't imagine how much company time he had spent with his cameraman creating this video, a spoof on Ambassador Toon. It picked up on and exploited many of Toon's idiosyncrasies, habits or comments. I hope it exists somewhere because it was very funny; we were in hysterics laughing at it.

That was over and you thought nothing could exceed this for laughter and kidding. Toon was loving it and then this man appeared and you would have sworn it was Leonid Brezhnev. Out lumbers this hulking man with his head down on his chest and a Brezhnev mask. It was Ed Stevens, our host for the evening. He went on in a mumbling style you could hardly understand. It was partly the way Ed talked at the time and it was vintage Brezhnev. Toon again just loved it. It was a genuine tribute from the American press corps. There were guys there like David Shipler of The New York Times, who only a few weeks earlier had written a very critical article about the embassy and about the embassy limiting access to the consular section in the wake of the incident there and this kind of thing. These guys didn't lose their critical edge but they really genuinely wanted to pay tribute, say farewell to Mac Toon.

To this day I look back on that with real warmth.

Q: I met Watson once when I was consul general around this time in Naples and the NATO commander in that period was Bill Crowe who became chairman of the joint chiefs. Watson mentioned that he was sent out there because of his business experience and the idea when Carter nominated him this was going to be an opening. Here was a businessman who could go out and sort of get a business perspective. A good idea because of Afghanistan and all but did you find that there was any business perspective coming out of the ambassador's office?

BROWN: Not really. That may have been the case that he was nominated, partly because he was a Democrat and partly because of his business acumen. I would imagine it would have been saying to the Soviets, "Look. This man has achieved the top of his field. We are sending you someone who is really number one in his field." They would take no offense it being a business person. They have great admiration for American business, even though they might claim otherwise.

I can't speak for Ambassador Watson that what he hoped to do was to bring the force of his personality, whereas a career person would have been simply representing the official policy of the U.S. government. Sure, Watson would have represented the official policy of the U.S. government but he would leave a lot of the negotiating and that kind of thing to other people. He was going to use Spaso House and make it an American cultural center. He was going to be able to use his personal wealth to improve U.S. – Soviet relations. He could recall, and I wish I knew exactly the details, that he flew across the Soviet Union right after the Second World War in his own plane. He wrote about those wonderful experiences. He was involved in lend lease so by dint of his personality, he hoped he could contribute to the improvement of U.S. relations.

Who knows? In Watson's mind, maybe that would also make them more open to arms control and to loosening immigration restrictions but it wouldn't prevent them from, as we know, pursuing their own national interests in Afghanistan and elsewhere.

Q: How stood our relations with our Russian employees, the Foreign Service nationals? This was before the Sergeant Lonetree incident.

BROWN: Yes, well before Lonetree. We still had Russian national employees. We had only a couple in the press section, most notably Yuri Zarakhovich. After December, 1979, we had less work for Yuri to do, there was no question. That was a regret of mine.

I might as well take a minute and talk about Yuri, a heavy-set, garrulous Jewish intellectual, a member of the Communist Party but only out of necessity. He had a hearty laugh, loved to exchange jokes or stories in either Russian or English. I believe that he had come to the press section from the exhibit program.

Yuri was a great help on many projects and we got to know each other well. He invited me to his dacha one weekend. I went out there alone, probably a violation of embassy restrictions. You shouldn't travel alone but I went out to his dacha for a weekend, met his wife, his mother, his mother's mother and their daughter. There were four generations

Yuri went along on several of our trips to Tbilisi; he had good connections there. In one particular case, Yuri put us in touch with a leading figure in state radio and television in Georgia. On a particular Saturday, we had a big Georgian meal with Yuri and his friend. I am sure we had not only a lot of food but a little bit of libation along with it. At the end, as we are walking out of the restaurant, we noticed that there was a Georgian wedding going on. It wasn't a house of worship; I think it was the reception. There was a ceremony in connection with it so I asked "can we just stand here in the back?" We did, the four of us, Yuri, the Georgian official and my wife and my daughter.

People caught sight of us, realized I was not Georgian, found out that I was an American diplomat and pretty quickly, I was paraded up in the front of the room with somebody acting as an interpreter. The next thing I knew, I was being offered one of these cow horns full of, I am not sure what it was full of, wine, let's say and I was "invited" to toast the bride and groom by downing that horn of wine nonstop with the appropriate amount of wine trickling down my chin and everything else. I did it and got a round of applause.

Then I said through the interpreter, "I have observed one of your traditions and now I am going to ask you to observe one of our traditions and that is I am going to kiss the bride." So I kissed the bride on both cheeks and that produced a lot of laughter and applause. We walked out and the Georgian jokingly said to me, "You better be careful you don't overplay your hand; kissing the bride before the wedding or before her bridal night might be contrary to local tradition. You might end up finding your tires slashed or your throat cut." It was fun.

I remember my daughter was there because she was in hysterics watching me drink this cow horn of wine.

On another occasion, my wife and I went to the Moscow puppet theater with Yuri. My Russian was good but I could not have begun to appreciate the nuances of what was going on in the puppet theater if Yuri hadn't been sitting behind us whispering and explaining things. He was always willing to become involved in any activity we had.

That same summer we were home, 1979, we met a woman named Helen Papashvily, a Georgian name, and learned about George Papashvily (his life is a whole story in itself, a Georgian American sculptor). We took a catalog of his works back to Moscow, showed it to Yuri and asked if he could translate the introductory remarks. I think he initially looked at it skeptically but he translated it into Russian. He brought it to me a few days later. He loved it. It was this genuine U.S. – Georgian story.

By my second tour, we had dismissed all the Foreign Service national employees. There was a lot of chest beating about “boy, oh boy. This is the best thing we have ever done. We got rid of all these spies. How could we have ever operated an embassy with these disloyal people working inside?”

I am proud to say that I did not buy that argument. I thought some of these people were very good. If we weren't smart enough to know how to use them but keep them in control, then that reflected on us. As I have said many times, if Yuri and others reported back to the KGB that Phil Brown loved classical music, let them fill up the file.

By my second tour, Yuri was working for AP, the Associated Press, and our loss was their gain. After the invasion of Afghanistan, in that year and a half that I was there, we didn't have enough work for those people but by the time I went back in 1987, we had so much work that I kept thinking if I could only get Yuri to help me out with this that or the other thing. By then, he was a very capable staff member at the Associated Press.

Then he was stolen away by Time magazine. The AP bureau chief was married to the Time magazine correspondent and I don't know how that went down within the family but Time stole Yuri away from AP. We last saw Yuri in Moscow in 2006 when we returned as tourists.

In the interim, Yuri had arranged for his daughter Masha to do university study at Emory University in Georgia. It happened to be a period when we were living in the States and Yuri asked whether Masha could call us in case there was a problem or issue. I said certainly. Masha is now an immigration lawyer in Jacksonville, Florida. She has her own child and she just posted the last week or so on Facebook page that her mother has become an American citizen.

A couple of years ago, 2009, we were coming back from overseas and picked up a copy of Time magazine. There was Yuri's obituary, a full column on the magazine's own page acknowledging what he had contributed to Time's reporting on Russia. He had died in his mid-60s of cancer. By this time he had come to live in Jacksonville. He lived long enough to hold his first grandchild. Yuri's daughter told me that they still have the dacha outside Moscow.

So that's the Yuri Zarakhovitch story, my part of it. I hope he left memoirs.

I just love that kind of story. As I go through my diary and look up people on the Internet, I say, "gosh. So that's who that person was we were dealing with. Now they are dead." There are others who were children when we were there and they are now in the prime of life and doing interesting things. We can keep track of them; that is rewarding.

Q: In this first tour, did you feel the heavy hand of the KGB?

BROWN: No, I did not. I was conscious that they were probably monitoring my telephone calls and I always carried a number of small, two kopek pieces with me. If you were going to call somebody and didn't want to be monitored, you'd find a phone booth on the street and use that to call. I was not personally aware of the KGB.

I was just the other day reading about a trip I took with the head of the internal political section, a fellow named Bob Ober.

Q: He taught at my prep school, Kent.

BROWN: On one trip, we flew to Odessa; from there, we took the train to Lvov and from Lvov, we flew back to Moscow; it must have been a five or six day adventure.

The most interesting part of it was you'd get out and walk the streets, meet people in a restaurant. I really like Bob Ober and have great respect for him but I can't tell you how many times on that trip Bob would say, "See those people over there on the other side of the street? They are following us. They are watching us."

I would look at those people on the other side of the street and I'd see just a couple of ordinary Russians going about their lives. So I think it is a matter of perspective.

I had my agenda. I would try to listen to the Voice of America and see if it was being jammed or not. We also did things like go to a concert at the conservatory in Odessa. I am sure I put Bob up to that. At the conservatory in Odessa, you could see the names of famous graduates, people like Rostropovich and Oistrakh.

Neither when we were going to the conservatory nor when we went out to visit someone by public transportation was I aware of our being watched or surveyed or whatever. Bob was sure we were.

Bob also had his agenda. There were people on various lists he wanted to talk to. So we went to visit a person who was on the embassy representation list. Any time we had a high level meeting with Soviets, we would pass over a list of individuals on whom we were making a formal representation, probably for the right to emigrate. For that visit, we might well have been monitored.

There was an Indian consulate in Odessa and Bob and I called on the consul, who was delighted to have some English-speaking visitors. We signed the guest book. I must have visited there twice because I remember signing that guest book a second time and there hadn't been many visitors in the interim. But there was always something about going to a port city, just a little bit different from other places.

Q: What was the history of the Jewish population of Odessa?

BROWN: All I know is there was a very large Jewish population there and that they were part of the creative intelligentsia but I don't recall very much of the specifics at the time. Undoubtedly, there would have been a synagogue and there would have been some Jewish cultural organizations. Many of the creative intelligentsia came out of the Odessa Jewish community.

We went on to Lvov which is a pretty little town. It was really a Polish town with an old square.

People inevitably ask the same two questions when I say I served in the Soviet Union. The first is "could you meet people?" My answer is, "I didn't have enough time to begin to meet all the people." This may sound boastful but I am constantly amazed at how much time I did find to meet people after hours on the weekends and everything else.

Yes, we said to our Russian friends, particularly to our Jewish refusenik friends that if at any time they felt contact or friendship with us put them in jeopardy, let us know and we would back off without any questions being asked. The answer was always the same. "Phil, the more contact we have the better."

The second question was "could you travel?" And I traveled extensively.

Q: You say you are meeting people. I know that the Soviets have sort of an unquenchable appetite for information about the United States. Do you really have a car or do you do this, do you do that, all these things. Were you able to engage in substantive conversations about the political situation and that sort of thing?

BROWN: We went to Moscow with a Volvo that we had purchased in 1972. That car was a lemon but somehow we nursed it as far as Moscow and it was obviously still going to cause us great difficulty. I managed to sell it. I never dealt in the black market. The American Embassy never dealt in the black market. The American Embassy always dealt with rubles at the official exchange rate but plenty of African and other third world diplomats dealt on the black market. So I sold, quite legitimately, my Volvo for a cigar box full of rubles that I could convert at the embassy at the official rate. It all worked out. The only condition was that I deliver that car to Helsinki.

I had a friend in the embassy named Craig Spitzer. I can't remember exactly what he did but he was not a language-trained diplomat. He was one of the technicians but he knew how to operate cars and on a beautiful spring day, May 12, 1979, we headed off from Moscow and managed to drive that car to Leningrad. For Craig, it was a novel experience. Otherwise, he was not only never going to get out of Moscow, but probably never get out of the embassy-to-apartment routine so it was quite an eye-opener for him.

We stayed overnight in the guest apartment in Leningrad. After I had retired for the day, Craig was out there working on the car, changing the spark plugs, changing the oil and everything else. The next day, we drove from Leningrad to Helsinki. I put Craig on the train back to Moscow. I would see him frequently afterwards and he'd always talk about that experience. I checked in to a guest house in Helsinki and got up on Monday morning to deliver the car to the port. It wouldn't start but thanks to Craig, I knew what I had to do with those spark plugs or whatever; I got the car started, delivered it to the port and that was it. That was the last I ever saw of that car. I think it went off to Sierra Leone. It may still be operating in Sierra Leone.

That was the last we would ever see of non-Russian cars. We went out and bought the little version of the Fiat called the Zhiguli, a little yellow Zhig, probably about as unsafe a car as you can imagine. It provided us with anonymity. It had a diplomatic license plate on it but you could let that license plate get awfully muddy in the winter. That provided us with a degree of anonymity when we went to visit Russian friends. At least we weren't driving up in a Volvo or Chevrolet or something.

Your question; what did we talk about? Most of my recollection is that we had close friends and we were not talking very much about politics. We were talking about family and raising children. But they were also full of questions about life in America and often about things that made us reflect. I can remember Yuri Ziemann, the father in the family we knew best, coming to our apartment. We had a whole row of books about Russia. We didn't have to engage in conversation. They were pulling out books and looking at pictures of the family of the czar and Russian history, pictures they had never been allowed to see.

I don't recall many conversations, except at the official level, on U.S. – Soviet relations or world politics or that kind of thing. We would talk about the news item of the day or personal concerns. With musicians, it might be on their hopes and aspirations for performing in Carnegie Hall in the case of Vladimir Spivakov, the now world famous violinist, or just the frustration of music making in Moscow.

Q: What was the music world, your impression of the music world then? What was going on?

BROWN: I listened to the Metropolitan Opera performance of "Manon" a couple Saturdays ago and during the intermission, they interviewed a couple of the leading singers. One was Polish, Piotr Beczala, and the other was a Russian, Anna Netrebko. The Polish fellow was quite critical of musical training in Poland but Anna Netrebko said that in Russia, they had the best musical training. I think she was referring to St. Petersburg. That's my way of saying that while I am not a music critic or a musicologist, I know that the musical traditions are deep in Moscow and it is not by chance that they have produced some of the world's leading performing artists.

I mentioned the Oistrakh family. I heard two generations of the Oistrakh family violinists perform in Moscow. I am jumping way ahead now but we were there when Rostropovich came back to the Soviet Union in 1991 as the conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra.

Musical training in Moscow was outstanding. They produced great singers, instrumentalists. Perhaps the orchestras were not up to the level of some Western orchestras, although I am dubious about that rating game. As often as not, it may have been a lack of instruments.

I can remember when the Empire Brass Quintet came out in 1987. They played in one of the Baltic States, in Vilnius, Lithuania. A lot of local brass musicians came to the concert and stayed afterward to talk. They just didn't have the instruments that the American performers had.

The short answer – I believe that Russian musical training was and is top notch.

Q: In literature, what's out there? Certainly at one point Russian literature is, it's almost demeaning to say world class but that's of an era.

BROWN: It is undeniable that under Soviet communism, Russian literature was unable to bloom, was suppressed. All you've got to do is go back to the 19th century and see the great writers and contrast it with 20th century Russian literature.

I recall a night we went to a dinner with famous poets André Voznesensky and his wife Zoya Boguslavskaya and Bella Akhmadulina and her husband and a playwright named Misha Roshchin. This was on my first tour in Moscow and I am not sure I fully comprehended then who these people were or the role they played. I was the press attaché, not the cultural attaché.

The name Roshchin didn't mean too much to me then and it didn't mean too much to me this week but I looked him up and saw that he was a well-known playwright. The Soviets were still producing writers of note. There just weren't as many and they didn't have the freedom that they had at one time.

You could also argue, of course, that it is restrictions on freedom that produce great writers so you have a Pasternak or a Solzhenitsyn. We would regularly go out to Peredelkino, the so-called writer's colony. We'd take friends out there to see the grave of Boris Pasternak and be reminded even in the worst of times, or maybe because it's the worst of times, great creative talent emerges.

The Solzhenitsyn immigration was, if nothing else, one of the major points in the disillusionment of Western intellectuals in the Soviet Union and what it stood for, that a great figure like Solzhenitsyn would leave or be expelled.

Q: Did you find within your contacts any nostalgia for Stalin and his ilk or not?

BROWN: Not to any great extent. I have a little item in my files, an 8 x 10 photo calendar that includes a photo of Stalin and all his achievements. You felt a little bit of nostalgia for Stalin if you went to Georgia. I never went there but there was a museum in Stalin's birth town, Gori, that I think exists to this day.

The other place you might find it would be on Victory Day, May 15th. May was full of holidays. May 1st was International Labor Day. May 15th was Victory Day marking the end of the Great Patriotic War and you could go down to Red Square, take all the pictures you want of the men who would come out in full uniform with all their decorations and among them would be those who felt great allegiance to Stalin for his role in the war.

If you were with a taxi driver or looked into the cab of a truck, you might see a picture of Stalin up there on the visor. If you engaged the taxi driver in conversation, there wouldn't be much more than a mumble. But some people remembered him fondly.

Q: Is there anything else we should discuss?

BROWN: I've got a whole lot more.

Q: Let's stick to this tour. What was the role of the church and the openness in this first tour?

BROWN: I remember attending Easter services in 1979 at Yelokhovsky Cathedral in Moscow. We went with Kevin Klose, the correspondent for the Washington Post, and his wife and another visitor. Easter services were of course on Saturday night. What an experience to walk into one of those great cathedrals. They were jammed with people. There was a terrible crush, even in the diplomats' section, but it was worth seeing and experiencing. We stayed for several hours and the cumulative effect of music, liturgy, incense and the faces of both clergy and worshippers was profound. It will remain with me for a long time. That was our first Easter in Moscow and I think we went every Easter to a Russian Orthodox services. They were such memorable experiences.

We have a photograph of a Russian Easter service, perhaps at Yelokhovsky Cathedral, taken by a Russian photographer who was, I think, married to an American. It's a wonderfully-composed picture. He sold it as a way of making money.

I think the general consensus was and is that the patriarch was beholden to the Kremlin but nevertheless, there were plenty of true believers and they came out. That's probably true to this day that the church is beholden to the Kremlin and as we have seen, they are not terribly tolerant of other faiths. There were certain officially allowed faiths, the Jewish, Baptists and a few others, but they were not very welcoming to anybody else.

There were plenty of true believers and not just little old ladies. You'd occasionally see guys in uniform.

We went to a Baptist church to a baptism; I have vivid memories of that. Of course, the Soviets always liked to say that "we have religious freedom in this country. Just go to a Baptist church and you will see a baptism." Well, we did. It was one of those full-immersion baptism services that went on forever and ever. I am quite sure those being baptized and the clergy involved were very sincere and very true in their religion.

Q: Were we seeing problems with Islam at that time? Or were we looking at it?

BROWN: Not that I can recall. I do have a note about going by a mosque in Moscow -- I think maybe there was one mosque -- but we didn't talk much about it. Islam was more associated with Central Asia. If there was a problem associated with it, I don't think we were thinking about it at the time; it was a demographic issue. Even back then, the Russians were conscious that they didn't have population growth. They would try to put in measures that would reward large families but the problem was that all the large families were out in the Central Asian, Muslim areas.

As far as Islam being a political subject, not that I can recall.

Q: How stood Jews in the Soviet Union at that time?

BROWN: Not openly persecuted unless they applied to emigrate and then like our friends, they would risk losing their jobs and any other privileges. There was a variation on that. Some said the Jews had privileges that other people didn't have because they were at least allowed to apply to emigrate. Non-Jewish Russians couldn't even apply to emigrate.

And, of course, the Soviets could point to any number of what I used to think of as Jackie Robinsons. The American version would be: "What do you mean Americans discriminate against Negroes? Just look at Jackie Robinson." The Soviet version was: What do you mean we discriminate against Jews? Any number of them occupy senior positions." I never stopped to think whether an editor or a member of such and such committee was Jewish but the Russians were very conscious of that. Nobody was wearing a Star of David. There was never any fear of that but there was anti-Semitism.

As for ourselves, we went quite regularly to church services which were held alternately in Spaso House or at the British Embassy. If you go back to the agreement in the 1930's that established U.S. – Soviet relations, one of the conditions was we could have a Protestant minister and a Catholic priest at all times in the Soviet Union at all times and we did. Protestant denominations went together here in the U.S. and paid for a Protestant minister to be in Moscow and there was always a Catholic priest.

The Catholics had their mass in the snack bar which resulted in all sorts of names such as our lady of the French fry or whatever. We Protestants met in Spaso House, which was a lovely setting or at the British Embassy, which looked out on the Kremlin. You could sit there at a church service on Sunday morning and look out at the bells of the Kremlin. It was a very inspiring setting. They would bring in an Anglican cleric from Helsinki or wherever. There was always good attendance and I even sang occasionally in a little choir we had. It was an important get together.

Q: Did you find much collaboration with the foreign embassies, particularly the French and British and German and all?

BROWN: There was something called the QP, quadripartite; the American, French, British and German ambassadors got together on a weekly basis with rotating hosts and compared notes. On my second tour, when I was counselor, I occasionally attended when Ambassador Matlock would debrief but I often came away thinking I've got so much else to do. I understood that we were all political officer in Moscow but we were not all doing this kind of work. I went wondering if it was the best use of my time.

Similarly, on my first tour but not on my second, the four press attachés would get together, the British, French, American and German. I would go to those. We'd host a lunch and occasionally the PAO would come too because he was the press counselor. The meetings reminded me that we did very different work. My counterparts in the British, French and German embassies were political officers. They were reading the Soviet press, analyzing it for changes in a word or two; that's what our political internal folks were doing.

Very few of my counterparts were doing what I was doing which was dealing with the press on a day-to-day basis, answering questions. They didn't cater to the press the way we did. They didn't have as many issues. They didn't have as many news making events as we did, as many news makers, as many things that caught the attention of the press. So those press attaché get-togethers were always fairly low on my list of priorities; I didn't find them terribly useful.

More important to me was my contact with their journalists. I knew some of their journalists better than they did. They didn't worry about the working conditions for German, French, British journalists but I was dealing with correspondents for the Financial Times and Le Monde and German newspapers on a regular basis.

New subject: In late September of 1979, all four of us, my wife and two kids and I made our first ever trip to Tbilisi, Georgia. It was a real eye opener. This was a part of the Soviet Union that just acted differently than Moscow. This was not our first trip outside Moscow by any means. We had been to Dushanbe, Leningrad and places like that but Tbilisi, Georgia was a real eye opener.

We had been given through music friends in Moscow the names of a couple Georgian artists and the fact that I can remember the names of Shavleg Shilakadze and Nodar Zhvanya -- I don't have to look at notes to remember those names -- says something about what an impression they made on us. They met us near the Hotel Iveria where we were staying. They didn't seem to have any hang-ups, took us around, took us outside town, fed us meals.

I remember one or the other saying he wanted to take us to visit a town called Mtskheta, probably 20-30 miles outside Tbilisi. I explained that I would like to accept but that I hadn't requested permission from the foreign ministry; you always had to outline exactly where you were going before you took a trip. Either Nodar or Shavleg smiled and said, "Phil, that's Moscow; this is Georgia." Off we went. There was that thumb your nose at central authority attitude that distinguished Georgia from the rest of the country.

The proximate reason for going to Tbilisi at that time was an American cultural presentation called the Preservation Hall Jazz Band out of New Orleans, amazing octogenarian jazz musicians. They did several performances in Tbilisi. We hosted a small reception for them afterwards and then they again performed in Moscow.

It is just occurring to me now; I wasn't the cultural attaché. I wasn't the CAO, I was the press attaché or information officer but I didn't think anything of blending the roles, of going to Tbilisi to attend the Preservation Hall Jazz Band concert and hosting the reception afterwards.

I remember quite a few years later going to New Orleans and hearing them perform there. You have to line up in the street to get in. I think it is even free. Some of the same people who had been in Moscow in 1979 were still with the band. Not the octogenarians but some of their younger performers.

That's the kind of thing we weren't going to experience after the invasion of Afghanistan in December of '79. This was September of '79.

Q: What was the impression you were getting, both you yourself but also from the other officers of the embassy towards Brezhnev and the leadership of the politburo? Was this a politburo that was even compos mentis?

BROWN: The only member of the politburo who was given much credence was Kosygin. Brezhnev was secretary general of the party. You had the nominal president, Nikolai Podgorny (his official title was Chairman of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet) and Alexei Kosygin who was in effect the prime minister. When American delegations came out, they would call most often on Kosygin and he seemed to be compos mentis. He was in better health than Brezhnev. In conversation, he was intelligent. Brezhnev had only a few years left to live and it was quite well known he was ill. He would reportedly joke with visiting delegations that if there were any smokers among them, they should blow smoke in his direction since his doctors had banned him from smoking. Rumors would frequently circulate that he had died.

BROWN: He would read speeches and it was this mumbling style that lent itself to mockery and jokes. Not on an official stage but elsewhere, there would be mockeries of Brezhnev who was hardly articulate.

I got to see him a couple of times because I would accompany the journalists to the Kremlin if a high level delegation was making a call. I mentioned earlier that one of those high level delegations consisted of two members of the Carter cabinet, Secretary of Commerce Juanita Kreps and Secretary of the Treasury Michael Blumenthal. They came on their own plane and were received at the Kremlin by Kosygin and Brezhnev -- separate appointments. A small pool of journalists was allowed to attend the opening and I got to go along with the pool. I have a picture of myself standing against the wall in the meetings with Brezhnev and with Kosygin. I was one of the relatively few people in the embassy besides the ambassador who actually got to see Brezhnev in the flesh.

I went to a hockey game one time. My wife's young cousin was visiting. We went to a hockey game just for the fun of it and there was this little shuffle or stir that caused us to pay attention. We realized Brezhnev was in attendance but otherwise he made very few public appearances.

This is one of the things that amazed us in 1987. Gorbachev not only appeared in public but you couldn't shut him up. He talked and talked and talked. At first it was interesting and then he wore out his welcome. He was so verbose.

One of the things that Tom Watson did was to attract a lot of friends. There were people who knew him from his previous life. I am sure he said “come see us in Moscow” without realizing so many of them would. I don’t know if it was connection with Ambassador Watson but we had a visit by Harry Reasoner, the CBS newsman who at one time had actually been a USIA employee. We went out for dinner with Harry Reasoner. He was doing something perhaps for “60 Minutes” on the Soviet Union. He told my wife and me one of the reasons he left USIA was he never figured out how he could put his kids through college on the salary of a government employee.

Another visitor was Armand Hammer whose relation to the Soviet Union goes way back and he had a blank check when it came to access. He could come in and see Brezhnev at any time he wanted. Armand Hammer had known Lenin. On this particular occasion, I was supposed to make sure the film crew that accompanied him had carte blanche to film him at Spaso House. I was there to make sure they did what they were supposed to do and still obeyed the rules.

In retrospect, it seems as if Ambassador Watson was snakebit. In late October, I went to the Kremlin with all the senior officers from the embassy as he presented his credentials. I have that photo.

In late November, less than a month later, Ambassador Watson had to return to the United States for gall bladder surgery. If you look back on it, he didn’t have good luck. Not only were political things going to turn sour, but his health was a challenge.

Q: Today is the 29th of March, 2012 with Phil Brown. We are finishing off his Soviet tour.

BROWN: Three years in the Soviet Union and we concluded last time roughly the summer of 1980, two years into my Moscow assignment.

What I would like to talk about today would be the last year but rather than doing it chronologically, I would do it by some categories.

As I read through my notes recently, I was reminded once again that on the one hand here we were in the depths of the Cold War. The Soviets had invaded Afghanistan; they had arrested Sakharov and many other dissidents. The United States had responded with sanctions, everything from cutting off grain deliveries to closing our consulate in Kiev, a consulate that closed before it even opened because all we had there was an advance party. We boycotted the 1980 Olympics and closer to home or closer to our activities in Moscow, virtually all the cultural programs dried up. There were no exhibits with Americans out there talking about U.S. life, no speakers, and no performing arts groups.

And on the other hand, as I look through my notes and activities both on a professional and personal level, we were as busy and as active and enjoying the experience as we could be. I say professionally and personally and yet it was really hard to make a distinction because they overlapped so much.

Let me suggest just some of the interesting American people that we met and experiences we had. Part of this was because of the personality of Ambassador Tom Watson. I mentioned last time Armand Hammer. Another name that wouldn't mean too much today but to people of your generation and mine, Lowell Thomas, the man who ended all his radio broadcasts with the phrase "so long until tomorrow."

Q: In the theaters there would be a short, the movie theaters Lowell Thomas often, sort of travelogue and that type thing.

BROWN: He was well into his 80's. He died a couple of years later but he was still well known to that generation of American journalists.

Q: He was very involved with Laurence of Arabia.

BROWN: We had lunch one day at the apartment of Washington Post correspondent Kevin Klose with Peter Jennings, the ABC anchorman and his wife, Kati Marton.

George Kennan popped in. He was there doing research and was invited to a staff meeting. Some other names don't mean quite as much but they are prominent figures in the world of publishing. Hedley Donovan of Time magazine; Time was doing a special issue, cover to cover, all about the Soviet Union. Sander Vanocur, who was a TV correspondent, came to interview Ambassador Watson. Walter Cronkite, I will mention in a different context.

But I want to go into a little more detail about two special visitors and about the experience we had with them. One was Bob Hope. Bob Hope came to Spaso House as the guest of Tom Watson. You can Google some correspondence between the two of them before the visit. Hope came with his wife and a friend whose name meant nothing to me at the time. The word was they would do a show for the American community at Spaso House.

No sooner had they arrived than I got a call saying Bob Hope wants to walk across Red Square. Round up some correspondents and walk him across Red Square so I did. It was an experience. Bob Hope, his traveling companion and a gaggle of correspondents and of course, nobody on Red Square had the slightest idea who Bob Hope was but he pretended as if they did. He made jokes about Lenin's tomb and about people walking around. We had some TV cameras and flashbulbs. There is a picture that appeared in quite a number of newspapers with Bob Hope and a young Russian soldier and me. I was translating for him. I was really quite surprised no authorities came over and said what are you doing or do you have permit? You didn't have that easy flexibility at that time.

We went into GUM, the famous or infamous Russian department store. We wandered around a little bit in there, bought ice cream cones and this continued for the better part of an hour. The American journalists were covering it but they were also enjoying it. It was a once in a lifetime experience.

A day later, I got another call about lunch time saying "Bob Hope and his friend were out last night and they saw some blue suede shoes in a shoe store and they want to go buy them.” I am sure the thought ran through my mind, why me? But I was smart enough to realize this was Bob Hope. Don’t miss this opportunity. So I got my wife and Bob Hope and his friend. We went out from Spaso House – I think we walked -- to the shoe store.

It was the middle of the day when a lot of Russians would do their shopping so it was crowded, mostly with women. It may have even been a women’s shoe store but we went in and he is cracking jokes the whole time. You don’t walk into a shoe store or any kind of store in the Soviet Union at that time and expect service. Service and Soviet Union do not appear in the same sentence but we managed to get the attention of somebody. Hope tried on the shoes. The process for purchasing was different in the Soviet Union. You didn’t pick out your product and then walk to the cash register. If you knew what you wanted to buy and how much it cost, you went to the cash register, paid, got a little ticket and came back and picked up your product.

When I had a pretty good idea of what he wanted to buy, I left my wife with Bob Hope and I went to the cash register, got in line, paid, got the ticket, came back and we picked up the blue suede shoes. My wife recalls that while I was doing this, he was making wisecracks about women’s legs. I was told he wanted to use the shoes for a gag of some sort in California. He gave me a signed, autographed picture. In addition to his name, it says blue suede shoes. It was one of those experiences we enjoyed sharing with our friends.

There is another memory I have of Bob Hope. He did a show at the British Embassy because he was British born. I must have attended it because I remember it really didn’t go over too well. The jokes were not that well understood but he gave a show at the American Embassy, at Spaso House, that was just hilarious. It was family oriented and for anyone who wanted to come whether they were diplomats or press or whatever. The entire community was invited.

The thing I particularly remember was that Bob Hope set aside a couple of hours that afternoon to go upstairs at Spaso House and prepare. Here was a guy who must have done tens of thousands of such shows over his lifetime but he didn’t take it for granted. He prepared, he adjusted his jokes for the particular context. They were all family jokes too. There was nothing that anyone would have been embarrassed about.

To me it was just a little lesson that no matter where you are in your professional career, don’t take anything for granted. Always go and prepare. Today I don’t know if there is any parallel or not but I am a Washington DC tour guide and I have done many, many, many tours around Washington. I did one just last Sunday night but I try to prepare and try to think in advance what is my audience, where do I want to go, what should I be attentive to. A little bit of that goes back to that Bob Hope experience.

The man traveling with him I didn’t know anything about at the time. His name is Alex Spanos. I Googled him recently. He is a Greek-American, very right of center, a multimillionaire; he has written a book about how he made it in the United States with a nice preface from Rush Limbaugh. He is I believe living in San Diego, California. Somehow Bob Hope invited him to come along on the trip.

The other prominent visitor I want to mention is Senator Charles Percy. I didn't realize but there was a tradition involving the particular heads of three corporations. The head of IBM, Tom Watson, the head of Bell and Howell, Charles Percy, and the head of Motorola, a man named Robert Galvan who died a couple of years ago, would get together at Thanksgiving along with their families and they'd have Thanksgiving dinner, these three titans of American capitalism.

By Thanksgiving, 1981, the Watsons had been in Moscow for about a year and Senator Charles Percy and Robert Galvan and their wives came to Spaso House for Thanksgiving dinner. What made it different was that only a couple of weeks earlier, Ronald Reagan had been elected president and Charles Percy was in line to be chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. He advertised this and the Soviets were very attentive. So Charles Percy made calls on Foreign Minister Gromyko, Defense Minister General Ustinov and on Brezhnev. He was not discreet about these calls. He let people know in advance. I camped out at Spaso House with the press corps when he came back from these various appointments.

On Thanksgiving Day, Washington Post correspondent Kevin Klose and his family were our guests for Thanksgiving dinner. Late in the afternoon, Kevin and I had to excuse ourselves and go down to Spaso House where we waited for Senator Percy to return from his call on Brezhnev.

In each case, he talked at great length and I dutifully had to go and type the transcript and send it off to Washington. That, I can assure you, was tedious work on any occasion but especially with someone like Senator Percy.

The upshot of it was that Senator Percy made statements to the effect "don't worry too much about what Reagan said during the campaign; now that he is president he will be much more moderate in his thinking about the Soviet Union." I am paraphrasing but that was the gist of his remarks I remember very clearly. That did not go over well at all in the White House or more precisely in the Reagan camp. I don't know the full details but I know there was a great deal of tension between President-elect Reagan and Senator Percy, a great deal of tension.

Without being indiscreet, I can say one morning I showed up at Spaso House in connection with this visit and Ambassador Watson and Senator Percy were having a real verbal battle. I thought it had to do with political issues. Tom Watson took me aside and said "I am tired of being his errand boy." Apparently Tom Watson was being asked to do things that in his role as ambassador and former head of IBM, he didn't think he should be asked to do. That was, as I say, just another people experience.

Q: Senator Percy later got crosswise and essentially lost an election in Illinois because he got the Israeli lobby mad at him for supporting, I think it was AWACS or an aerial combat system that we were wanted to give the Israelis didn't want us to.

BROWN: I ran into him about ten years ago at Dumbarton Oaks and I can't remember what the occasion was. The then Maryland senator Sarbanes was there. I ended up at a table with Senator Percy. When I started the conversation, I am sure he thought it was one of these "do you remember?" things where you never remember. But as I described his visit with Tom Watson right away I had his attention. Yes, indeed. He remembered it very well and he was wondering if I could help him through the Freedom of Information Act to get the reporting cables on that visit. I had to tell him I was now retired from the Foreign Service. My luck with the Freedom of Information Act would not be any better than his would be. He definitely was still interested in that visit.

I have another category called interesting Russian people. I was not the cultural attaché; I was the press attaché. But I had a very genuine interest in cultural activities, people in the cultural world.

I am going to mention names of a few writers and playwrights whom I met because I was invited to a luncheon or dinner, perhaps at Spaso House or because I was attending a cultural event. I knew vaguely at the time these were prominent figures. But at the time, I did not know that I would be going back to Moscow in the late '80s and that these people would still be very high in the world of the arts, only ten years later they would be liberated. They would be able to do many things they were not able to do in 1980, '81.

These were poets like Andrei Voznesensky and Bella Akhmadulina. These were names that I was just getting introduced to at the time.

In the musical world I have an even longer list. Among those whom I haven't mentioned before was a man named Lev Markiz. He was a violinist, he is now a conductor in Amsterdam. He introduced us to a young pianist named Vladimir Feltsman. Feltsman is now an American, lives in the United States and even teaches at SUNY something or other. He came out in the late '80s.

We went to a concert by Sviatoslav Richter, the famous pianist. He had a reputation even in the Soviet Union for agreeing to do a performance and then not showing up at the last minute, begging off for health or other reasons. He didn't perform very much.

We did hear concerts by a wonderful husband wife team named Oleg Kagan and Natalia Gutman, a cellist and violinist. I will mention them again ten years later because they came back into my life.

I have mentioned violinist Vladimir Spivakov several times. Not only did we get to hear him play but we were part of his life in other ways. I helped Craig Whitney of The New York Times do an interview with Vladimir Spivakov. They met in our apartment and according to Craig, Spivakov was nervous. He began the interview by handing Craig a paper and saying "here are the questions and here are my answers." Craig explained that this was not exactly the way American correspondents operated and it all worked out satisfactorily.

Just recently, I ran into a fellow named Bruce Nelan, who was the Time magazine correspondent in Moscow thirty years ago, and his wife, Rose. We were reminiscing about those days. Rose asked, "Remember when you delivered the shock absorber to Volodya?" To tell the truth, I had forgotten but the question forced me to recall.

We had gone to a lunch or dinner with Spivakov and he lamented that he couldn't get a spare part for his car. I was able to get spare parts for his car, probably through Helsinki. I didn't have to beg or anything to get tickets for his concerts. It was a very symbiotic relationship. He could provide me with wonderful thrills on the violin and I could help him with a shock absorber for his car. I had completely forgotten it but Bruce and Rose remembered it.

The fact that they remembered it says something about the community we were then and about how personal lives were interwoven with our professional lives. Bruce Nelan was a Time correspondent; I was the press attaché at the embassy. We were supposed to have this very professional relationship and we did. But our personal lives overlapped a great deal.

With our friend, Yuri Zieman and his then four-year old daughter Vera, I took a walk through Novodevichy cemetery one winter day. Novodevichy cemetery was closed to the general public. The reason it was closed, I think, was there were just too many famous people there that might spark some sort of political activity. But Yuri's father was buried there so we got to go with him. After we visited Yuri's father's grave, we walked around and we saw the graves of some of the famous people there.

I went back about five years ago and managed to walk by the freshly dug graves of Rostropovich and Yeltsin so it is still a burial place for famous Russians.

On this particular day with Yuri, I noticed the headstone of Nikita Khrushchev. The sculptor or artist for the headstone is an American or a Russian-American named Ernst Neizvestny. A gentleman was there scraping ice and cleaning the area. I wondered and so I asked in Russian, "By chance, are you Sergei, the son of Nikita Khrushchev?" And yes, he was. We had a brief exchange in which I let him know that I was an American diplomat and that I appreciated the historical significance of his father. Today he lives, I think, in Princeton New Jersey.

Q: Is he the one married to Eisenhower's granddaughter?

BROWN: No, that is Roald Sagdeev, who was involved their space program. I don't know much about Sergei Khrushchev's situation today except that is quite normal to see and interact with him. But it was pretty unusual in 1980 to meet the son of Nikita Khrushchev. We had a little conversation, nothing substantive but enough to let him know that I was an American diplomat and that I recognized the role of his father.

Q: Did you feel, talking to people who had been there before that despite the fact the Soviet Union had been doing various nasty things, it sounds like things had loosened up an awful lot from the Stalin times.

BROWN: No question that things had loosened up since the Stalin era.

But people were still reluctant or nervous when they found out that you were an American diplomat. They were taken aback. We knew or encountered Russians who had children our children's age and when they found out we were American diplomats, we learned they were not going to be comfortable meeting with us.

But we had neighbors in a big housing block right across from where we lived whom we met through our dogs. The dogs were a way of having a conversation with people. Their name was Yegorushkin and they had kids. They often invited us over there. We would go over there and have cake and tea and a birthday party and that kind of thing.

On any given day, I would see something on television or file a protest to the foreign ministry or read something in Pravda that confirmed the image that everybody has of the Soviet Union. These were not stereotypes. This was one aspect of life in that state.

But the same day, you could meet somebody on a plane or train or while you were cross country skiing or walking around the neighborhood and have a personal conversation with them. They would be astounded. "You are an American diplomat and you guys are riding on the second class train between these two cities in the Far East?" That was the reaction that an embassy colleague and I heard on a train trip one time.

We did have a lot of that kind of conversation with what I call the ordinary neighbor, the man in the street and despite what anyone says, these were not all KGB set-ups. In fact, I don't think any of them were. Quite often they were just that, a onetime conversation.

In one case, the guy turned out to be a film producer named Sergei Aleksandrov. I met him on our plane ride to Dushanbe and realized he knew a lot about American film. I invited him to our apartment to see a film – I think it was "Casablanca" – and to my surprise, he accepted. After that, we saw each other from time to time, often at the Union of Cinematographers building. He helped me acquire some really nice Bukhara rugs and in return I gave him a few pairs of jeans.

Q: I think one of the things that gets forgotten is how often we used to have magazines and leave them on trains or even in your car with the windows open. You could distribute things very nicely.

BROWN: I did this often. It was my own little way of sticking my finger in the eye of the Soviets, the way you did when you left a copy of Newsweek or Time magazine somewhere. Anything that would make it a little more difficult for them to exercise total control over their population.

But it wasn't all fun and games. I was recalling some of the sensitive press issues that popped up during that period. I have forgotten the details but we had a lot of focus on an alleged biological weapons incident in the town of Sverdlovsk. Sverdlovsk was a closed city but some of the correspondents heard rumors of a biological weapons incident there. We spent a lot of time dealing with questions about it that frankly we couldn't answer.

Q: The Soviets had a very extensive biological weapons program and the problem about these things is they can get out of hand. There had been reports from time to time of areas sort of devastated. Anthrax

BROWN: Yes, anthrax was the issue. Anthrax was the word of the day at the time and it was not out of bounds, not out of plausible thinking, especially when you think of Chernobyl and similar incidents. The Soviets were tightlipped. There wasn't much we could offer; whether we knew more than we were letting on, I don't know. There is a good subject for a freedom of information inquiry.

When the Soviets did invade Afghanistan, Ambassador Watson's relationship to the press became more difficult. He was never really comfortable with the press but now he was going to be dealing with a very difficult subject. He went back to Washington. I recall that I was told to tell the press it was on "personal business." That made me uncomfortable because I knew it wasn't personal business and I didn't like being told basically to prevaricate. It certainly wasn't personal business.

Ambassador Watson did not have a comfortable relationship with Brzezinski. He was much closer to Cyrus Vance, who resigned, and to his successor, Edmund Muskie. I specifically recall an article in the newspapers that said according to sources in Washington, Ambassador Watson and his deputy, Mark Garrison were sending back "highly varnished reporting" from Moscow, i.e., they were not really being as tough as they should be in their reporting.

That quote came from Washington and probably from the Brzezinski staff. We were inundated with inquiries in Moscow. What kind of reporting are you doing? Of course, we didn't say what kind of reporting we were doing. It increased the tension and Ambassador Watson's discomfort level in dealing with the press. We may have had some of the background briefings but they were more notable by their absence than by having them.

During that period, we also had the issue of the American hostages in Tehran. Soviet reporting on it was highly tendentious and we were protesting their reporting. Our visitors would raise it with any Soviets they called upon. Congressman Solarz from New York raised it in his call on the editor of Pravda.

Q: Stephen Solarz.

BROWN: Steven Solarz. He called on the editor of Pravda, who was nothing but a mouthpiece for the Politburo. I think it was in that meeting we raised the issue of Soviet press coverage of the whole hostage issue.

There were also world news events that you couldn't help but be aware of and feel affected by. As I said last time, you didn't get them quite as instantaneously as on your iPhone today. We relied more on the AP ticker.

First of all, there was the failed rescue effort which had terribly depressing impact.

The Moscow Olympics, I mentioned last time, during the summer of 1980. We were not only boycotting them as a nation and our athletes boycotting, but those of us who were at the embassy were not allowed to go anywhere near the facilities. I remember standing on Lenin Hills and you could look down at the stadium. You could see the lights, you could hear the roar but we were not allowed to be even caught close to the facilities.

We had the election of President Reagan in 1980. On the exterior of the embassy building, we had display windows and there was room there for four or so big photo panels that we would change regularly. These might be an innocuous subject like agriculture in the United States or it might be some news event that we could brag about and the Russians would walk by and take a cursory look at them.

Right after the election, in fact the next day, we put up big panels of President-elect Reagan. We also had big panels that we never put up of re-elected President Carter. We got these panels from the Regional Program Office, RPO, in Vienna and we were ready for either contingency. The Russians didn't really quite understand that and they thought it amazing that one day after President Reagan was elected, we could have these panels up there already with pictures of him and his career.

For most of those exhibits, the Russians would walk by and they might glance. Somebody might stand there for a minute or two. If they did the militiaman would probably encourage them to keep on moving. But for these pictures of Reagan, people lined up three and four deep.

Q: Did you find that people were wondering, what the hell is this? This is a movie star coming out of the right wing? This had to be very disturbing to the Soviets.

BROWN: And they had heard a lot about his statements about the Soviet Union during the election campaign. Both at the man in the street level and at the top level, they indeed were wondering who this man was.

That's why they were so interested in talking to Senator Percy. Anybody who could tell them something about this relatively unknown movie actor, governor, anti-communist, they wanted to know.

The man in the street, the people walking along the sidewalk in front of the embassy lined up for several days three and four deep. The militia did not prevent them from doing so.

Did that have much impact on shaping Soviet thinking about Ronald Reagan? I am not sure that it did, no. But I did say last time if you wanted to get a message around Moscow, in fact around the country, you could put it in those windows. We didn't do that but you could have put it in those windows and just by conversation, telephone calls, news would travel.

If we had put up there, for example, Sakharov arrested, that news would have traveled real fast. We also would have received a sharp protest from the Soviets had we done that. We never used them for that purpose.

I mentioned the Pentecostals, some 10 or 12 refugees in the embassy. We gave them refuge there. The press corps would see them there when they came in to use the snack bar but it was understood they could not do interviews. Finally we did relent and one summer day, the press and particularly the TV correspondents were allowed to come in and film them, interview them, give some insight into the life they lived there in the embassy. They lived there for several years.

Other world news besides the election of President Reagan and the release of the hostages included President Reagan's shooting which I followed until the wee hours of the morning on the Voice of America. A few days later, we received a tape from Frankfurt with the famous visual of Hinckley firing at the president. And I recall the shooting of the Pope and finally the death of Alexei Kosygin, the head of government. We didn't realize at the time this was the first of multiple funerals that would take place on Red Square.

Q: At one point President Reagan was asked about his connection to the Soviets and he said, "Well, they keep dying on me."

BROWN: After Kosygin, there was Brezhnev and then Andropov and then Chernenko. There was a joke about somebody at the funeral for Chernenko who said to another "but you were here for the Brezhnev funeral and the Andropov funeral." And the second guy replied, "Yeah, I bought the subscription." That's the type of humor that the Soviets liked.

One little remembered event. 1981 was the 26th Congress of the Communist Party in the Soviet Union. For the rest of the world, it was not a great big news event but by then, Ambassador Watson had left and the chargé was Jack Matlock. Jack Matlock, whom I had first met when he was head of the Soviet desk, was back in Moscow for about six months as chargé before going to Czechoslovakia as ambassador.

He really lit a fire under a lot of sections of the embassy but in his heart Jack was a political officer. The political section was told to cover this party congress like wallpaper.

Q: Which party congress was this?

BROWN: 26th, the XXVI congress. I don't remember that much came about out of it. There weren't any major changes in personnel or whatever but I managed to get a press credential for the press center and there wasn't much coming out of the press center either but at least officials would go down there and brief. I probably shouldn't admit it but I felt a little one-upmanship with the political section. I had access to the press center and I could read record briefings by spokesman Zamyatin and others and come back with various impressions. The political section always had to come to me and ask to borrow my tape. It was friendly rivalry. I had some wonderful friends.

Edward Djerejian was either the political counselor or head of political internal. A lot of Matlock's pressure was on Ed Djerejian to do the reporting on the party congress. Ed heaved a sigh one day and said, "Every time I think I have done my last cable on this, Matlock comes to me with some new assignment regarding the party congress." No one would remember these events, they were pretty dull. But for Matlock, he would extract everything possible.

Q: Was it the tenth party congress or somewhere where Khrushchev made his very famous denunciation of Stalin?

BROWN: Exactly and I think that is one of the reasons people, Kremlin watchers, paid attention to party congresses. Who knows? Maybe this would produce a repeat of the famous Khrushchev denunciation. In this case, it didn't. It was just the same old faces, the same old verbiage, every newspaper reporting it exactly the same way. But Jack Matlock could see the difference between an adjective used in today's Pravda and the one used ten years ago and extract something from that. He was like his mentor, George Kennan, and he could put a lot of pressure on the political section to cover the party congress.

Another thing I continued to do, that I enjoyed doing right through the end of my first tour and despite all the bad relations, was to travel, sometimes with family, more often with colleagues. I mentioned we took multiple trips to Tbilisi, more than one trip to Kiev; despite the closing of our consulate, we could still go down there and observe. I've described my trip to Odessa and Lvov with Bob Ober. I went repeatedly to Central Asia.

I took a memorable trip with a colleague named Gerry Hamilton. Jerry was head of the commercial section and he and I were good friends. We had gone through language training together; we were played a lot of paddle tennis, either as partners or on opposite sides of the net. He was a genuinely good guy. One day in the summer of 1980, I took my wife and daughters to the airport and they flew to New York City. They went through eight time zones. They went across the ocean. They went from the capital of godless communism to the United States of America.

The next day, Gerry Hamilton and I went to a Moscow airport and we flew eight time zones the other way, east, and we were still in Russia. Eight time zones west and you went across an ocean to an entirely different world. But eight time zones east and you were still in Russia. We flew across Siberia to Khabarovsk. At least at first glance, life didn't seem much different in Khabarovsk, a Russian city. From there, we went by train to the port city of Nakhodka. If you were doing it these days, you could go to the American Consulate in Vladivostok but in 1980, Vladivostok was a closed city. The one place you could go on the Pacific Ocean was Nakhodka.

We took the train to Nakhodka and back to Vladivostok. My recollection is that one direction we were in first class and the other direction we were in very ordinary class and ended up with a couple of Russians who were dumbfounded to find two American diplomats wearing jeans, sharing the compartment with them.

There was an American in Nakhodka who was in business there, a most impressive guy, spoke Russian, probably in his 20s, early 30s. I don't know if there were other Americans there or not. You have to tip your hat to this guy, out there a long way from any of the comforts that we enjoyed. He arranged for us to take a boat ride around the harbor. Just amassing impressions that we could put into a cable when we came back.

On the way back, we stopped in Irkutsk and went out on a hot summer day to Lake Baikal, the Siberian lake that has more water in it than all the Great Lakes put together. People were out taking advantage of the good weather.

There was a story that on the other side of Lake Baikal, the Soviets had some sort of manufacturing plant that threatened to pollute the lake. It is probably still a concern these days. Where we were, it looked as pristine and clear as we had been told it would be.

That was a week-long trip.

With a colleague in the cultural section, Bill Thompson, I flew down to Baku which is not a beautiful city on the Caspian Sea. I recently traveled with a young woman, a visitor from Azerbaijan. She asked me about my memories of Baku? This was before she was born. I said I have two distinct memories. One was that as soon as you got off the airplane and drove into the city, you saw the oil wells and you smelled the oil and you felt it was terribly polluted. We stayed in a place called the Caravan Sarai which if it had had camels and people traveling the Silk Road, you wouldn't have been surprised. It seemed to be one of those watering holes.

Q: Sarai was a basically an inn on the Silk Road.

BROWN: That's what it was and the one in Baku had a certain charm. We were well treated and we took a drive around the city and looked down at the Caspian Sea. You could see the oil wells out there.

From there we went on to Tashkent and to Samarkand, one of my multiple trips to that part of the world.

Q: Were you able to test or look at Islam in the Soviet Union?

BROWN: One of the reasons we were going to Central Asia was that after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, there was a new instruction from Brzezinski that if anybody could go out there and do any kind of reporting, make any kind of observation, they wanted it. It didn't matter how ordinary or how mundane it seemed to be.

What we specifically looked for were soldiers or any indication that this was a jumping off spot for their operations in Afghanistan. Maybe go to a cemetery to see if there were recent burials and that kind of thing. But you couldn't go to Tashkent, Samarkand and Bukhara without being aware of Islam in the Soviet Union -- the beautiful mosques, madrassas, the schools. The Registan in Samarkand is one of the UNESCO protected sites in the world.

It was hard to tell how intensive it was and at that time I didn't associate a madrassa with the kind of education that can produce terrorists, radicals, that kind of thing. In fact, these struck me as a very gentle people, very easy going.

Q: There are madrassas and madrassas. The Soviets didn't let this get out of hand.

BROWN: No, no. At the time, there was no association with either internal terrorism or what has happened in Chechnya or in Dagestan in recent years.

Generally I would say you had the impression that people were pretty free to practice their Islam, perhaps freer than Russians in Moscow would have been to practice their Russian orthodox faith.

Another memorable trip was to what is now called Bishkek. It was Frunze then in Kyrgyzstan.

Q: I spent three weeks there, in Bishkek in the 1990s.

BROWN: I went in the spring with a colleague named Kent Brown. Moscow was still grimy. The snow had not fully melted and we arrived in Frunze, which was the name of a famous Soviet general during the civil war. We were there for the May 1, 1981, holiday. You could see snow in the mountains but it was beautiful. It was spring, gorgeous. I thought “my goodness. What a relief from Moscow.”

Then we saw the May 1st parade and it was as dull and drab as any May 1st parade. Carbon copy. Any republic you went to, these same pictures of the politburo members came through.

We went up into the mountains with a guide and had a chance to realize what quality of life there could be there.

Our next stop would be Ashkhabad, the capital of Turkmenistan. To get from Frunze to Ashkhabad, we flew on what was called an AN-24, maybe on a couple of planes. We flew from Frunze to Tashkent, we stopped in a little desert town called Mary and we ended up in Ashkhabad, an entire day on these three flights.

We went out the next day, a Sunday, to the market, a beautiful market full of fruits and vegetables but also jewelry and camels and all those things you associate with any of the ‘stans.’ People these days talk about the ‘stans’ in a somewhat mocking or disparaging way. Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan, Kazakhstan were wonderful, intriguing places to visit. We have embassies in all of them these days. I didn’t want to go there for a two or three year assignment but if you were living in Moscow when we were, it was a great change of pace.

I am repeating myself but we would get out into the city, observe the availability of produce, or fruits and vegetables, the markets, have conversations with people, some of whom wouldn’t respond, but others would. They were never big political discussions about your country and my country. They were just more about family and life. Those are some of the trips I took. I am indebted to my embassy colleagues who went along with me.

With my wife and daughter, we made multiple trips to places such as Leningrad, to Vladimir and Suzdal, the two historic church towns not far from Moscow.

On Russian Easter, 1981, we decided to visit a place called Yaroslavl. En route, we stopped in Old (Velikiy) Rostov (not to be confused with Rostov on the Don) and Pereslavl-Zalessky. I remember going on Saturday night to Easter services in the Feodorovskaya Church in Yaroslavl with my wife, my daughter and a friend of hers; we were in a large crowd and when we turned around, the kids seemed to have disappeared. We had to go back and indicate that I was a diplomat and that these children were with us; yes, they could come in.

In 2007, my wife and I went back to Russia as tourist and took a cruise from Moscow to St. Petersburg on the multiple waterways that connect the two cities. I had never realized how many different rivers, canals, lakes and whatever connect the two cities.

One of the stops we made was Yaroslavl and I explained to our guide that in 1980, I had attended Russian Easter services here and he was quite impressed. I recalled the name of the church, Feodorovskaya. He said that was one of only two churches that were open and functioning at the time. Easter services wherever you went to them, whether in Moscow or outside, were memorable experiences.

Selling our cars was the occasion for another unusual trip. We owned two Russian fiats, Zhigulis. At the end of your tour, you could sell them and you would sell them to third country diplomats so I sold my two cars, one to a Syrian and one to a Sudanese who came with cigar boxes full of rubles. The embassy accepted these rubles as if they had been acquired as the embassy acquired all of its currency, officially, at the official rate. It is all too complicated to explain except to say that the incentive was to sell your car, get these rubles and have the embassy could convert them into dollars for you at the official rate. I could get back everything I paid for my two cars.

The hitch was that the Soviets had imposed some new regulation which said I couldn't turn over these cars to these people in the Soviet Union. I had to do it outside the country. It was very complicated but I arranged with the Syrian and the Sudanese that they would meet us across the border in Kouvala, Finland -- at the first place the train stopped after it crossed the border. So on this particular Saturday, my wife and I in one car and one of our Foreign Service national employees, Viktor Aksyonov, in the other car headed off in our two Zhigulis. We drove to Leningrad where we had dinner with my colleague, Barbara Allen and took a boat ride on the Neva River. We overnighted there.

The next day, my wife and I drove the cars out of the country to the train station in Finland wondering whether we would find these guys and sure enough, they were there. They, of course, were wondering if we'd show up because I already had the rubles and there was nothing to guarantee we would show up with our cars but we did, right on time.

One had the appropriate license plates to put on the car so he could drive back in the Soviet Union as if he were arriving there for the first time. The other guy did not have the right kind of license plates and he was going to have some trouble, we thought. My wife and I went on by train to Helsinki and treated ourselves to a nice night in a hotel and a spa and a good dinner because we had completed our mission and we flew back to Moscow.

Our FSN saw us when we were back in Moscow and he was laughing. He said "oh, the next day in Leningrad I saw your two cars. They had made it across the border and were on their way back to Moscow with them." It was one of those complicated but rather delicious ways of living and doing business in Moscow. Less than a week later, my wife and daughters left for the States; their three years in Moscow had ended.

Let me recall another couple anecdotes that I think illustrate what life was like in what was an unusual environment, these three years in Moscow.

One day, April 6, 1981, I went off to the center part of Moscow. There was a hotel where you could buy airline tickets and I think that is what I was doing. I drove my own car, my Zhiguli, down there and of course, in those days you had no problem finding a place to park. I bought my airline tickets and I was on my way back to the embassy. I would go up the street, around the circle where the KGB headquarters were and back down the other side, on the same side as the big children's department store called Detsky Mir.

As I am driving down there, by myself, there is a black Chaika ahead of me. That is a Russian official vehicle. It's not the Zil, the especially long VIP vehicle, but it's for high officials, the one ahead of me. These Chaikas are probably more associated with KGB; they are kind of official vehicles they have up there.

All I can remember is hitting the brakes quickly to keep from hitting this Chaika. I would stop in time. But before I could do anything, I was struck from behind and pushed into the vehicle ahead of me. This is the middle of the day. Everybody is out walking the streets, there is great clatter. I get out and realize it is a four car accident. There is the Chaika ahead of me, then I am here and I am now sandwiched between another big Chaika behind me and a fourth Chaika which had caused this whole chain reaction

We stood there looking at each other and it wasn't too long -- because there are police posts on every corner -- that somebody comes up the street. There is a big crowd of gawkers. The three Chaikas were pulled over to the right hand side of the street in the direction in which we were all headed. My car could still be driven although it was bashed in the front and the back and the trunk had popped open. All the traffic on the street was stopped and I was told to do a U turn and pull up on the other side of the street, roughly where I had started when I came out of the hotel so I pulled my car over there. I think they wanted to isolate me from the official vehicles.

Once they got me over there, that was it. They were done with me. They didn't want to know anything. My trunk had popped open. We talked before about America magazine the monthly magazine that we were allowed to sell in the Soviet Union. We kept selling it after the invasion of Afghanistan but the Soviets would say, "Well, we didn't sell very many copies this month. Relations are bad." They never explained; they simply returned the "unsold copies." You'd have 20,000 returned copies that went unsold so we had plenty of magazines to carry around and I always carried boxes of them in the trunk of my car. I could give them away to a gas station attendant or to anyone with whom I wanted to curry favor.

So my trunk popped open. The license plate, DO-4 told everybody I am a diplomat and a lot of people knew that 04 was the American Embassy. Nobody cared anything about my plight, my car. They started asking me personal questions and wondered if they could have a copy of America magazine. I gave a couple of people a copy of America magazine and asked them if they might watch my car while I went down the street to a phone booth with the kopeks I always carried with me and called the embassy to say I need some help.

I called the GSO and I remember hearing someone say "Well, he speaks Russian," meaning I could take care of it myself. But a good fellow named Jim Van Laningham drove over and provided me some much needed assistance as I was able to drive the car back to the embassy.

We insured the car through Ingostrakh so I did the paperwork and turned the car over to them. I didn't have a replacement vehicle and we were down to one car and that was pretty awkward but the damaged car came back to me weeks later looking like new; it had a fresh coat of paint, functioning well enough that I was able to sell it but I will never forget feeling pretty exposed and helpless. Not helpless but exposed out there in the middle of Moscow.

Q: Did any of those officials in those cars sort of point at you and try to BROWN: No, I don't think anyone implied that I was the guilty party. It was pretty clear what had happened. Number four car had hit number three. I was number two and was pushed into number one. I hit the brakes and was not going to hit number one car until I got hit from behind. It was just a four-car accident. No, I didn't have any more official contact other than the insurance claim. The police simply wanted to isolate me from the Chaikas. I don't recall that I filed a report with police or anything like that.

Here's another story about airline tickets:

In 1979 or 1980, someone had discovered that in London, you could purchase Aeroflot tickets that would be written London to Moscow and then Moscow to anywhere in South Asia -- India, Pakistan, Sri Lanka -- with two more coupons coming back for a very reasonable price. I wish I knew now what the price was but if you used hard currency, you could get these tickets in London. It was a way for Aeroflot to get business from South Asians living in the UK, Indians and Pakistanis who wanted to go home and not spend a lot of money.

Someone discovered that we too, living in Moscow, could purchase these tickets. You found somebody, a friend, in London who would purchase the tickets and send them to you. But instead of starting your trip in London, you could begin your trip in Moscow. So the four of us and the five-member David Willis family (David Willis, the correspondent for the Christian Science Monitor, had two daughters roughly the ages of our daughters and a son) went to the airport on a February morning in 1980 and flew for many hours non-stop from Moscow to Colombo, Sri Lanka. We flew over Iran. The hostages were there. I remember the pilot saying something about "if you look out the window you can see American war ships in the Persian Gulf." I think everybody went over to the right side of that plane and looked out the window.

It was a very comfortable flight. I wish I could fly that comfortably transatlantic or whatever these days. Good food and everything, a lot of Russians going down there for vacation, I guess. We had a wonderful two week vacation. Details elsewhere.

When we went to check in to fly back, we had our coupons; these were not electronic tickets, you had little paper coupons. When we said we were flying only to Moscow, the people said, "Oh, you need a visa for Moscow." We showed in our passports that we had visas for Moscow. And we flew back.

We still had coupons one and four. I didn't get to take advantage of it but a few weeks later, my wife and daughters used coupon number four to fly Moscow to London and number one to fly London back to Moscow. So for a very reasonable price, we had two holiday trips out of Moscow, albeit on Aeroflot; one to Sri Lanka, a two-week vacation there and one to London.

The David Willis' were Christian Scientists and they did not take any medicines, no malaria prevention medicines or whatever. We did, we took some precautions. Nevertheless, when we went there, our younger daughter got a little sick and was running a fever. She lamented "when I grow up, I want to be a Christian Science Monitor" so she wouldn't have to take pills and medicine.

David Willis wrote a piece for the Christian Science Monitor about that trip, somehow relating it to life in the Soviet Union. It was a humorous piece contrasting the world he left and the world he found, this so called third world country. He remarked that he could have written deep analyses of a party congress or changes in the politburo and never received a tenth of the reaction he got with that human interest piece on travel and contrasting a super power with a third world country. He got a lot of reactions to that story.

Another thing I remember about the trip to Sri Lanka is that when we got back, an Embassy driver picked us up with astounding news. I am sure he was unhappy himself but he had to share with us news of the great American victory at the Lake Placid Olympics over the Soviet hockey team. He didn't call it great; he just reported that the Americans had won. He couldn't believe it.

Q: It was hockey.

BROWN: And another memorable story.

A year later, it was school vacation time and our older daughter was in school back in the States so my wife and younger daughter and I decided we would go to Berlin. We had friends there who had invited us to stay with them and on the way back, we would stop and see some friends in Warsaw. It would be about a week long trip. On Saturday evening, February 14, 1981, we headed to the train station with our suitcases and our cooler with food and Christine's school books. My wife writes letters so she had her address book and cards and everything else.

Our train as called the East-West Express, leaving at 8:09 pm. We traveled all night and arrived in Warsaw in the middle of the next day. We stepped off the train because we knew we had an hour and a half and needed to stretch our legs a bit. My wife said she was going to go call our friends and let them know, reaffirm we would be back on such and such a day.

Off she goes while my daughter and I wait on the platform. Our train actually pulled out of the station but it soon returned. My wife hadn't been gone for more than a few minutes when I hear a whooshing sound, steam being released. A little red sign turns to green and a man on the platform says, "Get on, we are leaving."

I don't remember what language he spoke but the message was very clear. All I knew was that we had suitcases, coolers of food and all the other things we had taken with us up there in our compartment. I could not get all that stuff off the train. I had no choice. I said to my daughter, "We have to go" and she is in tears and I am in tears inside and we get on the train and off we go, leaving my wife there making a phone call. But she did not have her passport, she didn't have her money. She had virtually nothing except her wits, her common sense.

When we recount this story, this is the point where we begin to tell her version and my version. Soon after we left Warsaw, I began to figure out what had happened, that the train had been split in two with one part going to London and the other to Paris but both going via Berlin. I concluded that Bobbi would figure this out and decide to get on the second train.

So in Poznan, I explained to an official what had happened and left a written message saying “Bobbi, we miss you and love you.” I enclosed some money, 200 zlotys. And at the border, I left her passport. I left her passport in the hands of border officials saying I think she is on the next train. Off we go, my daughter and I, to Berlin. We are met by our friend Paul Smith who welcomes us to Berlin. I say Paul, “it’s good to be here but I think we have to wait a few minutes because I left Bobbi on the platform in Warsaw.”

Remember this is 1981. It is the period of solidarnost, martial law and everything else in Poland. Bobbi comes back, realizes that something is amiss. She gets on the train and goes to “our” compartment but I am not there and it is not the compartment she remembered. But the conductor insists that she remain on the train and off she heads. At one point, she was entertained in the restaurant car by some drunken Polish “gentlemen” who wanted to buy her food.

She gets to Poznan and somebody gets on and gives her this envelope that says “we love you, we miss you.” When she gets to the border, someone comes on shouting, “Roberta Brown, Roberta Brown.” These drunken Poles had already opened the windows calling the same name. The border official comes on and gives her her passport.

It was a long, nervous afternoon. It is a good six hours or so from Warsaw to Berlin on the train. So when the second half of our train reached Berlin and Bobbi was on it, Christine and I breathed a great sigh of relief. Needless to say, the story has been told many times. And Bobbi actually wrote an extended version.

Thinking about those years in Moscow, I have a category I call fabric of life. It was those institutions, those places that were part of your personal life in Moscow. They meant so much. As Americans, we were the embassy community, the 25 or so journalists and their families, a few business people and that was about it.

Among the institutions that kept up our morale and in which we were constantly involved was paddle tennis. I think it was Ambassador Stoessel who put in a paddle tennis court behind Spaso House, the ambassador’s residence. You played in an enclosed, caged area, a miniature tennis court. It was usually played doubles.

Ambassador Toon loved the game and I and others would frequently get a call from his secretary saying the ambassador was looking for somebody to play tennis during lunch hour. I accepted many of those invitations.

Then when Ambassador Stoessel went to Warsaw, he installed a paddle tennis court there. Paddle tennis was thus very popular among the staff in both American Embassy Moscow and American Embassy Warsaw, so much so that we had annual competitions. The first two years we were in Moscow, we went en masse by train to Warsaw and played a paddle tennis tournament there over the course of two days. People at the embassy hosted us and not only to play paddle tennis; we went out to dinner in the evening. It was a wonderful morale builder.

The second year, we should be hosting the people from Warsaw but because of the Olympics boycott, the thinking was “you certainly can’t have the paddle tennis tournament here in Moscow” so for a second year running, we went en masse, probably 40 or 50 people, to Warsaw for another tournament, hosted by our American friends.

So you see that even an institution such as paddle tennis could get caught up in international politics!

The third year, 1981, we played host. I am sad to say we were such gracious hosts that unlike the previous two years, we lost badly. By now Jack Matlock, Chargé Matlock, was there. He wasn’t much of a paddle tennis player but his wife played. We had a great dinner at Spaso House but I was really hung out to dry as the person who had put together all the pairings and whatever and had allowed Moscow the indignity of losing the paddle tennis tournament.

Another phenomenon; broom ball. Broom ball was played among the various embassies. They would take a regular tennis court, put water on it and in the winter, it would become like a hockey rink, except instead of a hockey puck and sticks you used brooms. I never played it. It could be violent. The Finns and some of the other north Europeans took the game very, very seriously. It was fun to watch broomball.

Cross country skiing. You could go many places in the woods around Moscow and cross country ski. I can remember more than one occasion skiing on my very nice skis purchased, probably in Finland, and in the other direction would come a Russian on his homemade wooden skis. He might well be bare-chested, a big burly guy. They loved their cross country skiing. It was another little way to interact with Russians.

Ambassador Watson also felt that to maintain our balance, I forget the details but you should take half a day or part of a day per week and get out of the office, just do something recreational or non-office related. On one particular day, he invited me to go down to a place called Serebryanny Bor to go cross country skiing. He wasn’t too adept on skis but give him credit, he was out there trying. We were on this partially frozen river and all of a sudden we heard crack.

Tom Watson said in so many words, “let me go ahead. I am older than you are. If somebody is going to go through the ice, let it be me.” Well, he went a little bit farther and we heard another crack. We turned around and got off that ice pretty fast. We were not where we should be on cross country skis.

The Anglo American Canadian School enrolled most of the English-speaking kids, not only British, American and Canadian but kids from Greece, India and Nigeria. It was a wonderful institution.

Q: How old were your kids?

BROWN: When we went in 1978, Christine was 10 and Sarah was almost 12, a real good age. They were old enough that they didn't need babysitting but they weren't teenagers. Christine did three years of school there. Sarah did two years, 7th and 8th grades. Because there really wasn't anything beyond 8th grade, we took her back to the United States and put her in a boarding school during our third and last year in Moscow.

Q: Where?

BROWN: Westtown Friends School, a Quaker school outside Philadelphia where her mother had gone to school and where her Uncle Tom was by then headmaster. That was a mixed blessing, she always told us. It was comforting to us to know that Tom was there and could be available but when Tom discovered that his niece had been drinking alcohol one night and had to send her up the road to her grandparents, it was an awkward situation. Sarah missed the last of our three years in Moscow; she was back in the States at Westtown Friends School.

One of the most memorable Moscow experiences was Christmas, 1980, when Sarah came out with her grandparents, my wife's parents; they were there for ten days. We did everything. Her parents experienced everything from the Bolshoi to Leningrad to meeting our refusenik friends and four-year old Vera singing Christmas songs. It was one of the highlights.

The American dacha at Zavidovo, an hour's drive was a large compound with the big dacha and the ambassador's dacha. The big dacha was available for embassy personnel on a rotating basis.

We concluded our three years in Moscow hosting a big reception out there for the press corps. We used one of the embassy's two Italian-born cooks to fix a wonderful meal and the journalists and their families. I think 80 or so came out. It was a great afternoon. It was because of events like this that 30 years later, you can meet one of the people from that era and you don't have to reintroduce yourself. You knew each other, you knew their children. You had had common experiences together.

In addition to the school and the dacha, you had Spaso House, which was used not only by the ambassador for formal activities but also for community activities such as plays. There were always people with thespian talents who could do a show. One year they did a very capable presentation of "Our Town." One of the lead roles was played by the NBC correspondent, Gene Pell.

A few weeks later, when Gene Pell was getting ready to leave, the correspondents organized a roast. They put on a play and called it "Nash Gorod," literally "Our Town" in Russian. It was a parody of Gene Pell who had a wonderful voice, a big deep bass voice, the kind you would want for a TV correspondent. Everyone howled with laughter. Gene went on to head Radio Free Europe, Radio Liberty.

Spaso House was also used for everything from the annual Marine Corps Ball to church services. In the 1930s agreement that established formal diplomatic relations between the U.S. and the former Soviet Union, it was agreed that the United States would be allowed to have a Protestant minister and a Catholic priest in Moscow. Those positions were filled by the respective denominations back in the U.S. The Catholics met in the snack bar -- "Our Lady of the French Fry was just one of the monikers -- and the Protestants went back and forth between Spaso House and the British Embassy. We pretty regularly attended the Protestant service.

You would never live in Moscow without remembering, usually in the spring, that the Russians had to clean out the pipes that delivered hot water. So you would go for up to a month in your apartment with no hot water; you'd forget how much you appreciated hot water, especially if you had two young daughters. At Spaso House, at the paddle tennis court, there was a little facility where you could take a warm shower. But it's no exaggeration; for four to six weeks you'd get along without any hot water for dishes, bathing, that kind of thing, except for what you might boil.

Mail day: When I hear the U.S. Postal Service might suspend Saturday deliveries, I think back to the time when mail came once a week with all the diplomatic pouches from Helsinki. You'd get 80, 90 pouches at a time. I don't think there was any other place in the world where American journalists were allowed to use the diplomatic pouch that way. They got their personal mail through the pouch. They couldn't get it directly. We had to sort it and make sure it was only letter mail. It couldn't be personal packages. We received all the journalists' mail. It could be official stuff, things they would use on the job, magazines, that kind of thing. Mail day was always a big event in the courtyard of the embassy.

We had a dog, a wonderful cocker spaniel named Tar that came into our family in 1970 in Algeria and lived with us for two years in Algeria, for five years back in the States and was now in an apartment building in Moscow. That dog introduced us to a lot of visitors. We'd take her out for a walk at night and meet people through the dog.

To get to school, our kids had to cross a busy, multi-lane road, Leninsky Prospekt. It was at least a six-lane highway with maybe a divider in the middle. I guess I should thank my lucky stars we never had any problem. One day, my wife walked over there with the dog, turned around and there was no dog. I got home to learn that Tar, our dog was missing. We were just terribly depressed. What in the world could have happened? We knew the dog had not been struck by a vehicle. So we went to our Russian friends, Yuri and Tanya Zieman, who lived not far away. They knew and loved Tar and Yuri put up little "dog missing" signs on trees.

Late that night, a couple of girls came to their door and said they thought they had seen the dog. We now think what happened was these girls had seen the dog and taken her into their apartment. The next day I went to the pet market to see whether our dog had been kidnapped and was now for sale down there. My wife went somewhere else to look, checked at home, and talked to our daughter. What a relief; the dog had shown up at the front door of the building to be greeted with open arms by none other than our militia man. The militia man was down there to 'protect' us and keep Soviets out of our building but he knew our plight and he was as happy as we were to see our dog show up. We think the dog had spent the night with these two girls and the next day they had let her out and sent her home. All we know was she was tired and muddy. We were so relieved.

I got into Soviet stamps. There was a bookstore (Dom Knigi) not far from the embassy where you could purchase stamps and they produced some political but quite pretty stamps. One of my retirement projects is to go to that shelf in my house and sort through the stamps. I've got a pretty complete collection for the late '70s and early '80s.

Those are some of the fabric of life things in Moscow.

I will conclude by mentioning the other thing that really changed life.

I have spoken frequently about our good friend Tom Watson. We had gotten to know him on a personal basis up in Maine before he came to Moscow and treated us wonderfully. It was tense because his general discomfort talking to the press was made all the more difficult by the political situation. Even so, when my parents-in-law came, he arranged a special dinner for us and them on the second floor living quarters of Spaso House.

I went up to see him one day in late 1980 and he had a paper on his desk. I realized what he was looking at were the design plans for his new boat. He had many yachts during his life and he was very excited about his new yacht and that was what he was looking at. He wanted to sail it around the world. He said something to me like "there's nothing to do here." That was pretty much the case; we didn't have anything going on with the Soviets that he could put his imprint on.

He left in early 1981 to be replaced by Jack F. Matlock, whom I had gotten to know when he was head of the Soviet desk. Jack came back to Moscow for six months. He put his imprint on things. Boy, did he light a fire under everybody.

He did not live at Spaso House, as I recall, but he used Spaso House for all sorts of representational activities. I asked him at one point if he would be willing to do press briefings and he was right into that. He was very comfortable with the press.

One night, at my suggestion, he hosted a dinner at Spaso House for foreign correspondents -- West European, Japanese and others. It was an amazing social gathering. First of all, it was a Spaso House event. A lot of these correspondents had not been to Spaso House or had been there only a few times. They loved being invited with their spouses. A beautiful meal and at the end, Jack answered questions. He did so, on background, but he did so with such confidence and such knowledge of the subject that we were there until late in the evening. The man, one of the most difficult persons I have ever worked for, a tough guy to work for but such a professional. This was 1981.

Q: Can you characterize his mood towards the Soviet Union. It was a difficult period. Did you have this gerontocracy or whatever you want to call it in the politburo? It wasn't very dynamic.

BROWN: That's a very fair question and I think I can say very fairly that Jack Matlock's attitude towards the Soviet Union, the political Soviet Union, reflected very closely the attitude of the United States government and President Reagan. He was not in any way sympathetic to this evil empire. He abhorred the system and its leadership and the way it manifested itself. He was dead set against what it stood for.

At the same time, long before he became a political officer, he was into Russian literature. He learned Russian at an early age. These people I mentioned earlier, people like Voznesensky and Akhmadulina, he knew who these people were. He knew of their intellectual accomplishments and potential. That was the other part of the world that he cultivated. We had poetry readings at Spaso. He was able to make that distinction.

Jack Matlock was a combination of knowledge and confidence and that's why he was so comfortable dealing with the press.

Walter Cronkite was in Moscow that spring to do some sort of documentary on the Soviet Union. I was chatting with him; my wife was driving Mrs. Cronkite from the embassy over to Spaso House and that kind of thing. You knew that Jack Matlock wanted to accept Cronkite's request to do an interview but he got a turndown from State Department, from Assistant Secretary Stoessel saying no, don't do it.

About a day later, Jack called me up to his office and showed me a memo that said you can do it if you recognize the obvious pitfalls. I can remember to this day Jack Matlock's face. He was pleased. I didn't see all the correspondence but I think he must have gone back and protested a little bit because he had been told it was too risky. He was willing to take that risk and I can remember him sitting on a bench in the circle in front of Spaso House being interviewed by Walter Cronkite.

I wish I could see what was actually used but it was an example of Jack Matlock's determination and his feeling that the press was not to be feared.

Q: Just to get a feel for the time and the operation, what were the obvious pitfalls?

BROWN: The obvious pitfalls. You think of Senator Percy going out there and going far beyond what the Reagan administration wanted to him to say. And Percy wasn't part of the administration. Jack Matlock was part of the administration. For anyone in the State Department, it is easier to say no rather than to say yes. It is the old argument, what do you have to gain from it? Not much. What do you have to lose if you say something that is misinterpreted or just flat out wrong, that opens up Pandora's Box.

I don't know that Jack Matlock ever really got himself in hot water with the press.

Q: What was your impression of the Soviet Union? One always thinks of I saw the future and it works?

BROWN: I was never under any illusion. The idea, and I attribute some of this to the military world, that they were going to defeat us in war, not only defeat us in war but defeat us economically, was just ludicrous. All you had to do was to see how inept their economic system was, how it failed to function, how it failed to meet the needs of people to know that this was not true. We used to joke that as the West was moving into computers, the Soviets were leading the world in production of carbon paper. Their economic indicators were all in fields that people didn't pay any attention to anymore. I knew, we knew they were not going to outstrip us economically.

And of course, there was this idea that we were being monitored all the time, that they were collecting all this information on us and that the KGB had these great thick files. My feeling was the thicker the files the better because if they ever went to a great war against us and tried to find out something, they would be awash in useless information. I sometimes think that about our own services in this country these days. Sure, there are better ways now of filtering through all that information and listening for key words and that kind of stuff. But I don't think the Soviets had anything other than piles of useless information and unmonitored tapes, stuff that wasn't going to help them at all.

Q: Was anybody looking at the Soviet educational system? Here you have this Marxism. It is a huge field of how things worked and according to a certain viewpoint and yet time has proven, it didn't work very well. I would just think that a smart Russian would do anything he or she could to avoid getting too mired down in this academic world. Did you get any feel for that?

BROWN: Yes. You could sense from talking to people that they did not believe a lot of what they heard, not so much in their educational system but in the pseudo educational system which was the media, what they heard and read in the newspaper, watched on TV. They just couldn't hear this or that or see something on TV and then see reality and believe it.

Talking about the basic educational system, I don't know that anybody ever did studies but I felt and I think a lot of other people felt that you still got quality primary, secondary and university education in the Soviet Union in particular fields.

There weren't too many Westerners, Kevin Klose of the Washington Post was an exception, who sent their children to Russian schools but all three of Kevin's children went to Russian schools for several years and they got good educations in the three Rs and in foreign languages.

As we all know, the Soviets, in spite of everything, produced world class intellects in virtually every field, the sciences, mathematics, language, and the arts. I think their educational system was not the weak link. They did do a good job of educating their children.

Q: I have interviewed Beth Jones. She her father was an administrative officer. She later became ambassador to Kazakhstan and then became the assistant secretary for European affairs, a very major job. She was sent when her father was in Moscow to a Soviet school and went through this. Then he was assigned to Germany. She went to a German school. I think it was, I am not sure if it was East or West German but then she said she came out and went to I think it was Swarthmore or something and sort of on the first day of school one of the professors said, "Miss Jones, what do you think?" and nobody had ever asked her what do you think?

BROWN: Yes that's very true. Sometimes that comment is made not only about schools in Communist countries but even some other more liberal countries.

I assume that the other part of her observation was that she got a pretty good education. I think that Russian education was probably quite sound.

That was our three years in Moscow. It far exceeded our expectations. Initially, I thought it was going to be a two-year assignment. It turned out to be three. I don't think when we left in 1981 that we knew we would be going back to Moscow but we were headed off to what we thought would be a four-year assignment as press attaché in Paris.

JON GUNDERSEN
Press and Publications Officer
Moscow (1979-1981)

Mr. Gundersen was born and raised in New York and educated at George Washington University, the University of Oslo International School, Stanford University and the National War College. Entering the State Department in 1973, he served abroad in Moscow, Stockholm and Frankfurt. At Reykjavik and Tallinn he was Chargé d'affaires, in Oslo, Deputy Chief of Mission, and in Kiev, Consul General. In assignments at the State Department in Washington, Mr. Gundersen dealt with a variety of matters, including arms control, anti-terrorism and Balkan issues. Mr. Gundersen was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2012.

Q: When did you go to the Soviet Union?

GUNDERSEN: That would have been the summer of 1979.

Q: Okay, today is the 25th of April, 2012, with Jon Gundersen and we'll pick this up in 1979, in the Soviet Union. What were you doing in the Soviet Union then?

GUNDERSEN: I think the last thing we discussed was that I was assigned by the Soviet desk to Embassy Moscow. As part of that forward assignment I was sent to Stanford to study Soviet affairs, arms control.

So I spent '78-'79 at Stanford, got a master's in what was then known as Soviet studies, went to Moscow, where I was first assigned as PPO, or Press and Publications Officer, which was somewhat of a cover.

My main job was traveling around the Soviet Union, buying books and publications in the local language. The travel was funded by the CIA, because they read the literature. I was briefed by a guy named Murray Feshbach, who was very famous Sovietologist, because he was the first to focus on the demographic problems in the Soviet Union, alcoholism and abortions and declining birth rates. He used the literature that we collected in the regions, which were unavailable in Moscow, to discuss the possible political consequences of social and demographic problems.

One regional almanac I collected was something called Narodnoe Khozyaistva, which is sort of the "Peoples Almanac." Each nationality had their own and the statistics that came out of those, hospitalization and birthrates, for example, gave us a picture of the future of the Soviet Union, which was much more grim than the Soviet Union we knew in 1979.

Q: It still is today.

GUNDERSEN: Well, yes, that's when it began to dawn on some of us that the Soviet Union had a real long-term problem on its hands. That it was not the ascendant power I had referred to in an earlier discussion.. And that Marxism was a false god that offered nothing to the proletariat or common man.

Q: Well, could you talk a bit about that job?

GUNDERSEN: A lot of Soviet hands who later did quite well had the PPO job relatively junior officers. As I mentioned the main part of the job was traveling around the Soviet Union to the various republics, to collect literature but also report on nationality issues and do reports from those travels.

So I traveled to the Baltics, the Caucasus, to Central Asia, everywhere from Tallinn to Alma Ata to Tbilisi to Irkutsk. You really got a sense that you not get just reporting out of Moscow.

So I literally bought thousands of books. I had to travel with somebody, because those were the Embassy rules, correctly so, because oftentimes the KGB, who always tailed us would try to compromise you.

They tried to do that by sometimes having an attractive young girl "happen" to sit next to me on the plane (every other seat coincidentally had been taken). When we'd arrive, the girl would say, "Oh, we have a room reserved for you" and they had a special room for us at the hotel that was clearly bugged. Needless to say, I didn't take the bait. Even though I am a man I'm not that stupid.

Another time my travel companion was an attractive female American officer, married, and the clerk said, "Oh, we have only one room for you," I think this was in Baku, "just for the two of you," setting us up for a blackmail situation. Obviously we didn't do anything, but we thought it was pretty humorous.

So I didn't just collect books.

Q: I've talked to some people who've done this. Some of the bookstore managers loved you, because as far as they were concerned, their business was settling books, these were not particularly bestsellers.

GUNDERSEN: Exactly. We'd had a list of books and topics we got from Washington (actually the CIA) and we'd buy a number of copies of the book: these were often biographies about leaders like Brezhnev and local leaders, Books on Communist and Marxist doctrine or local almanacs. So, yes, the book store managers were happy to see us buy books no one else wanted to read..

Only certain Western books, like by Hemingway or Jack London or Faulkner, when available, would sell out immediately. Certain of these books were not censored because they were deemed anti-Capitalist. So we didn't buy those, we bought the ones that they had to display, Brezhnev's works, etc..

Q: I was in Yugoslavia for five years. There was a big bookstore there and I was told by one of our local employees, "Go look." There, in the cultural section, was George Orwell's Animal Farm, which was selling quite well.

GUNDERSEN: I did find "Animal Farm" in one book store, I think in Uzbekistan. Probably the local apparatchik was a little dense and figured this had to be a book about animal husband. In Moscow, the ideological minders rightly understood it was a parody on Soviet socialism. Probably Yugoslavia censors were more tolerant or less ideological at the time. So we went in and bought the books, lugged them back. Usually we went to Dom Knigi, which was the main bookstore, it means "House of Books," in each of the cities. So that was my first year job.

Q: What was your impression of the Soviet Union at that time? You went around beyond the capital. How did it strike you?

GUNDERSEN: Most anyone who went to the Soviet Union was struck by the fact that it was essentially a Third World country with a superpower image. They obviously had a very strong military, but most everything else didn't work. That impression was reinforced by going to and traveling around the provinces.

I think the second thing that struck me was that nationality, ethnicity issue was something that was real and despite what the Soviet Union said about the creation of the New Soviet Man and allegiance first to the state, that was not the fact.

I remember in Baku, in a bar, seeing a fight between an Armenian and an Azeri. You could hear that the dispute was clearly just ethnic, vituperative.

The Embassy didn't really report on nationalities, because from the Moscow perspective, the official line was it's not a real problem. The Embassy was reporting on more pressing issues like Afghanistan, arms control, Jewish emigration, and human rights and dissidents. But even the best-known dissidents, by the way, were very Russo-centric. And so the reporting that came out of Moscow, both by the embassy and by journalists, was about the same issues,, but very little about nationalities. Everyone was talking to the same officials an even dissidents like Solzhenitsyn and Sakharov, who were all ethnic Russians. In other words, regarding ethnic issues, they heard the same story: a communist Soviet Union or a greater democratic Russia would not breakup and dissolve into ethnic based units.

Q: You were there from when to when?

GUNDERSEN: '79 to '81.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

GUNDERSEN: First was Malcolm Toon. He was an old Soviet hand, a career guy, and then we had a Chargé, Jack Matlock, who became ambassador later. Matlock was followed by Tom Watson, who was the CEO of IBM.

Toon was solid. Like most diplomats who served in Moscow for an extended period of time, Toon had no illusions about the Soviet Union. Moscow's one of those places, the longer you're there, the more skeptical you become.

In many countries, they accuse Foreign Service Officers of becoming overly protective of their host governments. In other words, they are infected by "clientitis" and of carrying their country's water in Washington. They don't accuse Foreign Service people who go to Moscow of that.

Toon was tough and knowledgeable., Matlock had majored in Russian and knew the country inside out. Watson was put there in the later part of the Carter years. It was a short period characterized by a window of optimism about U.S.-Soviet relations. Both sides wanted to sign a SALT II Treaty and to increase trade. Watson wanted to increase business contacts as well.

But when the Soviets invaded Afghanistan before Christmas '79 we considered what to do and how do we react. Watson didn't want to react too strongly, because he felt that it would hurt American business.

Most of us at a more junior level said, "This is such a transgression of basic international law and that the world, including the Muslim world, expected us to react strongly, and that we needed to do so. So there was tension in the embassy at the time.

Q: As you got there, what were the people who were reporting talking about Brezhnev and company? He was getting pretty old by this time.

GUNDERSEN: Yes, part of our job was to try to decipher what was from happening. It was hard to do, because we didn't know much about the inner workings of the Kremlin. but we were constantly trying to read the tea leaves..

I remember we had a visit of Daniel Boorstin, who was the Librarian of Congress. I was his control officer. I traveled with him and he met with the Minister of Culture, Madame Furtseva, who was female, the only one in the Soviet leadership. During the meeting, we found out in his conversation that she had not been invited to a Politburo meeting, where one of the subjects was Afghanistan. This was a month before the invasion. We speculated on why she had not and thought that perhaps subject matter was too sensitive. Unfortunately, we did not speculate that they were planning an invasion.

And that's the type of information we didn't normally get. So those are the type of things you try to find out.

And, yes, Brezhnev, he lived another three years or so, was not as in command as he had been. We were constantly trying to figure out who was up and who was down. You always looked within the Politburo, who got more space in Pravda, who was on Brezhnev's right on the saluting plenum atop Lenin's Tomb at the May Day or October Revolution parades, these type of things. You have to understand that this was the height of the Cold War and that this was the focus of American foreign policy, so we had a sense that our cables were actually read at the highest level in Washington.

Q: At the time of the invasion of Afghanistan, was there any consensus about why the hell they did it? It may have been a different type of communist government that was overthrown by Soviet troops, but it was a communist government and here the Soviets invaded.

GUNDERSEN: Well, there was much discussion. Interpretations ranged from the most dire, that the Russians were looking to expand their influence and Empire all the way through Iran and Pakistan to get warm water ports, to, "Well, it was just reactive, the communist president in power was not popular, so they wanted to get their communist guy in there." And this episode should not disrupt our bilateral relations.

Even in retrospect, it's hard to know exactly why they did it. I think we now realize that the Kremlin didn't think it would be as costly as it turned out to be, both politically or economically or certainly in terms of the survival of the system. Of course, Brezhnev and the Politburo expected a certain amount of Western condemnation, but that storm would soon pass and they would quickly suppress the rebellion as they had in Budapest and Prague. They had most recently also been able to intervene through Cuban proxies in Africa without real Western counter-actions. Sure, there would be some Western protests, but these would soon disappear.

They thought they could control the populace, the mujahideen, etc and they obviously could not. But, at the time, given their experience, they thought they could put in their own puppet and withdraw quickly. Obviously, they had not read Afghan history.

Q: On these trips you made to various places, were you able to get into any meaningful discussions with the people you'd meet?

GUNDERSEN: Not as much as I would have liked, because we always had a KGB tail. The local KGB was told that two Americans would be in their bailiwick and to follow them. Some regional KGB types were more sophisticated than others.

I remember, I think it was in Baku, that they followed us like Keystone Kops, ten feet behind, and when we turned around they would look up and point their cameras up and we would jump on buses and jump off, just to lose our tails just to piss them off.

Most of the people we met had never seen a Westerner and they were a little suspicious. But we did get into conversations, especially if you're in a place where they have a drink or two. That was always interesting reporting.

Q: When we put on all sorts of sanctions on the Soviets after the '79 invasion of Afghanistan. Were there counterdemonstrations in Moscow?

GUNDERSEN: Not really. I can think of one or two, but we always used to joke the word would go out that at 1400 there will be a spontaneous demonstration at the American Embassy.

It was all controlled. I don't think they wanted to have real mass demonstrations. And I never felt any sense of danger, or anything like that.

The Soviets wanted to play down Afghanistan and if they played up the Western reaction to it, it brought attention to Afghanistan. 'After all, they were sending Russian and other kids there to die and they knew it. When they had burials of war dead they never publicized it, they never brought all of the casualties to one hospital or one region. They were very careful not to shed any light on the casualties of war.

Q: I'm told that there was some visiting of graveyards and all that? Did you get involved in that?

GUNDERSEN: Yes, not so much related to Afghanistan, because those casualties did not begin to pile up until '82-'83-'84. I did visit graveyards just out of historical interest, because they give a sense of who had power by where they were buried.

We visited Pasternak's grave, for example, to see who was visiting. It's right outside of Moscow.

We went to a funeral of Visotsky, a mildly anti-regime pop singer. It was not publicized but we heard about it through the dissident grapevine. There were tens of thousands in attendance who spontaneously showed up crying and weeping. And that showed he was listened to. And that's the sort of reporting we'd do that was a little outside the normal reporting.

I should mention I also ran the Russian language program at the Embassy. The Russian teachers were assigned to us by the so-called Soviet Protocol Department (UPDK), who were a branch of the KGB. I got to know a lot of the Russian teachers, even though they reported to the KGB, as fellow human beings.

I remember attending the funeral of the husband of one of the teachers. It was a very Russian event and there was a lot of drinking and crying and laughing.

So I actually got to go to a lot of Russian homes, much more than the rest of the officers. I also knew some dissidents, artists. I showed old American films at my apartment. We received some first rate American films that the Soviets allowed us to show. They couldn't stop us from showing them; often times the Russian teachers attended.

I remember we watched The Deer Hunter, which was a very good movie about Vietnam. It was set in a Western Pennsylvania steel mill town populated by ethnic Russians. My Russian guests loved seeing the old babushkas yelling at the young kids about to be sent to Vietnam. So they really found that powerful, because it was just at a time when their own adventure in Afghanistan was unfolding and their sons were being sent there.

I remember we showed Kramer Versus Kramer, which the Soviets had no problem with, because it showed American divorce and some of the bad aspects of American society.

But all the Russians who saw it were most interested in the kitchens of the middle class. I would show a movie, then we'd talk about it afterwards.

Q: Were you there during the hostage crisis in Iran?

GUNDERSEN: Yes, not when the Teheran embassy was overrun in 1978, but I was there as the situation unfolded.

Q: How was that playing at the time, or was there much interest in it?

GUNDERSEN: Well, there was interest, but the Soviets were very careful. They actually reported the story fairly straight, because they had an interest in protecting their own diplomats. So they just reported that the UN and others were trying to get the hostages out. It was actually unusual to hear such unbiased reporting.

Q: Did the KGB give you a problem there, in Moscow?

GUNDERSEN: They had a KGB guy assigned to me. He would periodically call me to get together. And the funny thing is the KGB had probably the most sophisticated, best training in English and American culture as this guy had. I joked with him about it, that he had learned his English by reading Raymond Chandler novels or by seeing old movies, film noir and Humphrey Bogart.

So he'd always call and say, "Hey, Jon, how ya doin'?" Hey, pal, it's a swell day, ain't it, buddy?" He'd use this sort of slang from that time.

I was a single guy, I was fairly adventurous, I thought of it as a game. We'd try to avoid a tail and when I would hear the phone click, I'd yell at them in Russian, "How the hell can you live your life listening to somebody else?"

Whenever they wanted to show us that they didn't like that they'd pull the plug on our refrigerator or slash our tires, things like that. But nothing more serious.

Q: Did you have to do with other embassies there?

GUNDERSEN: Yes. My second year one of my responsibilities was to handle the upcoming Olympics in Moscow in '80. So initially the job was to be the control officer for Congressional and other delegations.

But when we decided to boycott the Olympics as a punishment for the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, my job changed drastically. We now worked with NATO and other countries to try to get other countries to support the boycott. So we met at least every other week to find out what each country was doing and report back to Washington with recommendations.

Q: The Olympics occurred while you were there?

GUNDERSEN: Right.

Q: I'm told that embassy officers were told to keep away from the Olympics.

GUNDERSEN: Yes. That was U.S. policy. But I loved sports, especially the Olympics and as the control officer I would have gotten to go all these events. Obviously, if you're boycotting an American representative can't show up. So, yeah, I was disappointed, but I understood the policy. Although I must admit I had mixed feelings about the boycott.

But I did have a lot of contacts with other embassies. For one thing, you couldn't fraternize with Soviets, so your potential social circle was limited, but there were journalists and others who were there, so you did have a social life. My girl friend at the time, for example, was a young Dutch diplomat. She's now the Dutch ambassador in Washington here.

Q: Did you feel that you wanted to become a real Soviet hand, or not?

GUNDERSEN: I think so, yeah, I found it fascinating. You're happy to leave, just because it's so restrictive, but I always felt I would come back at some point and I always followed Soviet affairs, even when I was not working in the area.

Q: You left there in '81?

GUNDERSEN: '81, yes.

ROBERT B. HOUSTON
Science Counselor

Robert B. Houston was born in Missouri in 1923. He received a bachelor's degree from Harvard University and a master's from Indiana University. He joined the Foreign Service Auxiliary in 1945. His career included positions in Ghana, Germany, Austria, the United Kingdom (Scotland), Poland, Bulgaria, Canada, Finland, and the Soviet Union. Mr. Houston was interviewed on May 14, 1990 by Horace G. Torbert.

HOUSTON: ... I took over as Science Counselor in Moscow in July, 1979. But five months after I arrived, the Soviets invaded Afghanistan. President Carter, as one method of retaliating, decided to stop all high level contacts under the exchange programs. The programs were the principle raison d'être, the principle source of activity for the science office in Moscow. We found ourselves with not much to do. The fall-off in exchange activity made it possible for me to engage in more reporting on scientific topics. I also carved out a niche for myself reporting on Soviet-Scandinavian relations, because of my service in Helsinki. I probably stepped on the people in the political section a bit. The Science Section was also given the job of controlling the embassy travel program. Travel is an important part of a mission in a Communist country, particularly in the Soviet Union where so much territory is off limits. You keep trying to get into places where people have not been into before just to see what is going on there. The travel program is normally run out of the political section. Since they had plenty to do in 1980, and we didn't, we took over the travel program. This made us become more involved in the political aspects of U.S.-Soviet relations.

Q: Did you have plenty of funding for internal travel?

HOUSTON: You never have enough money, but we had sufficient so that we could spend some of it on lower priority targets, or on travel by people who were not heads of sections. We could have spent more, surely, but Soviet secrecy not funding was the big problem. Our getting involved in the travel program was merely shifting the workload within the embassy, keeping track of travel, and planning it. Before things got too bad after Afghanistan, I did make one trip with one of our touring science delegations. This was a delegation of people investigating Soviet practices in restoring strip-mined land. We went to out-of-the-way places like the Siberian coal basins, Kemerovo, Karaganda, which also had a coal mining operation, and Alma Ata, a charming town in the Central Asian republic of Kazakhstan.

Q: These are very expensive tourist trips.

HOUSTON: Traveling with this delegation exposed me to a typical Soviet attempt to drink visitors under the table. I was not drunk under the table, not because I am a good drinker, but because I had sense enough to go to bed early. The head Soviet host claimed that he had an appointment and left before the drinking got serious. So I used the same excuse and left. The next morning we had a difficult time arousing one particular expert from the Bureau of Mines, who had stayed at the party until the bitter end. The Soviet practice is this: they outnumber you, as each person proposes a toast, the Soviets only drink to American toasts, not theirs. Also their liquor is drunk, vodka. I don't know why we don't do a better job briefing our exchange people so that they don't get caught the way one or two of our group did.

Q: learned that during World War II with Soviet purchasing missions.

HOUSTON: One of the first celebrations in Moscow after I arrived came when Ambassador Toon dug the first spade of dirt for the new chancery in Moscow. Since then, our construction of a new chancery has turned out to be a disastrous project. We will have to demolish the new chancery at great expense and start again. Andrei Gromyko gave Toon a farewell luncheon. V.V. Kuznetsov received the credentials of our new ambassador, ex-IBM board chairman Tom Watson, in November 1979. Gromyko gave Watson a farewell luncheon early in 1981. I attended all these functions.

Q: How was Watson as ambassador?

HOUSTON: Watson is a man who has had great interest in the Soviet Union since the mid-30s. He is the man who also thought that if you spend 30 years in the Foreign Service, you probably knew a great deal about diplomacy. So he relied heavily on the advice of his staff, although he wanted to overcome what he thought was an overdone anti-communism and skepticism of the Soviet Union on the part of the professionals. He basically considered his mission, the reason why he sought the job and took it, was to improve Soviet-U.S. relations sufficiently so that there never would be a nuclear exchange between the two countries. I must say the Soviets very badly timed their invasion of Afghanistan. Instead of profiting from the departure of hard-line Mac Toon and the presence of a guy willing to give them the benefit of the doubt, they went into Afghanistan. There was nothing Watson could do to carry out his own desires at the time. I think Afghanistan was a very great disappointment to Ambassador Watson, his desire to head off the nuclear confrontation. He could do nothing, because of circumstances. Later, I think he was the first foreigner to get permission to fly a private airplane across Siberia. He had been a pilot on a mission which flew from Alaska across Siberia to Moscow to open the Al-Sib route. The route was used to fly aircraft to the Russian front from Great Falls Montana through Alaska and across Siberia. He had been co-pilot of a plane flying back to the United States from this mission to Moscow. The plane just barely made it back to the town of Yakutsk in winter time when engine trouble developed. He was stuck in Yakutsk for ten days in 1942 while they tried to fix the aircraft. I know this story well. One of the things Watson wanted to do as ambassador was to go back to Yakutsk with his wife to show her what that area was like. He and his wife were good enough to ask my wife and me to accompany them on this trip. This was the first time I had been on an ambassadorial trip, getting all the extra attention that goes with that. Watson tried to meet some of the people whom he had known in 1942 in Yakutsk, particularly the General who had been in charge of the Soviet airlift at the time. There was still enough Soviet suspicion that they did not produce that man. Watson did see a museum director whom he had known 38 years before.

Q: Had IBM maintained an office in Moscow as they had in a number of Eastern European countries during the cold war?

HOUSTON: IBM had representation in Moscow when we were there, but I am not sure about its history. There had been an IBM in Bulgaria for years, and one in Hungary. I noticed the IBM office in Moscow got very busy when Watson was there. When Olive Watson's IBM typewriter broke, the IBM people in Moscow wanted to give her a brand new one, the latest. She insisted that they repair hers. They had to fly a guy in from the IBM factory, I guess, to fix the old machine, but they did just that.

Q: You talked about doing scientific reporting, how did you do that, weren't you forbidden to talk to people?

HOUSTON: No, I was not forbidden. The higher level people from the Government agencies back here were not allowed to contact my people over there. The embassy was never enjoined, even at the counselor level, from going out and talking to anybody they could find who were willing to talk to us.

Q: What sort of things were you able to report on?

HOUSTON: I must admit that most of my reporting came from reading the scientific literature we received at the Embassy, as well as from round-table meetings of science counselors once a month. I picked up at these meetings what other countries were doing in the science field who had not cut back because of Afghanistan. Also there were ongoing U.S. projects. One in particular gave us entrance into a science research institute in Moscow, namely our cooperation with the Magneto Hydro-dynamics Institute. The Soviets in science think nothing of investing $50 million to build a full scale plant, whereas we are aghast at spending so much on experimental projects. We prefer to test things on computers, then try it on a small scale, and gradually work up before we invest in a large way. The Soviets, on the other hand, lack some of our refined, delicate instruments. So we found a happy marriage of Soviet willingness to build a full scale plant to test the theory of magneto-hydro dynamic electric generation, and our ability to supply components that they could not build. This cooperation gave us unusual access into the particular institute doing this work. Even though high level cooperation was cut off, we could still go to that institute and find out what they were doing.

Another example of reporting I did from Moscow: one summer while in Finland, my wife and I spent a week near the Norwegian and Soviet borders at the Sub-Arctic Research Station of the University of Turku. Our stay was primarily a vacation, but I did look into various scientific activities under way. One thing I did was visit the seismic station there. That station had two seismic detectors, one Soviet and one American in keeping with the Finnish policy of neutrality. Readings from the detectors were regularly sent to Moscow and Washington respectively. Of course, the U.S. detector was much more sensitive than the Soviet one, and the location close to the Soviet border was more important to the U.S. than to the USSR. In any case, the Finnish tending the detectors told me that they had been picking up for some time signals indicating some sort of drilling activity across the Soviet border. This all came back to me when I read in Moscow a brief account of a Soviet project to drill the world's deepest hole in the hard granites of the Kola Peninsula. I reported to Washington my suspicion that signals the seismic station in Kevo, Finland had been picking up for years came from the Soviet drilling project on the Kola Peninsula.

Science and politics are very closely related in the Soviet Union. The USSR Academy of Sciences plays a very important role in the USSR political system. The Academy is automatically entitled to several seats in the Soviet parliament. The President of the Academy of Sciences was always a member of the Central Committee of the Communist Party. The supervision of the Academy of Sciences, which covers not just the hard sciences as we know them, but also includes fields like Party ideology and history. The Senior Party Secretary, Suslov in my time, would supervise the Academy of Sciences, so there was a lot of politics in the Academy. Andre Sakharov was a member of the Academy of Sciences. He was very political, so there was a lot of interaction of politics and science in the Soviet Academy. We had to be careful in dealing with the Academy of Sciences not to tread too much on what the people in the political section were doing. The political section maintained contact with Sakharov, for example.

Q: We have our own bureaucracy. You must have had a reasonably collegial atmosphere in the Embassy?

HOUSTON: We had all those things which at the time of the Sergeant Lonetree trial were portrayed as bad. We knew a KGB colonel worked in the Embassy personal services section. We had New Years dances or Marine Balls at which Marines or the ambassador would have his arms around the head KGB representative at the Embassy. The relations of Russian and Americans at the Embassy were all very collegial. Perhaps inexperienced Marines thought we did not care about security. One time at Spaso House I remember in particular dancing with this KGB colonel, to the American song “Rah, Rah, Rasputin, Lover of the Russian Queen”, a very popular piece among the Russians at the time.

I viewed my assignment to Moscow as pretty much the end of my career. I think that I had gotten into trouble in Finland by failing to ride herd on Ambassador Austad. I felt I was not going to get any more good assignments. So when I came home from Moscow, I went again to the Board of Examiners for a brief period. I retired early in 1982 when the senior officer cap [the cap in salaries for government workers which meant a higher pension calculation, based on the last three years of salary] was raised. I thought I was very smart waiting that out. I eased the shock of my retirement by taking a part time job in the Freedom of Information work in the Department.

NELSON C. LEDSKY
Special Assistant for Moscow Olympics
Washington, DC (1980-1981)

Ambassador Ledsky was born in Cleveland, Ohio and was educated at Case Western Reserve University and Columbia University. After serving in the US Army, he joined the Foreign Service in 1957, serving in Georgetown, Guyana; Enugu, Nigeria; Bonn and Berlin, Germany and in the State Department in Washington. In his various assignments he was closely involved in matters concerning the status of Berlin and West Germany as well as on the persistent Greece-Turkey conflict over Cyprus. Among his other assignments, the Ambassador served on the Department's Policy Planning Staff. Ambassador Ledsky was interviewed by Thomas Stern in 2003.

Q: We are now in 1980. You became the special assistant to the secretary for the Olympics. Had you had a predecessor?

LEDSKY: As far as I know, I was the first. I think there may have been some officers who were given some responsibilities for previous Olympics, but I don't believe that any single officer was ever previously designated as the Department's focal point. My role in 1980 was a new one for the Department.

In late 1979 or early 1980, after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, the U.S. looked for actions it could take to express its distaste for Soviet action. I believe that the British and Canadians first suggested that one effective action that could be taken would be for countries to refuse to participate in the Moscow Olympic games, scheduled for the summer of 1980. The Soviets had devoted much time and attention to making these games a shining example of the prowess of its regime. It was the first time that the Soviet Union or its predecessor regimes had ever been awarded the Olympics and it was going to make it the event of the century. It was, I believe, the conclusion of the British and Canadians that little could be done to reverse the invasion, but they believed that a symbolic act of displeasure was in order and that by not participating in the Olympics we could show that displeasure in a meaningful way.

The British essentially sold this idea to President Carter, who was also looking for public actions to express American disapproval of the Afghanistan invasion. We had only come up with such minor irritants, as a wheat embargo which was bitterly opposed by mid-western farmers. Around the turn of the year 1980, there was an exchange among the British, Canadian and U.S. governments which led to their agreeing to a boycott of the Moscow Olympics. The three governments also pledged to try to get other governments to join the boycott. There were a number of letters exchanged by the three governments at the time. The Department was asked by the White House – Lloyd Cutler, the legal advisor – to coordinate efforts to have other countries join the boycott. The secretary, Cutler and Christopher met and agreed that the Department should take the leadership in coordinating the U.S. government's boycott. This was about January, 1980.

In January, I was called to Christopher's office. I had tentatively been selected to be nominated as our ambassador to Uganda. I had told Dick Moose that I would be interested in an ambassadorial assignment, but not Uganda because of my wife's health condition. Since H knew that I was about to be reassigned, it had selected Walt Cutler, who had been in Iran, to replace me. So I was out on a limb. In any case, Christopher asked me to undertake the Olympic boycott coordinator's role. I said "yes" somewhat reluctantly, since I thought I would be going to an ambassadorial post overseas. Christopher was very understanding; he understood my dilemma and I think appreciated that I agreed to undertake the coordinator's role. We both may have thought that by the end of the summer of 1980, I would find another acceptable assignment and this coordinator role was just a temporary bridge. I think they all thought that Carter would be re-elected and that an ambassadorial position could be found for me.

So I called on Lloyd Cutler, who had assigned Joe Onek of his staff, to this work. I knew nothing about the subject matter. I knew very little about Olympic sport events. I knew nothing about boycotts. Christopher's request came as a bolt out of the clear blue sky. I knew that the Olympics would be held, but that was about the extent of my knowledge of the whole subject.

Eventually, someone reached the decision that my office would be part of the Secretariat. I would be assigned four or five people and my main role would be to co-ordinate with the British and the Canadians to implement the boycott. I don't think anyone in early 1980 knew what had to be done. The job description still had to be written. We quickly discovered that our first task was to convince the U.S. Olympic Coordinating Committee to agree with the government's boycott policy. President Carter did not have the authority to deny American athletes participation in Olympics. We had to convince the Committee that it should support the boycott.

We also had to convince the British and Canadians to bar their athletes from participating in the Olympics. That was also a tough task because the British Olympic Committee was entirely independent, as was its Canadian counterpart, both in a similar way to ours. As we began to work on this facet of the boycott, I soon found out that the opposition was very strong and that our policy was about to fail for lack of support from the athletes. In addition, the Canadian government fell and was replaced by a new one, which had not agreed to join the boycott. The British government, previously headed by Callaghan, fell in late 1979 and had been replaced by the new administration of Margaret Thatcher. So, the trio of countries that had agreed to the boycott, all of a sudden shrank to one by early 1980. The British essentially took the position that its Olympic Committee was independent and not subject to governmental direction. They said that if we wanted to try to convince their Committee we were welcome to come to Great Britain to give it a try. The Thatcher government really did not want to get involved.

The new Canadian government, led by Pierre Trudeau, was completely opposed to the boycott, primarily for commercial reasons, that is the sale of Canadian wheat to the Soviets. So, at the start of 1980, there were considerable doubts about President Carter's policy. Many thought that we should lift the boycott and participate in the Olympics. By this time, the whole issue was in the public domain because the exchange of letters among the three pro-boycott nations had been released to the media.

I spent most of January and February working with Lloyd Cutler and Oniek. At some point, Vice President Mondale became involved, so I spent much of my time with White House staffs. No one else in the Department, including Christopher, seemed very anxious to becoming involved. I was essentially left holding the bag. In early 1980, we drew up a work plan. We sent demarches to many countries – to the Europeans, to Latin American countries, and to African countries. We told these countries that we believed that it was very important that the unlawful Soviet invasion of Afghanistan be publicized and we thought that a boycott of the Olympics would do that. We said we hoped that the games would be canceled, or their importance minimized, if enough countries stayed away. The demarches took different forms.

There were some reactions to the demarches that were disturbing. A number of governments said that they would support us. I am not sure that all demarches were welcomed. For example, the Romanians, Liberians and the Chinese said they would join the boycott. The last even pledged to mount a campaign in the Third World to build support; that was not totally welcomed in Washington. The Chinese kept their promise, but were not really very effective. I maintained a dialogue with their embassy in Washington during the spring and summer.

Lloyd Cutler and I took a few trips to Europe in spring and summer of 1980. Our first focus was on Great Britain, where we wanted the Thatcher government to return to the Callaghan policies in support of the boycott. We talked to a number of British sports federations. We spent some time in Geneva talking to the International Olympics Committee, which was most interested in what we were doing. We suggested that the Committee select an alternative venue to Moscow. We also tried to get the Committee or some of the federations to support and participate in the boycott. We were not successful.

In the course of our trips to Europe, we met with a number of delegations, which were affiliated with the IOC. We met with a Korean delegation, which we did convince to join the boycott. We met with the Germans and received Helmut Schmidt's agreement to talk to the German federation to join the boycott. We met with the Egyptians, who then joined the boycott. We conducted these efforts during the spring and summer and we had some successes. By the time the Olympics opened in Moscow, about sixty countries had joined the boycott.

I remember that one of our first fiascos was the dispatch of Mohammed Ali around the world to speak in favor of the boycott. That was not my idea. We got various bureaus involved in preparing for this presidential envoy. We brought Ali to the Seventh floor to explain to him what his trip was all about. That was a challenge in itself because he really wasn't sure where Afghanistan was or why the U.S. government was so upset. We hoped that he would be effective. The trip was supposed to begin in Nigeria and then move on to a few other African countries and then on to India – four or five places that we had picked which seemed targets of opportunity.

I will not forget what happened in Nigeria. There, Ali, instead of dissuading the Nigerians from participating in the Olympics, was convinced by the Nigerians that Carter's policy was wrong and that the U.S. athletes should go to Moscow. So, it was back to the drawing board. Dick Moose and I got on the phone to talk to Ali's State escort officer. The trip had been well publicized; it would have been very difficult to cancel. So we told the State officer to continue on the trip, but to try to convince Ali before the next stop that the embargo was the right policy. We had to keep going on the trip. On the next stop, Ali met some Chinese diplomats, who turned him around again and convinced him that an embargo was the right course, that the Soviets were the most evil people in the world and that all people of color should stand against the USSR. It was during this period, that not only did the Chinese convince Ali that a boycott was correct, but they also offered to come to Washington to develop a joint plan, which would give the Chinese the leading role in Africa in bringing those countries to join the boycott.

Ali then went to India, where he was again subjected to arguments in favor of participation and was finally won over to that point of view – again. The Indians convinced Ali that the Moscow Olympics was too important an event to be boycotted, and that furthermore, our stand opposing the invasion of Afghanistan was all wrong. By the time Ali returned to the U.S., he was thoroughly confused. He reported back to us on his trip and then went on his way. We did not use him again! However, I should note that Nigeria and India and some other countries decided in the final analysis not to participate.

Lloyd Cutler and I then began to work on the Olympic Committee, which, by the way, we discovered is made up of a couple of dozen independent fiefdoms, each representing a different sport. The Olympic Committee was really a federation.

We began to mount a media campaign, stressing the importance of the boycott as a strong gesture of our disapproval of the Soviet's actions in Afghanistan. We took our case to the country, trying to marshal as much public support as we could. I spent a lot of time with the media and appeared on TV on a couple of occasions. Lloyd Cutler made a lot of public appearances. I spent some time on the Hill, although I don't remember Congress playing a very active role on this issue. There may have been a couple of resolutions passed, but I don't think they were consequential.

I went to Tennessee to talk to the Track and Field Association. I went to other meetings with several sports federations. We ran into very stiff resistance. I don't remember a single federation which at the beginning of the effort supported the boycott. Every one wanted to participate.

Onek and I flew to Chicago during this period to meet with the Track and Field federation leadership. We also met with the Diving federation and the Swimming group. They all opposed the boycott. Their stand was essentially that the U.S. position was a political one – a sign of disapproval of Soviet actions, and that they were in the sports business – which had no relationship to sports. Their athletes had been training for four years; some had spent the previous three years in Colorado Springs devoting 100% of their time to training. They felt it was not fair of the U.S. government to ask for such sacrifices from a group of people who had nothing to do with politics. I vividly remember the head of the U.S. field hockey federation coming to see me in Washington to explain that her young women had worked hard for four years to overcome a losing record in international competitions. They were now ready and this was their one chance to correct the record. Our position was that all of these athletes were American citizens first and had to support their president and country in this public display of disapproval of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. Slowly but surely, I think, we made some headway with these federations.

We continued our efforts in the U.S. until April or May, 1980, in preparation for a trip that Vice President Mondale, Lloyd Cutler and I took to Colorado Springs to address the U.S. Olympic Committee and to meet with representatives of all American federations. Mondale asked all of the federations not to send their athletes to Moscow. This lobbying effort lasted four or five days with our meeting with each of the many sports federations. Mondale met with Bill Simon, a well known Republican, who was the head of the Olympic Committee. He did not have a very high regard of Carter or any Democrat, for that matter. In the end, we were successful. The Olympic Committee did vote at the time not to send any teams to Moscow. I must say that I was not very confident that we would win that vote. I was pleasantly surprised when the vote went our way. I think it was sheer patriotism that swung the vote.

We flew back in one of the government's small jets. It was a happy trip home. It was a big triumph. Then we discovered, after our return, that the Committee's vote did not bind the individual federations. It was no doubt a significant vote, but there could well have been some slippage in the participation in the Olympics. And in fact, a few U.S. teams did participate surreptitiously, a fact that has been forgotten. So, we did not have a complete boycott. But the vote of the U.S. Olympic Committee allowed us to go back to countries, which up to that time had rejected the boycott notion.

I think, in the final analysis, from our point of view and that of the Soviets, the Olympics were a disaster. NBC withdrew its sponsorship and the Soviets lost $75 million right there. There was no coverage in the U.S. of the Olympics. Those games were not a reflection of the world's athletic prowess because, although many countries participated, most of the ones with the top notch athletes (Japan, Pakistan, Korea, the U.S., Australia, New Zealand, all Arab countries, most German teams, a few British teams, and Romania) did not.. It was not a world competition and therefore became less than significant in the annals of Olympic sports. I must say that the Germans complained bitterly, blaming Carter for all sorts of mischief.

I think that even if we did not get 100% participation in the boycott (and no one thought that we would) our efforts were successful in the international political arena. There was wide condemnation of the Soviet invasion. Even in countries which participated, there was considerable support for our stand.

I should mention that we also became promoters of some sports events in the U.S., in part to allow those athletes that had trained for so long and so hard the opportunity to display their competence. My staff and I became promoters of track and field events, which were held in Philadelphia as the "Liberty Games." This was a deal I worked out with the Track and Field federation, which wanted a venue for their athletes. These games were held in the fall of 1980 and were an international event. We financed the travel of about thirty foreign teams to go to Philadelphia. The Track and Field federation did most of the organizing work, but we were the ones who made the arrangements for the foreign participants.

Then we were involved in an international boxing tournament in Kenya. Some 20-30 countries participated in that. That was our sop to the Kenyans for their participation in the boycott. It was also our payment to the U.S. Boxing federation for its cooperation. So there were some substitute events organized in the fall and winter of 1980 for the Moscow non-participants. By the end of the year, we closed down our operations and my stint as the U.S. Olympics Boycott coordinator came to an end. To this day, I am probably still one of the leaders of the "to be avoided" list of the U.S. Olympic Committee and its sport federations.

Of course, on the negative side, our boycott had no impact on Soviet policy in Afghanistan. They did not withdraw or change their Afghan policy at all. But as I said before, our world-wide efforts and our boycott did highlight the Soviet's nefarious actions. We did get a lot of editorial support, which reflected the mood of the American people after they had a chance to consider the issue. I think that helped the Olympic Committee reach its decision, which, as I said earlier, was really an act of patriotism.

This whole episode has been written up in several books, most of them written by people involved in the Olympic movement. They were mostly negative about our policy and efforts. The conclusion drawn by many of these writers was that American athletes were made to suffer because of the ineptness of the U.S. government in expressing its displeasure with Soviet policy. The athletes were made to suffer because the U.S. government could not stop the invasion of Afghanistan through more traditional means. I, of course, argued that a boycott was a perfectly legitimate and powerful expression of disapproval. I don't think we had many other means in 1980 to show our disapproval of Soviet action. It did send an important signal to the Soviets; it did influence world opinion and turned much of it against the Soviets. I think that embargoes are useful foreign policy tools. I know that many disagree, but I think that in the case of these Olympics, it did have a desired effect. It was a symbolic embargo, different from that which we usually impose, but I think it was a good decision by President Carter. There was a tit-for-tat with the Soviets boycotting the Los Angeles games in 1984, but that didn't have nearly the same effect.

I must admit that I came away with some skepticism about the whole international Olympic movement. It is not an entirely above-board operation, with bureaucratic politics within the movement playing a very large role. I am sorry that we were not totally successful; had it been, it would really have sent a powerful message to the Soviets. That is not to say that what we did accomplish was not noted in Moscow; in fact, the Russians have never forgotten the boycott. I think it did demoralize the Soviet public and brought home to it what the world thought of their government's actions in Afghanistan. The boycott was not totally effective – some nations participated. At the beginning, we had a number of aspirations: first, that the games be moved from the USSR by the International Olympics Committee (IOC) in response to the Soviet violation of international law. I guess that was aiming too high, although the IOC had the power to do so if it had been sensitive enough to the Soviet transgression; it was not. Mr. Samaranch, who ran the IOC, used to be his country's ambassador to Moscow and we believed was in fact on the Soviets' payroll, as has been exposed in recent times.

Once the IOC decided to proceed with the Olympics in Moscow, we fell back on our second, our backup aspiration to get the world's major countries to join the boycott. There, I would estimate we were 60-70% successful. I never expected that the East Germans would join the boycott and they were an international sports powerhouse. As I mentioned earlier, at the beginning, the British and the Canadians did join the boycott; but, with their change of governments, we lost both of them. That hurt. This shifting scene made our calculations of success a moving target during 1980. We really did not know until the very beginning of the Olympics how successful or unsuccessful we would be. It was clear that a 100% success was not possible and with the loss of the British and Canadians our hopes were lowered.

I think it is fair to say that as a government, we really had no idea what we were getting into at the beginning of 1980. We didn't know much if anything about how the sports world is organized. We learned a lot as we went along. We didn't know what our task was or how we could reach our goal. At the beginning, we worked on the assumption that if a U.S. president said that U.S. Olympic teams did not participate, that would be the end of that. It didn't take us too long to understand that in some matters, such as the Olympics, the U.S. government was impotent to enforce its decisions on a private group or groups. We rapidly faced a situation where the U.S. government had to sell its policies to its citizens, or key groups of its citizens. I certainly learned a lot in those few early months, as I think Lloyd Cutler and Warren Christopher and many others also did.

I should add that when we started in early 1980 to work on the boycott of the summer games in Moscow, we were hosting the Winter Olympics in Lake Placid, New York. We, of course, did not want anything to happen to those games. They had to be successful. That limited the scope of what we could do considerably for several months. We could not do anything which would jeopardize the success of the Lake Placid event.

Another sub-text to this history was the financial consequences of a boycott. That was fully understood in the U.S. government. We knew that missing the Olympics would cost federations considerable financial support from sponsors. I think the U.S. Olympic Committee and its various sponsors probably broke even at the Lake Placid games, or perhaps there was a small loss because winter games can apparently be money losers if they are not well attended and not well organized. We believed that our boycott of the Moscow Olympics would lose considerable income to the Soviets, particularly if we could minimize the number of Western attendees. I believe that in the final analysis, the Soviets did lose a lot of money – millions. They had invested huge amounts in preparing for the Olympics – setting up villages for the visiting athletes, building and refurbishing stadiums, and building media facilities – all of the requirements that are demanded by the IOC (just as the Greeks are doing now for this summer's games). We knew that if we could keep visitors and athletes away from Moscow in 1980, it would be a major financial blow to the Soviets. I think we were successful in meeting that goal.

Q: Did anyone think that a boycott, with all of its negative consequences, would make an impact on Soviet policy?

LEDSKY: Not in the short run, but I think we did believe that we might be able to change long range policies. In fact, we were able to rally the Muslim world against the Soviets. There were a number of senior State officials who felt that that alone was worth our efforts. The invasion of Afghanistan started this anti-Soviet mood in the Muslim world, but our effort to organize a boycott really highlighted Soviet policies and strengthened that mood, so there was a feeling in the Department that the boycott did have some positive political consequences. It may have encouraged the emergence of the mujahideen, which we later supported with arms and money. I don't think anyone thought that the Soviets would withdraw from Afghanistan because of our boycott, but there was a hope that the boycott would have political and financial consequences, and I think it did that. I can't measure the impact, but it was surely there as could be observed from subsequent Soviet bitterness and anger. That was palpable; we really got under their skin.

Through this boycott, we also began to have a better understanding of Soviet vulnerabilities. This was probably the first real dent made in the Soviet empire. I never had any conversations about the boycott with Soviet representatives in Washington, nor did Cutler, as far as I know. However, it was clear that they were not "happy campers." I think the boycott was moderately successful; it cost us very little in financial terms. We did spend a lot of time on the issue, we did cause considerable irritation among the athletes and sports lovers in the U.S. and around the world. But it was politically successful. We didn't have a lot of policy choices in 1980 to publicize our views about the invasion, so our choices were very limited; the boycott was the right one. There were assessments made by a number of people after we closed shop.

I should mention before we close this chapter that I got terrific support from my Departmental colleagues. Each regional bureau assigned one officer to my staff, who worked part-time on this boycott effort. I was given one or two other people who were between assignments. They all turned out to be very good. I had a terrific staff. This included Charlie Reese, who is now a DAS in EUR; Brian Sulser, a former defensive end Washington Redskins football player who joined the Foreign Service; and Ron Maloteek, who was thrown out of Saudi Arabia. It was an interesting group. Most of them were out of a job at the time for one reason or another; the personnel office would send them to me to keep them occupied for a period of time. I always had four or five officers assigned to my office and we were busy writing, traveling, or talking. We were extremely busy for the first half of 1980. It was an assignment unlike any other I had ever – or any other Foreign Service officer – had ever had. We had no "road map" to follow; everything was improvised. We had very little supervision, certainly from the Department or even from Lloyd Cutler, who was quite busy with his day-time job. We did need high level involvement from time to time, which we did get, as I have mentioned earlier.

I well remember when, after Vance resigned and was succeeded by Senator Muskie, I had to brief the new secretary on what I was doing. I had met him previously while working in H, but I doubt that he remembered much of that. I spent about an hour briefing him; I came away feeling that Muskie thought that we were out of our minds and that we were pursuing an idiotic goal. I think I did convince him that we were working very hard on this boycott, but I don't think he ever fully understood what or why we were doing. Later, Muskie had to chair a number of meetings on the boycott in the Department, including a briefing by a four star general on what was going on in Afghanistan. I don't think he was ever convinced that we were on a wise path. We had a couple of events in the White House for American athletes during which President Carter gave some short sermons about the boycott. Those meetings required us to provide some talking points to both the president and the secretary. We put on a number of breakfasts for Congressional members, as well as for other interested parties. There never was any end to the small details that we had take care of; we worked long and hard. As I suggested, not everyone thought that the boycott was a good idea. It certainly took a lot of time and effort, especially since Carter and Cutler were so deeply involved.

There was considerable discussion of the boycott in the American media, particularly the sports media. My picture, as well as Lloyd Cutler's, appeared in Sports Illustrated. So the sports world knew the issue very well, as did much of the American public.

After the Moscow Olympics, I was invited on several occasions by various groups, particularly the sports federations, to participate in discussions about the use of sports boycotts and their effectiveness. This was especially true in early 1984, when it became clear that the Soviets would not participate in the Los Angeles Olympics. There was a lot of interest in Soviet motivations. Sometimes, Lloyd Cutler would call me and ask me to substitute for him at one discussion or another. I was involved in this issue for a long time and participated in discussions even after my return from my Berlin assignment. There are still some sports federations that are still angry and hold me responsible for the 1980 boycott!

E. WAYNE MERRY

Mr. Merry was born and raised in Oklahoma. He was educated at the Universities of Kansas and Wisconsin and Princeton University. After serving briefly at NATO headquarters in Brussels, Belgium and in Washington, DC at the Department of the Treasury, in 1972 he joined the State Department Foreign Service. In addition to assignments on Capitol Hill, at the United Nations in New York City, and at the Departments of State and Defense in Washington, DC, Mr. Merry served abroad in Berlin, Tunis, and Moscow. A Russian language speaker, he was a specialist in Soviet Union affairs. Mr. Merry was interviewed in 2010 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: You were there in Moscow from 1980 to...

MERRY: '83. Embassy Moscow in its State elements was staffed in an interesting way. The State Department always had more political and economic officers wanting to go to Moscow than it had positions, but it always had too few administrative and consular officers bidding for jobs there. Often the way you got an assignment to Moscow was by agreeing to spend one year in either in the Consular Section or in the Admin Section, and then moving to a position in the Political or Economics Section. In many cases, of a standard two-year assignment, as Moscow was a hardship post, only one was in the officer's professional area. I did three years on this tour, one year in the Consular Section and two years in the Political Section. I'm not complaining about this, because the year I spent in the Consular Section was one of the most interesting and rewarding I ever had. It was an absolutely fascinating experience. To begin with, consular work in Moscow in the Cold War was intensely political. To illustrate, we had six American officers in the Consular Section that year: two consuls, of whom I was one, and four vice-consuls. Of those six, only one was an actual consular cone officer. The others were all political and economic officers doing their year in Consular before they went upstairs to the other sections.

It was a fascinating place to work, and not a routine consular section at all. I got my baptism of fire on my very first day in country. I flew in from East Berlin—I'd been back there to visit East German friends—in October of 1980, and was met at the airport by my new boss, Kent Brown, a political officer who had recently taken over the Consular Section. I was his deputy. We went to the embassy, where it was the lunch period. The Consular Section was on the ground floor of the old embassy, whereas all the reporting sections were upstairs. I went into the Consular Section to get acquainted and look at what would be my office. While doing so, the receptionist came back and said, "There's an American woman out front insisting that she see a consular officer immediately." I foolishly agreed to meet with her. What I should have said is, "Look, I haven't even checked in, I just got off the plane. She's going to have to wait half an hour until one of the vice-consuls comes back from lunch." But, no, in my enthusiasm I agreed to meet with her.

The woman comes into my office, closes the door, and starts taking her clothes off and threatens to commit suicide. Honest to God, this was my first professional experience in Moscow on the day I arrived. Her story, in brief, was that she was a former Soviet citizen who had emigrated to the United States years before, become a U.S. citizen, and changed her name so she could come back on a group tour to retrieve manuscripts of her writings she had left behind in safekeeping. The reason she was taking her clothes off was these manuscripts were concealed on her person. She threatened to commit suicide if I did not agree to send the manuscripts out through the diplomatic pouch, so she could have her writings when she got back to the United States. This was in my very first hour of my first day on the job in Moscow. Obviously the first thing I did was try to calm her down somewhat, and the second was to get hold of our real American Citizens Services vice-consul, to contribute his invaluable experience in dealing with U.S. citizens abroad.

What could illustrate better the intensely political nature of consular work in Moscow than to have this on my hands first thing? Our initial concern was to get this woman the hell out of the Soviet Union before they figured out who she really was, because her passport did not show she was born in the Soviet Union. Her passport indicated she was a native-born American. We got her out of the Soviet Union before we had a real problem on our hands, but then we were stuck with the manuscript and what to do with it. Under international law it was not proper for us to use the diplomatic pouch to send it out. The issue was eventually resolved and she got her papers, though it took a lot of back and forth with the Department. We had her manuscript, which was several inches thick, sitting in the vault in the Consular Section for several months. This incident illustrates that in Moscow nothing was routine in consular work. Absolutely nothing.

Most of our work had to do with Cold War issues—we had a big program of Armenian immigration, of Armenians leaving Soviet Armenia for southern California, for purposes of family reunification, and every one of these cases involved complex human issues. We also did a considerable amount of non-immigrant visa work, particularly for third country people. There were large numbers of Third-World students in Moscow who, as soon as they had completed their university training in the Soviet Union, wanted to go to the U.S.A. and not back to Bangladesh or Sierra Leone or wherever it was that they came from. Not surprisingly, very few of them got a visa from us. We were also involved in reciprocity issues with the Soviets, what I called the “visa wars” of tit for tat visa denials, often to little purpose. From that experience, I acquired a lasting skepticism about sanctions in situations where both sides can play the game.

Given how little tourism and trade there was in those days, we had a substantial number of American citizens who got themselves into problems of one kind or another in the Soviet Union. Issues that would have been straightforward in most other posts were anything but in Moscow. We also had—and this was particularly my responsibility during this year—seven Soviet citizens who were living in temporary refuge in the embassy.

MERRY: Within the embassy but the responsibility of the Consular Section. They were the so-called “Siberian Seven,” seven members of two families of Pentecostals from a city named Chernogorsk in Western Siberia. This was a very highly-publicized case in the United States. The responsibility for this case, and for the actual care and feeding of these seven individuals, rested with me. I spent a lot of time with them and found them both deeply sympathetic and frustrating to deal with. These people had become, in many respects, reflective of the Soviet system which had oppressed them. Pentecostals had been subject to all kinds of Soviet pressures, repression and discrimination, and because of that experience they were intensely suspicious people. Suspicious of everyone, including suspicious of the American Embassy which was giving them temporary refuge, and much of that suspicion came for a time to focus on me. It was my job to tell them the truth that their migration desires could never come to fruition as they wanted but only by compromising with the realities of Soviet emigration procedures.

What made the case especially difficult was that it was not about seven people, it was, in fact, an immigration case of 29 people, because the size of the two families was 29, only seven of whom were at the embassy at Moscow. The other 22, from two different families—and the two families were often not on speaking terms—were back in Chernogorsk. The seven were not interested in simply emigrating from the embassy to the United States. They were not willing to leave either the Soviet Union or the embassy without all of their family members. Many people in the United States did not understand that this was not about seven people, this was about 29 people. Relations between the families were often quite tense, and their relations with the embassy were also tense. The Soviet authorities would not even talk to us about this case. As far as they were concerned, the solution was for the United States to throw these people out of the embassy and for them to go back to Chernogorsk and apply for exit permission. Well, they had been applying for exit permission for decades, literally decades. They had in fact been to the embassy several times before, over a period of many years, seeking help in getting out of the Soviet Union.

The case, happily, was successfully resolved, but not during the period I was in the Consular Section but a year later, after I'd moved to the Political Section. It finally did involve the families going back to Chernogorsk. This was after the change in U.S. administrations and some fairly high-level negotiations between the early Reagan Administration and Soviet authorities, which met the Soviet requirement that these people could not emigrate directly from the embassy, that they had to go back to Chernogorsk. There were assurances given in Washington, from President Reagan personally, that the United States Government would not embarrass the Soviet Union if it did allow these people to leave.

The seven lived in the embassy, in two rooms on the ground floor of the south wing, for almost five years, but they did eventually achieve their goal. A central problem in the early years was simply the publicity issue, that the Soviet authorities were absolutely adamant they were not going to be forced into letting people emigrate through what they saw as a public relations stunt of taking refuge inside the U.S. Embassy. The final compromise involved a promise from President Reagan matched by a commitment from the Soviets that, if the people did go back to Chernogorsk, then their applications would be approved. Making that all happen took literally years. I contributed about 10 months to that process, but it went on for another year and more before it actually came to fruition. During my time on the case, the gap between Washington and Moscow was too wide to effect a deal. It was ultimately the personal intervention of the new U.S. President that closed the gap, so the Soviets could say, "All we've ever said was that these people had to obey our laws and obey our procedures." That was, in fact, humbug, because these two families had been following the procedures for many years and had never gotten anywhere.

It was quite an educational experience for me in the political culture of the Soviet Union. It was a cultural challenge for me to speak with people who were ill-prepared to believe anything they heard from any official, even an American official. I had not previously encountered such a mentality. During one period I had a series of conversations with them about what I came to call the "helicopter fantasy," when they believed the solution to their case was to get the other 22 family members to Moscow, to come into the embassy, and then the Americans would send a helicopter to land on the embassy roof and they would all fly off to the United States. Of course, they had seen pictures of the evacuation from Saigon and imagined something similar could be done for them. It was quite a job to persuade them that we could not fly a helicopter into the middle of the Soviet Union, land on the roof of the U.S. Embassy and take 29 people off to live happily ever after in the U.S.A.—that took a lot of persuading. I had an Air Force colleague speak to them about it. That was only one aspect of a continuing effort to convince them that we were their friends and champions and not their enemies. That's what I spent my time doing, dealing with things like the helicopter fantasy. In addition, they did not actually want to go to the United States, which they regarded as hopelessly decadent, but to the Biblical Kingdom of Israel. Not the contemporary State of Israel, mind you, but its Old Testament predecessor. Kind of hard to issue visas for that.

It was a terrifically good year. We had a great team, not just the six of us who were Foreign Service, but our other American employees, and I would say even our Soviet local employees. We had a lot of work. We had a number of serious incidents. We had several cases of people using violence to seek entry to the embassy, not always Soviet citizens but sometimes third-country nationals. We had a lot of problems with physical security. The American Embassy was, of course, one of the most well-known political venues in the Soviet capital. The Consular Section was on the ground floor of the north wing right at the front entrance archway, with Soviet guards on the sidewalk but no American security of any kind, so anything that came through the archway tended to come in to us. The Marines were upstairs guarding the so-called "core." Downstairs we had no security other than the Soviet guards, while our policy supposedly welcomed free access to the embassy. That was not always wise, as we had several violent people force their way in. During the final months of my consular assignment when I was acting head of the section, I made some strong representations to the front office that our security problems needed attention. It was only after a Soviet man with a shotgun got into the residential part of the complex that this problem was addressed.

While the question of Soviet dissidents was largely the responsibility of the Political Section, we in Consular had a role to play concerning those seeking to leave the country, coordinating with our colleagues at the Dutch Embassy about Jewish emigration, because the Dutch were the protecting power for Israeli interests and for immigration to Israel. We had a number of cases of Soviet Jews who had an American connection and sought to go to America. Some had claims to U.S. citizenship, so we were involved in that. We had a surprisingly large number of cases of claims to dual citizenship, often from descendents of Americans sent by Henry Ford when he established some plants out in the Urals...

MERRY: Yes, and these families often got stuck there under Stalin. There were also people who had been American citizens and had gone back home to their countries of Latvia, Lithuania or Estonia when those republics were independent between the wars and then were caught when the countries were taken over by Stalin. Some of these people were still alive, but mostly it was a question of their children. In many cases, they had legitimate claims to U.S. citizenship. In our view they were binationals, Soviet and American, and we had to represent their interests.

One fine day I had a young man come in to see me, a Soviet citizen who announced that he was the son of Donald Maclean, of Burgess and Maclean the famous British espionage duo, and he was claiming U.S. citizenship.

Q: How come? Maclean, of course, was British.

MERRY: Maclean was British and had been a British diplomat in Washington, but Mrs. Maclean was an American citizen, and there were three children: a daughter who was born in the UK and two sons born in the U.S. The father had been on the so-called "blue list." He had full diplomatic privileges and immunities, so being born on U.S. soil didn't give his son U.S. citizenship, but the fact that his mother was an American citizen did. It was adjudicated that he had a legitimate claim to U.S. citizenship. Here was the offspring of one of the most famous espionage cases of the 20th century coming into my office, saying, "I'm Donald Marling Maclean, and I was born so-and-so, and I'm claiming U.S. citizenship, and I want you to get me the hell out of here before I get drafted into the Soviet army." These were the kinds of cases we had.

Q: What happened with that?

MERRY: We could give him a U.S. passport. The trouble is, we couldn't give him a Soviet exit permit. That was a separate issue. Eventually the kid did get out, but the fact he had a legitimate claim to U.S. citizenship and a U.S. passport couldn't guarantee him departure from the Soviet Union. None of these cases was purely consular. In many other countries a claim to U.S. citizenship would be a fairly straightforward matter of paperwork. In Moscow, nothing was straightforward and nothing was simple.

What else did we do? We set up a proxy marriage in Montana for the child of Yelena Bonner, the wife of Andrei Sakharov who was in internal exile at the time; the child was from her first marriage. I once represented the daughter of a famous Soviet film star who was murdered under very suspicious circumstances. The daughter was in the U.S. but was not allowed by the Soviets to attend her mother's funeral, so I did. I visited families of people with claims to U.S. citizenship in places like western Belarus, the Baltic states and Armenia, if only to demonstrate they had not been forgotten. I was the point man with the foreign ministry on the Polovchak case of a Ukrainian family which had gone to the States and the parents decided to return to the Soviet Union but their two offspring thought otherwise. That was all over the front pages in both countries. I counseled American students who wanted to marry their Soviet boy or girlfriends, whose interest was often purely in getting to America. Never a dull day in Moscow Consular. There were a number of cases I cannot speak about, even now. I recall it as pure variety, with lots of things I never would have anticipated. Made for a great year.

I also, of course, was getting settled in Moscow and to life in the Soviet Union. I had never even visited the place, but I was completely smitten with the experience from my first day. Of course, for an American diplomat, this was the most important posting in the world, and it was also something of the front trench of the Cold War. I thought it a privilege to serve there, and so did many of my colleagues. Not all, there were people in the embassy who really hated the place and bitched and moaned about it all the time. Given my previous fascination with East Germany, it is probably not too surprising that I took to service in the Soviet Union with real enthusiasm. In addition, I genuinely liked living in Moscow. God knows, it is not a user-friendly place, but I was in my early 30's and single and full of beans, so I was more than ready to enjoy the place. The housing was modest but quite adequate. The working conditions were, by most diplomatic standards, pretty spare and even primitive, but I did not mind. I found the city of Moscow absolutely fascinating from the very start and just loved exploring it and soaking up its history.

One thing I learned very quickly was to wear hats. I had never used hats before, but in Moscow you can die in the winter without a fur hat. In addition, not to have a hat on of some kind except in summer marked you as a foreigner. So, I learned to wear hats and have never stopped. One thing which struck me early on was the very different human dynamic of standing in lines in the Soviet Union from the lines I had known in the GDR. East Germans stood in lots of lines, but with a note of anticipation and impatience. In contrast, Muscovites endured their lines with a stoic resignation and a wary realism that there might be nothing left for them after the long wait. The experience reminded me of something George Kennan had written, that textual study of the Soviet Union was inadequate until a person had stood in Russian lines. Without having Russian mud on your shoes, you could not really understand the place, he said. He was right. I later often saw the distinction in perceptions of Russian realities between those Americans who had and had not spent serious time standing in Russian lines.

Q: Well, a little time there, we might as well cover this. Were you particularly, or your colleagues, targeted by the KGB?

MERRY: In my own case, that started intensively when I moved from Consular to Political. I think this was the experience of many people, that during the year in which you were working in the Administrative Section or the Consular Section, the attention from the KGB was fairly moderate. Once you went into the Political Section the attention went up very sharply. That certainly was my experience. Unlike many of my colleagues, I did not experience much initial attention from the KGB for purposes of file building because obviously they already had my file from their colleagues in East Germany. They didn't have to start a file on me; they inherited a very adequate file. This does not mean we were not under surveillance, but even the KGB had to establish priorities. In East Berlin, the foreign diplomatic community was tiny. In Moscow, it would have required inordinate manpower to perform intensive surveillance on all of us all the time.

I might note that during this first year in Moscow, the year in the Consular Section, we had two chiefs of mission. One was the outgoing U.S. ambassador from President Carter, Thomas Watson of the IBM family, whom I scarcely got to know because he left a couple of months after the election. He seemed a very amiable and rather popular ambassador. With the election of Ronald Reagan came the question of a new ambassador to Moscow. The new Reagan team decided, since Ambassador Watson had departed with the end of the Carter Administration, to send Jack Matlock, an experienced senior Soviet specialist in the Foreign Service, to be chargé d'Affaires on an interim basis until they settled who would be ambassador. Matlock expected this was going to be a few months; it turned out to be 10 months. He didn't even bring all the seasonal clothing he was going to need. In any case, Jack Matlock—who, of course, later was ambassador to Moscow in his own right—got to spend 10 months as chargé in Moscow. I think he enjoyed it enormously.

During most of this time I was in the Consular Section, and that led to some interesting supervisory issues, because Jack had himself served in the Consular Section in an early assignment. He exercised more direct oversight of the Consular Section than most chiefs of mission would. In most embassies the front office wants the Consular Section to do its work competently and not to worry about it. Matlock was one of the very few chiefs of mission who wanted to scrutinize outgoing consular cable traffic and know the details of consular cases. As our cases were often very political, there was some justification for this, but as the acting head of the section for about the last four months I was there, I would have preferred a front office less directly engaged. In any case, I never had anything but good personal ties with Jack Matlock. He is, of course, something of a legend in his own time as a Soviet specialist within the Foreign Service. I mention this because this was the only time I ever worked for him. I never worked on the Soviet desk, and I was not at the embassy when he was ambassador. My only period working with Jack was when he was chargé and I was acting head of the Consular Section.

This was the only consular assignment I ever had in the Foreign Service. Many people complain about having to do a consular tour of duty at the beginning of their Foreign Service career. I didn't do one. My first consular assignment was not as a vice-consul but as a consul, first the deputy head and then the acting head of an important section. I enjoyed it thoroughly, and I think it was a very educational experience. I had daily contact with ordinary Soviet citizens and with real problems created by the Soviet system. In Consular, we saw the human grit and grimness of Soviet life a bit more close up than was the case in the rest of the embassy. We dealt with real human tragedy. One case involved two sisters who had been separated for decades, one in America and one in a village in Ukraine. A real human drama worthy of a great writer. Sometimes we could really help people, whether Americans or Soviets, and that is not something you get to do much in a political section. The intense gratitude of local people whom we could help was something I would not experience again. One elderly woman from Estonia told me I was the first official she had encountered in her entire life who had treated her with respect; she wept at the experience of simple courtesy from an official. Every day in that job was more of an education in Soviet reality than a year of reading. I was a better and more effective political officer in the following two years because of my consular year, plus we never had a dull moment.

Then, in 1981, I moved up to the Political Section, which in Moscow was divided into two. They were called External and Internal. Political/External dealt with Soviet foreign policy, both bilateral with the United States and Soviet policy toward the rest of the world. Political/Internal dealt with Soviet domestic affairs. I was in Political/Internal, which was definitely what I wanted and was there for two years during a fascinating transitional phase in the Soviet Union. This included the last year of Leonid Brezhnev's rule, the coming to power of Yuri Andropov after Brezhnev's death, the end of what later came to be called the "era of stagnation," and a period of great ferment under the surface. To most outside observers, there was very little going on politically in the Soviet Union other than one old man following another at the top. That was very misleading. In fact, there was an enormous amount going on and it was the job of the Political/Internal Section in the Moscow embassy to try to get below the surface to find out what was happening and, of course, to report this to Washington and explain what it all meant.

There were six officers in Political/Internal. Other people in the embassy made contributions to domestic affairs reporting, but the work focussed on a half dozen of us. This was a much larger reporting unit than any other Western embassy had; only the Chinese had more. The chief, in the job I had a decade later, was Kent Brown, who had been my boss during the previous year in consular. We got on famously, and I can say I have rarely had so smooth a working relationship with an immediate superior, and I have been pretty lucky in that regard overall. One officer was responsible almost full time for dealing with Jewish refuseniks, a demanding and difficult position, which brought with it very heavy KGB harassment. One officer was our Sovietologist and Kremlinologist, a guy of rare talent and skill in this regard. He was extremely valuable. My own area of interest and responsibility was primarily nationalities. I was in a job which required me—and I might say allowed me—to travel a lot in country. I was the most traveled Foreign Service officer in the embassy in my two years in Political/Internal. I got to all fifteen of the union republics and to a total of 74 cities of the Soviet Union.

My job was to get out of Moscow and explore those parts of the Soviet Union we were allowed to visit and, of course, report on it. This was similar to my job in the GDR, but much more challenging. Diplomatic travel in the Soviet Union was nothing like as easy or productive as it had been in East Germany. Many parts of the Soviet Union were prohibited to us, closed to travel by foreign diplomats, involving huge amounts of territory and many cities we would very much have liked to visit. We also only traveled in pairs; that was our own requirement for security reasons. Any trip I wanted to make, other than to Leningrad where we had a consulate, I had to find somebody to go with me. That usually meant someone from another section, since it was difficult to take two people away from any one section at the same time. I would travel with somebody from Political/External, or another section, or even someone from another Western embassy. Sometimes I traveled with one of the military attachés, despite their intelligence role which greatly increased surveillance. Many people in the embassy wanted to travel for personal reasons, to see something of the country, but often their jobs militated against it. Other than the military attaches who had special reporting interests, it was unusual for an assignment to require domestic travel, so I was often limited by the need for a travel partner.

The logistics of travel in the Soviet Union were also a problem, because of the scale of the place and the fairly primitive facilities. Winter travel could be especially fraught with uncertainty. There were any number of trips I tried to organize that, for one reason or another, never came off. Occasionally the Soviets would refuse permission, because we had to get foreign ministry authorization every time we left the Moscow area, but often it was something more practical. It required constant effort, but it was worth it. During those two years, I traveled around the Russian Federation, throughout Central Asia and the Baltic states, into the Caucasus, Ukraine and Moldova. These were very eye-opening because you could get a false impression from being only in Moscow or Leningrad.

Q: I'm told that you stepped outside of the outer ring of Moscow and all of a sudden you're in the 16th century.

MERRY: I wouldn't go quite that far, but if you got much beyond the ring highway, yes, you went back in time. There were places within suburban Moscow where I have seen peasant women doing their laundry in winter by taking a big rock and bashing a hole in the ice of the stream or pond. The enormous contrasts of underdevelopment and mis-development that the Soviet Union presented were much more obvious when you got outside of Moscow or Leningrad. I happened to love living in Moscow. This was not, perhaps, typical of most Westerners there and certainly not of most American Embassy staff, but I enjoyed Moscow. Some colleagues in the embassy found my enthusiasm a bit weird, but after all this was one of the great cities of the world, the Cold War notwithstanding. I found Moscow a fascinating, stimulating, interesting place to be, and I got to meet and know many Russians, to be invited to Russian events, and to Russian homes. I got to know people especially in the arts communities, such as painters, jazz musicians, actors and graphic artists and people engaged in a variety of semi-legal and semi-underground cultural activities. I found Moscow a very engaging city, also, in terms of searching out its history. I loved to find and explore the old monasteries that had been converted to secular purposes. The city was full of older buildings with a role in some aspect of the city's history that had been swallowed up by urban expansion. You really had to hunt for a lot of these places.

In fact, after a year or so, I started writing a series of articles for the embassy newsletter of historical walks around the city of Moscow. I had developed these for my own purposes, but I wanted others to know how easy it was to find places of historical interest in the city. I started the series out of frustration hearing people complain at lunch that there was nothing to do, nothing of interest in Moscow. My first article simply revealed some the wonderful historical structures within a ten minute walk of our front gate. This series became fairly well known within the diplomatic community, although the articles were far from scholarly. In fact, the last time I was at the Embassy, I found they still have a compilation of them for staff, though they are far out of date. I have always been an enthusiastic urban walker, so it was natural for me to explore any city. It also reflected the fact that I found Moscow anything but the gray, dreary, boring, tedious stereotype.

I am particularly fond of classical music, and Moscow is a first-class music city. I went many times to performances at the Great Hall of the Conservatory, one of the great concert halls of the world, and to other venues. Obviously, this included the Bolshoi. Despite the prevailing negative perception, getting tickets to the Bolshoi in those days was not a problem for diplomats. In this three year tour I went over 70 times, both for opera and ballet. In my two Moscow tours I saw "Boris Godunov" at the Bolshoi eight times. Moscow was also a great theater city, though the acting style in those days was sometimes a bit stilted. Diplomats had special access to just about everything, if we went to the trouble. The embassy ticket lady, a Soviet employee, got to know my interests and tastes quite well, as I was an excellent customer. I am sure this was reported for my KGB file, but they knew it already from my opera and theater-going in Berlin.

Getting to know this complex and challenging city consumed a lot of my weekends, especially after I came to know some Russians and went around with them. Moscow reflects a history of forced urbanization under Stalin, but is really a number of Russian towns loosely patched together. Sometimes on a weekend, I'd get on the Metro—I did not have a car in Moscow, I used only the Metro, only public transportation—and go out to one of the more distant, obscure Metro stations and just explore the neighborhood for half the day, sticking my head into shops and churches and parks and seeing what life was like, getting a feel for the place. On Sunday mornings I would go a different church, in part to see the interior and in part to observe attendance. There were about 45 working churches in Moscow at that time, and I went to them all over a couple of years. Some represented competing sects within the Orthodox church, like the Old Believers, and I could often strike up a conversation with someone. During Easter week, Holy Week, I was very active in going to church services, meeting people, getting a sense of who was still religiously active and the role of religion in Soviet society, which was much more alive than most people in the West imagined. Most families still had their children baptized, even if surreptitiously, and many young couple had church weddings.

I also spent a fair amount of time in Leningrad because our consulate there was always understaffed and frequently in need of temporary assistance. When they needed somebody to help out for a week or two, I would often volunteer. As I was a bachelor, I was frequently the only person who did volunteer. As a result I got to know this second great Russian city, both during the winter and in the summer during the famous White Nights. I spent about a month in Leningrad one summer. That was another city I just loved to explore; it is heaven for an urban walker. Leningrad was replete with not just political history but literary history. I searched out the places Dostoevsky had lived, and he moved a lot because he frequently couldn't pay the rent. I found places described in, for example, Crime and Punishment, that are real places. You can visit them. The city is full of places where political incidents took place during the Revolution or during the Siege or in earlier periods. Leningrad, in the winter or in the summer, was an utterly fascinating city to explore and to walk in.

Please do not imagine I did not work during those visits to Leningrad. This was my only experience working in a consulate, which I think are much better value for taxpayer money than huge embassies. I regret that we have closed so many consulates, as they are not only excellent places for younger diplomats to gain experience, but they are the best means of providing support to American citizens abroad who may need assistance with no embassy anywhere near. In the summer in Leningrad there were plenty of cases of Americans, especially students, with problems requiring consular support. In one odd case, an American tourist required treatment in a psychiatric hospital for ten days. As the staff spoke no English, I went every morning to translate, taking great care to respect this citizen's privacy in what I would and would not translate. I imagine I was the only American diplomat who ever spent much time in a Soviet psychiatric facility, which gave me an opportunity to learn something about it from extensive talks with the staff while performing my consular duties.

As I didn't have a car and used public transportation and was walking extensively around Moscow and Leningrad and the other cities I visited, I gave the KGB a lot of work because they had to keep me in sight. The poor buggers, I think, had to use up a lot of shoe leather. The quality of the surveillance would vary dramatically, but the only occasions on which they ever deliberately showed their hands or engaged in harassment was when I was engaged in what they would consider a political act. Unfortunately, they considered many things political. For example, in Vilnius, in Lithuania, my travel partner and I were visiting the family of a Lithuanian nationalist who was in political prison. We'd been there for two or three minutes when, literally, the door was just kicked off the hinges. They didn't even knock, they just kicked the door down to inform us that we had no right to be there. If I was trying to attend a dissident trial in Moscow, or if I was visiting a Soviet dissident, then, yes, the KGB could become, shall we say, overt. On one occasion a colleague and I were physically thrown out of the supreme court building of the Russian Federation. When I say thrown out, I was briefly airborne going out the front door. Of course, we protested that to the Foreign Ministry, because they weren't supposed to physically lay hands on diplomats. They were just supposed to tell us to leave. They weren't supposed to pick us up and heave us out the door, which in this case they did.

For the most part, I would say my experience with the KGB was—I certainly wouldn't call it benign—but it was less adversarial than one might think. Something I noticed, and I was not the only one who noticed, was that the KGB tended to harass people whom they felt were disrespectful of Russia, people forever making derogatory, condescending, even semi-racist remarks about Russia and Russians. Those were the people the KGB really harassed. Whereas people—not just Foreign Service officers, but some of our military attachés—who were genuinely interested in the country, its history, and who experienced its culture and clearly had a respect for the nation, for the society, tended to get less harassment from the KGB. Not that they didn't keep a close eye on us, not that they weren't tailing us, not that they weren't tapping our telephones and bugging the apartments and so forth, but they tended to treat with respect those people whom they felt reciprocated some respect. I once asked the foreign ministry for special permission to visit a cemetery that was closed to the public – because Khrushchev was buried there – to lay flowers on the grave of Dmitri Shostakovich on the anniversary of his death. This was simply a personal gesture for me, but I think it redounded to my credit with the Soviet authorities. Cemeteries play an important role in Russian culture, and manifestations of respect for cultural figures are taken seriously.

They did occasionally screw up. One Columbus Day, a Monday holiday for us but not a holiday for them, I had slept in till about ten o'clock in the morning, something like that. I was just beginning to putter around in the kitchen when I heard a key in the lock of the front door. I turned to look into the entry hall, but knew instantaneously what I was about to see. The door opens and two guys in winter coats and hats appear, they see me in my bathrobe standing in the kitchen. One of them mutters an appropriate Russian obscenity. The door closes, they lock the door, and off they go. They had assumed the apartment was empty because this was a Monday, a working day, and they hadn't heard anything on the microphones. It was a classic illustration that they were certainly there. They did regular visits to inventory your apartment for anything of interest, to keep track of what you were doing. Some colleagues suffered real damage to their property, but in my case they only stole corkscrews, several times. Corkscrews were a scarce but necessary item.

On occasion we screwed up as well. I was on a trip across Siberia with a colleague who bought us tickets for the boat on the river at Novosibirsk, but who thought it was going fifteen kilometers downstream rather than the fifty it in fact went. This put us beyond our permitted travel zone. We were detained at the final stop by the uniformed police, with ample plain-clothes guys in evidence taking photographs. The police wrote up a protocol of our violation, which we refused to sign, which was noted, and we were put on the boat back to Novosibirsk. An embarrassment, as we were in the wrong. Nothing much happened in consequence, and I found the experience somewhat educational because the uniformed police captain in the small town where the incident took place was very competent and courteous. I hope he went on to better jobs.

There were significant differentials in how we were treated. My colleague who handled Jewish refuseniks was a constant target of the KGB, they just made his life a misery, whereas my contacts with Christian dissidents were evidently less toxic in their eyes. Leningrad was a much tougher KGB town than Moscow, much. I think this was a common experience for diplomats and journalists. I received more personal harassment in a total of about three months in Leningrad than I did in almost three years in Moscow. They conducted a series of near hit and run encounters with our consular staff. I was one of the targets and was very nearly hit by their car, with its license plates covered over. The Leningrad KGB were real sons of bitches. We found out that, to some extent, the harassment in Leningrad was retaliation for harassment of Soviet UN mission staff in New York by the Jewish Defense League. So, that was reciprocal bullying.

Out on the road, it varied. In some places the KGB were quite obstreperous; in other places they just kept an eye on you. In such a large and diverse country, surveillance was a patchwork. In some cases the surveillance was skillful; in some cases it was comically poor. I remember one KGB guy of rather large girth trying to conceal himself behind a fairly narrow birch tree in Odessa as he was tailing me. It was a like a bad Max Sennett comedy routine. But it varied enormously. For the most part, in the provinces there was little overt harassment. This may have reflected how few and far between were visits by Western diplomats. The exception was the Baltic states, where Soviet sensitivities about local contacts with the outside world were very high. During a trip in Turkmenistan I think my partner and I may have harassed our minders more than they did us. Ukraine tended to reflect its reputation for bully tactics, while places like Armenia and Georgia were astonishing in their relative openness. Tajikistan was very sensitive for them because of the ongoing Soviet campaign next door in Afghanistan. In all, I learned not to generalize too much about the Soviet Union outside of the capital.

There was never any question but that the Soviet Union was a police state, and that the role of foreigners, particularly diplomatic foreigners, was, for them, a sensitive one. They viewed all of us as spies. If you look at their concept of espionage, well, from their perspective, yes, we were all spies. From their viewpoint, just buying the morning newspaper at a kiosk constituted an act of espionage. The fact that I was working for the Foreign Service and the State Department and not for an intelligence agency did not, in any way, from their perspective, distinguish me from anybody else in their very broad concept of what would be espionage.

During these years, I very much enjoyed myself both at work and beyond, traveling extensively in the Soviet Union, exploring the two great cities, Moscow and Leningrad, getting to know a fair number of Russians in different contexts, having many fascinating conversations in railway compartments and cafes and concert intermissions and peoples' kitchens and while out collecting mushrooms, or visiting somebody's dacha (seasonal home) on the weekend, having what, for me, was a very fulfilling and educational experience learning about Russia—and of course, writing a lot of reports back to Washington. I would say my main occupation during these years was listening. I had learned in East Germany not to ask questions so much as to listen to what local people wanted to talk about, to let them guide the conversations, in order to understand their perspective and their concerns. This meant answering, or trying to answer, their questions about America. This was probably a common experience of Americans in the Soviet Union, but I must have been challenged with thousands of questions, often quite naïve, about my country. I would describe the perception of America which existed in the Soviet Union as being out of a novel by Theodore Dreiser. Dreiser was, in fact extremely popular among Russians, both as an author and as a viewpoint on America. Now, whatever relevance Dreiser may once have had, by the '80s, his description of our country was hopelessly out of date. Many, many times I tried to correct or at least modify what I would call a Dreiseresque understanding of America among people I knew. These conversations reflected what I consider now to have been the most important role I played during those years, which was to represent America to a number of Russians. This was quite distinct from representing the United States to the Soviet Union. That kind of official representation is, of course, what diplomats do. But, for me, representing my country as a person to people in the Soviet Union was much more rewarding and, also, much more informative for me. I learned a lot about that country and that society by answering their questions about my own.

At the same time, there were important things going on. The early years of the new Reagan Administration and the aging, decrepit Brezhnev regime in Moscow could be quite adversarial and at times even confrontational. The rhetoric on both sides was completely detached from each other.

Q: Were they laissez-faire? Just no connection, almost?

MERRY: Very little. You have to keep in mind that each side, the early Reagan Administration and the late Brezhnev regime, were each coming from such completely different experiences and worldviews, with contrasting notions about the most basic questions of what a society is, what is political legitimacy, what the future of the world should be, that they were talking past each other to an extraordinary extent. This became actually quite dangerous during the martial law crisis in Poland. Washington tended greatly to overestimate the danger of a direct Soviet intervention in Poland, and Moscow tended greatly to overestimate the extent to which events in Poland were being driven by Washington. In point of fact, the crisis in Poland was a Polish crisis. It was based on Polish workers and Polish intellectuals and Poles in general being Poles. Moscow wanted to see the hand of the United States somehow behind this. Washington wanted to see the beginning of a Soviet military intervention of the kind that had taken place in Czechoslovakia, and before that in Hungary and before that in East Germany. The danger of these mutual misunderstandings leading to a real crisis in East-West relations was, I think, more real than most people would, in retrospect, recognize. When the Polish government declared martial law in mid-December of 1981, we had a 24-hour watch in the Political Section, a genuine crisis watch. The concern was legitimate. This was a real crisis, in my view the most serious crisis between the United States and the Soviet Union since the 1973 Middle East war. It didn't rise quite to that level of danger because there was not an ongoing war, but it was certainly a damned dangerous period.

I became directly involved beyond what my position normally would have called for. At the end of a Friday—actually well into the evening—I was locking up when the political counselor, Sherrod McCall, came to me with a special assignment. He said the front office had just been on the secure line to Washington, where there had been a report in that morning's Washington Post of military reserves being called up in Russia, and people in Washington were becoming frantic over the danger of a Soviet intervention in Poland. The embassy had a lot of contact with informed people, editors, people in Soviet think tanks and so on, and we had a much more balanced view of Soviet intentions, which was that Moscow wanted General Jaruzelski to control the situation in Poland on his own. The Soviets had absolutely no desire to intervene in Poland because they knew it would be a disaster. McCall told me Washington needed a high-level message from the embassy, to calm things down, so he gave me the task. It should have gone to a colleague in the Political/External section, a friend of mine, but he was out of the country at his sister's wedding. Sherrod McCall decided I was the guy to write this message, perhaps because I had recently written a long report about the impact of Polish events on neighboring Lithuania. Starting around eight-thirty or nine o'clock on a Friday, that's what I did all night. I had a decent draft by the time people came to work on Saturday – we pretty much all came in on Saturdays in the Political Section. However, this message required a lot of clearances and tweaking, and eventually went out on Sunday morning. I worked on this message from Friday evening until Sunday morning, getting breaks for food and some rest while waiting for clearances. Keep in mind that in an era of typewriters, every alteration required retyping pages of text, and I did it all.

This was a high-level message from the ambassador to Washington saying, “It is our judgment that the Soviets want, above all, to avoid military intervention in Poland. They are under no misapprehension that the Poles hate them. They know perfectly well that an intervention in Poland would not be like intervening in Prague, that it would not be only one city, that it would involve cities all over Poland, and this would create a crisis within the socialist bloc that would dwarf what had happened in the crushing of the Prague Spring or even in the invasion of Afghanistan.” As memory serves, that is pretty much what the message said, but at much greater length.

I’m fairly proud of that message because, after the end of the Cold War when Yeltsin started declassifying Soviet high-level documentation—much of which is now available through the Cold War International History Project—we have the declassified minutes of politburo meetings of the Soviet leadership during this time. If anything, our evaluation and what I wrote in this message were more correct than even we understood. The Soviet leadership had made a decision that no matter how bad things developed in Poland, they were not going to intervene, that even if Jaruzelski couldn’t keep things together they weren’t going to intervene. That was certainly farther than the analysis I was willing to put down on paper at the end of 1981. I’m happy to say this was a case when the U.S. Embassy really served the national interest by telling Washington to calm down, because the country we were responsible for understanding, the Soviet Union, was not going to be as bellicose as many people in Washington feared. Although I wrote the message, obviously I distilled information gathered by a number of people and the thinking of a number of colleagues. I had my own point of view and I fought for it and, with some modifications, that’s what went out. I think we all earned our paychecks that weekend.

During the ensuing year, 1982, we experienced the end of the Brezhnev era, with the death, not just of Leonid Brezhnev himself, but of other members of his generation of the Soviet leadership. Among the first to die was Mikhail Suslov, who was the politburo member in charge of ideology and supposedly a true hardliner, though some of the declassified documents after the end of the Cold War put him in a somewhat less hard-line light. It was pretty obvious, during 1982, that we were approaching the end of the Brezhnev era. We had an embassy contingency plan for Brezhnev’s death. We were, all of us, very focused on the question of the succession; what’s going to happen after Brezhnev. Who’s going to take the helm?

MERRY: This was obviously a matter of intense interest to Washington. By this time, the Reagan Administration was beginning, at Reagan’s behest, to look for areas of engagement with the Soviet Union. The relationship was still pretty bad; that didn’t change until later in the Reagan Administration, after Gorbachev had taken power. That’s still quite a ways in the future. But in 1982, the Reagan Administration was trying to find what could be done in arms control and with various East-West issues. We were very unhappy with things they were doing in Nicaragua, things they were doing in parts of the Middle East, the continuing Soviet war in Afghanistan. They were unhappy with some things we were doing: our very substantive support to the mujahideen (Islamic guerrilla fighters) in Afghanistan, our efforts to destabilize their partner regime in Nicaragua, and confrontations in places ranging from Ethiopia to Angola. But there were senior people in the Reagan Administration who understood that a transition was approaching in the Soviet leadership, and that transition was going to be important to the United States.

As I mentioned earlier, it took 10 months for the Reagan Administration to send a new ambassador to Moscow, but they certainly picked the right man for the job. They sent Arthur Hartman, a career Foreign Service officer who had been, for the previous five years, ambassador in Paris and had earlier been assistant secretary for European Affairs. Hartman was a man with no direct Soviet background. He was not a Russian speaker, he was not a Russia hand, he was not a Soviet hand. He had a lot of experience with the Soviets, particularly as assistant secretary for European Affairs under Henry Kissinger. He was something of a surprise choice for Reagan's ambassador to the Soviet Union. He was not a known hardliner. He was not known as somebody who would publicly smite the communists hip and thigh from an ambassadorial position. He was known as a top-flight professional diplomat, but he had just spent five years in Paris and was coming with no formal background in Soviet affairs. He was, however, Reagan's choice. He arrived in the fall of 1981, and brought with him as his deputy Warren Zimmerman, who had worked with him in Paris, who had a background in Yugoslavia and in the Soviet Union. I think the U.S. Embassy in Moscow during my second and third years, under Arthur Hartman's leadership, was, all told, the highest quality mission in my entire professional experience. That's partly because every U.S. government agency sent really good people there. The military did, the CIA did, the Department of Agriculture did, USIA did, and the State Department certainly did.

With Hartman and Zimmerman there was an extraordinary amount of not only good team spirit, but the kind of leadership that is somewhat rare in the Foreign Service. True leadership, and a warmth between the chief of mission and the staff, was something I found extremely gratifying. I could never quite bring myself to address the ambassador by his first name; I could never call him "Art." I do now that we're both retired. When he was the ambassador, I just couldn't bring myself to address him as anything other than "Mr. Ambassador." But many people called him "Art," and he was a remarkably approachable, easy-going guy as a chief of mission. He was also a remarkably tough, even downright steely person in dealing with the Soviets on issues. Behind that somewhat urbane, Frenchified exterior, Art Hartman had real steel. He understood how to deal with the Soviets, that you couldn't let them nickel and dime you, that you had to maintain your position on the small things, not just the big things, and that you had to show them when and where you just wouldn't give way. On a number of occasions he really annoyed Foreign Minister Gromyko, which is something of an achievement.

I came to have not only personal liking for Arthur Hartman—which wasn't at all difficult—but a lot of respect for him as the kind of smart, tough-as-nails but non-ideological ambassador that I thought the United States really needed in the Soviet Union during this period of the Cold War. I thought it was just a first-class embassy, which did a lot of first-class work. We had excellent leadership in the Political Section under, first, Sherrod McCall, who was regarded with great fondness by almost everybody who worked for him; he was known as "Uncle Sherrod." Then came Curtis Kamman, a man for whom I have the highest regard and personal liking. I think we just had a hell of a good team. I look back on it as being the epitome of the U.S. professional diplomatic service at a key point in our nation's history during the Cold War, in the absolute front line of the Cold War in Moscow.

Q: How did you operate there, as a political officer?

MERRY: Well, as I mentioned, the Political Section being split between Internal and External, we had very different kinds of tasks. Our colleagues in External were in the business of dealing with the foreign ministry. I never did. Other than when I was in the Consular Section, I don't think I ever set foot in the Soviet Foreign Ministry. Those of us on the Internal side were dealing as much as anything with the cracks in Soviet society. We had a number of contacts with Soviet think tanks, such as the U.S.A. and Canada Institute, editors of the Communist Party journal Kommunist, various political writers—some with somewhat nefarious reputations, like Victor Louis, and others of real repute, like Roy Medvedev—who had insight into what was going on. We also dealt with the diplomats from other countries who had insight into what was going on: a few of our British colleagues, French, German. The Chinese were particularly well informed. Some of the foreign journalists based in Moscow were very good and well informed. One of the best at that time was a Dane, which shows you that individual talent has nothing to do with a country's size. Our embassy was a center for much of the discussion of Soviet affairs among a wide range of people because we represented a superpower. People wanted Washington to have their insights and views. We all traded information and rumor, so that we tended to pool our collective experience to try to understand what was going on in this fairly opaque political system.

We obviously followed the Soviet press carefully, a quite tedious undertaking. I first started drinking coffee only then, to help me get through Pravda in the morning; tea was just not enough. The Soviet press was not completely lacking in real information. It was a matter of understanding how they packaged it, and what various words and phrases meant in a particular context, and how to glean information about who was on top and who was not and where the political winds were blowing by reading Pravda in the same way that a Soviet Communist Party official out in the boondocks would read Pravda, to get the little indications of which way the weathervane was turning. My colleague the embassy Kremlinologist was much more skilled at this than I was. They would occasionally reveal bits of information in odd ways. It was my habit to look at the afternoon daily Izvestia late before I left the office. One Friday afternoon, buried in the middle of the sports news was a little paragraph about Andrei Sakharov, who was then in internal exile in the city of Gorky, that he was on a hunger strike and had been taken to a hospital. It was just a couple of sentences. Of course, we had known about his hunger strike, but no more. Immediately I got on the phone to Washington and started knocking out a telegram.

We could sometimes glean interesting comments by trying to meet the author of an interesting article to follow up with him. Sometimes that would be productive and sometimes it wouldn't. You could never tell, when you walked into an office, whether you were going to be wasting your time or were going to be getting real insight. I remember being in Volgograd, the former Stalingrad, shortly after the 40th anniversary of the German surrender in February 1983. I had gone down there with a colleague, to see how they marked the anniversary. That part of the trip was interesting enough, though it was bitterly cold. In addition our local sponsors decided we should visit the hydroelectric power station on the Volga. I thought to myself, “Oh, God. Another hydroelectric power station.” By that point I had been to a number of Soviet dams and heard the statistics and felt I knew the drill. In this case, however, we never actually saw the dam. They did not show us the turbines or tell us how many cubic yards of concrete were there and how many kilowatt hours it put out. We were shown immediately into the office of the deputy director, and had one of the most fascinating conversations of my three years in the Soviet Union. This man had spent his entire professional life building and operating hydroelectric power dams, which he now believed were a mistake. This man had become an environmentalist, he was a “green” in a senior management position in the Soviet electric power sector. He spent a couple of hours explaining to us in detail why his dam was an environmental mistake, why the Aswan dam in Egypt he had worked on was a mistake, and why all the great Soviet dams were a mistake. It was the damndest thing. We didn’t even ask to talk about environmental issues, but this man unloaded on us why his life’s work needed to be undone. It was a fascinating insight. The man obviously knew what he was talking about. Again, when you walked into somebody’s office you could not know if you’re going to get screamed at or bored out of your mind or really informed.

In another case, I was in Ufa, the capital of the Bashkir Republic in the Urals. Somehow,—I think by mistake—they gave me an unscheduled meeting with the top man in the republic government. I was astonished, as I had never been received at that level before. I think it was the result of confusion in the bureaucracy when I showed up, as they couldn’t quite figure out what to do with me. I don’t think they’d ever seen an American diplomat before. They showed me into this guy’s office, and he was a screamer. I was there for about three-quarters of an hour while he had a series of brief meetings with other people, and his sole means of communication was screaming at people, on the telephone and in person. Mostly he just ignored me, as I sat there watching him scream at others. Finally, he got to me and said he wouldn’t talk to me, that I had no right to be in his city and his republic, and he wanted me out by nightfall. I pointed out that the foreign ministry in Moscow had given me permission to be there, but it was quite clear this man was a feudal lord in the Bashkir Republic. There were no laws that in any way inhibited him. Moscow was a long way away. He was the laird and could do pretty much anything he wanted to do, and he was a bully in every sense of the word. I actually felt some moderate fear just being in the same room with this man; I was alone in this instance. I was glad when the meeting was terminated. It wasn’t an informative meeting in the same way that my meeting with the dam director had been in Volgograd, but it was certainly an educational and instructive meeting.

I mention those two as contrasting characters, illustrating the range of a couple hundred meetings in various parts of the Soviet Union, many of which were not particularly memorable. But some of them certainly were.

Q: Did you get anything from these—I don’t know what you’d call them—educational lectures?

MERRY: Oh, yes. I would occasionally go to what was called the Znaniye Society, “znaniye” meaning “knowledge.” These were public lectures on all kinds of topics, oriented towards the better educated part of the Soviet public. I went to these lectures if they were on a topic of special interest to me. It wasn't so much the lecture I wanted to hear, but the Q&A session afterwards; that was how you could get a sense of public concerns. For example, I went to a lecture on "scientific atheism," a topic that will put you to sleep, if nothing else will. During the Q&A period, there was a guy in the audience who was a provocateur, who kept asking questions, like "Is it true the Bible is the most popular book ever published?" This and similar questions. The lecturer got really flustered, because he obviously was not accustomed to dealing with even simple questions from a religious believer. This provocateur was tying the lecturer in knots in front of the audience. Finally, whoever was running the program started showing a movie about how spaceflight proves there is no God, and the debate moved out into the corridor with the provocateur now departed, but another man just furious that this Znaniye lecturer couldn't deal with the questions. The man identified himself as a Communist Party member, but he was outraged, demanding, "This organization is called znaniye! What the hell kind of znaniye is it if you can't answer a few simple questions from a stupid believer?" It was a really interesting evening.

One of the interesting items in my portfolio was the production of the annual "Moscow Miscellany" telegram. This was a compendium of Soviet political humor and anecdotes, obtained from the entire embassy staff but largely the Political Section. This was an old tradition in Moscow, and also in a number of other bloc embassies – I had done a similar annual message from Embassy Berlin. The "Moscow Miscellany" was unique, however, in the readership it received in Washington. By some accounts, it was the most widely distributed and read Foreign Service telegram of the year. President Reagan loved it and would occasionally use items in his speeches. That fact imposed some restraint on me as the editor, because some anecdotes involved identifiable individuals, so I felt the item could not be included lest the President unintentionally compromise one of our local sources. There were the so-called "Radio Yerevan" jokes and the "Rabbi, Rabbi!" jokes. For example, "Rabbi, rabbi, is it possible to build socialism in one country, say in Holland? Of course, my son, of course, but what have you got against Holland?" As Brezhnev became increasingly feeble, there were lots of jokes about him, often quite vicious. Some jokes I recognized as recycled Walter Ulbricht jokes from the GDR, though I suspect that humor about aging dictators has a very long pedigree. Once Andropov took over, the humor took on an edge of anxiety, as people did not know what to expect from the new regime. Brezhnev jokes were much funnier than Andropov jokes.

Q: You were there in the political section—this would be '81- '82 or so?

MERRY: It was '81 to '83.

Q: If you were to characterize what was going on, was there anything, a political movement or anything, or developments going on at that particular time?

MERRY: No. There were some things going on of a national character in the Baltic states, and in parts of Central Asia, particularly around the Fergana Valley and parts of Central Asia that bordered on Afghanistan. There would occasionally be rumblings in the Caucasus. In Azerbaijan, Georgia, and Armenia, you'd occasionally hear little bits and pieces. I received my first full-bore Armenian nationalist sermon in Yerevan, in a man's apartment, where he lectured me at length on what Woodrow Wilson had supposedly promised the Armenians and my personal responsibility to fulfill the creation of a “greater Armenia.” Within Russia itself, there were famous dissidents like Sakharov and others mostly not known in the West, who were seeking an opening up of their society. For the most part, however, these were classic representatives of the Russian intelligentsia, who throughout Russian history have been the lonely voices of truth speaking to power. Their courage was very admirable. I knew a few of them, and they certainly had more guts than I do. However, they were voices on the outside. What mattered were the under-the-surface fault-line changes taking place within the nomenklatura, within the Soviet Communist Party system itself. We would occasionally have conversations that were quite candid, with people within the system who were just utterly disgusted with the Brezhnev leadership.

I remember conversations with people who had traveled to the West, and had seen the contrast between their country and the West. Sometimes, not even the West, but people who had traveled to Poland and East Germany, or people who had been in Finland, and could see the contrast between the way people lived in those countries and the way people lived in their own country. The conflict for them inside was fierce, as these were very patriotic people, people who were very proud of their country, and yet were faced with this contrast of the squalid conditions in which most people in their country lived in comparison with other countries that had been just as badly damaged in the war, like Yugoslavia or Poland, where people now lived much better. Polish workers were organizing Solidarity and moving towards overthrowing the communist system in Poland, and yet Polish workers would eat meat once or twice a day, when their Soviet counterparts would be lucky to have meat that often in a week, and not even as good meat. Many people in the Soviet elite—particularly what was called the Golden Youth, who had traveled abroad and seen the outside world—were just fed up with the stagnation of the Brezhnev era and really, really wanted a change.

The figure on whom many of them focused their hopes and aspirations was Yuri Andropov. Not yet Gorbachev—that’s still in the future. Even though Andropov’s background was the KGB, he was also known as being a highly intelligent, sophisticated man who wanted to change things; who wanted to get the Soviet system off of its duff, and to make Leninism work. There were a lot of people who were really champing at the bit waiting for the change, waiting for the transition.

Q: Was this a period where you would sit and watch Brezhnev get up and wonder if he was going to finish his speech or not?

MERRY: On one occasion, I went to a session of the Supreme Soviet. I was in the diplomatic loge and was in fact the only spectator of any kind at the session. There wasn’t a soul in the balcony. There were half a dozen loges along the side, one of which was for diplomats. I was the only person in any of them, and was there with my little Zeiss pocket binoculars, looking at the leadership, trying to figure out who was going to be the next one to die. We could observe this, to some degree, on television, but television wasn’t going to show any really embarrassing stuff. So I was up in the diplomatic loge studying everybody on the stage, to see who looked the most fragile. It’s the kind of thing American diplomats did in the old Soviet Union.

Eventually, in November of 1982, Brezhnev did die. We received an indication of this from an unofficial source. It hadn't yet been announced. I got a call at home early in the morning from my immediate boss, Kent Brown, and he did not tell me what they had heard, but he said, "On your way in, go by the Central Committee complex and look into the central courtyard." I understood exactly why he was asking that, because we knew from satellite photographs that whenever the Central Committee of the Communist Party had a plenum, they would clear out all of the cars from the courtyard so the big cars, for the big shots, could get in and out. Clearing out the courtyard was an indication of an unscheduled Central Committee plenum, which would of necessity take place if Brezhnev had died. So I went down there on the Metro, and hiked around the Central Committee complex, looking in through the gates and, sure enough, the courtyard was empty. We had indications from other sources that Brezhnev was dead. So we told Washington, it's pretty clear that he's gone.

That was not long before the official announcement came out, and then started what were some of the most demanding three or four days of my life, Brezhnev's funeral. The Reagan Administration sent Vice President Bush and Secretary of State Shultz to the funeral, obviously to make contact with the new leadership, which had not yet even been announced. Vice President Bush was on a multi-country trip in Africa, which they interrupted. He flew up to Frankfurt, dumped most of his staff and came into Moscow, and Secretary Shultz came in separately. I was assigned to be the embassy liaison officer with the vice president's team, first with his advance team and then, once the vice president arrived, with him. I wasn't his control officer, that was Mark Parris the head of Political/External in the embassy. Mark was in charge of the visit. The vice president's advance team asked for somebody who knew Moscow well to be assigned to them full time. As I had a reputation of being out and around Moscow all the time and had written those walking tours, I was chosen to be with the visitors day and night. This meant getting about two hours of sleep a night for the next four nights, as we went through the preparations for the funeral and then the funeral itself.

Vice President Bush's staff were very professional and very good to work with. They were already exhausted, as they had been on this African trip. They were functioning on Benzedrine and willpower, but they were first-class, easy to work with, very professional, no nonsense. We spent a couple of days organizing what the vice president would do, and then, once the vice president arrived, doing it. That included going to the Hall of Columns in the House of Unions for a wreath-laying directly from the airport, going to the actual funeral itself on Red Square the next day, and then to the official meetings afterwards. I was on Red Square during the funeral, although I wasn't supposed to be. The U.S. presence was limited to the vice president, the secretary of state and one Secret Service man, but at the very last minute three staff were added so I was actually on Red Square for Brezhnev's funeral in violation of protocol, but it wasn't our violation. A Soviet three-star KGB general who was more or less in charge just said to us, "Why don't you guys go on out and watch the show?" So the White House doctor, the Regional Security Officer and myself were taken on to Red Square and placed right in front of the entire general staff of the Soviet Army. I looked back on rows of generals, and they obviously wondered who in hell we were. In some of the photographs, we're quite conspicuous.

After the funeral, I accompanied the vice president to a series of meetings, including the first meeting with Andropov. I wasn't actually in the meeting, of course. The only people in the meeting were the vice president, Secretary Shultz, Ambassador Hartman and the interpreter. I was the logistics guy for that meeting and meetings with various other people who were in Moscow; for example, the Pakistani president was there.

Q: I can't remember—was it Chernenko or Andropov who followed Brezhnev?

MERRY: It was Andropov. Now, that is an interesting point, because shortly before Brezhnev's death, we had a visit by a team experts from CIA, and there was a dispute with them because the embassy—not myself, but my colleague, our Sovietologist—had been telling Washington that Andropov would be the successor. The common wisdom in Washington was that Chernenko would be the successor. I'm happy to say the embassy was right. My colleague, when the actual announcement came out, was like the cat who has eaten a canary, because he had been right where all of the smart money in Washington had been wrong. I remember watching Andropov as this first meeting with Bush was starting. I was not in the full meeting itself, but there was a presence to him that had been notably lacking in the Soviet leadership in recent years. There was a "there" there. There was an active mind behind those eyes.

This four-day period, from the time Brezhnev died through the time we put the vice president on his plane to go back to his truncated Africa tour, was, as I recall, just complete, round-the-clock work. I got about two hours of sleep a night each of those nights. It was also quite cold; not yet a Russian winter, but cold enough to feel; it was November. We were going non-stop. This was a vice presidential visit with no preparation: no briefing books, no planning, no prior organization. The advance team, including Secret Service, were working with us, and we're working with the Soviets, and it got done. Most of it, to me now, is a blur. The part I remember really well was the actual funeral, because that was the only time I got to stand still and not be doing anything during this four-day period. It was an hour and a half standing out on Red Square during the funeral. If I had been able to sit down I'm sure I would have gone to sleep.

However, I did get a good telegram out of the experience. As I had seen more of the preparations and conduct of the funeral than anyone else at the embassy, I thought it might be good to share what I had witnessed with Washington. The cable was titled, "A Clockwork Red." It almost did not go out, as I had second thoughts about the thing, that it was not sufficiently "serious". Curt Kamman had doubts as well, but decided to send it in. We got more positive feedback on that message than on anything else the Political Section did that year; people in Washington just loved it and passed it around. I took a lesson from that for my own later role as chief of Political/Internal, that illustrative slice-of-life reporting can be more effective in attracting a readership than even high-quality standard reporting. Washington readers like to be titillated.

Q: How soon after this did you leave?

MERRY: This was in November of 1982 and I left in the summer of '83. Obviously the next half-year was a period in which the embassy was evaluating, examining, hearing things. There was a lot going on, particularly in the economics field, as people who had worked in economics institutes, not just in Moscow but particularly out in Novosibirsk, who knew what the problems were, who understood what needed to be done, but who couldn't get any attention up until that time, were now formulating schemes and proposals. There was a lot going on within the Soviet system, most of it out of public view. With Andropov, there was the end of an era, the Brezhnev era, and the beginning of something else. What that something else was going to actually be, we didn't know.

Of course, the Andropov era was very truncated because he only lived another 15 months. He was followed by Chernenko, who also didn't live very long, 13 months, and who was a throwback to Brezhnev. Chernenko was an appalling choice for a Soviet leader, but the transition ultimately resulted in Gorbachev. It's an interesting question, how things would have developed had Andropov been healthy enough to run things for a few years. He would have been Gorbachev without Gorbachev's more benign instincts, I think. Would the Soviet Union have endured longer with an Andropov who wanted to reinvigorate things, but who still had a firm hand and would be ruthless in maintaining and exercising power, which Gorbachev ultimately was not? Hard to know. Obviously, it's a counterfactual question. With the coming of Yuri Andropov came the retirement of many of the Brezhnev-era people, the beginning of the exposure of some of the pervasive corruption of the Brezhnev era. A few people were arrested, people who had been related to people at the top, who'd been a little too greedy and were now made an example of.

We tended to focus on the top-level political issues, because that was what Washington cared about, but you often learned more about the erosion of the Soviet system from ground-level experience. Now, everyone who lived in the Brezhnev era has a fund of anecdotes to illustrate its inherent fragility, but my all-time favorite is not even an experience of my own. One of the assistant military attaches had vehicle trouble on the road to Leningrad and got a tow from a Soviet truck driver – very much a common practice, by the way, given the crappy cars and crappier roads. Along the way he learned that the driver was not, as appeared, delivering a load of tires to an address in Leningrad but was on an illicit vacation. His superior at the tire factory in Odessa had given him the tires with fake delivery paperwork to get past the police checkpoints along the route. Once they were out of sight of the final checkpoint on the outskirts of Leningrad, the guy stops, drops the back flap of the truck and dumps the brand-new tires into the ditch by the side of the road. Then he got back into the cab, looks at my friend with a big grin and recites one of the classic slogans of the system, "Thus we are building Communism!" Honest to God, I am not making this up. That was how some members of the proletariat regarded "real existing socialism."

My point is that the Soviet Union in those days was a giant with feet of clay, but Washington pretty much saw only the giant. That was understandable, as nobody knew in which direction the Soviet leadership would turn. In retrospect, it is not at all obvious that things would develop as they did. The Soviet Union could very well have become violent and destructive in its final years. If either Grishin or Romanov had become party boss after Andropov, I hate to think what our world might have looked like. So, those last six months of mine in Moscow were a period of questions without clear answers. A large part of what we were doing was asking questions and speculating. I wrote a long article for a classified in-house State Department opinion publication; I don't remember what it was called, but it was a classified journal with official distribution, for individual views. I wrote a piece for it, which I haven't seen since and do not remember at all. It was not a dissent, but a personal musing on where the Soviet Union might be heading. I mention it because it's illustrative of the kind of speculation which the outside world was starting to generate about what kind of changes we could expect from the Soviet Union.

Until Brezhnev's death, we had not had a congressional delegation in a very long time. As soon as Andropov was in, congressmen started to come to Moscow in droves and, of course, they wanted to meet with Andropov. They did not get the meetings because the Soviet system was not yet that open to the West. Journalists started coming, wanting background interviews, which I remember giving a lot. There was a sense, not just among the diplomats, but among everybody, that the Soviet Union had been hibernating for a number of years, and now the bear was waking up. What would that mean?

Many of us wrote things—I remember writing a long speculative telegram on the subject that I recall did go in. Embassy Moscow had a fine tradition, which it maintained for a long time and still may, of occasionally submitting an individual officer's views not as dissent channel but just as an expression of an individual's views. I can't remember seeing any other embassy do that. I doubt my speculations in that message would look very prescient now, as I tended to perceive the Soviet future in negative terms. After all, the visible evidence all pretty much was negative.

Q: Were you within the ranks of looking at the internal situation, looking at the ethnic mix, and what would this mean?

MERRY: Since nationalities were part of my responsibility, that's one of the things I speculated about but I did not see the serious ferment ahead. It was mostly pretty quiet. The real problems among the nationalities were still a few years into the future. Things really started perking up out in the provinces of the Soviet empire after Gorbachev came in, partly because Gorbachev had a real blind spot on nationalities. He believed the nationality problem had been solved. He never understood nationalism, certainly not within the Soviet Union. Much more of his concern was focused on nationalities within Eastern Europe. Poland, first and foremost, but not too far behind, Hungary. It was pretty clear that Ceaușescu's regime in Romania was creaking towards some kind of end. But everything centered on Poland, because Poland was the one country where the government was not, in any reasonable way, in control of its own population. The communist government in Poland functioned at the sufferance of its people. So particular attention was focused there. Within the Soviet Union, lots of non-Russian peoples were beginning to ask questions, but keep in mind that what seemed possible just a few years later, when Gorbachev was in power, was still within the realm of fantasy and the unthinkable when Andropov was in power.

Q: I'm looking at time and this is probably a good place to stop.

MERRY: OK, let me just cover one other thing: one subject that I pursued during my two years in the Political Section in Moscow that was of particular personal interest and for which I gained something of a reputation was the role of religion and the church in Soviet Russia. This initially raised some eyebrows because nobody had written about religion or the church, other than as a human rights issue, in living memory. Nobody had reported on religion as a social issue, as a question of national identity, of the Orthodox Church in Russia as an institution that had a role to play in society and in national identity, or argued that the church was not just a bunch of old women. Some people thought I must have a personal religious act to grind, which was not the case. From my time in grad school I had recognized the enduring spirituality of Russian culture and understood it remained vibrant, despite official hostility. This was not just part of my official responsibilities. I pursued this theme because I was interested in it, and I got support from my bosses within the embassy because nobody had written on this in many years. In fact, I had to go way back—back to George Kennan; he had written about religion when he was at the embassy—to find somebody who actually took the church seriously.

Because of my expertise in this field, I was chosen to shepherd Billy Graham on a controversial visit in which he took part in a Soviet-sponsored ecumenical “peace conference.” While he did take part in religious services in both Baptist and Orthodox churches, he was strangely uninterested in the realities of life for Soviet believers. I saw believers beaten and arrested outside the Orthodox cathedral where Graham and other conference participants were attending services, but he expressed no sympathy for them when I told about it afterwards.

The time and attention I devoted to the study and reporting of religion in the Soviet Union were personally gratifying. I met many interesting people who would not otherwise have had any contact with America. Years later, I was vindicated because, once the Soviet Union fell apart, the Russian church demonstrated it was not just a bunch of old women and that it did still have a vital role to play in Russian society. Not necessarily always a positive role, but certainly a role, and at least back in the early 1980s there was somebody at the embassy in Moscow telling Washington that spiritual institutions were still very much alive and ultimately an important part of what Russia is.

Let me wrap up this portion by paying tribute to the superb quality of the team we had in Moscow in the early 80's: the military attaches, the Station personnel, the USIA people, from the Department of Agriculture, the Admin and Consular staff, and of course the Political and Economic Sections. I have been fortunate to work in some pretty fine diplomatic missions, but none ever was quite as good as Embassy Moscow in those days. We had real team work and dedication that made coming to work each morning a stimulating experience. Patriotism certainly played a role, as we were in the front trench of the Cold War. I cannot say that other people enjoyed living in Moscow as much as I did; there is no question I was a bit odd in that respect. However, everyone understood the importance of what we were doing. First-class leadership from Ambassador Hartman and his deputy Warren Zimmermann played a very important role, but I think the embassy was just first-class top to bottom. If you look at how many of the staff went on to become ambassadors, it is very impressive.

Living in Moscow was certainly not deluxe in any way. We had very limited access to fresh foods during much of the year, so it was important to take vitamins to avoid health problems. The city was neither healthy nor user-friendly; I would not want to be handicapped in Moscow, then or now. I was in my early 30's and active, so the limitations of the place did not bother me. I actually enjoyed the winters, although November with its freezing rain and mud was always pretty depressing until we got a lift from our Thanksgiving Day festivities. Housing was pretty basic. My apartment was quite small, with a living room, bedroom, kitchen and bath, with the washer/dryer in the living room in a closet. It was “cozy” shall we say, but I was quite content there. My kitchen had a view onto an old monastery with a bell tower and cathedral dome, so the first things I saw in the morning were a bit of old Russian architecture. I used only the Metro, but it was by far the most sensible way to get around that enormous city. We got hardship pay for Moscow duty, and I expect we earned it. The place was no hardship for me, but I was widely viewed as eccentric in my enthusiasm for Moscow. Enthusiasm overcomes a lot of perceived hardships in our service, I find.

It was also the assignment I remember as the most fun of any I have had. Given that Moscow was a pretty gray and grim place, and that many people bitched and moaned about it a lot, it was striking what a great party place that embassy was. We had terrific weekends at the embassy dacha, we had some nigh-legendary embassy parties, like one St Patrick's Day bash that will live in the memory of all who were present, and we did things like meet in the Political Section most Friday afternoons for caviar and vodka, our "Friday afternoon snort." We had amateur theatricals, and I was conned into directing a production of "Oklahoma" that was a big hit despite my input. It may surprise some people who would regard Cold War Moscow as not a very cheerful place, but I have never had quite so much genuine fun, both with Americans and with locals, as in those years in the early 80's.

It is also true I did a lot of drinking in Russia. Most of my intake was with Russians, so it was kind of an occupational hazard, but as someone who had not used alcohol at all until my mid-20's, getting into the booze level of Russian society was quite an adjustment. Russian parties – and I was at many – were always alcohol driven. Whatever you may have heard about drinking in Russia, the truth is worse. Red wine with vodka toasts, for example. One New Year's Eve I spent with a young scientist from Georgia – Georgians are legendary boozers even by Russian standards – and I paid with a brutal hangover after five bottles of wine and spirits between two people. In Russia, alcohol is both a social lubricant and a disease. I never approached anything like it again, even in my second Moscow tour, thankfully.

I also did some travel outside of Russia, though not as much as others in the embassy. I liked in-country travel so much that I did not feel a need to get to the West regularly. We each got a free trip to Helsinki once a year, from which I acquired an enduring admiration and liking for Finland. I went to France once to visit friends and, candidly, to eat my way the length of the Loire Valley. I took one long out-of-country trip, to Thailand and Burma at the invitation of a Canadian colleague in Bangkok. That was a terrific change of pace. I traveled through much of Thailand on my own, which I loved, and spent a week in Burma, which was fairly off the beaten path in those days but utterly fascinating.

I very much wanted to stay a fourth year, but Warren Zimmermann felt I should come up for air and then get another Moscow assignment later on. I worried I might never be able to return, which in the Cold War was not an unreasonable concern, and I might never see some of my Russian friends again. I had some final meetings with people I cared about very deeply with the expectation this was a last meeting in our lives, that we would never see each other again. In some cases, I was able to pick up the relationship years later, but in others, I simply could not find them again after the passage of time. I still recall with pain parting from a friend on a metro platform with both of us knowing it was forever. That rupture of human relationships for political reasons was one of the things I hated most about the nature of the Soviet system and why, unlike some people, I feel absolutely no nostalgia for nor regret for the demise of the Soviet Union.

WAYNE LEININGER
Russian Language Training, Foreign Service Institute
Washington, DC (1980)

Consular Officer
Moscow (1980-1984)

Born in New York State, Mr. Leininger was raised in New York and Florida. After graduating from Florida State University he joined the Foreign Service. His foreign assignments, primarily in the Consular field, include Moscow, Tel Aviv, Hong Kong and New Delhi, where he was Regional Supervisory Consul General. After attending the State Department's Senior Seminar Mr. Leininger had several assignments in Washington concerning Personnel Management.

Q: After your academic stint, what was your next assignment?

LEININGER: My only request to my career development officer, with whom I dealt at very long distance, was that my next assignment be to a post that had an English-language school. That was so that my son could start first grade in such a school. I was told that there were a number of posts that fit my requirements, including Palermo, Italy. The job of deputy principal officer was coming open. I applied for it and was chosen. I was supposed to go to Italian language training first. After I had been approved for the job, my career development officer sent me the post report. Lo and behold, nothing was said about an English school. So I went back to him and pointed out that my only requirement had not been met. So Personnel put that assignment on hold. By sheer happenstance, it was about at this time that an officer - the chief of the Consular Section in Moscow - resigned - in a great deal of self-generated publicity. He denounced the Department for making the Embassy in Moscow utterly marginal, and irrelevant to U.S.-Soviet relations. So that job opened up. It was a job for an FS-1 - or one grade above my level at the time. Also it required a working knowledge - a 3/3 - of Russian.

When I was approved for the job, I had to go to language training first. That meant that the Moscow position had to be left vacant for a year - or, rather, it was filled on a temporary basis by Kent Brown and Wayne Merry - two political officers! I returned from the west coast to Washington and attended language training for a year. You'll recall that I had studied Russian in the past, so that it was more a matter of refreshment and enhancement - or rather, erasing some very ungrammatical Russian that I had learned. My vocabulary was old-fashioned.

Q: So you went to Moscow in the summer of 1981. This was your first important overseas assignment. What was it like when you arrived?

LEININGER: I was in Moscow from 1981 to 1984 - the "deepest and darkest" days of the "Evil Empire." In 1980, we had boycotted the Moscow Olympics and the Soviets were planning to retaliate by boycotting our LA Olympics scheduled for 1984. The Soviets were taking a very hard line in Poland against the "Solidarity" movement; they were continuing their occupation of Afghanistan; they would soon shoot down the Korean airline that had strayed off-course into Soviet air space; they were increasing impediments to emigration not only for Soviet Jews, but for ethnic Germans, Armenians, Ukrainians as well. That policy also blocked the humanitarian emigration - divided spouses or families, many of which were Americans. Very, very few people were allowed to leave the USSR.

Q: Why did the Soviets impose such restrictions?

LEININGER: To some extent, the people were regarded as the property of the State. "We educated you; we housed you; we provided health care, we gave you jobs. You owe us." More importantly it was another means of control. The refusals of exit permission were in many cases completely arbitrary. The Soviets just wanted to scare any one from even trying to leave. They felt that emigration would signal that all was not well in the USSR. They didn't want it. They had been more liberal in earlier periods, particularly during the Nixon presidency. But by the early 1980s, Brezhnev was in power, even though he showed many signs of senility. He and his entourage became increasingly concerned that they were losing control of the country. It was a symptom of the ossification of the entire regime. They were clenching and were tightening the screws of control tighter and tighter, including making the emigration process more and more arbitrary. One could not predict if exit permission would be granted or if there was a defect in one's resume. There were just no known ground-rules. The authorities would just say that it was not "desirable." Neither the applicant nor we would ever know why such a decision had been reached.

Sometimes, we might make an educated guess. We had one applicant who was a spouse of an American. He was a trained computer technician or programmer. In those days, Soviet computers were still in a primitive stage compared to those in the West, but they were still the latest in the USSR. So he was denied permission to emigrate. He then made a living as a photographer, and by repairing home computers of journalists in Moscow.

We had a list of about 150 people who fell into the "divided families" categories. We had taken formal diplomatic notes to the Foreign Ministry periodically to ask for a review of these applications, hoping to get permission for some of these people to emigrate to the U.S. Many of these cases had Congressional interest behind them, reflecting the interest of the relatives in the U.S., who wanted these applicants to join them. A lot of these people were distant relatives - uncles, aunts, grandparents. While I was in Moscow, we began to focus more on "divided spouses" - people who were being denied the primary relationship of a family because of Soviet arbitrariness. That constituted about 35 applicants. Some of them had been divided as much as thirteen years; some were in the three or five year category.

All of these applicants were viewed as part of the political contest, a tug-of-war. We also had the case of the Pentecostal families, who had taken refuge in the Embassy, since June, 1978. By the time I got to Moscow, they had been "guests" for three years. You will recall that in 1978, eight Pentecostals (two families) tried to enter the Embassy by rushing past the Soviet guards. They wanted to discuss the possibilities of emigrating to the West. They had been for a period of 15-20 years persecuted - thrown into prison camps, denied jobs, etc. They were ethnic Russians from Siberia, but they were evangelical Pentecostals. Now, the Soviet authorities tolerated the Orthodox Church because they had it under control; it had been under the government's thumb since czarist times and was hardly a threat. That Church had a nice organizational structure, with identifiable bishops and known meeting places. The authorities could easily keep track of the Church's doings and who was responsible. The Soviets could live with it.

But what the state could not tolerate were religions like the Pentecostals, who had no organizational structure, no ordained ministry, no set places of worship, except homes, where they could not be easily monitored. Very difficult to control. So the Soviets cracked down on all evangelical groups. Our "guests" hoped that they could emigrate to the West, but the Soviet guards in front of the chancery turned them away. However, the Pentecostals took evasive actions and finally ran past the guards. That is, most of them made it. One was caught by the scruff of the neck and beaten badly on the sidewalk in view of the seven others. He was dragged off to the militiamen's box around the corner, not to be seen again.

The Pentecostals who had breached the Soviet "security" perimeter entered the consular area and huddled in the waiting room. The ambassador was not in the chancery and I don't think the DCM was either. Jack Matlock was the political consular - and acting DCM. He made the decision on the spot not to force the Pentecostals out; he judged that they would undoubtedly have faced retribution from the Soviets, having seen one of their number beaten bloody on the sidewalk in front of the Embassy. He decided that under the circumstances, it was perfectly appropriate for the Embassy to offer temporary refuge to these people. [end tape]

Q: Wayne has just arrived in Moscow, and he is giving the background of the Pentecostals who made their way into the Embassy in the early summer of 1978. So they decided on that day that they wouldn't turn them back. What flowed from that?

LEININGER: We – the Embassy and the U.S. Government – became responsible for their well being.

Q: Of Seven people.

LEININGER: Seven people. There were two families, the Vaschenkos and the Chmykhalovs. There were five Vaschenkos: Pyotr, Augustina, and daughters Lyuba, Lilya, and Lidia; and Maria Chmykhalov and her son 13-14 year-old son Timothy. The Vaschenko girls were probably at that time 17 to 21. What everyone thought was going to be a relatively short process of resolving these people's immigration concerns ended up being a five-year odyssey. On the very first business day – still on that afternoon or the very next morning, I don't know, but on the very first opportunity – a consular officer called the Foreign Ministry and said, "You know we have these people here from Chernogorsk, Siberia. They are the Vaschenkos and the Chmykhalovs, and they wish to emigrate to the west. How should they go about this?"

Q: Could they have gotten visas as refugees or something?

LEININGER: I will describe the general process and then we will go on to the rest. The response of the Foreign Ministry was, "they have to go back to Chernogorsk and apply for exit permission just like anybody else." That formulation, almost word for word, was exactly what we were told by the Soviet authorities every time we asked for the next five years, exactly.

Now, ordinarily to emigrate from the Soviet Union you needed a relative or other kind of sponsor in the West who could file an invitation called a “priglaseniye” that became the basis for your application for exit permission. Absent such a close relative, or absent, when they were allowing it, membership in an ethnic group that might be permitted en masse to leave, such as the Soviet Jews, there was no hope for individuals to emigrate. None, closed case. You just couldn’t pick up and go just because you wanted to; you saw a better life, no, not permitted, “nelzya” – never. You were property of the state. So this advice from the Foreign Ministry, “you should go back to Chernogorsk and apply like everyone else,” was disingenuous, because if they applied like everybody else, the application would get round-filed immediately. There was no basis for emigration if the Soviet citizen didn’t have a required relationship. The Pentecostals, being nobody’s fools, had not survived 15 or 20 years of persecution, prison camps and everything else just to be shined on by some bureaucrat in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs with some b.s. advice that they knew wouldn’t avail them anything. They offered back, “You know, we don’t believe that.” Well after about three or four days of getting nowhere, someone finally said to the, them, “Well you can’t stay in the waiting room any longer. Embassy officials had put them up in the waiting room; there were no other facilities available to them at that point. They said, “Yes, but we can’t go now.” “Why can’t you go now? We can watch you and make sure you are not beaten.” “We can’t go now because we have already left Soviet Union. We left without permission. We are here in America on American soil. “ “No, you are not on American soil.” But our finely-honed legal position on non-assertion of the principle of extra-territoriality to our Embassies was irrelevant to them. In their minds, and arguably in the minds of the Soviet authorities, they had in fact left the Soviet Union without permission. This itself was a criminal offense, and they would be sent back to prison. So that provided, by the second day, a longer lasting reason for them not to leave. Having once committed that sin, they could not leave the Embassy. So an attempt was in fact made to talk them into going home. They declined to go. They declined to go for the next five years.

Q: This case, did it get publicity in the United States?

LEININGER: Within a matter of a couple of weeks. Very shortly thereafter a tactical mistake was made by the Embassy leadership that was to reverberate to our discredit for the next 2-and-a-half to three years. That was, to cut off access to the families to anybody except a designated few within the Embassy hierarchy. No other Embassy staffers or well-wishers, no co-religionists, no visiting journalists, nobody visiting from the West, was allowed to have access to the families. They were in effect kept in a quasi- isolation status.

Q: Did you put them in an apartment or on the grounds, where did they live?

LEININGER: They were in two, side-by-side courier apartments, one to a family. The apartments on the street level of the Embassy, with windows that looked out on the sidewalk, but the apartments themselves were semi-sunk.

Q: By couriers you mean diplomatic...

LEININGER: Diplomatic couriers, who need housing while transiting.

Q: American couriers.

LEININGER: These were turned over to the families. The Vaschenkos, the five of them, stayed in one and the Chmykhalovs stayed in the other. There was a common bathroom down the hall, which was shared. The apartments themselves had small hot plate stoves and refrigerators.

Q: The Embassy supplied them with food I take it?

LEININGER: Initially, there were donations from Embassy staffers. In the course of time it was the Secretary's emergency fund.

Q: The Secretary of State has an emergency fund, discretionary.

LEININGER: The consular emergency fund to handle consular emergencies. Out of that came their food, their clothing, and educational expenses, for books that were purchased for them. But still, in essence, they were denied access to the outside world, and the outside world was denied access to them.

Q: Why was that?

LEININGER: It was apparently intended as a form of psychological pressure, not to make them too comfortable, to get them to make the decision to go back home. Well, instead, in a very short period of time, we became the enemy. The United States government became the enemy of these people.

LEININGER: Not only their minds, but in the minds of supporters in the West. You ended up having large human rights and religious rights organizations in the United States and around the world in support of these poor beleaguered people, who were being harassed and persecuted not only by the Soviet Union, which was expected to be horrible, but by the Americans, who should be acting on their behalf, but instead were acting as their jailers!

Q: Were they getting comments out to the world these people.

LEININGER: It was impossible to keep everybody within the Embassy community away from their wing of the compound. So there were leaks, and there were Embassy staffers who were sympathizers, who disagreed with the Embassy's policy, who were sharing information with the outside. So that was the situation. Three years down the road, Curt Struble, who was to be my deputy, preceded me to Moscow by a few months. Curt got there in April and I got there in June or July. We walked into this thing, and we discovered that we were the bad guys! The consular assistants, who attended to the day-to-day needs of the families, were regarded as their guards. We eventually had to spend a year and a half, easily, attempting to overcome that long history of mistrust, suspicion, and downright hostility. We found that the families would not take at face value any good advice that we might give them about what course of action to take, where do we go from here. So we rethought our policy. In six months, Curt and I had many discussions on this, Curt often taking the lead. He was the best deputy I ever had. He is now ambassador to Peru; he just got sworn in a couple of weeks ago. Anyway, he said, "Look, let's stand this on its head. Let's just open the door. Anybody wants to come in and talk to these folks, please, be our guests, go ahead, have at it." And then there was a whole spate of interviews, the Christian Science Monitor, and even Parade Magazine, and all the visiting firemen of all the organizations sponsoring them. Danny Smith from England, Jane Drake, from Alabama, Freda Lindsay, of Christ for the Nations, in Dallas – they all came, and within six months the story was old news, and we were back to, "Now what? Now what do we do?" There was no more finger-pointing about us being the bad guys. We are now looking at working with the groups and families that were supporting the Pentecostals, attempting to find a solution to this problem. In fact, every time we had a visit from the Secretary of State or a major administration official, human rights in general and or the Pentecostals in particular were always up there as number one or two on their agendas, every single time.

Other visitors came. The Reverend Billy Graham came. We briefed him in advance; we tried to warn him that if he went in and to have a prayer session with these folks regarding them as meek and mild, hold your hands, bow your heads Christians, they were going to eat his lunch. They were going to put him and his whole organization on the spot. "What are you going to do for us?" "Whom are you going to talk to while you are here?" "What are you going to do when you leave?" "Who are you going to talk to in the outside world?" "How are you going to help us?" He shrugged that off and said, "Don't worry about that. I have talked to people under stress before." He got in there, and within 5 minutes his face was pale. He was sweating. He couldn't speak in a complete sentence. I have never seen anybody so otherwise self-possessed become so thoroughly discombobulated before. But then, he had never met anybody like these people before.

Q: Why did the Embassy decide to handle them that way in the beginning? The ambassador, the DCM, who pushed that decision, did the consular people?

LEININGER: That was well before my time, but my impression is that it was a tactic agreed upon between the Embassy and the geographic desk in the Department – EUR/SOV. I think the decision was made after awhile that, "we can't have this precedent set of allowing people to stay indefinitely; all of Eastern Europe would have tried to follow suit." They probably thought, "We have got to do something, but something short of actually forcing them out, which would be politically and morally impossible." So it was an attempt psychologically to freeze the Pentecostals out, in hopes they would make the decision themselves to leave. Little did anyone know...

Q: So you arrived there in the summer of '81, and they are there. These Pentecostals. And then there was the overriding situation, with the Russians being totally annoying as usual, more annoying than usual.

LEININGER: Well, you know, just the usual things, having your phones tapped, the tables at the restaurants where you dine out miked up, or people having their off-compound apartments broken into, routinely searched. They'd sometimes do cutesy little things like, we had our albums, old vinyl ones – that is how long ago this was – alphabetically stored. They would just reach in and grab a handful and turn them upside down and backwards here and there, putting them all out of order. Just a little calling card. “We were here, and we fiddled with your stuff, and we can do it any time we want.” That was the pleasant kind of demonstration. The unpleasant kind was sometimes they would come in and take a dump right in the middle of the bedspread on the bed. It'd still be sitting there, steaming.

Q: Because people did not all live within the compound, American housing was not all within...

LEININGER: I counted, as I recall, about 30 apartments in the old Embassy building. The new Embassy was under construction then. Three and a half years in progress, and it was going to take another seven years to finish because of all the buggings. So we were not even close to occupying any of those facilities. Most of us lived off compound in high rises that were segregated for foreigners, usually foreign diplomats, news people, and businesspeople. No ordinary Soviets lived anywhere near us in these compounds. The apartments were monitored, bugged constantly. Militia people were stationed at the parking lots, watching entryways and taking photographs of everybody who came and left. You were on public display 24 hours, all the time. You could never count yourself to be alone. It was a very stressful time. You couldn't argue with your spouse, lest potential marital discord give the KGB the idea that there was a possible intelligence vulnerability there. You were told when you arrived at post, “if you two have something you need to discuss, come in to the Embassy and yell at each other in a secure environment.” And you could only argue there. Now who argues that way? So, if you were pissed off at something, you just bit your tongue because you couldn't blurt out, “yes, and your whole damn family is alcoholic.” You couldn't do any of that stuff. So the moment passed and you internalized it. People just closed down. You very rarely could have a normal, healthy exchange of opinions about anything. You couldn't talk about family illnesses at home, least of all financial problems of your brother or somebody back in the States. “God he is out of work again.” All this stuff constituted potential vulnerabilities that could be exploited, so you just didn't talk about anything of a really sensitive, family- oriented nature.

Q: How big was the consular section?

LEININGER: We had five, counting the consular assistant. Let's see, Curt, me, Bill Hill, Adrian Stefan, yes, only four officers, and then the consular assistant, whose primary job was caring for the Pentecostal families.

Q: Then did you have FSNs, Russians?

LEININGER: We had Russian staff, but of course, they didn't work for us. They worked for the diplomatic service bureau, the UPDK.

Q: Right, which meant that the Russian government actually employed them all.

LEININGER: Right, and their job was to spy on us, how we interacted, what we did and what we said, and that sort of stuff.

Q: Exactly.

LEININGER: So they stayed on one side of a Dutch door and we stayed on the other side of the Dutch door. We didn't raise our voices in proximity of the Dutch door. Any time we had sensitive issues to discuss we went to the other end of our half of the consular wing, and that is where we had our staff meetings and where we did everything else. Even there we had to assume that the windows – which could be seen from adjoining Soviet buildings – were being lased, so you didn't talk about anything classified even in your own office. The FSNs did routine processing of notarials, and actual preparation of something like 700 or 800 NIV's a year, 80% of those in the official visa categories, and maybe 200 B-2 tourist visas issued to people who'd won the Stakhanovite of the year award – workers who had “over fulfilled the plan” during the current year, turning out steel or something. They could only travel, though, with KGB escorts – you know, like in the movie, “Moscow on the Hudson.”

Q: So in other words as late as the early '80s you were issuing 800 nonimmigrant visas a year in a country of 200 million people.

LEININGER: 210, 220 million, something like that. But remember, only about 200 of those NIV's were issued to “real” tourists...

Q: Amazing.

LEININGER: ...Now we had also a Consulate General in Leningrad, and they issued, by God, they had another 200 or 300!

Q: So the NIV work was not...

LEININGER: Virtually non-existent. One thing you never had to worry about was 214-B, the section of law that presumes that visitor visa applicants are intending immigrants and puts the burden of proving otherwise on them, because these people would never have gotten exit permission in the first place if the KGB believed there was the slightest chance they wouldn't come back.

Q: They had their families...

LEININGER: They had their families hostage. Our own regulations tell us never to take family members hostage by denying them visas, as a mechanism to ensure the return of the principal visa applicant. We in Moscow were even tempted to do that. That is what the KGB did for us. They only issued exit permission to one or two family members, and kept everybody else at home. So that was the extent of our nonimmigrant workload. On the immigrant side, we had a handful of real immigrants, probably a couple of hundred a year, who in fact did get exit permission and were able to be reunited with family members. In my first year or so, the initial time while I was there, we had quite a few Armenians coming forward through the refugee program. My first year there was something on the order of 3600 as I recall, but it dropped down to about 900 by the time I left.

Q: How did they get to get out? I mean the Russians were willing to let them go?

LEININGER: They were willing to let them go. Armenians were a pain, I guess they were perceived to be a pain. For our purposes, and the way the refugee laws were written, anybody fleeing a communist dominated country was a refugee with a credible fear of persecution, even though I can say without fear of contradiction that fewer of two percent of any of our Armenians were ever personally persecuted in any way whatsoever.

Q: They were really economic refugees but not...

LEININGER: They were by no means suffering “a credible fear of persecution on account of race, religion, ethnic origin,” or any of that stuff. But we could get them out; it was good to get them out, so we did get them out. In Moscow, we did all the preprocessing, as if they were going straight to the U.S. In fact they stopped off in Rome, and INS issued the final refugee admittance documents. But we did the medical exams. We looked for criminal ineligibilities, and lined up sponsorships with the voluntary agencies, and all of that stuff. There was at that time no INS presence within the old Soviet Union to process refugees for. There is now, somewhat amazingly.

Q: How did you find the issue of American citizen services? Did many Americans go there in those days at tourists or journalists, and did they get into trouble.

LEININGER: Few people went for tourism purposes, or exchange purposes because those were the scientific or cultural exchanges that were being closed down right and left because of the soured relationship. People who came in for organized tours through Intourist were actually very easy for us to take care of. We didn’t have to do much of anything, because the Intourist took very good care of them. The Soviets did not want any of these people to get lost! Anybody who got sick was taken care of by the best hospitals then available in the Soviet Union, and then gotten promptly out of the country. There are benefits to doing consular work in a totalitarian state. People don’t get lost, and if they do somehow get lost, they can be found very quickly.

Q: Most tourists came in with Intourist.

LEININGER: Yes, there was virtually no private tourism at all except if you got an invitation, it had to be an invitation, invited to go into the old Soviet Union, on the basis of an official tour through Intourist, to see a close relative.

Q: Were you able to travel around in the country?

LEININGER: To a limited extent. There was, as I recall, something on the order of 60% of the country permanently closed to foreigners. Permanently. That means that even if a plane crashed, you couldn’t go there. The other 40% was nominally open, but every time you wanted to go someplace, you had to file a diplomatic note at least a week in advance, giving your itinerary. They would never tell you “yes.” If you just didn’t hear from them, then you could go. You carried with you a copy of the note you had sent, informing the MFA that you were going. But fully half to two thirds of the time they would tell you “no” for “reasons of a temporary nature,” never specifying what these reasons might be, and sometimes telling you only an hour before you were to board the train. Now, in some cases we would know what the reasons might be. They had just suffered a devastating flood, and half the wheat crop was wiped out, and they didn’t want our Agricultural attaché to go out there and see the devastation first hand, because they wanted to conceal what dire straits they were in, before concluding the next grain deal with us. We might have suspected, but didn’t know, that there had been, say, a bacteriological contamination of a facility somewhere in the area. Or some kind of nuclear accident, or chemical spill. There was always lots of speculation as to why an area that previously had been open was now closed. Even within those travel parameters you had to have a reason, at least as consular people we had to have a reason, to visit. Many times divided families were used as that rationale, to get to the Baltic republics, for instance. Then, on behalf of our colleagues in the political section, we’d tack on visits with religious or political dissidents. Of course, when you got out there, you were followed.

Q: Did you drive or take the train?

LEININGER: Usually trains, or if distances were huge and you felt like living dangerously, we’d use Aeroflot, the Soviet state airline. You could never travel in the old Soviet Union alone, under our own travel rules. You always had to have a compartment mate for protection. A couple of times in a tour you would get to make a non-pro courier run through Leningrad, onward to Helsinki, to pick up classified correspondence. That was one of the forms of R&R, a non-professional courier run that you signed up for. I think we did a total of four runs to Helsinki in the space of three years. Roughly once every nine months. It was a free trip out. A couple of times I heard stories of people being gassed in their train compartment on the way back to Moscow, carrying stuff back into the old Soviet Union. Colorless, odorless gas would be introduced underneath the door of the compartment. The compartment would be opened up. You had the pouch right there in the compartment with you. You put it between the two bunks, where, hopefully, it would be safe. It never happened to me fortunately.

So we did get to travel a bit. We visited the Baltics. We also went to Soviet central Asia. We went up to Tashkent, Samarkand and a little town called Andizhan. But, again, people always followed you when you took these trips inside the country. Almost always, anyway, but especially when we were going to areas of political sensitivity, like the Baltics. Nobody followed you to Samarkand or Tashkent, but we did have people “spontaneously” invite us over to their restaurant tables to share some vodka or something, “Thanks, but no thanks.” People – usually women, if you were guys traveling together – would ring up your phone in your hotel in the middle of the night and invite you to party. Again, “thanks, but no thanks.”

But anyway, we got to Andizhan. Now Andizhan, we didn’t know why we were going there except that the travel officer, a guy named John Beyrle, now a senior officer but at the time a second tour junior officer, had been made the travel officer. It was his job to try and organize our annual travel plans so we got as many people out to as many areas of the old Soviet Union as possible, without duplicating trips and wasting our limited travel money. He also ensured that every traveler who went out into the country filed a trip report describing the localities visited – how much meat was in the shops, how many fresh vegetables were in the farmers market, and so forth. Now, we wanted to go to Samarkand and Tashkent; those places we had heard of as desirable destinations. Samarkand more than Tashkent. Tashkent in modern times is a dump. After the earthquake in the late '70s it was rebuilt in the Soviet Stalinist modern style, a lot of square apartments and office buildings. But Samarkand is gorgeous. If you ever get a chance you should go to Samarkand. But as sort of penalty or premium on that destination, with dogged Mr. Beyrle as travel officer, you had to go to Andizhan. You said, "Why? Where is Andizhan?" "Oh, it is in the Fergana valley." "What do they do there?" "Oh they grow rice." "Why are we going to go?" "Well, there is a report here from the late '60s, when somebody went" "What did they see?" "Nothing much." "Well, why do we have to go again?" "Well, maybe something is going on now!" So we went to Andizhan. Andizhan turned out to be indeed an agricultural community, of about 50,000 people. It was very large. Even small villages in the old Soviet Union were very large collectivized farms, conglomerates, lots of people. But the atmosphere was so much different than it had been in the Baltics and in Leningrad and in Moscow, where you had this ever-present perception that people were watching. And it was true – they were watching, so that people walked the streets hunched over looking down at the sidewalk, never making any eye contact. There was never any spontaneity among themselves, or, least of all, with you as a foreigner. In Andizhan people walked around with their heads up, looked at each other in the eye, even smiled at you, even knowing that you were a Westerner.

Q: Was it a Russian area?

LEININGER: Yes, well, actually it is in Uzbekistan.

Q: So it is part of Uzbekistan now.

LEININGER: Yes. And all kinds of ethnicities intermingled there for thousands of years. One interesting story: at the time of the Korean War the Soviets forcibly relocated a lot of ethnic Koreans, Korean/Russians, from the northeast part of country, and brought them to the Andizhan area. They came, and the locals looked at them curiously and said, "You guys look funny, what can you do?" The immigrants said, "Well, we can grow rice." Since the primary staple of life there is pilaf or "ploff," as they called it, a rice pilaf casserole type of thing, the people in the Andizhan valley were overjoyed. The ethnic Koreans brought with them a special variety of hard kernel, yellow-gold rice, and it is perfect for "ploff." Andizhan is now about the only place in the Soviet Union where that particular rice is grown, because the immigrants brought it from Korean border regions.

Q: That is interesting. So you were able to go there and that had a much more...

LEININGER: Wide open atmosphere. We went to the market there. We were walking along the market stalls, and everyone was just as open as could be, and greeting us and talking to us. "Where are you from?" "Well, we are American. I don't think you really want to talk to us." "Well, why?" "Well, we work for the Embassy, and you probably don't want to talk to us." "Why?" they would ask, genuinely puzzled. I mean, in Moscow, you often openly identified yourself that way, because you didn't want innocent people to get in trouble. You were being followed in Moscow, if the followers saw you speaking to anybody along the street, they would grab them, they would visit them at their homes later that day. "Why were you talking to Amerikanski Diplomat?” You didn’t want to get people in trouble you know, so we all became circumspect.

It wasn’t like that at all in Andizhan. We met a guy out there around the market. He was sort of like the character Norm, on “Cheers” – everybody knew his name! Everybody was calling out to him. “Andrei, how are you doing Andrei?” Andrei was dressed in Levis, real Levis with the orange tag on them, and hand tooled western boots. By western I don’t mean western hemisphere, I mean Texas western. He had on a leather jacket that would have made anybody in the KGB green with envy, and a silk shirt. Where did this guy get the money? Well, it turned out Andrei earned the money, and was so popular among the citizenry, because he was the chief Zhiguli mechanic in town. The Zhiguli was the Soviet version of the Fiat. You know how reliable Fiats were, even when made by the Italians. Just imagine the same Fiats, that wonderful engineering design, being manufactured by drunken Soviets. The rule in the Soviet Union was never to buy a car that was manufactured on Monday or Friday, because the workers were either getting an early start on a drinking weekend, or working off the resulting hangover. Because those lovely cars were so apt to break down, Andrei was the most important man in town. He had the Zhiguli spare parts, and he scheduled the repair appointments. As a result, he earned more money, he told us, than his schoolmates who had gone through engineering and medical schools.

Q: Well, they couldn’t make the cars work.

LEININGER: They couldn’t make the cars work. Everybody paid Andrei off in order to get the parts and in order to get the servicing. He had been to Turkey, Greece, to Italy, and to Egypt, foreign travel opportunities that were virtually unknown for ordinary Soviets. Of course, he had to leave his wife and kids behind, but that didn’t bother him. He was a Soviet Central Asian male, and he’d have done that on his own, anyway!

Q: Let me ask you in that connection. In light of what happened to the Soviet Union by 1990 and what has happened to it since.

LEININGER: Okay, we are going to get there.

Q: Yes. What did you think when you were there?

LEININGER: Our experiences in Andizhan gave rise – and we shared these impressions when we got back to Moscow – that those who held them were maybe attempting to tighten the reins of control, but the reins didn’t seem to be attached to anything out there in the hinterland. Our guy, Andrei, took his afternoon off from work, and he called up all his buds on the phone, his engineering buddies and university professors, “Hey I got some Americans here in town. Let’s go up to this little retreat up on the mountainside and have a real blowout feast.” So we retired up there for the rest of the afternoon, drinking and eating, and eating and drinking all afternoon. I was blown away. I’d never seen hospitality like that, so open, in the old Soviet Union. Now, I’d had it extended by certain desperate people, religious dissidents or refuseniks, who were at wits end, and they would share meager things with us, but they had no where else to turn, and nothing left to lose by being seen associating with us. But this was the first really open and completely hospitable social occasion we’d experienced, and, still leery, I said, “Look. Something like this just could never happen in Moscow. You guys would be taken in for questioning. You would be hauled away.” Our host just looked at me, and he said, “We are a long way from Moscow. It is not like that here.” The fact that he not only had that perception, but also that he shared it so readily with me, an American diplomat, is what led to my doubts about the ability of the central government to control the ethnic populations in the outer lying republics, by simply demanding that they just fall in line. The people, the populace, already felt themselves to be out of Moscow’s control. They had local party bosses, sure. But they are ours; they were not “the center.” “The center” was something else. “The center” wasn’t holding, even at that point. We took that trip in the spring of ‘84.

Q: But also if they couldn’t build a decent car in the Soviet Union, what does one make of these reports that the U.S. intelligence people were constantly about how strong the Soviet army was and all the nukes and bombs.

LEININGER: It was a totally two track economy. I mean they had separate factories to build nuts and bolts for missiles than those that built nuts and bolts for the Zhiguli factory. They had different standards of quality control, different hiring and firing practices. I mean most of these people pretended to work, and the state pretended to pay them. That was the old joke. But for state sponsored enterprises, the military, scientific and arms industry, they did have a second track economy. But the problem is that they ran out of money. The rest of the economy couldn’t support it. This couldn’t go on. So even those favored industries or sectors couldn’t sustain themselves over time.

Q: But I mean do you attribute, did the Soviet Union collapse, I mean people say Reagan did it, I mean but you always see it as a certain element of saying the rooster crowed and then the sun came up. I mean Reagan did certain things and the Soviet union collapsed, but is there a link between his or is it much more kind of a seventy year sclerotic thing that finally did them in and was going to do them in anyway?

LEININGER: I came away with that view. The place was rotten to the core. And it probably helped push them over the edge that Mr. Reagan had made it clear that he was prepared to keep U.S. military spending at a high level, one that those in the know in the old USSR – like Andropov! – knew the Soviet infrastructure could not sustain.

Q: Yes, but why wasn’t, was the intelligence people reflecting that? Was that coming through?

LEININGER: Our intelligence people were trained to look only at certain elements in command and control structures, or in throw weights of missiles or in the number of people in military divisions. How many tanks they had. They were not looking at the infrastructure underneath it.

Q: Did you feel that way at the time, you say gee this place is something.

LEININGER: Yes.

Q: I mean is this the great enemy? I mean how are they I am not just speaking of weapons and stuff but the whole.

LEININGER: Everybody there regarded it as simply a third world country that happened to possess nuclear weapons. In every other respect it was not a world power. We all knew that.

Q: But you couldn't find that reported much in the United States in the public media in those days...

LEININGER: No, I don't think you could. But there were some people that had those feelings. I recall a USIS project, as I recall it was a USIS project that tried to garner those impressions from the "non-professionals." They took us all into our individual secure compartments and said, "Just talk about your experiences. What do you think of the place?" Some of us came out with some of this stuff. Now, I am a consular officer. What the hell do I know about the future of the Soviet Union. So my comments probably went to some nice convenient filing cabinet somewhere, and nobody really took it seriously.

Q: So who was the ambassador when you were there? Was it Hartman?

LEININGER: Hartman. Actually when I started Matlock was DCM and charge. He had come back for a second or third tour of duty, and was charge. He left and Hartman came in from Paris with the dearly departed Warren Zimmerman, one of my best DCM's. A wonderful man.

Q: So how did your interaction go with those people?

LEININGER: Fabulous. Really it was absolutely fabulous.

Q: Very supportive?

LEININGER: Extremely.

Q: And they agreed with your idea to open it up to the Pentecostals and so forth.

LEININGER: Yep. They were for all of our human rights activities across the board, not just those having to do with divided families, but also those on political and religious dissident issues in general. I mean, Hartman opened up his house. We had parties and receptions there, to which those on the "outs" were made guests. Hartman cooked up a program with Jack Valenti of the Motion Picture Association of American, to share first-run American movies with us. They started it with official showings, for Soviet audiences. I mean functionaries at the various ministries. Those guys were under orders in most cases not to meet with Americans under any pretext whatsoever, but it was a "social occasion," so that movies were an exception. They could come to Hartman's house and watch things like "Sophie's Choice." Which the Soviets loved. It is the quintessential Russian movie, with suffering, and all this conflict, and madness, and trauma. Best of all, who are the bad guys? The Germans! So they loved that movie. They never got "ET." They couldn't understand why "ET" was even made, full of frivolity, a fluff of a movie. Anyway, they would come and turn out and we would have these social occasions, drinking Hartman's booze and eating his cook's mini-pizzas. Well, Hartman started bringing in a couple of dissidents on the margins, but then the Soviet official attendees dropped out, on orders, and we lost that opportunity to get them liquored up and get them talking about things. So Hartman then established dissident night, once a week dissident night, and everybody came for various kinds of presentations, Jessye Norman singing, or a Hollywood movie, luncheons, all kinds of neat things.

Q: Now did they include you in that and the consular friends?

LEININGER: Oh yes, absolutely. We had ours, the political section had theirs. The folks in the press section had their contacts. All people on the outs, and we got together and had a jolly old time. Of course, a lot of them didn't trust one another; there was always an undercurrent of paranoia, of suspicion that so-and-so was an informer for the KGB!

Q: Did you interact much with the station people there, the CIA people?

LEININGER: Yes.

Q: So you were able to get your views to them, and they trusted your travels and experiences and so forth.

LEININGER: They were very circumspect in what they told us, but they were interested in what we had to say about what our contacts in the dissident community were willing to say aloud. Remember, in those days, everybody was trying to weave a grand tapestry with little bits of lint about what was going on in the leadership, and who is on top, and who is on the bottom, and who is in line for this, and that kind of thing. The constant speculation all over the place about who was on the rise and who was coming in and who was going out; it was a grand guessing game. The best at that actually were our own internal political guys. They were better than the station chiefs. Lynn Pascoe and Mark Parris were fantastic. You know Wayne Merry was still there, and Kent Brown was still there for most of the time, and Steve Coffey, whom we called "The Wizard," because he seemed sometimes to be able to predict the future on the basis of no information whatsoever.

Q: What happened finally to the Pentecostals? You opened it up and let the air out of the balloon.

LEININGER: ...and freshness started to come into things. And outside events contributed to the breaking of the logjam. First of all, there was an ill-advised but quasi- successful series of hunger strikes undertaken by a number of the divided families. It began, I think, with some German divided families. Hunger strikes, serious hunger strikes were then going on, usually in Moscow, for a variety of reasons. And foreign journalists were able to visit, usually to report that nothing was happening. The Soviets then made a tactical mistake. Instead of taking the short-term, albeit severe, public relations hit of a hunger striker or two dying, they let a couple of them out. As soon as that happened, our divided family community started to take it to heart, and we had a few hunger strikes started among our group. One of those people got out. Now, she got out only because she was the daughter of a general in the Red Army. He made his superiors understand that unless his daughter was let go, he was going to defect. He had leverage. They let her go. Well that in turn inspired our tenants – the Pentecostals – to try a hunger strike. Now the least of them – I say this in terms of physiognomy – was Lydia, who must have been about 5 foot 1 and 98 pounds soaking wet, at the outset of the hunger strike. Her hunger strike wasn't as rigorous as the one by one of the divided family guys, named Yuri Balovlenkov, who started out at 165 pounds and went down to 113, and had turned yellow. He was jaundiced from the tip of his toes to his eyeballs. But because she was so slight in the first place, we soon had concerns for her health. She was joined – more or less – by her mother, Augustina. Augustina was a large woman, to begin with, and we had reason to believe that she was cheating on her strike, so we were much less worried about her.

Q: What year was this going on?

LEININGER: This was '83 and '84. I remember that was the most depressing thing I ever had to do – go around and visit these hunger strikers and report back at the end of business every day, sending a cable to Washington, so that their spouses in the U.S. could have it the next morning, so they could find out how Tatyana was doing, how Yuri was doing, how Sergei was doing. Were they responsive, were they active? Curt and I took turns making those visits. Yuri ended up suffering brain damage. His short-term memory function was gone. You have probably read about people like this. There is a movie out now, Fifty First Dates, that somewhat makes light of the phenomenon. Well, this happened to Yuri as a result of his hunger strike. He consumed nothing but mineral water, period, nothing else. Well Lydia took fruit juices, and Lydia supplemented that with crackers every once and awhile, but nevertheless, over the course of about 2 months, she lost something over 17 pounds. She was down to 81. We had an Embassy physician on the compound. Dr. John Baker. A saint of a man, who cared very deeply about his responsibilities to the families, but past a certain point he couldn't monitor Lydia's physiological wellbeing any longer. He didn't have the blood testing equipment. There is a certain toxin build up in the blood that occurs in prolonged hunger strikes that will cause you to sustain permanent damage. For example, Yuri's wife came to Moscow to care for him. She was a registered nurse. She flew Yuri's blood samples to Helsinki to have them analyzed. One of the labs came back and said, "This man is dead. Why are you having us analyze the blood of a corpse?" Yuri had reached that point where the level of toxins in the blood usually kills people. He was "merely" brain damaged. Well, John Baker, our doctor, couldn't past a certain point certify that Lydia could be saved or that she wouldn't go on to some kind of shock or coma as a result of her strike. He had limited facilities there on the compound in the clinic. He and Warren and Curt and I sat down and talked it through, then went to Hartman and said, "Look, past a certain point, we are going to have to remove Lydia from the compound and put her in a Soviet hospital if she persists in this." So we told the family that if she kept on, this would be what we were going to have to do. We were not going to see her die or become permanently disabled while in our care. We could not. President Reagan even wrote a letter to Augustina and Lydia, pleading with them to stop. Augustina agreed. Lydia said, "We are going to continue. We know it works." Well, it worked here and there as rare exceptions, when the Soviets made stupid mistakes, or in the one case where the General had them by the short hairs. We knew it wasn't going to work with the Pentecostals, but they persisted. At a certain point we said, "Okay. Lydia has got to go to the hospital." We made arrangements for her to be transported by ambulance and admitted to Botkin Hospital in Moscow, which was usually reserved for high-ranking party members and foreigners.

The family was convinced that what the Soviets were going to do was to take her there, force feed her, and take her away to prison. Well, when she was admitted, Lydia was welcomed by name by the nurses, given the best possible care, and initially given saline solution, glucose and saline solution. That is the way you bring them back. You can't give them solid foods initially. As you might be able to tell, I came to know more about hunger strikes than I ever wanted to know. When I was in India, years later, some Tibetan monks undertook a hunger strike on behalf of the Tibetan refugees there. I wrote 2 and a half pages for our human rights officer. "This is what you want to look for. These are the psychological effects; these are the physiological effects. This is what goes first; then this, then past a certain point, it's too late." Oh my God. I don't want to go there.

Q: It was not knowledge that you want to recall.

LEININGER: It is not. Right. Anyway...so she went to the hospital. Was given the best possible care. We had someone visit every day. After two days, she willingly took food by mouth. Got herself back to, I don't know, 92 or 93 pounds, and was certified as able to travel by the doctors. The authorities said, "Now you are going to go back to Chernogorsk, to your family there." She said, "You are not going to send me to prison?" "No you are going to go back to your family in Chernogorsk."

That was the critical first step, because now Lydia was back in Chernogorsk, in a position to make application to the Office of Visas and Registration (OVIR) for her exit permission – just as we had been advised five years earlier. Now, by this time, there had been significant high-level interest in the case expressed by the Reagan administration to the Soviets. Schultz and, I think, Eagleburger, talk about this in their memoirs. Reagan more or less made it clear to the Soviets, "Look. This is a continuing bleeding sore between us. Let these people out and I'll guarantee, we will not crow about it; we will not repeat our previous denunciations of your previous treatment of these people, we will not hold you up to international condemnation for their five years worth of struggle. Just let them go and we will have done with it." Now what exactly else, if anything, the Soviets had got in return for this I have no way of knowing. But in any event, in our continuing interchanges with the Foreign Ministry were told how Lydia go to the OVIR in Chernogorsk and apply to emigrate. Presuming to know their laws better than they did, we said, "But...but...there is no basis. She doesn't have an invitation." More sternly, "Have her go to the OVIR and make application." Now, we were in touch with her by phone. She was phoning in once a week to the family. We said, "Lydia, we have it on fairly reliable authority that you can go to the OVIR and apply." The OVIR was a local branch of the Ministry of the Interior, one that oversees, again, the issuance of exit visas. Well, Lydia did so. Filed her application, and was granted exit permission within a period of about two or three weeks, which was world record time. Now, ostensibly, she was to go to Israel, because this is where religious dissidents were allowed to go. It didn't matter that she was Pentecostal and not Jewish. So we had to work this little charade. She was documented with a Swiss transit visa in Moscow before she left. She would "go to Israel." We worked it out with the Israeli Embassy in Moscow. They gave her an Israeli immigrant visa, even though she is not Jewish. Our other-Embassy colleagues played along with us. I mean, this is the benefit of a cohesive consular corps in places where it is you against the host government. I have been in other places where the consular corps is absolutely nothing but elbow-bending social tea parties, a bunch of self-promoters and hangers on, especially at the honorary consuls. But man, in Moscow, we were all together in the same boat, getting over, around and through Soviet bureaucracy. So when we needed to call on these people, “Please give us a piece of paper to cover this,” boom, boom, boom, it all worked.

So we got Lydia to Israel, where she was not actually met by a Jewish organization but by some of her supporters from the West, who put her up in a hotel. Once she was there, she promptly turned around a filed “priglaseniye,” or invitation, for the remainder of her family, and for all the Chmykhalovs, the other family, even though they were not blood relatives. But again, the Soviets, by this time, didn’t care. They willingly turned a blind eye to a requirement of their own rules. Lydia sponsored everybody else for immigration.

The final hurdle we had to overcome was that the families in the Embassy had to take that final leap of faith, and return to Chernogorsk. They had to believe. Now, they had watched Lydia’s treatment in the hospital. They had watched how Lydia got her exit permission. They had watched how the Soviets let her go to the West. So they were willing to buy into the proposition that the Sovs wouldn’t have gone that far, only to turn around and screw them at the eleventh hour. That would have undermined whatever good will the Soviets would have been attempting to cultivate previously by letting Lydia sail through the process. It would have made them out to be absolute conniving beasts. In many respects they were, but not in this instance! Curt and I partially drove vans with the families to the airport domestic terminal, because the families mistrusted our FSN drivers. And we waited in the waiting areas until we saw them on the plane going out to Chernogorsk. As soon as the families got there, they phoned. They got there fine. They settled down. Within, I guess, two months, all the exit permissions came through, and they all emigrated. Not just the ones who had been resident in the Embassy, but all their extended families, too. It was something like 12 more Vaschenkos and 17 more Chmykhalovs. I mean huge families...

Q: ...talking with Wayne Leininger, and we are just at the point where all the Pentecostals are making their way out of the Soviet Union. So the extended families...

LEININGER: Extended families all got out. They ended up transiting Europe. They didn’t all go on to Israel. As I said that was something of a sham in the first place. Even the Soviets knew it was a sham, but so what? The address on the invitation was the right address. What they did after they left the Soviet Union was out of anybody’s control. The Chmykhalovs all settled around Dallas, Texas, are, and the Vaschenkos all went on to the Pacific northwest. If you were to ask me how they’re doing, I know that the most vocal and articulate member of the Vaschenko family, Lyuba, went to law school, which was absolutely appropriate for her. Timothy Chmykhalov wrote a book, which was widely promoted in evangelistic Christian circles. On the web you can probably still find the book somewhere. I have done recent Google searches on them, but I can’t find anybody. Maybe the girls got married, and aren’t going by the name Vaschenko anymore. I know Pyotr, the father, died of cancer. Oddly enough it had been Augustina, his wife, all the time in the Embassy who was complaining, “Oh, I’m dying of cancer.” She had colitis. Just was overweight, didn’t exercise, didn’t eat right, and just had a lot of gastric problems. The last I knew she was still alive and doing fine. Anyway there was a lot of good will in the human rights community all around the world, and I am glad the people got out and are apparently leading happy existences here.

While they had been with us, their presence was, in a way, useful, helpful, because conditions in the old Soviet Union were hard, and conditions were getting desperate, and people were getting desperate. In addition to the Pentecostals in the Embassy, we had others who wanted to be helped to emigrate, and were taking desperate measures to do so, by crashing through the Embassy gates, literally crashing through with automobiles, climbing over the walls, or in one instance, taking refuge on the construction site of the new Embassy, which didn't have that much security around it at the time. In all these instances our imperative was get them out before close of business. "Do not allow them to stay overnight and have the same pretext of fear of retribution enter into the situation." Now, "get them out" didn't mean we physically twisted arms and threw them out. We were never going to do that. We had to make them see the futility of attempting to gain exit to the west by camping out in the Embassy. While the Pentecostals were with us, we always had those couple of occupied apartments over across the compound to point to. "See those people over there? They have been here for 4 years, and they have not gone anywhere. We are full up; we don't have any more room, and moreover, you don't want to put yourself in that position. You would be cut off from everybody." "Yes, okay, I understand." That usually worked, with the sane and rational people.

LEININGER: Yes, and they turned the corner, and the KGB probably then took them away. We usually walked out with them, to forestall any incipient violence, and sometimes went so far as the nearest subway entrance. I would say, usually, in half of these instances, the fact that there were Russians in the American Embassy, who had been there for several hours closeted with consular officers, became known outside. Most of the journalists had lunch at the Embassy snack bar, so there was almost always somebody hanging around from the Post, Newsweek, or the New York Times. We had great relations with the press by the way. Again, the press and we were in the same boat, trying to gather these bits of lint to weave those tapestries. John Burns from the New York Times, Ned Temko from Christian Science Monitor, Andy Nagorski, from Newsweek. We used to play touch football on the weekends. It was Andy who dubbed that the "Liars versus the Spies" bowl, and mentioned it in the magazine. We used to play poker. We had weekly poker games. This mad German, Peter somebody from Sturm or Der Spiegel, used to have everybody over; tons of beer and tons of snacks and we would play poker until 3:00 in the morning. That is neither here nor there, but anyway it illustrates that this was not an adversarial relationship with the press. We cultivated them and they cultivated us.

Q: So anyway, people would leave.

LEININGER: They would leave, and we would escort them to a subway station. We would tell them this: "We will get you to the nearest subway station. We can't guarantee your safety beyond that. We will go with you as far as the subway station, and after that you will probably have to explain yourself to the authorities. If you want to say you were discussing a potentially complex immigration case, that would not be far from the truth, and it is legal for you to do that." We heard they were in fact taking them into custody for questioning. As far as I know, though, nobody was actually taken away and put in prison or sent away to a camp. Except for one guy we know was a wanted felon, for having committed assault on his foreman in this factory with a monkey wrench. He came to us not because he was a political dissident or a religious dissident.

He was simply pissed off at the way workers were being treated. He had asked for some time off for something, to go to, I don't know, a relative's funeral, something fairly reasonable. His foreman wouldn't let him go. They got into a verbal back and forth, and then he beat the hell out of this guy. He told Bill Hill and me this in a very boastful way, cackling about how much blood he'd made flow. Bill and I just kept looking at each other out of the corner of our eyes, edging toward the door, in case he went off. This guy who we are talking about came in with a handgun into the Embassy. He was disarmed by the Marines before he was let in. He actually showed his weapon to them. "Please sir, give me the gun. You don't need the gun in here. We will give it to you when you go back out." They didn't give it back to him, obviously. He was also physically imposing, hulk of a man, easily 6'3" 260 pounds with fingers as big around as my wrist. I mean, you could picture this guy going amok on an assembly line beating people with a wrench.

LEININGER: They took him away. We had no basis to intervene or to provide refuge. Bill and I talked him for about two or three hours; we were scared, the guy was a time bomb. He could have lifted up the table and beat us with it. He left.

Q: Did you ever have somebody who would not leave?

LEININGER: We never had anybody who would not leave at the end of the day. We had one young couple who came back twice, first by running in and then by ramming their way in with their car..

Q: Broke in?

LEININGER: Broke in, smashed through the gates with their little Soviet Fiat. We had to tell the, "Things haven't changed. We can't help you any more now than we could the last time." I think the second time they got arrested for malicious destruction of property and causing personal injury to a militiaman – I think he broke a leg – but again we were in no position to protest. That said, there were also, regularly, provocateurs who came in and pulled the same kind of stunt. Claiming to ask for political asylum or some sort of refuge, and their stories would be so obviously cooked up. You know you start an NIV interview, and somebody is claiming to be a white-collar worker in a bank, and he has got grease under his fingernails? We did the same kind of assessment of these "asylum seekers." These people were telling stories of woe, and yet they had nice manicures, and haircuts, and decent shoes by Soviet standards. They spoke very good, educated Russian. They were obviously not the oppressed factory worker I was just talking about. They weren't out of work, they weren't hungry and homeless, they weren't truly desperate. They were KGB. They were coming in to test our policies and procedures for handling walk-ins. So those were just, "Sorry, can't help you," and we blew them off. They would actually leave much sooner and much more easily than the genuine kind. The genuine people were really desperate. Then finally there was the Azerbaijani duo of "freedom fighters," they called themselves, who climbed over the construction site fence at 3:00 in the morning in February one year. By this time Curt had already left. He had stayed for only stay two years; he hadn't extended. Marsha Barnes had come in behind him. Her Russian wasn't up to doing these kinds of things. So I was the only one who could speak to these people. I crawled out of bed at 3:00 in the morning and talked to these guys for an hour and a half. I couldn't stand it any longer. I was freezing to death. I said, "Look this isn't even diplomatic property." We hadn't asserted full diplomatic privileges over the site. "So we can't protect you if they want to come and get you. There is nothing I can do or the Embassy can do about the political situation in Azerbaijan. Now you got this guy down there, Aliiev. I understand he is a fairly strong character. He might come to some prominence." Of course he is the guy who years later took over and became a despot in his own right. Now his son has taken has inherited the job. "Aliiev, he is a fool. He won't do anything." He was not a fool. He eventually did take over. In any event, I convinced them that the Embassy was not in a position to be able to assist them in asserting Azerbaijani rights to independence from the Soviet Union, and if they wanted to do anything, they should go back to Azerbaijan and work from within. "Oh, yes, that is good idea." "Then you had better get out before the sun comes up, because then the guards will see you and want to know what you are doing here. You will have to show your papers and bad things could happen." So they agreed to leave, and they climbed back over the fence where they had come in, and they avoided the Soviet militia guards, and left.

Q: All right. So that is the flavor of life. One thing I wanted to get in is how did your family handle, you had a wife and one child, and how did they function in this environment?

LEININGER: Oddly enough, for the kids, it was almost perfect. They lived in the Embassy housing compound or in those huge apartment complexes assigned to Westerners. They played together. The stairwells were filled with American families and their kids. The same kids that got on the school bus together and went to the American school, which was a fantastic school.

Q: It was, yes.

LEININGER: For every teacher we recruited, we had to fight off a hundred applicants each year. That was one of the few ways you could get into the country legally and stay for any length of time, was to be a teacher in the American school. People were incredibly well motivated and well qualified. Once they got that job they taught like their whole future depended on it, because they didn't want to lose it. Class sizes were small, and the kids in effect lived in a little cocoon. They suffered next to none of the hardships of daily life in the USSR. Our son, because of my job, was something of an exception in that regard. Through our relationships with the divided Soviet spouses and their American husbands and wives, he saw a lot of the negative side of Soviet life. He saw a lot of tears.

Q: How did your wife feel?

LEININGER: Spouses in general had a hard time because the officers were as a rule all workaholics. I mean, there was nothing much else to do. Go in to the Embassy on weekends? Sure! The most interesting thing to do was come in and browse the cable traffic. Remember, this was well before the day of satellite TV; there was no CNN and definitely no ESPN.

Q: They didn't have the spousal employment program.

LEININGER: Very minimal spousal employment. Outside employment opportunities were obviously very limited; nothing was available on the regular economy, and jobs within the mission were few and far between. Nan did, however, become a CLO after a time. She time-shared the job with two other Embassy wives, one after the other.

Q: CLO being the community liaison officer.

LEININGER: Right. But there generally is just one of those I per mission, at least in those days – the CLO was a recent innovation then, and hadn't proved it's worth – and so that one job was it, as far as mission employment for spouses was concerned. Well, we had about 135 direct hire Americans as I recall, in those days, and that meant you had 133 unemployed spouses. There was not much to do in old Moscow. You couldn't freely wander around very easily. Even if you could wander around, there wasn't much to do. Gorky Park. You go to Gorky Park once, and you have been there. You can't do much else. Soviet television was the only television you got. There were no cable stations. There was no Internet. Embassy employees, whether they were specialists or officers, on weekends often went to the Embassy to do more work, because it was the most interesting place in town. You could hang around the snack bar and schmooze with the journalists. It is where the action was. It was all on a volunteer basis. It was stay home and get bored or go to the Embassy. This whole situation stretched and strained marriages a lot. Now, we did have help at home, and Nan did want to try to get out of that apartment. For awhile, she worked for a journalist there, Ed Stevens, an ex-pat American, who had been living in the USSR since the '30s, and who had been co-opted by the Sovs a long time ago. He was what used to be called a "comsymp" – a Communist sympathizer. For Nan to get the job she had to be vetted by the Regional Security Officer. "If you take this job, you tell us anything funny that goes on, and who visits him and that sort of stuff." Stevens wrote a lot of stories speculating about the Party leadership struggles, so it was interesting for Nan to have an inside look on that.

Anyway, we'd known in advance that she would want to do something, so we brought along a nanny. Now, originally, this was my late-in-life-acquired step sister, the daughter of my mother's third husband, who had just turned 22 or something, had just gotten out of junior college, was at loose ends, and didn't have a life plan. So going to Moscow with us seemed to be a wonderful thing to do, see the world and all that. Well, she got off on the wrong foot when she transited Paris on the way in. She stayed at the hotel we had stayed at some years previously – when my sister had "done Europe" after graduating high school – but the place had since taken a downturn. The night manager came up and started fondling her feet one night! So she split that place in a blind panic at 2:00 a.m. after vainly trying to get the police to understand what had happened. She went off to the airport Sofitel, where she spent the rest of the night before she got to Moscow. During the time she was in Moscow, though, about the only thing she could do was hang out at the Marine house, because she had no Russian. Remember the Marines, Moscow, early '80s?

Q: I was going to come to that. Wasn't there a scandal?

LEININGER: There was a scandal; the main events all are reputed to have happened after we left. Different people, but the assignment policies...

Q: Except that Hartman was still there.

LEININGER: Hartman was still there.

Q: He took a fall because of it.

LEININGER: And it wasn't his fault. The Marines in Moscow were in the main screw-ups. They were there, as screw-ups, as a result of a policy followed by the battalion commander in Frankfurt. A Marine got assigned to Embassy duty in Moscow because he had gotten into trouble elsewhere in western Europe.

Q: Why would they do that?

LEININGER: Because it was punishment.

Q: But I mean didn't they see the implications. Isn't that strange.

LEININGER: They were idiots. Now there were the rare exceptions. Some of those guys volunteered to go to Moscow, in the best tradition of that organization, because it was hard duty. Those are the guys who later went on to college, and several went on to take the Foreign Service exam.

Q: And who decided who became a Marine Security Guard (MSG) in Moscow?

LEININGER: The battalion commander out of Frankfurt.

Q: It wasn't the State Department?

LEININGER: State, and Hartman, didn't have any say-so about who we got.

Q: So they were sent there as punishment.

LEININGER: Right. Even while I was there, I had to go to the Finnish consul and try and defend a Marine for raping one of the Finnish nannies. The admin counselor had to go to the Foreign Ministry and argue that they ought not hold two of our guys who, on May Day, had been ripping down the red flags from the street poles around Moscow, after they had gotten drunk. I had to go again for Marines who had gotten in a bar fight at one of the western restaurants in town. This one had a bowling alley attached to it. I mean, one incident after another. I know for a fact that Hartman protested the assignments formally to the marine commandant and got nowhere.

LEININGER: So, the next generation of screw-ups came along, and they reputedly sold out, supposedly to allow tours by KGB pawns, of some of the Embassy's secure areas. That has never been proved conclusively, to my knowledge. We do know that there was an excess, shall we say, of fraternization, and that the gunnery sergeant – the gunny! – did get involved with a Soviet agent in a romantic liaison. The whole thing just stank. It was just awful. The people should never have been assigned there in the first place under those conditions of stress, where you have got to be really punctilious in your conduct, and attentive to security details.

Q: Did that change after the scandal?

LEININGER: Oh, yes. They upped the standard of training for people to even get into the MSG program back at Quantico. The whole policy has changed.

Q: Today is March 1, 2004. We are still talking about his experiences in Russia. Is there anything, any other issues or particular themes that you would like to talk about from that period.

LEININGER: I would like to go back and revisit, go into more depth about the divided spouse issue. I think I mentioned Curt Struble and I, when we got there, had something like 135 or 140 people on what we called the Rep list, representation list, which important American dignitaries carried with them to the Foreign Ministry every time we had a high-level visit, and said please let these people go. Well, partly in response to the squeaky wheel syndrome – namely, the spouses of these people in the United States – Curt and I said, “Wait a minute. Husbands and wives are different, and we ought to have a sub-set of the Rep List, just a separate small list of the really important cases, those of the husbands and wives, because this is the fundamental relationship in someone’s lifetime. Having these folks not allowed to live together is an order of magnitude greater than simply not allowing someone’s grandparents to emigrate.” So we got the front office aboard, and we got the Department to buy into it. That whittled down our “important” caseload to something like 35, of whom in a given year we might get five to seven out.

Q: How did you get it whittled down? If you started with 140, did you get...

LEININGER: All the rest were uncles, aunts, nieces, nephews, grandparents, brothers or sisters.

Q: They were people of interest, but not spouses.

LEININGER: The spouses became really the focus of our push. We had great little capital to use in those days. We had used up the sticks, and cut off the carrots, so there was very little we could do in the way of bargaining for these people. But at least we spent an awful lot of time in... caring for them, is the only phrase to use. They had almost without exception lost their jobs. They had been thrown out of school. A couple of them, because they had neither job nor school in Moscow, a couple of them had been thrown out of the city. You needed a residence permit to stay in Moscow. A woman named Yelena Kaplan was exiled to an industrial town called Kalinin, a town of about 120,000 people, none of whom seemed to have gotten past high school. She was put to work in a cloth factory, grading fabric. This was a young lady whose father was a research physicist in one of the closed cities in Moscow, who herself had gone to Moscow State University, where she met her future American husband. She was on her way for her doctorate in mathematics. So they kicked her out of Moscow and sent her to work in a yarn factory in Kalinin. As part of her punishment for trying to leave, she got to count how many cross-threads there were in each square centimeter of fabric. This is a lady who thinks, and, for her, this stultifying existence was the lowest level of hell. But almost everybody had a story like that. I think I mentioned Sergei Petrov, a guy who had engineering and computer training, who was reduced to taking photos and tinkering with home PCs of the journalists in town to earn money. Another touching case was that of Matvey Finkel, who, despite his name, was not a Jewish emigrant. He was married to a girl named Susan Graham. She was a nanny at the time, for a journalist. Now, Matvey was perhaps not the sharpest tool in the shed, but he had the biggest warmest heart you ever saw. He would come over and play with our son, with little tinker toys and matchbox cars on the floor all around him. All he could get was daily work. No one would even give him a job. For the longest time he couldn't figure out why, and neither could we, why was this guy who was a blue-collar type, refused exit permission? I mean, Sergei had computer training. Elena's father was an important research physicist in a closed town. We said, "Matvey what have you done in your life?" Matvey said, "Well I went to school. I studied in high school." "Yes, what did you study, everything? Nothing special?" "No. Then I went to the army." "Well everybody goes to the army, Matvey. I mean, as you know, conscription is the law. What exactly did you do in the army?" "I dug holes." "Matvey, everybody digs holes in the army. You dig one hole, and you fill it up, and you dig another hole." "I dug big holes." "Where did you dig big holes?" "All around Moscow." It turns out he had been one of the laborers digging the silos for missile emplacements, the one that was allowed under the old Anti-Ballistic Missile treaty! That had been 10 years before, but because they ostensibly figured he would reveal all to us as to where these missiles were (as if we didn't have other means of discovering them) he was refused. He had been refused exit permission, by the time we got there, for four years already, and it was going to be another five years before he actually got out. Well after we left Moscow, he eventually got out. But that wasn't that unusual. I think I mentioned before that in some cases they would refuse permission for no discernable reason whatsoever, just as a means of showing people it is a crapshoot, unpredictable. You cannot count on any known, public policy in making your own life plans. "We own you, and we will do as we want, not as you want." There were stories – I'm not sure we ever had any such cases ourselves – told by some of the other Western consuls in town, about charwomen in the ministry of defense being refused because they cleaned the toilets where the general shat. I suppose if they discovered bloody stools or something they could reveal the state secret that somebody was suffering from intestinal cancer or something. But the Sovs were in fact refusing permission to menials, who just happened to be in the wrong place at the wrong time. It wasn't just to intellectuals or political or religious dissidents.

Q: So despite the small number of these cases, they took a lot of time.

LEININGER: An immense amount of time.

Q: ...holding them, correspondence with the States I suppose.

LEININGER: We worked with the spouses trying, on the one hand, to get the Soviet spouse out, but also, failing that, lobbying for visas to get the American spouse permission to visit. In some cases the Soviets would refuse that, too, just to be nasty. When the American spouses came to Moscow, they often stayed with us in our apartment. We often had people over for important holidays, and had Thanksgiving or Christmas dinners with them. The Soviet spouses became some of our best friends. Matvey, Yelena, Sergei, Anya, Yuri.

Q: But several of them.

LEININGER: Curt Struble and I would take turns on the weekends showing movies. This was well before the advent of VHS cassettes for that purpose. We were indebted to the AAFES folks, the Army Air Force Exchange System, for circulating 16 MM films all through the defense attaché offices in the east bloc. The DATT office would get these in oh I guess in tranches of six, every two weeks. There would be sign up sheets. People would pounce on them to sign up for these movies. There would be a 16mm projector in almost every stairwell of all the properties we owned or leased, and section chiefs had dedicated machines of their own. The community projector was schlepped up and down the stairs and traded off to people who were able to sign out the movies. You would show the movies on the big blank white walls. All the apartments had big blank white walls; we weren't allowed to paint them. I became an expert in switching out reels on a 16 mm projector in about two minutes and five seconds. Rewind, get it down, get the next rethreaded, ready to go! If it was a particular popular movie, you would "hot reel" it. It'd be showing in one apartment, and as soon as reel one was done, you would run it down two flights of stairs and give it to the downstairs neighbor. When you had really good movies, decent movies, ones that had been released to theaters in the United States, you were encouraged to use them, section chiefs especially, to use them for representation purposes. But we mostly got grade triple Z movies. Ones that, these days, would go straight to video. They were never released for distribution in the U.S. "The Monster From Outer Space That Ate Cleveland," that kind of thing. Movies you just couldn't believe, but that was all there was to do. Again, this was well before satellite television of any kind. It was well before commercial videotapes were widely available. Certainly, we didn't have a tape lending library in Moscow. So those movies were our entertainment. We had a TV in the house, but it only got Soviet programs, and most of those were just complete rot. You watched it when you wanted to get your blood pressure up, if you could understand it. So we would show these movies and have folks over for dinners. You couldn't help but get emotionally involved with the situation the divided families were in. My son grew up there; I guess ages seven to ten. He would just sit and listen to the conversations about people who were being screwed over by their own government, and he couldn't believe it. He still to this day has a firm loathing of authoritarian government because of what he saw happening there.

Q: So this brings you up to about what, 1984?

LEININGER: 1984. We are now about getting ready to leave. Before I leave this topic, I want to relate a few more anecdotes about the KGB, because some of these are part of the lore of the times.

Q: Absolutely.

LEININGER: I mentioned the other day about how the KGB would come into your apartment sometimes, very annoyingly, and mess with your personal papers, leave "calling cards," scramble alphabetized record albums so the alphabet was screwed up. Sometimes, as well, these people would get a little light fingered. If your wife had left jewelry out of any kind, it would just go missing. That, of course, would be given to the searcher's girlfriend. Well, there were several ways of addressing this. You could go to the Foreign Ministry and lodge a formal complaint. You'd get, "We don't know anything about that. We can't possibly help." But the easiest thing to do, that developed over time, was simply to complain loudly to the chandelier, or just talk about it on the phone, complaining aloud about your loss, because the "listeners" in the KGB were from a different branch than the smash and grab people. The listeners didn't like the fact that the smash and grab people had this extra benefit on the side. So within two or three days of your talking loudly to the chandelier or talking over the phone about your loss, the missing brooch or ring would reappear magically in open plain view.

On the other hand, these guys were not to be trifled with. As I was just arriving in Moscow, another Embassy employee was packing up and going on after three years or so in-country. Early on in a tour, this petty harassment tends to just strike you as quirky, a little amusing. "This is unique; this is strange," you think, but after awhile it just gets to be annoying and really oppressive. So it was with this guy who was coming to the end of his tour of duty, so he had his brother, who was a locksmith in the United States, send him over the latest state-of-the-art, pickproof lock. Now of course all the standard locks on the off-compound apartments, the KGB didn't have to pick. They had their own keys to every Soviet apartment complex. So there was no need to jimmy the locks. But this guy, on a Saturday afternoon, took off that standard issue lock, and installed his brother's recommended pickproof lock. He and his wife went out to dinner, and the Bolshoi that evening. He was smiling to himself the entire evening, secure in his possessions for the very first time – he thought. They came home from the Bolshoi and got in the little lift, the caged elevator, when they got to his floor, there in the hallway, off its hinges, was the door to his apartment. The message was clear, "Don't F*** with us. You can't get away with anything." So you know, ultimately, there was generalized guidance for all of us: just behave, and conduct yourself, as if your life was an open book. Don't trust that anything you do will remain confidential. Believe that everything you say is going to be overheard, and don't keep anything important in writing laying around. You can rip it up, or flush it down the toilet, or burn it, or whatever you need to do. Don't say anything out loud you don't want anybody else to hear. I mention this because it is going to come back to another story I will tell in a little bit.

Okay, we are coming to the end of our tour of duty in the summer of 1984, and it is time to say our goodbyes. Now you have to understand that every time you left the old Soviet Union and crossed that border, whether you were on a plane, train or automobile, there was a tremendous uplifting feeling that filled your soul. It was like the weight of the world had just dropped away, and you were like Jonathan Livingston Seagull, being able to fly across the open skies, totally at liberty. It was a tremendous sense of relief and ease. If you were going to go back in again and face up the dreads again, it was okay to indulge in that fleeting feeling. But I had heard from other folks, and it became true with us too, that as you near the end of your tour, you develop increasingly severe survivor's guilt. And when you are leaving for the last time, you realize that you are leaving behind, in our case, some dear people that we had seen very close to death, or otherwise damaged by hunger strikes, or otherwise spiritually and psychologically depressed, and they were going to have to stay. We got very few of the divided spouses out of the Soviet Union during our time. There were just two of the members of the really core divided family group, the one that was really organized, and the one on whose behalf we made the most representations, who made it out. One of them was this general's daughter, Tatyana Lozanskaya, and the other was Boris Molchanov. He was the one the Soviets made the mistake about when they let out a “normal” person on hunger strike. From their standpoint, they should never have done that, but they did. That gave rise to the subsequent rounds of hunger strikes.

Well anyway, we are getting ready to leave, and Sergei Petrov visited our apartment, I guess the week or so before I am going to go. He said, “We have to talk.” “We can’t talk here, Sergei, let’s go for a walk.” Well, you couldn’t even talk within a quarter-mile radius of your apartment building, because they had parabolic microphones out all around, and you would be overheard. So we took about a mile and a half walk long the Naberezhnaya Road, going to Moscow State University. In the middle of a six-lane road, we walked in the center, tree-lined strip. He said, “I have been refused permission again, and it will be six months before I am permitted to apply again. Meanwhile I have been getting draft notices.” “Yes, we know you have been getting draft notices. It is one of those reasons you probably fear for your life.” He said, “Well I am not going to go. If I go into the Army they will never let me out of Soviet Union.” “Well, Sergei, what are you going to do?” “If I have to, I am going to go across the border.” “How are you going to go across the border?” “I am going to climb over the mountains into Turkey.” “Sergei, you got off your hunger strike about months ago. You are still down about 40 pounds from your fighting weight. I don’t think it would be very wise of you to climb mountains and try to get out of here.” “I have no choice. I am going to go over mountains if I get another draft notice.”

Now, I am already suffering anticipatory survivor’s guilt. I am getting emotional. “Sergei I can’t counsel you to do that. You will kill yourself. It is your life. I just feel bad that I have been able to do so little about getting you and Matvey and Lena and all these other people out.” He stopped me, looked me straight in the eye, and said, “Wayne don’t worry about it. You kept us alive.” So I felt a little better at that.

I told you that story in order to tell you this one. Okay, we are flying out of the Soviet Union, this feeling of uplift has set in but then survivor’s guilt follows on its heels. We decided there was no way we were going to be able to go straight to home leave in Florida and start the usual rounds with friends and neighbors and relatives, going on about, “Oh, how was it in the Soviet Union?” All of us in the Service have had these discussions with the folks back home, usually about places of a rather nicer nature than the Soviet Union. When you start to try to tell people what it is like, in a minute and a half, two minutes, their eyes glaze over and they are looking in the far distance. “Dear, what are we having for dinner tonight?” We were still feeling the USSR too deeply to engage in that kind of inanity that quickly, so we decided that when we got back to the States, we would drive across country in an RV to decompress.

So we rented one just outside of JFK Airport, and we drove all across the northern tier of the country. We took a little side trip up to Toronto to visit old friends there, and came back, came back through Michigan. I ran a marathon in Duluth, Minnesota, Grandma’s Marathon – Grandma’s is a saloon! And we drove all across North Dakota, Montana, Idaho and Washington. We headed south; we were going to end up in San Francisco. En route we stopped at a national forest in Oregon. We are at this point 23 days into a 27-day cross-country trip. We had stayed at nothing but Kampground of America RV parks and farmers’ pastures in the most quiet and idyllic and American settings you could possibly imagine. We are now in the middle of this primeval state or national forest, and there is just one other camper, about a quarter of a mile away, in sight. It struck me suddenly that I never told Nan about my last conversation with Sergei, that if worst came to worst, he was going to climb over the mountains to Turkey and might die. I said, "Nan, have a seat. You remember when I went out for a walk with Sergei, the week before I left.?" "Yes." "He told me that he is really getting desperate now, he is really getting concerned. If he gets another draft notice, it is really going to be then end for him. If that happens he is going to..." and here I grabbed a napkin and wrote, "Going over the mountains into Turkey." And I handed it to her, and she read it, and with out another word she turned on the burner on the gas stove and burned it. It took us about fifteen seconds before we looked at one another, realizing what we had just done. The habits were hard to break.

Q: That is quite a little story.

LEININGER: Anyway I wanted to tell that story because it pulls a lot of things together. People who served in Moscow in those days of the cold war developed that kind of mentality.

Q: So you are coming to the end of your assignment. What are you looking to do next then. This is 1984.

LEININGER: 1984, in the summer. Of course there was bidding on onward assignments the previous fall. Oh, that is one thing I should have mentioned. To the tranche of language students who went off to Moscow a year or two before we did, everyone in the Department painted life there in a very rosy way. "Oh, it is not as bad as you have heard. You are going to love it. It is a very close-knit community," and so forth. Within about six months those people were in the pits of depression, because it was a helluva lot worse than they had been told it was going to be. So there were a lot of curtailments and a lot of people would not even consider the possibility of extending for a third year. Well, with our group took quite the opposite tack. They painted it in very dark terms. "It is very grim, but you are doing your country's business. If you really buckle down you might survive. You know, depend on each other, that sort of thing." They got us all expecting the worst, and as a result, out of our group, probably about 40 to 50% of us decided to extend. Now, you have to take into consideration the fact that you had to make that extension decision within about eight weeks of your arrival. Because of the language training requirement, they had to know whether to put the job on the bid list in the October-November time frame, for a vacancy that would ordinarily occur two summers later. If you were to extend, the job would not be advertised. But they had to know. So we just get there at the end of July, and by the end of August or early September we had to decide whether to extend. We hadn't gone through a winter, we hadn't experienced any of the ugliness of the place. We said yes, and we stuck it out for the third year, but that third year was tough. I said earlier that over time a lot of those little KGB games ceased to be amusing; when people leave your dinner parties and get arrested and dragged around the corner and get debriefed on every single thing that went on in the apartment that night, it ceased to be funny.

But all that said, I had seen a lot of people come and go from Moscow, including the previous political counselor, Sherrod McCall, who was a darling man. Uncle Sherrod, Curt and I called him. He was Acting DCM during much of the period in which we had gate crashers and hunger strikes, and so would sign out our most sensitive reports. He would correct our cables in the most sensitive and gentle way, with deep sighs of clear regret, and act as if we had somehow, inexplicably, disappointed him. We, his favorite children, hadn't gotten it quite right. We were talking about some pretty sensitive stuff in those cables, who is dying and who is not, and who was to blame for what action that had or had not taken place, and we had to get our nuances right. But he was very good. We loved him; he taught us, especially, to consider our audience and its needs and imperatives.

But he chose unwisely for his onward assignment. He went to Stockholm. Now you'd think "What is wrong with Stockholm? It is a very civilized place. It is western. It is modern. Things work!" The problem was, he was bored to tears. Once you have been in a place like Moscow – I said this before, the most interesting things going on were within the mission; people would go there on the weekends for fun – you don't want to go to a place where you wonder why you get out of bed to go to the office in the morning, where you are not making any difference because there's no difference to be made. So with that lesson in mind, we looked around at what consular vacancies were coming up. We knew we wanted a better quality of life. We knew we wanted the place to be friendly and warm. But we also knew we wanted some substance, a little professional challenge. There was Tel Aviv! It was perfect. So we bid on Tel Aviv; that was within our sights.

HENRY L. CLARKE
Russian Language Training, Foreign Service Institute
Washington, DC (1981-1982)

Economic Counselor
Moscow (1982-1985)

Ambassador Clarke was born in Georgia in 1941. He attended Dartmouth College and enlisted in the US Army. He later entered Harvard University and then entered the Foreign Service. His career included positions in Germany, Nigeria, Romania, the USSR, and Israel. He was later appointed Ambassador to Uzbekistan. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

Q: In '81 you went where?

CLARKE: I went into Russian language training. My assignment was basically broken in EUR/RPE so that I could become economic counselor in Moscow. They released me, recognizing that was a career move for me. It was a senior officer position, and I was an FSO-1. It was an exciting assignment for which my experience in other aspects of East West trade prepared me.

Q: You took Russian from '81 to ...

CLARKE: ...'82.

Q: How did that go? How old were you at the time?

CLARKE: I was 40 and it was a very rough experience for me. Obviously. I was in a fairly large class. There was a new linguist in charge and two schools of thought on teaching Russian. The lady that was the favorite, even though she was new, was close to the FSI (Foreign Service Institute) tradition of simply repeating patterns and then varying the pattern until you subconsciously developed a sense of how to speak correctly. I believe that is the right way for most people to learn Russian because the grammar is too complex to analyze. However, there were a number of teachers who were accustomed to dealing with Russian on an analytical basis as well and being 40 years old, I was rather eager to figure out why I was saying these crazy things that I was saying. I longed for an analytical framework and hated the endless repetition at which I was not nearly so good as the younger people were. So that was a hard year. At the end I was very disappointed that I didn't really feel I had a professional command of the language. Grades apart, I just didn't feel comfortable. Not to the degree I had felt in German and Romanian in earlier periods.

So when I got to Moscow, the first thing I did was make sure I got into the language program again. I basically had a routine in the mornings that included listening to the radio on the way to work and trying to decipher a significant fraction of at least one newspaper every morning before starting anything else. I worked on Russian throughout the three year tour, though obviously not as intensively as in FSI. In the end I did reach a professional level in Russian.

Q: You went to Moscow from '82 to '85, correct?

Q: Before you went to Moscow, how did we see our relations with the Soviets and where the Soviet Union was going?

CLARKE: We were in a particularly nasty phase of the Cold War. There had been a warming trend in the mid '70s, but everything had fallen apart by the end of the Carter administration as far as the détente was concerned. We were back in the business of imposing new sanctions as a result of Afghanistan, or for other reasons. The Reagan administration was sending strong signals that basically, communism needed to be defeated. So it was not the ideal time for me, going to Moscow.

Q: Had you been in the Soviet Union at all before?

CLARKE: On TDY. That was an awkward aspect of the transfer, because over the years the Office of Soviet Affairs, working with the embassy in Moscow, had tried to build up a cadre so they could recruit the section chiefs from officers who had already served a tour there.

Since this was a period soon after we had taken the commercial function away from the economic cone, there was some sense in Washington, to which I subscribe, that economic section chiefs should be experienced economic officers. I was interested. There's no question that I came to do this job. But when I got there, I discovered to my amazement that no one in my section had ever done economic reporting before.

Only two of the officers were actually as new as I was, but the other officer was coming in from the consular section and was an untenured junior officer as well. So I had to train the whole team when I got there.

Q: This all struck me as being a real problem with our reporting on the Soviet Union. We got quite good at the political reporting. The economic reporting was different and the crucial thing that brought down the Soviet empire was how the economy didn't work. How were we looking at the Soviet economy in '82?

CLARKE: We had a host of people in the intelligence community, analyzing not only anything that came from the embassy, but anything that came from anywhere about the Soviet economy. It was widely recognized that the Soviet economy was not productive in most areas and that it basically was not growing. There was a prevailing joke: Khrushchev had predicted back in the '60s that by 1980 the Soviet Union would overtake the United States. But what was actually happening was that Japan was overtaking the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union had long since been left behind by the United States, even though the United States growth rates were minimal in those days. So there was no assumption that this was an economic powerhouse. The reason that people did not predict major change was that it seemed to the Soviet leadership that this was an acceptable state of affairs. They were just forgetting about Khrushchev's silly prediction and as long as they were prepared to live with an economy that was basically stagnant, why should it change? They were in charge.

Secondly, there was a feeling that just as it couldn't grow, it was not terribly vulnerable to collapse. This was an economy administered from the top down. Everybody had their orders as to what they were supposed to do and what they were supposed to deliver. The orders were always bigger than they could achieve, so they were constantly missing the targets of the five-year plan or the one-year plan and that was one of the games we played. Which month would we discover, after the beginning of the New Year, that it was already impossible for them to meet the plan for the year. One year we predicted as of January that they couldn't make it, which was I think because the weather was excessively cold. They had insufficient natural gas pressure in their pipes, and they had to shut down whole factories in January. We said, "Okay, they've already lost their margin for making the plan this year."

So anyway, there was no feeling that they could do very well. There was a feeling that because this was a bureaucratic or even military style economy, in any hard time they could make sure that the minimum got delivered. They knew where to cut because they had priorities. One of the places they were not cutting, and one of the ways they were being bled dry on the consumer side was that they were putting all their priority into their military. That process continued unabated during my tour there. It was hard for us to report on their military industrial production because we had no access to that and it was all secret and nobody would talk to us about that. But I trust our analysts, who had better ways of counting these things, that military production was in fact maintained. You could see the results of the military priority everywhere you went. For example, only the military had the right to reject a product. Out in the civilian economy there were a lot of olive-drab colored trucks working. Those were trucks the military had rejected off the assembly line and were therefore shunted off onto the civilian economy where even if they could barely make it off the factory grounds, they were still better than nothing and were taken. So there was a sense that as long as the leadership chose to continue this system, they could keep patching it up, and it would be able to produce guns if not butter.

Q: How did you find Soviet statistics and information?

CLARKE: That was an interesting part of the job in that Washington was dying to get their hands on the official statistics the day they were published. It was a requirement for my section to see that the official statistics got back there very quickly after they were published. But they had to be taken with some reserve. The fact was we were not able to go out and collect basic statistics on the Soviet Union very easily. We could go to markets and find out what prices were like and what would be available to consumers, but there was no way we could collect industrial or agricultural statistics very well. It's true that USDA estimates of the Soviet grain crop were always closer to the mark than the Soviet official estimates, but they were done differently and they had the advantage of satellite photography. One of the interesting features of my tour there was to find out that, although they joked about it, Soviet officials did in fact put some credibility into what the USDA reported on their crops.

Q: They didn't trust their own statistics, eh?

CLARKE: Right, especially in the case of wheat. I actually accompanied an American wheat expert on a tour of certain wheat lands in the Soviet Union. We'd been denied access to areas where the crop was doing badly, so we got to visit only where the crop was doing fairly well. We were received by a group of people who were also very knowledgeable about wheat. I guess I knew the general principle before I got there, but nevertheless, it was demonstrated to me. They make their estimates before the harvest, based on what's in the field. They have every incentive and no disincentives to exaggerate that. So, for example, I stood in a field with the American and some Canadians, who were competitors for sales - and Soviet officials, and they couldn't agree what was actually growing there. So that's for starters. There was a difference in field information.

Secondly, Soviet losses in harvesting were enormous. They would not let us near their harvesters because they knew that we would be able to see that the harvesters and combines were not very productive, and they lost a lot of grain right there as they were harvesting. During storage and transport and along down the line, losses were also unacceptable by U.S. standards. So even the difference in what we'd think would satisfy their needs and their original estimates was outrageous. Just vast. Wheat is only one example. It happens to be a critical crop for them, but the same things would happen in other crops as well.

During my career in Moscow, Uzbekistan distinguished itself by pulling off what I think is one of the world's most classic frauds. They were reporting six million tons of cotton production per year when they were actually only producing four. Considering the fact that cotton is an industrial crop that you can't eat on the side, where was the other 50 percent of the bale? Where did it all go? The answer was, there was fraud at every stage in the collection process and at every farm. There was exaggeration which all compounded together amounted to a 50 percent error in the statistics. It was discovered, however, and led to something of a crisis between Moscow and Uzbekistan in the 1980s. But there simply was no incentive to tell the truth. You could only be hurt by it. You could only lose your bonus or worse yet, be punished or fired. So what could they do?

Q: How did we view this, with chuckles, seeing that here was our giant enemy unable to do things and maybe we could make some money off it? Or what?

CLARKE: We cared about those cotton estimates, not because we expected to sell a lot of cotton to the Soviet Union but because we are a major cotton exporter ourselves. If they have sufficient, or if they have to import it, that would have a significant impact on world markets. The same is true for wheat and corn and all of those major commodities. So we had an economic interest. But everybody would sit around and ask, "When is this all going to change?" Clearly they are not world competitors economically, and this is not going to get them anywhere. But in a top-down system, that is for the people at the top to decide for themselves. So it was a constant question.

There was something called the Brezhnev Reforms which are now viewed as a joke. We in Moscow at the time also viewed them as a joke. Dusko Doder, who was the Washington Post correspondent in Moscow at that time, did not view them as a joke. He was constantly writing front page articles in the Washington Post about how reform had come to the Soviet Union. That was 1982 to 1985. Each time he'd write them a little different way because a new set of decrees came out, and he would report that reform had come. We knew when a new decree was published that the next day at 6:30 in the morning, our policy makers in Washington would be reading Dusko Doder's absolutely fundamentally incorrect analysis, probably before they left home. Therefore we had a matter of hours to get together a contrary view and ship it off to Washington in the cable traffic, which of course, the senior leaders in Washington would never see, but which at least analysts could use to brief with, if they got questions.

Q: Doder, I know in Yugoslavia, was certainly a little East European hand. What was bringing this about?

CLARKE: Lack of self-esteem in my opinion.

Q: To be ahead of everybody else?

CLARKE: Yes. He had Yugoslav buddies in Moscow who he stayed in close touch with. The Yugoslavs were inclined to boast that they were showing the Soviet Union the way to the future. In the context of today, that is even funnier than it was then. But that was actually their line. They had a somewhat less bureaucratic economic system than the Soviets and therefore were capable of helping the Soviets reform their system. Or so they thought. The more serious people in Moscow, in the think-tanks, considered the Hungarian model a great deal more interesting than the Yugoslav model. And the western model obviously was more appealing to some there than the Hungarian model. That analysis was not what Doder was reporting. He was claiming that these decrees were a sign of something really new. He was insisting that the Washington Post publish them on the front page, which they did.

But I was pleased to discover that after a time, the International Herald Tribune started carrying its economic reporting from the Los Angeles Times reporters and not from Doder. As far as I'm concerned, he's a totally unreliable economic reporter.

Q: This brings up an interesting thing. If you have a reporter working for either the Washington Post, or the New York Times, who's doing this, these accounts are read more by policy makers than the analysts'. This is what they read with their coffee in the morning before they go to the office. It penetrates more deeply into the political system than all the professional reporting combined.

CLARKE: Right. However, I think someone must have immunized our bosses at some stage. We still felt under the gun to be in competition with him, which we thought was unreasonable because we had analyzed the situation the same way over and over again. Nevertheless there was no sign, at least from State or the White House or our colleagues in the intelligence community that they perceived real reform was going on. In fact, it was contrary to the Reagan Administration view that the Soviet Union was hopeless.

Q: Look at the agricultural situation. We have an agricultural attaché (this is an aside), who seems always to be an extremely competent person. They are a delight to have in an embassy. Where did they see the failure? Was it the system? Was it the geography? Or was it something innate in the Russian work ethic? Or what was it that caused such a disaster in agriculture?

CLARKE: We considered it the system. It is true that most of the Soviet Union was at higher levels of latitude and was more northern than the United States but not more northern than Canada, and we could see what the Canadians could produce in the same climate. It was systemic because if the work ethic was bad, in our typically American analysis, if the work ethic is bad, it's probably because the system doesn't provide the right incentives. Certainly it's true if you work on a farm in which there are 5,000 farmers, it's pretty hard to believe that if you get up in the morning and go do your job or you call in sick, it will make any difference in whether you get your bonus at the end of the year. Even if you get your bonus, it's not going to change your life. So there was just no way to make the collective farm system productive. Then again, they did have technological problems. But if they had a harvester that could really harvest, they would have saved themselves a significant fraction of their wheat crop. They could have bought harvesters from us, but that would have been too embarrassing.

Q: Were you there during the issue of the gas pipeline?

CLARKE: I believe I'm the major victim of the gas pipeline.

Q: Could you explain what the problem was?

CLARKE: Yes. A few weeks before I was due to arrive in Moscow, the United States decided to impose sanctions against those western countries which were supplying equipment or services for the gas pipeline from the northern part of the Soviet Union to Western Europe that was then under construction. In my view, this was probably one of the stupidest foreign policy decisions ever made in the economic field, certainly in terms of accomplishing anything. I believe it contributed to Secretary Hague's decision to resign within a few days after that decision was taken. If it hadn't been for George Schultz coming in and turning it around, it could have been a disaster for NATO. We imposed those sanctions on our allies. The most vociferous response came from the British who pointed out how this was interfering in their affairs and that it was extraterritorial sanctions and refused to cooperate as did all the others who were supplying equipment for the pipeline. And there were American companies indirectly related to these European companies. The decision was taken without knowing what the hell we were doing.

Q: This was a political decision.

CLARKE: A political decision. It was something that Richard Pearle, perhaps Richard Pipes, and other people had brought with them to the White House or the Reagan Administration as something they wanted to do. They were dissatisfied that in the Carter administration, we had let the Europeans go ahead with the idea of the pipeline. I don't know if we'd ever actually formally endorsed it, but it had been studied in NATO. The "hardliners" were determined to find some way to stop this pipeline. To my mind, I don't believe a single day's work on the pipeline was ever interfered with. This was the most ineffective decision imaginable.

The effect on me was, nobody in Moscow would talk to me except our allies, and you can imagine what they had to say. I couldn't get appointments with anybody. The general reaction was we were conducting economic warfare against the Soviet Union. The pipeline was a high priority project, one in which they were engaged with countless international firms. Therefore I was a representative of the economic enemy.

This was not good for my work on my Russian either, except that maybe I had more time to study on my own. I certainly didn't have enough opportunity to use it in meetings. I did have some meetings but too often I tended to be shunted off onto KGB types rather than real economic interlocutors.

Q: During your time, was it seen that this was going to be a viable source of power for Western Europe? Did it make sense?

CLARKE: The Reagan administration's argument was that Western Europe would become dependent on this power source. So obviously even we acknowledged that this was useful to Western Europe because if you were going to become dependent on it, it must be helpful.

When I had served in Munich many, many years before, the government of Bavaria favored buying gas from the East because Bavaria was disadvantaged vis-à-vis Northern Germany which got gas from the North Sea and from Holland which I think was an exporter into Northern Germany. So the idea went back 10 or 15 years before, when the first pipelines were done. The difference was only that this pipeline was so big in diameter, it could pump in so much gas, that the argument of dependency, which was silly with the early pipelines, was real. But the policy was stupid anyway. The pipeline was being built. No reasonable foreign policy analysis would have concluded that our sanctions would actually take effect.

I remember talking with a guy from Business Week in New York on my way to Moscow. It was a hard conversation for me because I knew what the Reagan administration's policy was and I was sure it was going to fail, but I was also concerned about being quoted since that's one way to make it fail. I would not say so, but I even hoped it would fail and quickly, before it was a complete disaster. That ruined our alliance, which we needed for much more serious matters. The Business Week guy was really surprised that the sanction wasn't somehow already precooked and it was a really a disaster. Within a few months, a fig leaf had been invented in NATO to restudy the question and the sanctions were dropped.

We went on to other sanctions of course. We were still imposing Afghanistan sanctions. We had the shoot down of the Korean airliner. We imposed sanctions on Aeroflot because of that which to the best of my knowledge only handicapped official American travelers. But in any case, we did that and shot ourselves in the foot again. But we made a point. We made a public point that we were unhappy with the USSR.

Q: You mentioned the airliner being shot down over the Kamchatka Peninsula. All these things must have really made you very popular there.

CLARKE: Yes. That was a grim thing. I think our sharp reaction was basically all right. They shot down a plane that had belonged to one of our allies. It had a lot of Americans on board. They did so, apparently, by mistake, but they weren't willing to admit it was a mistake. So I think we were right to take them to task. Seymour Hirsch has written a book on this, trying to make it look like the United States was being so evil, not to be more reasonable about the shoot down. I guess he was looking for a controversial position. There is no excuse for shooting down a Boeing 747 commercial airliner, full of people.

Q: What was your impression of the Soviet petroleum industry?

CLARKE: That was one of their big success stories. Talk about dependence, they were totally dependent on their oil exports. They were hoping to get more from gas, but really their role in international trade depended upon oil most of all. They had vast quantities. Even when I first came to Moscow, they were in denial that this would ever peak. I'm not sure that all of our CIA predictions, which were public, were totally on target, but the general drift of them was right. A peak was going to come. There were things they could do to mitigate or postpone the peak, but there really wasn't much they could do to prevent it simply because of the geology of the question.

Q: Were we concerned about ecological matters? Looking at the Caspian Sea, oil apparently was all over the ground. They weren't making any effort to reduce wastage. It was misuse of nature.

CLARKE: Right. We viewed those as Soviet problems rather than global problems in those days, it's fair to say. But even though we weren't generally able to go to oil fields, in our travels around the Soviet Union we had no trouble running into environmental disasters. In the case of Baku, it was not a closed city for us. We could visit Baku. I did several times, partly because of our interest in the oil industry. We had sanctions against the oil industry too, trying to keep American companies out of the oil business in the Soviet Union. I never did agree with that. But the scene around Baku is ghastly. That was not news. The question of whether they would reroute the northern Siberian Rivers to flow south into Central Asia was already an issue during the early 80s. It was being discussed. That was one of the few issues actually in which you could find conflicting public opinion in the Soviet Union. There weren't many such issues but this was one. Russian nationalists would speak up when it looked like something disastrous might happen to Russia in favor of Central Asia, for example, in the case of these rivers. Some environmental protest was sometimes made.

One of the first signs that Andropov might be introducing some reform after Brezhnev's death was in the economic pages of Izvestiya. Even though I hadn't been there very long by then, it was my impression that they had eased restrictions on reporting about economic problems, specifically environmental problems. This was the end of 1982. I'd only been there for a few months. It was very interesting that we for once learned of an environmental disaster out of the Soviet press before we knew about it from some other source. This was a major waste chemical spill. I'm trying to remember now. It was on the Dneister or the Dnieper River. It was a disaster. It ruined the water supply for many, many towns and villages and killed all the fish for a long stretch of the river until it came to a dam where it was somehow contained.

Just the fact that the story was published while it was still news before everybody heard about it on Radio Liberty was an interesting sign. That continued pretty much after Andropov came in. Nothing changed on the front page of Pravda or Izvestiya. All the political propaganda was in place but if you turned inside, there were certain pages – I forget exactly which pages, but I think maybe pages two and three – that were usually devoted to economic developments. That went from almost totally phony stuff to some interesting stuff about such things as why they couldn't get spare parts for certain oil fields. Then later it even began to creep into TV. You'd actually see a TV program in which somebody would be saying, "Yes, this is not working right." That was unheard of when I first came.

Q: Were we looking at the relationship of the various elements of the Soviet Union, the ones that broke off – 12 or whatever it was that broke off about 10 years later? Were we looking at the relationship of Kazakhstan or Kyrgyzstan or Georgia to the Russian side in order to see who was coming out ahead, or were we looking at this as a totality?

CLARKE: Both. There was always somebody in the political section who was specifically responsible for knowing all the beefs of the different segments, not only the republics but the nationalities in general, had with the center and what they were most upset about. Sometimes there were economic questions. The prevailing public opinion among such intellectuals as we got to talk to in Moscow – I mean even informally volunteered – was that actually Russia had been strapping itself for too long by putting more investment into places like central Asia or the Caucasus than at home. There was a net shift of resources going into these other basically undeveloped areas by comparison.

The center of Russia, the heartland of Russia, not necessarily Siberia or the Far East, and not Moscow, as nobody ever claimed that Moscow wasn't getting its share, but the heartland of rural smaller town, small city Russia was being sacrificed. That's a respectable position. I'm not sure we had good enough or sophisticated enough figures to know where all of the Soviet Union's investment was going, at what rates, and at what times. But it was certainly plausible that the huge water projects, the huge mining projects, the huge transportation projects out across the remote parts of the Soviet Union, were not really balanced by similar infrastructure investment in

Is what you are getting at, how might one have foreseen the breakup of the Soviet Union?

Q: Yes.

CLARKE: There was a book published, which I had read at the time, by a French woman, basically predicting that eventually the Soviet Union would fall apart because of nationalist pressures. I read the book, and later I even met the author – a real scholar. I traveled in many of those areas and concluded that this was a theoretical model that she had there and if the Soviet Union were maybe a little more democratic that might happen, but it wasn't going to happen under the Soviet system; I felt that there were too many people benefiting from the Soviet system and in the positions of power in each of the republics. A footnote to that is, I'm not sure in retrospect that I was entirely wrong. The Central Asians who were in power were in no big hurry to break up the Soviet Union.

Q: No. They screamed and yelled when it came. They didn't want to become separate.

CLARKE: Where the French author was correct was in identifying where the greatest strain was and that was visible actually even in the early '80s. Mainly that the Baltics were the worse case in terms of dissatisfaction and the Caucasus next. I don't think we even had a handle on what Ukraine would do. It was pretty clear that the Baltics were seriously disaffected, and maybe some parts of the Caucasus. The latter was not as strong a case as the Baltics.

Q: Were we seeing an underground economy? I served slightly earlier in Italy. Italy's announced national product and its underground, or gray economy, probably exceeds what they report for tax purposes. Did you see any of that going on?

CLARKE: Of course. Actually we used to draw the analogy with Italy all the time. I guess the question was posed when someone announced that the Italian economy was going to collapse. The answer was, "It can't collapse because it's already sunk. It's just sitting on a sandbar. There's no further way down it can go." And I think that's about right for the Soviet economy at that time. It wasn't floating on anything.

The underground economy was obviously critical to the performance of the main part of the economy. But when it reached the extreme of the Uzbek example I gave, about six million tons of non-existent cotton reported, clearly you couldn't have a planned economy where one third of your cotton supply didn't exist. Input-output tables had to be a little closer than that. So yes. There were both functional and dysfunctional elements of the underground or unreported aspects of the economy.

There were people thriving by supplying goods or services that the state could not supply, that certainly existed. The Caucasus and central Asia were already known as being more adept at doing that than the Europeans. There was a lot of discussion about that. But again, it was a system that could continue as long as the leaders were satisfied. I think it is fair to say that Gorbachev, who understood the problem better than all the old people who were in the Polit

Bureau (he was the best educated Polit Bureau member when he was appointed), was aware of all these problems, and he had the audacity to think that change could bring about better performance. Gorbachev didn't come to power until about three or four months before I left.

Q: What was your impression of the Soviet leadership, Andropov, Chernenko and all, and before that Brezhnev?

CLARKE: We buried three of them while I was in Moscow. Brezhnev was already losing it by Aug of '82 when I arrived. We were all sitting around watching him, live, on TV making a speech in Baku and it was pretty pathetic. He lost his paperwork, or his paperwork got confused. Maybe that was not his fault. Nevertheless, he couldn't cope.

The camera had been focusing painfully on a struggling old man trying to collect himself in front of all the party leaders of Azerbaijan. Finally the camera mercifully turned away but you could hear his voice with his inimitable bad accent saying, "Comrades, I'm not guilty." That was, I think, the poor man crying out for help. I got to go to the October Revolution parade in November, because there were a thousand other things we were boycotting so that our ambassador couldn't go and they had to send a counselor and I got to go. It was snowing. It was miserable. Brezhnev was there and stood through the whole parade which goes on forever and ever and ever. Then he went to the reception, which our ambassador was allowed to go to.

Q: Who was your ambassador?

CLARKE: Arthur Hartman, who had been Assistant Secretary for Europe and Ambassador to France, really an outstanding American diplomat. He called a meeting not long after the reception and told us that Brezhnev was going to die and we'd better start figuring out what we were going to do, in our reporting, in our analysis, and about the funeral. He wasn't quite that blunt, but his sense was that the man was a goner, that he'd just done something that a man in his condition should not have done. Sure enough, he did die within a few days. We were really busy then coping with the end of an era. You could argue that the era didn't really end until Gorbachev came in, but the process of leadership turnover certainly began with Brezhnev's dying. Some say that it began actually when Suslov died a few years before, but that's an even more complex argument. Suslov would have been the heir apparent if he had been there.

Q: He was the ideological type?

CLARKE: Right. And it would have been a very different outcome from Andropov, who was KGB but somewhat more sophisticated, and who took over. Immediately he got sick and was missing from the public scene for most of the year that he lived after he took office. Economic reform, the phony reforms of the Brezhnev period, continued, but nothing real happened. So other than the thing I already mentioned about loosening up on the economic press, there wasn't much change there.

But some very important things were happening outside the economic field. They were very decisive things for both the end of the Cold War and I believe the change in leadership as well, which came about when we were able to deploy Pershing and cruise missiles in western Europe.

Q: It was close to the SS20 that the Soviets had?

CLARKE: Right. Because Foreign Minister Gromyko had a major campaign in Western Europe to try to stop deployment and he went so far as displaying the Soviet Union's dislike for German Chancellor Kohl and his reelection. Both efforts at Soviet foreign policy in Western Europe failed. NATO held to its decision. The deployments went ahead despite protests and everything. Kohl got reelected and some were saying it was partly because a few people said, "Well, if the Russians are against it, maybe we need this guy."

I believe Gorbachev, already sitting on the Polit Bureau and listening to these old men arguing about this, must have begun thinking about what he would do if he took over. Nobody was surprised by Gorbachev's prominence because he was a whole generation younger than the rest of them and he was better educated than any of them. He was what passed for the number one rising star of the Soviet Union. People were a little surprised that he didn't automatically become general secretary, but I think that's a failure of Kremlinology. They had to go through this business of the ranking leader succeeding.

Q: Was Chernenko viewed as a short term, interim replacement?

CLARKE: My interpretation comes to a certain extent from Russian sources who were questionable, but nevertheless plausible to me. It is that in exchange for a quick agreement that Andropov would become the general secretary, it was also at least tacitly but probably explicitly agreed, that Chernenko, the representative of the old guard, would be next in line. Every sign after Andropov's appointment, I felt, fitted that model. Then the other side had its day when Andropov died and it was Chernenko's turn. The more progressive members said the next guy is our guy, Gorbachev. So I believe this business of figuring who is number two helps explain why there was no great crisis in any of these turnovers. The Polit Bureau handled this transition, not brilliantly, but with tremendous stability.

Q: Did you sense during this '82-to-'85 period any change in the Reagan administration attitude towards the Soviet Union or was it fairly constant?

CLARKE: I think in the limited area where I was working, economic and commercial relations, there was some change. I think there was no change in the ideology of the Reagan administration. But on pragmatic issues, we began to see that after you got through pounding the table, you still had to decide what you were going to do. Negative things didn't seem to have any impact on the Soviet Union. So by the time I left, which was of course still during the Reagan administration, we were working back into a more official economic relationship. We were having meetings discussing the whole range of issues. The Commerce Department Secretary came out to chair such a meeting. We were loosening up the diplomatic isolation on the economic side. There was pretty much the end of our agricultural trade controls, which were intensely unpopular in the United States and which cost us permanently a fraction of the Soviet market. That policy was pretty much being wound down. Even self-inflicted wounds have to be healed eventually.

That policy was both sufficiently symbolic and practically important to the Soviets so they were willing to move forward, even despite this elderly leadership. We had a septuagenarian in the White House, and we had a whole row of septuagenarians in the Polit Bureau. But both sides began gradually to adjust to a more practical relationship. Most important, Gromyko failed in the arms control area and in the military area. It was a big relief to our military guys. They got to deploy the weapons they felt they needed. I think it was more important in terms of attitudes within the Soviet Union. They were not going to bring us down by just outsmarting us. That was not going to happen.

By that time, the American economy was starting to recover from the ghastly inflation and unemployment that we'd had at the beginning of the 80s. That may have had a demonstration effect on them too. This was a cyclical decline in the American economy, and there was no structural decline going on.

Q: Being on the economic side, did you help the intelligence community with satellites and looking at serial numbers and that whole thing?

CLARKE: They wish. They wish.

Q: They wish. Were you getting much information from the CIA and other intelligence agencies to make your judgments?

CLARKE: For most of the three years I was there, the bilateral relationship was in such bad shape that I had actually a lot of time to devote to analysis and studying the Soviet economy. Of course we looked with great interest at the finished work. The day to day operational stuff we didn't even see. But this group of analysts in the states would periodically produce important analytical documents on the Soviet Union, and we would always read them, not only to see what they came up with, but whether they agreed with us or whether they'd borrowed anything that we'd ever written.

I know there's a great deal of controversy still about the CIA cooking the books on some issues, but my humble opinion is they were doing a pretty good job with what they had at the time. They were not rosy about the Soviet economy. Nobody was. We also saw the academic economists a lot. Since we had no formal exchange program going with the Soviet Union at the time, little informal exchanges and non-governmental relationships were much of what actually was taking place. Leading American experts on the Soviet Union would come to Moscow, and we had a good exchange with them. We would tell them what we could tell them from sitting there and being there all the time, and they would tell us what they were thinking, based on what they could get and their more scholarly approach. I've had very few jobs in the Foreign Service where such a high percentage of the time was actually devoted to analysis. Maybe the only time I had more was when I was in INR..

Q: Arthur Hartman was your ambassador during this time?

CLARKE: Right. He was there before I got there and he was there after I left.

Q: How did he operate? What was your impression of him?

CLARKE: He had a tendency, despite the fact he always seemed very imperious in his posture, he always had this manner of saying, "Gee, I'm very dependent on you guys because I really don't consider myself a Soviet expert and I really expect you guys to give me the best you can to bring me along." This touch of humility, I felt, was a wonderful way of encouraging the staff to produce their best work, but it was also a bit misplaced. We had as our ambassador somebody who'd been ambassador to the EC, I believe, and to France – one of the very few professional diplomats to serve four years in Paris as ambassador – assistant secretary for European Affairs, an economic officer with great political savvy. We haven't often done better than that, even though he didn't claim to be a Soviet expert. I don't think ambassadors necessarily need to be geographic experts. The one disadvantage he had was, although he worked on Russian, he never really mastered it. We of course have had other ambassadors there who did not speak Russian.

Q: Were you there during the Sergeant Lonetree business and the security problem?

CLARKE: Thank heaven I was gone when all that broke. I am pretty familiar with the situation that prevailed in Moscow before I left and therefore, I have some views on it. Even though I don't ever remember meeting Lonetree, he might actually have been there as one of the watchstanders.

Q: Could you talk about the security situation?

CLARKE: I think, first of all, the effort to blame Art Hartman for failures in security in Moscow is totally misplaced. My impression is that he was careful about security in his own dealings with the rest of the staff. There are two places to look when the marines are not doing their job right. One is, who is in charge of the marines? And who is in charge of post security? If those two people are fighting with each other, you've got a management problem that somebody needs to correct. The agreement between the Marine Corps and the State Department on management of marine security guards is flawed. I found this out the hard way as DCM in Bucharest. But it can be made to work if you have good people.

I don't know who exactly is to blame for what happened in Moscow because I wasn't there and I have only all the horrendous amount of newspaper articles that I did manage to read. But clearly there was a collapse in discipline among the marines. If you have marines violating the no-fraternization rule, then you have lost discipline. If you have big parties and lots of alleged intercourse with the wives of the mission and all this kind of stuff, you've lost control of the Marine Corps at your post. It's not the job of the ambassador to maintain the day-to-day discipline of the marines at post. It's, first of all, the marines' job and if they fail, it's the post security officer's responsibility to do something about it.

Q: How did you find the KGB? How was this when you went on trips?

CLARKE: We could spend the next several hours because I was there during the period in which the KGB was not allowed to harm us physically but almost anything else was okay.

Q: Could you talk a little about that?

CLARKE: I would say there were two levels of interaction with the KGB. On the Moscow level, there was the simple fact that some of the people that we met who were ostensibly members of the USA-Canada Institute or some other official organization turned out not to know a whole lot about that organization but seemed to know a whole lot about the American diplomats. So you had this question of a tainting of your professional dialogue, in which you had to recognize that the guy you were dealing with was probably interested in you for reasons other than the subject you were discussing.

The other element was when you traveled. The KGB had this impression that this was the opportunity to seduce American diplomats and they had to give it their best go even if they had failed before. As you would come into each area, there would from time to time be attempts literally to seduce you with women or to get you drunk or do something to build your file. This poor KGB leader out in this corner of the empire could report back to Moscow he fulfilled the plan and had run an operation against a visiting American diplomat. We traveled in pairs. Your pair didn't necessarily have to be a Foreign Service Officer. It could be a wife or it could be another western diplomat but because of this constant intrusive practice, we were not generally allowed to travel alone. In some situations that was very comforting. If something was becoming really rather hard to control, you at least had one other pair of eyes there to see what was going on.

Q: Could you give an example or two?

CLARKE: Okay. Tirnopol, Ukraine. I was visiting there together with a young officer from the political section, junior to me but more experienced because he had been stationed longer in Moscow. This was my first year in Moscow, and it was probably his last.

Q: This obviously was before the Chernobyl nuclear thing went up?

CLARKE: That didn't happen during my tour in Moscow. That happened when I was in Bucharest. That's another story for another day. We were visiting and after – we were in a snowstorm – after we sorted ourselves out, we wound up in the restaurant of the one hotel we could stay in. We were sitting at a table, and there were two young Ukrainians there at the next table, and somehow we got into a conversation with them in Russian. Suddenly two women came up - one attractive and one not - and bumped these guys, basically telling them, "Get out of here." Then they started to put the make on us, suggesting we get together the next night some place and so on. It was done sufficiently crudely that we were of course fully aware that this was not their hormones at work. Much as we'd like to think that they might enjoy that, we didn't believe that was why they were there. So we tried to avoid them. We didn't tell them what our plans were the next day. We deliberately didn't tell them.

We found another restaurant through Intourist so we wouldn't be subjected to this a second night and got a cab. That also had to be arranged through Intourist because Tirnopol is kind of a crummy place and we were enjoying what was indeed a better meal at this restaurant. We were almost the only guests when guess who shows up? Same two girls, who then arranged to ride back with us to our hotel, stranded away from town and the more attractive one invited us to her flat. Any woman who has a flat of her own – a single woman who has a flat of her own either it's not her flat - who's flat is it? Or she's a full time worker for the KGB. She had some interest in living abroad. We asked her about her husband. She had no husband, but she did have a boyfriend. He was off in Poland and so she wasn't worried about him and so forth and so on. This is just a typical but sufficiently blatant example of how they worked.

Q: Did you see a difference between how things were in Moscow and when you got out in the country?

CLARKE: Yes. Generally speaking in Moscow, there was a sense of keeping track of the diplomats mainly by checking them in and out of their homes. We all had to live in certain places, and there were KGB guards in front of those who were observed from time to time to be taking notes on who was coming and going. They were probably smart enough to be able to recognize us about the third time we passed. So they were able to play a zone defense, if you will, in Moscow.

But out in the countryside, a zone defense would have been too manpower intensive so they had to go more one-on-one. They would actually track you according to your itinerary. But since your itinerary had to be approved in advance to get travel permission, they had it. They knew where you were going to be staying. They knew what appointments you were seeking. They knew who you were. They had the files. It was a piece of cake.

That being said, we still had conversations with people that maybe later got interviewed by the KGB but who were really willing to talk to us and who were not afraid to do so. But in Moscow, people were more likely to be afraid of the follow-up interview.

Q: You were a new boy on the block in the Soviet Union. Could you comment on your impression of the Soviet specialist core as it had developed because this is fairly far into the period. It started with George Kennan and Chip Bohlen. But by the time you got there, it sounds like there was a certain dissipation or it kind of wore out?

CLARKE: I don't know what happened to the economic function. It may have been that the economic function just never got started in this cadre. So this was mainly a political officer question. The system was that they tried to recruit the best they could get in political officers and put them to work in the consular section after they had their Russian, so that they could practice their Russian every day, and then would rotate them from the consular section into some other section – political or economic section. And then they would hope they could sign these guys, or women, up for later tours either at some sort of mid-career level if possible or have them come back as a section chief. It was expected that the DCM would be an old Soviet hand at least.

Q: Who was the DCM when you were there?

CLARKE: We started out with...I can't say his name. I can see his face; later ambassador in Belgrade.

Q: Zimmerman?

CLARKE: Zimmerman.

Q: Warren Zimmerman.

CLARKE: Warren Zimmerman. And then his successor was Kurt Kamman who was political counselor or political minister/counselor when I was economic counselor the first couple of years. Then he took over in my third year as DCM. He went on to be ambassador several times in Latin America. So I don't know what happened on the economic side. It didn't work as well. That was the expected pattern. I think it produced some very good people. No doubt about that.

I should say what they did not welcome was really long tours. They felt three years was the absolute max and two years was enough for a junior officer. That was because of the intensity of the fishbowl quality of living at the embassy there and the basically negative relationships, the isolation, the security concerns and so on. So they didn't push for long tours. What they preferred was for people to go off and serve some place else and then come back. I think it worked pretty well. I certainly never would have been economic counselor there if it had worked perfectly because they would have had somebody and indeed the guy who they did propose as economic counselor was Mike Joyce who was doing a fine job as the head of the science section. The trouble was, that was a boring job because we had wiped out most of our scientific exchanges through various kinds of sanctions. Mike was later DCM when Jack Matlock was ambassador. So I sincerely hope my getting that job didn't hurt him. It certainly made a big difference in being later considered for not only Bucharest but Tashkent for me.

Q: Was the radiation still going on during that time?

CLARKE: That was an irritating thing. I don't know exactly what's been made public about it. While we were there, they turned on the microwave again, and my understanding is that Art Hartman simply told them, "Either you turn off the microwave or I'll shut down my embassy."

I don't know whether he was authorized to do that from Washington or not. Probably not. They turned off the microwave. That was the end of the discussion. We were all very pleased with that outcome.

Q: You left there in '85. What was your impression of whither the Soviet Union and its relationship with the United States?

CLARKE: That was really fascinating. I was tired because it had been three hard years. But I felt I was leaving at the wrong time. We were all interested in what Gorbachev was going to do. I think I can speak in the collective on this because it was more or less an understanding within the embassy. We thought that because Gorbachev had studied agriculture – he'd been first secretary in Stavropol and had experimented with economic enterprises and what not, on a reformist basis there, and therefore knew something about agriculture – he had to know what was going on. We assumed that he would leave the international and military situation that he received more or less in place. Let the old guard continue to have the assurance of Soviet might, but meanwhile turn his attention to the domestic economy outside the military sector and try to reform it. That was the theory but it was not based on a conversation with Gorbachev and indeed if Gorbachev had signaled what he wanted to do before he became general secretary, it's my view he never would have become general secretary. So we didn't discover it either. His fellow politburo bureau members didn't know what he was going to do. But I knew that all our predictions were off before I got home from Moscow.

I traveled east from Moscow and spent a few days traveling in China with my family. When we got to Honolulu, I picked up a newspaper and found that he'd appointed Shevardnadze as foreign minister and Gromyko was going to become president. I immediately knew this was way off the scale of anything we'd predicted while I was there. Although Gromyko was said to have supported this move and there was still the lingering possibility that somehow as president he could still run the Polit Bureau, he would still be in charge of a lot of things in foreign policy. We now know that Gorbachev and Shevardnadze, as you might expect, knew each other from before and there was a whole new agenda in foreign relations going on. He appointed, maybe before I left, and this was a little puzzling to us, Likachev to be in charge of agriculture. He was widely understood to be a conservative hard liner, which seemed to suggest that his first moves were not going to be in agriculture. So when Perestroika came, it was not a particularly agriculturally oriented move.

But I was sure there was going to be big changes in foreign policy. I remember visiting in California on home leave and being invited to give a little talk to my father-in-law's service club in town. For what it was worth, I predicted that there would be a fairly significant change in foreign affairs. I wasn't exactly sure what it was, but probably it would involve a new relationship between the U.S. and USSR.

Q: What about family life, your wife and children and all that during this time? How did that go?

CLARKE: Moscow is not the greatest place, but my children were young. They were in the Anglo-American school, which was not a bad school. Many international schools, even in remote places, can function effectively. This one was certainly big enough for grammar school. It had enough classes so that there really were enough kids to make a very viable grammar school, not only for kids of American diplomats but all of the foreign community. There were no Russians in the school. It was possible to send your children to a Russian school and Greg Guroff sent his kids to a Russian high school, but I believe they had a little more of a break on language than most kids would have had because of Greg's excellent Russian. They survived pretty well. They were treated well at the Russian school. It was a particular school that had some foreigners, not just any school.

But certainly there was a social life within the foreign community and to a lesser extent some contact with Muscovites, limited, not very rewarding, but for those of us who were basically dealing with communist countries, it was not totally impossible. It was frustrating. You couldn't get people to come to your home, and when you finally got somebody who would come, it turned out to be another KGB guy. But you still had some interaction that was useful, and they weren't all KGB. There were those, especially in the artistic community, who I'm sure were not KGB. They were creative people who simply were willing to put up with the interviews that they had to go through afterwards. At least that's my interpretation. They never said they were being interviewed afterward. I just assumed these were folks who were given a little more leeway and who of course had no access to any privileged information. So in that sense they were not a risk to the Soviet system.

I did take my family with me on some of my trips in the Soviet Union. We were able to mix tourism and official calls. That was important because a lot of times we would arrange meetings and they would just not happen when we got where we were going. So we had to do something and at least we could see the sights. Before we left, a group of the wives actually went on a trip by themselves to central Asia and had a good time. But the local officials couldn't figure that one out. They never figured that one out. I guess by the time they left maybe they understood they just wanted to see more parts of central Asia and they were willing to pay and they went. The husbands were busy with visiting delegations and couldn't travel.

MICHAEL A. BOORSTEIN
Washington, DC (1981-1983)

Mr. Boorstein was born in Washington, DC and was raised in that area. He was educated at Beloit College, the University of Colorado, Harvard University and the University of Turku in Finland. Entering the Foreign Service in 1970, Mr. Boorstein specialized in administration and personnel, serving in Palermo, Rome, Ottawa, Warsaw Curacao, Moscow and Beijing. In addition, Mr. Boorstein played a major role in the planning and construction of US embassies in Moscow and Beijing and in the renovation of consulates and embassies throughout the globe. He spoke six foreign languages. Mr. Boorstein was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005.

BOORSTEIN: The job I had in the State Department was the first full-time Washington assignment that I had and it was unusual as an administrative officer because I was a desk officer in the Office of Soviet Union affairs. I was attracted to the job because I was ready to try something different and a lot of my administrative colleagues were counseling me against it, saying "you're going to make a mistake, it's going to hurt your career, you're going to be out of the mainstream." I said, "thank you for your advice, but I want to do this," and I did and I'm really happy that I did.

Q: You did this from when to when?

BOORSTEIN: August of 1981 to July of 1983, so just about two years. The office director at the time was Tom Simons. The office of Soviet Union affairs was probably the largest country desk directorate in the whole Department of State. We had four divisions. There was the office of bilateral relations. There was the office of multilateral relations. There was the office of economic affairs and the office of science, technology and cultural exchanges and that was the office that I was in. My boss for the first year was Ed Hurwitz who has been retired for quite a while, but he was Charge' in Kabul towards the end of his career. He was consul general in Leningrad. He was a real Soviet hand. I was probably the second ranking officer and there were two other junior officers.

Q: Did you have a piece of the action?

BOORSTEIN: Yes I was going to say that you have to sort of look at the backdrop of U.S. Soviet relations in the summer of 1981 in late 1979, was it '79?

Q: December.

BOORSTEIN: December of?

Q: '79.

BOORSTEIN: December of '79, the Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan. The relations got very chilly. I talked about the closing down of our effort to open up a consulate in Kiev. Among the sanctions that President Carter imposed was that he basically ratcheted down with that order the array of formal bilateral science and technology and cultural agreements between the U.S. and the USSR to barely survival level. We didn't want to abrogate any of those agreements, but we didn't want to use them as a vehicle that would run counter to our effort to show our displeasure across the board to the Soviets' action against Afghanistan. There was a whole array of these agreements that had been developed and signed after the Second World War, primarily in the '50s, the umbrella agreement of science and technology exchanges and under that there were whole other agreements for cooperation in space, health, primarily heart. You know, Michael DeBakey the guy who did the first artificial heart was honorary chairman of the USSR joint commission on heart research. There was an agreement on housing, an agreement on transportation, an agreement on the environment, a whole array of things that were government-to-government agreements and the office that I was in was in charge of monitoring and supporting and backstopping those agreements and the activities that stemmed from them. When they operated in a very robust fashion, they sort of had a life of their own. Constantly delegations were going back and forth for different meetings and discussions and workshops and joint research and whatever. After the invasion of Afghanistan there was a requirement that any time a delegation was proposed either by the U.S. or was invited by the Soviet Union to go over to the USSR or the U.S. counterparts invited a Soviet delegation to come over, it had to have White House approval. I spent most of my tour writing these memos from the Department to the NSC. They were known as Bremer-Clarks because they went from Jerry Bremer who was the executive secretary to Clark who I guess was the national security advisor at the time. I learned a whole new style of drafting. I don't believe any of the proposed trips in either direction were ever turned down, but nonetheless it was a bureaucratic impediment that needed to be done for the sake of showing the Soviet government that they just couldn't take these things for granted. It was a fascinating tour in that I went all over Washington to the Department of Housing and Urban Development, the Department of Transportation, National Institutes of Health, the Department of Energy, NASA. I had contacts in all of these places that I worked with on a daily basis. One of the more interesting aspects of that assignment was the controversy surrounding a high energy electromagnet that had been loaned to the Soviet Institute of High Energy Physics in the mid 1970s and that magnet, multi, multi ton thing, probably the size of this room that we're in which is what about eight by sixteen or twenty.

Q: Yes.

BOORSTEIN: Was owned by the Argonne National Labs in Illinois.

Q: A big nuclear lab, yes.

BOORSTEIN: Yes, well, but this was not a nuclear thing. This was basically a way to extract more energy out of burning coal to produce electricity. The initials are MHD. I don't remember what they stood for. It's a physics term, but it's a high-energy kind of thing that will produce energy cleanly and more efficiently. Its never even today gotten to the point I believe of being viable commercially, but nonetheless it was lent and one of the outcries from largely the conservative wing of the Republican party in Congress was to bring the magnet home. You would think that this was silly, but it was a big deal at the time. Towards the end of my tour I was sent to Moscow with one of the scientists from the Argonne National Labs to negotiate the terms by which the magnet would be returned to the United States and it was really bizarre because it was like going to a bazaar in the Third World to negotiate the terms because the director of the Institute of High Energy Physics in Moscow didn't want dollars as compensation to arrange for moving this behemoth thing through the streets of Moscow and out to the airport and whatever. We were going to fly in a C5A.

Q: That's our biggest cargo plane.

BOORSTEIN: That's right. What he wanted in exchange for him facilitating all of this was a whole array of audiovisual equipment, which was to help him with his presentation abilities in the institute. It was a barter kind of a thing. We talked about it and agreed that we would talk some more. Then my tour was over. Well, in August or September of 1983 after I left that assignment, the Soviet Air Force shot down that Korean airline, 747, and then all thoughts of us sending a C5A into Soviet air space was absolutely squelched. I believe to this day 22 years later that magnet is still in Moscow. It may be in mothballs. The technology may have totally surpassed its utility as a research tool, but to my knowledge that magnet never was returned.

I made one other trip back to the Soviet Union after a year on this job. I convinced Tom Simons that the woman I work the most closely with in the Bureau of Oceans Environment and Science, a woman named Sharon Cleary as a civil servant had never been to the Soviet Union and yet she worked closely with all the people across the board in the U.S. government with our visa office, obviously with me on the Soviet desk and would meet the Soviet scientists when they came to the United States. I thought it would really be good for her to have a flavor of actually going to the Soviet Union, going to Moscow and Leningrad and conferring with people in the embassy and Tom Simons agreed and the office director of OES, his name was Thomsen was the last name, he agreed, too.

So, Sharon and I went off on this trip. Sharon was an interesting woman. Her father was a CIA agent who was killed in Vietnam. Like I said, she had never been to the Soviet Union and for reasons that were never apparent, when she and I got to Moscow she underwent culture shock. This was a very with it kind of young woman who at that point, how old was I, I was 35 and she was about my age and we had a friendly professional relationship. We got there I just noticed visibly that she stopped talking, looked distracted, looked depressed and wasn't eating. We were staying in the same hotel and so we would meet to have a meal and after, I mean we were in Moscow for about five days and then we were going to take the train up to Leningrad and then on to Helsinki and then fly home. Like the second day there we're having dinner in the Ukraine Hotel, one of these big wedding cake buildings that were there. One of seven with similar designs known as a group as "The Seven Sisters. I said, "Sharon, I have to tell you that you're acting strangely, that you're not just yourself. Is anything the matter?" She just looked at me and she said, "I don't want to be here. I don't like this place. I just want to leave." I said, "well, you know, we have work to do here. Are you going to be able to cope with it?" She said, "yes I can, but I'm just not very happy being here." I said, "well, how would you like me to treat you? Should I be concerned about your welfare or should I just basically leave you alone," and she said, "I just want you to leave me alone. If I need anything from you I'll let you know." This went on for another couple of days and then she sort of gradually came out of it. That was the strangest thing to witness in somebody else and I really never had. Later on she said that it just, she just felt totally out of her element and she had traveled abroad before, but somehow the environment there was such that this was the way she reacted.

In Leningrad she had pretty much recovered and we took the overnight train and we dealt a lot with Anne Sigmund. Anne Sigmund at the time was the branch public affairs officer. She was career USIA and she went on later to be public affairs officer in Warsaw. She was ambassador to one of the Stans (former Soviet Republic), I forget which. Then she was the deputy director of the office of the inspector general and she just recently retired.

Q: Do you know where she is?

BOORSTEIN: I don't.

Q: How do you spell that?

BOORSTEIN: S-I-G-M-U-N-D.

Q: S-I-G-M-U-N-D.

BOORSTEIN: Anne was her first name. She was also in my junior officer class. She'd be a good person for you to talk to because she was in the State Department for, maybe she retired two years ago, 33 years. She was a Soviet specialist and came in as a single woman and was told you can't go to the Soviet Union. Ultimately those rules changed. Ultimately those rules changed and she was able to go.

Well, anyway, working on Soviet affairs in Washington during those years was tough because of the sanctions against the Soviet Union.

BOORSTEIN: Reagan was elected in.

Q: This was.

BOORSTEIN: In 1980, so it was just within his first year.

Q: It was the evil empire, it was towards the end of the Reagan when things pretty well opened up.

BOORSTEIN: Exactly and it was interesting to be part of and I was still at a fairly junior level, the tussle between the NSC and the State Department over who owned Soviet policy. Ultimately the State Department prevailed as it usually does with a new president and new political appointees, but it took a while until a level of trust was developed between the White House, the NSC and the Department and that the career people were listened to. Rather than take this harsh attitude toward the Soviet Union there was still ultimately a sense of okay, look, we still need to engage with these people. We don't want to isolate them and alienate them too much. We have points to be made and after all it was Jimmy Carter who imposed the sanctions, it wasn't Ronald Reagan, but he certainly supported them and continued that attitude and that was appropriate, but again the nuances ultimately entered into the picture. Of course we were very much courting the beginnings of the changes in Eastern Europe at the time, but pretty much my activities were confined to the Soviet Union.

On the cultural side there was absolutely nothing that went on. It was just totally dead in the water whereas when I was in Moscow the cultural visits, the traveling exhibits I told you about, Jessica Tandy and Hume Cronyn in The Gin Game the last time that I spoke they came over and did that, but it was very rich. During the time I was on the desk, it was totally dead.

One other little story about that tour. There was a very wealthy Washingtonian, I wish the name would come to me who was the owner of the Madison Hotel and he lived on Massachusetts Avenue, very close to the British Embassy, but on the other side, had a fabulous home filled with wonderful art. He very much liked Russia; he traveled there many times and knew a lot of the Soviet officials. The name may come to me, it may not and he was giving a farewell party to the science counselor at the Soviet Embassy and so the invitation went out to Tom Simons to attend. (His name was Marshall Coyne.) I don't know whether it was for political reasons or Tom had a conflict, he said he wasn't going to go and the invitation trickled down to me and I was told to go to represent the office of Soviet Union affairs. Off I went with my wife to this fantastic home and I remember when I met the Soviet diplomat who I believe was going to be assigned as the Soviet consul general in San Francisco and he greeted me and started to me in rapid fire Russian and we knew that he spoke fluent English. My Russian was good, but I hadn't used it in a while and it was a little bit rusty and I was sort of taken aback and I chatted a little with him and I thought to myself this guy is just testing me. He's just playing games.

The party was like a buffet dinner and it was free seating so my wife and I saw this Russian gentleman and his wife, had no idea who he was and we offered to sit down and introduced ourselves and he introduced himself to me and it was Melor Sturua. Melor Sturua was a Soviet journalist and he spoke fluent English, didn't play any Russian language games with me and its an interesting story about his name Melor and he was probably born in the late '20s, early '30s. Apparently, it was in vogue in those years to name your children with letters that referred to the Russian revolution. So, Melor, M-E-L-O-R stands for Marx Engels Lenin October Revolution.

Q: Oh God.

BOORSTEIN: It's a fascinating little story and my one cousin the one in Leningrad who was the Ph.D. chemical engineer, her name is Ninel. Ninel is Lenin spelled backwards, we called her Nyela, but nonetheless that is another derivative of that kind of name. Melor Sturua lived in the same apartment house as my mother in Chevy Chase, Maryland and he, all he wanted to talk about was fine wine, what were the best restaurants in Washington and he was dressed to kill. He had great Saville Row suit and very polished, you know, Soviet journalist. That was the dinner and it was very memorable. I'm telling you this because there's a follow-on story. Shortly after that dinner, within a week, Andrew Nagorski who was the Newsweek correspondent in Moscow was out doing something. I don't know whether he was in the Baltics and I don't know exactly what, but he was expelled. So, we retaliated. Who did we retaliate against? Melor Sturua and he was told to leave the United States. Tom Simons in a staff meeting turned to me and said, "Mike, I bet you they're writing up some extra things about you in the Soviet Embassy because you know, they're going to warn your people if you have dinner with Mike Boorstein and the next thing you'll be asked to leave the country." Anyway, Melor Sturua came back many years later after the fall of communism and was a visiting professor at the Humphrey Institute at the University of Minnesota. The other thing that happened at that party it goes to show you the impact of our policy on the families, diplomats and their families and I talk about it when I talked about the closed and the opened areas in the Soviet Union and how we had the same sort of map in the United States, the Soviet Embassy had put in a request as an exception to allow one of their cruise ships to pay a call at the Port of Baltimore which was a closed area because what they wanted to do was to have the Soviet diplomats that were finishing their tour of duties and their families get on that ship and sail back to the Soviet Union. I handled that request as part of what I was; my office got involved in that a bit. They had just gotten the favorable word. Here I was the representative of the State Department there and people were thanking me profusely for this effort and of course it wasn't my decision, but then of course there was a follow by the expulsion of Melor Sturua. It was a very interesting tour of duty and like I said I took two trips to the Soviet Union during that time. The one with the magnet was a fascinating trip.

ROBERT E. MCCARTHY

Mr. McCarthy was born in Canada and raised in New York City. He was educated at Fordham University, City College of New York and American University. After service in the US Army and studies in Paris, he joined the Foreign Service in 1973. His assignment in the Bureau of Education and Cultural Affairs was the beginning of a career dealing primarily with Public and Cultural Affairs with USIA. His overseas assignments as Public Affairs and/or Cultural Affairs Officer were in Belgrade, Moscow (twice), Montenegro, Leningrad and Budapest. His Washington assignments also concerned USIA programs. Mr. McCarthy served as Diplomat in Residence at Georgetown University 1995-1996. Mr. McCarthy was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2003.

Q: [laughter] Okay, 1981. Have we gone into how you got that job?

McCARTHY: Yes, we did. I had just finished an interview with the current PAO, I believe, and with my Yugoslavia PAO. We had known each other, so it was more or less an audition interview. Because I hadn't been there before, it was considered a tough assignment. At that time, checking off the Moscow box was one of the way stations in the Foreign Service, as you know.

Q: Yes. So you were there from when to when?

McCARTHY: I was there from 1981 to '83 in Moscow, and '83-'84 in Leningrad.

Q: What was the status would you say of the Soviet-American relations in 1981?

McCARTHY: Very tense. The Soviets had gone into Afghanistan in December of 1979. This was the time NATO was preparing to put cruise missiles and Pershing intermediate range nuclear missiles into Europe to counter the Soviet SS-20s. And a couple of years later there was the KAL airliner shootdown over Kamchatka. So it was a tense time. As far as our day-to-day activities, that is the activities of USIA were concerned, the cultural exchange agreement, which governed U.S.-USSR exchanges had lapsed because of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. We did not want to renew those negotiations and accord the Soviets the respect and additional status that that would have meant. That put a crimp in a lot of what we did. Up until that time, we had sent large exhibits to the Soviet Union. They had Russian-speaking guides and reached otherwise inaccessible (except for short-wave broadcasts) areas of the Soviet Union. Exhibits would open up for six weeks or so. They would show an aspect of American life, and then the guides would answer questions about everything American. It was a way to get our message out. We had major performing arts groups coming through: Alvin Ailey, the Chicago Symphony, etc. They would play to packed houses; All of these activities gave the lie to the Soviet caricature of American society that was constantly portrayed in the Soviet media.

In 1981 those activities were not possible, because they required Soviet cooperation to book those groups into halls, etc. So what we tried to do was continue to get our message out, but use other means. The ambassador at that time, Ambassador Hartman, made Spaso House, the ambassador's residence, available as an ersatz cultural center. And we would do events there, nonstop. The ambassador just opened his residence completely. There was a special fund, private donations maintained by the State Department that was used to defray some of the costs. Large groups and small groups performed at Spaso. We would have invitations sent out to the elite, the creative intelligentsia. Sometimes people with political clout would come too, although they generally tried to boycott those events at that particular time.

Q: When did you arrive there in '81?

McCARTHY: I arrived at the end of the summer.

Q: What was the lean, you might say from the office or the American staff of the embassy of this new Ronald Reagan administration. It must have been viewed with a certain amount of trepidation, because he had been an outspoken anti-Communist, and very much to the right. What was the feeling?

McCARTHY: Among the staff... well now you're asking me to go back more that 20 years now and try to remember those atmospherics. Those feelings didn't leap out at me. I can say that.

McCARTHY: But there's something else, too, I think. To a certain extent, we take on the coloration of the countries we're in. And I remember somebody came to talk to us about some State Department internal policy. They said when they went to Turkey, everybody there was yelling and asking them questions, like "young Turks." And when they went to Moscow, people sat and absorbed it. The only thing they didn't do was rhythmic applause. [laughter] That's going way too far as an explanation for lack of trepidation, but there was just a little bit of that. Remember also, when you were in the USSR, it was very clear what you were up against. It was very clear what the nature of that society was. Nobody had any doubts. A phrase like "evil empire," I don't think, would have registered particularly strongly with the staff of Embassy Moscow, the way it would in Western Europe or elsewhere. It was true, though, one might have picked other words. I don't recall it as a big issue; let me put it that way.

Q: Okay. You mentioned the, what was the term used, "creative intelligentsia?"

McCARTHY: Right.

Q: I take it there's a distinction. You know, in France you talk about the intelligentsia. What did you mean?

McCARTHY: By "creative intelligentsia" I mean people who are creating works of art in various ways that affect people. So, at that time for example, theater was the most outspoken art form. It was less subject to censorship, less so than the movies or television, which were mass vehicles. So, the playwrights who were writing in the theater would come to events at Spaso House, let's say. And when you went to the theater in those days, there were lines that you knew would be spoken in a particular play and you waited for them. It was understood by everybody that even though this play might concern a dispute between relatives, the particular lines also had political meaning. Sometimes, when a particular line was spoken, you could hear a pin drop in the house. Silence. And then a buzz as people whispered to each other after the line.

Or poetry reading would be another example of that – the creative artist affecting public perceptions. There would be readings where young people would read the works of Akhmatova, Pasternak, Tsvetaeva... poets who were not mainstream... but represented alternatives to Socialist realism. There would be candles on the wooden tables in front of the readers. There would be young people in the audience. Many people's mouths would be moving as though they were praying, because they knew the poetry by heart. The poetry - and the reading - was a form of spiritual sustenance. So, the creative intelligentsia in the Soviet Union at that time were able to represent people when they could not be represented in other ways. They could not be represented through the political system. It was an alternative way of expressing deeply felt beliefs, of maintaining contact with important Russian traditions.

Q: Was "samizdat" still there?

McCARTHY: Yes...

Q: The publishing of Xeroxing or the equivalent of things that couldn't go through the regular publishing houses?

McCARTHY: Yes, you had some of that. You still had demonstrations that were spontaneous demonstrations that would be broken up immediately by plainclothesmen. The demonstrators would try to distribute material. You had magnitizdat, which is the tape recorder version of samizdat. And songs of people like Vysotsky would circulate, things like that. And there were publishers abroad, who published works that could not be published in the USSR, and one way or another people managed to become familiar with them. Some of that material would be read on the radios. The radios were extremely important. By "radios," I mean Voice of America, and Radio Liberty, which could reach large and remote audiences.

Q: Did we have any program of getting publications into the system from Moscow?

McCARTHY: We had American Illustrated, or "Amerika" in Russian, which was a glossy magazine in the style of the old Life Magazine. It used to be in over-large format the way Life was, and then it shrank down to a normal format. It covered different aspects of American life, complete with color photos, and the magazines were highly sought after. Like everything else, sales were regulated by intergovernmental agreement. There was a ceiling on the number of copies, number of exemplars per issue that you could have for sale. They would be sent around the Soviet Union and be sold at kiosks. In Moscow, you could go out to the kiosk when they were to be delivered, and there would be lines of people waiting for their copy of Amerika. You always had returns "unsellable" because there allegedly wasn't sufficient demand. But this was simply to make a political point. I think we estimated that every copy of Amerika went through ten readers or so. There were people who tried to save the entire collection. That was one way we put ideas into the system. There was some modest... we would give away books of course when we traveled... there was the Fulbright chair, de facto anyway, of American history at Moscow State University. But that's really more indirect. We didn't really have many ways to reach out to large numbers of people directly with print publications, though there were a few other specialized publications that reached small influential audiences. The radios were more effective that way.

Q: Was there a different life outside of Moscow as you traveled around? Exclude Leningrad at this point, but elsewhere?

McCARTHY: Oh, yes, it was much more remote, much more cut off, much more underdeveloped. That was one of the things that would strike Soviet visitors to the United States when they came on the International Visitor Program and would go out to Iowa or someplace off the beaten track. The fact that you could be living out in a small town and have access, pretty much, to the same types of food, the same types of clothing, the same types of appliances, the same types of reading material... was a revelation. Obviously, if you were in a large city with a huge library, you had more access, in the U. S. or anywhere else. But in the Soviet Union roads turned to mud in the spring, you wouldn't be able to get good consumer goods, you would not have access to information, etc. People came into Moscow for that. Yes, there was a big difference.

Q: On these receptions at the Spaso House and all, was this a place where you could talk? Did you talk?

McCARTHY: That was one of the great things about those events. You would find out what was going on. My job there was Assistant Cultural Affairs Officer for Performing Arts, and in the old days I would have been working with large American groups coming in. But, as it was, I was arranging events at Spaso House, and also reporting on the arts scene as partial barometer of what was happening, what was being expressed. You would learn all about that. It was a two-way thing. You would hear what was going on and your guests would hear from you and see some element of American culture. There was a range of events. There were jazz combos, for example Dave Brubeck or the New Orleans Jazz Ensemble. Jazz was considered a preeminent American art form then in Russia, and there was a large jazz movement. But we had other groups as well – the New England Conservatory Youth Orchestra, the Yale Russian Chorus. In addition to that, we had movie showings. There was an agreement with Jack Valenti and the Motion Picture Association of America that we would get first-run movies. We had 35mm projectors set up in the back of the ballroom, and the agreement was that when those movies came in they were chained to your wrist from the moment they got there until the moment they left. No chance of a black market copy being produced. But we would show those movies and you would pair off with Russian guests and translate the movie as it was going – could be embarrassing dialog to interpret sometimes. Those were wonderful events, really.

Q: What sort of feedback were you getting from the people. Was this just sort of 'here it is,' we're laying it out on the table, and just hoping something will happen?

McCARTHY: Well, the feedback from the people was not so much "there is what we are laying out for you, let's hope something happens," although a lot of people certainly did want something to happen. This was the time of what they called "zastoy," sort of a lethargy, a stall, under Brezhnev, where the leadership was stagnant. There wasn't much change going on and there was a dead hand of bureaucracy over everything. So burbling underneath all this, in addition to the international scene, was 'what is going to happen post-Brezhnev?' People did want change. They wanted some sort of reform. A lot of people who went to these events and who had engaged us were simply enlarging their area of personal growth. They made a decision, "Look, I can just stay back and never contact foreigners or anything and sort of keep my name clear or I can decide I'm going to live in a fuller more engaged way and I'm going to go to these receptions.”

When they came to these receptions, it wasn't just that they walked up to the door and entered the residence. There was a little square outside Spaso House, a little park. Well before a reception or embassy event, there would be people out there reading newspapers (even if it was pitch black - in other words, plainclothesmen would be out there) as well as militiamen. And the officers of the embassy would be out there, sort of like lifeguards on chairs. They'd see somebody out there beyond the surf in a little bit of trouble, and they'd go out there and sort of take that person, rescue that person so to speak... well, “rescue” is too big a word... but bring that person in. “There seems to be a problem with this invitation” the militiaman would say, so you'd have to go out and say, “Yes, this person is on the list” and take them in. And invitations would be deep-sixed if you sent them out to somebody at a particular institution where they worked; they might not get there. So there were very elaborate instructions for delivering invitations to particular people. You might meet a contact of yours on the street corner giving six invitations for certain individuals. You're always walking around with a pocket full of kopeck coins so you could use the pay phones to call people. In short, people who did this made a decision that they were going to expand their life and take whatever consequences there might be.

Q: What were you observing in Soviet cultural life? Was it vital, growing?

McCARTHY: Yes, it was a very vital life. Music was of extremely high quality. When they held the Tchaikovsky competition in Moscow, for example, and American performers performed, they always commented on the quality of the audience. Acoustics too, but mainly the quality of the audience, that feeling of understanding and support from the audience. I don't pretend to understand that, but performers who had good grounds for comparison would say that. Theater was very lively and very interesting. Playwrights and directors were always pushing the boundaries out a little bit farther. Ballet was good, not very innovative, but very, very good. There were some poetry readings around, still, as I said. I thought the arts scene, the cultural scene, was very alive.

Q: Did you notice, or was anybody remarking, because you were only there for a particular time. One thinks back to pre-Hitler's Germany where a really small, something like six percent, percentage of the population was Jewish. It was a salt in the German stew, you might say. The influence in music, in the arts, in movies, and literature was tremendous. In the Soviet Union you were having this leeching away, in a way, of the Jewish population into Israel and all this. Was this having an effect or was anybody ever remarking about that?

McCARTHY: I didn't notice any... there was that for sure... but I didn't notice any real leeching away of the creative juices. I didn't notice any wholesale departure at the top of these different professions. That wasn't something that I recall being remarked on.

Q: It wasn't being remarked on or anything like that.

McCARTHY: I don't recall that it was.

Q: Were you there when they had the Marine problem and all that?

McCARTHY: That was a little later. I had gone, by then, yes.

Q: How did you find living in the Soviet Union? Were you put upon, tried to be recruited, harassed or anything like that?

McCARTHY: You are always aware of that, and there was certainly a conscious effort to intimidate and it started at the very beginning. For me, it didn't involve anything physical, but let me give you an example. We had arrived in Moscow. We were living in an apartment away from the embassy; the foreigners tended to be clustered in apartment complexes with militiamen stationed in little booths outside. We were in a great, old merchant area of Moscow (Zamoskvarechiye") where you could walk out and be right in the heart of real Moscow. Something happened with the television set in the apartment. I turned the back of the television around and was fooling with it, figuring maybe just by luck I would hit upon something that would make the television work. And the phone rang. I pick up the phone and there's nobody on the phone. I go back and start tinkering with the television. The phone rings. Nobody on the phone. As soon as I touched the television again, the phone would ring. So I guess the people on the phone thought I was a little slow on the uptake, was not getting the message.

So the next time when the phone rang, I picked it up, and nobody was there, and I hung up again. But the phone continued to ring. The phone is hung up now, right? In its cradle, and just going, ring, ring. So they're telling me - this is the message for the less astute among us - that we know what you are doing, we are here. So I buried the phone under pillows and everything and it just kept ringing all night. Or, you'd be out someplace and the moment you came into the house, the phone would ring and there would be nobody on it. My assumption was that it was to sort of let you know that they're there. That type of thing. And you're always aware of possibly being approached. I never had anything that was definitely black and white. It's more you're always wondering why this person is telling you this particular information, why is he taking you to this theater production when he really doesn't know about the theater. So you are wondering, "Well, why, I wonder why" and you just sort of tuck that away in the back of your mind. And this is going on constantly, part of your internal processing. It gets into your veins so deeply that I recall being back in the U.S. and riding with friends in New Jersey, on a highway in New Jersey, and somebody asked me a question about my personal life. Something normal that friends would ask about. [laughter]

Q: [laughter]

McCARTHY: And I remember my stomach tightening up and thinking, "What an indiscrete question to be asking in a car (which could easily be bugged)!" [laughter] Now that's crazy, and I'd only been there two years, so you can imagine the self-censorship mechanisms that people develop who grow up in that culture.

Q: When you traveled, did you always travel in pairs?

McCARTHY: Yes, you always traveled in pairs. During that time there was even a rash of food poisonings of the defense attachés, so they had to take samples of food back, just to make sure.

So, yes, that was a problem. You couldn't travel alone.

Q: I take it that Soviets would not talk about, you know, after Brezhnev... Obviously that whole regime was straffish, as you would say. They were all aging and you had the feeling that their minds weren't working too well. In fact, one wonders all about the Afghanistan invasion - it didn't make an awful lot of sense. But, did you get into any political discussions with anyone?

McCARTHY: With a few people, but generally people didn't bring that up. That was something they didn't get into. It wasn't as though they thought they were going to have a role in deciding whom it was, or determining anything, it would pretty much be somebody who was on the politburo and they wouldn't decide it.

Q: Well, in a way you were spared. Being in the cultural field, you didn't have to read Borba or Pravda on a daily basis.

McCARTHY: No, I didn't. Some of my colleagues did. And there was also a dissident account in the embassy. Officers had that responsibility - just what you asked about. You know, going out and talking to dissidents to find out their views and why they thought what they did. That was their political beat. The average person would not talk to you about that, thought some friends would.

Q: I was wondering, we put an awful lot of focus on dissidents, and I guess it sort of came with the territory, but how did you feel about this? Was this just sort of keeping the flame alive or it was the only game in town? Was this of any real importance?

McCARTHY: Dissidents is a big word. We are talking about major figures like Sakharov all the way down to somebody who is more junior. But a lot of people who were already in that category had made their decision on what was important to them in life and what risks they were going to run, and what consequences they were going to live with and they wanted to get information out. They wanted people on the outside to understand what was going on. Information would get into the external press, be reported on the radios, inform opinion. That was in their interest, too, so there was a mutuality there, I think, in a lot of those instances.

Q: What about newspapers, what reviews of plays in all this? Was this a political area at all, I mean reviews?

McCARTHY: Yes, well the reviews don't come out right away. It's not like the play opens and then the next day you go and see what the review is. There would be a delay and then something might be written up in "Literaturnaya Gazeta," the Literary Gazette. And depending who wrote it, it could be rather informative, but the real information on a lot of things, so many things, was word of mouth. You'd hear that there was a theater being closed down by the police. So you'd go over to the theater, and they'd invite you in, and you'd talk to them about it. You wouldn't read about it in the paper. Or you'd hear about a politically sensitive play and go to the dress rehearsal.

Let me give you an example of how information traveled unofficially. Gary Burton on vibraphone and Chick Corea on piano were to give a concert in the Composer's Union Hall in Moscow. This was a big deal already but they were letting us do this. It was a modest hall, there were no announcements in the papers, or anything, nothing public. But people from as far away as Vladivostok, on the Pacific, seven time zones away, heard about this and came. Jazz buffs, aficionados... because there is a network of information in any particular group you want to name that gets that information around. So at an unadvertised concert, there was a square full of people outside the hall, wanting to get in. The seats inside were already full up.

That same concert illustrates another point about how information gets around. Willis Conover had hosted a jazz program on VOA Radio for 30 years or so, a forbidden radio. He was in town at the same time as Gary Burton and Chick Corea, but nobody really knew about that. They knew about Corea and Burton through word of mouth. Imagine the scene. The hall is packed, they're expecting this performance by Gary Burton and Chick Corea. The lights go down, it's very dim. You see a standup microphone on the small stage. Now a figure walks out and stands by the microphone, and he says, "Good evening, ladies..." and that's as far as he got...the place went crazy! People standing on chairs, cheering, clapping. It was Willis Conover ...his voice so familiar for so many years, right there in Moscow. All the audience needed was a couple of words. And they were so familiar with the voice and loved it so much because of a radio (VOA) that had no official standing at all.

Q: Did you get involved in observing these, I guess they're called educational lectures or something...?

McCARTHY: Oh, God. [laughter] Yes. Particularly in St. Petersburg, the year after Moscow. They were called the Znanie Society lectures, the Knowledge Society lectures. And you would attend and it was so painful. You spent three hours and took notes on what the individual said and what the questions were and the general tenor of the discussion. And you'd do a cable on it. This was one way of reporting back what the Communist Party's popular outreach was on different issues. And you'd be in there on a Sunday afternoon and you could count on probably five or six hours of daylight that day, and you're spending three of them sitting there in the Znanie Society Lecture. That came up every five weeks or so in St. Petersburg on a rotational basis among Russian speakers.

Q: When you left Moscow, you went to, well we're talking about Leningrad in those days...

McCARTHY: Right.

WARREN ZIMMERMAN
Deputy Chief of Mission

Warren Zimmerman was born and raised in Philadelphia, PA. He received a bachelor's degree from Yale in 1956 and attended Kings College, Cambridge as a Fulbright Scholar. He served briefly in the U.S. Army before entering the Foreign Service in 1961. Ambassador Zimmerman's career included positions in Caracas, Belgrade, Moscow, Paris, Madrid, Geneva, and Vienna. He was the ambassador to Yugoslavia from 1989-1992. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on December 10, 1996.

Q: Today is June 9, 1996. Warren we are in the fall of '81 and you are going to Moscow. You served in Moscow this time from when to when?

ZIMMERMANN: I served from September '81 to July of '84.

Q: What was your job?

ZIMMERMANN: I was the DCM.

Q: How did you get the job?

ZIMMERMANN: I got the job because I had worked for the ambassador, Arthur Hartman, twice before, once in the European bureau and once when he was ambassador to France. He was somebody who had not had a lot of general Soviet experience. He ran the European bureau but he had never served in Moscow before. He didn't speak Russian so he wanted somebody whom he knew and who also had the Moscow credentials, so he fixed on me despite the fact that I had promised my wife that we would never return to Moscow.

Q: Yes. It is the type of job you can't turn down isn't it?

ZIMMERMANN: Even she thought that.

Q: Well, what was the situation in '81? This would have been Ronald Reagan had just come in.

ZIMMERMANN: Yes, we were probably at the lowest point of our relationship with the Soviet Union in the past two decades since maybe the Cuban missile crisis. Reagan had come in. The Soviets thought he would be another Nixon and be in favor of detente and would be able to deliver the American conservatives toward detente. As it turned out, Reagan had no interest at all in detente. So, the Soviets were not only wrong in their analysis but they were doubly furious at him because he didn't conform to their analysis. So, we got there in the fall of '81 after Moscow had been without an American ambassador for nearly a year with the mission, although it was never clearly expressed, to try to hold things together against the day when the relationship might take a turn for the better.

Q: Well, before you went out there, were you taking to people at the Soviet embassy and getting or from Soviet intellectuals or people that you had contact with, I mean how were you finding that they felt that somehow Reagan was going to be another Nixon?

ZIMMERMANN: Well we heard it. I am not sure we heard it before we got out there, but it became clear to us through our contacts at the USA Institute in Moscow which of course, was a very powerful intellectual organization that our Yuri Arbatov, the head of that institute had advised Brezhnev, who was then still the general secretary and the President, that Reagan would be another Nixon. Arbatov had been proven wrong and was in a very surly mood when we got there because he was out of favor for having miscalculated the American election. So even the contacts which we normally had with the USA institute which usually were more or less good, were circumscribed because of Arbatov's pique at having gotten things wrong.

Q: Could you talk a bit about the role of the USA Institute in the Soviet Union?

ZIMMERMANN: The USA Institute was 50% a research organization on the United States and 50% a propaganda organization which was designed to be the host of virtually all intellectual American visitors to the Soviet Union and to give them the Soviet line on practically everything. It was heavily infiltrated by KGB as we suspected when we were there, and we later found out to be true, once the Soviet Union collapsed. So it was meant to be the more or less exclusive funnel for American visitors to the Soviet Union. This was in great contrast to Soviet visitors to the United States for whom we had no funnel and they were totally free or nearly totally free to investigate every nook and cranny of American life. We had a filter in Moscow in the USA Institute. American professors visiting and others visiting had to use that filter.

Q: What was the political situation in the Soviet Union like when you arrived in '81?

ZIMMERMANN: Well, it was now called the period of stagnation. Brezhnev was in his dotage. He was slurring words; he was falling asleep. He was getting drunk. There was a general perception that nothing was happening. In fact, Brezhnev died shortly after we got there and was succeeded by Andropov who didn't last very long either, who was succeeded by Chernenko who also didn't last very long. So it was a period, it was probably the period in which the seeds for the destruction of the Soviet Union were coming to bloom. When Gorbachev, who was a dynamic energetic individual took over after I had left, Hartman was still there, he was taking over on the ashes of an absolutely paralyzed ineffective political apparatus.

Q: Well, let's talk about the embassy first. How did Arthur Hartman work in Moscow?

ZIMMERMANN: Hartman was and is a genuine intellectual, somebody who approaches problems with a very clear insight into them. He was extremely frustrated by the inability to get to see Soviet officials at a high level and on a regular basis. He turned in a direction which no previous American ambassador had ever turned which was toward the dissident and refusenik community. He decided if he wasn't able to get to official Soviets he was prepared to talk to unofficial ones. He became a great leader in the cultivation and the support for the dissident community in the Soviet Union including many people who are now holding important posts today.

Q: Did this sort of upset you might say the embassy establishment in this. I mean this is a turnaround and sometimes there is the feeling would we do that, don't rock the boat or something like that?

ZIMMERMANN: No, the people in the embassy loved it because first of all some of them were assigned to look after the dissidents, and secondly, they felt as he did that these were people that it was the duty of the United States to support. I think most people in the embassy thought it had not been done adequately before Hartman arrived.

Q: Well, when you say dissidents, often this was focused on the Jewish community but this was a far broader group.

ZIMMERMANN: Yes. There were essentially two types of people who were on the outs with the regime whom the U.S. embassy could see. One group were dissidents, that is people who were focusing their lives and their careers on opposing one way or another the policies and the structure of the communist Soviet Union. Those were people like Alexander Solzhenitsyn who by then was in the United States, Andrei Sakharov, people most of whom had no intention of leaving the Soviet Union. They were reformers. They were interested in improving. Then you had a second group. The first group was not primarily Jewish. They were primarily Russian or primarily Ukrainian or Baltic, where ever they came from, although there were many important Jews among them including Sakharov's wife. But secondly there was the group of refuseniks. These were almost entirely Jewish. These were people who wanted to leave the Soviet Union, go to Israel or the United States who felt that they had been subjected to tremendous ethnic discrimination which was the case. They felt no particular allegiance to the country or to the regime or to the doctrine of communism. They simply wanted to get out. Perversely, although they were a thorn in the side of the Soviet authorities, the authorities decided to prevent them from leaving. We saw both of these groups, and they had not been seen at the ambassadorial level before at any point during the whole history of the cold war.

Q: Well on this new focus, there is always almost this competition between one trying to influence people, you know, and present the American point of view with the hope that eventually they will be in positions to do something, and the other one is sort of from the intelligence side to milk them of everything they know. Was that a problem because the intelligence side can taint the other relationship? Did that come up?

ZIMMERMANN: Well, the Soviets, of course, had a traditional paranoia about the United States and, they certainly felt that our desire for contact with them was driven by the desire to find out illicit information about them. That's why they went to such ludicrous extremes to prevent us from meeting with Soviet officials, with Soviet citizens, with scientists and so forth. Certainly there was a desire on our part to learn as much as we could about the Soviet Union, particularly those things which pertained to American interests. But there was also a desire to find people we could communicate with in order to have a dialogue and project the American point of view and get an authoritative version, not just out of Pravda, of the Soviet point of view. In those three years '81-'84 when I was there, that was denied us.

Q: Well, Well the KGB, at this point Andropov was running the country to begin with, wasn't he still running the KGB?

ZIMMERMANN: He was running the KGB. Of course, we knew that every phone conversation we had that every conversation we had within our own apartments or residences was bugged and listened to. I heard estimated by a person in the CIA when I was a very junior officer in Moscow, when I was a first secretary in the '70s, that no fewer than six KGB people were assigned exclusively to me to collect telephone transcripts and buggings from the apartment and to follow me where I went and so forth. Six were dedicated to me. In an embassy which probably had 40 or 50 officers that is already an enormous expenditure of resources. They would have to do the same to the British and the French and the Germans and some of the other embassies in town. So this was a police state in an absolutely accurate sense of the word. The promotion career possibilities for people in the KGB were better than for people in the foreign ministry for example or people in the other civilian ministries. The KGB was more or less the top of the tree for ambitious careerists in Russia. It dominated everything.

Q: Was there any feeling that in the long run the KGB might be almost the answer? They were really much more exposed to the real world than other parts of the Soviet Union.

ZIMMERMANN: We were anxious to get to know KGB people, people that we knew or suspected were KGB. KGB people were more interesting to us because we assumed they would be better informed, would be closer to what the really authoritative elements of the regime were. So, we rather than shun them, we were very anxious to talk to them.

Q: I mean again we come to these two sides. One, to try to turn a KGB agent of course is the goal of any decent CIA man, as the reverse is true. But there was more than that. This is to, not to influence them but to reform them and get from them. Did you find them a good source?

ZIMMERMANN: Yes. Any diplomat wants to talk to people in the host government who are important and authoritative. In the Soviet Union that meant in most cases the KGB, so we were very interested when we knew or suspected that somebody was a KGB person to give them our position and to listen carefully for theirs.

Q: What about daily life there? Was it a problem; had it gotten worse, better?

ZIMMERMANN: Well, there was very little difference between our first tour and our second tour six years later. Everything in daily life was a hassle. I am speaking about diplomats now. For Soviet citizens it was a hassle times ten. Shopping was difficult. Getting anything repaired was difficult. Finding people to talk to was difficult. It was a very stressful life for diplomats. There were very few occasions where you could totally relax because you were constantly under the surveillance of the KGB who would exploit any weakness, drunkenness, sexual aberration, affairs, that kind of thing. They would try to use those against anybody they caught doing it.

Q: How did Arthur Hartman relate to his staff?

ZIMMERMANN: Hartman, I would not call him a chummy person. He had a certain aloofness and dignity. He also presided over an embassy which consistently I think got the highest marks by the inspectors for morale. He was very sympathetic to individual problems. As I said, this turn toward human rights made him very popular with his staff. I recall as a matter of fact, that the first lunch he had at Spaso House, the ambassador's residence, was for the spouses, the Soviet spouses of American citizens who were unable to leave the country. The spouses couldn't leave the country, so we had our own group of refuseniks. There were about 30 of them. Most of them were Jewish but not all. Nobody had thought to bring them together as a group, and Hartman did that. He brought them together as a group, we had lunch. He expressed his strong support for getting them exit visas so they could join their husbands in the United States. It was a wonderful gesture which had never been done before and which I think immediately ingratiated him to his staff because many of the staff in the embassy had been taking care of these people. They had been having them around and cheering them up and so forth. There were some people in the embassy who felt that since Hartman was not a traditional Soviet type, that is he had not done his apprenticeship in previous tours in the Soviet Union. He did not know Russian. That he was inappropriate for the job. I detected some feeling to that extent. I disputed it. I was opposed to it, but I think it did exist. I would say by and large, when he was an ambassador, he was very much admired for his diplomatic ability. To my mind he was one of the best two or three diplomats I have ever seen, not just worked with, but seen in my career. He was greatly admired for that. He was greatly admired for his integrity which was rock bottom 100%. I think essentially he had a very positive, gave a very positive feeling to people who were in the embassy.

Q: Well his not being a Soviet Russian expert, I would think that would cast you in a somewhat different role than the normal DCM who was supposed to be the inside man who administers the embassy. Did you find you were called on more somewhat different than the traditional DCM role?

ZIMMERMANN: Well I think I in a way had to be in the traditional DCM role in the sense that DCMs look after the running of the embassy, are the lightning rod for morale problems and so forth. I did that. I had never really done that before. I discovered I liked doing that quite a lot because it brought me very closely in touch with varieties of people. But, Hartman did look to me for that, and I worked very hard at that part of it. That was certainly well over 50% of what I did, although previous to that I had been primarily a substantive political officer.

Q: Well, looking at both the political and even more so the economic officer's part of this, what sort of information were they getting? I mean was it still the traditional looking up at the newspapers and newscasts and that sort of thing?

ZIMMERMANN: You got very little from people. You got most of it from published sources. I think certainly that was true with the economic section. They had to rely on mostly what was published, and what they could see with their own eyes.

Q: Well this is it. This, of course, came up about a decade later with the essential collapse of the Soviet Union mainly because of economic inefficiency and political stagnation. Were we looking at the Soviets and saying you know, Gee this doesn't work, or was it just more of the same the way we were seeing it? Or were we seeing any increase in the non workingness of the whole system?

ZIMMERMANN: Yes, I think there was a general feeling that it was grinding down. Brezhnev had become a figure of ridicule while we were there.

Q: Ridicule in the embassy or ridicule in society?

ZIMMERMANN: Ridicule in society. Now when Andropov took over, strangely enough, he was seen as a kind of a reformer. Somebody who was going to get the system moving again. Of course, he didn't have much time to do it, and the things he did were not very radical, so nobody will ever know whether he would've moved things or not. But, even Soviet dissidents and people who were on the leading edge of independent culture were quite sympathetic to Andropov, at least in comparison to Brezhnev. I remember for example, Yuri Lubimov who was the head of the Taganka Theater which was the most avant garde Russian theater. It did some productions which were very critical, inferentially critical of the regime. But Lubimov was an admirer of Andropov. Andropov had sent his son to try out for Lubimov's theater, and Lubimov tried him out and turned him down, and he went back to his apartment and waited for the inevitable phone call that would tell him he was fired. He got the phone call. It came from Andropov himself and it consisted of two words, "Thank you." So Lubimov who was a very influential person in the dissident community was propagating Andropov. Roy Medvedev, who was a dissident historian, was strongly supporting Andropov, so Andropov had a mixed reputation. Some of the dissidents supported him; others felt that this was just a somewhat more palatable version of a totally corrupt and ineffective and oppressive regime. Then when Andropov died and Chernenko took over, that was a step backwards because Chernenko was a Brezhnev person and was very old and infirm.

Q: What was the general feeling about this Chernenko taking over from Andropov? I mean what was our analysis?

ZIMMERMANN: Well the analysis was simple and I think even obvious that the politburo was not up to pushing reform further than Andropov was prepared to take it, and instead took a step backwards from reform by choosing someone who wasn't even politically important. He had been an apparatchik, a bureaucrat all his life, and had been associated with Brezhnev, the model of stagnation. So, it was a clear indication that this politburo was not up to reform. Actually when they chose Gorbachev not so long afterwards, it is doubtful that very many of them realized that Gorbachev would become the reformer that he turned out to be. He certainly was more energetic than the others and younger, but he had been an orthodox communist up to that point, and nobody had guessed that, neither in the west nor in the Soviet Union he was going to turn out the way he did.

Q: Did you feel that you were as sometimes embassies do having to fight fires on both your rear and your front? In other words you were dealing with the Soviets who were difficult, and then you had the new Reagan administration. The Reagan administration changed over the years as most do, became more subtle in how it approached problems, but you had the brand new Reagan administration, the NSC, the White House particularly. Did you feel they were unhelpful, or was it a problem?

ZIMMERMANN: Well the NSC was absolutely terrible in the sense that it took a bad relationship between the U.S. and Soviet Union, two countries which after all were capable of destroying each other, took this bad relationship and made it worse on purpose. Richard Pipes for example, who was the Soviet expert, a fine historian of Russian history from Harvard, he would take drafts of letters from Reagan to Brezhnev and sharpen them so as to put in insults, the kind of language that the Soviets would immediately take to be insulting. Something that no head of state should ever do. Of course that would infuriate the Soviets and we would end up with a kind of a non-existent relationship. The State Department was not like that. You had people in the State Department who were pragmatists. Larry Eagleburger who at that point was undersecretary for political affairs, and was Hartman's major interlocutor, understood the need to keep a relationship going, and most of all George Shultz. When he became Secretary of State, he had a clear view that we had to maintain a relationship with the Soviet Union. He worked very hard on Reagan using whatever tools he had to move Reagan toward a more cooperative relationship with Moscow. Shultz worked with Mike Deaver who was a public relations guy but was very close to Mrs. Reagan who had doubts about the tough policy because she did not want her husband to go down in history as the man who messed up relations with the Soviet Union. So, she was a factor for a better relationship. Deaver fed that, and Shultz in the State Department was working in that direction. Finally, we got by 1983 to a situation where we were able to make a number of small agreements with the Soviets. They didn't amount to much individually. Collectively they didn't amount to much either but at least there were elements of cooperation that were going on. Things were beginning to pick up. Then you got the Soviet shooting down of the Korean airliner sometime in the spring or summer of 1983, and that knocked everything back.

Q: Before that you were talking about Richard Pipes, sharpening and exacerbating the situation. What was his motivation in doing that?

ZIMMERMANN: He was anti Soviet. He is a Polish émigré. He had a traditional Polish view of the Soviet Union which was 100% negative, and he did not want a close relationship with the Soviet Union. It is actually amazing to me as a professional diplomat that people should not want even a minimal relationship with a country that was as powerful as the Soviet Union. But Pipes didn't want it. Richard Perle who was a very important force in the Pentagon didn't want it. His boss, Secretary of Defense Weinberger didn't want it. These were people who were so ideologically hard over against any relationship with the Soviets that it became very hard for Reagan who may have been ideologically in the same camp, but personally wanted a relationship. He wanted to get to know Soviet leaders. He thought he could influence them. It made it very hard for him. So during most of his first term nothing happened that was cooperative.

Q: Also there was a period of what I gather was a sort of a freewheeling national security council who didn't really have any leadership in the National Security Advisor. You had some rather weak people who didn't know the territory.

ZIMMERMANN: You had weak people and it was a kind of a revolving door. They changed all the time, and there was no discipline anyway in the White House.

Q: It allowed sort of the people who had their own agenda, the Pipes and later Ollie North and all to sort of go ahead and do their thing.

ZIMMERMANN: That's right. There was nobody telling them to stop.

Q: I have been interviewing Frank Carlucci talking about when he was eventually called in just to clean up the mess. He fired a lot of people and just sort of got the thing organized because it was sort of all these independent operators. Were you feeling that?

ZIMMERMANN: Oh yes, sure. Definitely on Soviet policy. People would come in with their own agendas. There was no sense that they had to discipline themselves, that they had to stick to any policy line at all other than what they decided in their wisdom was the right one.

Q: How about high level visits; were there many?

ZIMMERMANN: There were none at all. Reagan didn't meet Gorbachev until 1985, so we had no major visits I can remember at all. In fact, Gromyko who had the habit of going to the UN every fall for the opening of the UN general assembly and would usually go down to Washington and meet the President, we sanctioned his plane. We tried to prevent his plane landing at Kennedy Airport which of course was ludicrously ineffective and stupid. As I recall the ruckus over that effort resulted in no Gromyko meeting with high level American people.

Q: Sanctioning it, here somebody is coming to the UN. I mean what the hell was this all about?

ZIMMERMANN: It had to do with some effort by New York State I think it was or the governor whoever it was at that time, to grandstand and to make a stand against Gromyko. Of course Gromyko had a perfect right of going to the UN to land. We have a treaty obligation to provide that, but that didn't stand in the way of people. He eventually did land, but he was furious that it just made the atmosphere for any serious discussion with him impossible.

Q: How about Congress? Was there much Congressional to and fro?

ZIMMERMANN: Congress was very interested in the human rights side of things, of course. I don't think Congress was a major factor in trying to hold back the relationship in the first Reagan term. We got a number of Congressional visitors who were anxious to meet at the highest level possible with Soviet officials. In a way, I think Congress may have had a moderating effect on the extremes of the Reagan administration's anti Sovietism at the beginning.

Q: What was the feeling your feeling and maybe by inference by Hartman and all about Reagan during this time? Was he considered such a right winger, you know sort of a we just have to get through this administration or was he seen as maybe something could be done?

ZIMMERMANN: I can only speak for myself on this. I am not sure what Hartman would say. I voted against Reagan twice. I am a Democrat. I didn't like what he stood for at all. I didn't have much respect for his competence before he was President. When he came into office, I was faced with the normal choice of every foreign service officer is faced with, do you want to serve this president or not. If you serve him, you are loyal to him and you carry out instructions. I grew to think quite quickly that Reagan because of his strong belief in personal relationships actually wanted to have a better relationship with the Russians. He wrote Brezhnev hand written letters occasionally talking about peace, and getting rid of nuclear weapons. So this was a man that I thought would come around if you could somehow reduce the influence of these baleful advisors that he had who didn't want any progress at all.

Q: What about Afghanistan during this time? You arrived sort of two years into the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. At that point I guess it looked like the Soviets were really going to subdue Afghanistan didn't it? What was the feeling?

ZIMMERMANN: The feeling I think by 1981 was that the Soviets were in a quagmire. They didn't seem to be able to deal with anything. We began to get probes. I don't know if it was disinformation or real information, but they were looking for a way to get out. They wanted the United States to help them. Of course, the price of that might have been pretty high I guess. Even as I recall Dobrynin said something.

Q: Was he ambassador?

ZIMMERMANN: He was ambassador to Washington. As I recall he said something to somebody in the State Department about the need to get U.S. help to help the Soviets out of Afghanistan. The rumor when Andropov came in was that he was going to get them out of Afghanistan. That was a rumor that was so widespread it almost certainly was being spread by the KGB. Of course he didn't do it. He didn't do it in the year or so before he died.

Q: Was the embassy sort of saying here is a target of opportunity? Let's make it more difficult for them. How did we feel about that?

ZIMMERMANN: I wouldn't say the embassy was involved in that. There was a strong Congressional view which resulted in legislation to arm the mujahideen in Afghanistan, which I have to say I was not sympathetic with but which actually turned out to work to make it more difficult for the Soviets. Indeed that is what happened. There is no doubt at all I think that American arms help and training for the mujahideen helped them to defeat the Soviets in Afghanistan. Now of course, we have a mujahideen problem.

Q: What about Soviets in this period internationally? Were they messing around? How did we feel about what they were doing in let's say Central America?

ZIMMERMANN: Well, the relationship with Cuba was as strong as ever. We were on a crusade, of course, in Nicaragua and El Salvador and were alleging a lot of Soviet and Cuban communist influence there. I think that was a big exaggeration. A lot of the dissidence there it seems to me was indigenous. But we had major disputes with the Soviets over Nicaragua for example when we mined the harbors of Nicaragua; they were furious at that, of course. I don't think Central America was a major issue for them. It was for us, and we imputed to them a lot of things I think they weren't actually doing. As far as Asia was concerned, trying to think back, I don't think we had any serious problems with them then. The North Vietnamese who had taken over in '75 had not really extended their influence very far, so there was not a feeling that the Soviets were piggybacking with the North Vietnamese into new areas of influence in Asia. Africa was such a mixed picture. I didn't feel that we had serious problems there. The middle east was a major area of confrontation, as it traditionally had been and it remained. Europe was very important because we were trying to put in intermediate range weapons. As far as the Soviets were concerned the major question was would the Germans be prepared to accept these missiles that could reach into the Soviet Union.

Q: Well, the Soviets had already introduced their intermediate one the SS-20.

ZIMMERMANN: Yes, the Pershings and the cruise missiles, the INF weapons so to speak were designed to be a counter to the SS-20s. If you look at it, and we get into strategic arms theory here, but if you look at it from the point of view of the doctrine of deterrence, we wouldn't have needed to put intermediate range weapons in Europe because we had the triad of American strategic weapons in the air, ground based missiles, and submarine based missiles. If the Soviets attacked with their SS-20s we could destroy the Soviet Union with these strategic weapons. But there was a strong feeling that you needed to balance the SS-20 off with an intermediate range weapon that would be stationed in western Europe. For example, this would be the first nuclear weapon stationed in Germany ever.

Q: Well they have had, I remember as a GI, I could see this cannon being rolled around Frankfurt and other places, huge atomic cannon.

ZIMMERMANN: I may be wrong in this; they may have had tactical nuclear weapons, but these were the first nuclear weapons the Germans had that could reach the Soviet Union. The Soviets mounted a major campaign to stop that.

Q: Well, if I recall, that the Soviets had put in the SS-20s mainly to tell Europe say look the United States might not support you if we just have these, and therefore you are under our gun. I mean ours was a response in a way wasn't it?

ZIMMERMANN: Ours was a response to the SS-20, there is no doubt about it. The SS-20 was certainly a weapon that intimidated and was meant to intimidate western Europe. So the issue boiled down to Germany and who would have the greater influence on the Germans. The Russians waged an all out no holds barred campaign of threat, intimidation, inducement, bribe, whatever to insure that the Bundestag did not vote to accept the weapons, and they lost. I think it was in the fall of 1983 that the Bundestag voted to accept the Pershing missiles. I happened to be in Berlin. I had gone from Moscow to a conference at the Aspen Institute in Berlin, and it was the day after the vote. One of the members of the German Bundestag who was at the conference from the social democratic party which was the party in power, Schmidt's party, said, "This is the blackest day for Germany since the war." I said, "Coming from Moscow, this is the blackest day for the Soviet Union since the Cuban missile crisis." Indeed the Russians had lost big, really big.

Q: Was that manifested from Moscow, I mean from your point of observation?

ZIMMERMANN: Oh sure, absolutely. This was their major foreign policy objective, and it failed.

Q: This is right from the institution of the SS-20. It was a whole follow through we will, this will help separate Europe from NATO in a way.

ZIMMERMANN: Yes. It was very definitely a political agenda as well as a military agenda there. The reaction to it, the fact that the Germans and the Italians accepted nuclear weapons on their soil brought them even closer to NATO, made them much more an integral part of NATO's overall defense, so it was a real defeat for the Russians.

Q: How was this played publicly in the Soviet Union?

ZIMMERMANN: I can't remember exactly, but of course in their press they never lose a battle. I think it was played as perfidious American forces working on German opinion, that the Germans took a decision which was against their basic interests under the influence of American pressure and American power and so forth.

Q: Was there any feeling, you know, during the Kissinger years at least in some of my interviews, I have had the feeling that Kissinger was basically pessimistic about the ability of the United States to stick to it, that the Soviet Union was here to stay, and that it was best to cut a deal earlier rather than later with the Soviets because in a way, time was on the Soviet's side. This may be unfair, but I had this feeling. I was wondering what the feeling was during this time. Was the feeling that time was on our side or on the Soviet side or what?

ZIMMERMANN: Well, my feeling and I suppose it was fairly typical in the embassy was that we were stronger than the Soviets in every countable way. We were stronger militarily. We were stronger politically. We were stronger in the allegiance of our people. We were stronger in our ability to win genuine support as opposed to coerced support from other countries. But I also believed as I think everybody in the embassy believed, that the Soviet Union was going to be around for a long time and was going to be our adversary for a long time. I cannot pretend that I sat at the U.S. embassy in 1983 and 1984 and predicted that in six years the Soviet Union would be gone. I didn't think that. I don't know anybody who thought it.

Q: If they did they certainly kept their thoughts hidden. What about the ethnic problems? Were we watching that? I am talking about the various ethnic, the Ukrainians the Kazakhs and all. Were we watching that?

ZIMMERMANN: Yes, we had people in the embassy who were assigned to different areas and who would travel as often as they could to those areas. I think there was no misunderstanding of the ethnic tensions that were a part of Soviet rule.

Q: But did we feel that they were pretty well sat upon and kept from...

ZIMMERMANN: Yes, I think everybody in the embassy exaggerated the ability of the repressive elements in the Soviet regime to keep things under their thumb. I can remember saying, and I wish I had followed this to its logical conclusion, I can remember saying, "The Soviet Union is a stable country, but it has the stability of a catamaran to use a sailing term, the multi hulled sailboat rather than a single hulled sailboat. A single hulled sailboat can keel way over but it will come back up. A multi hulled sailboat won't keel over, but if a big wind hits it, and it goes way over, it will go all the way over. And the only things that could drive the Soviet Union over, I thought to myself, were a combination of major economic crisis and ethnic unrest." That of course, is what happened, but I was assigning a very low probability to both of those contingencies, when in fact there was a high probability to both of them.

Q: Well, I think this is one of the things that really everyone missed, both in the Soviet Union and the west was how poorly the system, everybody knew the system was working poorly, but you know there was the feeling yes it is but it will always stay the way it is.

ZIMMERMANN: Well I think that is right. It had been around so long working poorly that I think most people assumed it would be around for a long time working poorly.

Q: Were you there when announced the Star Wars Initiative?

ZIMMERMANN: Yes.

Q: You might explain what that was and sort of the reaction both within the embassy and what you were getting from the Soviets.

ZIMMERMANN: Without any staffing out or briefing papers or consultation, at the end of his speech Reagan announced...

Q: I think it was a state of the union speech.

ZIMMERMANN: Maybe it was that, announced that he was prepared to build a space based defense, that is a defense that could strike and destroy incoming Soviet missiles in space. The Soviets didn't waste a nanosecond in deciding that this was a very dangerous idea. They worked very hard propagandistically to denounce it, to try to show that it would exacerbate tensions, that it could lead to world war III, that it would be too expensive, that they could match it, which of course they couldn't and didn't, and it would drive the arms race into unparalleled heights. They were genuinely scared of it, because they knew they couldn't duplicate it. They assumed funnily enough that we could build it. As it turned out, we faked our tests, and they believed it. I later negotiated on this. I didn't know we were faking tests, and the Soviets didn't know we were faking tests. They assumed because they had this rather pathetic admiration for American science, that we could do anything we wanted to do, and they couldn't. So they saw this as giving us what they called the first strike capability. If you want to get into the strategic aspects of it, I can do that, but essentially they saw it as unilaterally putting us way ahead and putting us in a position where we could destroy their country without them being able to destroy ours. This was another objection which was a genuine objection, they considered it violated the ABM Treaty which had been signed in 1972. Indeed most objective American observers agreed with them on that.

Q: What did this cause, did the embassy get involved in this or was this something that was worked out, I mean was there higher levels to deal with the Soviets?

ZIMMERMANN: Nobody talked to the Soviets before Reagan's speech, and I think very few people talked to the Soviets after it. I certainly don't recall that the embassy weighed in against the initiative. After all, it was announced by the President. It was American policy, so we thought that our job was to report what the Soviets were saying about it. It took a long time for it to have any concrete nature in American implementation. It was an idea that took a long time to be brought to any kind of production phase, even research and development phase.

Q: I recall President even said something about and we will share this with the Soviets or something like that.

ZIMMERMANN: Yes, he did say that. Of course they didn't believe him.

It is unbelievable to me that we would share with them technology which we had which was much better than their technology. Whether Reagan wanted to or not I just don't believe it. And the Soviets certainly didn't believe it.

Q: I think it was Ronald Reagan sitting practically alone in his room coming up with this and would pass it on to other sort of the American military and scientific establishment in a scramble to figure out what the hell this was and how to do it. in a way wasn't it.

ZIMMERMANN: Yes, everybody was caught by surprise except I guess, Dr. Teller, who apparently was the one who convinced the President to do it.

Q: That was Edward Teller.

ZIMMERMANN: He was the one I gather who faked the tests.

Q: Speaking of technology, did you see, you I am speaking about our collective Soviet experts, see the advent of the computer technology which was coming in? We are talking about personal computers and general communications and all of being something that the Soviets couldn't, I mean the system wouldn't allow it to get out in their own hands, that was a real threat.

ZIMMERMANN: Absolutely. I mean they were paranoid about Xerox machines or the Soviet equivalent of Xerox machines. If you were working in a Soviet institution, you had to go through the ordeals of Hercules in order to get to use a duplicating machine because they were so afraid of the power of the duplicating machine to disseminate information that they didn't want spread around. Samizdat got stuff typed on carbon, one carbon after another because these poor guys who were doing it couldn't get access to duplicating machines, but the cybernetics revolution was a major threat, was an enormous threat to the Soviet Union because the Soviet Union operated on total control of information. If they couldn't control information, then they couldn't proselytize and control their people the way they wanted to. So, there is no doubt at all that they saw it as a major threat.

Q: Well, but also at the same time, if you wanted to be a modern nation you had to have these things and throw them into the masses so they could all produce.

ZIMMERMANN: You had to have them, you particularly had to have them for your defense industry because it couldn't possibly compete with us if it didn't get into the computer age. So, they were faced with this problem, a delicious one from our point of view because it challenged the very essence of Soviet dictatorship.

Q: Were we kind of putting these things together at the time.

ZIMMERMANN: Yes, that was an obvious one because it was so clear to anybody who had anything to do with the Soviets that control of information was a paramount objective of theirs.

Q: Were there any efforts made on the part of Soviet scientific community to say come on fellows, let's swallow this pill if we want to be part of the modern world?

ZIMMERMANN: I think that the work remains to be written about the role of the Soviet scientific community in the modernization of Russia. We assumed that the Soviet scientists were among the leading liberals, the leading would-be reformers in the Soviet apparatus. Occasionally one or two of them would pop up to give evidence along those lines. Like Sakharov who was a significant nuclear physicist, and there must have been others like him who weren't quite as brave maybe who were trying behind the scenes to move things. Sagdayev who is now married to Susan Eisenhower and was the head of their defense program was a person like that, a man of extraordinary integrity. So we assumed the scientists were among the leading wedges of reform in the Soviet Union. That is exactly why the Soviet Academy of Sciences and its political apparatus made sure that the scientific community was totally under the thumb of the party. The way that the Academy of Sciences worked was that you had party people, reliable party people at the top who could not only prevent the outbreak of dissidence or quell it if it happened, but could also restrict the contacts that Soviet scientists had with scientists from other parts of the world. Of course, a soviet scientist would not get travel permission unless he was certified to be politically correct. The dissidents would rarely be able to travel. Sakharov for example, never got to the west as far as I know except maybe once for humanitarian reasons to see a family member.

Q: I mean this was just one more of those factors that was thrown in of how the Soviet system is crippling itself because for science you have got to have these contacts..

ZIMMERMANN: Of course you do. I remember talking to the scientists at Livermore and Los Alamos. I asked the heads of those labs about Soviet military science. They said, "Theoretically it is the best in the world, but they can't implement it." That was an interesting comment. They can't actually produce the stuff.

Q: Did you have a science attaché?

ZIMMERMANN: We did; we took that very seriously. He was in fact not a scientist, but he was somebody who had an enormously probing intellect and was very much involved in the importance of science in politics which was really what that job entailed.

Q: What was the role of Dobrynin who had been for so many years the Soviet ambassador in the United States? I mean in the old days he and Kissinger bypassed everybody it seemed. Was he a spent factor by this time?

ZIMMERMANN: No, I don't think he was a spent factor, but I think he was a very negative one. In the embassy we did not share the view that Dobrynin was the liberal or in the reforming wing of the Soviet communist party, that he was a reliable interlocutor. Our sense of Dobrynin was that he was an opportunist, he would tell his bosses what they wanted to hear. He would make things up occasionally to put himself in a better light. WE had one piece of actual evidence of this because Hartman had a meeting with Gromyko, and the meeting had to do with a subject, I don't remember what it was, on which there had been a meeting in Washington the day before between Gromyko and Secretary Shultz. Between Dobrynin and Secretary Shultz. We had our reporting cable, almost a verbatim cable from that meeting, and Gromyko had his. There was nothing in common with the cables. It was clear that Dobrynin who rarely took a note taker anyway into meetings just distorted what had gone on, where we had a pretty near verbatim account. I don't know whether Gromyko felt that this was helpful to him or not.

ZIMMERMANN: It's scary. There was one other example from Dobrynin which comes from 1985. This was a meeting which I did not attend but it was during the first Reagan-Gorbachev summit in Geneva. Hartman was there and told me the story that Gorbachev led off with a totally erroneous misperceived view of the United States, that it was run by the Jews and the industrial capitalists and so forth. He turned to Dobrynin and Dobrynin reinforced that view. Dobrynin had lived in the United States for nearly two decades, for over a decade, over two decades, and knew the United States very well. He knew that was wrong, but he was not prepared to move Gorbachev away from this very erroneous view, even gently. In fact, he reinforced it; he stoked it. Now I will say I have read Dobrynin's memoirs carefully. I use them in my teaching. I think it is a very important book. It rings true mostly in the various things he describes, so the reflective Dobrynin is maybe a bit better than the operational Dobrynin, but the operational Dobrynin had no fans in the American embassy. There is another thing I should say out of fairness. We resented the fact that Dobrynin had terrific access in Washington whereas our Ambassador had very little access in Moscow.

Q: But just emphasizing, could you point out why it could be considered just plain dangerous to have an ambassador who is not reporting accurately.

ZIMMERMANN: I am not sure it is always dangerous, but if he gives a distorted view of the position of an American administration, it makes it much harder for a Soviet government to formulate a policy that deals with those positions. When we set out a position whether publicly or in confidence to the Soviets, we want them to understand it. We don't want them to carry away a different view of what we are trying to say than what we are trying to give them. I think Dobrynin at least in some cases, did that.

Q: Were there the problems of the security of the embassy while you were there or not?

ZIMMERMANN: They happened shortly after. I am trying to think. I can say this. The problems happened after, the Lonetree and Bracy incidents happened after I left.

Q: Could you explain what they were.

ZIMMERMANN: Yes. Lonetree and Bracy were marine guards of the American embassy, and they were arrested by the U.S. government and accused of spying for the Soviets, of letting Soviet people into the embassy. The charge against Bracy was dropped. Lonetree was convicted and sentenced to 30 years. This came at a time when Hartman was ambassador, and Hartman was heavily criticized in the United States on television for being lax on security. That is an issue I would like to address because I can address that from my own experience in the embassy in Moscow. Hartman believed that if you can't communicate with the Soviets personally, there is still a way you can communicate with them. You can talk to the bugs. He would have, for example, visitors from the United States, Congressmen, businessmen, professors, policy people, etc. He would sit them down in his residence at Spaso House and speak totally frankly and openly about American policy toward the Soviet Union. He had in mind two audiences: his guests and the people on the other end of the listening devices because he wanted the message to get through. If he couldn't get to see people, then he would do it this way. He used to say quite openly, this is what I am doing. I believe in this. Now, some of the right wing conservatives in Washington began to spread it around that Hartman was lax on security because he was saying things to listening devices that were sensitive. Hartman knew exactly what he was doing. It was exactly the right thing, I believe.

Q: This is part of getting to the intelligence apparatus that was such a major factor, because these would be read at the very top level.

ZIMMERMANN: Yes, exactly. Andropov would have probably seen them or his successor. So, that was number one. Number two was that the security people in Washington decided that the new embassy which was going up already in Moscow could be made absolutely bug proof. They had never made a totally bug proof embassy anywhere in the world, so they were going to choose the toughest city in the world to do it in. They came up with a project which would have produced an embassy with no windows because windows are easier than stone walls to transmit radio signals. With no windows, and artificial light, therefore everywhere in the embassy, so the little amount of sun you get in Moscow with its long winters would be reduced to zero in the working environment. It was going to be highly complex because a lot of the intricate equipment was going to be ensconced in ceilings and behind walls and so forth where it would be very difficult to get at to service and to monitor and to check. Hartman felt it was a Rube Goldberg scheme, and he also felt it would diminish security because you would create such a morale problem which was bad enough in Moscow already for people working in this cave. They would seek relief by drinking, by having affairs, by all the kinds of human foibles that can happen to you when you are depressed. They would make themselves vulnerable to a KGB probe, and then you would have an American sitting in the embassy who would be passing out secrets, and your perfect security wouldn't work. So, Hartman strongly opposed this on security grounds. To my mind he was absolutely right, but he infuriated the security community in Washington by opposing their pet project. He said, I remember one of his grace notes was, "Look, if you are going to try to have a perfect security embassy, try it somewhere where our security is not so important. Don't try it in the most difficult country of all with the most sophisticated penetration devices. Try it somewhere else." So that was the second thing. The third thing was that we had Russian employees in the embassy. We assumed that every single one of them without exception reported to the KGB or was in fact a full time KGB officer. This was understood, and of course there were parts of the embassy they couldn't go into. There was a strong move in Congress to get rid of the Russian employees and have American employees come to Moscow and do all the menial stuff that the Russians did, the char force stuff and drivers and things like that. Hartman opposed this again on security grounds. He said, "Look, we know the Russian employees are KGB people. We don't let them into parts of the embassy which are sensitive. Our people are all trained not to spill sensitive information in front of them. What if you get Americans? They will come and do menial tasks; they will have a low level of education. They won't speak Russian. They won't be trained for service in a foreign hostile difficult country like the Soviet Union. They will be sitting ducks for the KGB."

Q: Oh absolutely.

ZIMMERMANN: Well, you know, they didn't like that. I should say one other thing to go back to the so called fully secure building. Hartman said, "Look, there is a simple way to provide security within the embassy building without getting rid of the windows. It has been existing for 30 years. It has only been penetrated once in Harry Barnes' shoe. It is the secure rooms." He said, "If you make absolutely sure when there are meetings going on in those rooms that you are monitoring them in real time, you can't miss," which is true. The problems of the bubbles historically as I understand it is they are not always being monitored when the meetings are taking place, so you can't be sure stuff is coming in or out. But if you monitor them as you could do in Moscow, you can be absolutely sure.

Q: We are talking about a plastic room inside a room and the monitoring being...

ZIMMERMANN: To see if any radio signals are going in or out, any emissions going in or out. It is a very easy thing to do, low technology.

Q: You mentioned Harry Barnes' shoe, could you explain what that was?

ZIMMERMANN: Harry Barnes is a now retired foreign service officer and was one of the great foreign service people, ambassador to many countries. When he was a junior officer in Moscow, I don't remember all the details, but there was some evidence that things were getting out of one of these bubbles, so they examined the clothing of everybody that had been in a bubble. Harry Barnes had sent his shoes to a Russian shoemaker. He had big feet, and they got into the heel of the shoe and implanted an emitting device. I can remember when I was taking the security course before going to Moscow the first time, they had Harry Barnes' shoe and they showed it all around to us, and they showed us the device in the shoe. It was a very graphic indication of what even back in those early days could be done.

Q: Was security, I mean as DCM this was sort of on your plate. Was this, did you find this much of a problem for you?

ZIMMERMANN: I supervised security. Actually it was not a huge problem. I will tell you why. Because there is very little, amazingly little that is a genuinely sensitive nature that even an embassy in Moscow does. One of the things that is sensitive of course, is protecting the names of your CIA people. Even more important than that is protecting the names of their Soviet agents. But they never told any of us including the ambassador the names of their Soviet agents, so we never knew them to tell anybody. But there were very few things, and the reason I know this is because the Soviets managed to bug my secretary's typewriter for a year, so we had to assume that every cable that was typed on that typewriter was in the hands of the Soviets. When this was discovered, I was called back from vacation in Vermont to Washington to go over every cable or memo that had been typed on that typewriter for the course of a year to assess the damage to U.S. security interests. I discovered that there was nothing. There was no damage because the cables we wrote, these were cables that I wrote or the ambassador wrote. They were analytical cables which had been overtaken by events. They were a policy recommendations which would have been of interest to the Soviets but probably of no surprise to them. They were records of meetings with Gromyko which he already knew about because he had been in the meeting, although our comments on the meetings following at the end of the cable might have been of interest to him. There were complaints to the State Department because we weren't getting this or that. These things would have been interesting for the Russians, but there was nothing that I could find that damaged in any serious way or in any way at all U.S. national security. Now that doesn't mean you don't need to have rigorous security rules, and you have to indoctrinate your people into knowing what the score is and what the enemy is doing out there. I would say with my experience of a total of five years in Moscow, that people who had Russian training before they went, people who had been prepared at least for a couple of months for this assignment, were very good at knowing when you could speak freely and when you couldn't.

Q: What was our reading on Gromyko at this time? I mean he was probably the world's most experienced diplomat. He had been going since WWII as actually ambassador to the United States, I think, during the early '40s, wasn't he?

ZIMMERMANN: Yes he was.

Q: So here we are we are talking about 40 years later. What was our reading about him and what sort of an influence he had on Soviet affairs and American relations?

ZIMMERMANN: I don't have anything that would contradict the basic view that Gromyko was a quintessential cold warrior, that he saw us as the chief adversary. What we learned in Moscow about Gromyko was a couple of things, one, he was almost entirely focused on the United States. I mean we Americans were his major and almost sole foreign policy interest. Secondly, he was an incredible workaholic. The stolid kind of exterior reflected a man who just worked all the time. Third, he probably didn't count very much in Soviet decision making. Perhaps he did at the very end when he became a member of the politburo. I think he was seen as an implementer of policy not as a creator of policy. Fourth, he actually had a very nice sense of humor which I had not been prepared for, and a kind of a sensitivity. Hartman was very tall; he is about 6'5", and Gromyko used to kid him. He would say Hartman, you have grown taller today. Next time he would see him, you have grown shorter. I remember once I was chargé. Hartman was away, and I had to take Gromyko a demarche. It was to tell him we were mining the ports, the harbors of Nicaragua which was an issue that was later taken, as I remember, to the International Court and we lost.

Q: It did. We lost.

ZIMMERMANN: We lost. But I was supposed to tell him we were doing it and why we were doing it and it had to do with Soviet meddling in Nicaragua. It was a very difficult demarche for me as my first demarche to Gromyko, to this storied Soviet foreign minister. I knew I was going to get a blast, and of course he knew what I was coming in on so he was ready. So I gave it to him in English. He read English perfectly well. He looked at it and he read a response which was a nasty response, but he read it in a kind of a monotone to try to take as much of the edge off it as possible. I knew as I was listening to it this was exactly what was going to come out in the Soviet press word for word as it did. He then said, "Is there anything else you would like to discuss?" I said, "No, Mr. Minister." Then he, I can't remember what it was, but he made a kind of a pleasantry. It was a sort of a how are you getting along or how are you finding things. He understood I was nervous about this demarche, and he wanted to put me at ease. This was not the stereotype of Gromyko that I had been led to believe.

Q: What was your reading on how well the politburo whatever the decision making body was, I guess it was the politburo, read the United States?

ZIMMERMANN: My sense of it is, this is a bunch of 70 and 80 year olds, some of whom had never been out of the Soviet Union, others of whom even if they had, had been only to the communist bloc, very few of whom had been to the west. Of those who had, very few had took in what they should have taken in. I think their view of the United States was entirely stereotyped based on what they read in their horrible magazines and newspapers, based on what their Marxism-Leninism told them we were. My guess is that we would all be appalled if we were able, if we had been able to examine these people in any depth about their views or knowledge of the United States. I think we would be appalled at the shallowness, the failure to understand the simplest issues about America. I say this in the knowledge that even a very sophisticated Soviet can make mistakes about the United States that no American would make. For example Arbatov, the chief Americanist in the Soviet Union in the mid-1970s did not understand that Richard Nixon because of Watergate was in real danger. He didn't understand something that every American knew. I am not making the criticism because of that. I am saying these members of the politburo have only the most rudimentary knowledge and understanding of the United States. Probably worse than any leadership in any other communist country in Eastern Europe with the possible exception of Albania.

Q: Was there the equivalent of American studies that or was getting to the second layer down of the Soviet apparatus particularly communist apparatus or was this a lack?

ZIMMERMANN: Well, they could do things like studying the labor movement in the United States, and if it had a kind of Marxist zing to it, they could study it. Of course they had to study it in very stereotyped formalistic fashion without access to the kinds of documentary information that would make them objective. It was possible to study American literature, and that was done. I don't know how widespread it was but it was certainly done. I can say for one that people who in American literature who depicted decaying cultures were extremely popular in Russia, primarily Faulkner and Tennessee Williams. One day when we were in Moscow during the 1980s there were seven Tennessee Williams plays playing in Moscow. Seven different Tennessee Williams plays playing simultaneously in Moscow while we were there.

Q: I would be hard put to remember, to think of seven different...

ZIMMERMANN: I know, but they loved that, because it was a free and legal way to make the connection with their own society and its decadent nature.

Q: What about turning again to foreign relations, China. We had a I mean an ongoing relationship with China. How did that fit?

ZIMMERMANN: Well, they didn't like it. The Russians certainly didn't like it. They never wanted to talk about China with us in the Soviet foreign ministry. I don't believe we ever got to see the Chinese desk in the Soviet foreign ministry. We could see the institute people. Some of them were very good on China, but it was considered highly sensitive, high security, and we weren't privileged to have a dialog with the Soviets in Moscow on China. The Chinese embassy, which is huge in Moscow, would cultivate us, but they would never have anything to say about their relations with the Soviets. They would talk a lot about what is going on in the Soviet Union, usually missing it completely. They were not good analysts to my mind.

Q: Well, I was thinking that really they a huge Chinese embassy with probably less connections than we had.

ZIMMERMANN: I would say less connections than we had. I think that's right.

Q: And also they were inhibited by the fact that they had their own ideology to filter things through which would make it even more difficult.

ZIMMERMANN: Yes. I don't think there was much going on. If the Soviets talked to the Chinese, I don't think they did it in Moscow.

Q: You mentioned the middle east before and the Soviet's interest. The one big thing that happened in the middle east was the Israeli invasion of Lebanon. Did that raise any tension or interest?

ZIMMERMANN: Well, the Soviets, I think, saw the middle east as a chess game, as a way to diminish American power. They didn't see it as an area that affected their own security very much the way Europe did and the way China did. So, they were constantly looking for advantages over us in the middle east. Any mis-steps we might have made, they were quick to pounce on. And of course, their assets in the middle east were not too great. They had a close relationship with Syria. They had a pretty close relationship with Iraq, with Saddam Hussein. Pretty close with the Palestinians although I am not sure really in the end how close that was. We were much better placed of course, because of our relationships with Israel and Egypt.

Q: What about, you mentioned how things changed dramatically. It had been pretty bad, but after the shooting of the KAL plane over the Kamchaka Peninsula, Sakhalins.

ZIMMERMANN: It was horrendous. First of all the Soviets lied about it. Then they had a cover story which implied that the plane had been challenged and had flown away. Then there was a silence for a couple of days. I was chargé again at the time. We were beating up on the foreign ministry for information about...

Q: You might explain what this was.

ZIMMERMANN: This was a Korean airliner that took off from Alaska bound for Seoul, and probably because they fed the wrong numbers into the computer, it flew over Sakhalin island which is territorial Soviet Union, and militarily very sensitive, and was shot down by Soviet fighter planes. Apparently without any warning, although that is disputed. There was one American Congressman on board. You know it was a horrendous thing to do to shoot down a civilian airliner over your airspace. It is illegal. You are not supposed to do that. The most you can do is force it to land. It happened, as I said, right at the time we thought our relationship was improving a little bit. First they shot it down. Then they pretended it hadn't been shot down. Then after a couple of days of trying to figure out what to say, they argued that it was an American spy plane, that somehow we would use a Korean airliner to spy on what they had, what their military dispositions were over Sakahlin Island. It was just absurd. Unfortunately the administration didn't make it better by arguing they shot it down, they had orders to shoot it down from the top more or less which was never quite cleared up, and that they knew what it was. They claimed they didn't know it was civilian airliner although that didn't quite jibe with their story that it was a spy plane. In any case, it was a stupid act of brutality by a dictatorship showing in spades its paranoia. The way they tried to justify it was even stupider. That just set back the relationship for a long time.

Q: What about during this '81-'84 period, Soviet support of terrorism? What was our reading on that?

ZIMMERMANN: We didn't know much in Moscow as I recall. We assumed that they were supporting these primarily middle east organizations, but we didn't have much information on it, and it was the sort of thing you couldn't see and you couldn't get anybody to talk about.

Q: So you couldn't raise the subject particularly.

ZIMMERMANN: I am sure we raised it, but we would not get any, obviously no confirmation.

Q: Were there any lines that despite the bad relations and all sometimes there are things that are going on that are really going quite well between two countries. Were there any of those? Weather research, Antarctica?

ZIMMERMANN: Oh, things like that, yes. Those were the kinds of little things I was talking about during the run up to the shooting down of the Korean plane. We were doing some things like that. I don't remember all of them, but they were small signs that on both sides the go had been given to an improved relationship.

Q: What about student exchanges? Were these still going on or was that pretty well dead for most of this period?

ZIMMERMANN: We did have some students, so it wasn't entirely stopped. There were students. I don't remember now what the programs were, but there were some, not a lot. Not as many as in the '70s when I had been there. On the line of cooperative events going on in 1983, I was actually the head of an American delegation which negotiated an upgrade of the hot line with the Russians during that period.

Q: Could you explain what the hot line was.

ZIMMERMANN: The hot line is a communications link between the politburo or the Kremlin and the White House, so in the event of a crisis, high level communication can be made. In fact, I always thought the hot line was a telephone. It is now, I am sure. But in those days in '83 it was a teletype, very slow actually. It wasn't in the White House; it was in the Pentagon in our case. It was not necessarily a personal communication between. It could have been between anybody the president designated, and it would have been too slow to prevent a real crisis. But what we were doing in our upgrade was to speed it up so that it would have more of a crisis possibility. Not now, I have lost touch, but I am sure it is very fast and undoubtedly direct.

Q: Well, what about communications? Were they a problem for the embassy? I mean we have good communications.

ZIMMERMANN: With Washington? We had a secure line to the desk. We could talk to anybody in the State Department or the Pentagon or the White House by secure line, so that wasn't a problem. Of course, cables were very quick.

Q: Well, I am just thinking were there any other things that we haven't covered?

ZIMMERMANN: About those Moscow times? Let's see. Nothing much comes to mind. Well, there is one other thing which was an interesting sidelight on religious fanaticism on the Soviet system. When I arrived in the Embassy the new embassy hadn't been built yet. The old embassy was in a very cramped courtyard in which there were also Oh I don't know, 60 apartments. My wife and I lived in one. We were hosting seven religious fanatics, Pentecostal believers who had rushed into the embassy several years before past the guards who were all KGB, and in the mistaken hope that if they had got on to American territory and we could get them out of the Soviet Union which they dearly wanted to leave because they were being oppressed. The decision was originally taken by Ambassador Toon who was the ambassador when they rushed in to the embassy in the late '70s to take them for awhile but to make their living conditions so difficult that they would leave of their own accord. When Hartman got there, this is another example of Hartman, he looked at their living conditions. They were living in one room, seven of them, or maybe it was two rooms. He said, "We have to do better for these people. As long as they are here, we have to make life as comfortable as we can." So we increased the space they had to live in. He encouraged people in the embassy to find ways to employ them. One of them did crocheting. They were very simple people, very poorly educated. So some of them worked and did gardening in the tiny courtyard and actually made some friends. Meanwhile we were trying to get them out, to get the Soviets to agree to give them exit permission if they would leave. Reagan got into this. This is an example of Reagan and his strong view of human beings. He heard about it and he said to Dobrynin, "Let's get these people out, I mean come on." It was actually being very bad publicity for the Soviets. It was a good idea to get them out from their point of view. But they had this neuralgia about letting anybody leave the country who wants to.

So, finally one of the Pentecostals went on a hunger strike. We took the decision in the embassy that we would have the embassy doctor monitor her health, and if it got to a certain stage where it became life threatening, we would commit her forcibly if need be, to a Soviet hospital. We didn't know how long this would take. Finally after about three months, she got to that point. We had told her all this. She knew. We got to that point. Hartman was away just briefly, but I was there. I sent a cable to Washington, It was Friday, saying tomorrow is Saturday. We are going to have an embassy van take her to a Soviet hospital as agreed. Washington had approved all of this. Well, alarm bells all over Washington began to ring. I got a call from Walter Stoessel, undersecretary for political affairs, saying you have got to hold up. Judge Clark, the National Security Advisor thinks this would be terrible to send this woman out of the embassy. I said, "The choice is having her die." I said, "Look, I am sorry. I don't care what you instruct me, but she is going to a Soviet hospital tomorrow. If I am against instructions, if I have to resign, I will do it. I am not going to be responsible for the death of this woman." Walter Stoessel is a very nice man. He said, "Thanks a lot for your views." I didn't hear another word about it. It is a wonderful story. Then next morning at ten o'clock, the van came into the courtyard. She was a very feisty woman. She had many temper tantrums during the course of this hunger strike. Aged about 30. She put on her good dress; she had come downstairs, and she was saying good-bye in the courtyard to all of her friends. There were about 50 or 60 people lined up to shake her hand, kiss her and so forth. She got in the van with a lot of dignity, with an embassy officer. Driven to a Soviet hospital. An hour and a half later I get a phone call from the embassy officer. He said, "She's eating, voluntarily eating." Two hours later I get a phone call from her saying, "Thank you for doing this to me." She needed it to be done against her will. She had decided it was the right thing. The story has a very happy ending. Because of Reagan's intervention with Dobrynin, the Soviets gave her an exit visa. She had to go back to her hometown in Siberia, apply through channels and - whammo - she got it and left the country and went to Israel. Then we had the job of persuading the other six to leave the embassy. They didn't trust anybody; they didn't trust us. As Tom Simons' suggestion, he was the head of the Soviet desk, we brought in Olin Robison, who at that point was head of Middlebury College and a Baptist minister with long experience in Russia, to come and talk to the six and try to persuade them that they should leave, that what happened to the first one, would happen to them all. Of course, the Soviets would give us no assurances. That again had to do with their pride. Olin spent three days praying and arguing with them and finally they agreed to go. But they set a condition that every member of their nuclear family would go too. So from seven it became about 35. All this was being done in Washington with Dobrynin. Dobrynin was given a list of about 35 family members. He said, "I'll do what I can." They left the embassy and went to Siberia, and they all got out. So it was a happy ending. They all were able to get out with their families. But it was interesting, their psychology was interesting, their enormous distrust of the Soviet authorities and of us. And the Soviet psychology was interesting. They wouldn't do anything that looked like weakness. They would not make a guarantee. They insisted that the dissidents go back to their home town and apply through channels, but they gave in. They gave in on something they had been very reluctant to ever concede before.

ARTHUR A. HARTMAN

USSR (1981-1984)

Ambassador Arthur Hartman was born in New York, New York in 1926. He received a bachelor's degree from Harvard University. His career in the Foreign Service included positions in France, Vietnam, and the United Kingdom (England), and an ambassadorship to the Soviet Union. This interview was conducted by Bill Miller on May 31, 1989.

Q: How did the appointment to Moscow take place? What were the circumstances of that?

HARTMAN: Well again, it was I was just there for the Carter administration really in Paris and the Reagan administration came in and I of course knew Al Haig very well and he said, "I think you better stay on in France. We've got a transition period now with Mitterrand coming in, but eventually we'll have to think about a successor." I don't know what all the considerations were but I'm sure there were many. The President had a lot of friends I think that he was thinking of sending to Paris and Al finally called me back and said, "How would you like to go to Moscow?" I was torn because I was not a Soviet specialist, I did not have the language, but I was very much given to understand that if it didn't go to me, it would probably go to a non-professional. I felt at least I had a lot of experience dealing with the Soviets even though I didn't have the language. I felt very strongly about not having a language and I went to some of my old friends, I went to George Kennan, I can remember talking to Foy Kohler, Marty Hillenbrand; a number of the Soviet specialists. I remember asking them, "should I take this, or is this going to hurt the cause of professionalism?" They all encouraged me to take it and I'm glad I did. I picked up some of the language for social use and obviously for professional use, and we stayed five years; to be sure through three slow deaths of leaders before we got to the interesting period of a new generation coming into power. Intellectually I think I found the experience of being Ambassador to the Soviet Union the most challenging thing I've ever done and the most rewarding.

Q: Let me take you through that if I might. You're appointed Ambassador and you have all of these questions if it's the right thing to do, whether you're the right person. You come to the conclusion that you are the best person given the circumstances and you've had a lot of experience on the vital issues of arms control, you know who the players are, you're very familiar with the literature, all the briefings and the various attitudes of our country in the past and so on? You go to Moscow.

HARTMAN: There's a step before I go to Moscow. I talked with Al Haig and with the President to find out what they're after because that to me was important. I mean I've had a lot of feelings that ordinary citizens had of the President and what his views were, and of Al Haig and what his views were.

I knew those perhaps better than I did the President's, but I sort of had doubts as to whether or not given what I had heard, if I could seriously carry forward in what the President wanted. I must say those discussions relieved me. Obviously the President was more ideologically, had a more ideological bent. What I was assured of in that period was that after an initial period of wanting to get the defenses in a better shape. I agreed with that analysis, I think we had delayed many of the decisions in the seventies which we should not have in terms of modernizing our forces and not being able to choose. There was no consensus between Congress and the administration as to what particular things should be done, there was no defense policy that was accepted. I felt that that was a necessary basis with which to be dealing with the Soviet Union. Once I was convinced that this was not totally ideologically bent, and you know the “Evil Empire” thing is often pointed to a low point-high point of the exchange. As a basic principle it is an evil empire, it does evil things to its own people. I could accept that, what I could not accept was that this would be the sort of language of our discourse with the Soviet Union, I just didn’t think as a practical matter that it was going to get us anywhere. Indeed the President doesn’t think so either and has moderated his sort of public usages, although there are a lot of people around him who would like him to continue batting away. Since I didn’t have the feeling from him that he felt that things could only be done in one way, I thought that this was something I could do with full feeling that I would be heard and that I would have an influence. Al Haig certainly led me to believe that and indeed during the time that he was there, and later with George Shultz that I would be an important part of the process. This is again, it’s unusual for Ambassadors, but we had developed a means of communication that made that the case.

Q: To that you had direct contact with the Secretary of State and with the President?

HARTMAN: Yes, less with the President. This is not his style of leadership, he doesn’t deal on a daily basis with other people and the ones that have immediate responsibility.

Q: So that aspect of contact and the ability to discuss fully and frequently with the Secretary was very appealing to you.

HARTMAN: No only the Secretary of State, but with the Secretary of Defense, the arms control people, I kept my contacts with all of them.

Q: You were involved in the preparations for START and the other arms control negotiations?

HARTMAN: Yes, and Yes, less so in the detailed things rather than the sort of general objective. On detailed negotiating, I think I had an influence on those as well.

Q: What was the date that you arrived in Moscow as Ambassador?

HARTMAN: October of 1981 and its less than a year after the Reagan administration took office.

Q: And one leader is dying?

HARTMAN: One leader is on his way out although I met him several times and he wasn’t totally gaga but I remember on one occasion, a November seventh, I can’t remember whether it was the first November seventh or whether he was still alive at the second one. Going through the line I said something to him, I guess it was the first one, the last time I had seen him was in Vladivostok I think. I said that he had very nicely taken us to Vladivostok because the meeting actually took place outside the city limits on the outskirts as it was a closed city. He kept promising us a trip through Vladivostok if we were good and if we reached good agreements. There was a lot of joking back and forth, in any case he had to kind of be nudged by Gromyko to recall this because he really was just about to turn ga-ga at that point and a kind of sad figure.

Q: When you go to Spaso House at that time what size embassy do you have?

HARTMAN: Well there were you know sixty odd professional officers, another forty or fifty staff, plus the large Soviet staff about which we are hearing so much these days. The basic job in the Soviet Union is to penetrate a closed society and I used a lot of the experience that I had in France, which in another sense is a closed society, it's closed intellectually sometimes. You have to invent techniques to sort of get at people, they don't want to talk to Foreign Ambassadors, they have a funnel through which they like to pass all Americans called the U.S.A.-Canada institute headed by Doctor Arbotoff. This is a tradition that comes at them from Russian days. Before I went to Moscow, George Kennan said "Look you've got a good month off in Maine, get yourself some good nineteenth century memoirs and read those, you'll learn more about Soviet society." He was right!

Q: Were these the memoirs that he had edited?

HARTMAN: No, not the ones that he edited. I got earlier ones, you know people like Coustine, and one remarkable one that he put me on to called "The Memoirs of Lady Londonderry" and it was a description of a trip that she took with her husband who was a General in the Napoleonic Wars and had gone back to visit some of their own friends in Russia and how they were shunned, and how people were suspicious of them. They were handed onto people that the Czar had designated to talk to them and they were not allowed to see some of their old friends. Well this is very much the Soviet Union today. They fear foreigners, they fear foreign contact and even with all the Glasnost that Gorbachev talks about, he's basically dealing with four-hundred years of a closed society, of a feeling that they are at the mercy of foreigners, that they are weaker than foreigners, that they are inferior to foreigners in many ways; and yet they have a great patriotism and a great closeness to their soil that gives them the backbone to resist all of this.

Q: You used the word penetrate as though it were a military operation?

HARTMAN: Well it is in a sense, I mean what I did was try to bring people to Spaso House who would be live bait for some of the intellectuals and even some of the party people because they wanted to see them. So I brought over for example, Murray Feshbock who knew more about their demography than they were willing to admit, and indeed if they had let Murray in there and talked to him very freely in that period and later they might not have had to rediscover the wheel under Gorbachev because he was already saying that alcohol was their major problem. He was already saying that they were losing young men to this, that many of the problems that they saw in trying to get their economic growth started again were do to basic undiscipline and alcoholism. Well we used people like that to sort of get a discussion going with certain elements of the Soviet bureaucracy and society as a way for us to learn more about what they were thinking.

Q: You had sixty people officers, you had resources in Washington, and you were familiar with a lot of the writings and scholars, you had consulted and did a lot of reading. How did you ask your embassy to assess the situation for you? You arrive and you are a new boy on the beat and what was it that you asked your embassy to do first?

HARTMAN: We looked at personnel first. I brought in my own Deputy which Ambassadors normally do, an excellent man who had been in the Soviet Union before, Warren Zimmermann. We had a good staff, at the lower levels excellent people.

Q: Mr. Ambassador, you've just arrived in Moscow and you've had this careful preparation in Washington briefings, you've consulted with former Ambassadors, you've read memoirs, you've gone through intelligence material and the best insights that you can find in the Department, but it's a new place. You have this staff of sixty people and one of the questions I'm sure in your mind is "Tell me what I need to know. How should I go about learning about this place?" How did you do that?

HARTMAN: I had one other thing, I participated in my first meeting with Gromyko at the UN in New York.

Q: Was this before going out to Moscow?

HARTMAN: Yes, before going out to Moscow at the usual UN meetings in September. We had I think tried to build a staff there that had really good qualities. There is a tremendous depth of talent I think in the people who had gone into Soviet affairs as a specialty. So we had people who were experts in the internal situation and analysis of the economics and politics of the Soviet Union party organization, and people who were experts on the external aspects of Soviet policy either in arms control or in regional policies. So a lot of the early days I think were spent talking to them and beginning to make initial calls. The Soviets don't allow you to make that many initial calls. You are allowed to deal with the Foreign Ministry that's fair game, you're allowed to deal with the Cultural Ministry that's fair game, the Ministry of Foreign Trade. I can see my old friend who is Head of the Central Bank Alkimoff. After that I never got to see in all the time I was there the Head of the Plan. I mean I complained to Gromyko about it once and said, "You know this is crazy an Ambassador can't see the Head of the Plan, what's the matter here?" He said, "Oh I can't believe that's true." And sure enough he apparently leaned on this fellow and I got a call saying that at four o'clock on a Saturday afternoon I could come around and see him. Well I happened to have something else to do at that time and I never got another offer, so it was clearly reluctant on his part. Meanwhile of course he saw all the manner of Americans as they had come through or other Ambassadors from other countries.

Q: What was the, what were they trying to say to you or was this simply the bureaucracy?

HARTMAN: I think this is traditional and it applies to most Ambassadors except those that they are cultivating, because they come from a country like India for example. The Indian Ambassador gets pretty well received. I've since learned in the last year or so that even the East European Ambassadors have troubles.

The Soviets like to deal with those governments through the party apparatus and sometimes Ambassadors are cut out of that. So it's a common problem and the way we tried to get around it was by bringing delegations in so that we could go in with the delegations that they wanted to see; either of private Americans or public officials to discuss official exchanges or particular negotiations.

Q: This is where two-tracked diplomacy works together?

HARTMAN: Absolutely, it's the only way to work there and through oddities. For example, an old friend of mine that I had met because of my interest in architecture in Paris is Kevin Roach. We invited Kevin in and suddenly found ourselves open to the architectural community. We found some rather remarkable things in the Soviet Union and we'd bring musicians in and similarly we would get to meet the musicians and artists and we would get to meet the artists. We would use Congressmen when they would come, and so otherwise you tend to be thrown onto the Refusenik community, and the semi-dissident groups. There weren't that many dissidents by the time I got to Moscow. They were either all in the Clink or out of the country. Sakharov was already in Gorki although Mrs. Bonner was still in Moscow and we would see her. So we did this, applying all these techniques in addition to the rather regular contact that we would have with the Foreign Ministry on particular negotiations on particular problems. I would regularly see the Foreign Minister, it was Gromyko at that time and later Shevardnadze to have general discussions with them and I talked with their Deputies from time to time and have general discussions, or particular things that I may have been instructed to do. Washington is very bad about getting instructions out and in the end I usually prefer not to have an instruction. The reason that instructions are hard to get out is they have to be cleared. Once you start the clearance process you get the lowest common denominator and it's really bad, so I would rather not even start that. By going back to Washington often enough, I know what's on the Secretary's mind, I know what's on the President's mind, I'd get around to other senior people in Washington. Let me alone, let me go in and do my own discussing, unless there is a particular point that they want emphasized in a particular negotiation, or a particular regional area. I remember Al sending me back and saying, "I want you in another month or so to go into the Foreign Minister and you emphasize the dangers if they start shipping certain kinds of equipment into Nicaragua." We really hit that very hard. Unfortunately we didn't make the definition quite broad enough to include helicopters, but high-performance aircraft they have stayed away from. So that kind of thing, and then having senior people from Washington come to discuss regional matters, or arms control matters, or whatever gave us the opportunity as an Embassy of getting at more people. The only point of having an Embassy in Moscow is to get at Soviets and this is something that is very hard to explain here. It's particularly hard to explain here in the kind of paranoid atmosphere of concern about security. This is a closed society, the point of being in Moscow is to do things that you cannot do in Washington.

You can read Izvestia and Pravda in Washington and do all the analysis you want. The reason for being in Moscow is to get the reactions of Soviets, real live Soviets to those articles to see whether there is anything more we can pickup that will give us an indication of what the real trends are, not just what they are saying, but what they believe. It is very difficult to do and you have to find all kinds of strange ways of doing it. In this period when we tend to be concerned about security and about what might happen. Indeed things have happened in terms of the spying back and forth. We tend to forget that there is a purpose of being in Moscow and that is to have contact and not to cut ourselves off from contact. We always have to weigh that and the security risks with allowing people to have contact. We don't obviously want non-professionals to have this contact, that's the thing we try to prevent.

Q: On the official list of contacts that you were permitted to have or you were able to have, were there any that you were able to develop a close enough personal relationship where you would go to their houses for dinner?

HARTMAN: No, Ambassadors by and large don't get invited officially to anybody's house of an official nature. The houses that we got to are the intellectuals, the artists, the musicians, the refuseniks; the people who are kind of out of phase with the official society. I have never been invited to an apartment of an official. Now some of my officers have occasionally, but very rarely. When the officials want to entertain you, they do it in an official entertainment place, or at a restaurant. I suspect that there isn't that much official visiting back and forth among officials, they don't want each other to know the extent of their benefit of the nomenclature system; the access to better goods, or imported goods, they really want to keep that in the family.

Q: What about travel within the Soviet Union?

HARTMAN: Travel I could do as much as I could, I probably should have done more. I got out to the Far East, I got out to Siberia, I got out to Central Asia. My wife actually did more traveling than I did, she went out with Diplomatic groups. I always seemed to have somebody in town and I couldn't go on those trips. I went to Tabriz and Armenia and Leningrad of course, and Murmansk. I got around but I really would have liked to have got around much more.

Q: If some of these un-official visitors, some of the scientists or say groups like ours had gone a Department as sometimes happens, and they had said "Why don't you come along?" Would that have been possible?

HARTMAN: It could have been, but it would have been a big policy issue for them. Normally they just don't want it.

Insofar as they are taking any risk at all, and normally most people get permission to invite not only officials but also unofficials to their apartment and those that are given permission are trusted and they think there is some good that is going to come out of it. They would not want to get involved with the Ambassador because that raises an added dimension that they probably wouldn't want to get into, and I wouldn't want to subject them to.

Q: So it's a very circumscribed and almost an art form in Ambassadorial roles?

HARTMAN: Yes, but you meet a lot of people, I mean a lot of people came to my house through all of these non-official and official visitors we would have receptions for them, they would come, we would be able to talk to them. I would visit when visitors came through.

Q: So this is the lifeblood?

HARTMAN: Yes, and again the French experience helped. If I hadn't have had that experience I think I would have been more at a loss in Moscow as to what to do and how to get engaged enough so that you can have some discussions with Soviets and really get to know better what makes them tick.

Q: How would you assess the various, let me describe them this way; accessible institutions within the Soviet Union. For example, the nexus that seems to provide a lot of opportunity for going to the Soviet Union and conferences and what have you is The Academy of Sciences, generally. Within that there is U.S.A. institute and then for the scientists there are many numbers of groups, and for the lawyers there is?

HARTMAN: The Soviets use all of these groups to get at private citizens in other countries mainly for influence, that's what they want to do. The individuals involved in the exchanges are interested in other things, in their professional development. In other words, there is a use of the system by individuals in the system in the Soviet Union for their own purposes. So a man like Velukoff for example who is one of the leaders of the Academy, he's a physicist and he likes to keep in touch with other physicists so he does his business and he does it very well, but he also wants to keep up his professional interests. The same is true of a number of other scientists. The one area where I, the man I have the least respect for is Zarbotov who seems to me is a maneuverer of the first order who has never done any real independent work himself, and who is a manipulative individual who is the natural enemy of the Ambassador. His job is to keep as much control and contact with Americans in the private exchanges, and even officials. He is the clearinghouse, he is the guy who wants to form their opinion on any particular issue.

My job is to break that hold and so I'm naturally going to be against him and everything that he is doing, and aside from his character, which I can't stand I spent a lot of time doing that and getting around him, and getting to know his colleagues in the Central Committee, and even getting to know members of his staff better.

Q: Who did you find the most interesting?

HARTMAN: I don't really want to get into that (for security reasons), but there were people that I found genuinely good on their subject and very interesting to talk to. Other institutes like the MMO, which is the World Economy Institute headed now by Primakov, very good, solid intellect, a man who you can deal with on a variety of regional issues as well as economic issues. Other people in the scientific community for a variety of subjects that we have dealt with; people on Atomic Energy, people on environmental problems. All the things that we've had exchanges with the Soviet Union about are there to be developed and bring people over to talk to them. This administration starting out with sort of a prejudice, well picking up from a Carter policy. I mean Carter I think made a great mistake. As a sanction for Afghanistan, he shot us in the foot by cutting off cultural exchanges, that is the only reason for having a mission in Moscow is to make contact and to try and open up that closed society, and it's no sanction to the Soviets to participate in their cutting themselves off. It's a sanction against us, and it was wrong. I kind of sympathize with political leaders in this country because the major reaction whenever something happens in the world is "What are you doing?" Even if it's something totally out of control of the American President, the speeches on the Hill are all going to be "What have you done? You just stood there and let this happen!” With the invasion of Afghanistan, well what the hell possible thing could the United States have done to stop that? This was a stupidity on the part of Soviet leadership which they now admit five years later and our policy has been to make that as difficult for them as possible there, and to talk to them about getting out. That was a good policy, but cutting off all of these exchanges was not a good policy, it was done primarily for the American market, not for what it did to the Soviet Union.

Q: So a very helpful adjunct to what an Ambassador has to do is to have vigorous exchange programs and lots of visitors to attract diplomacy?

HARTMAN: Absolutely, absolutely. Also that with those visitors you should do as much as you can to influence them to have a healthy exchange, that is one that is not controlled by the Soviet Union in which they treat people as though they are objects to send back with their policies. I think that the main thing there is to encourage people to go in for much better preparation before they come, with much more experience and substance and be prepared to discuss real topics. I think one of the most interesting things we could do as a people is to get exchanges going of a non-political nature, that is dealing with topics totally foreign to politics.

We could get dentists together with dentists, and I shouldn't say doctors with doctors because you might end up with this doctors coalition which I think is kind of, really does not accomplish a purpose. I would much rather have doctors talking to doctors about their professional lives, cardiology rather than ideology, that that would open up a part of Soviet society and have an exchange that in the end would be beneficial. What it would do is introduce new horizons for these very confident scientists and professional people and be very subversive of the Soviet system.

Q: Well what about at the political level, the visits of Congressmen, Senators and staff?

HARTMAN: I think there are good to, but there again with careful preparation. I've just been up on the Hill talking to the Speaker about his trip. They've got to get individual Congressmen up on the issues as much as the Soviets they are going to meet. The members of the Supreme Soviet are often the negotiators for the Soviets, so they know the issues. Our Congressmen don't have that kind of benefit of experience, so they have got to really study and be up on the issues and Tom Foley led a group over there several years ago in which he did that. Members of the group were organized to talk about human rights, to talk about arms control, to talk about regional problems broken down, and some bilateral issues. So when the Soviets raised these issues they found on the other side of the table a man who had done his homework and it was good. I think that's now that way that the Speaker is now going to organize this trip.

Q: In tracking the intellectual movement, you've got under Gorbachev what appears to be a significant, even revolutionary departure from the previous groups. You witnessed that and have seen some of the effects. How did you intellectually become aware of that? Did your embassy rediscover it in the journals? Was it a matter of conversations with their contacts? What was the way, how did you see something new?

HARTMAN: Before Gorbachev came to power, we had had through these visitors contact with people like Aganvagian who at that time was in Novosibirsk and studying the economy writing in a journal called Echo, his views about how society ought to change. Occasionally we would see that he would be censored and he would tell friends of ours that he was not allowed to express the real views that he had, so there were a whole series of people like that who were advocating certain kinds of change. Gorbachev didn't sort of bring a new era with him, in fact were not even sure to this day how new it is, or how much of a change he really favors. The talk began in Andropov's time, the criticism of the kind of stuck in nature of the Brezhnev era when decisions weren't taken, where the growth rate dropped, where a lot of mistakes were made in handling things like Afghanistan. Some of the young people that we talked to would reveal in their odd crab-like way that they didn't like it and that there were better way to do these things.

So you could see a first of all a necessity for doing something because clearly the Party was not doing its job, and the civilian side of the economy wasn't working. The military side was doing quite well, there was a ferment in the intellectual community they were kind of mad that they weren't allowed to do the kind of things that they wanted to do. We had been reporting on these trends, we had been talking to people. Now we find, or I find that a lot of my job is to kind of caution people not to think that because Mr. Gorbachev looks different, talks differently, and seems a more modern person that he is the greatest performer that has come down the pike. I don't believe he is, I think he is basically a pretty orthodox fellow who has come up through the party structure, who thinks and believes that you can make the Marxist-Leninist system work; and so his first objective is to make it work. He follows I think the Andropov line that the way to do that is to create the new Soviet man, and that the perfectibility of man without real material incentives is possible. That's what he's trying to do, although he promises material incentives as well, he can't produce them at the moment. So it is a fascinating period now and I don't think we have yet seen what the real Gorbachev policy is.

Q: How do you think it (the new Soviet policy) should be followed, for our government, for the informed public? What are the best ways to follow Soviet policies?

HARTMAN: I think the best ways are to engage and to have as much going on as possible, to get in touch with as many people as possible, in as many areas as possible. The last thing I would do would be to make U.S. policy on the basis that we want to help him in some way. I think that one thing that the experience of the last forty years has taught me is that Americans are not very good at having a good enough analysis of another countries situation to know when a policy decision that they take is going to help somebody else. Think of U.S. interests and just play it straight, if it has a beneficial influence then so be it, but don't try to predict what your policies are going to do to be helpful to somebody else. We just don't know enough to do that. With Gorbachev particularly I just don't know him, I disagree strongly with the kind of Steve Colin analysis that we already know the direction he wants to go in and we should be helping him. I don't think we know the direction he wants to go in yet, my own view is that it is a pretty conservative direction; it wants to make the Marxist-Leninist system work and I have no idea why the United States should help that process, since it doesn't believe that it is going to work anyway.

Q: So through as much contact as possible and careful reading of what they say you were able to gain most of your knowledge?

HARTMAN: Yes, private exchanges and public exchanges. I mean if he really wants to begin to open Soviet society that's totally in our interest, if he's going in a different direction on inspection and verification; we want that, that will build greater confidence. They've got along way to go.

My favorite story of this is that when you go out of the American Dacha just outside of Moscow, and you want to take a walk in the woods and you walk down the road about three-hundred yards, there is a road that goes to the left and another one that goes straight ahead or to the right over into the woods. You can't turn left, there is a militiaman there. I know for a fact because I've looked from the woods on the other side of that road over across, there is nothing, absolutely nothing there that would be abnormal for the sight of a foreign diplomat. Well in a country that just outside of Moscow won't let you walk down a road in the country that has nothing on it; there's no secret installation, there's absolutely nothing there, they've got along way to go to achieve any kind of openness that would give the outside world confidence that we knew what was going on. So I say work at it, but you are overcoming four-hundred years of Russian history, not just Soviet history.

Q: What about the embassy itself? At some point our government entered into a negotiation with theirs about the embassy itself. How should that be staffed?

HARTMAN: Well, were now in a situation where the Soviets overdid, that is they brought too many people here who were engaged in straight intelligence work and so we had to cut them back, both in the U.N. and in there mission here. So were now both of us operating under ceilings, that is we have 225 people in the embassy and they have 225 people here in Washington and they have a very reduced presence in New York and I think they will meet those limits. What this means is that we will have fewer slots for substantive officers because of that 225 we now must use a number of those slots to do the jobs that the Soviets were doing before and all this winter our officers have been doing them. Through a very cold winter they have been going out to the airport and picking up a ton of pouches because we ship a lot of thing in by pouch that we don't want the Soviets to get a hand on; and bringing in the milk from Finland from the station and a whole series of things that had previously been done by either escorted Soviets our unescorted Soviets. We're never going to go back to a different system, we will not go back to a system where we use Soviet employees and that's both because of Congressional pressures, and other pressures here now and incidents like this Marine incident; and because its just felt that that is a way to build greater security. I have disputed that in the past saying that going to zero Soviet employees brings in added risks, you are going to have to bring in young Americans whose ambition is not to be in Moscow for intellectual reasons to learn more about the society, but its another place to make money. These people will be subject to pressures by the Soviets as we've seen with the Marine cases and they will be eventually somebody gets recruited. Now people say to me that if you hadn't had Soviets on the site to sort of see who was vulnerable, then these people wouldn't have been picked up; well that shows a total ignorance of what goes on in Moscow.

You fire all of the Soviet employees and one of the first ones I fired by the way was the barber, a wonderful old lady who did nothing but pump the Marines and pump everybody else as to what was going on, and I fired her early on. Well Marines need haircuts so they go off to the hotels and very charming young ladies do the barbering in hotels, so contacts can be made. There is no substitute for picking mature people who will not get themselves into these problems, and watching them all the time and building systems to keep these people from getting out of hand. My own view is now, and I've recommended to my successor that we take the Marines out of Moscow, that we go for a kind of British system. This system uses retired policemen, retired NCO's married who come over there and do the guard duty; their wives work so we get two for one under our ceiling, and that this is what we are going to have to do. We are also going to have to have much more differentiation which we have started a number of years ago about where people can go on our premises. In other words not every American will be allowed anywhere near the classified areas, there is no reason for all of them to be there. We've already done that with the pass system, what we didn't do and what we all feel stabbed in the back is to think that our Marines would do what they have done there, or apparently have done at this point.

Q: The new thinking, what is it? This is a very difficult subject and one that many people have discussed, many people are following carefully, but you've always paid a lot of attention to intellectual currents, what's happening in painting, what's happening in various forms of writing, in the theater and so on. What was your appreciation of what seems to be exciting the Soviets themselves?

HARTMAN: They are very much excited about Gorbachev's movements. It has begun to affect the artistic community and your seeing it in play. It is a conscious policy to open up enough, not completely, to attract the intellectual community. This is not to because you want to see what they are going to produce in terms of what they have already been writing, but I'm sure Gorbachev's purpose is to try and harness the intellectual community to help him accomplish what he wants which is to modernize that society, to get people motivated to work harder and to do fewer of the things that have been debilitating to that society in the past, but be good Communists. This can be turned on, it can be turned off; Khrushchev did the same thing for awhile and then it got turned off. The trouble with a society that is based on the principle of Democratic Centralism, namely authoritarian is that it doesn't let loose totally of control, it is not a Democratic society. So the poets are unleashed at the moment up to a point. Bella Akmandulla has had all of her poetry printed now except for one paragraph that they wouldn't put into a page poem that she had written. She wrote out that paragraph for me so that I would have the complete poem. They're just getting around to publishing Dr. Zhivago for God's sake! Another perhaps more important book is going to come out soon by Ribicoff which will be a condemnation of the Stalin period and very well done and he's a great writer; incidentally, also a Jew. He is a Jew who doesn't want to emigrate, he is a member of the established class although a man who wrote a book that's been on the shelf since the seventies, and a vigorous condemnation of the Stalinist period. Movies are coming out now talking about the Stalin period, all that it seems to me is to the good, it should be encouraged, but one should not think that this is a precursor of a change in society that is so great that they are going to move away from some of the Marxist-Leninist principles that got them in trouble in the first place.

Q: That's where the debate is whether your right, or whether some of the outsiders are right?

HARTMAN: You mean debate among the outsiders, there is not much debate among the insiders about that.

G. PHILIP HUGHES
Deputy Foreign Policy Advisor to Vice President George Bush
The White House, Washington, DC (1981-1985)

Ambassador Hughes was born and raised in Ohio and educated at the University of Dayton, Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy and Harvard University. His career with the US Government included service at the senior level with the Congressional Budget Office, the Departments of State and Commerce, and the White House, where he served two tours with the National Security Council. In 1990 he was named US Ambassador to Barbados, where he served until 1993. Ambassador Hughes was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1997.

HUGHES: From January/February 1981 until September 1985.

Q: What was the role of the Vice President as you saw it from your perspective? Where did he fit in particularly in the foreign affairs field?

HUGHES: In the beginning of the administration President Reagan had brought on Al Haig to be the Secretary of State. Even as a young staff member who didn't have access to the president's daily briefing or his daily national security meeting or things like that, but just watching what Dan Murphy did, hearing the conversations that went on in his office and phone conversations with the West Wing of the White House and so forth, it was plain to me that there was a lot of mistrust among the Reagan insiders on the White House staff. Maybe Jim Baker, maybe Mike Deaver, maybe Ed Meese, the Reagan boys. It was a triumvirate at the top of Meese, Baker, Deaver with Baker as chief of staff, Meese as Counselor to the President and initially the overseer of the National Security Council staff though that didn't work out, and Deaver as Deputy Chief of Staff and sort of chief image manager for the president. There was great mistrust of Al Haig, great mistrust of the institutional State Department and great mistrust of the foreign affairs establishment, if you would, of the government.

It was plain to me in the early days of the Reagan administration that the State Department were regarded as not red-blooded patriotic Americans who really stood up strongly and assertively for our country's interests, who really stood up strongly and assertively in the face of menaces and threats from Russia or Russian surrogates, whatever. They were suspect and Al Haig was suspect for different reasons. Not that he wasn't a full red-blooded American but that he either wasn't a team player or he wasn't a player on Reagan's team or he was too egotistical and too uncontrolled for his own, or the nation's, or the administration's good. In any case there was a desire to, I don't know exactly the right word, but to box Al Haig I guess and that George Bush as Vice President was supposed to play a role in that.

It was never plain to me how much of this was Mr. Bush's own personal doing and how much of it was simply people in the West Wing around Reagan saying "How can we keep this from being Al Haig's responsibility? Let's give it to the Vice President." Nobody can complain about that because he is the Vice President and besides he has all this foreign affairs experience and so forth. It was plain to me that George Bush as a Vice President was going to be the most loyal, the most thorough going team player Vice President that you could get. But at the same time because of who he was and what his background was and his extensive foreign affairs experience, that he was going to be interested in finding somehow a role that President Reagan would be comfortable with that wouldn't upstage or trample on the President's prerogatives. It would be a role in which he could complement Reagan and make a contribution to the administration in the foreign affairs field, but delicately, not trying to upstage the Secretary of State, not trying to trample other departments of government, not trying to upstage the President but to play a useful role. Clearly this would be something that Bush would be thinking about.

In the early days of the Reagan administration the whole issue of how the crisis management structure of the White House should be set up was a topic. I don't know if it was in response to a proposal from the State Department. I should say by the way that in the initial days of organizing the Reagan administration, I believe that Secretary Haig generated a lot of suspicion and maybe hostility at the White House from the way he went about staffing the State Department. Clearly he was a Washington operator and an insider who really knew how the game was played.

Q: He had been with the NSC and worked at the White House.

HUGHES: He had been Chief of Staff for Ford.

Q: He and Kissinger had sort of presided over the last days of Nixon and the whole Ford administration.

HUGHES: And so he clearly knew how the game was played or considered that he did. In the very beginning of the Reagan administration, once Haig was named as Secretary of State, I have no idea how that came about, he moved out faster than any other cabinet officer who had been named to announce his lineup of subordinates at the State Department. It was apparent even to somebody who read the newspaper that his strategy was to get his team on the field faster than everybody else and make up as much yardage as possible, to use a football metaphor, before the other teams could even get organized. He described himself as the vicar of foreign policy for the Reagan administration, making a lot of people wonder what it meant to be a vicar of foreign policy.

I think all of this excited a certain reaction inside the Reagan loyalists who came with Reagan from California. In that process George Bush could be very useful.

When the issue of setting up the crisis management structure in the White House came up, there was a discussion (I happened to be around for part of it in Dan Murphy's office as Chief of Staff) when the West Wing of the White House called to ask if Mr. Bush would be willing if in the structure of the National Security Council [NSC], a subcommittee under the NSC was set up called the Special Situation Group [SSG] which would be the crisis management group that would be presided over by the Vice President which would make recommendations to the President on what to do in certain crises so the President himself wouldn't have to chair the NSC to actually thrash out different opinions and so forth. People might speak perhaps more freely before the Vice President than they would before Reagan himself and then they could recommend to the president via the Vice President rather than the Secretary of State. The SSG was to try to find a way to perhaps compensate for what some people thought of as Mr. Reagan's limitations as a chair of a crisis management NSC session, and maybe account for what were already perceived as some of the limitations of his initial National Security Council staff and particularly Dick Allen and Ed Meese, who were regarded as unable to move paper and unable to reach decisions and unable to get things done, and certainly though to box out Al Haig, to make sure Al Haig was not running the show on major foreign policy crises.

Q: I would have thought that there would have been a natural affinity between Al Haig and Vice President Bush in how they looked at the world. Bush had been head of our liaison mission in Peking, had been a director of CIA and had been around. Haig had also been around whereas the people you mentioned, Ronald Reagan, Baker, Meese, and Deaver were really sort of the typical things that come with an awful lot of presidents, including Carter and all. They were boys from the home state coming in and were suspicious of the foreign affairs establishment which is usually dealing with the crisis. The situations don't change from administration to administration but a new administration seems to feel this. I would have thought that Bush was an old hand at this, Haig was an old hand at this and almost that he would be considered by the Deavers and company to be in the enemy camp.

HUGHES: I think there was in the initial days in the Reagan administration a certain suspicion of Bush and of the people who were around Bush as not being really conservative and not being really with the Reagan agenda. I mean after all the "voodoo economics" slogan from Bush's primary campaign still rang in people's ears, referring to Reagan's economic policies. After all Reagan had done a very brave thing in bringing his primary opponent in as Vice President and a representative of what you might call the more establishment or east coast or Rockefeller wing of the Republican Party. That even spilled over sometimes to us members of the staff. I remember once being introduced to a very conservative member of the presidential personnel staff by another good friend of mine who happened to be on the presidential personnel staff at the time. The information was of the form "he works for Bush but he is very hard core conservative" because that is what it took to establish your bona fides.

Q: Did you find yourself having to almost, it's probably the wrong word, but almost to posture a bit in order to maintain your credentials: I'm tougher than you are?

HUGHES: No, not really. I don't think so. I think that the people in the White House figured out quickly who [inaudible]. It was once you got in there and we were all pitching together on a whole range of policy issues for the next five years inside that Old Executive Office Building, the National Security Council staffers from Dick Pipes and Paula Dobriansky to Norm Bailey, a whole bunch of people who were very identified with Reagan policies, as I'd like to think I was identified with Reagan policies, we all figured out who was playing on the same team. If there were people who were thought of as not really being with the program so to speak, people figured out who they were, too, and then you sort of worked around them or you didn't collaborate very closely with them or whatever.

In any case to go back about Bush and Haig, I don't remember ever being in the same room with the two men, to be honest, at the same time. After all, Haig was only Secretary of State for about 18 months or less. What I do recall is that Mr. Bush had a sort of delicate problem because in his conception of government and his conception of the role of the Vice President, he had a very, very complicated game to play so to speak. His conception of the role of the Vice President was it was to be a loyal deputy and do whatever the President wanted and whatever would help the political fortunes best of the ticket once he was Vice President. His conception of his institutional role was that it was a role that had lots of potential but only to the extent that he could carve a space and carry out a role without trampling, as I mentioned, on the other cabinet departments and secretaries and their proper responsibilities.

He had a third problem in that there were those in the Reagan administration, but probably not Mr. Reagan himself or his wife I suppose, but certainly advisors who must have wondered, especially with Jim Baker, who had been after all Bush's campaign manager, becoming Reagan's Chief of Staff: was Bush going to try and to take over this presidency? Was he to somehow play a super role in the presidency? He had to establish that he wasn't a figure of suspicion and that he also was with the program, he was with Reagan, not publicly espousing but secretly undermining Reagan's policy, but he was with Reagan. This is entirely speculation on my part, but I would say that even if he had been some kind of a foreign policy guru establishment of Al Haig, the last thing in the world that he could have afforded to do would have been to appear to be the ally of Al Haig, even if he thought Al Haig was completely judicious and completely even-tempered and completely balanced and completely sort of calm and deliberate in his reaction to all sorts of things.

HUGHES: He was the antithesis of all those things in his public image.

Q: Intemperate from time to time was not an inapt word.

HUGHES: Yes, and of course an early defining moment I think for Mr. Bush came in March, as I recall, of 1981 when the assassination attempt on President Reagan occurred and Mr. Bush was at that time traveling in Texas. Al Haig came to the White House and he convened a meeting of the NSC to go over the situation with Reagan's advisors. There was of course great public anxiety, and someone had to go up and make a press statement. Either Haig nominated himself or someone nominated him but in any event he walked into the press room breathless. I remember watching this on TV from my office. He walked into the press room breathless. He looked perfectly flushed and frazzled.

Q: He had a heart condition hadn't he at that time?

HUGHES: Possibly. I don't really know. I think that is right. He announced that the situation was normal and there was no cause for alarm. The Vice President had been notified and he was flying back from Texas and in the meantime Al Haig was in control at the White House. A particularly infelicitous choice of words which, I think, already in the minds of many Reagan supporters and staff, for Al Haig to come up and say that "I, Al Haig, am in control here at the White House," just convinced many people that, first of all he was intemperate and injudicious and not suited for the role, and further that he had vast ambitions of power in the administration which were not in keeping with the way that Reagan cabinet secretaries were expected to behave. So frankly then there were a whole bunch of battles after that and Mr. Haig passed from the scene.

Q: What was your role during this time? What were some of the things that you did?

HUGHES: The role of the Vice President's Deputy Foreign Policy Advisor is a hybrid role. It is a lot like the role that you might perform on a professional staff on Capitol Hill. Briefing your principal for his next meeting with a foreign dignitary, helping prepare his public remarks on a foreign policy topic, representing him at meetings or briefing him for meetings of the National Security Council or other cabinet level meetings that might pertain to foreign policy. In our office we had a National Security Advisor, myself, a couple of military aides, and then some enlisted personnel. We sort of divided up the world between us. I drew Europe and the Soviet Union, Latin America, and then bunches of other functional topics: the intelligence portfolio, the international economic and trade portfolio, human rights and international organizations oriented portfolios. I typically didn't work on Africa. I worked a little bit on Africa in the beginning. I typically didn't work at all on the Middle East and typically didn't work on Asia.

What was my job? Mr. Bush in those days was receiving sometimes as many as three or four foreign leaders a day visiting Washington. I had to brief him for most of those meetings. I had to prepare his briefing paper and his talking points. Liaise with the State Department or other agencies that had an interest in this meeting to make sure that points that they wished the Vice President would get across would be gotten across. I had to minute the meetings in many cases. Just producing three or four briefings a day and doing the logistical coordination of the meetings, greeting the foreign visitors at the door, taking them to the Vice President's office and taking them back out again, that takes a lot of time. There is a lot of writing involved.

Why was he meeting so many foreign leaders? President Reagan's schedule was very tightly controlled and he did a very limited number of meetings a day. The emphasis was on quality versus quantity. Especially in the early years of the administration when governments all around the world wanted to get to know the new leadership in Washington in the White House, they were clamoring for President Reagan to meet with their visitors. He wouldn't do many of them. He only did those that were most important at the advice of his staff. Mr. Bush basically handled the overflow.

There is another perverse aspect of working for the Vice President, and in dealing with the State Department you get a fair dose of this, and that is he also ended up sometimes at the behest of the Department handling the overflow from the Secretary of State. That is, if the Transportation Secretary of Ghana is coming to the United States and he wants a meeting with the Secretary of State but the Secretary of State can't see him, the enterprising desk officer is likely as not to think, who could we get him to see? How about the Vice President? We ended up with all these sorts of odds and ends meetings that were recommended to Mr. Bush, many of which he did cheerfully until we got wise enough to ask questions like "is the Secretary of State seeing this person?" "Well no actually he is too busy." "Well, if he is too busy, then why do you think he merits the Vice President's time?"

Meetings of the National Security Council. Briefing the Vice President for those and keeping abreast, working closely with the National Security Council on what are the issues.

Q: I would like to grab one thing at a time. Visitors. Somebody is coming from Ghana or somewhere, what would you do and what would be the sort of the things, how would you get information?

HUGHES: It is pretty straightforward. You want me to describe how a visit is handled entirely for the Vice President?

Q: Yes.

HUGHES: For the Vice President, the idea of a visit might arise in several ways. A foreign government might request the visit through our embassy overseas or directly to the State Department through their embassy in Washington and then the State Department would contact the Vice President's office. Once they get comfortable with who are the new crew of people in the White House, officers will contact the Vice President's office directly by phone otherwise they will send over a formal request from the Executive Secretariat. It proposes a meeting between the Vice President and the Defense Minister of Germany who is coming, that is a fairly common kind of thing. That is a way it might happen. Another way it might happen is that as the Vice President's office, once the administration settled in, develops wider and closer relationships with the embassy community in town, the German embassy might call directly and say the German Defense Minister is coming and can we arrange for him to meet the Vice President?

There are certain countries and certain officials that you know are so important that the Vice President is certainly going to meet with them if at all humanly possible. There are certain people that you may come to know over time that the Vice President doesn't particularly like and he is not going to meet with them in any case. You just have to find a diplomatic way of saying so. There are other people that are really marginal calls and then especially if the request doesn't come initially from the State Department, you may have to go through an elaborate consultation first about whether we are even going to recommend this to the Vice President. Mr. Bush wanted to approve all of his own appointments so the next thing was to make sure there was time on the calendar and send a memo to Mr. Bush urging him to meet with this person and explaining why. It was usually very short and he usually checked off on it in his night reading and sent it back to you saying set it up.

We would then set it up with the scheduling office and that involves determining which office we are going to use: the West Wing office, the Old Executive Office Building office, or sometimes, rarely but sometimes, his office in the Senate. Who is going to come with the foreign leader? Who is going to come from the State Department and the National Security Council? The State Department would then prepare a briefing paper on a schedule that we'd set up. There is a standard arrangement that we worked out with the secretariat. The briefing paper would come over in a specified format. We evolved the format over time so that it was more suitable for the Vice President. Then we would rework it into our own briefing paper basically for the Vice President. Oftentimes meetings would happen on such short notice that we wouldn't have time for the State Department to generate a briefing paper.

Once upon a time at the beginning of the administration when everybody was struggling to do a great job and to show off their staff expertise for the Vice President, Dick Allen decreed that the National Security Council should prepare a briefing paper for every Vice Presidential meeting and the State Department would prepare a briefing paper for every Vice Presidential meeting. Of course the Vice Presidential staff, not to be outdone, was going to prepare a briefing paper for every Vice Presidential meeting. The upshot of it was that Mr. Bush, for a 20 minute meeting with the transportation secretary of Ghana was going to get about eight or ten pages of written prose, much of which would be repetitive. A State Department paper covered by a National Security Council paper, covered by a Vice Presidential office paper with all this supposed information in it. We got that all streamlined into something much more workable so eventually Mr. Bush pulled a set of talking points off the back of his briefing paper and he just went through the meeting with a few points. There was then participating in the meeting, minuting the meeting, and doing any follow-up from the meeting. So that's how a meeting happens.

As I say over time you learned some things. You learned who are really important to the Vice President or to the agenda that we are trying to evolve. The German Defense Minister comes to town at the height of the Euro-missiles crisis, there is no question that the Vice President is going to see him especially since the president will not see defense ministers for the most part. We have to make sure that the Vice President is primed in what to say. Usually that involved liaising with the State Department, liaising with the NSC and sometimes liaising with the intelligence community often over the phone, sometimes over the secure phone, to gathering information about what was currently hot with these countries. Although on the staff we are following the daily traffic and reading the NID [the National Intelligence Daily] and other daily intelligence publications, if you are covering Europe, the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe and Latin America and Canada and all of those functional portfolios, nobody can be absolutely on top of every development in every country at the rate of three briefing papers a day, or three meetings a day, or two meetings a day, or one meeting a day. That is a big part of the job.

Another part of the job is briefing the Vice President for meetings with the National Security Council or other cabinet level meetings in which foreign policy related topics are going to be discussed. Once again there it is working closely with the NSC. You will have been participating probably in inter-agency deliberations representing the Vice President's office for weeks or months in advance of the NSC meeting, as options and issues and ideas and recommendations for the president are developed. From all of that participation you will sort of know where the bodies are buried, what agencies are taking what positions, what cabinet officers are probably going to argue what positions. You'll have a sense of what you think is the right thing to do. Both the right thing substantively and what comports with what you know to be the positions of the Vice President from things he has taken or said or done in the past.

You write him a briefing usually in close consultation with the NSC because in those days we were trying to make sure that the president and the Vice President were together in these meetings. Our briefing paper would cover the president's briefing paper for the NSC so the Vice President would see what the president was given by the National Security Advisor. On top of it would be a spin paper, if you would from us, from myself and my boss when I was involved in these briefings, to say this is how we think the meeting is going to unfold and this is what we think this cabinet secretary and that cabinet secretary are going to want to say. This is where we think the NSC staff wants this to come out, and this is what we think would be a good posture for you to take in this meeting. You might want to make these points or you might want to ask these questions or you might want to concentrate on these issues. And brief him for the meeting. Usually my boss would go along with him to the NSC meetings, or Dan Murphy, the Chief of Staff. Usually Dan Murphy would go with him to NSC meetings. Then we would learn about what happened and there might be some role for the Vice President in implementing the follow-up, i.e. if the NSC decides the Vice President needs to take a trip.

Preparing the Vice President for his visits abroad, Mr. Bush began traveling slowly and somewhat reluctantly. He didn't take his first trip abroad until as I recall June of 1981 when he went to meet Francois Mitterrand at Mitterrand's installation as President of France. He stopped in London on the way back, meeting with Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher. He didn't take another trip abroad until I think September of that year when he went to Mexico for the Mexican independence day celebration. Each time the Vice President traveled abroad, he need to be briefed for the travel. The travel needed to be arranged. The countries that he was to visit and the reasons for visiting, the agenda, the purposes of the trip and the expected accomplishments of the trip all had to be outlined and discussed. When those trips happened in my part of the world, that was part of my job.

Representing as I mentioned the Vice President's office in inter-agency deliberations was another important part of the job and having the opportunity to staff and support the Vice President for crisis management responsibilities. My most memorable experience in that regard was the Grenada rescue operation in 1983.

HUGHES: As I was saying my most memorable crisis management experience was in the planning of the Grenada rescue operation in 1983 so that was another aspect of that.

Q: I want to come back to that but first I want to go back to these visits. It may be a small matter but I was wondering, were any visits, people calling on the Vice President, particularly notable either from a serious, humorous or annoying matter that sticks in your mind?

HUGHES: There were lots of visits that were memorable or humorous or annoying. I remember several visits where various funny things happened. On one occasion in the early '80s we had been trying very much to continue pursuing the policy of differentiation vis-à-vis Romania compared to the rest of the Eastern Bloc because of their more independent minded and intractable sort of policy with respect to the Soviet Union. You might say it was a way of wedge driving in the Eastern Bloc. Although we had our difference with the Ceausescu Government over certain human rights things and Mr. Bush had particularly crusaded for the release of certain families from Romania whose cases had been brought to his attention particularly after he visited Romania in 1983, we nevertheless did attempt with Romania's ambassadors in Washington and by meeting with Romanian officials, Vice Presidents and other people when they came to call in Washington, to maintain a very cordial set of relations with Romanians. I remember on one occasion where this was totally thwarted. A Romanian ambassador was brought to see Mr. Bush as a courtesy introductory call soon after coming to Washington and presenting his credentials. The ambassador's job of course was to maintain good relations with the United States and he proceeded to get into a fight with Mr. Bush over some issue of how policy was being handled in Romania.

I remember a Hungarian ambassador who did the same thing. The outgoing Hungarian ambassador had been regarded as just sort of sweetness and light, a fine representative of his country even though it was then under Soviet domination. His successor was brought to the White House and there was every hope that he would strike off a good relationship with the Vice President. Once again the Hungarian ambassador took on a very pugilistic approach with the Vice President and they ended up getting their relationship off on rather a sour note.

The Vice President had, I remember, a discussion with Helmut Schmidt in his OEOB office once Schmidt had ceased being chancellor. It was one of the most far ranging and visionary discussions between two statesmen about the panorama of the world that I can recall. Just sort of a wonderfully visionary discussion.

Some of the Vice President's meetings that for me were the most memorable in terms of the witticism that came out of them actually were meetings that he had overseas rather than in his Washington office. I remember once he was meeting with Franz Joseph Strauss in Bonn in connection with a trip he made there in '83 or '85, I don't recall which one. It was at a time soon after Gorbachev had taken power so we can date it. Mr. Bush was asking Franz Joseph Strauss's views about Gorbachev and whether Gorbachev could be successful in achieving reform of the Soviet system. Strauss said to Bush that reforming the Soviet system was like trying to make roasted snowballs. There were a number of other funny meetings like that. We can go over more of them. They will come back to me as we talk along I am sure.

Q: Why don't we stop at this point. I would like to put at the end that you were talking about maybe there were some other incidents of meetings, overseas travel and all. We can talk about the role of the Vice President as you saw it and what you were doing on Vice President Bush's overseas travel. Also I wonder if you could comment on the fact that more than most, George Bush seemed to be collecting names of people that he could call on in the international field which he certainly did in spades during the Gulf War crisis when he was president. Was there a sort of plan or was he building up a repertoire there? Also some comments again from your perspective, did you see particularly after George Shultz came in, the clash between George Shultz and Casper Weinberger? Did the Vice President play any role in trying to keep these two people, who apparently couldn't stand each other, apart? And then more about Ronald Reagan and the field of foreign affairs and various people on the NSC. Again, all of this from your perspective and any things from the White House. Of course we will come to Ollie North and that whole thing too. Whatever you can talk about and then we will keep going from there.

Today is the 28th of January 1997. You heard that list of things. Let me ask first about Bush and collecting names. Were you involved in this?

HUGHES: To the extent that I was right in the middle of Bush's foreign policy operation, yes. But I think that it would be not quite the right view to think of what the Vice President did during his time in the foreign affairs field as just amassing Rolodex. That was sort of a byproduct of the other things that Bush was doing in his foreign policy role as Vice President. As I was reflecting on the last story that I was telling you about, sort of funny episodes from the Vice President's travels, it reminded me that Bush was in contrast to some Vice Presidents whom, the legend was anyway, the President stuck on a plane and just kept them flying. This was something supposedly that was a famous pitfall of Vice President Agnew, that he was sort of put on a plane and kept flying. Mr. Bush traveled a great deal but the overwhelming majority, I think, of Mr. Bush's foreign travels had behind them some central mission that he was on for the administration. Sometimes that mission was the initiative of the President, or the President's staff. Sometimes the idea was Bush's own idea and sometimes it was an idea that his staff, I or my colleagues, got up with others in the administration.

When I think back over those travels, there are certain trips that are sort of hallmarks for me. Things Mr. Bush was doing to carry water for the administration on foreign policy and in the course of doing those, he interacted with a lot of people, he formed personal friendships. He introduced into his travels and also into the visits of foreign dignitaries to the United States, a special personal touch and I think part of that was his own personal graciousness. Part of it was going the extra mile to invest in personal capital that would pay off for the United States in our dealings with a country, with these leaders over the long haul and part of it was probably also cultivating relationships that, if he became President, would serve him in good stead.

Q: You are quite right to mention this. It is not a Rolodex of gathering names but more than almost anyone I can think of, he seemed to both go out and make the contacts and obviously get the name, but I mean make the contacts which he was able to pull in as President which was a very important element.

HUGHES: I think there is another element of Bush's style that is probably important to bear in mind and that was his penchant for doing special personal things for visitors. Later on in the vice presidency, particularly in the second term of President Reagan and then this carried over into Mr. Bush's presidency, he took to the idea of extending personal invitations to leaders with whom he felt special friendship to visit him in Kennebunkport at his family home. I can't remember offhand the names of all the leaders that he invited to do this. After he became president he invited President Mitterrand of France for example up to Kennebunkport, I recall. Every one of the those evolutions in Kennebunkport was an investment in relationship building and personal capital building that would pay off later.

Q: Let's talk about some of the trips that you were involved with because I also want to keep it from your perspective of how you saw this, what some of these particular trips were doing?

HUGHES: In 1982 we had a major challenge in Europe to keep the allies together in support of INF (Intermediate-range Nuclear Forces) missile deployment in order to be able, we felt, to bring the Soviets to the INF negotiating table and to get an INF control or reduction agreement. Mr. Bush undertook a mission in 1983 to visit all the capitals of countries that would be key to INF deployment and other capitals that would be important, like Paris, to persuade the allies to back the administration's position on INF deployment, to go forward with INF deployment, so that we could credibly represent that NATO was not going to be deterred by the Soviets from deploying intermediate range nuclear forces to counter the Soviet SS-20s. And the only way that Russia would be able to deal with this would be to come to the bargaining table. He made that trip, he made that case, and it was quite successful.

His very first trip was to welcome President Mitterrand to the family if you would of western leaders. The first socialist president of France in the post-war period who had a couple of communists in his first cabinet, something that was very worrying to the allies. Mr. Bush went to reach out to Mitterrand and there began a long and close relationship between Mitterrand and Bush, and the Reagan-Bush administrations and France. On that same trip he visited Margaret Thatcher in England as well, our closest friend in Europe.

Mr. Bush made a pair of visits to Geneva as I recall in 1984 and again in 1985. In 1984 laying down the U.S. position on a Chemical Weapons Treaty before the United Nations Disarmament Committee. A very controversial position which called for any place, any time inspections as the centerpiece of the verification provisions of the treaty. A provision that some people thought was a sort of killer amendment and that other people thought was frankly necessary in order to be able to have any assurance of verifying something where you are dealing with essentially chemical compounds that could be put anywhere. Weapons that could be small enough and have low enough signatures that they could be put or hidden anywhere. The difficulty with verifying this sort of thing is pointed later in Iraq.

The next year in 1985 he went back and laid down the text of the treaty. First the position, then he presented our draft treaty. This was at a time when he had been in the position of having twice cast tie-breaking votes in the Senate on binary chemical weapons production in the U.S. -- something he joked publicly that his mother called him about and sort of gave him a "shame on you" for. I am not sure what his personal commitment to chemical weapons arms control was, as a sort of deep seated personal belief, but clearly it helped balance, if you would, his image on this issue to be the administration's most visible spokesman on chemical weapons arms control in Geneva in those two outings.

Q: I want to come back because this is focusing on you. What were you doing and what were some of the pressures when say Bush would go out and take a trip? You had a rather peculiar White House at that time, I am talking about the staff and lots of jealousies, lots of stuff going on. What were the pressures on you and all?

HUGHES: Let me just mention one other trip that I would like to mention, then I'll go back to your question. That trip was the Vice President's trip to Central America in 1983 as I recall in which the central mission was the trip to El Salvador. The central mission was to lay down the law to commandants of the Salvadorian military that death squad activity had to stop or we wouldn't be able to sustain aid to the Salvadorans and the whole effort would collapse. He went and made that case to the Salvadorian military commanders and there were subsequently important changes in command, important reform, death squad activities substantially did stop. We were able to not only continue assistance to Salvador but began a lethal aid program to the Contras partly as a result of that.

What was I doing in the midst of all of this? Each of his trips I was involved in preparing and on some of them I accompanied the Vice President. In preparing each trip, each was slightly different. Let's take the case of the Vice President's trip in support of INF deployment in 1983. We recognized that we had a problem on our hands in Europe. Not just a publicity problem but a policy problem in which the commitment, the backbone of our European allies was being tested and where we needed to do something but what something wasn't entirely clear. I think that the idea of the trip emerged from an initiative of the staff, either myself or in consultation with the Vice President and my boss, that perhaps it would be a good idea for the Vice President to visit a number of capitals in Europe. It might even have been suggested by the President's National Security Advisor at the time, probably Bill Clark, to the Vice President and it may have filtered back to us that way.

But in any case, I'm trying to remember the rough timing of the trip, I believe it was early 1983. We were clearly preparing in late 1982 for this visit or thinking about the idea. The question came up, when should it happen? There was as I recall an election or a set of election events in Germany that some people were sensitive to and felt that the Vice President should go later. I don't remember the exact event but there was a politically sensitive event in Germany and it appeared the Vice President should go later. This was, I think, the view of the State Department. There was a different view on the NSC from Bill Clark and an officer that I worked with at the time a great deal, the number two guy on the European account, Dennis Blair, who was working then under Dick Pipes, the senior director for European and Soviet Affairs - he was really a Soviet specialist. Dennis and I were consulting about this and it was very much Dennis's view, and I very much concurred, that we should not wait to do something to shore up the support of our allies for INF deployment. There were many pressures and stresses on them. The Russians were being very energetic in trying to bully the allies into, in a salami slice fashion, one-by-one, dropping out of their commitment to deploy especially since the German commitment to deploy - had been made contingent on a couple of other countries, including Benelux countries, committing to deploy.

We felt that the Vice President should travel earlier; so Dennis with the connivance or the cooperation of Judge Clark sent a back channel message to then Chancellor Kohl's National Security Advisor who I believe was Wolfgang Schaeuble. It was 13 years ago so I am a little bit hazy but I think it was Wolfgang Schaeuble. Clark sent this message to Schaeuble asking how would the chancellor feel about a Vice Presidential visit earlier rather than later in 1983? We got back from the Germans that there would be no problem going forward. So we informed the State Department, and did go forward with planning the trip.

What did the planning involve? It involved first of all selecting what capitals the Vice President would visit. It was pretty obvious that it had to be the main deployment capitals of NATO: Germany, Britain, France because of France's overall importance in NATO, and Brussels and The Hague because they were the two Benelux countries in this mix. I am trying to recall whether it was on that occasion or on a later occasion that the Vice President visited Luxembourg. I think we did not visit Luxembourg on that occasion. In any case that was the trip that was got up and the Vice President made those visits and managed to keep the allies together. We selected the capitals.

Of course in every case there is a pre-advance visit which goes out and I did all of them in my areas of the world that I was responsible for. These involved basically going with some advance people to do essential advance things. On the substantive side I basically went over what would be the agenda for discussion and set some limits on what we would do in the way of events and what sequence of events we would accomplish to try to project the image or project the agenda or mission that the Vice President was on. When should a press availability take place? What should be the ground rules? Do we want to have joint press events? Those sorts of things were things that I and the press folks would work on. Usually that mapped out pretty much what the Vice President was going to do, I don't recall there being a great deal of pulling and hauling over the substance of the trip.

From there on it was a matter of putting together the Vice President's briefing. Usually there were a series of oral briefings that were given to the Vice President beforehand and I would orchestrate those -- what would be the topics, who would be the briefers. You think there would be a lot of controversy or a lot of pulling and hauling over who got in to brief the Vice President but I don't remember receiving many appeals that these people are getting in and we also want to brief the Vice President. As I say, beforehand there was usually a series of pre-trip briefings and I don't remember anyone really second guessing or appealing the lineup of briefers. And then there was preparing the Vice President's briefing package which meant all of his substantive remarks, his talking points for meetings, a trip book with background material on every issue that he could read along the way and then either sending him off, if I wasn't going on the trip, or going with him on the trip and then doing a bunch of support things along the way. That gives you a sense of what that was like.

For the two outings on the Chemical Weapons Treaty in Geneva, there was an important policy issue at stake. What was going to be the U.S. position on verification? What was the Vice President going to say and eventually what was the treaty going to contain? Leading up to that there were a series of inter-agency meetings, some of them formal, some of them informal get-togethers up in the NSC staff offices on the third floor of OEOP, one floor above mine. I participated in those for the Vice President's office and in those kinds of meetings the approach I think that I took to performing my role was to try to figure out where the administration's center of gravity was on these issues. What was likely going to emerge because you had a very conservative White House with quite a number of people who were politically and ideologically identified with Ronald Reagan in the White House, both with the senior staff and in the ranks of the NSC, often standing off against federal bureaucracies. I mean, that is, permanent government staff with career civil servants or career public servants in them. That was usually the cleavage I found between where does the permanent bureaucracy stand and where do people in the White House want to go. I was trying to figure out what's the center of gravity here -- both what are the equities at stake, and which positions seem to have the most merit and also the most chance of winning. There is an element of advising the Vice President on what we think is right or what might you think is the right position and what's safe for you. What is safe for you, where should you be? Should you take sides or is it safer to stand aside until the dust clears?

Q: Did you have the feeling that you were both trying to carry out obviously the President's policy but protect your principal, being the Vice President, against the inevitable jealousies, egos of others in the White House?

HUGHES: Yes, and also to protect him sometimes from what might be positions of the administration. I remember on another matter, it was a speech that the Vice President was supposed to give, some remarks that he was supposed to give on the Strategic Defense Initiative [SDI]. This was actually later on in 1985 but it speaks to the point that you were just raising. In collaboration with the NSC, the Vice President's speech writers (and I had some role in this) had to come up with a draft set of remarks for the Vice President to make on SDI. These remarks echoed what the president and others in the administration said about building a defense system that would stop Soviet missiles from an attack on the United States. Our Chief of Staff then, himself a retired admiral, read these remarks. I remember, I was standing in the Vice President's outer office in the West Wing and we were waiting to go in to see the Vice President. He was reading these remarks, again echoing the standard line of the administration. He turned to me and said, we can't have the Vice President say this. It is fine if Ronald Reagan says this. Everybody knows that he doesn't know what he is talking about, but people assume George Bush knows what he is talking about so he can't say this.

Q: This is the thing that I find absolutely amazing about the Reagan administration in that in a way the President was deniable but the other people around him weren't. He would set the course but then sort of the staff would kind of take over from there and then all of a sudden you had all the various elements playing on more in the staff side than really on the President. Maybe this is unfair.

HUGHES: No. I don't think it is unfair but I think it's actually maybe not a bad way to run the railroad. The President set the general course; he left it to the staff to work out the details. Sometimes the staff disagreed sharply about the details. Sometimes the details they disagreed about were fundamental to whether you could achieve the stated course or not. Sometimes I think those who didn't like the destination we were headed for came up with essentially detailed procedural kind of disagreements that were really disguised disagreements about fundamentals. The President was sort of left above the detailed fray, but he was there to adjudicate the differences and if necessary say "look, I said I wanted to do this. We are not achieving that so let's do this."

Back to your question, were we there to protect the Vice President from cabinet battles and so forth? Yes, you are always there to protect your principal but sometimes you are looking at what is the substance of policy that he is going to be associated with and you are not making administration policy. To some extent you are in a position to say, well, if we put it that way or if we go quite that far, this may be difficult for the Vice President to do. But in that sense it constrains a little bit more what the people around the President might be willing to do but it doesn't drive them. Then you try to figure out what is safe for your principal.

I remember another instance where two senior officials, an Undersecretary of the Treasury and an Undersecretary of State for Economic Affairs came over to see my boss. They came up with this great idea that the Vice President should go to one of the UNCTAD meetings in Yugoslavia; it was a pledging conference. They came up with this brilliant idea that the Vice President should go to this UNCTAD meeting and he should present the U.S. position because it would mean so much to the UN to have an official of his level. It would make such an important statement for an official of his level to go to UNCTAD about our seriousness and our commitment and our devotion to the underdeveloped world and so forth. My boss -- I don't mean to be critical of him -- but he rather naively took this all in and seemed to be thinking more about another trip and how Mr. Bush would like that.

Q: Your boss being the admiral?

HUGHES: No, my boss was Don Gregg, Bush's National Security Advisor. So he seemed to be receptive to this. For my part I saw it as nothing but a can of worms because it was plain that we were not going to be coming up with any meaningful financial pledge for UNCTAD and many in the administration had serious problems with both UNCTAD and UN organs in general as reliable vehicles for American foreign policy interests. I was right away calculating as I heard about this, well if this is so important, why aren't these senior officials who are going to talk to us about this also going? Perhaps they know that something unpleasant is going to happen and they are not eager to be there to watch. Should the Vice President be eager to be there to watch and be on the receiving end of blasts from the third world about the U.S. parsimoniousness and stinginess and so forth?

Anyway the key thing was, from my point of view, to see if these gentlemen's approach really represented an inter-agency viewpoint or were they basically just fishing for some high level official to get out there to take the flag so the Secretary of State wouldn't have to go or they wouldn't themselves have to go. I made a quick call to Rick Burt, who was then the Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs and said this has been proposed to the Vice President, what do you think about this? I knew perfectly well what he thought about it. The idea was shot down in flames within about 48 hours and that was protecting your boss. How to keep something that was just going to embarrass him publicly from embarrassing him publicly. To keep him from blundering into that. So yes, we were sometimes protecting our boss, but I don't remember protecting Mr. Bush so much from inter-agency battles as I remember protecting him from bad ideas, just dumb ideas that would not enhance his image or his substantive role in the foreign policy process. Ideas that would not advance administration policy, and that would get him associated with things that he might later live to regret in his political life. Those were the things I remember trying to be a bit protective about.

Q: How about on a trip, what sort of things did you find yourself doing? Were there any particular problems on any trip?

HUGHES: No. Actually there was a funny episode that happened with respect to Ollie North that I can tell you about, but on a trip it is pretty cut and dry. The first thing is don't miss the airplane when it takes off from Andrews Air Force Base. Everybody needs to be aboard. On the flight over to wherever the destination is, at some point typically Mr. Bush would have his briefing in his sort of the onboard air force office. The planes we dubbed Air Force II in those days, 970971 to 72 were the tail numbers. Old presidential aircraft that had been retired to the Vice Presidential and other dignitary fleet. There was a central lounge with a sort of boomerang-shaped desk and a banquet and a central swivel chair for the Vice President. He would gather his press advisor, his chief of staff, his national security person, the NSC person who was along for the trip, the State Department person who was along for the trip. He always invariably took someone from the State Department and from the NSC. It was a very consciously coordinated inclusive sort of thing, and from other agencies when it was important to the purpose of the trip, maybe someone from Defense if that was important, maybe someone from the EPA if that was important. But anyway, those core people would be invited up and they would brief and discuss with the Vice President, but it wasn't so much in the form of a briefing. Sometimes it was a bit moderated by the chief of staff but it was more in the form of a roundtable discussion. Those would happen not only on the flight over but typically in between stops if we were flying on the airplane.

Once on the ground, basically you fit into a schedule that has been worked out by the advance team. It is what is called the line-by-line schedule and it controls every movement of the party. The Vice President may arrive and he might go straight to the ambassador's residence to be lodged and the rest of the staff go to the hotel. On the trip the duties of a foreign policy guy are pretty straight forward. You are to accompany the Vice President to his meetings. In the Vice President's office when I did this, I always took the notes. On other trips, I know sometimes my boss, the Vice President's National Security Advisor Don Gregg, or others left it to the State Department to take notes. If there was an embassy person who was permitted to be in the meeting, that person might be the note taker. I considered it though to be my job to take the notes so I took notes on each of the Vice President's meetings and did the memcons. I thought it was very important that the Vice President's staff have control over how the official records of those meetings were made and what they said or didn't say, again from the standpoint of not just the judgment of history but people riffling through the files in future years. Then I typically did the minutes that day as soon as I had a free minute. I remember on one occasion in Brussels, I kept my secretary up until about 2:00 or 3:00 in the morning. We just did all the memcons from that day that night. I'd do very voluminous ones, almost verbatim ones.

You would attend the Vice President's social functions. You would be called upon if a problem came up in the course of the trip, a question and a demand for something to be put on the schedule. Someone who has tried to pass the Vice President a message. A problem about a future stop that is upcoming where there is a hiccup in the schedule. You would be called upon to maybe sort it out. Sometimes we were working on multiple projects at once. I remember coming back from Ecuador on one occasion, we were preparing the text of a speech the Vice President would give in Baltimore about 48 hours after our return to try to put pressure on congress to achieve support for an MX missile appropriations vote. Once again the Vice President was called upon to articulate the administration's message and do it in a public place that would be a little bit away from Washington where we would be able to get some national press and do it in a very forward leaning, forthright way.

Q: Speaking of this, on the foreign affairs side, the Vice President has another job which is to be president of the Senate and there are foreign affairs votes and all. Did you get involved in that?

HUGHES: When it came to votes and vote counting in the Senate, the Vice President has a legislative affairs assistant. That person typically works and lives up on Capitol Hill. He or she were the people who were mainly responsible for the liaison with Congress.

The Vice President's national security affairs staff got involved in selected issues in this way. If the administration thinks a key vote or there was a key congressional consideration of some matter where the Vice President was going to be called upon to intervene with members, say make calls to members and try to persuade them to support the administration's position or oppose legislation the administration opposed, that would usually be deliberated between the NSC staff and sometimes most often the relevant agency. That agency might be the State Department, it might be the Defense Department or the CIA or the intelligence community. On occasion when the Vice President's help was needed, the pull that those agencies would use to approach the Vice President, the Vice President's national security staff, was we need the Vice President if he is willing to make calls to these members or to make representations to members. If the Vice President was needed to say stay up all night to provide the tie-breaking vote on binary chemical munitions production or some other issue like that, that would usually come to him through his legislative affairs office. But if on the other hand we faced key opposition to say a major intelligence collection program and the DCI [Director of Central Intelligence] and his staff wanted to get the Vice President involved with key members to ask them to (again these things aren't publicly discussed it's all inside this select committee on intelligence or the House Permanent Select Committee on intelligence) support the program, then the approach would be made typically either from the DCI staff or from the NSC's intelligence unit, to me or to my boss. We would work up a little briefing package and in coordination with the chief of staff or with the chief of staff's approval, run it in to the Vice President to see if he would be willing to do this. Similarly on a defense matter. I don't remember too many foreign affairs per se matters where this happened but I do remember some defense procurement items. I do remember some intelligence community concerns where the Vice President was brought in.

Q: Did you find yourself involved at all, or the Vice President, sort of between the Defense Department and the State Department? Relations weren't great between the two leaders.

HUGHES: I know that and you sort of heard the tensions between Shultz and Weinberger inside the administration and sometimes saw the effects of those tensions. I myself can't think of an instance where the Vice President was himself sort of torn between these two, or mediating between these two men. I think first of all in order to see those instances you probably have to be in the room with them when this occurred or you would have to be in the room privately with him immediately after some discussion in which Shultz and Weinberger may have sharply disagreed with each other before the president and Mr. Bush reflected on that after the fact. I don't remember, there may have been some episodes like that, but I don't remember them.

I don't believe that Mr. Bush would have sought to insert himself in the middle of that. It was not his style in the vice presidency to try and mediate inter-agency disputes much less to mediate inter-personal disputes between cabinet members. It was much more his style in my judgment to take the posture of you guys work it out and once we've got a policy that I am supposed to sell so to speak in the world abroad, then I will take it to the world abroad and sell it as long as it's something that I can sell. As long as it is something that is not either harmful to me personally or politically or intellectually, so unsaleable that I can't really do it.

When Shultz came to the State Department one of his first challenges was to unwind the frayed, the skein of terribly strained relationships between the U.S. and its European allies over the Soviet natural gas pipeline. I don't have a lot of detailed commentary on this to offer you but this was clearly a case where the Defense Department was strongly of the view that the pipeline needed to be stopped at all accounts.

Q: We're talking about a Soviet gas, natural gas pipeline?

HUGHES: The Buringori gas pipeline through Eastern Europe to Western Europe which would have made certain Western European countries importantly dependent for energy supplies on the East Bloc, at least that was the concern. The Reagan Administration had sought to use our export control laws and policies to block the construction of the pipeline including forbidding subsidiaries of American companies operating in Europe from participating in the pipeline project. This led European countries to essentially enact legislation or issue orders forbidding American subsidiaries operating in their territory from complying with U.S. law, insisting their own sovereign law was governing.

Shultz arrived and he needed to sort this out. It's pretty plain that in doing so he faced major opposition from the Pentagon to just wind down the level of conflict and rhetoric and do away with the temporary denial orders that had been issued against U.S. companies. Try to get behind the campaign that certain firms had launched against the U.S. government, Dresser Industries was such a firm I remember. I am sure there was a clash with the Pentagon. From what I recall, it was my boss's, Don Gregg's view and I think therefore probably also Mr. Bush's view that we had gone too far in trying to, in a very muscular way, stop the Buringori pipeline almost unilaterally. I think it was an occasion on which probably in substance he sided with what Shultz was trying to do but I don't recall seeing any evidence of him therefore clashing with Weinberger or maneuvering in conjunction with Shultz to outflank Weinberger or anything of that sort. That is not really his style.

GEOFFREY W. CHAPMAN
Moscow (1982-1985)

Geoffrey Chapman was born in England and raised in England and Boston. He became a naturalized American citizen in 1957 and attended Bowdoin College and Princeton. He later entered the Foreign Service in 1971 and served in Germany, the USSR, and England. He also held several positions within the State Department. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005.

Q: And then you went where? To Moscow?

CHAPMAN: To Moscow, yes.

Q: How would you describe the state of our relations with the Soviets the summer of '82 when you got there?

CHAPMAN: Relations were not as bad as they became a little later on. We were engaged with the Soviet bilaterally, and various arms control negotiations were in progress. Still, there was obviously a lot of tension. Afghanistan was still a major sticking point so it was not a very easy relationship. It was a difficult time for an American diplomat working in Moscow. We were dealing a closed society, and our ability to make professional contacts and to produce useful information were necessarily limited. During my first year in Moscow I served as the publications procurement officer, which was a great job in many ways because it got me to travel throughout the Soviet Union. There were of course extensive travel restrictions imposed by the Soviets, but we could travel to fairly large areas of the Russian Republic and Ukraine and to the capitals of the other constituent republics of the Soviet Union. In my three years in Moscow I traveled to all 15 republics at least once -- in Central Asia, the Caucasus, the Baltics -- as well as fairly extensively in Russia itself. Basically the job involved working for the agency in Langley trying to come up with all kinds of publications that are not normally available outside of the Soviet Union that might give them a better picture on what's going on there.

Q: Well how did you find Comrade Ivanof who ran the local bookstore in Bishkek or something when you arrived there? I mean, you must have- everybody knew what you were doing. I mean, how were you received and how about buying these books?

CHAPMAN: It varied tremendously. I don't think the center issued orders to the republics not to allow me in the bookstores. I remember encountering no problems in initial trips to the Baltics -- I was free to wander through the bookstores and buy what I wanted. Sometimes there was virtually nothing worth buying; other times I would come out with stacks of books. The I went down to Kiev and started shopping in a large bookstore very near to the hotel I was staying at. I was there all of ten minutes when an assistant came by and told me that the store was closing to take inventory. And this ten minutes after the store opened. Obviously it was a ruse to get me and the colleague I was traveling with out of the store. I went to other stores in the Soviet Union where they would have most of the store cordoned off, so I could only go to the children's book section for example. I'd find other stores closed down, doubtless timed to my arrival, with a sign on the door announcing that an inventory was in progress but obviously nothing of the sort going on. In one particular store in Akhshabad in Turkmenistan I plunked a stack of books on the counter only for the clerk to tell me that all except three or four were reserved for specialists and that she would not sell them to me. So it wasn't exactly a free and open buying experience.

Q: I remember I was in Yugoslavia in the '60s and one of my local employees came up and said you should go down to the Yuga Salenska Kenega, which was the main bookstore in the main square there and they said go look in animal husbandry. And there was the book Animal Farm. Those in the know were having George Orwell's book, you know, satire on communism and having-

CHAPMAN: In translation or in English?

Q: It was actually in English.

CHAPMAN: Okay.

Q: But it was being sold in the animal husbandry side. Were you able to pick up any, on these trips- In the first place, were you harassed by the KGB or did blonde provocateurs come at you?

CHAPMAN: To some extent. There was an embassy rule that employees could not travel alone in the Soviet Union, and often I would travel with an agency representative who was on paper assigned as my deputy. Since the Soviets were on to his affiliation, we were shadowed by the KGB everywhere, most of the time very blatantly and obviously. They were there at the airport when we arrived, and would practically wave to us in greeting. One always felt very safe because there was very little street crime at that time and in any event you could be sure that these goons would step in to protect you if something did happen. As to provocation, my colleague and I were having dinner together in a hotel restaurant in Kiev and all of a sudden these two young blondes showed up and sat down at our table and started engaging us in conversation. But that was all; I was somewhat disappointed in fact that they didn't try anything further. In several out-of-the-way places, where foreigners were a rarity, I was asked by policemen to show them my papers; normally they were satisfied after a glance at my diplomatic ID card. But that wasn't really harassment. There were other instances where I was in a restaurant and would be befriended by other diners, who would invite me to their homes for a drink a drink. I took up these invitations a couple of times and nothing came of them. The security people would doubtless have been outraged at such visits, but I saw them as opportunities to learn more about local conditions and get ordinary Russians to express their views. I'm not sure whether these were intended provocations; many of these encounters took place in provincial towns far from the center where foreigners rarely ventured, and the authorities might simply not have warned citizens to stay away from foreigners. Who knows? I get the impression that the society at that time was not as closed and as regimented as we might have thought. The police state was not as thoroughgoing in those days as it had been during the days of Stalin.

Q: What about, were you there during the period of demise?

CHAPMAN: Yes.

Q: With Brezhnev?

CHAPMAN: Well, Brezhnev died-

Q: Chernenko and then Andropov.

CHAPMAN: The other way around, Andropov and then Chernenko. Brezhnev died in November of '82, just shortly after I arrived in Moscow. This was the first time since Stalin that a Soviet leader had died in office, so no one really knew what was going to happen and ostensibly there was no succession arranged beforehand. During my second and third years in Moscow I was the head of the internal political unit in the embassy so I got directly involved in leadership issues. Both Andropov and Chernenko were sick men when they came into office, and we spent a lot of time trying to track their medical condition over the less than a year and a half that Andropov was in office and barely a year that Chernenko was in office. One thing that I started doing was to try to track leadership motorcades, trying to determine who was coming to work and who was staying ill in the dacha. Police would close down the main streets when the General Secretary's motorcade came along and everybody would scatter from the sidewalks. And I remember the first time I did this, trying to check whether Andropov who was coming to work, I stationed myself near the Central Committee building and then noticed that the crowds had suddenly disappeared from the streets. I was the only person standing there. And afterwards I thought that probably there were marksmen with their rifles trained on me in case I was some security threat. The motorcade rumbled by, I actually got a glimpse of Andropov in the back seat so I reported back that he was at least going to work. But it was things like that we had to resort to to try and determine what was going on and who was still in charge.

It was a time where our sources of information were few and far between. We had fairly ready access during the Andropov years to Roy Medvedev, the historian who was an authority on Stalin, and who considered himself to be a true Leninist. He was harassed during the Chernenko years so access to him was a little more difficult. We could not go to his apartment but he could come to ours without hindrance, which leaves you wondering about the efficiency of the system if indeed the Chernenko people were out to silence him. He still had a good range of contacts and provided us with some solid information. We had periodic access to the editor of a journal called Kommunist, which was an official party organ. This editor was a member of the Central Committee and very circumspect. He would not come out and say things in a direct and clear cut manner. It was all hints, suggestions, nuances here and there; and you had to learn how to interpret and make use of these. We also had a useful KGB contact that my predecessor and I had been introduced to, part of, as we subsequently learned, a KGB effort to have a direct channel to the embassy should they at some point need one. I would generally meet with him once a month over lunch. He never spoke a word of English in my presence, although he claimed to read Time magazine faithfully every week. He maintained that he worked for the State Committee on Science and Technology, which was obviously not true given his openness in discussing Soviet internal politics with a foreign diplomat, his dress, his demeanor, and the fact that he read Time regularly. Later on, he was tied up with an espionage scandal involving some Marines at the embassy in Moscow.

Q: This was Sergeant Lonetree.

CHAPMAN: Yes. The man who was known to the Marines as Uncle Sasha I knew as Alexei Yefimov. During the time I knew him he never sought any information from me about the embassy. He rarely asked questions about U.S. policy that I couldn't answer quite openly and he would provide a few indispensable nuggets of information here and there. He gave me a tip-off on Chernenko's death before it was announced, calling me at my apartment over a weekend, which was highly unusual. It was very strange to learn afterwards that sometime after I left he was given the added task of trying to suborn some Marines in order to get access to classified premises in the embassy. It was hard to believe that the KGB would have a single agent performing two very different roles.

Q: Well, was there the feeling or concern that with, you know, Brezhnev going basically senile in office and then Chernenko practically had to be propped up right from the beginning, I mean, you know, you felt sorry when you see the man there, when he was talking, I mean, obviously he had a hard time, even at death's door.

CHAPMAN: Yes.

Q: And then Andropov seemed almost, although the KGB connections seemed like a breath of fresh air until you found out he was on dialysis most of the time. But was there a concern that the leadership at the top was, well terribly weak because of this and this meant it was unpredictable and you know, and when you have something like this it can get scary?

CHAPMAN: I think in the case of Brezhnev, yes, we all recognized that he wasn't any longer capable of exercising the functions of his office. Like Chernenko later on he was trotted out and propped up as a symbol of the regime to make the case that it was still in existence and still functioning. This was a time when as people recognized even of stagnation in the country. The Soviet economy was stagnating, there was little effective leadership, and everybody recognized the need for change. Andropov, who succeeded Brezhnev, was considered a breath of fresh air.

Q: Chernenko, I mean Andropov who succeeded Chernenko..

CHAPMAN: No, Andropov succeeded Brezhnev.

Q: Oh, I'm sorry, okay.

CHAPMAN: Andropov was not a career KGB officer, but had worked his way up through the ranks of the communist party and was a party leader. In the spring of '82 he moved from the KGB to the Central Committee as one of the senior party secretaries. Andropov when he came into power recognized full well that the economy needed some kind of a push, some kind of a boost; but rather than actually reform the system, he sought to give it this boost by introducing greater discipline, insisting that people work harder and cut back on drinking, which obviously was a major problem causing economic losses as well as health problems. So there was a huge campaign to cut back on drinking and a huge campaign for more discipline at the workplace. There was nothing as I recall in the way of real incentives; just a focus on getting people to work on time, sober, and have them do their job. Andropov also sought to reduce the so-called gray economy that existed alongside the official state-run economy. People would work in their off-duty hours and on weekends on what were essentially private projects, earning real wages, but they would steal materials from their workplace. So there was an attempt to crackdown on this theft. This petered out as Andropov got progressively more and more sick and by the time he died then in early '84, the program had pretty much ground to a halt.

Chernenko was the last gasp of the old guard. It was well known at the time that Gorbachev was Andropov's favorite to succeed him, but the old guard asserted itself one more time. Gorbachev was recognized effectively as the second secretary behind the general secretary, and for much of Chernenko's tenure in fact Gorbachev chaired the Politburo and ran the Central Committee apparatus because Chernenko was in no condition to do that. The old guard did not yield easily, however. Viktor Grishin, who headed the Moscow city party apparatus, engineered several of these Chernenko appearances on television where the General Secretary was literally propped up and obliged to mumble through some remarks. This only served to emphasize how frail Chernenko was, but Grishin's purpose was by association to get across the point that he was the legitimate successor to Chernenko's mantle.

When Chernenko finally expired all the cards were essentially in place for Gorbachev. During Chernenko's final months we in the Moscow embassy had an interesting dialogue -- perhaps a euphemistic word for it -- with analysts back here in INR (Bureau of Intelligence and Research) and in the CIA because my conviction and that of my colleagues was that Gorbachev would be the successor; all the indications that we saw and all the information we were picking up from the few sources we had was that this was going to be the case. Some of the old Soviet hands in INR and in the agency disagreed with that and somehow stories were circulating that Gromyko wanted to make himself general secretary on Chernenko's death. As it turned out Gromyko was the man who in fact pushed Gorbachev forward, who formally endorsed Gorbachev as the successor at the crucial Politburo and Central Committee meetings upon Chernenko's death. People had limited expectations of Gorbachev back then. Early on he shook up the Politburo, brought in his allies, some of whom later turned against him, such as Ligachev. He made clear that he intended to take charge, but there were no indications back then that we would soon see the flowering of Glasnost and Perestroika. Those terms weren't around back then when Gorbachev took charge in March of 1985. It was clear that he intended to pick up sort of where Andropov had left off and try to revitalize the Soviet economy; but it was equally clear that he had no intent at the start to change the structure of the economy or end the dominance of the communist party. There would be efforts to make the economy more productive, to get more work out of the average working man. In addition there might be some loosening of controls, perhaps allowing elements of a market economy to come into existence. But I left in July of 1985 and very little of that had come to the fore by the time I left.

Q: Well you were dealing with internal matters during this time of, I won't say troubles but-

CHAPMAN: Uncertainty.

Q: Of people dying, leadership dying and all which upsets. But were you seeing the Soviet system internally, with all the weaknesses that apparently Gorbachev at a certain point saw but I mean, but also 10 years later or less than that come out, the terrible state of the economy and the nationality problem and all that. I mean, was that as apparent to us at that time while you were there?

CHAPMAN: Well certainly the state of the economy was. Just by living there and traveling around the country and talking to people, you could see that this was an economy that was not producing.

Q: Would you just repeat that last part?

CHAPMAN: The Soviet economy was clearly in very poor condition just by all the evidence you could see in Moscow, visiting other parts of the Soviet Union, and talking to people; it was simply not producing the goods that people wanted and needed. By this time, Soviet citizens were becoming more aware of what was happening in the outside world. Russians were able to travel to parts of Eastern Europe, not everybody but a sizeable number, and they could see that things were so much better in Hungary and the German Democratic Republic and Poland than they were in the Soviet Union. I think people were starting to question why this was happening and whether a totally managed economy was in fact best for the USSR.

On the nationalities issue, there had been periodic sort of uprisings which had been kept secret to a large extent by the Soviet leadership, happening in parts of Central Asia and the Caucasus. Obviously you couldn't get people in these areas to talk openly about how much they opposed the Soviet regime or the communist party, but it was clear they didn't like the Russians and the Russians were everywhere. The intent of the Soviet leadership was to push Russians out into the periphery of the Soviet Union so they would in effect submerge the other nationalities and would be able to run the other republics. Typically the general secretaries of the republic parties were of the local nationality, but the second secretary would invariably be a Russian who was essentially in control of the ruling party apparatus. Some of the other republics were very different from Russia. Outwardly there were similarities such as the same ugly apartment blocks that were built in Tashkent or Tbilisi as in Moscow, but the peoples and the cultures were so different. Georgia was in many respects almost a Mediterranean country, not only with regard to the climate but the way people behaved and their general openness. I remember having a wonderful five-hour-long evening conversation with a Georgian philosopher in his home in Tbilisi. I had been given his name by a colleague, and I just picked up the phone and called him and he invited me over for supper right away. So we chatted, quite openly, for about five hours. That couldn't have happened in Moscow I don't think.

Q: Well was there any thought at the time among you or your colleagues about the ability of this empire to hold together? I mean, were we seeing this as, you know, stretching on into the far future?

CHAPMAN: I think that really nobody foresaw in 1985 that within five or six years the Soviet Union would be gone. I think we saw it mellowing, modifying itself, perhaps introducing elements of a free market economy. I don't think we foresaw any sort of change in political structure, any change in the role of or dominance of the communist party. And I don't think we foresaw any breakup of the country.

Q: What about with the Reagan administration there and Ronald Reagan had come in from the right wing of the Republican party and was making remarks, you know, sort of off the campaign trail and all, you know, about confrontation with the Soviet Union, was this a difficult period to sort of explain to Soviet types or among ourselves at the embassy that, you know, I mean, did we feel we were on an overly confrontational course with the Soviet Union or what?

CHAPMAN: Well the phrase that really raised Soviet hackles was the term evil empire. To my recollection Reagan had uttered the phrase before I got to the Soviet Union so I wasn't in a position to gauge the immediate impact of it. Certainly amongst Soviet officialdom and the contacts we had there was strong opposition to what was seen as an effort by the Reagan administration simply to build up American military might and to ignore any dialogue with the Soviet Union aimed at reducing mutual threats and tensions. When I was out in the provinces people would ask me about this or that Reagan administration policy and challenge me to justify it. But it was not unusual to come across people who had a certain admiration for the United States. There was a dichotomy in many ordinary Soviets' minds between the American people and the American government: an admiration of and respect for Americans, for our way of life, for our entertainment industry, for the resilience and output of our economy, but a lack of understanding of – indeed outright opposition to -- what the Reagan administration was up to. Relations were by no means smooth during my first year in Moscow, but they turned considerably worse after the shootdown of Korean Airlines Flight 007 in September 1983.

The shootdown brought about a real freeze that didn't start to thaw until March of 1985 when we resumed arms control negotiations in Geneva. But during those eighteen months contacts were even more difficult than they had been before, and it was very difficult to get any sense of what was going on behind the scenes in the society and the party and the government. Although preparations for the resumption of arms control negotiations were in progress during Chernenko's watch, the coming of Gorbachev brought a sense of greater hope for U.S.-Soviet relations. There was a feeling that things were getting back onto a more even keel. But still I heard plenty of criticism of Reagan administration policies during the spring of 1985 -- the military build-up, the strategic defense initiative, the deployment of intermediate range missiles in Europe where they could reach Soviet soil.

Q: Dissidents. Did you have, was that part of your thing or did somebody else have it?

CHAPMAN: An officer in my section was responsible for contacts with dissidents.

Q: Who was that?

CHAPMAN: Jon Purnell and the George Glass. A lot of their contacts were with what were called refuseniks, most of them Jewish, who had applied for emigration and had been denied. Typically there were gatherings outside the main synagogue in Moscow on Friday evenings, and Jon or George would go down there to pick up information on individual refusenik and dissident cases. That is where we got the information for our representations to the Soviet government on human rights cases. We had indirect contact with Sakharov through his wife, Yelena Bonner, whom we would visit at her Moscow apartment from time to time.

There were other people on the dissident fringe whom we got to know, some quite closely. It was impossible to have any real social relationship a foreign ministry bureaucrat or anybody else in the Soviet apparatus. But people who were on the dissident fringe, who were not labeled as enemies of the Soviet regime as such but who had run afoul of the regime in some form or fashion and who had lost their jobs, we quite amenable to friendship with foreigners. Some of these people were strong religious believers. One particular individual that I got to know was a strong Russian nationalist as well as a devout believer, a mathematician who had been fired from his job and did manual labor helping restore the Danilovsky Monastery, now the seat of the Russian Patriarchate, while his wife held down a paying job. We would get to meet a lot of unofficial artists. A lot of these people suspected, probably correctly, that the regime was following what they were doing; but they figured that there was nothing for them to lose.

I got to know a Georgian sculptor through Alexei Yefimov, my KGB contact, and spent many pleasant social hours with him and his wife. One evening I called on the sculptor alone to find Yefimov also at the studio, and we spent several hours over some excellent Georgian dishes discussing all manner of issues in a way that was totally out of character for a Soviet official. I was openly challenging the basis of communism and the Soviet regime, and he was quite forthright and realistic in his replies. This was the one occasion I can remember of having a genuine no-holds-barred intellectual discussion with a Soviet official in which I was not simply fed the party line.

Q: Well, who was the ambassador while you were there?

CHAPMAN: Arthur Hartman. You may have seen he was recently in the news with this open letter opposing the Bolton nomination.

Q: Yes, I know. How did you work with him? I mean, was he a consumer of what you were producing?

CHAPMAN: Art Hartman was not a career Sovietologist and did not have fluent Russian, in contrast to practically every other Foreign Service ambassador we've had there. Largely because of the state of relations, he did not have easy access to senior Soviet officials. But he built up close ties within the diplomatic corps, both among western and eastern European ambassadors, and the latter in particular were good sources of information. There was generally quite a sense of camaraderie in the diplomatic corps in Moscow, extending to the Chinese among others. My internal political unit would meet periodically with our Chinese counterparts to exchange information; they were quite open and had some useful insights to share. They would regale us with magnificent banquets at the enormous Chinese embassy; we could reciprocate only with lasagna and salad at the Embassy cafeteria or at an ordinary Russian restaurant.

Hartman excelled in running the embassy and attracted some very good people. Warren Zimmerman was DCM (deputy chief of mission) for the first couple of years I was there, and then Curt Kamman, who had been the political counselor, moved up to that slot.

THOMAS MACKLIN, JR.
Russian Language Training, Foreign Service Institute
Washington, DC (1982-1983)

General Services Officer
Moscow (1983-1985)

Thomas Macklin Jr. was born in Fort Worth, Texas in October of 1935. He attended San Diego State University and majored in political science, later receiving a masters degree in history. He entered the Foreign Service in 1965 and took his first post as a Consular Officer in Amsterdam. His career took him to The Hague, Vietnam, Barbados, Israel, Russia, and Italy as well as several posts within the State Department. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in September 2000.

Q: In '82, how did you fit in? You weren't a Middle Eastern hand. You weren't administrative.

MACKLIN: I was fed up with having a separate assignment. I also had developed a real interest in going to Russia. Traditionally, Moscow has been a good place for tandems. I was really kind of interested in going to Russia. Also, I liked the Middle East. Sheldon Kryz was the executive director of NEA at the time. He came out and visited. The guy who was GSO in Tel Aviv left in the summer of '82. I left in the summer of '82. So did Dennis Jett. All three of us. So, NEA suggested to me that maybe if I wanted to move over and be GSO, Adrian could get Dennis' job and we'd still have a tandem. I said, "No." In retrospect, I probably shouldn't have. Lewis really liked me and it was an interesting place. But I said, "No." We took an assignment to Moscow. But by then, Sheldon had figured out that maybe I was okay. They were prepared to reassign me to post or something. But I really wanted to go to Moscow and I told him that. So, I did.

Q: Did you both take Russian for a year?

MACKLIN: Yes, we took a year of Russian, '82-'83. Then we went to Moscow for two years.

Q: So from '83 to '85?

MACKLIN: Yes.

Q: How did your Russian come along?

MACKLIN: It was difficult. I'm not really good at languages involving intricate grammar changes. Russian, with all of the cases and then the two track verbs and all of that, was difficult. I managed to muddle through with a 2+. But it was a very divisive year. We had a linguist, an Irene Thompson. She was writing a book and had sold the FSI hierarchy on the idea that the way she managed things, she could bring people with no Russian up to a four in the one year, 44-week period. Then she turned to us and said, "Look, we're all trying to do the best we can. The idea is to speak as much Russian as you can. If you're in a class and somebody else is having problems answering something, don't hesitate. Jump right in and answer for them. We want everybody to answer on this. I'm going to reward people who are the most verbal." So, several of the people took the hint and nobody took their turn. You can imagine what that does to the language class in the FSI hierarchy. It was a very nasty year. Then Andy Goodman and a few other people complained about her system and so she gave them really snotty training reports. It was a divisive year.

Q: What jobs did both of you have?

MACKLIN: She spent a year in the Consular Section, which was typical, and then a year as deputy science officer. I went on as GSO. Initially, I was going to go out as admin officer, as number two. Both that and the GSO job were open. Joe Hewins, who went out as the admin counselor, called me up from Belgrade and said, "Look, we had you in mind for admin officer, but Rusty Hughes also wants to go to Moscow and his wife is now an FSO and she's been assigned as an assistant GSO. I was going to make you admin and Rusty GSO, but I can't do that because of his wife. Would you be willing to switch?" Rusty and I were the same grade. I said, “Well...” He said, “You’ll report directly to me. You won’t report through the admin officer. You’ll report directly to the admin counselor. I’ll make sure you’re taken care of.” You can’t very well say, “Well, fuck you, I don’t care.” So, I said, “Okay, fine.” So, I went out as GSO, which in retrospect I think is probably a better job.

MACKLIN: In 1983, we had a brand new baby, so that complicated things a little bit, but I remember we went out there, got there in August, and then about a month later, the system was that they tried to get you out as often as they could because Moscow tended to get to people. Actually, I always liked it. I was very much at home there. One of the things they would do to get people out was, when your car, which you had shipped in, arrives in Helsinki, it was actually cheaper for the government to send you down on the train, let you spend the night or two in Helsinki, and then drive the car back to Moscow, overnighing in Leningrad along the way. That was cheaper than having the car shipped in. So, they would send people down there to drive their car back. So, we were at the Intercontinental Hotel in Helsinki and the TV was full of something about some plane crash. We could never quite figure out what it was because the Finnish is so convoluted. It was when the Russians shot down the Korean flight. The relationship turned so sour after that. Gromyko and Shultz wouldn’t even talk to each other. They just spit at each other. For at least a year until Andropov died, it was a frozen relationship. It was also at a time when the medium range missiles were being put into Western Europe-

Q: This was the SS-20 and we responded with a Pershing and Cruise missiles.

MACKLIN: Yes. So, there was a lot of acid in the system in those days. So, for the first year that we were there, we didn’t have any CODELS, we didn’t have a SecState visit, we didn’t have anything. We could just do our jobs. The Russians were very cold. There was an organization set up to deal with all the diplomats, UPDK. They were actually quite friendly to us, but very correct on anything they gave us. We needed additional housing and OFM was just getting on the ground in those days. So, we couldn’t really be reciprocal on everything. It was only partial reciprocity. But we had a major problem trying to get additional housing and trying to get them to do things. So, the relationship was really kind of tense. They never hassled us. But they hassled a lot of people at post, the KGB. Art Hartman was the ambassador. He was very good. He actually had awfully good access considering the constraints. It was a good embassy. The DCM was Warren Zimmerman. The political counselor was Curt Cameron. His deputy was Mark Paris. It was a very small embassy but very good.

Q: How did you find the embassy building?

MACKLIN: The embassy building was old and creaky. The offices were inadequate. But in those days, there was a pretty good balance between space and people, much better than there was in ‘89-’91 when we went back. Then we had real problems. But because we had a small staff, it was a pretty good balance. GSO was in the courtyard behind the embassy. The embassy building itself on the ring road was built sometime just after the war, about ‘47, and was a strong building and it had to be to withstand all those fires. There were four or five apartments in the building. There was a good snack bar in the courtyard, which turned into a nightclub at night, which was a really popular place. There were very few places to go in Moscow then and so Uncle Sam's, as the nightclub was called, was pretty popular. It was concessioned out, usually to a SEABEE who would buy the liquor and run the bar and make the profit. The concessions were re-bid every year. There were a lot of people who came to Uncle Sam's and it was the nearest thing there was to an international gathering spot.

Q: Did you show movies there, too?

MACKLIN: We had movies, but not at Uncle Sam's, which was too small. But people would do it in their apartments.

Q: Were other diplomats going to Uncle Sam's?

MACKLIN: Yes. It was mostly a young crowd, but a lot of diplomats from other missions, and the Marines... There were a couple of communicators who hated it. They hated the Russians. They hated Moscow. I found the culture fascinating because it was kind of a forbidden civilization. You couldn't just go there. I found it really fascinating, but there were people who didn't, who were xenophobic. Two of the communicators made a bet as to who could stay on the compound the longest. They lived in an apartment on the compound because you always had to have a communicator on call. They ate in the snack bar, bought food from the commissary in the basement of the building, and so they went for three or four months without ever leaving the embassy compound. When one of them finally lost, it was because Joe Hulings invited him to dinner and he couldn't get out of it. So, he lost his bet. But there was that spirit among some of the people at the mission.

Q: I can't remember... There had been a major fire there. Was that before or after you?

MACKLIN: That was before. There had been two fires before us and then a major fire... The worst fire was the second tour. We were there for that.

Q: I'm interviewing a Mr. Skoug, who was there during a big fire that took the roof off the embassy.

MACKLIN: What did he do?

Q: Was there a concern about security? You had the Sergeant Lonetree case. Did that happen while you were there?

MACKLIN: Yes. I hired the femme fatale, so I know the case quite well. One of our biggest problems in the administrative area was lack of personnel. We had a terrible lack of personnel. When I arrived, there was only one guy who cleared shipments for us. We had shipments that came into the airport. We had a biweekly train run from Helsinki, a big department store in Helsinki called Stockmans would come in with milk and perishables which we could buy at exorbitant costs and then there were land shipments that would come into the big customs house outside. There was only one guy, Anatoli, who cleared all of these shipments. There was no controlling Anatoli. He was very devious. He was extremely smart. He was always one jump ahead. He always had a valid reason for clearing the shipment that he wanted to clear. No matter how bad you wanted him to be outside of the customs house outside of town, he had a better reason for being at the airport. There was no controlling Anatoli. There was the same kind of problem with a couple of other areas in GSO. I said, "Anatoli, the problem is, we need three Anatolis so we could send one to the airport and one to the train station and one out to customs. Then everything would be covered." He said, "What we really need is a woman back here as a clerk and then an assistant for me and maybe it would be more manageable. But forget about it, because there is no office space. We tried this before. UPDK won't let us have it because there is no office space." We also needed a couple of other things – somebody to do the clerical work on customs shipments. There were two FSNs there who were known to be intelligence operatives. One was Galia, who worked for me in GSO, who had a sort of Lotte Lenya personality, very well organized, very connected, very decisive, and didn't work any bullshit with somebody she didn't like. Then Riya, who worked in Personnel, who was a tall, blond woman about 6'4". Everybody called her "Ilsa Shewolf of the SS." She was very tough. Everybody knew that they were intelligence operatives. Galia controlled the keyboard, amongst other things, and there was really no better way to do it. You had to have keys for all parts of the embassy. So, somebody would come in and say, "I need a key to the upper room in the upper annex" and she'd kind of file away who it was that asked for the key for that part of the building. Those thoughts were shared with her colleagues across the river, but I don't think...

Q: The KGB.

MACKLIN: Well, she would share it with the KGB, but I mentioned it to our Langley friends and to the NSA guy a couple of times, but they didn't seem to be bothered by it. But in any event, there were those concerns. So, it went to Hulings and said, "Look, if the problem is office space, we've got two huge containers sitting next to the GSO office that are just taking up space. They're filled with some stuff from an Austrian contractor that we used to redo kitchens and bathrooms, a guy named Golofer, and let's take those containers and get them the hell out of here and have the FSNs build their own office building. If we build a small room, you can house about four people in there and then I could hire two assistants for Anatoli and a couple of other people." I worked all of this out. He liked the idea. We went to the UPDK. They agreed to it. I had the FSNs remove... It was a project. "This is your office building. You guys build it." It was beautiful. They removed the containers. They designed the buildings, the carpenters, plumbers, they all came in. Beautiful pine floors and gingerbread outside. Lovely place. Then I was able to hire additional people and we could begin to control Anatoli. But we still needed a couple more people. I talked to Riya and Riya said, "Well, the problem now is, even though we have space, there aren't people available through the UPDK." Well, there was this one very pretty Russian girl that they had brought onboard at Spaso House. She was very cute. She worked three for about three months and we had a clerical job we had to fill. One of the clerks had quit because of something. I talked to Riya and said, "Look, we really need a clerk. We need somebody to fill that clerical vacuum. I would like to get it done before I leave." She said, "Well, I've got somebody good for you, this woman over at Spaso House. They just wanted her there for a short time and she speaks English and would be perfect." I said, "Well, let me check her out." I talked to Mrs. Hartman and she said, "Oh, she's dumb as a goddamn wall. Don't touch her with a ten foot pole." So, I went back to Riya and said, "No, I don't want her. She's no good." So, Riya said, "Well, I'll go talk to the UPDK." She came back and said, "They said there's nobody." So, it stayed that way for a couple of months. Just before I was leaving, I said to Riya, "Look, I really want to fill that job. We've got a window of opportunity." She said, "Why don't we do this? Why don't you just bring her on for three months. That establishes the position with UPDK. They recognize they've got to fill it. Then during this probationary period, we'll fire her and then we'll fill in behind." So, I talked to the personnel officer and a couple of other people. They said, "Okay," so I told Riya, "Okay." Then I was replaced by Jane Becker, who was an old friend. Jane and I agreed to meet in Frankfurt on the way out. She couldn't arrive before I left, but I met her en route. We spent a day together kind of going through everything. I told her about this babe and said, "First thing you've got to do is fire her because she is dumb as dishwater and all we wanted to do was get the position established and watch out for Riya." That was enough time. She had already made her contact with Lonetree.

Q: He was a sergeant in the Marines.

MACKLIN: Yes. The gunny sergeant's wife worked for me in GSO. I employed a lot of spouses. When I arrived, it had been a Gunny Sandabol who was a mean, nasty piece of business who was mean to everybody. To the best of my knowledge, he beat his wife, probably beat the shit out of his kids. He had a cute little kid who must have been around seven or eight and his favorite expression was, "I'll rip your lips off." All the Marines hated Gunny Sandabol because he was so hard on them. But they didn't dare step out of line because he was kind of unpredictable. He was really mean. He was replaced by a guy who was a far better manager, whose wife also worked for me in GSO. He eased up on the Marines a bit. We had the second year there a British nanny who was going with one of the Marines. Then the Marine was transferred out to Barbados. So, she started dating one of the other Marines and would occasionally spend the night at the Marine house. She said, "I wasn't the only one spending the night at the Marine house (which was located in the chancery). There are a lot of girls, Yugoslavs and other nationalities, who shack up with the Marines there." I think that's also part of the atmosphere of what happened.

Lonetree was stupid. They picked somebody who considered himself a loner. But in a way the gunny sergeant was unfairly victimized, but I don't think it would have happened under Sandabol. He'd have killed the guy. But all of that was going on at the time.

Q: Ambassador Hartman was sort of like the captain of the ship who is held responsible for this. Talking about the Marine Corps situation and having overnights staying there, that gets, particularly in an embassy, a little bit out of line, quite a bit out of line, isn't it?

MACKLIN: I think it is in the Soviet Union. The RSO was at that time a guy named Rich. He was very easygoing, not anything like the guys that we had in later tours there. If you had a British girl spend the night with one of the Marines, frankly, we knew the British girl, there was no risk there. I don't know if you get into Eastern Europeans like Yugoslavs... I think basically, it was a laxer atmosphere than was probably healthy considering the angst back here over the Soviet threat.

Hartman was a good ambassador. He took the long view. He was very bright. Matlock, who followed him, whom I also worked for, was also very good, but they were as different as salt and pepper. Matlock felt there was no detail too irrelevant to report and Hartman said, "We're out here to provide our judgment over big issues and not to try to scoop CNN. I want quality reporting. I'm not so concerned with the volume. I want to be right." And he was. I think he turned out a good product. There were good people there.

Q: Were you able to partake in the cultural life of Moscow?

MACKLIN: It was impossible to get to know Russians. They were just scared stiff of us. We had a baby and Russians love babies more than anybody I've ever met. So, you're in a park and you're all bundled up because it's cold nine months of the year and you're pushing this little kid who's all bundled up so you just see a nose, eyes, and a bit of a mouth. But that is still enough for Russians to [notice]. So, you run across other couples with babies. When they'd get a little bit older, a year and a half, or when David was almost two, take him to a little playground which was a place full of topsoil, full of glass... incredible. They used this filled dirt from God knows where. Glass all over the ground. They put up a couple of swings and that's a playground. David would play there and other kids would play there. As happens the world over, you strike up a conversation with the parents. Well, the minute they hear you talk, they know you're a westerner and close up like a clam and scoot back. They're just terrified. It was very tense.

The militia men everywhere. The police. I remember one of the communicators' wives who worked for me, they had a car and she had done something that pissed off somebody and so they took her car. She came out one day and couldn't find her car. She got on really well with the militia men who guarded that particular compound. So, she went up and said, "Look, do you have any idea where my car is?" He said, "Yes, go up about four blocks and over on the street and it's just around the corner." So, she did and it was. The single people, sometimes the KGB would come in their apartments when they weren't there and do things like leave a cigar someplace so you'd know they'd been there. If they didn't like you, when you took an R&R out of the country, they'd unplug your freezer. Pour Coca-cola into the open vents on a hi-fi system. Not a lot of it, but some.

Andropov died. Chernenko became Party Secretary. Chernenko died. Gorbachev became Party Secretary. That kind of breathed a bit of fresh air into the place. When they started having funerals, we started having people come out. George Bush came two or three times, was very amiable, spoke with the mission, was very decent. So was Shultz.

Food was uniformly terrible. You'd go to a restaurant to hear the music, so if they liked you they'd put you at a table up close to the band so you can't talk. The food takes forever to be presented. After a while, we figured out that if you really want to go out to eat, you go there ahead of time and give them some cigarettes or something and get a table way away from the band and maybe you'd get some food that was moderately edible. There were beginning to be some more liberal restaurants just as we left in '85. Nothing to write home about.

We traveled a bit. We went to Volgograd. I can tell you anecdotes about the trips, but I don't know if that's really-

MACKLIN: Ostrahan had not been reached by the German army. They were stopped about 75 miles north. We flew up. Marty McLain and Ed McWilliams and I flew into Stalingrad, Volgograd. We saw the usual stuff. Very impressive. Then we flew down to Ostrahan, which is on the inlet on the Caspian. It's where a lot of the ships start the tour of the Volga. It's a lovely old city. The Russians used to do a lot of movies there because they had a lot of these old wooden houses like "Dr. Zhivago." It was really fascinating. We flew in there in a small jet. Off to the left of the airfield was this huge field of biplanes. There must have been 200 biplanes, the kind we might use for crop dusting, just sitting there like they hadn't moved since 1914. It was a beautiful old city with old trolley tracks wandering around. They hadn't had any diplomat visit there in ages, so they didn't even have an Intourist hotel. They had a hotel. They put us up. But there was no food in it. In fact, there was not much food in the town at the time. It was late spring. They did have some chicken and some jarred pickles and stuff from Bulgaria. That was about all they could serve in the hotel. But there was a yarmaka, a fair, going on in the town. These yarmakas are places where people who have their own individual gardens come in and sell stuff. So, it was kind of fun. Marty and I bundled up. I took a lot of pictures. Somebody got the idea that I was from- (end of tape)

Somebody got the idea that I was from Russian _____, whereas normally Russians don't want to be photographed, especially by a foreign diplomat, they were all teeth (or broken teeth as the case may be). So, I got some great pictures of these people down there. It was wonderful. They had their own Kremlin down there and there was a parade going on. We went to this yarmaka and they had all kinds of nice bread, so we bought four or five little loafs and that's what we lived on for two or three days. It was really funny. It was a little bit cold. We wandered down by this Kremlin. Against the wall, there was this little Russian kid who must have been about eight years old who had a ratty soccer ball and he was kicking it against the wall just for practice. There was this very tired looking dad standing there while the kid played. I talked to him for a minute. Down there, they weren't as afraid of us. It was kind of poignant. It was really interesting. There is something universal about a dad standing there while his kid bangs the soccer ball against the wall.

So, Marty and I stayed there two or three days and had a good time and took a lot of pictures. Then the day out, we went to the airport and they lined us up. This very broad shouldered, fat old gal, about 55, when it was time to board the flight, said, "Okay, everybody on board the flight to Moscow, come with me." She had a flag and started marching across the tarmac. It's a tarmac littered with about 25 planes. When we got about half way over, the crew sees us coming and they come running down the walkway and said, "No, you can't take this plane. This plane is no good." So, the woman said, "Yes, they're assigned this plane. They've got to fly on the plane whether you like it or not." So, they get in an argument there. He said, "No, no, no, take that plane over there" about seven planes across the tarmac. So, she said, "Okay." Off we go, this line of people getting more trepidatious by the step. The same thing happens. The pilot and the stewardess see us coming and come running out, "No, no, no, this plane won't fly." So, they have an argument. So, the woman says, "Okay, follow me." So, we do an about march and she goes back to the tower, which is about two stories up. There she is with her flag shaking her fist at this tower saying, "We've got to get these people on a plane. I don't care which plane you put them on, but you've got to fly these people to Moscow." They were saying, "Well, I don't know about this plane and I don't know about that plane." So, they took us back into the waiting room and about two hours later they took us out and we went to the second plane just as if nothing had ever happened. We boarded the plane not feeling great about this. We took off and it was a wonderful, uneventful flight. Everything was fine.

MACKLIN: Yes. But whatever it was, I didn't feel great about taking that flight. This was very typical of travel in the Soviet Union.

Q: In '85, where did you and your wife go?

MACKLIN: We came back to Washington. We wanted to stay overseas, wanted another tandem assignment. As it turned out, the whole crew who had been in Moscow before us almost to the person were assigned to embassies in Western Europe. But they went there for four year assignments. So, there was no admin job, no science job, no nothing. It was really pretty dismal. So, they offered me a bunch of things. Finally I agreed to be the executive director of the Medical Division, which was a big mistake. Adrian was offered a job in OES and went to OES and did okay. We left in '85, came back to Washington. I was actually offered Nicosia, which in retrospect, I should have taken, but I didn't. There was no job for her. But it was probably a mistake on my side, but not on her side.

RICHARD T. MCCORMACK
Assistant Secretary for Economics and Business Affairs/Under Secretary
Washington, DC (1982-1985)

After attending Georgetown University, Mr. Richard T. McCormack assumed a multitude of administrative roles for the Nixon Administration in addition to serving under Governor William Scranton of Pennsylvania and Senator Jesse Helms of North Carolina. Mr. McCormack's career also included positions as the US Ambassador to the Organization of American States as well as Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs. Ambassador McCormack was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: Could you explain the relationship shifts during this time, from 1982 on. I mean here you have Assistant Secretary for Economics attached to your name, then you have an Under Secretary of Economics attached to it. Who did what and why?

McCORMACK: The Under Secretary tended to concentrate on a few key issues and on broad supervision. Both of us reported to the Secretary of State.

Q: You both did?

McCORMACK: We both did. We had a regular separate meeting with the Secretary of State.

Q: Was this how George Shultz ran things? Was this true of Bureau Affairs and Central American Affairs?

McCORMACK: We had a regular staff meeting at the Assistant Secretary-level with George Shultz every morning. Wallace was not present at that meeting. Then he would have a meeting with Wallace and some of the Under Secretaries. But as you well know, the Assistant Secretary has hundreds of people who report to him. The Under Secretary has a staff of five or six people. So one is a big operating job where you have to keep track of everything from airline negotiations to oil prices to all these other microeconomic problems, while the Under Secretary tends to concentrate on a few major issues. Now in the case of Wallace, we worked well together on 90% of the issues that we dealt with. I attended his staff meetings from time to time. I would go to his office, and we would sit and chew the fat for an hour and a half every few weeks so he would get some sense of what I was trying to do, what my problems were, and what was happening with the Treasury Department. Then we would have regular meetings with our peers from the Treasury Department: the Under Secretary and the Assistant Secretary. The State Department and the Treasury Department totally coordinated every issue. This interdepartmental cooperation was unique in the time I have served in Washington. There was absolutely no space between state and treasury. We sat together; we planned the issues together. We addressed problems together. They had no secrets from us, and we had no secrets from them.

Q: Who was the Secretary of the Treasury?

McCORMACK: Don Regan was the Treasury Secretary, Beryl Sprinkel was the Under Secretary, and Marc Leland was the Assistant Secretary. We met regularly, the four of us over lunch, to work through our issues.

Q: Of the top bodies, you have state, defense, and treasury. You didn't have that relationship if you want to call it that, between Shultz and Weinberger.

McCORMACK: That involved the Pentagon. There is inherent tension between defense and state on some issues. They have different portfolios and different perspectives. Both Shultz and Weinberger were strong able men who viewed things somewhat differently. I had one slice of the Pentagon issue, which was East-West trade. This was at a time when we were trying to squeeze the Soviets in a variety of ways. In this case, we were trying to deprive them of as much high technology as we could. This was a controversial policy. The whole area of tighter export controls was a controversial policy.

When I became the Assistant Secretary, I had a person who was in charge of the East-West trade area who lost my confidence when he strongly supported a computer sale to China, claiming it was associated with weather research. I eventually had my special assistant check this issue out carefully, and it turned out that this was the computer that was used in one of the major nuclear arsenals in the United States to develop nuclear warhead design. The building in China where they design nuclear warheads was right next to the building where this computer, the High Share 700, was to be located. It was very clear that this computer was ordered to help the Chinese develop their nuclear warheads. My special assistant, a former sugar broker, was able to dig this information out. When the office director in charge of this issue missed all this, I lost confidence in him and brought in someone from the outside to handle these complex issues. Thereafter we worked more effectively with the Pentagon.

Q: All right, 1982, you are Assistant Secretary for Economics and Business Affairs. In the first place how did you divide business and economics? What is the difference?

McCORMACK: It is a seamless web. You make your business decision within the context of sound economic policies. If you don't have some sense of macroeconomics, you will not be in a position to make intelligent recommendations on some other matters. So economics and business come together. You recall that during the previous Carter administration, there was a wheat embargo against the Soviet Union, which caused tremendous devastation in American agriculture.

Q: That was Carter in reaction to the Afghan invasion.

McCORMACK: Yes. We lost markets; other people moved into those markets. It was viewed in the U.S. farm community as a tremendous fiasco, and it did cause major damage in the American farm economy. The farm economy had expanded to serve what they thought was going to be permanent markets in the Soviet Union. Many farmers bought large farms and expensive machinery. Suddenly that market was eliminated. Grain prices fell. It caused a crisis in large parts of the farm community. So I made it my business to try to improve the relationship of the State Department with the American agricultural community. They had blamed the State Department for the decision on these earlier actions. So I traveled extensively with Jack Block, the Secretary of Agriculture, around the world to increase the sales of American agricultural products in all kinds of areas. But I also went with the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Commerce for other reasons. Whenever a Secretary travels, he interacts with senior Ministers in foreign governments. If I knew the Secretary of Commerce was making a trip to certain places, I would sometimes arrange to go on that trip. Then I would also get in to see key Ministers. The Secretary of Commerce would do his business, and I could do mine on behalf of the State Department or White House. Some of these visits turned out to be of immense importance.

Q: How so?

McCORMACK: Well let me give you an example. You will recall there was a time when we had a foreign policy catastrophe in Iran when Khomeini took power. Our Embassy was seized.

Q: 1979 through 1980, just around the corner.

McCORMACK: Yes, but a very large underground Tudeh Party, the communist party in Iran, was still lurking. In the intel material was some suggestion that, just as the Soviets had come into Afghanistan to consolidate a friendly communist government, there was some concern that there were elements of the Tudeh Party that might also be contemplating a coup if conditions ripened. Then the Soviets could potentially come in and consolidate that operation. Iran was an important country, much more so than Afghanistan. The reverses then being suffered by Iran in the war with Iraq potentially increased the regime's vulnerabilities in Tehran. The Russians also had historical territorial ambitions in the upper part of Iran. There was also some concern about that. Thus when Secretary Block was planning a trip to the Middle East, I arranged to accompany him.

Q: Secretary Block being...

McCORMACK: Secretary of Agriculture, Jack Block. We went to see Mubarak in Egypt, Crown Prince Abdullah in Saudi Arabia, and the Prime Minister of Turkey.

Abdullah was the Saudi Crown Prince, and would later become King when Fahd died. He was the chief operating officer at the time, similar to a Prime Minister. At each one of these stops I said that I was having concerns about what might happen eventually in Tehran with the Tudeh Party. I mentioned this to Mubarak and Abdullah. When we arrived in Turkey, I also raised the Tudeh concern. The Prime Minister banged his fist on the table and said, "I am picking up exactly the same things. Furthermore, one quarter of the people in Iran are of Turkish origin. We have contacts all through their system. I am hearing this from our people. It is time to do something about this. It is potentially very dangerous." So I flew back to Washington. Well about a month after that, there was a huge purge of the Tudeh Party by Khomeini's people. All the top leadership was arrested, and we ceased to hear any more about the Tudeh Party.

Q: You kicked off a night of long knives.

McCORMACK: In fact we no longer heard plans by anyone to stage a coup in Tehran. I am sure that the fact that the Prime Minister of Turkey also had independently confirmed our suspicions was the important factor. They went ahead independently and dealt with the problem. Possibly Khomeini's people themselves picked up some of the Tudeh people, questioned them, and confirmed it themselves. They went after the whole bunch. Who knows what all happened? I moved on to other issues. But you asked why some of these trips were valuable, that was an example.

Another valuable trip that I took was a trip to China with Secretary of Commerce Baldrige. As part of our global strategy to deal with the Soviet Union, we were trying in every way possible way to put pressure on the Soviets to force them to spend, spend, spend and spend. This was, of course, one of the reasons behind the Reagan idea for Star Wars. We knew they were struggling financially. The President felt because we were in a position to spend more, and if it got into a spending contest, the U.S. could crack the USSR economy. That was the core strategy of President Reagan.

Q: Was that pronounced at the time, or was it ex post facto?

McCORMACK: It was pronounced at the time. Ambassador Vernon Walters' book and papers confirm that in great detail. Dick Walters was present at early meetings with Reagan when this was discussed. It is a matter of record. There are, of course, those who will deny this happened because they don't really want to recognize the fact that there was some relationship between the Reagan strategy and what happened in the USSR. But the truth is Reagan set out with this strategy in mind. I know that as an absolute fact.

The question was what role might China play in this strategy. When Reagan came into power, he had a very close relationship with the Taiwanese both for ideological reasons and for other reasons. The mainland Chinese were wondering whether the old Nixon policy was dead. However, some of us felt that China could play a role and that there was some advantage in pursuing the Nixon opening. I certainly felt that way. I went to see former President Nixon with whom I had a personal relationship from years past to talk about China strategy. We both believed the U.S. needed to increase export of dual use technologies to China. This later became U.S. policy. But the policy change required a trip to China. We proposed to sell dual use technology to China with the exception of three critical mission areas, one of them having to do with the development of nuclear weapons, one associated with sensitive communications technologies, and another with submarines. Those were the three mission areas where we would not let any relevant dual use technology go to China.

Q: What about the White House? This was the time when you had Ollie North and others. I mean later the White House became the NSC, and other parts of the White House became a real problem. One had the feeling that sometimes the President was being treated as almost a figurehead, and there were battles within the White House staff. How did you find that?

McCORMACK: It is important to understand that the President provided the strategic direction. The major policy execution was directed by presidential decision memos. Of course, I was at the State Department. I would be invited to White House meetings. The arrangement in those days was that only political appointees could participate in cabinet council meetings at the White House. That was done so that the President's agenda would be formed and executed. If there were no political appointees available for a meeting, then there was no State Department representation. There was a divergence of view between the Reagan White House and the earlier State Department view from the Cy Vance period on handling East-West issues. That division was mirrored in parts of the career ranks.

Q: You say Cy Vance?

McCORMACK: Former Secretary of State Cyrus Vance under President Carter. As you probably know, there were some people in the State Department from the Vance period who believed that the convergence theory was the way to deal with tension with the Soviet Union. Our policies would become more like theirs, their policies would become more like ours, and then we would eventually ride off into the sunset together. This is an oversimplification, but that was basically what was called the convergence theory.

Some of us thought this theory was complete rubbish. That was certainly the White House view. We believed that the only way to deal with the Soviet Union was to go back to the programs we used successfully in the 1950s, which worked to contain Soviet aggression when they were moving aggressively at that time: rebuild the CIA, rebuild USIA, and rebuild the ability to operate with muscle and money in the third world. There would not be any more cheap Soviet third world victories. This policy clash obviously resulted in a lot of broken crockery.

When Al Haig came to the Department, the career people who had been working hard to carry out Secretary Vance's general perspective on the Soviet Union were still in position. During the transition period, some opposed the shifting of policy. There was some White House uncertainty over whether State Department career ranks would in fact support a muscular U.S. strategy or attempt to sabotage it. Everybody knew this was going to be a difficult and risky business. We had lost one country after another to communism during the 1970's: Nicaragua, Cambodia, Laos, South Vietnam, Angola, Ethiopia, Afghanistan.

The Soviets and their communist allies were on the march in the third world and elsewhere. President Reagan felt that they needed to be contained and driven back. People remembered that Lenin had earlier said the way to undermine the U.S. was to destabilize Mexico and then work with leftist Mexicans to destabilize the U.S. That was Lenin's comments in 1921. There was now concern that Nicaragua would then be used to subvert El Salvador. Then Guatemala would fall and be used to destabilize Mexico. Wars were raging in all three Central American countries, supported by Moscow and Cuba.

Shultz was an outstanding economist and a person of immense integrity and decency. Some in the White House didn't believe that Shultz was as convinced as the President that a muscular approach to all this was the correct path. There was some tension between the Secretary of State and the President at that time, and between the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, and the CIA Director William Casey. When there is a little tension at the top, it sometimes resonates in exaggerated form down in the lower ranks. I was perceived in the Department, and I was, in fact, a White House person. I had been one of the original authors of the President's strategy to deal with the Soviets' 1970s expansion program in the article that I cited earlier. Obviously since I was one of the policy authors, I was supportive of the strategy. I was also a friend of the National Security Advisor, Bill Clark, as well as the Deputy National Security Advisor, Admiral Nance, the chief economic advisor in the National Security Council, Norman Bailey, and others. I had very little to do with Ollie North. My chief relations were with those three key men and their immediate staffs. But it was a time of turmoil.

Q: Let's talk about trade with the Soviet Union or their satellites. Let's say you want to sell a powerful computer. Some in Congress are all for it; the Pentagon is all against it, and the State Department ends up in the middle trying to figure out what to do. Did you find yourself running into that?

McCORMACK: Yes, occasionally. You just have to try to make the decisions based on the criteria I mentioned before. What is in the broad interest of the United States? Is this, in fact, a piece of technology that is unique and militarily relevant? Is it something that you can buy off the shelf somewhere else? Are you just gratuitously denying an American company the opportunity to export something that can and will be bought from somebody else? Is COCOM still a meaningful operation and if not how can we make it meaningful? (We, in fact, strengthened COCOM in the course of the time I was there, and it contributed to the growing strains on the Soviet economy.)

Q: Were you there during the Toshiba business, the super quiet submarine propellers sold to Russia?

McCORMACK: Yes. Very often Japanese business interests were trying to make a buck, just like Austrian, Swiss, German, French and everybody else. If they thought they could sneak a piece of valuable technology through the system without getting picked up by the COCOM enforcers, sometimes they would do that. Sometimes one had to deal with violators in a firm way. There was one time before I came into office, during the Carter administration, where one particular company abroad wanted to sell a highly advanced submersible illegally to the Soviet Union. There was difficulty in stopping the sale in time. A covert operation was therefore mounted to puncture and weaken the vehicle on the shipping dock so that when it was eventually delivered and used, it was only used once. That was all Cold War stuff.

Q: How was our relationship with the growing European Union during this time? In many ways, talking about how we developed Japan after the war, the European Union was considered a bright star of our policy. But were we beginning to get worried about this?

McCORMACK: No. We had our innumerable little commercial competitions such as the one between Airbus and Boeing. We didn't like the fact that they were subsidizing Airbus, and they didn't like the fact that our defense contracts, they thought, were subsidizing Boeing. So we hacked away at each other a bit on those issues. The issue that caused the main strain with the Europeans was an issue that I was not involved with: the deployment of nuclear armed missiles, Pershing missiles and things like that, to counter the growing Soviet nuclear buildup aimed at neutralizing Western Europe.

Q: It was the SS-20.

McCORMACK: That's right.

Q: You weren't at that time seeing the growing European Economic Community as an economic competitor, we had better watch out for them, or something like that?

McCORMACK: Hell no. Bear in mind our policy was aimed at generating economic growth worldwide. We wanted to see prosperity worldwide. We didn't like the idea of starving children. We didn't like the idea of countries in such destitution that they were potential victims of communism. At the end of WWII, we set out to spread prosperity around the world, and we achieved prosperity around the world. That is our post-war crowning glory, my friend, our crowning glory. Was I happy that I could see Europe becoming more prosperous? Yes. Did we have trade disputes? Of course we had trade disputes, but in the context of a strong and positive relationship across the Atlantic. One of the reasons why I am so troubled now is that we have serious Mideast-related problems with our European friends. We are going to have to work to rebuild these relationships.

ROBERT E. MCCARTHY

Leningrad (1983-1984)

Mr. McCarthy was born in Canada and raised in New York City. He was educated at Fordham University, City College of New York and American University. After service in the US Army and studies in Paris, he joined the Foreign Service in 1973. His assignment in the Bureau of Education and Cultural Affairs was the beginning of a career dealing primarily with Public and Cultural Affairs with USIA. His overseas assignments as Public Affairs and/or Cultural Affairs Officer were in Belgrade, Moscow (twice), Montenegro, Leningrad and Budapest. His Washington assignments also concerned USIA programs. Mr. McCarthy served as Diplomat in Residence at Georgetown University 1995-1996. Mr. McCarthy was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2003.

Q: When you left Moscow, you went to, well we're talking about Leningrad in those days...

McCARTHY: Right.

Q: What was the difference from your feeling between the two cities?

McCARTHY: On the one hand, St. Petersburg, Leningrad was more open, slightly more cosmopolitan... not more cosmopolitan, I'll take that back... more open to the West in a sense. But the authorities there wanted to show that they were more Catholic than the Pope. So they would harass the scholars and exchangees, and one of your responsibilities was counseling them, having them over, intervening on their behalf. I remember a consular officer meeting with a dissident lawyer, and when he came out of the meeting, the consular officer was assaulted, I mean physically assaulted. Again the administration was making a point.

It was a smaller operation as well. The real creative juices were flowing in Moscow in terms of theater productions and things like that. But you could do things. Our approach in St. Petersburg was similar to what we did in Moscow. We had the consul general's residence as a culture center of sorts. So, for example, we had a graphics art exhibit, curated by the State University of New York, in Albany. We brought it into Leningrad, professionally curated, labeled the works and hung them in the residence. This was Ray Benson's brainchild, by the way. We had special showings, and at any event in the residence - say Pearl Bailey - guests could also see the art. We had access to institutions there. Dick Callner, the curator of the SUNY exhibit, came and had a discussion/slide show for professional staff at the Hermitage on current trends in American art. As long as it didn't attract a whole lot of attention, you could do things. We had programs at the conservatory. We had what we used to call Cultural Ambassadors, Nancy Weems, for example, was resident there for some weeks and gave master classes. We brought in a judge to talk to law students. We could arrange all those things through the right contacts.

I would say it might be a little harder there than Moscow, and you didn't have quite the same support. It was a smaller staff, you know, one American officer, an American secretary, and several local employees to do the public diplomacy work, whereas in Moscow you would had a public affairs officer, a cultural affairs officer, an executive officer, assistant information officers, and assistant cultural affairs officers. A big operation. And the Leningrad consular district was responsible for the Baltic states, of course. And there the difference was profound. When I traveled out to Lithuania, I visited a teacher-training institute and they with me normally, served coffee, and just chatted. By contrast, when I went to a similar institute in Leningrad, they were deathly afraid, as though I was going to reach across the table and steal their souls somehow. By this time, when I was in Leningrad, this whole intermediate nuclear range issue in Europe...

Q: The SS-20...

McCARTHY: Exactly. The SS-20 and the Pershing/cruise missile response. Absent an agreement, NATO was going to install those missiles. So the Soviets were intentionally feeding the rumor mill that this was putting us on the brink of war, this was exceptionally dangerous, the Americans were crazy, Reagan was a war monger, etc., etc. So this complicated things.

Q: Who was your consul general in Leningrad?

McCARTHY: First of all, it was Bill Shin. And then Charlie McGee.

Q: Did we have much contact with students and faculties in either place?

McCARTHY: Yes, we had. And there was a tradition of that. Let me just back up a second. The exchange of students and young faculty members, Ph.D. students, began around 1959 or so with the er-university Committee on Travel Grants based at Indiana University. Soon the responsibility passed to another organization, the International Research and Exchanges Board, IREX, a non-profit organization. They administered this program that was funded through the Bureau of Education and Cultural Affairs. There was an overarching U.S.-U.S.S.R. bilateral agreement that covered these exchanges, and every two years you'd sit down and negotiate a more specific two-year protocol. I participated in several of these, and it's very detailed and a bit tedious - how many visitors will we have, and how many performing arts groups, and what are the provisions for having somebody lecture?, etc., etc. All during that time we had contact with students and faculty, partly by virtue of the exchange program. When the bilateral exchanges agreement lapsed after Afghanistan, you would think, "Well, probably these educational/cultural exchanges will end, too." But they didn't. Everybody just looked the other way, and IREX continued to manage these exchanges of scholars and students, and in the Soviet Union we continued to be involved. Those scholars and students were in St. Petersburg/Leningrad, and they were in Moscow. Particularly in Leningrad, we had quite a bit of contact with them. We were trying to help them with their access to archives. We tried to cheer them up, invite them over, and give them advice. One of them may still be wearing my old U.S. army overcoat.

Q: At the time... this was a time of sort of almost the last gasp of the Soviet Union. Correct me if I'm wrong, but as I see it, the last gasp of the Soviet Union trying to make a major push toward the West with these intermediate-range rockets and all, trying to split essentially Europe off from the United States. In the Soviet Union, was there concern that this thing might get out of hand, or was this just another part of the old game that had been played for years?

McCARTHY: You mean concern on the part of the...

Q: Yourself, and also was this affecting, were you reading this into the Soviet populace?

McCARTHY: They certainly were more worried. The people who you associated with before were worried about conflict. Yes. So it did have an impact. And then every American visitor got a dose of this to bring back... People were genuinely nervous. This was a time of last gasps. You know, Brezhnev died, and the city closed down. There were lines of people going through the street. An army division was mobilized. And then you had Andropov for a while, and he died, and then you had Chernenko. I left before he died, but he was already, as you said in the "last gasp" phase. Last gasp is an appropriate term, since he had emphysema and he could hardly breathe when he speaking in public.

Q: I think it was Ronald Reagan who made the remark saying, "Why don't you have better contact with the Soviets?" "Well, they keep dying on us." [laughter]

McCARTHY: [laughter] The time of funerals.

Q: When Brezhnev went, was there concern? He'd been around a long time.

McCARTHY: It wasn't like the accounts you read of Stalin's death - despair, panic. When Brezhnev died, there were long lines of people to go into that trade union hall and observe the body lying in state. It was a major production. I was there for quite some time, since there was press coverage and we were working with the American press. There was also extensive television coverage...speeches...the actual burial.. But I don't recall any real concern.

Q: Well, you spent, what, three years in the Soviet Union?

McCARTHY: Right.

NADIA TONGOUR
Washington, DC (1983-1985)

Nadia Tongour was born in Turkey and raised in South Carolina. She was educated at William and Mary and Stanford Universities and taught at several colleges before joining the Foreign Service in 1980. Primarily a Political Officer, her Washington assignments were in the fields of Soviet and Soviet bloc Affairs as well as Democracy, Human Rights and Labor. Her foreign assignments include Brazil, Barbados and St. George's Grenada, where she was Principal Officer. Ms. Tongour was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

Q: So you were on the Soviet desk from '83 to when?

TONGOUR: To mid '85.

Q: Well do you want to talk about in the first place, how the Soviet desk was constituted and then we will talk about what you were covering, the developments.

TONGOUR: Actually, I served on the so-called Soviet desk twice, and each tour was quite different. In my first assignment, there were at least four distinct offices under the umbrella of the Soviet Desk. One of these dealt with bilateral relations, which was the office I worked in; another focused on multilateral affairs. A third covered scientific issues, and the fourth, I think, focused on educational and exchange programs. And, of course, there was a small Front Office, then headed by an outstanding Director, named Tom Simons.

He had an excellent career in the Soviet/East European area, including a stint as Ambassador to Poland. I've lost track of him but initially after retiring, he spent some time at Stanford. I had a lot of respect for him, but he definitely came from the traditional Foreign Service background. I think his father had been a diplomat as well, and Tom himself had gone to ivy league schools -- Princeton and Harvard I think. So he could be described as being of the old guard. Yet, that said, there was no chore beneath him. If someone needed to dump ashtrays, make copies, or bring in additional chairs for a meeting, he was perfectly willing to help out. So, he represented a super intelligent, big picture thinker who at the same time was able to do whatever needed to be done. In short an excellent boss. Fortunately, my section chief was outstanding as well. As for my own responsibilities, they were somewhat mixed. I had to deal both with security issues, particularly as related to the New Office Building (NOB) being built in Moscow and with questions involving dissidents, particularly religious dissidents. It was an odd mesh.

Q: But both very important at the time.

TONGOUR: That they were. My work also often included many things that did not fall neatly into any one category but were fascinating all the same. But in the case of security, the issue of most critical importance then and subsequently had to do with listening devices and bugs planted in our new compound in Moscow; we were both conscious of these and very concerned about what needed to be do. Obviously, this is a sensitive topic about which I really can't say very much.

Q: Well, at that time, I mean, we were building a new embassy.

TONGOUR: That is right.

Q: And the place was just riddled with listening devices. Was this public knowledge at the time?

TONGOUR: This was a key. It was not public knowledge at that time but became so two or three years later and various congressmen were outraged. Unfortunately, they were under the mistaken impression that the State Department had been in the dark about this. We were well aware of the problem. However, there were differing views within the interagency community as to the best course of action. Does one wait until the building is completed and then take them out or do so piece meal, etc ?. There were various schools of thought on the matter and on policy implications vis-a-vis our relationship with the Soviets. .

There were other issues as well, including the treatment of dissident minority groups. And there was a case I personally got involved with concerning a young would-be defector. The young man was the teen-age son of a high ranking diplomat who was due to return to Moscow. The kid did not want to return to the Soviet Union with his parents..

Q: He was quite young, was he not?

TONGOUR: Yes, he was about 14 or 15 -- I no longer remember his exact age. In any case, he ran away -- to an American friend's home as I recall -- but eventually Soviet Embassy officials "nabbed" with the intention of sending him swiftly back to Moscow. For our part, we tried to submit demarches advising the Soviets not to put the boy on a plane before we had had a chance to ascertain his intentions. Otherwise, we knew that there could be horrible repercussions, not only with regard to human rights concerns but also in terms of our bilateral relationship. But, the Embassy officially refused to accept our demarches. We seemed to be in a stalemate. My supervisor at the time, the Deputy Office Director Lynn Pascoe asked me whether my Russian was good enough to talk to the guard at the Soviet Embassy. After I indicated that it was probably adequate, he asked me to go to the Embassy that evening with a document in hand and essentially insist on giving it to the guard. This, obviously, is not the way demarches are normally delivered. However, I was told that since it was critical that we deliver our message, if it required sliding it under the door, I should do so. I'm sure I was on camera at the old Russian Embassy on 16th Street, where a car dropped me off. After ringing the bell, I spoke with the night guard, telling him I had to leave a document. He clearly did not know what to do with it but eventually took the paper which basically outlined our position -- our insistence on interviewing the boy. In the end, they did grant us permission to talk to him at Dulles Airport to ensure that he was returning to the Soviet Union voluntarily. Who knows what he really wanted, but when our then Assistant Secretary for European Affairs -- the case had reached that level -- Richard Burt interviewed him, he said he wanted to go home.

Q: Well, you know, when you are talking about a 14 or 15 year old kid who is having disputes with his family, you know, it is sort of without question, of course you are going to let him, I mean, you know, you just cannot turn this into something but how do-

TONGOUR: How to avoid the adverse publicity and the problem of public perception that the U.S. Government was sending a kid back to "those commies". It was still the Cold War era after all, and official relations remained somewhat chilly. There is a problem of the public at large saying by God, you are sending a kid back to those communists. It was still a Cold War era.

Q: We had this with, Elian Gonzalez.

TONGOUR: The Cuban kid.

Q: The Cuban kid, where his father was in Cuba and wanted him back and the kid was eight or nine years old and the Cuban American community tried to turn him into a saint or something like that. At a certain point you just realize this humanity and all this; unless you can talk about being really an abusive thing and then you turn it over to the authorities of the country. But it was tricky.

TONGOUR: It really was tricky. And, we were of more than two minds about what was the best approach. From the standpoint of the family, it was best that the son return to the Soviet Union with the family; moreover, as the son of a high-ranking diplomat, he would probably not confront serious repercussions. Undoubtedly, this whole episode had a negative impact on the father's subsequent career. I don't think he secured any other high level postings abroad. Plus, based on later reports, it seems the son had a difficult time readjusting to life in his homeland. In the end, we were all of two or three minds as we watched the kid board the plane and fly off to Moscow.

But it was an interesting, albeit tense, . I stress this now because years later, when I had a second stint on the Soviet Desk, the atmosphere was very different, and the relationship had clearly improved between my first and second tours on the Desk. One final aspect of my first such tour warrant mention, namely that I somehow also had the role of "logistics" person in the office, and as such wound up putting together a lot of the preparatory materials for a visit by Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko to Washington. Because of the heretofore icy relations combined with factors such as the Soviets shooting down a KAL flight, there had not been an "official" visit by the Soviet Foreign Minister to Washington in years. So we had not "SOP" (standard operating procedures) for the Desk/European Bureau should deal with the visit. So it fell to me to prepare a step-by-step manual concerning who did what -- who went to the airport, took part in events, etc. Obviously, the Protocol Office had its own materials but this was in-house for us. It turns out that my handiwork, this manual, was used by the Soviet Desk for a number of subsequent high-ranking visits.

Q: Let us talk about the religious dissidents and all. Were the Pentecostals still in the embassy at the time?

TONGOUR: Yes. There were still one or two Pentecostals living in the Embassy. This had been a very hot issue for some time, but was starting to be less of a point of contention by this time. Yet, the question of "what is to be done" remained. The real issue then was how to assist genuine religious dissidents while simultaneously preventing a horde of people from seeking refuge or camping out in the Embassy basement.

Q: Well what- this '85, it was '83 to '85 period?

TONGOUR: Yes.

Q: What was the situation in the Soviet Union? I mean, how would you describe relations at that time?

TONGOUR: Relations were cool (even icy at times) and references such as the "Evil Empire" didn't help. At the same time, it was a period of flux, even opportunity, wherein Foreign Service Officer, such as our Office Director Tom Simons and the staff as a whole, looked for ways to melt the ice, if you will. This set the stage for the "that" that would occur a few years late, with Reagan-Gorbachev.

Q: But Gorbachev- we were still going through the Andropov, Chernenko; I mean, leaders were dying.

TONGOUR: That is right. What I mean by setting the stage is that there were people in the U.G. Government focusing on how and when to get beyond the horrible time when I said set the stage, there were people already thinking, in the U.S. Government, about how and when and how to get beyond the seemingly horrible relations of the day. And of course, arms control issues that were very much uppermost in the minds of our leadership, as I am sure they were Soviet priorities as well. Other hot button issues included the broad range of human rights and dissident concerns, including a variety of non-religious dissident cases, which I personally did not handle.

Q: Well, did you get involved, I mean, was there sort of a dissidence of religious- was there a Jewish cast to it or was this almost separate?

TONGOUR: That was basically separate. There was certainly a Jewish orientation in the work of the office related to emigrants from the former Soviet union, especially in the late 70s when many of the so-called Refuseniks were starting to leave, but I was there only at the tail end of that migration. By the early-to-mid 80s, we were focusing on more esoteric groups, whereas the Jewish groups were already being cared for by a number of different Offices at State as well as nongovernmental organizations. .

Q: Did you get any feel for the White House, the National Security Council dealing with this? I mean, was there- was this still the period where sort of President Reagan and his group, he came out of the pretty far right of the Republican Party and obviously extremely suspicious of the Soviet Union; was that still prevailing or were things beginning to change? Did you get any feel for this?

TONGOUR: I definitely got the feeling that they were still very, very conservative. But at the same time, folks on the Soviet Desk and elsewhere in the bureaucracy were furiously writing all sorts of briefing papers and memos aimed at chipping away at the ice and looking for ways to open up the dialog and the minds of those in charge.

Q: Well, when you are dealing with religion, did Islam, _____ of the Central Asian area and all, did that play any role in what you were thinking at the time or was it pretty much-

TONGOUR: To start with, there were several of us working on various aspects of the dissidents issue. In general, we gave little thought at that point to questions related to Islam. Later when I returned for a second tour on the Soviet Desk, this was a much more significant variable. But that was later, and while during this period there was an officer in our section that focused more on regional minorities, I concentrated more on the Pentecostals and other minority religious sects out in Siberia and the Far East. .

Q: Did you feel a bit like the new kid on the block, being at the Soviet- I mean, obviously you had had this background but at the same time you would have had people who had been dealing with this their entire careers and then all of a sudden you are plunked in there; how did you feel about it?

TONGOUR: No, I never felt that on the Soviet Desk (SOV). SOV behaved very much as a family and you really weren't included unless you more or less arrived with a certain predisposition or educational background. Not that it was overly tight or exclusive, but rather it tended to be self-selecting with most of the people in the office having advanced degrees in either Russian history or politics, and they all knew Russia. My background certainly fit the mold. There were definitely people that had been working these issues for years but they did not make one feel inadequate or inferior. That said, I recall early on attending a Foreign Buildings Office (FBO) meeting where a big hulking guy briefed me about building security in Moscow. I saw a look on his face that seemed to signify "what is this young thing going to understand about building security, and why on earth did they send her to me?" In turn, I became very determined to prove to him that I could climb the scaffolding, if need be, when I visited the NOB and that I could learn the vocabulary of the building trade.

Q: Did you have, I mean, the fact that you came out of the visa line into the Soviet- did you have a mentor or somebody who was, that you felt was kind of, you know, plucked you out and looking after you?

TONGOUR: Yes, actually several people, one of which was someone who eventually became my supervisor on the Soviet desk who has worked in this field and has a fascinating story of how the Foreign Service works by the name of Jim Schumaker.

TONGOUR: Jim is roughly my age. He entered the Foreign Service after college and rose rapidly in the system. And after having served for twenty-something years and reaches the senior rank of OC quite early confronts the situation of being 47 or 48 and not yet promoted from OC to MC in the requisite amount of time. Having spent most of his career working on the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, plus a tour in Afghanistan, he was clearly passionately committed to working in the region. Yet, suddenly he was faced with being "ticked out", meaning too much time spent in a particular "grade", before he was even 50. Ironically, he was essentially willing to work for next to nothing, so committed was he to the Foreign Service. But the Department really couldn't allow that. Well, Jim demonstrated incredible ingenuity by simply re-taking the Foreign Service Exam. He had already held a number of senior positions, including Deputy Chief of Mission. Needless to say, he passed. When time came for his oral, half the panel had to recuse themselves because they knew him. He passed the oral as well. This created serious issues for the Department's personnel officers, raising questions about what to do with him and whether to re-admit him into the Foreign Service and at what rank. Eventually, they found a diplomatic solution, allowing him to fill in as needed in the former Soviet world. For example, he served as Acting Consul General in Vladivostok for some months during a staffing gap. He filled in elsewhere -- Moscow and Kiev -- as well. Basically, he served as a WAE without exactly being retired. .

Q: WAE is-

TONGOUR: I am sorry. It means "when actually employed".

Q: Which is what we use retirees for to put them on part-time work.

TONGOUR: That is right. I do not know what category they put him in but they used his services for several years. Most recently he went to work for the OSCE (Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe) back in Kiev, once again working in the same general area. I go into all that because he is someone who had been totally committed to first, the Foreign Service, and secondly to serving in the area of the former Soviet Union. And he was the Section Chief for the unit I worked in during my first tour in SOV. When a year into my tour there was an announcement that Roz Ridgeway, who was to be the next Assistant Secretary of State for Europe, was looking for a mid-level assistant, Jim, my friend and mentor, recommended me because he thought I had the requisite skills. I interviewed for that position and got it. And that certainly helped me obtain other positions down the road. Tom Simons also was very helpful. In such a close knit group, people were protective of their own and very helpful to them.

Q: Well, how long were you working with Roz Ridgeway?

TONGOUR: Originally, the assignment was supposed to last one year but it turned into an 18-month tour. The standard length for such Special or Executive Assistant positions was one year. But after I had been on the job a few months, Ambassador Ridgeway asked me to stay on a little longer because we had hardly gotten into the swing of working together; so I did stay on, and it was a fascinating experience.

Q: Let's talk about Roz Ridgeway, whom I have interviewed? How did you find her and her way of operating?

TONGOUR: I liked her very much. She would be the first to admit that even having been an ambassador twice and then an Assistant Secretary, she had never had a female Special Assistant until then. And she once admitted to me the difficulty of knowing exactly how to interact because at times, especially when we traveled together, it was easy for her to simply regard me as a friend. At the same time, however, she recognized that I was her staffer, and she was used to having men as staffers, except in purely secretarial roles. So, she had to grapple with the gender issue as well.

I imagine there was a certain ambivalence on her part towards the situation. I remember once during one of our trips to Europe we wound up going to dinner and having a very open and personal conversation. I suspect that she might well have later thought that this wasn't an appropriate interaction with a staffer. She was a bit more distant subsequently. So, there was a bit of "push-pull" that way, but the relationship was certainly amicable and an wonderful learning experience for me.

Q: Okay. What were some of the things you were seeing being done during this period?

TONGOUR: Well, this was the start of the budding Reagan/Gorbachev relationship to be sure, but there were many factors that led to this, including some negative developments, such as the mistreatment of the American journalist Danilov in Moscow and continuing problems related to the whole arms race. But on the personal front, from the outset we had to figure out exactly what my role in the Front Office was to be. The Assistant Secretary herself was brand new, and initially it was far from clear what I would be doing. Over time, I became essentially a clearinghouse for papers that were passed to the Staff Assistants and intended for her -- the doorkeeper of sorts, but there was also a secretary to do that. Some parts of my work were substantive but much of it was in that gray zone, and I lacked a clearly defined portfolio of my own. I attended many meetings and got to hear the views of both the Assistant Secretary and her interlocutors and in turn acquire a better grasp of our own policies. But, I have to admit, I had lots of questions regarding whether I had a real role or was simply moving papers around. In other words, did I have any significant contribution to make? Not really, but then again, that is the way a Special or Executive Assistant is supposed to function.

Q: But you are the fly on the wall.

TONGOUR: The fly on the wall that hears and learns a lot. And in that period our relationship with the Soviet Union shifted from being one might say fairly dark to considerably lighter. But from my perspective one of the most interesting aspects of the job related to travel because when the Assistant Secretary traveled, I traveled as well. When Secretary Shultz traveled to Europe, so did Ridgway, and therefore, so did I. And when it came time for the G-8, which happened to be in Tokyo that year, Shultz traveled to Japan, and she went along, as did I. There were definitely some fantastic trips and the opportunity to witness the dynamics among the key players. As you well know, George Shultz was very well respected by members of the Foreign Service for many reasons, not the least of which was his manner of dealing with subordinates, especially when compared to some of his predecessors and successors. Several examples come to mind. While I was still on the Soviet Desk, Office Director Tom Simons invited him to our Christmas party, an event that was actually renowned in the building for having caviar. Apparently, none of the working level offices had up to that point ever invited him to such a party; yet he came. Flying on the Secretary's plane was also interesting. On each flight he would make a point of walking down the aisle and talking to everyone at least briefly. There was someone on his staff who seemed to keep track of the birthdays of members of the traveling party and advise him accordingly so that he could acknowledge the person. It happened to me once during a trip to Athens. We were all at some reception and at some point he came over to me and said "I understand you have a big day today." These little touches were endearing and much appreciated particularly in a bureaucratic environment where such gestures tend to be infrequent.

Q: Of all the secretaries of state, both in the substantive and on the personal level, George Shultz really stands preeminent.

TONGOUR: I think that's right.

Q: Colin Powell on the personal level was great, policy level, well, I mean, we got the Iraq War.

TONGOUR: That too. Back to the earlier period. It was very interesting to work closely with the Secretary's staff (the so-called S Staff) and be at least on the periphery of a wide range of important meetings -- some of which were tense or difficult. And there was a period in which Roz Ridgway herself was the center of discussions concerning whether or not a woman might know anything about "throw weight" and should have any real role in arms control negotiations. And that attitude still exists -- so the gender issue rears its head in many different ways.

Q: It took her a long time but Roz Ridgeway became the world's preeminent in fish, which was very much a man's world but she became so respected she was a fisherman's boy.

TONGOUR: I know. It was something she said she very much enjoyed. I don't recall the specifics but I think she may have met her Coast Guard husband in the "fish world".

Q: Were you there when- did you go on the, when Ronald Reagan went to Berlin and said tear down the wall, Mr. Gorbachev, and all that?

TONGOUR: I was not, for reasons that I can no longer remember -- there were a few trips in which the plane was "too full" and some staffers didn't make it. That may have been one of those times. Frankly, what saddened me is that considering all the trips I did go on, the one that I could not make at the last moment due to space limitations was Reykjavik. And I really wanted to, as did all the staff at that point.

Q: Well, as part of the SOV club, were you finding this a very exciting time? Because things seemed to be melting quite rapidly.

TONGOUR: Yes, it truly was. Your mentioning the SOV Club is an apt description which reminds me that in the EUR Bureau there was another important office called RPM (Regional Political Military Affairs) and there was considerable rivalry or competition between SOV and RPM on policy issues and approaches related to arms control and dealing with the Soviet Union in general. One of the things that struck me most while working for Roz Ridgeway and seeing the papers produced (briefing materials, memos, etc) by these two offices was how in a funny way the two offices resembled two different types of beauties, namely Grace Kelly and Sophia Loren.

Q: We are talking about two mammoth movie stars of an earlier period, Sophia Loren being sort of a very earthy and Grace Kelly being ice princess.

TONGOUR: That is right. Grace Kelly's slip never showed, and RPM was the Grace Kelly of the Bureau. RPM papers were always letter perfect -- never a typo and the format was always correct. The Soviet Desk on the other hand -- and I have to admit to a bit of partiality here -- did not always have its "paper act" all together. Not that Sophia Loren was slovenly, but figuratively speaking her slip sometimes would show, and yet she was quite impressive, and at her best, outstanding. That was what always struck me about the work produced by those two offices; both were excellent but the Soviet desk would come in with a true tour de force production every once in awhile.

Q: Well, did you sort of personally subscribe to Gorbachev as a new look or- there was one of skepticism; how did you feel about that?

TONGOUR: I think there was a very strong desire to want all this -- note the caveats -- and him to be the genuine article. But at the same time, what did the "genuine article" mean? The genuine article as a Soviet reformer; yes, we thought he really was that. Whether he was going to emerge as our image of an honest-to-God democrat, on that there were widely differing views. After all, he did come up through the Soviet system, and that certainly left its mark, but how much so was unclear. .

Q: Did you pick up on the part of Ridgeway or others or even yourself, you know, a bit of nervousness about Ronald Reagan, that he might get overly enthusiastic about Gorbachev? You know, I mean, you are sort of the handlers and your principle might get too far off the reservation.

TONGOUR: Well, you have to understand that no one wanted to be mistaken for a Pollyanna or jeopardize U.S. interests. But relations had been bad for so long that we were caught up in the hope for real improvements. Things evolve; circumstances and attitudes change but certainly at that moment we hoped for the best. Of course, there was the concern that if we were overly optimistic or enthusiastic, at the first setback, when something went wrong, there might be a tendency for the pendulum to swing to the other extreme. There was that concern; yet, overall, we were cautiously optimistic.

Q: Was RPM a brake on this?

TONGOUR: Probably. You know, it is really hard after all these years to recall exactly who was for what and when but let's say RPM was more focused on the nuts and bolts, the military and nuclear hardware available and what we did or did not need, as were other government agencies. Certainly, they concentrated more on weaponry and broader political-military issues. That said, I don't want to make it sound as though SOV or any other office consisted of misguided optimists, not at all -- simply that their orientations were a bit different. different.

Q: One general question. When dealing with the Soviet Union in both manifestations in your job, were you picking up the people around you- I mean, one of the things that struck me as everybody who went to the Soviet Union for years coming back and saying this damn place does not work.

TONGOUR: We knew that.

Q: The elevators do not work. You know, it does not work and yet we were building up the Soviets as being 10 feet tall in a way. How did you feel about this during this particular period?

TONGOUR: I think, and I was hardly alone in this view, there were many who knew what did and did not work in the Soviet Union and why. They were learning about causes -- some of which pre-dated the Soviet regime, going back to much earlier periods of Russian history, with its two-class society. Fundamentally, there has always been an elite with lots of intelligence, capacity, and creativity, with scientists who could come up with brilliant ways to patch things together with the proverbial band-aid. And we also had a fairly good sense of how the system did not work, which made it possible to suspend disbelief in a way, regarding the point that you made. In other words, recognizing failures in the system, were we, nonetheless, allowing them to act as a threat. We might be seeing parallels in North Korea with a leader sacrificing his people for specific military-related goals. That, too, was an image many had regarding the Soviet Union, namely that they might starve the masses if necessary to build the perfect rocket. It obviously took some time to grasp that they might not be doing as much as some thought in the sphere of military/nuclear technology development. Similar assumptions came to the fore in assessments about Saddam Hussein and what he was up to, and tended to drive policy.

Q: Was anybody, you know, during this time on the Soviet desk, saying, you know, this place would crack apart as far as the disparate elements, the Stans and all this; was that at all an issue?

TONGOUR: Let me jump ahead a few years. In August 1991, I was returning from a sunshine tour in the Caribbean for my second stint on the Soviet desk and I remember thinking how different was the bilateral relationship I was coming back to and how much better, calmer our relationship with the Soviet Union was the "second time around". And I recall turning on the television in the hotel I where I was temporarily staying, and was shocked to see pictures of tanks in Moscow, with shots of Boris Yeltsin in the thick of it, and everything seemed to be falling apart. That was my first day back. I immediately went to work, and for the next week or so it seemed as though we were working around the clock. What was patently obvious was that other agencies seemingly had not prepared scenarios for this type situation, the "dismemberment" or collapse of the Soviet Union we were witnessing. One would have thought that analysts might in prior years (before 1991) have at least prepared some contingency papers along the lines of what actually transpired, but they provide very little along these lines. We had to come up with our own scenarios for what might happen next. We wound up doing our own analysis, there on the Soviet Desk, with minimal input from other agencies.

Q: Yes, we are talking about the CIA.

TONGOUR: Basically but it is a general observation.

Q: It is far enough back and also, you know, we are not talking about methods or anything else; I mean, we can talk about the analysis of the CIA.

TONGOUR: The analysis was absent, which was quite surprising, even shocking given the large analytical staff devoted to that part of the world. Yet, in that period at least, they really did not come up with much that was coherent or of value to policy makers. So, during the next few weeks we churned out a myriad position papers dealing with the "what ifs": the what if this happened or that occurred --- scenarios one, two, three, etc.

RAYMOND ELLIS BENSON
Press/Cultural Affairs Officer, USIS
Moscow (1983-1987)

Raymond Benson was born in New York City in 1924. He served in the U.S. Army between WWII and the Korean War. He graduated from the University of Wisconsin and attended the Russian Institute at Columbia University. He joined the United States Information Agency (USIA) in 1957. His overseas posts include, Zagreb, Belgrade, Hamburg, Turkey, and Moscow. Mr. Benson was interviewed by Robert Daniels in 2000.

Q: Then in 1982 you left Belgrade and served in Washington with the Atlantic Institute.

BENSON: I went there as a fellow for a year. The question of what I would do after that year was left open. I think it's fair to say that I sort of milled around for the better part of that year, and then one day in early 1983 I got a call saying that Ambassador Hartman had called USIA and inquired whether I would accept a Moscow assignment that summer. So I spoke with my wife, who said she couldn't think of anything she'd rather do, and I said yes, and that in fact is what we did.

Now, it was immediately clear that what was going on--I didn't know this at the Atlantic Council--was that there were conversations, informal, between the United States and the Soviet Union about developing the text of a mutually agreeable cultural agreement or cultural and information agreement. The one which had been signed and in which all USIS work in the Soviet Union and all Soviet work in the United States in the cultural area was organized was the so-called Lacy-Zarubin Agreement of 1958. It had lapsed in 1979 after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. There were talks to renew the agreement, which was going to expire at the end of 1979, which had been recessed for Christmas to have each side think over some points of dispute. In the meantime the Soviet went into Afghanistan and the talks were never resumed. The agreement lapsed as of December 31 of 1979. We are now talking about 1983. Both the Soviet Union and the United States thought it might be fitting now to try to get an agreed text between the two countries, and what Art Hartman wanted was to have me prepare myself for leading the negotiating team which would do this. So my Atlantic Fellow stint was shortened and I went back to USIA. I sat in the European area, a little cubicle was prepared for me, and I was asked to prepare a draft text which would be the basis for the discussions.

So back I went home and sat in the European area and, reviewing the files which were available of all old agreements and review sessions, which were annual, and evaluations and God knows what else we had, I produced a text. There were three documents: the basic general agreement, then the program document, and then the so-called implementing conditions. If you don't have one, two doesn't exist; and if you don't have one and two, three doesn't exist; but they're negotiated separately and signed separately. The total was quite a few pages. So that's what I did sitting there with all of the files at my disposal. By the time I got to Moscow, the text was there. But that's a separate story, and we'll get into that when we talk about my tour of duty and the negotiations themselves. But that's what I did for I cannot remember now how many months, but there were quite a few that it took me working alone. I was given a typist who would take what I scribbled up and turn it into text. That's what you did then; we didn't have computers. We had a pretty good text by the time I left. It was edited, it was critiqued. I argued my points. We had a good text by the time we were finished.

Q: So you were developing the American text that would then have to be negotiated with the Russians to get an agreed text?

BENSON: Yes, exactly. We had reason to believe that they were doing the same thing, but we'll come to that later. The degree to which they were not doing the same thing was fascinating.

Q: Could you comment on your preparations in early 1983 and what you expected the Russians to be doing?

BENSON: I don't recall, Bill, whether I spoke of Yale Richmond and the saving of the files, the historical files on US-Soviet cultural agreements. Did I speak of that? You're an historian, and you would find this very interesting indeed. The first agreement was signed in 1958. It was called the Lacy-Zarubin Agreement because of the two negotiators, one American, Mr. Lacy, and one Soviet, Mr. Zarubin. Every year it was renewed. Finally the agreements were biannual; finally they were tri-annual. Then every year there would be a review. A group would meet, alternately in Moscow and in Washington, and there would be a bill of particulars, complaints and suggestions on how the agreements could be expanded or do we need this paragraph after all. Thus, the agreement grew very pragmatically over many years.

Separately, the Cultural Unit of the State Department was terminated. It ran exchanges. It ran Fulbright programs. It ran all cultural programs around the world. USIA related to CU--it was the only thing left in the State Department when public affairs issues were removed from the State Department and formed as a separate agency, USIA, in 1953. This bifurcation made for complexities in dealing with a part of the State Department which had a budget that had to be fought through a Congress as a part of the State Department on the one hand and USIA on the other. And we public affairs officers in the field had a very interesting bureaucratic and sort of technical series of problems to face.

Well, anyway, this anomaly was terminated in either 1981 or 1982, at which point Yale Richmond, who was a USIA officer seconded to the State Department in charge of the Soviet and East European geographical area of CU, was, along with other geographical unit heads, given an order, which was to clear out the files. We were moving administratively from the State Department to USIA, and we don't want to move with all these cartons. Yale was surrounded by file cabinets.

Well, Yale, who had served in Moscow, who had served in Poland, understood very, very well the complexities of dealing with East Europe and that these cultural arrangements and cultural programs had enormous political significant in those countries because contacts with the United States were considered under one heading, contacts with the United States. Well, Yale knew all this, and as he sort of tells the story, he sat in his office and he closed the door, and he decided that he simply couldn't be a party to this destroying the entire historical record that he had in the filing cabinets behind him, which went back to 1958, to the Lacy-Zarubin negotiations and so on and so forth. So he packed this material in moving boxes, the whole thing, everything, file cabinets full. Of course, there was no problem to get some sort of official truck, because they were moving certain things over. And he showed up, quite literally, in the European area of the USIA with these dozens of cartons. Well, Len Baldyga was then the head of the European area.

He's an East European hand, and he understood the importance of all this, so filing cabinets were obtained. They were set up along the wall, and dutifully all the files were placed within the file cabinets in simple chronological order, just the way they were in the State Department.

When I got over to the European area of USIA and was asked to write up a new agreement, I was given a little cubicle close to these filing cabinets, and the whole history was there behind me. I found material from Malcolm Toon when he was the head of SOV, or Walt Stoessel, Jack Matlock, during these annual talks, during negotiations on the cultural agreement, the Q&A, you know, faithfully typed, the Soviets complaining of this and the Americans of that and so on. It was an inexhaustible source of, shall I say, intelligence; that is to say, my intelligence was fed this background. Now, as I said before, hope you don't take it condescendingly, but as an historian you understand that it's simply impossible to start de novo. I wouldn't have known quite what to do. I would have found the last agreement somewhere, to be sure, the one that lapsed in 1979, but here I had for me an absolutely, totally--I hope they still have it somewhere, bless them--fascinating mosaic of, let me see, 1958 to 1979, 21 years of negotiations. Well, give Yale Richmond a heck of a lot of credit for not doing what he was told to do, because it was insensible to follow that particular order. The European area under Len Baldyga shielded, protected and stored these documents; and there I sat; and with their aid I created the new draft text.

Q: Today is June 12th, 2000, and we are continuing our Foreign Service Oral History interview with Ray Benson, who in 1983 was preparing a new U.S.-Soviet cultural exchange agreement.

BENSON: Right, our drafting of the agreement covered 1983. The negotiations began toward the end of 1984 actually, but as I started on the last tape to say, the draft of the agreement which I was producing in the European area of USIA had to be read by Charles Wick before it would be declared acceptable to USIA. He had the idea that the Soviets were out to trump us every time a card was dealt. Therefore, imperatives and superlatives were written into the agreement at points that both Len, who had never served in the Soviet Union, and I knew, and Yale Richmond to be sure, who was I think by then retired but I spoke to from time to time. We knew it's just impossible to negotiate an agreement with such language in it. So what we decided to do, Len and I, was to qualify the language as sensibly as we could to get Charles Wick's approval, not the points at which there were irritants to Charles Wick, and get on with it, because what we needed was an agreed text at home. The blood on the carpet was being spilled in the USIA building; we hadn't even gotten to the Soviet Union yet. That was a lot of fun, I must say.

Q: Wick, as I recall, was appointed by President Reagan when he took office in 1983, and he did not have a foreign policy background. Was his forte American media experience?

BENSON: No, Charles Wick was a graduate of Michigan University. His name was Zwick; out of that came the name of Charles Z. Wick. He had been a jazz, I think, trumpeter and had some kind of orchestra or played in an orchestra, I'm not sure which--or call them jazz band. How he acquired some wealth I don't know, but some years later he was living in California near the Reagans, he and his wife, and he owned a group of old-age and convalescent homes, which made him wealthy, very wealthy. Mrs. Wick and Mrs. Reagan used to car pool to get their young children to various events like school in the morning and soccer in the afternoon, and they became very fast friends, these families. The Wicks and the Reagans spent every Thanksgiving and Christmas together.

When Reagan was elected, he appointed Charles Wick the head of the inauguration ceremony committee. Wick, I'm told, did a bang-up job in getting the various auditoria and venues in Washington to be ready to do this, that and the other thing all on time and to get Reagan moving that evening among these various venues. A book was produced, which Charlie gave to me at one time, on this marvelous event. Once all of this was over, lo and behold, Charles Wick was appointed the head of USIA, a man who had been in show biz and was a friend of Reagan. There you are. He had no other relevant experience.

I suppose it's fair to say, however--it should be said--that he was a man of tremendous energy, and USIA in a strange way benefited--I shouldn't say 'in a strange way', very directly benefited--from his closeness to the President. The USIA budget lacked for nothing during those years. Perhaps that's enough at this stage of the game to say on this record.

We'll maybe put in a few things later about Charles Wick, but he was very conservative and very concerned about the Soviet Union. By golly, he was the head of USIA and USIA was going to be in charge of writing this text beginning the negotiations, and not on his watch would we give an inch to them. So by the time Len and I shook hands on an agreed text, it had been agreed with Charlie and it was, I believe, very quickly, not cursorily but promptly, vetted by the Soviet Bureau in the State Department and went off in the pouch to Moscow. When I got there in Moscow, it was waiting for me.

Q: This is all very helpful background for your work on the treaty. Now shall we take up your own move to Moscow and the nature of your assignment?

BENSON: Well, the work I plunged into in the first instance was kind of interesting. There was no substantial program anymore. We didn't have an agreement, so we had no cultural groups, we had no exhibits of the kind that used to move through the country, we didn't have budgets for it, we didn't have a covering agreement. Therefore, we didn't negotiate such things, we didn't have warm relations with concert agencies, museums or anything of the kind. There was just nothing going on.

Q: The chronology here can be very important, because Brezhnev had died in November of 1982 and you arrived under Andropov. Did you arrive before or after the Korean Airline [Flight 007] incident [September 1, 1983]?

BENSON: No, I arrived in June. Andropov was last seen publicly in early August of 1983 when his kidney ailments reached critical stage. He went off to be essentially under dialysis, which kept him alive and apparently functioning quite well as far as you can be functioning well under dialysis. Let me go back a step. When I got to Moscow, Arthur Hartman, of course, greeted me extremely warmly. He had asked for me, and here I was. [Ed: Hartman served as Ambassador from October 1981 to February 1987.]

We had met before, and I'll go into this in the post, editing stage. Arthur Hartman in it must have been 1972 or 1973 was flown into Turkey in a small jet courtesy of the U.S. Air Force with an aide or two. Bill Macomber asked me to be at the meeting, and the two of us agreed that was when we first met. But it was a short meeting. It had to do with the opium poppy substitution program. It had to do with other local crises. This was a run-up to Cyprus, the invasion of 1973. But we had never worked together really.

Anyway, he greeted me warmly. He said that there was one thing he had to tell me, which was that I was by rank the third man in the embassy--himself; Warren Zimmerman, the DCM; and me--and that when he would leave on vacation--he took very few vacations, he took one every year in the summer and it was a long one--Warren would replace him, and I would be acting DCM replace Warren. Would I agree to that? And I said yes, I would agree to that if he wanted to do that. We talked about my security file immediately.

In fact, very much earlier when he called the European office in USIA and said that he would like this fellow, Ray Benson, to replaced [Wallace] "Pic" Littell, my answer was yes, I would like to, but would somebody make sure that he was aware of my personal background. He was getting a public affairs officer with a certain, let's say, unique security file. The answer came back that he was delighted that I would come and, yes, he was aware, and with that I fetched up in Moscow of June of 1983. I then told him that when I arrived in Moscow in 1975 I had told Walt Stoessel--I think we've recorded that on these tapes--that I would not be looking up my half-sister for some time and would certainly check with him before I would want to do that. And I didn't do that until his successor, Mac Toon was firmly in place. Just five, six, seven weeks prior to my departure I said I'd like to do this, and Mac said go ahead and do it, and I did it. I told Art that we all at USIA, talking with the people who were sending me out and who knew the security file, had agreed that I would not be so bound this time and that I would look my half-sister and her mother up and see them as if they were normal Soviet citizens. People at the embassy did see Soviets. And they said, "Just fine. You will keep people informed, won't you?" I said I would, and so I said to Art that's what I'd like to do, and he said, "Fine. If anything comes up of interest to the embassy--you know what that means--you will talk with us, won't you?" I said, "Fine," and that was agreed, and that's the way we proceeded with my contacting my half-sister and seeing her for the rest of my tour. Well, soon after I got there, I started a special section in my own personal file for the American draft of the exchange agreement text, which had been pouched to Moscow and which I now repossessed, and anything relating to it.

It was agreed that, until such time as we went any further with it, it was not a matter for general discussion around the embassy, because there was no agreement with the Soviets about when this thing would be joined, this discussion. Recall I did say earlier, didn't I, that off-line, in fact, the Ambassador himself, actually, had been talking with the Soviets and they with us about, yes, we really should do this. So there were discussions, and they were not widely reported at all. And so that's where that was tucked away. Until further notice, I was not to talk about it among my staff, and we would proceed with the summer's business.

The summer's business was very quickly Arthur's preparation for leave, and off he and Donna went, as they usually did, toward the end of July, as I recall it, and they would be gone for six or seven weeks. An interesting twist on all of this, you know, for me was that Warren Zimmerman decided he would not move from his office and would I mind being acting DCM sitting in Arthur's office. I said I wouldn't mind at all, and we proceeded in that way. Of interest during this period, the KAL Flight 007 was shot down on the night leading to September first. There are time zone differences and all of that, but the night leading to September first of that year, meaning 1983. It was a time of enormous pressure and tension in the front office. There were many cables, which were received which the front office got and certain other people in the embassy got, which related how events were proceeding, which were not a matter of public record nor widely read in the embassy.

At the same time the State Department was preparing an inspection of the embassy. Had nothing to do obviously with the KAL plane but had everything to do with what a DCM was supposed to do in preparing the embassy for inspection. The USIA inspections are a tedious mess for people on the ground. A State Department inspection is indeed a tedious mess. You go by the book, and the book is very thick, so there I was responsible for it, and Oren--I shouldn't say generously but just per force, I mean he couldn't do it--said, "Prepare the building for inspection." So with the Administrative Counselor, (Joseph S.) Joe Hulings, whose his last tour of duty was as Ambassador to Turkmenistan [Ed: Sept 1992 – September 1995]. I visited him there when I was doing the exchange program, wonderful man, now retired, so, we prepared the building for inspection. It was very, very complicated for me. I mean, I'm not of State Department on that, but we did that.

Relations with the Russians were stiffened by the downing of the KAL plane. Arthur came back. I moved back to my office, thought of negotiating the agreement. It was laid away for now. My recollection was that it was in January or early in 1984 that (Minister of Foreign Affairs Andrei) Gromyko at a conference in Spain--just ticks in my memory, doesn't matter where--said certain things about the United States and about Soviet-American relations which seemed absolutely to preclude any sensible discussions on almost anything.

Q: Was that before or after (Konstantin) Chernenko took over?

BENSON: That would have been about the time that Andropov was on his last legs or had already been interred. It's about then, because Andropov died in February 1984. Gromyko spoke either just before then or just after then. It was for all intents and purposes an interregnum period, because Andropov was not terribly active.

Chernenko also was not terribly active and, therefore, was elected by the Politburo. That was an interregnum period in so many ways. Underneath all of that, or along with all of that, there were certain USIA-supported programs which continued. In fact, to go back on what we've been talking about, they continued after the termination of the cultural agreement and despite its termination. For example, our support for IREX...

See, the Soviets didn't want the higher educational exchange, the graduate-level exchange, the research exchange operating under IREX to be terminated, and it wasn't. Money was, such as it was, continued to be granted by USIA to IREX.

Q: There was a bit of a hesitancy on their side, wasn't there? In my own experience, I was supposed to go on IREX in the fall of 1983, and at that point after the KAL matter, the Academy of Sciences did not answer its mail. I didn't go until March or April of 1984.

BENSON: Well, yes, no. Why should they? They were in a state of shock, and it was an interregnum in practical terms in the Soviet Union. The top was in a shambles. Some people moved back and forth but very, very few. But I guess my point here that should be recorded--and we'll edit it into proper shape when we get the typescript--is that despite all of what happened and despite all of what we have been speaking, certain programs continued through agreements or letters exchanged between by the partner organizations. That is to say, Kassoff and Dan Matuszewski on behalf of IREX, would agree when the Academy of Sciences on one hand and the Ministry of Higher Education on the other. You know, IREX has both programs, the special programs which, I think, had 11 categories with the Academy of Sciences in gerontology and history and literature and archeology, what have you, and they had an agreement with the Ministry of Higher Education for people who were going to universities, reciprocally, and the Soviets were interested in continuing that, and IREX was interested, as was USIA and the American Council of Learned Societies. So there was an agreement to do this. At that time IREX did not have an office in Russia, in the Soviet Union, and the action on the ground, except when Allen and Dan would be visiting, was accomplished by my office. It was the USIS office of P&C, Press and Cultural Office, which acted on behalf of IREX and on behalf of the ACTR, the American Council of Teachers of Russian, which was placing people in the Pushkin Institute.

Q: Now, was this different in nature or degree from how you operated with the academic exchanges in the '70s?

BENSON: Really not. Neither IREX nor the ACTR had an office then. It didn't have an office in the 1980s. USIS Foreign Service Officers, my educational officer or cultural officer were doing the liaison work. We had telexes from IREX. That's the way one communicated in those days. We'd get copies of a telex that IREX had sent to the Academy of Sciences or copied back from Allen of one they'd received. It was just an awful lot of, not to-ing and fro-ing, but of back and forth to keep every informed. We had other exchange programs, some of which were recipients of USIA money. There was a program sponsored by Ohio State/Purdue Consortium, Leon Twarog --you must have known him--which had a resident director in Moscow and had a group of students from a Middle West consortium. There was a SUNY program for undergraduates with a resident director.

Q: You worked with these various university programs whether or not they had federal support?

BENSON: Yes. They tended to have a little federal support, but yes, we did, there's absolutely no question. In fact, whenever I arrived at a post--I'm glad you asked the question--I would speak with the staff and I would say that we would operate on behalf of the American academic, intellectual, cultural establishments here on the ground in Yugoslavia, Turkey and so on. In the same way the commercial officer operated on behalf of the American business community. Somebody from Indianapolis could come in to Moscow and say, "I would like to sell widgets in Moscow or in the Soviet Union. Help me." So we were essentially operating as a public service in relation to any American cultural and educational interests? I strongly believe we should be and should have been, and we were. When the Midwest Universities Consortium for International Activities (MUCIA), I think it was, when they came in, they had no government money, but they wanted to start an exchange program that would involve the big ten universities. It was a big deal. This consortium, which was set up in, I think, Lansing, Michigan, would deal essentially with AID and the Department of Agriculture, and they had an enormous series of grants because they were land grant universities. They worked in India, they worked in Pakistan, they did land amelioration and cultivation, God knows what all, and we ended up, bring the story to an end here, with an agreement between them and counterparts at the Academy of Sciences and the Ministry of Higher Education, in the Soviet Union. Person months, it was a certain number of people for a certain number of months, and it was a very proud day when this was completed.

Rutgers heard of this. They came in, and they wanted, on behalf of the New Jersey system of higher education, to have a similar agreement, and we got one at that time. The person who at the end was doing academic exchange for us was Carol Dorflin, whom you know now. You are dealing with her in the Karilian exchange. She was of inestimable help to the Rutgers people, who had things off sort of halfcocked. To complete the answer to your question, these groups would come in, they'd have a draft reciprocal agreement, and we would critique the draft and say, "This just won't go here. It's not France." They would either accept or not accept our suggestions. They're a private institution. But like as not, they would be very grateful.

Q: So you really played a crucial role for American universities or consortia in breaking the ground for them with their Soviet counterparts to get their programs established?

BENSON: Absolutely. We did it before the negotiation and signing of the agreement. We did it afterward on a different base, because there was an agreement already, you see. The agreement did not set up a necessary juridical basis in the Soviet Union for doing these exchanges. It depended on the political climate, whether you could get things done or not. And the political climate in terms of our work was vitally affected by the fact that there was finally an overarching government-to-government cultural agreement. Suddenly there was an outburst of USIS programs.

Q: When did you conclude the agreement?

BENSON: Well, the agreement was concluded and signed by Secretary Shultz and Foreign Minister Gromyko at the Geneva Summit on November 21, 1985, which was when Reagan and Gorbachev first met.

Q: What about Hartman as an ambassador [October 1981 – February 1987]?

BENSON: Art Hartman was delightful. He was a very loose, very relaxed, very affable, extremely intelligent, charming man. His wife was all of the above. They had in the best sense of the word 'show biz flair', deeply cultural in certainly music in their tastes. They turned Spaso House, the ambassador's residence, which you've been in, which has great public space, into a site of special concerts, chamber music, dances. They lived that way. We had no America House in Moscow. We had no venue to do anything. There was no library there, no reading room, none of that. Through all of these tough times. When they came back from vacation in '83, the plane had been shot down, things were in ghastly shape. They repainted the inside of the great ballroom in Spaso. They put frescos on the walls. Donna Hartman had friends from Paris come to do this. They decided--and we were of enormous help here, USIA, my staff, me--that they would intensify their efforts to reach out and to develop contacts, maintain contacts, enhance contacts with whichever of the Soviet Moscow intellectuals, intelligencia, as would come, poets, playwrights, writers, artists, musicians, and so on.

Q: Did Hartman, by the way, have a Foreign Service background? How was his Russian?

BENSON: He didn't have much Russian. He studied valiantly, but his language was French. Arthur Hartman had been in the Foreign Service since Point Four days. He's Harvard educated with an economic twist, and he'd been in Paris then, the Marshall Plan, Point Four and so on as a very young man. Joined the Foreign Service, worked with Kissinger in the European area, and had been, prior to being assigned to Moscow, in Paris for a bunch of years. So I say he struggled valiantly with Russian just because he felt that was what he wanted to do or should do or could do, but he was never able to function at all in Russian. Whether he was able to read much, I don't know, but this is not the man who would have, as Mack Toon and Jack Matlock and Walter Stoessel, four newspapers delivered in the morning so that the morning staff meeting would be illuminated by what they knew had been printed, and Izvestia in the evening. No, that was not his background, but still Foreign Service background he certainly had.

Anyway, I would say what distinguished the Hartman tour of duty was this outreach. He would invite to these evenings, which would go on into the wee hours and were not infrequently scheduled once every two months. But you might have two a week. They would invite other ambassadors, of course, and interesting attachés--by attachés I mean cultural or press--in foreign embassies who knew one heck of a lot about the Soviet Union. I must say that our office worked like crazy on these guest lists, on calling people. We didn't have emails then. Putting together an evening of that sort was really a lot of work. And I should say official Soviets were invited too. Some came, most didn't, but groups of them came from the USA Institute; or IMEMO, the Institute of World Economy and International Relations; other special institutes, various people who the embassy was interested in and who were interested in the embassy and could on this kind of occasion get permission to come.

Q: Did those encounters then lead to any softening up of these institutions or the work you had to do with them to promote exchanges, for instance? Was there any benefit that you immediately gained or eventually gained from establishing that kind of acquaintance?

BENSON: The answer is yes. You see, through the agreement between IREX on one hand and the Academy of Science that's 11 different component parts--I think I mentioned economics and history and gerontology and all of that, these separate agreements.... You know, the whole agreement was negotiated during my first tour by Wassily Leontief. He was the one who came over on behalf of IREX and the American Academy...

Q: He was one of my economics teachers.

BENSON: Was he really? He was a great guy, wasn't he?

Q: Oh, yes, way above the students though.

BENSON: Well, he was a Nobel Prize winner in 1973, wasn't he?

Q: That's right, although I didn't appreciate what I was getting at the time.

BENSON: Well, we so often don't. But he did it, he came over. Of course, he didn't negotiate it actually. It had all been hacked out over a period of a year or two. But he came over, and the Soviets were just ga-ga over Leontief. His Russian was still elegant, it was splendid. He was so pleased to be back. I guess he'd been back, I don't know. But anyhow, the people who were at institutes which were involved in these exchanges had more of a "reason" to accept the invitations. There was no other function, no other person, no other way in which contacts were to be developed and maintained with these institutes, with these persons. When IREX came over in the person of Allen Kassoff and Dan Matuszewski, they would visit these contacts we had developed. Of course, there were scholars who would come and spend a day or a week with them, or there were conferences of a certain kind. They would either check in at the embassy or not. And that kind of meeting was not of such interest to the embassy as a functioning source of contacts with Soviet society and a source of reports and reporting on Soviet society. But meeting these people--never mind the American scholars--was of inestimable advantage. This kind of gathering, these gatherings, they went on for years. It was just gorgeous. It was a way of trying to bring them in. As the cultural agreement was being negotiated and then signed, there was just an unleashing of contact possibilities. Most notably the USA Institute, where various of its higher officers, (Georgi) Arbatov, (Radimor) Bogdanov, Milshtane, now became available.

Q: The general?

BENSON: The general, great guy--he was really special--(Eduard) Ivanyan and others. Anyway, an elaborate and mosaic-like answer to your question, and we'll fill in later. The question about Arthur Hartman as ambassador: he was superb.

Q: Let's go back then to the chronology of Soviet events. Chernenko took over in April of 1984 and died in March of 1985. Did the change in the Soviet leadership affect your work?

BENSON: Well, you see, by then we were well into the negotiation on the cultural agreement. The negotiations began in August.

Q: Today is still June 12th, 2000, and we are returning to our conversation with Ray Benson. We are discussing the negotiation of the revived cultural exchange agreement in 1984 in Moscow.

BENSON: The negotiations began, if I recall it correctly, August 8th. They followed a very quick and in a certain sense--to me anyway--surprising burst of meetings, which didn't include me, in Washington and in Moscow in which both sides agreed finally, yes, let's sit down and talk over if we can reach an agreed text. Against a background of some ghastly events in 1983 and Gromyko's blasts in early 1984, one could be surprised but there it was. We gave the Soviets our text; the one I had worked on a year or two before.

As a matter of fact, it worked this way. Arthur came to me and said that he had the document--he didn't come to me; he invited me to his office—and said he had a document empowering him--it's an official document; there's a name for it [Circular 175]--from the State Department. He would be the designated chief negotiator, he and such staff as he wished to involve in the negotiations on this agreement. He had that document, and he would be off and running. However, he said, he didn't intend to do any of that. He would like me to do it and to pick such members of my staff as I wanted to accompany me on this. Of course, there would be regular telegraphic reporting on progress as we began to meet through State Department channels, and he would see it all. If there was any reason I wanted to burst in and tell him what had happened or what had not happened at any time, I could do that, but otherwise let's get on with it through this process. So I said fine, and I got my staff together.

We had a cultural attaché, we had a press attaché. The cultural attaché was Greg Gorov on my left hand; Jerry Verner, the information attaché on my right hand, literally on my right hand. He was senior, and he was the information officer, information attaché or press attaché or both. Each of them had with them other members of their staffs. So we would appear in two cars. We had one, two, three, four, five, seven or eight people for each meeting, one of whom was the reporting officer. The first reporting officer who would be taking notes--you know, there was nothing, at least on our side, done with a tape recorder; maybe they did, though they had a reporting officer there to scribbling away like crazy--was Mark Taplin, whom you know, who was in the cultural section. He wrote like a dream, and he was very smart. He caught everything. He knew Russian well. He was sitting off toward the end of this line at this great big rectangular table, and he was taking notes. That's the way we went on. There were no representatives of the State Department side of the embassy; there was just us from USIA.

Anyway, Arthur said, "That's what I want you to do, and we'll set about doing it. We have to agree with them on when they would like to begin. They take their vacation seriously, and we want to have ours." I cannot recall when we agreed on the date that we would begin, but it was agreed, and it had to be done in advance because the Soviets had to arrange their vacations accordingly, and we would begin in early August. I went off as an aside to Yugoslavia with my two sons, and we sailed the Adriatic with a Serb friend from Rovinj to Dubrovnik. It was a gorgeous trip, three weeks.

We got to our first meeting in a room in the Office of International Programs of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. It was right across the street, an old ducal palace. It was right across the street, Kariniński from the sort of campus which held the buildings of the Friendship Society, which I think was a Momentov estate. These are old buildings and very beautiful indeed. Our meeting place was a ballroom. They had a big rectangular table, and we sat facing the street side windows. We had 65, at least, meetings there. We started in August of 1984, we watched winter come, we watched the leaves fall, and we watched spring come. The last meeting was toward the very end of October of 1985. We discovered when we had our first meeting, which was just to establish the process, that they didn't have a text; they were preparing their text.

Q: Did you have to wait for them, or did they work from yours?

BENSON: You anticipate the answer. What they did, because they didn't have it, because they couldn't put it together because their bureaucracies were rivaling each other but didn't communicate with each other. But let me get into that little bit more in just a minute. They decided they had to have some darn text to get started, so they translated our text into Russian. We didn't realize this for two meetings, because they didn't hand the whole thing over to us. They told us that, of course, as we proceeded in the negotiation, both sides will reserve the right to change the text as the negotiating discussions indicated the necessity of doing so. We said of course, if we don't give you a bronze tablet, you don't give us a bronze tablet. Well, good, so we can begin. And they immediately began changing texts because it really didn't suit them to accept our text, but they had to have something to begin with. We now had it. We begin with the preamble, where some changes were made. And it went on like that. Later in the process, great hunks of text were changed on their side.

We have already, in talking here, anticipated the reason, and the reason was simply that it was impossible for this office of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, which handled negotiations of such agreements and had the responsibility of monitoring of such agreements and so on, despite the rank of its senior officers, it was impossible for them to order the Ministry of Education, the Ministry of Culture, the Ministry of Higher Education and God knows what other organizations were involved--we do know which other organizations were involved--to produce a text by date certain. Who could Alexander Churlin who was in charge of this office, communicate with at the Ministry of Higher Education? He's not going to call the Minister; he has no right to do that. Perhaps not even in the United States would it be done that way, but certainly there it wasn't. So he communicates at his level in the Ministry of Education. This guy hasn't received any orders yet to accept the charge from Churlin to produce a text, nor does he know in what context is all this, or if he knows he doesn't know who in his ministry knows. How far has this information been disseminated? He can't rush up to his minister and say, "You know what I just heard from Churlin?" Well, time passed, tediously.

Q: Was Churlin the lead figure in your face-to-face negotiations, supported by representatives of the other ministries involved?

BENSON: Yes, Churlin was the lead negotiator on their side, but other ministry representatives came and went. My guys and gals were there for a year and a half. I had a permanent team. We had really a position of strength. For one, to begin with and for a long period of time, the negotiations revolved around our text. Even when they're getting rid of it, it's our text. For another, we had a team, colleagues and friends. They had Churlin, who was very good. They had a representative of the American Bureau always, the counterpart of SOV, the Soviet Office. He was over on the right hand as I faced the other side of the table. They had a note taker. They had an interpreter.

Q: I was going to ask you, what did you do for languages in these encounters.

BENSON: Well, they had an interpreter; they had interpreters. As time went on, an interpreter would disappear and go to Geneva or go to Paris and what have you, and a new one would come.

They were top notch. Churlin understood English, and obviously we all understood Russian. Some of the people who would appear from various ministries on his side when the relevant paragraphs were up for discussion knew English very well. Some knew it not at all. So what we obviously decided to do was have each side speak his own language; and whether Churlin understood me or not, it was going to be translated.

Q: And that, of course, gives you the chance to hear the other guy's statement twice before you have to answer.

BENSON: That's absolutely the case, and it was of crucial importance all the way through, because you don't get into an immediate repost because you have to wait for the translation, during which you think over whether you should offer a repost or a comment. It eases and softens and makes much more intelligent the response, when it finally comes your turn.

Q: This is a very important point, because I think people often think of language barrier and interpreting as an obstacle, when in fact it can facilitate back and forth. Assuming that you know the other guy's language so you hear it in Russian and then you hear an interpreter put it into English, and vice versa. Say you make a statement in English and then you hear what it sounds like being put into Russian.

BENSON: This is perfectly true, and very often I would correct the Russian translator and say I think there is just a little bit of a shade there, or sometimes they'd get it way off because we speak our language with some idioms, you know. You learn as you're going through the negotiation to speak more slowly and to speak in shorter sentences. You try. You don't use baseball terminology. "You couldn't get to first base," would throw the usual Soviet interpreter. And they too.

Gradually as we began--I say we had 65 sessions--we learned how to deal with it. We would speak more slowly and less in the vernacular. So texts were exchanged, changed text, new text, new suggestions in one language only. They would give it to us in Russian; we would give it to them in English. On the next session they would show us the translation into Russian of the text we had given them in English, and vice versa, and then both sides would correct, because you can go off a little bit. There's a lot of sort of what sounds like minor administrative back and forth but which is absolutely essential if you're going to finish page one and go on to page two and three and so on. You know, our agreement had three parts. Part One was a statement of general principles, let's say. Part Two was the program document. Part Three were so-called implementing conditions. They were interrelated, quite obviously. They had to be signed at the same time.

Q: Did your program document list all of the specific programs that would be covered and how many concerts back and forth, to that level?

BENSON: Oh yes. The implementing conditions would frequently be of interest to people like IREX and money, per diems.

Q: But the agreement didn't specify, for instance, the American organizations that would supply the person-months under a certain category, or did they?

BENSON: They did in the case of IREX. They did in the case of the Fulbright Commission. By that time we had a Fulbright agreement of a kind.

Q: Oh, so that was running even when the cultural exchange agreement had lapsed?

BENSON: Right, limping but running.

Q: You see, I was there on IREX, which was functioning despite the lack of the agreement, as you explained. I was also a member of the Fulbright Committee for the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe at that time, and this involved me in a brief negotiating session--it was actually one morning, I think--with Greg Gorov and some of the other people in your staff and a couple of other people, a woman whose name escapes me now, a Polish name, I think. We were discussing with the--I think it must have been in the Ministry of Higher Education--some of the problems in the level of implementation and the difficulties people had experienced on both sides. And that negotiation incidentally was conducted completely in Russian.

BENSON: Well, you knew Russian, Greg knew Russian.

Q: Well, everyone in the American group functioned in Russian. So that was just a little filler that occurs to me that illustrates what was able to go on during that period when we had no agreement. Then what was the impact on the embassy and your work generally when Gorbachev took over in March of 1985?

BENSON: By that time--we had been negotiating since August--Soviet organizations, various ministries, Gosconcert and other administrative units on the Soviet side had been brought into the picture, had been made to focus on the texts which did refer to them. They would often say, "Where did this text come from?" and my counterparts would say, "Look, it's the American text that we have had to translate because you didn't give us anything else!" Well, I didn't hear such a conversation, but I know it happened, I very definitely know it happened. "...and if you don't like it, come up with a text. We've been talking to you for the better part of a year, and you haven't come up with anything. We're negotiating now, so it's now or never."

So then they'd come in and they would table a text for discussion next time, and we'd see it changed dramatically. We would wink at each other and we'd say, "Thank you very much. If you think this is realistic, we will talk about it next time." And that's the way it went. By the early part of the year we had moved along substantially. There was one crucial point which the Soviets held out as being basic and if we could not reach agreement on it there would be no agreement at all but "Let's continue talking about the other points." So we agreed with that, of course. And that point was the use of national airlines to move the exchangees. You know, after the invasion of Afghanistan, the air agreement between the United States and the Soviet Union was terminated.

Q: Oh, so Aeroflot could not land in the States.

BENSON: Precisely right. Nor could Pan American land in Russia. So they said it was ruinous for them and they couldn't deal with it any other way, to have an exchange program, if the Moscow Philharmonic had to pay international rates; it was just not possible for them to do that--or even individual scholars. Parallel to our negotiations, Aeroflot and Pan American under the aegis of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the State Department respectively were negotiating an agreement to resume flights. We're both aware of this obviously, and I said on many occasions, "We wish them well. It's got nothing to do with this agreement." And they were saying, "Indeed we wish them well. It has everything to do with this agreement, because we can't afford to send them any other way." We suggested that they send their groups on Lott, the Polish airline, which flew to the United States. I said to Alex, "I'll bet they'll take rubles too." He winked at me and he said, "For us it has to be Aeroflot." The reason I go into this as background is because it will later play a crucial role in the end game as the agreement was agreed. It goes directly to help answer your question about the influence of Gorbachev. As we're going along and we are hacking away at this thing and we're getting changes and we're reserving positions for the end game and so on, underneath is this terrible problem.

They will not sign--and they let us know every time we turned left or right, that this thing has to be settled. We say that it has nothing to do with this agreement, and it keeps getting stated and restated, stated and reiterated that we leave it for the end game. Well, some of the positions--back to Arthur Hartman now--that we were reserving, apart from the issue of the flights, were piling up at one point, and our desire in the embassy, to compromise in this point or to be firm on another point we were communicating fully with Washington. There was a daily telegram that was drafted by Mark Taplin and, when he gave up on it, Mark Smith, another one of my staff on the information side, who was another magnificent drafting officer. And at one point Arthur said to me, "I think we've got positions reserved on both sides, and our views are changing a little on how we might adjust the basic original text. I think it's time for you to go back to Washington." "Oh?" I said. "Yep," he said, "rather than our sitting here and sending a long telegram which would offer the argument for changing this or reserving this or being stubborn here, which is going to be read by everybody in Washington, we think this and we think that, you go back and you talk to SOV and you talk to the NSC." The SOV was then headed by Tom Simons, an old Soviet hand, an East European hand, who eventually became ambassador to Poland and then later Pakistan. In fact, he may be there now. And the NSC person in charge of Soviet and East European stuff was Jack Matlock.

So off to Washington I went, preceded obviously by a message from Arthur saying I was coming, and the idea was that there was massive reporting already in hand and we would get either an affirmation of the direction we were going and a little bit of applause, or we would get new negotiating instructions which would be specific to certain points. They would analyze where we'd gone and where we might be going, and they would say, "Go," or "Just a moment. This is how you should change."

Q: This must be the trip when you turned up at the Kennan Institute when I was there in the spring of 1985.

BENSON: That could very well be, because I think I came only once in the spring of 1985. This trip was fabulously successful. Tom Simons understood exactly what was going on. He read everything which had come in. He was reading the daily reporting telegrams, or the thrice weekly. He had read what Arthur had to say, and I went over to SOV and we talked about this and that and the other thing. A meeting was set up with Jack Matlock in Old Executive Office Building, which is where his NSC office was. We showed up there with Marlin Remick, who was the deputy of Len Voldig and had been my deputy in Belgrade in 1979 to 1982, and another person. Tom Simons was there, and there was somebody else. We'd go through the argument, recap the discussion, and Jack Matlock says, "You know, I think that these are very difficult discussions. It seems to me you're going along a very productive path. Can't predict the future, but right now I don't see any need for changing the operating instructions. Comes to that, we'll note it. I read the reporting cables. Tom reads the reporting cables. What do you say, Tom?" "Oh, fine," he says, "so we'll stay in touch here..."

All along it's understood that we would report back whatever happened, and if needed the instructions to continue on the basis of this document would change. So Jack was saying there's no need to change that: "Everything's going along fine." Tom Simons on behalf of SOV says, "Yes," and so there it was. We had the verbal stamp of approval. Something must have been written back to Arthur saying, "General review here. Progress very satisfactory. Continue. Keep reporting. You'll be in touch with us and we with you." So I went back and I said, "You know, it really cleared the air," because this decision by SOV and NSC was communicated to Charlie Wick, not that Charlie Wick or his people had been complaining necessarily but that we had been chipping away at some of the language that Len Voldig and I had left in the basic text because that language was necessary to get the text by Charlie. He wasn't reading any reporting cables, you know. But we didn't want to be in a position where somebody would rush to him and say, "Charlie, do you know what's happening? In paragraph 1A this is gone; in paragraph 2C this is gone," and he would say, "Oh, my God, you're giving away the keys to the safe." So, before that would happen, he would have received, and he did, from either Jack or Tom or both, word saying okay, good, NSC approves. So we proceeded.

Now, to talk about the difference in the Soviet Union when Gorbachev come into authority. We'll talk about this and other contacts when we go back and talk about intellectual life, cultural life, and so on in the Soviet Union at that time, but there was something else that was going on apart from Gorbachev's coming in, which is that the Office of International Programs of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs had finally been able to get all the responsible parties in the Soviet Union to focus on the fact that we were working through, a quarter through, a third through, half through, this major document. "It affects you, it affects you," and so on and so forth. Of course, the knowledge of what was going on was up at a good high level in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, so increasingly the texts were germane to Soviet interests, and we were proceeding along. Well, not to go through the absolute--and perhaps we'll pick up a little bit when we get to looking at the typed script--picking up the absolute, every...; I can't recall every negotiating session, you know. But, talking about Gorbachev, it comes to a point when we're finished, around the fall of 1985; October of 1985. Aeroflot and Pan Am are negotiating away a blue streak. They don't have an agreement.

Q: That explains how I got there, because I flew American to Rome and then Al Italia to Moscow. If the State Department suspended Aeroflot's rights in 1979, then how could resumption just depend on negotiation between the two airlines?

BENSON: Well, because when there would be a result satisfactory to Pan American, the State Department would be asked to rescind or relax its order.

Q: I see. So Pan Am was really negotiating to get an acceptable deal before asking the State Department to relent?

BENSON: Yes. That's the way it was before too, and the number of frequencies and other conditions attendant on flying back and forth, how many people would be resident in the Aeroflot office: you don't need 60 people for two flights a weeks, and that kind of thing. A very important thing was the security considerations. You needed groundskeepers and all. So they're negotiating away, and the Soviets tell us that we have agreed on everything, except aviation reciprocity issues, and we have told them that we will not have included in the cultural agreement any reference to flights, it's not for this agreement. We'd been saying that for a year and a half, and we ended up saying it. So what we ought to do is prepare the text we suggested as it stands in Russian and in English, and we'll take it to Geneva and it will be decided there whether Mr. Gromyko and Mr. Shultz will sign it. There was no other way to deal with this, you know, and it was agreed by us and by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs that that is what we would do. They would reserve their position, we would say, "Your position is impossible," and then we would have completed the text with airline problem pending, this resolution.

They're negotiating away in Moscow, the airlines, and we prepare the text. It's finished, and it's finally in Geneva printed up on the proper protocol paper, which they ran out of--their documents have to be on their paper and our documents have to be on our paper--and suddenly they realized that in Geneva, where they had a lot of offices and a lot of agreements, they'd run out of protocol paper, so they had to wire Moscow to send a special courier to Geneva overnight with a ream of protocol paper.

Q: Now, you were in Geneva?

BENSON: Oh yes, I went with Mark Smith, who was the second reporting officer after Mark Taplin. We had the responsibility of printing up all these copies. The Soviets are amazingly incompetent in doing these things. In the American mission, we had to find a copy machine which could handle the Soviet protocol paper, which is uncommonly thick. It must have been 19th century paper, for the thickness of it. Most of the printers which we had in the special offices, which were set up in a hotel which we took over to accommodate it, couldn't handle this paper. But in the basement of one of the buildings of the American permanent mission to Geneva, there was an old copier which could handle that paper.

God, we were in a mess. But anyway, it was done. At one point they're ready now to--this is Reagan and Gorbachev--they're ready to have their aides tell them all these documents are ready for signature tomorrow. There were various documents which are signed on such an occasion. I was not at this meeting. Reagan is sitting on a couch. Gorbachev is sitting on a couch. The fire is crackling, and this is the end of the negotiations and various groups have gone off to perfect or cross the final 't', dot the final 'I' on the various agreements which will be signed. Apparently the group which went off to a separate room, headed by (Deputy Foreign Minister Georgi) Korniyenko, had among the documents they were considering the cultural agreement. So finally one by one the chiefs of these various subgroups returned and reported, "We are ready, sir. We'll get the documents ready for tomorrow," and so on and so forth. Korniyenko comes in and he says, "This is ready, but we have a problem with the cultural agreement. Can't sign it." There was consternation. Gorbachev says, "Why can't we sign it?" "Well, it's because the Pan American and Aeroflot agreement is not ready." Gorbachev says, "What's that got to do with the cultural agreement?" Korniyenko says, "Well, because the groups fly on Aeroflot, and it's just very difficult for us to carry off. You know, we have scholars and these are all the people who would move per the paragraphs of the cultural agreement." As I hear it, Gorbachev says to him, "Is the cultural agreement ready?" "Yes, sir, it's ready, but it doesn't have anything..." "Okay, it's ready. Are they negotiating in Moscow on the Aeroflot and Pan American agreement?" He said, "Yes, that negotiation continues." As an aside, an hour or two, three, four earlier in Moscow, Aeroflot and Pan American had reached agreement. Geneva didn't know that.

So Gorbachev turns to Korniyenko and he says, "I think we're talking about two agreements here. One is finished, and the other is being negotiated. We hope we will sign both. We will certainly sign one." Korniyenko, I'm told by somebody who was in the room, takes two steps back and he says, "Yes, sir." So the cultural agreement was finally ready for signature. On the next day in the auditorium where the various agreements were presented for Shultz and Gromyko, and I was sitting next to Art Hartman, the agreement was signed and he said, "I'll get you the pen," which he did but I lost it.

Q: We have just finished discussing the negotiating and signing of the renewed exchange agreements in 1985. Would this be a good point to turn to your picture of the Soviet cultural scene during those first years of your second tour?

BENSON: Well, why not? The first years of the tour did not presage just yet the changes which occurred so quickly when Chernenko died and Gorbachev took over in March of 1985 under the doctrine of novea machanya, or new thinking, Glasnost, and Perestroika. Arriving in 1983--we've gone through this already--there were tough times immediately that year with Andropov disappearing from view, the KAL plane being shot down, but I found my old friends who were there--(Bella) Akhmadulina; (Andrei) Voznesensky; Roshin, the playwright; Yuri Lubimov was out of the country, living abroad at that time, he's back in Moscow now; (Oleg) Yefremov, deceased three or four weeks ago, the head of the Moscow Art Theater--many people, some of the artists, without going through name after name after name, were very willing to resume our acquaintance.

Q: This is the afternoon of June 12th 2000. Ray, we were talking about the cultural scene in Moscow from 1983 on.

BENSON: You were asking about the differences with earlier and how did things go--earlier meaning my earlier tour of 1975 to 1979--in view of the difficulties of the period, 1983-1984, the shooting down of the KAL plane, lame-duck governments at the top, tough language against the United States and so on, but there was not, as far as our relations with the cultural elites insofar as we knew them and met them--we knew many of them--there was no feeling that Stalinism lurked. They didn't feel it quite obviously, because they did welcome us. They didn't have to do that. They did attend the lunches and dinners and evening receptions, the concerts and so on that Arthur Hartman and his wife, Donna, sponsored at Spaso House, which I've referred to. They wrote for the drawer, meaning there was no substantial lessening of restrictions against publication, but there were no dramatic persecutions of people who were writing. There were no raids of apartments with police standing by and hauling out manuscripts from these drawers.

Q: Compared to some of the repression, the dissidents in the 1970s.

BENSON: Yes, or the 1960s even worse. You had (Andrei) Sinyavsky and (Yuli) Daniel. The refuseniks, some of whom were in the cultural area--these are people who had applied for permission to leave the country and were denied that permission, who had applied for visas to the United States and were denied that, many of them Jewish who had applied for the right to emigrate to Israel and were denied that--were very public in their protests about all of this. Sakharov was in Moscow at the early period here, if I recall it correctly, in the 1970s, and had been remanded to Gorky, where he lived, now named Nizhny Novgorod. He was only released from internal exile by Gorbachev in 1986. It was not too long after he came in and sort of gathered his strength, if you will, and sense of purpose.

But we found the theater very, under Soviet conditions after all, very adventurous. Sasha Gelman's place, Misha Roshin's place, Sakharov's place--although from a Leninist point of view, bless him--they didn't shy away from criticizing things as they were; or things as they might have been were adduced. The younger generation was depicted frequently being in opposition to parents, younger generation clad in jeans on stage, you know, this sort of thing. It was lively, it was interesting, and there was no thought of episodes like the bulldozer incident that you asked about, which preceded our arrival in 1975. The Balia Grozinskya exhibit hall was still in operation. The unofficial artists were selling to foreigners and trying to get out of the country. They were among the refuseniks. Arthur Hartman did marvelous things--I've said this three or four times already--with some of these people. They were hassled, they were interrogated. At the gate to Spaso House they had to stand in line, these people, with their passports, internal documents that is, with their invitations while the guards at the gate there--you've seen them--would look them up and down and make a great point of writing in a book what their names were. We had embassy officers, notably from my staff, who would wait out at the gate and escort these people in, or try to. They would be stopped by the guards. They would wait while these people were looked over, while this purposeful writing of their names into the book went on. Then they would be walked to the front door, somebody else would take over for the next person, and that's the way we did it. But it went on. That is to say, the groups came, the people came in, by and large. The Hartmans' point was made. The invitations were honored, as they were at occasions in our house. Cultural life was active, cultural life was rich. These people were hoping and waiting for change. Change was in the air, although one didn't know where it was going. Brezhnev had died, Andropov had died, Chernenko was on his last legs. You could barely tolerate the sight on television of Chernenko breathing. He had terrible emphysema; that's what he died from.

His shoulder was hunched over as is typical of people with emphysema, as he was trying to create a bellows effect to be able to breathe more easily with his diseased lungs. I think we might go on about this a little bit at length when we can see a typescript and so on, although I can't be encyclopedic in describing all of the things which were happening in the cultural scene below the threshold of the continuation, or within the context, of a system which still had a censor. You couldn't publish freely. You still had reviews by the Ministry of Culture committees, which would go to a theater prior to the dress rehearsal and sit there with the scripts in their hands and look at the text and review what was being said to see that they weren't sneaking anything by, while suggesting changes and so on.

Q: What about the effect, if any, of Gorbachev's taking power in March of 1985 on the cultural scene and your mission in dealing with the cultural world?

BENSON: Well, the effect was almost immediate, of his taking over, or at least it was soon in coming. You know that famous phrase which you have pointed out to me was Rabbi Hillel's rhetorical question, "If not we, who; and if not now, when?" is one that Gorbachev, without quoting Rabbi Hillel, addressed to a group of Soviet writers and intellectuals--not 250 people, maybe 25...

Q: In June of 1986, I think.

BENSON: ...that sound about right--whom he summoned to a meeting, and they talked about the creative arts. He said, "We've got to stimulate creative energies in the intellectual area; and "if now we, who, and if not now, when?" and was quoted in the papers, very openly quoted in the papers, as this meeting was described. Well, there were subsequent and, in fact, immediate developments in the so-called cultural journals, the learned journals, the thick journals, notably one journal which was more popular, which was Ogonyok under the editorship then of Vitaly Korotich. This is a separate story, but if you took on a horizontal level all of what was being published now Literaturnaya Gazeta, the literary paper of the writers' union, and the Soviet Kultura, the cultural paper of the cultural office of the Central Committee of the Communist Party--I think Kultura was a weekly and Literaturnaya Gazeta was also a weekly; Kultura might have been twice a week, I can't recall.

Picking up after a little break, there may be a lack of perfect transition, which we'll correct later. Things began to be published in various literary journals. Novi Mir; Questions of History, Voprosy Istorii; and so on simply loosened up. There were struggles within editorial boards. Certainly the historical and theoretical journals, which were closer to the core of Communist orthodoxy, had more of these struggles. The literary journals had fewer of them. Grossman's work was published [Ed: perhaps the reference is to Life and Fate published in 1980 in Switzerland], Vasily Grossman, the novelist.

Q: The novelist who wrote on Stalingrad, etcetera.

BENSON: Right. Rybakov, who wrote on Stalin, was published. The changes, the opening went on across the board. It was a time of really great excitement and a little puzzlement. Was this going to be like Khrushchev's thaw, which proved to be, relatively speaking, in crucial areas short lived or nonexistent? Khrushchev was not a great liberator after all. He loosened things up, to be sure, but not permanently and not, they would say, in a basic sense, but this seemed to be heading in a much more forcefully or much more purposefully and a much more basic direction. It was exciting to be there.

Q: Who were some of other key people in the embassy who you worked with during the Hartman years?

BENSON: Well, I noted already his DCM when we came back in 1983 was Warren Zimmerman. He later was very much in the public eye because he was the ambassador to Yugoslavia during the days when the country was falling apart, 1991. In any event, Warren had been in Moscow when we got there in 1975, in the political section. He left very shortly thereafter. He was a good linguist. He was a Yugoslav hand and a Soviet hand; we shared that. He was very intelligent. He had very good cultural tastes, if you will, as did his wife. He was very decisive without being arrogant. He was very quick to penetrate to the core of an issue, of a problem, of a situation, and he did not like for anybody he worked with to anticipate his judgment and to give him their judgment in anticipation of his; i.e., as a clumsy way of putting it, he didn't like 'yes' people. He wanted people to offer their view and to argue them, so that various intelligences could be brought to bear. There are some people who are very sharp in their way of expressing their views. Matlock was one who didn't seem to encourage that kind of behavior by people under them, but Matlock really did, but he didn't have the outward personality to encourage that. Warren did. I'm not saying one is better than the other, because it behooves a younger officer to fight through this until he's permanently squashed and then decide that indeed this other guy does not want to have a free flow of opinion. But Matlock did. He just didn't express his desire for it in the way that Warren did.

Warren was a remarkable wordsmith. He had been a speech writer somewhere in his early career in the State Department. He edited quickly, incisively, marvelously, and was in general a delight to serve with. He was very sociable, and we hung out a lot together. Matlock came in as ambassador during this second tour of ours. He had been the DCM in the earlier tour. He came in [April 1987] from the NSC after Hartman left [February 20, 1987]. We were old friends, and I don't know quite how to describe the situation, but let me do so, up to a point anyway. He followed an ambassador, Arthur Hartman, beloved by his staff, who had an extraordinarily popular wife, Donna Hartman. I'm talking about internal embassy relations, you know, not with the Soviets. Let me pause a minute to say Jack was totally bilingual and bicultural. There was very little he didn't know about Soviet history, Soviet literature. He had a great collection of Russian and Soviet literature, art, and so on.

Q: I understand he even gave speeches in languages like Georgian.

BENSON: Well, let me say that he claimed to be able to do all of that, and he would give speeches in different languages, but it reminds me of my days in Yugoslavia when I used to give speeches in Macedonian and Slovenian, having had them translated from Serbo-Croatian or English by my staff and coached in the various accents which were different and so on. Not to denigrate it or make it cheap, he thought this was important anyway, to show his respect for the local languages. And if an entire speech was not in Georgian, at least the opening paragraph would be, and it was terribly much appreciated by the local people.

Q: Certainly because the Russians in the non-Russian republics have never bothered to use any of the local languages.

BENSON: Absolutely. These speeches, by the way, were required at the openings and on occasions surrounding the presence in given cities of the USIA exhibits. We would go together. This was during his days as DCM. He would open an exhibit, I would speak and introduce him, he would speak, and so on. He was fine.

Q: In the 1980s you had no exhibits to open because the cultural agreement was in abeyance until 1985.

BENSON: Exactly. The first exhibit per the new agreement came to the Soviet Union after I departed in 1987. I did not witness it. It takes a while to get these things going. But Warren was a lovely man to work with. Jack Matlock, I had no trouble in working with at all. I've described my relations during our first tour when he encouraged me to become a reporting officer on certain issues of the day affecting the cultural scene, which he edited, to be sure, but never cut.

Q: When did Zimmerman leave as DCM in Moscow?

BENSON: Zimmerman must have left by January 1985. He could have left in the summer rotation cycle of 1984.

Q: Who replaced him as DCM?

BENSON: Curt Kamman, who moved up from Political Counselor and later became--I think he's in Latin America now, or South America--but he became the head of the U.S. Interests Section in Havana. He was a splendid linguist also, and was there all the time... In fact, let's look back. During our negotiations, the one who on behalf of the embassy would be looking at our text was generally Curt. It could very well be that Warren left around summer 1984. I simply do not remember.

Q: This is Robert Daniels continuing to interview Ray Benson, picking up on Monday, June 19th 2000. We are in the middle of discussing Ray's second tour in Moscow, which was 1983 to 1987. We would like to talk about developments after the conclusion of the cultural exchange agreement in October 1985 and the Geneva Summit meeting of November 1985 during which Shultz and Gromyko signed the exchange agreement.

BENSON: Remember Gorbachev was there and gave a signal to go ahead and sign it. Well, what happened afterward, after really the Christmas vacation, early in January 1986, I'll point out several things. There was an immediate barrage of program proposals for the "opening of the Soviet Union" which hit the desks of the action officers in USIA in Washington. Every state, every nonprofit organization, it would seem, from the Rotary Club on down seemed to have an idea, or have had pending for the last couple of years, about what they would do once the Soviet Union was “open again,” and this swamped the USIA. They decided the only way to handle it, since the desk, the program desk, in the European bureau was just incapable of dealing with this, had other things to do, was to open or create an office to deal with this whole matter. So they started small. Steve Rhinesmith was hired on contract to head the office. Molly Raymond from the Education and Cultural Bureau of USIA was seconded to it. The proper number of secretaries and computers and filing cabinets were scattered around some very nice office. Greg Gorov later joined this office.

Q: What was the office called?

BENSON: What was the office called, you ask. I shall have to look it up, and we'll put it in at a later stage. There was obviously a commitment in space, in resources, in persons by the USIA to try to make all of this coherent and to give form and a little bit of direction in liaison with us in the theater so that this could be reasonable in terms of our priorities and USIA's priorities. That was one effect that was with us for some years. That office no longer exists obviously and didn't last much longer than my tour of duty. But it did fulfill its function. We can talk more about that, and certainly when I review the text with you later, things will come to mind and we'll fill it in. The second interesting effect is one that you are quite familiar with from subsequent years. In January of 1986 several presidents of American universities visited the Soviet Union.

We got a telegram from the State Department saying that these people were coming and were on their way to see Sakharov. They wanted to talk with us, because we were the office which had negotiated the agreement. They were all excited about it, and in fact the leader of the group was Olin Robison, who was then the president of Middlebury College. They came into town. They contacted us. Three of them said that they would separate themselves from the rest of the group and come with me. Would I set up a meeting with the office which had negotiated--I've referred to this in a previous tape--negotiated the agreement. So David Fraser, the president of Swarthmore [1983-1991], and Alice Stone Ilchman, the president of Sarah Lawrence [1981-1998], and I and I think it was Carol Dorflin, the person in charge of academic exchanges in our office, we went along and talked with the people who in fact had been across the table from me during the negotiations. I've referred to this. The interesting thing was that these people were keen on developing a program of college-level, undergraduate, exchange with the Soviet Union, which didn't exist. There had been some Soviets who went to the States on special programs; some were undergraduates, especially Moscow State University/SUNY Albany exchange. They had a language student, language major, exchange.

Q: The major exchange before that, conducted by IREX, was at the level of graduate students and faculty?

BENSON: Yes, graduate students and faculty. There was a CIEE program that you've heard of. The Council of International Educational Exchange had a program which was located in Leningrad. It was for American students who could pass an exam signifying that they had a certain language achievement already, and they paid for the privilege of going to Leningrad. There was an American who ran the program, and it had a USIA grant annually and continued through all the bad days when there was no agreement.

Q: Go on about the idea of the undergraduate exchange.

BENSON: Well, the presidents led by, as I recall it, David Fraser and Olin Robison, Swarthmore and Middlebury, were saying how pleased they were that the cultural agreement had been signed and they knew this office had played a major role. The Soviet side said that it seemed to them that the time was right to have an undergraduate exchange. Students would go for a full year. This is what they would welcome. Obviously there had to be language preparation, but they would study in each other's country for that year. Certain details, many of them, would have to be developed. But what did they think about the prospect of beginning the new era with such an exchange? And they pointed out that the United States had such exchanges of foreign students from tens and dozens, 100 other countries, but not from the Soviet Union on the undergraduate level. Well, the Soviets, the people on the other side of the table, said, "It's just fine. We think you're right. It's time we move to try to implement such an idea. Fill in the blanks and make us an offer." We discussed other things. The meeting was very congenial, with tea and cakes and all of that. We went away. The presidents were in a state of euphoria. We from the embassy thought this was just idle blabbermouth talk.

Well, what happened then was that Robison went back to the States and had a meeting of his athletic conference, NESCAC (New England Small College Athletic Conference), which was dealing with hockey scheduling, paused in Boston on the way back to Middlebury. After the meeting, he asked them if they would give him five minutes, and he told them of this conversation, just about that much, and he asked for a show of hands which of the group sitting there would be interested at all, if they could get the details ironed out, in hosting Soviet students for a year and sending theirs over for a year, and everybody raised his hand. So, as Olin told me later, "I now had a problem. I had to do something with this brainstorm of ours." He went back to Middlebury, continued on, and wrote a letter to the group and only two or three backed off. One was not at the meeting; that was Bryn Mawr. Another was Tufts, and the third at that point was Haverford, with Amherst saying neither yea nor nay. The next thing that happened is that--I didn't know any of this until later--Tom Beyer, professor at Middlebury and the chairman of the Russian Department, came into Moscow, called on me, and asked if I was aware of this interest among the small colleges. "No." Well, he would like to bring the results thus far to the Soviet side.

So I said, "You must go to the Ministry of Higher Education, because ultimately it's going to have to be that body which will be the action office on the Soviet side. Don't worry about going to the Foreign Office, but they will have been informed." So he went to the Ministry, and he got to be very, very busy. He called me from the airport on the way out, and he said, "They said, 'Of course, yes, but where is that document or where are those details?'" He said, "I've got to talk to Olin." Well, next thing we heard, from the Department, I guess it was, or USIA, was that Olin Robison wanted to visit. This would have been in the mid-spring 1987.

Let me think a minute on this timing. We signed the agreement in November 1985. This was 1987. I might have earlier said that they visited in January of 1986, but they didn't. It percolated during that year while the office of Steve Rhinesmith was doing its thing. In any case, it was the early spring of 1987. By then I was a short-timer, with order to depart post midsummer, early summer. And into town came Olin with his wife Sylvia toting two enormous bags, Middlebury tote bags, of catalogs from 18 or 19 separate academic institutions. We went over to the Ministry of Higher Education. A huge group assembled. Olin, I, and Carol Dorflin lay on them all of these catalogs and the fact that we wanted to start this agreement; we were quite serious about it. This is Olin speaking. "We, the consortium here..." There might be a very good thing at the end of it, but he said to them that there were certain principles that the American side would insist on. It was arrogant to do that, but at the on-set we should say so so that there be no misunderstanding later. And they said, "We were quite aware," with a certain amount of concern. "Well, what are these principles you would insist on?" He said, "Well, they're very simple actually. Number one and perhaps most important, there would be no accompanying person, an uncle, a watchdog, from the Soviet Union, as these students would go out in twos and threes to each of these institutions. You should, however, have one person resident at Middlebury who would be in contact with them." At that time, you know, emails were beginning, and there were telephones. Olin speaking now: "Middlebury College would provide the basic costs. No trouble in communicating by telephone. So that's a basic principle. Another basic principle is that we cannot sign an agreement with you that does not say that the goal of this program is to have equality among the genders. You would have to send female students in about equal numbers. Further, it would have to be another principle for a full year; no semester students. And as for the rest, we ought to have an agreement. There'll be many, many details, and let's sort of get on with it."

The Soviet side agreed that these principles were satisfactory. They would be difficult, but it was satisfactory. There was nothing really onerous about it. "Let's talk about an agreement." And then, of course, the devil is in the details. Olin brought out the catalogs and--this is an aside--it was really amazing. Obviously he put Middlebury's catalogs on top. Why not? And there was a little description, a little brochure, on the Snow Bowl, the Middlebury ski slopes. The Soviets said, "What is this, a vacation spot?" and Olin said, "These are the ski slopes at Middlebury College's upland campus." They passed this around--I'll never forget this--beautiful pictures of what is in fact a beautiful slice of Vermont. It's a ski slope with many lifts and a lodge down at the bottom. It took them--and I don't know when we left if they really believed it--it took them a long time to absorb the fact that this was open to all students and it was where competitions were held among colleges and that it belonged to Middlebury College and that if their students would come to Middlebury they could ski on the slopes. In general there was both acceptance of the proposal in principle and disbelief about some of the conditions, which were very favorable actually to the Soviet side. Out of that came the request by Olin that I on retirement come to Middlebury and start the program. I did retire in July according to plan and came to Middlebury and we started a program, which is not the subject of these interviews.

Q: Nevertheless your tour in Moscow, which is very much the subject of this interview, underscores your role in this major accomplishment for you and USIA.

BENSON: It was a major accomplishment, if I do say so, though the agreement was only developed later in the year after I retired and mostly in early January 1988.

Q: This is when you were on the other end of it representing the consortium and working for Middlebury.

BENSON: Yes, yes, but to follow up on what you said a minute ago, the fact that they all knew me--after all, I had had eight years there and importantly I had been there for the last four and had headed the negotiation and brought these three professors and presidents to Moscow; that's when the idea was launched--it gave me such credibility with the Ministry of Higher Education that the launching of the program and then the continuation of the program, which was both effortless, one could say, and had so many problems to overcome in the first years because of the translation of the different systems of education for one side and for the other. Again, that isn't the subject of this interview but, yes, I will accept the fact that my being known by all of them was absolutely instrumental in the thing getting going and succeeding for as long as we had the money to keep it going.

Q: Now, the fact that you were able to get this very major exchange program started, from the signing of the cultural agreement through working for Middlebury, seems to reflect the breath of fresh air that came in with Gorbachev in 1985.

BENSON: There's no question of that. There is simply no question, and I suspect that will require a little more time before it is written up well under that heading, Gorbachev's Gift. But from the point of view of an American who was very doubtful of the sincerity of the Reagan administration in searching for broad-ranging agreements with the evil empire, it was of great interest, a fascination, very warming to see that during a Republican Administration these organizations jumped on the opportunity presented to bring these elements of the two societies together for a series of exchanges which were extremely productive.

Q: Today is June 19, 2000 and we continuing our discussion with Ray Benson of the situation in Moscow 1985 to 1987 and the circumstances around the conclusion of the undergraduate exchange program with the American Collegiate Consortium.

BENSON: The United States government, the USIA budget, found the means to offer financial encouragement to organizations which would send in proposals. They would come to the office, as I said a littler earlier that Steve Rhinesmith headed. There was a serious evaluatory process going on there. They were graded as to the seriousness of the proposal--you know how these things would be done--and the profile of the organization and so on. Offices within the government, the National Security Council, and USIA, Charles Wick and his intimate advisors were solidly in favor of moving this thing along. We are, after all, in 1987. Just a few years earlier it had all been the Centurion evil-empire period on both sides, vituperation, and really akin to saber rattling. It was really reassuring and heartwarming to see that this initiative was taking off and so welcomed. This was a period of resumption of planning for the big USIA exhibits. I didn't see the first one, which came in afterward. This was the period of the resumption of funding for a certain number of concert groups.

This was the period when Vladimir Horowitz, the pianist, revisited the Soviet Union in April 1986. That visit was negotiated commercially. We facilitated that all the way by accompanying the negotiator, by advising, I guess you might say, on the behavior of Gosconcert. Peter Gelb was the entrepreneur who developed the project. This is all a subject for longer reminiscence by Peter if he would do it. In fact, Horowitz came, Horowitz played, Horowitz visited various places in Moscow which he remembered very keenly from the days of his youth. He visited Leningrad, formerly St. Petersburg, once again now St. Petersburg. He visited old friends. He visited Scriabin's, a Russian composer, Scriabin's daughter, whom he knew when she was a little girl and he tinkled the keys on the Scriabin piano in the Scriabin home.

Q: You know that Scriabin was Molotov's uncle?

BENSON: By golly, I knew that was his name, Scriabin, but I didn't know he was of that family.

Q: That's what I understand.

BENSON: Well, fie on him, a grand lineage. It was a tremendous event, the Horowitz concert and all of the various episodes in Moscow. He stayed at the residence of the ambassador, Spaso House, he and his wife. Arthur Hartman was still ambassador.

Anyway, I was brought back myself to USIA at least once for long meetings with all manner of offices in USIA who were eager to steer some of their program money in the direction of work in the Soviet Union. It was a problem for us at the Moscow embassy, for me, to say "no." There is only a certain amount that can be done, not because the staff was limited, but it was, and not because our budget was limited, because it wasn't--we were unleashed--but simply because the potential Russian cooperating agencies, bodies, cities were not capable of handling all of this, nor was it useful to overload the circuits. Good, solid programs were initiated, were resumed, and on that basis we thought we would go on to see where both sides would agree on expansion.

But, I think my first visit was in early 1986, to emerge from Washington and return to the post in Moscow with the idea of spending $4,000,000, $2,000,000, for academic exchange student programs, concerts, and so on. Grants would be given to 15 American nonprofit organizations which wanted to have our intimate support in running programs through the Soviet Union, programs which had not yet been defined. This, it seemed to me, was a little too much.

Promises were made about what would happen, how much good work could be done by the new office and by the offer to expand USIA funds to run these new programs. It really was a bit of to-ing and fro-ing between us in Moscow and those in the United States and Washington with the best of will, who wanted to start everything at the same time. We had an enormous amount going, and it was great fun. When I left in July of 1987, everything was moving along marvelously.

The IREX program zoomed in full speed. In fact, when we go back and edit the text, Bill, I should note that Allen Kassoff and Dan Matuszewski came into Moscow in the course of the negotiations, because the implementing conditions, which was the third agreement among the three parts of the cultural agreement, i.e., general conditions, program agreement, and implementing conditions. And the details--again the devil--included details about the stipends, length of time, categories, and what have you, in the IREX program. Dan and Allen came to Moscow and helped for the day or two that we were centered on the IREX paragraph, and that program was booming along. ACTR, the American Council of Teachers of Russian, was looking to expand. SUNY was running its program very well. The Purdue program was running very well. The Rutgers/New Jersey State Consortium, which I mentioned earlier, signed an agreement in 1979 that lapsed almost immediately because of the invasion of Afghanistan, was now interested in resuming its efforts. The Midwest Consortium for International Action, so-called MUCIA was interested in resuming its program. I'll try to recall the name, but perhaps it's not that important. He visited me when I was the acting DCM at the end of 1983 and said that times were tough but they were certainly interested in resuming this. They were nine of the Big Ten universities, and by 1987 they were away and running. It was amazing what was happening. It will be of interest to you that the Project Harmony, which has Vermont roots in the person of David Kelly, whom you know well, visited Moscow soon after the agreement was signed and encouraged us to be helpful as they started their work. Project Harmony at its outset had a very proper name. They were going to exchange choral groups of high school students. The organization continues and has a much wider scope of operation. It's difficult to go on about every single program initiative, I don't remember them now. I may add a few as we edit this.

Q: But in 1986-87 there was really an explosion of exchange initiatives on the American side and a comparatively wide opening on the Soviet side to receive them.

BENSON: That's absolutely the case. You see, on the Soviet side you had a document. This is a highly bureaucratized society. For SUNY Albany, or Purdue, or New Jersey, or what have you, it was interesting that you have the document because it means that they're more open on the Soviet side to resuming negotiations, but it doesn't have the same weight. In the Soviet Union it meant everything to have the Ministry of Education and Culture; Coskino, you know the film people and the exhibits people, and so on and so forth, have a document on which they could base their work, an approval for action. So there was an explosion absolutely immediately. It was very rewarding for those of us who had spent all of that time negotiating.

Q: About this time, shortly before you left Moscow for the last time, you received an award for public diplomacy.

BENSON: I did, yes. It was at Tufts University. I'm glad you remembered that. Yes, there is an annual award given to a person working in this area. It doesn't offer a financial reward; it's just an award, and so it isn't endowed, but it has been given the name Ed Murrow Award for Excellence in Public Diplomacy, one a year, and that year they gave it to me. It was really splendid. I went to Tufts and was given it at their graduation ceremony. I was promoted to the rank of Career Minister, I think, the year before. Those were the final recognition of my achievements.

Q: Let me ask a general question about your career experience. It seems to me that you have a very high regard on the whole for the professionalism of the people you worked with in your various postings abroad. On the other hand an American academic often had a jaundiced, if not to say cynical, view of the institutions and the people he's worked with. Is that a fair impression of those two worlds?

BENSON: Well, that's a fascinating question. When I first came to Middlebury to oversee the exchange program we have referred to, Olin Robison sat me down and he offered several pieces of advice, some of which are totally irrelevant but one of which bears exactly on your question. He said, "You will not find here on this campus, even though I am running the college, what you found at an embassy. There is no discipline here. There is no chain of command, even though I am the president here. The most that we can achieve is to have what you might call organized--and he drew his voice out--organized chaos. But nobody listens to anybody necessarily." But the opposite is what happens or should happen at an embassy. You have to have, at an embassy or within your own staff, you have to have it clear that within your own staff, if you are a public affairs officer, that you're the boss. If you're the ambassador, you're the boss. But in order to allow the creative juices of the other people to move, to flow, and to keep on moving and flowing, you have to encourage and allow discussion of every issue. At the end of the day it may be that the vote, if you want to put it that way, in the country team is 13 to one, the ambassador being the one, and that is what we will do.

Q: As Abraham Lincoln said, "The ayes have it."

BENSON: Exactly, it's absolutely the case. He may have been able to run the government that way. He had his trouble with some of his people under him, didn't he? But that, it seems to me, defines the way in which an embassy has to run and defines the way in which it did run. I suppose what you see--it's not unfair to put it this way, it's certainly not unfair to me to put it this way now--what you see in my judgment of the people I worked under is a reflection of their respect for my work. Even Bill Macomber, whom I may have described this way earlier--I certainly will when we edit--who would become so furious at me for certain things that he would throw things, always threw to miss and always missed, became and really was a good friend. He threw ashtrays. But, you know, the people I worked with--I pause to say this--in Eastern Europe at that time, certainly in the Soviet Union at that time, were very experienced hands. I don't know how Moscow is staffed these days, but everyone had gone through language school. Many people had degrees in Soviet affairs. Many were on their second or third tours. It was a volunteer service then, and the momentum or the excitement in being there--some of the days were tough, with the KGB and the microwaves and all of that; we haven't paid sufficient attention to the microwaves; we will when we do the redraft--there was a commitment on the part of everybody, from the military attachés, the (CIA) station people, bless them; to those of us in the more traditional Foreign Service. If that continues now I do not know.

Q: You've explained the character of your work experience on a structural basis and would compare it with Olin Robison's view of the college from the top down. I'm thinking rather of the view of leaders from the bottom up, that your experience with the people you worked with, the caliber of the people that you worked under seems to be uniformly on the whole much better than the average academic or governmental experience.

BENSON: Well, of course, it's hard for me to compare. My career was spent entirely in diplomatic service except for the 12 years in Middlebury, where I was both within the context of the college and running a separate program where I had enormous independence. The people, I repeat, the people whom I worked with in my foreign service career, there was never a political appointee; they were always deeply experienced. Arthur Hartman I have described as one who didn't know much about the Soviet Union, but he was a quintessential diplomat, personable, intelligent, graceful. Matlock was frequently not so personable, not so graceful. But he was one of the world's great experts on the Soviet Union. Now, if you work under him and you do not realize that and do not respect it, you're a fool. And furthermore, you're not only a fool but you're going to ruin the program that works under you. Now, in my case I was a personal friend of Jack Matlock's, as well as my wife, so it made all of that easier. Mack Toon, this was his third turn-around in the Soviet Union. He'd been the head of SOV, the Soviet Bureau.

Q: Did you find, comparing notes with other people in USIA or in the Foreign Service who had worked under different kinds of people in different situations and worked under political appointees, for instance, did you find distinct different in the atmosphere of your posts compared with others that you came to know about?

BENSON: The answer is yes and yes. A political appointee--as I say, I never worked with one; many of my friends did--could be a marvelous person and could have been a good businessman and knows how to work with a board or an executive committee but doesn't know anything about the country. That political appointee's problem in organizing the staff and playing any role at all in the embassy is a very keen one under the heading of management, but it doesn't have included within it any of the substantive expertise that all of the people I have named brought to their job. Look at Eagleburger, Anderson and Scanlon. I never worked under Scanlan; he was a deputy there. But, my goodness, these are people who began their academic studies in dealing with foreign policy affairs and the language and were on their second and third tours. So there is that matter of substance that you can't expect from a political appointee.

Q: But anyway, the East European posts and USIS were grounded much more in expertise on the area compared with the services generally?

BENSON: Yes, certainly USIS. There were examples of people who were assigned as ambassadors to East Europe, not to the Soviet Union, whose credentials involved their being firm and sometimes very loud anti-Communists.

Q: Perhaps also being of the nationality by descent of the country they were posted to?

BENSON: Yeah. Well, that in itself might make them very sensitive to the situation. It could also make them falsely arrogant about how much they know because they knew the language well. And it could mean that they were vehemently prejudiced against the current regime because they had suffered, or their family had, under them. It doesn't necessarily lead to a balanced approach to relations with the United States. But by and large, your point is well taken. Other posts, other missions, in East Europe were well served by, by and large, experienced Foreign Service officers. Moscow, the mission there was headed in historical timeline by people who were not diplomats: Walter Beetle Smith (1946-48), Thomas Watson (1979-1981), Robert Strauss (1991-1992), or earlier Admiral Standley (1942-43).

Q: In your time it seems that at least the missions in Belgrade and Moscow were very well served by the people who were in charge and people who worked for them.

BENSON: We were equally well served in Ankara. When I got there, the ambassador was Bill Handley [June 1969-April 1973]. Bill Handley, a State Department officer obviously, had worked under Joe Sisco in the Near East Bureau of State and then was seconded to USIA, where he ran the Near East geographical office in USIA as a lone State Department officer. By the time he appeared in Ankara, an East European hand who knew everything about USIA--Turkey had been moved to the European Bureau in USIA--perfect man for the post. Bill Macomber came in. I worked under Bill Handley for only one year. Macomber came in, had been the ambassador in Jordan, and had been the author of a study on the reorganization of the State Department. He was the head of a series of task forces, the so-called Macomber Report. That's pretty good background. Neither of them knew more than 10 words of Turkish. That was very rare.

Q: There must have been special atmospherics to Moscow, at least until Gorbachev's time, of being almost marooned on a desert island, being the American embassy surrounded by a hostile sea, so that the people in that post would really have to depend on each other psychologically perhaps more than in the conventional diplomatic post?

BENSON: Well, that's an interesting question, and the answer to it is yes, that's what was the case and should have been acknowledged by all. It frequently challenged people. Not everybody is capable of becoming a collegial member of a community, just by the nature of the psychology of that person. The embassy in the 1970s and in the early 1980s was relatively small by all objective criteria. It's a huge country we're dealing with. The embassy now is enormous, as you may have heard, and the function assigned to it. NASA has a huge staff, the DEA has a huge staff, the IRS has a huge staff, and the FBI has a staff there. This was unthinkable in our day.

Q: And these people have filled up the premises of the new embassy while the old one still functions?

BENSON: I think that's what's happening. I don't--this is a little beyond me there; I was there obviously my last tour when the 'oh my God' discovery was made that the Soviets, left to their own devices, which we left them to, had implanted bugs all over the darn place, and so the new embassy was not be usable. That is being corrected. I do not know. I'll know more after our visit in September. We're going to be the guests of the DCM in Moscow. I do not know what they have done with that huge building. I know that when I was there last they were continuing to scrape out the interior and haul away all the stuff. The problem was that the bugs were implanted in the steel I-beams. We had in our wisdom allowed them to provide the construction members. It was really pretty silly.

Q: The bugs were in these beams when they brought them into the construction site.

BENSON: There you have it. Apart from the tunnels underneath the building... It was really pitiful.

Q: Can you tell us about the tunnel episode during your second tour of duty in Moscow?

BENSON: The tunnel episode was very widely reported in the American press. It came to pass that the CBs (Navy Construction Battalion workers) were contracted by the State Department to provide certain expert, highly cleared obviously, maintenance people. These were people who would be able to repair complicated communications equipment, but they would also be able to paint and plaster in classified offices. Here we are not talking about classified offices, and maybe if memory serves, they would also employ the sons of some Foreign Service Officers to do routine painting of bachelor officer apartments in the south wing of the embassy. As I recall the story, they had finished a wall or two and were sitting on the floor enjoying a sandwich and a Coke and talking about the security perils of living in the embassy and listening devices and so on. One of them says to another one, "You know, if you see on the wall, for example, a little black spot, it could very well be the end of a wire, and that wire could very well be a point of reception for an apparatus which is a little further along so that sound, speech and so on can be transmitted to this apparatus." As they were sitting there, this one guy says to the other, "You know, I'm looking at the radiator, and that's a perfect place to have such a wire, and I am looking at a black spot behind that radiator. It can't be, can it?" And so they walk over, and damned if it wasn't a wire.

They quickly brought reinforcements in there and traced the wire through the wall to a nonfunctioning chimney, because these south wing apartments had been part of the apartment structure which was basically Soviet. And the chimney went downstairs to a boiler as part of the heating system for this wing of the apartment complex before we took over this part of it. Having taken over this part of it, the chimney was no longer functioning. It was a huge chimney. Inside of it there was a staircase, or stepladder, protruding rungs. If you find the proper issue of Newsweek or Time, you'll find all this described with pictures and everything. Well, it may have taken more than a day, but they cut their way through. How they camouflaged with all of the people who were listening, I have no idea. They worked their way into the chimney, they came down the chimney, they moved along a hall into the basement of the nearby apartment building, and found themselves face to face with several people with earphones and battery devices, a very proper listening room. Well, what shall I say? Diplomatic protests, news stories. We cleaned up our act on that wall. The whole building was thoroughly inspected. Now, in this effort to get to the bottom of it, there was a lot of digging. You go down the chimney and then you have to dig through...

Q: Roughly when was this episode with the chimney?

BENSON: This would have been probably 1984. I think it was 1984. There was a lot of earth that was piled up outside near the staircases on the south wing. I came home from a trip out of town, saw the earth and asked someone and that is how I became aware of some but not the whole story. Then I soon became aware of the whole story as I talked to people in the security office.

Q: This is June 19th 2000, afternoon. We are continuing on the review of certain special episodes in Ray Benson's Moscow tours of duty, now finishing the story of the bugging that was discovered through a chimney and tunnel in 1984.

BENSON: Early in the morning very soon after I came back from this trip and became aware of what was happening out there, there was a ring on our doorbell, and standing out there leaning on the door jamb was Kevin Close of The Washington Post and Dan Fisher of the Los Angeles Times, both of them very new in Moscow, very young and tall, good-looking guys, superb.

They said--I think it was Kevin who said, "All right, Ray, what's going on out there with the tunnel?" I can't remember what I said then and how the story played out. I know that pretty soon everybody became aware of it, it was in all the papers, protests were made, guilt was denied. We patched up our walls and made sure there was nothing sticking into them that would lead to any Soviet listening apparatuses.

Q: There was also some security problem involving the Marine guards.

BENSON: Well, that would have been in 1986, because there were still Soviet employees at the embassy. There were two Marine guards who were accused of having become involved with local female employees in our embassy and of having succumbed to temptation, including giving these women, especially one, I guess, materials from safes that they were monitoring as part of their responsibilities, the safe they would open and close. Details are a little remote in my memory. I can't remember exactly. It was, of course, a terrible time.

It was 1986. I now recall that one of the Marines had been transferred to Vienna, but had on temporary assignment gone to the Summit in Geneva. It was he who couldn't bear it any longer and made a clean breast of it with the security officer in Vienna. One was acquitted of responsibility. One went to prison. I think he is now released. He was a Native American, which is irrelevant except that much was made of it because he was the one who went to prison. The other guy was released, that is to say was not prosecuted. It helped create the climate of heightening concern for security which came to a head later in 1986 when, I think it was in October, the Soviets removed all Soviet employees from the embassy overnight. They didn't appear for work one day.

This was in retaliation for the United States government's asking the Soviet embassy to remove from the United States an awful lot--my recollection it was in the 40s, maybe 50--Soviet citizens who were doing various things--could have been newsmen or tourist people--in the United States including some so-called lower-ranking employees of the Soviet embassy in the United States.

Let's say "so called" because they might have been senior officers of the KGB who were driving vehicles around. They were given access to running around town in a way that others would be followed more closely. In any event, we at the embassy on this given morning suddenly had nobody, no char force, no chauffeurs, no customs expeditors or travel people, nobody buying tickets, nobody helping in the mail room hauling mail sacks and so on. The word came at a time when my wife and I were in Helsinki on unclassified pouch courier duty. Twice a week somebody from Moscow went to Helsinki by train and came back by train with the unclassified pouches, which were mostly mail for embassy personnel. But we were called in the morning and were told to come back on schedule, but don't worry about accompanying any bags because there wouldn't be any bags because we couldn't figure out how to have trucks driven to the railroad station and we didn't even know the procedure for presenting unclassified pouch customs clearance papers because the Soviet employees had been doing it all these years. We were told what had happened and "come back and we'll all talk about it together," so we came back without any bags.

The embassy had to go into sort of Plan B. Duty rosters were set up which people were assigned to different tasks in addition to the regular work they were doing, tasks which had been accomplished by Soviet employees including mopping floors and cleaning windows and cleaning toilets and sinks and carrying equipment in the back yard and driving, chauffeuring, repairing motors, clearing things at the customs shed and the airport and so on and so forth. This went on for months and months. We were all assigned to specific tasks. Mine was on the ground floor doing halls and the bathrooms off of the hall; that's what I did, from the consular office bathrooms through the hall. My mind goes back now; I can count the bathrooms for you, but I won't. I was very proud of doing a good job. It was in a way the embassy's finest hour. It again illustrates a point that you have made on several occasions about the sense of community which a time of stress can engender, which has to be there if you're going to keep on functioning. Again, it was a wonderful show by professional Foreign Service officers. Art Hartman was the ambassador. Everything had to be done, vacuuming of the carpets; it goes on and on and on.

Q: How was it finally resolved to get the staff back?

BENSON: Well, I'm trying to think. I do not think that in our day--we left in July of 1987--the char force had returned to duty. We still had no Russian staff. In fact, by then various of functions at the embassy had been contracted out to American firms, Pacific Engineering or Boeing.

Q: I've always wondered since my first experience in Moscow--that goes back about 45 years--why in a country like the Soviet Union we would hire locals to do all kinds of embassy jobs whereas over here the Soviets would only bring Soviets to do work in their embassy. Was there an inherent security problem?

BENSON: Of course there was. There was an inherent security problem. There's no question about it. It was foolish.

Q: But this has been a practice throughout the American foreign diplomatic missions to employ locals for any kind of non-sensitive and non-specialist job. One other episode I want to ask about if we can get it on this tape, and that is the problem of the new embassy building in Moscow and the bugging that was discovered built into the structure.

BENSON: Well, that's a statement of the fact. I cannot remember a date. I would imagine it was in 1986. It was certainly playing out in 1987 as we left this assignment in the summer of 1987. The new embassy was being put up finally. Sophisticated means of testing the security of this building discovered that the new embassy, which was in the center of the complex surrounded by townhouse and a low-lying building in which there would be two theaters and an exhibit area and the consular section, this building which was in the center was riddled with bugs, many of which had been implanted in the steel construction beams. The framework of the building was riveted steel I-beams, which we had contracted from the Soviets. We had bought cement from them; they poured it.

Which reminds me--I'll put it in right here--of a story I got from a friend of mine who was in Poland at the time when we were building a new embassy there. Part of the contract there was that we would pour the concrete, they would not. Our workers would appear in the morning to discover that six inches of concrete had been poured overnight, which we would then remove, and all sorts of fancy little bugs would be pulled out. The Poles would be scolded. They would say, "Can't understand how this happened." Very tediously the embassy went up, after which, again, sophisticated means of counter surveillance were brought in and discovered the walls were just ridden with the kind of wire, which was a transmitting wire, that I have described a few moments ago as having been found in Moscow.

This experience notwithstanding, we were very, by my likes, very careless in Moscow, which is even a more severe security environment. The new embassy was finally declared not useful, and to my understanding, to this point it has not been remodeled, refurbished so that it is. They were scraping out the insides and getting rid of a lot of stuff and analyzing carefully whatever they hauled out, but the embassy is still in its old quarters. I don't have more in detail about that episode. It added to the whole sense of being beleaguered.

I should speak about the IBM typewriters, which at one point we had ordered a bunch of for the embassy, very sophisticated machines, you know, that had memory and all of that. This is the last step before the personal computer was brought to us. Through analyzing certain behavior on the Soviet side, it was concluded that the messages typed on these typewriters were being read. It was finally determined that somehow or other between the IBM factory and receipt in the embassy, the most fine and small and sophisticated apparatuses had been inserted so that everything you typed could be read.

Well, what to do? Well, what to do is put all typewriters within the secure rooms. You know, the embassy had many of them, though we had not used them to put the secretaries in with these machines, but that's what happened.

Q: In the secure rooms then whatever signal came out of the typewriter could not be picked up from the outside?

BENSON: Well, the first thing you do is remove these devices. Once you've discovered one, you know how to find all of them, then have, you hope, clearer typewriters. But from the on, classified information was typed in those rooms. The rooms were used for dictating. You couldn't dictate anything classified outside of those rooms, or for conferences, one-on-one discussions and so on. But we had not seen them as a typing pool. My recollection is that a large room was brought in, one of these new ones, and put up near the political section and a bunch of typewriters were placed in there. It created--you can see all of these things together--an atmosphere of being beleaguered in security terms, which I guess we always had been.

Q: It's a little paradoxical that your sense of being beleaguered in the security matters was getting even worse in 1985-1986 after Gorbachev had come in and after you were scoring breakthroughs in the negotiation of the exchange agreement and getting academic exchanges moving.

BENSON: Yes, there is not here in my view a contradiction, because the search by one side for a more sophisticated way of becoming aware of what the other side was doing, thinking, writing, receiving, sending, went on and continues today. It is not sensible to think that it stopped at any time. Means of surveillance would jump ahead of means of apprehending the means of surveillance, and then the latter would jump ahead. Technology was a wonderful thing, and it's probably going on at this minute at a level that maybe one side or the other side doesn't know anything about, but so it goes.

PARKER W. BORG
Deputy, Office of Counter Terrorism
Washington, DC (1984-1986)

Ambassador Borg was born and raised in Minnesota and educated at Dartmouth College and Cornell University. In 1965, after a tour with the Peace Corps in the Philippines, he joined the Foreign Service and was posted to Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia. During his career he served in Vietnam and Zaire, and in the State Department in senior positions concerning Vietnam, West Africa and Counter Terrorism. He served as US Ambassador to Mali (1981-1984) and to Iceland from 1993 to 1996. Ambassador Borg was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: Today is the seventh of October 2002. Parker, in 1985 you were going out to combat terrorism. What was the job?

BORG: It was 1984, it was the summer of 1984, and Bob Oakley had asked me to come back and work with him as his deputy in the Office of Counterterrorism. I knew little about the job. I arrived in August before he arrived. The office was then headed by Ambassador Robert Sayre, and I worked with him for the first couple of weeks before Bob Oakley arrived, but I do recall that the very first weekend that I got there, something like August 24th, there was a hijacking, and that would be the pattern of the way things would be for the duration of the next two years that I worked in that office. There seemed to be hijackings or terrorist incidents almost continuously.

Q: When you say a hijacking, did you gear up if it was a hijacking of a Russian, or at this time a Soviet, plane by Chechnyan people? Or was this only ones that concerned us?

BORG: We were concerned about hijackings especially if they were American aircraft or, secondarily, if there were Americans aboard the aircraft and, in a third position, if they were the aircraft of a friendly government where we might have some kind of other relationship.

Q: These things change. In this '84 to '86 period, what constituted in our definition 'terrorism'?

BORG: Well, the number of incidents increased dramatically about 1983-84, and the predominant view when we came into the office was that there was a very close Russian connection behind most terrorism around the world. Clair Sterling had written a book which tied the Russians to the assassination of the Pope...

Q: The attempted assassination.

BORG: ...excuse me, the attempted assassination - and pointed out that most of the Palestinian groups had had training that was supported by countries that were supported by the Soviet Union, that East Germany provided haven for terrorist groups and that, if you looked carefully at every single terrorist group, you could find a Russian connection. I guess, in addition, there were all of the leftist guerilla groups in Europe, the Red Army faction...

Q: Bader Meinhof.

BORG: ...Bader Meinhof gang. All of them, Italy, France, Belgium, Japan, they all had leftist terrorist groups. Bob in particular felt that this was not correct, that the correct way to look at terrorism was that there were individual causes in each one of the countries that had led people to become terrorists and that in the Middle East it was very dangerous to try and tie the Soviet Union to all the different terrorist-related activities, and that in Western Europe there may have been leftist groups but there was no clear evidence that the Soviet Union was in fact supporting what they were doing, that they seemed often to be independent operators who were pursuing their own leftist agenda.

Q: Now, in a way, given the time period, this would have been rather unpopular in the power structure.

BORG: We suspected that it would be but, in fact, by declining to emphasize a Russian connection and focusing on the local groups that were behind the different incidents and seeking programs to combat the terrorist problem individually within each country, we essentially went beyond the simplistic notion that there was a Soviet connection. There was another issue that was going on at the same time and that was, because of the considered threat to Americans, there was a commission that had been set up in mid-1984 that became known as the Inman Commission that looked at diplomatic security outside the United States and what do we need to do to beef up the protection of American diplomats overseas. This quickly got confused with the whole question of counterterrorism, and we had to fight a bureaucratic battle to stay separate from the new diplomatic security office. We argued that diplomatic security was essential to protect American embassies and American government personnel overseas but that was not our issue. Our issue was the broad question of terrorism as a policy and the way it impacted on our foreign relations and the way it affected American citizens in general, not just the American official community. It took us a while to convince people that this was a separate issue, but eventually we were able to keep ourselves separate from the Bureau of Diplomatic Security. We were originally, for the first year or so, operating under the Deputy Under Secretary for Management - I guess he was called the Deputy Under Secretary for Management at the time. After about a year the office was changed from being MCT to being SCT. We became an adjunct to the Secretary's office.

Q: Diplomatic security, was this the normal bureaucratic tug-and-pull of trying to expand its horizons, do you think, or was it just a misperception?

BORG: The Inman Commission created a vast new bureaucracy which greatly expanded what the activities of what had previously had a different name - it wasn't Diplomatic Security - and there was a great augmentation of personnel brought into the organization. Diplomatic security officers were assigned to posts throughout the world, standards were created for what embassies needed to be like, and there was a tremendous emphasis on protecting the American diplomatic presence outside the United States. It was much more a question for us of maintaining our identity and maintaining the policy issue, that this was not a part of protecting American diplomatic personnel. That was the purpose, that was their program and they should do it. We did not feel that the Diplomatic Security people should be the ones dealing with foreign governments when it came to general terrorist issues, that this was a clear and separate issue which would have gotten lost in diplomatic security.

Q: In a way, I can see you had two customers, clients, or people you went after. One would be the intelligence people within the United States, the CIA, the FBI, INR and the military, to feed you information, but the other one would be foreign governments, particularly the police powers or their investigative powers. Let's talk about the overseas operation first. What were you doing?

BORG: Overseas we were, for the first year or so, responding to terrorist incidents as they occurred and participating on almost a weekly basis in task forces back in Washington where we were attempting to resolve these crises. There were the individual crises, individual terrorist incidents, the various hijackings that took place; and the second type of crisis was the continuing presence of hostages in Lebanon, and an organization known as Hezbollah kept taking Americans in Beirut and holding them hostage. This was an issue that was there when we started in the office and was there when I left the office. It was a continuing high-profile and very difficult issue that we spent an awful lot of time on. This goes back to your original question of how were embassies organized. I'm trying to think if we had a counterterrorism coordinator. I don't think so, because if there was an incident, then the ambassador and the DCM and everybody became involved, and when there wasn't an incident, we were focused somewhere else. So it wasn't the sort of thing where there was a continuing problem. The bureaucracies in Washington were far more complicated. We first had to sort out our relationship with the Bureau of Diplomatic Security (DS) and between ourselves and the different regional bureaus as to who took the lead when something occurred outside the United States. The third level was the relationship with the CIA and military. I think that it came to a draw within the Department, because we were quite successful at dealing with the CIA and the military and the FBI in bringing everything under a common umbrella over the course of the time that we were working in the office. Once it was established that we were separate from DS, we went to Ambassador Spiers' daily meetings where we talked about security, but there was rarely a question again of what was our issue and what was their issue. Essentially that was resolved. When there was a hijacking or something of that nature and a task force was established, there was always the issue of were we in charge of it or was the regional bureau going to be in charge. The way it worked out, for the most part, was that, since the Middle Eastern Bureau had so much experience and so many people who had worked these issues, we had sort of a co-equal relationship with them when there was an incident, but when it was one of the other regions in the Department, we had the expertise and the region didn't, so they deferred to us.

PHILIPPE DU CHATEAU
Assistant Information Officer, USIS

Moscow (1984-1987)

Mr. du Chateau was born in Illinois and raised in Illinois and Indiana. He was educated at the Universities of Indiana, Cornell and Harvard, and Middlebury College. From 1973 to 1977 he worked with the US Information Service in the Soviet Union, joining its Foreign Service in 1979. Mr. du Chateau served several tours at USIA's Headquarters in Washington, DC. His foreign assignments include Sofia, Moscow, Tel Aviv and Helsinki. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2011.

Q: Then where after Bulgaria?

DU CHATEAU: Well, our next assignment was as AIO, Assistant Information Officer, in Moscow. I've always had good luck with assignments. I can never complain. We've just been very fortunate. We went to interesting places, places we wanted to go. That's unusual, I guess.

At that time, the Soviet Union was our adversary, of course, but it was extremely important in the American psyche. We cared a lot about them. Nobody does now, except maybe we pay attention to Putin occasionally. It's all the Middle East these days, Iraq and Afghanistan.

But it was also true that at least for USIA people at that time, it was important to cycle through Moscow as a Foreign Service Officer. I heard an earlier USIA director, Frank Shakespeare, wanted to make it mandatory for anybody rising in USIA to work in the Soviet Union. Now I suppose much the same would be said about Iraq and China.

The Soviet Union was a so-called hardship post, of course, but it didn't make any difference to me or my family, because we liked being there. We were used to it. Golnar had relatives there. It was an assignment that other people might have avoided. I thought, "This is good stuff." And of course there was extra pay.

They made me AIO, Assistant Information Officer. Anything to do with anything written, magazine, books, I was the person in charge of it. I was the deputy press attaché, you could say.

We came back to Washington for about six weeks to relearn Russian and that was pretty successful. I had to retest in Russian, which was no problem, and so I got my incentive pay, which I always liked. And then we were off to Moscow in the fall. I think we arrived in October or November 1984.

Those of us who were due for transfer in the next year were supposed to bid on maybe 5 possible assignments. But as I recall, I never did that when bidding from Bulgaria. I think the AIO Moscow assignment was out of sync with the rest of the summer reassignment cycle for some reason. However, folks in the Washington office that covered the Soviet Union knew me, and I had a good reputation in USIA for working above my pay grade, after all I was acting PAO for months at a time in Sofia, so they offered the job to me. It helped that the timing worked well in that I could get some Russian language training before going over. After consultation with Golnar, I took it. That was easy. I don't recall bidding on any other job.

Q: What was your wife doing at this time?

DU CHATEAU: Well, my wife, first of all, like in any successful Foreign Service family, she was totally my partner in all of this. And she would always pick up jobs at each post. As I mentioned, she worked for DAO in Sofia. We also had a newborn child when we were in Bulgaria, so that became a full-time job.

In Moscow, Golnar ended up working as the accountant for the ABC News bureau, for a gentleman named Walt Rogers. This was interesting, because part of my job was to work directly with ABC News as well as all of the news organizations in Moscow. But there was no conflict - Walt was very honorable. He never ever asked for any special information or access just because Golnar worked for him. I think my bosses in the Embassy were a little concerned at first, but it worked out.

There was a reason why Walt hired Golnar. He was getting cheated. He had hired Soviets to do his bookkeeping and they were just both incompetent and corrupt. He did not have the budget to bring in someone from Washington full time. Where would he find housing, for instance? So I guess he looked around in the Embassy community.

I don't know how my wife met him, but she did. She has no bookkeeping background, but she's honest, always a plus. So she worked for Walt for most of the time we were in Moscow. She got to meet some nice people through the bureau, and she had a very good time.

Her working in the ABC bureau helped me, too, in a way. I grew to have a better sense of what life was like for the correspondents in Moscow, what their pressures were. Often FSOs feel threatened by the press, but this relationship helped me understand better what the Embassy looked like through their eyes. Since my main job was working with the press, not as Embassy spokesman, that job went to my boss, but rather on a more mundane level, arranging press events, what have you, I think this very informal relationship with the ABC Bureau made me a more effective officer.

Q: You were there from when to when?

DU CHATEAU: I would have been in Moscow from the fall of 1984, when I got done with language training, to July of 1987.

Q: What was your job?

DU CHATEAU: I was the Assistant Information Officer for Press and Publications, an AIO. As I mentioned, there was a press attaché, my boss, and under him there were two Assistant Information Officers. I can't recall exactly how we split the work, but I recall the other AIO was in charge of anything having to do with movies, anything not in print. Our tiny offices were right next to each other up on the 6th floor, I think it was 6, anyhow up in the secure part of the Embassy, beyond where the Marine stood guard.

USIS Moscow was split into two main offices. The PAO, his admin assistant, our budget officer, the Information Officer or spokesman, and the two AIOs were all up in the secure area. The culture section, which had just as many people, was down on the ground floor. It was not in a secure area, anyone who had access to the Embassy could walk in, which was the idea. This is where Yuri Zarakhovitch worked. I mentioned him earlier with USIA exhibits. We also had a space in the basement of the north part of the embassy where we had storerooms and our large Xerox machine.

The simplest part of my job was to see if USIA's America Illustrated magazine was actually being sold on newsstands in Moscow. Our Soviet staff knew where it was supposed to be sold, so when it came out on the first of the month, I and the P&C driver would go around to the kiosks and ask them if they got them and if they were selling.

I did it, but it was just a big farce, because the kiosk people I asked, of course they would say they were selling them. Yet somehow they couldn't sell all of them, even though it was obvious that the magazine was popular. At the end of the month, or every couple of months, we would get the "excess" copies of America Illustrated into the embassy and I had to store them. We had a little storeroom on the north side of the embassy building. I can still remember it, as well as how cold it was going around to the kiosks in mid Moscow winter.

If the Western press had any questions, they tended to call me and I would deal with it. They couldn't get to my boss that easily. It worked out well as I fielded the questions and made the call back.

I also ran the Wireless File reproduction operation. I think I've already mentioned that the File was a compilation of news stories sent out by dedicated line from USIA in Washington every workday. We would take it down in the night, and several of the Soviet staff I had working directly for me would run off copies for distribution. We had an enormous Xerox machine that always seemed to break down. I've forgotten how many copies we made, but it was considerable, because the driver for the press section distributed them by car throughout town each day, and we gave lots of copies to all the embassy offices.

Another job was to keep track of what anybody was saying about the Embassy and about the United States. I did this in order to prepare a press briefing paper for the ambassador every week.

I was very fortunate in my career. I always worked for smart competent ambassadors in all my posts, although in Jerusalem the ambassador was 40 miles away. Anyhow Arthur Hartman was the ambassador most of the time I was in Moscow, up to the last month or so. He had been ambassador to Paris and I believe he retired after leaving Embassy Moscow. I loved working for him and his wife Donna. I saw a lot of them.

Arthur Hartman loved talking to the press. He liked getting his views on a story out there, the reporters loved talking with him, because they could get something to write. The briefs were on background, but still it was good value for them. They always showed up.

My job was to get a briefing paper together in advance. The briefs were on Friday around 11, so

Thursday afternoon I'd go around the embassy, the political officers, consular, science, the Defense Attaches, and ask people what was going on, what was happening that the press might know about. I kept a clipping file of ideas on hand, too. I'd write up the memo Thursday afternoon, it would go through my bosses for further suggestions and clearance, that's to say through the Information Officer and PAO Ray Benson, and then up to the ambassador. Well, I suppose down, because his office was below ours. The memo also went out to all the section heads. It was considerable effort to put this together, but fun in its way.

I still remember the first time I did this, I had no idea what I was supposed to do, my IO boss did not help me, but I had already learned how to make things up, as it were. I was supposed to have several days of overlap with the guy I was replacing, but I barely met him. His wife was pregnant, she was being medevaced to Helsinki because of complications the afternoon after I arrived, so he was a little distracted. He had already cleaned out his desk, so he just went around in the morning introducing me, and he was gone. It was just as well. Too much is made of overlaps.

Anyhow, then at some point Friday morning, all the section heads would get together with the ambassador in his office and go through the points I thought of, and anything else I missed. It was hard, keeping ahead of these people, but I watched how Hartman would take something and use it to our advantage, turn the issue around as it were. I recall many questions about refuseniks, Congress, military affairs.

Then around 11 the reporters would get together at the embassy entrance and I would escort them up the creaky elevator, past the Marine Guard, and down to the small conference room where we had the briefs for the American press corps. I enjoyed just listening to the back and forth between the ambassador and the reporters. It was all on background, but Hartman gave good worth. He knew his subject well.

We did the same thing for the Western correspondents in town as well, but only about once a month. We held that brief in the Commercial Office, which was in a neighboring building where there was more room and security was easier. I think the only security then was the Soviet guard up front. Through that connection with the Western correspondents, I got to know a couple of correspondents who became good friends, and I'd like to think still are. Leif Davidsen was then the Moscow correspondent for Danish Television. He's gone on to be a very successful author in Denmark. His wife, Ulla Høy, became close to my wife. We still stay in touch and visit. Urjo Lansipuro was the Moscow correspondent for Finnish Television. We also became close, and, purely by chance, he was very important in my last overseas assignment in Finland roughly 10 years later. All this because I would answer the phone and help them out when I could.

I guess I'm emphasizing this because so many FSOs are scared of the press, afraid that they will say the wrong thing and that it will ruin a career. Of course that is possible, I know from my experience with the Photo exhibit, but I think it never hurts to be helpful, does it?

At the time, our offices were in what's now called, I guess, the old embassy building, right on the ring road. What was the street name? Tchaikovsky Street comes to mind, but maybe it's changed. It was an old building and it had its problems. Other than the high rise fronting on the street, we had a courtyard out back surrounded by low wooden buildings that housed the garage, the all-important snack bar, and the General Services offices, the workshop. Oh, there was a small medical clinic there, too, the one where I took the musician from the Preservation Hall band. Other Soviet buildings were all around, towering down on us. I'm sure there were normal apartments in those buildings, but surely people in others were watching everything we did.

Earlier I called us USIS Moscow, but actually we were called the Press and Culture Section of the embassy in Moscow, P&C, because, I guess, the Soviets didn't particularly like the U.S. Information Agency much. So we had this fictional mask. The culture side of the office was downstairs, in the south wing of the building, open to anyone who could get past the Soviet guard out front. People could walk in on it without any trouble at all and sometimes did. It was the so-called P&C Down. That's where all of our Soviet employees worked, except the ones in the north wing basement that ran my Wireless File distribution outfit, and P&C Down's where the CAO, the Cultural Affairs Officer, and two ACOs had their offices. They were tiny, too.

I mentioned P&C UP a minute ago. It was quite the schlep between offices, but I was always on the move, up the stairs a floor from my office, past the Marine Guard, out to the elevator and down to the street. We never took the stairs up or down, maybe partially out of laziness, but also because they were blocked at the street level for security reasons. And things were stored on the stairs I later found. It was exhausting, all the up and down.

My office was tiny, but I had a door to a little balcony overlooking the main ring road that we never opened. I have a picture someplace of the office in winter with snow that came in under the door. The only security violation I got in my career, I got up there one time when I didn't close a safe properly. Funny now that I think of it. The rest of my career abroad in Jerusalem and Helsinki I worked in unclassified places alongside my local employees, so no security violations were possible, and I liked that.

At that time, when I first came to Moscow in the fall 1984, at least in theory it was pretty easy for people to walk into the embassy. Foreigners just had to show their passport to the Soviet guard out front. There were a couple of large archways through the building into the courtyard through which we drove cars, the north one going in and south one going out. You could just walk through there. As I recall, that fall there was no Marine Guard at the ground level. The Soviet militiamen on the sidewalk out front of both drives would make sure only the right people came in.

The good times could not last, of course. Fairly soon we had a Marine Guard stationed at the vehicle entrance. And things tightened up considerably. We all hated it, because we had to wear these newly issued badges and show them to the Marine. It was terrible. I recently looked at the building using Google "Street View" and it looks like those archways are all filled in. Apparently we still have the building though because the picture shows an American flag out front.

So it was an old building. Full of bugs in all forms. We assumed there were listening devices beamed at us from the neighboring buildings, so we never had a conversation in the courtyard. Supposedly our upstairs offices were clean, but certainly not P&C Down.

Q: Did you have much contact with Soviets, the citizenry, rather than Embassy Soviet workers?

DU CHATEAU: Yes, all I wanted, but, you know, I was tired pretty of it after years of meeting Soviets during exhibits.

Maybe I mentioned this earlier. After my father-in-law died early-on while we were stationed in Moscow, my mother-in-law moved back to Finland where she grew up. At one point we brought her down to Moscow to live with us and visit with a sister she had not seen in at least 50 years, they were separated in the 1920s or 30s, anyhow well before the war. It's a long story and not worth going into here, but it's enough to say that we had close contact with Golnar's local family, not just with Soviets we somehow met. So we saw people, we knew people, we knew what was going on, we had, through family, extremely good unofficial contacts. We could go out all we wanted to around the city and did. Driving outside the city was another matter, though. Unlike Bulgaria, that was tightly controlled.

As I mentioned earlier, the Bulgars would not talk with us unless they had official sanction to do so once they knew we were with the embassy, and so that made it very difficult to get people to come to our home. They had to get cleared by someone someplace to come to have dinner at our house. Russians didn't give a damn.

Q: This was during the Gorbachev period, wasn't it?

DU CHATEAU: Well, no, not quite yet. We went through two official funerals, Andropov and Chernenko, while I was there. Brezhnev died while I was in Bulgaria. Andropov soon after I got to Moscow. By the next year when Chernenko went, we had the system down pat. We knew what the American press would want and how to do it for them.

But I remember Gorbachev coming to power. I remember watching him give a speech on television and thinking, "Oh, Jeez, we're in trouble. This guy's smart. He can talk, he thinks, he's not dead." And the poor people in the political section actually had to work.

Q: I guess the refuseniks were not on your beat.

DU CHATEAU: Well, no, not officially, but P&C dealt with them a lot. One of the things that Hartman did at least once a month on a Saturday afternoon was to have a 35mm film showing at Spaso House, the ambassador's residence in Moscow, that was for the refuseniks. The idea was that they could all meet on safe ground, and so that those embassy people interested in talking with the refuseniks could do so easily. As I recall, this was basically a P&C program, so all the AIOs and ACAOs had to show up and help. Of course other FSOs were required to be there also on those Saturday afternoons. There's really no time off, is there?

You could not just walk in to Spaso House and see the movie. Refuseniks on our list were sent an official invitation, one of those nice pieces of cardboard with the seal on top. A couple of us ACAOs and AIOs would stand on the street out front of Spaso House and check the invitation, but check it along with the Soviet militiaman who was supposedly guarding the residence. It was a bit of a dance, for if we were not there, the Soviet refusenik would not get beyond the guard, no matter the invitation. It was fun in the summer, a little less so in bad weather.

So I got to know these people somewhat. The problem was they were difficult. They were not nice folk in that they had hard lives and were bitter. It's all understandable, but it was hard to know what to say sometimes.

My wife's relatives were just run of the mill Soviet citizens and they were hard to deal with, too, because they would constantly come up with the same sort of comments and criticisms of American life we used to hear from Soviet visitors to the exhibits. It all boiled down to the phrase, "U nas luchshe," "We have it better." That was a little irritating.

But let me take a minute to explain that 35mm film business, because it was a big deal at the time, and I expect that it is all gone now. Maybe it's the techy in me, but I think it is kind of neat.

I don't know who had it built, but there was a small movie projection room, a little cabin, built on the outside of Spaso House, outside the ballroom on the north side of the building. You climbed up a ladder from outside to get in. No heat, I think, but none needed as there were these two large movie projectors in there, and they could project movies through a hole in the wall. There was a 16mm projector in there for the typical flic that came into the embassy through DAO, the Defense Attaché Office, but the real deal was the two 35mm projectors. You needed two projectors to switch reels while showing the film, which was a trick. You could tell when the reel was going out, and so you watched the screen for a mark that's in the film, start up the second projector to bring it up to speed, then when the next mark came up, you shifted projectors. Done right, no one in the audience sees the process - which is easy to say. Anyhow, if I remember right, and after thirty years, who knows, the 35mm projectors came from the military. They were a kind of portable outfit.

One of the people I supervised, I think his name was Vlad, Vladimir, knew how to project films, so he worked overtime doing it when needed. I tended to hang out with him some, partially to make sure everything was going well, and probably also because I didn't want to be down with the guests.

These 35mm movies were a big deal. The ambassador, Ambassador Hartman, I guess though others must have had the same access, could get first run films directly from the U.S. One of us AIOs, my upstairs colleague or me, had to be around the film at all times so that we could say that no one had the chance to copy it. I suppose that's another reason I would hang out in the projection booth. We had great representational showings, I think we showed flics to the refusenik crowd, and I think we did something for the embassy kids.

Q: While you were there, did you sense any unrest among the various nationalities who eventually broke away into independent countries?

DU CHATEAU: No, I wouldn't say so. I think many people have excellent hindsight. I didn't sense that at all. Sure there were refuseniks, sure there were people who wanted to get out, including some of Golnar's relatives. It was there, but what does it mean? There was no way anyone really predicted what happened a few years later.

Q: The Baltic States are usually considered something different from the Soviet norm. Did you have a feel for the Baltic States?

DU CHATEAU: We did travel into the Baltics when we were there with exhibits, but not while stationed at the embassy. A feel for them? I think so. First of all, Estonia always was different. In the 1970s we traveled up there on our own, but the US government could not bring an exhibit to the Baltics. We couldn't go into the Baltic States with exhibits, because we did not officially recognize their annexation into the Soviet Union.

The closest that we could come was to Minsk and we did that with one exhibit, Technology in the American Home in the fall of 1976, I think it was 1976. People from Baltic States came down to see the exhibit in a big way.

Minsk was a very difficult city. It wasn't a nice place at all. The people we worked around were very nationalistic, nasty, and of course the city had a pretty rough time during WWII. Golnar and I walked out one day around in the neighborhood of the hotel, around where there were small private houses, and there was a big depression in the ground and a monument to Jews who were killed there.

We were very tired by the time we packed up the exhibit. I have a picture of it someplace, but also a good mental picture of looking out of our hotel room and seeing the Soviet cranes pick up the exhibit containers for shipment to Vienna. Minsk was our last showing city with that exhibit. We just made it during takedown, for as I looked out, I could see that it was snowing real hard.

Anyhow people came down from the Baltics like crazy. Their train would be stopped and they would be told to get off, but they would still come. It was amazing.

We traveled up in that area, to Tallinn and Vilnius, we never got to Riga, and you could see that it was so different. There were real stores on the streets, for instance, and at least in the center of the cities, things just did not look Soviet. The Soviet system really wasn't taking there at all.

I mentioned that when I was working for exhibits I had a little problem with the PAO, the head of the Press and Culture section.

Q: Yes, you said, talking to the press.

DU CHATEAU: I talked to the press and told them about the censorship that the exhibit went through and about the censorship of books and that and of course I wasn't supposed to do that - and I made my comments on the record, my name was in the article, what have you. It was embarrassing. The PAO, Ray Benson, was scathing in his criticism of me, and he was right.

Q: I know Ray very well. He was a Red Diaper baby.

DU CHATEAU: I don't know what that means.

Q: Well, his families in the Thirties went back to the Soviet Union and he was a little kid and he got the hell out, eventually. We served together in Yugoslavia.

DU CHATEAU: That's probably about the only time he wasn't in Moscow, or back here in Washington, because he was back and forth constantly, stationed in Moscow if not in DC.

I had no regrets whatever about talking to the press during that exhibit and maybe it was useful, a lesson learned for the future. I'm sure I put Ray in a bad position. Well, low and behold, he was my boss when I got to Moscow, Ray Benson and his office was like twenty feet away from mine. I knew he would be PAO before I was assigned there, but I thought, "Well, what the hell. Why not?"

We never talked about that whole experience until I was leaving town, when basically I was saying goodbye. It was in my so-called outbrief with him and I said, "You know, I was a little worried about coming here."

And he said something to the effect, "Yes, I remember the incident well." He thanked me, though, in more direct terms than I'll get to here, because I was dependable and I did not let strange personalities get to me. There were some problems in P&C Up, but I made it work. Ray and his wife Shirley were there the whole time I was there, all three years.

Q: Did the Sergeant Lonetree thing impact on you?

DU CHATEAU: I was going to talk about that.

Q: You might explain what it was.

DU CHATEAU: Lots of things happened when I was there in Moscow that made the news; anything that happened in Moscow made the news in the United States. Anyhow one of the Marine Guards got involved with a Soviet young lady and was accused of being a spy and letting the Soviets into our classified areas of the embassy.

Whether that was true or not, I don't know, but there was sufficient paranoia at the time that they were worried about it, whoever "they" are. They should have been worried about other things, too, by the way, because they should have been worried about the way they were building the new embassy down the street. But that's a different story.

But, anyhow, poor Sergeant Lonetree. If I remember correctly he was an American Indian, that is, Native American, and I remember him vaguely as a very nice guy. It was a big deal because we were looking for spies everywhere. I remember an Olympia Snow CODEL, congressional delegation. It was a big press issue, lots of people came to town to do their supposed research and then talk about it to the American press in Moscow. Such press briefs would have been one of the things I arranged. Lonetree was taken out of the embassy quickly, but I don't know what happened to him. I suspect one could find out on the Internet.

We had an unending number of delegations, congressional delegations, secretaries of state, commerce, and again I would be working very closely with the American press arranging press briefings. My office would be the one that would do transcripts, if they needed them. There's a lot of scut work associated with these visits. My P&C colleagues and I got very good at typing up the transcripts and sending them by cable to the US so that they could appear in the Wireless File the next day. Actually, I hated it, but loved working with the press.

But, yes, the new embassy building was a lot of fun, too, because the central building, the brick main office building was already up, the brick outsides at least. There was always a question of what were the Soviets doing to bug the new building, as all materials were stored in a Soviet warehouse off site. Of course I did not work in that department, but I think the reasoning was that we were smarter than the Soviets, one had only to look around and figure that out, and so we would catch anything they did. We eventually found out they were very clever. I'm sure there are books written about this, but as I recall, the Soviets were able to implant devices into the structural steel.

Q: Was it a topic of conversation, that the Soviets must be sticking all sorts of stuff in the new structure?

DU CHATEAU: Yes, we just couldn't figure out how they did it. But, yes, as I recall, it was a constant question raised in press briefings. Eventually they had to tear the building down and start again, but this time trucking everything in under guard directly from Finland. What an incredible expense. Hard to believe. But that all happened after we left town. Much later, maybe about 10 years ago, I was back in Moscow for a day and visited my friend Paul Smith in the embassy. He was DCM. What a nice place it is now, a wonderful place to work.

I was on the outside with the Lonetree business, but here's another spy story that I really know. At that time, I guess it would have been in mid 1986, we were living in a very small, not very elegant, apartment, way out on Leninsky Prospect, Leninsky 83. My wife, as I mentioned, she was working for ABC News. Our time to go on home leave came and as was commonly done, we arranged for somebody to live in our apartment in order to keep the bad guys out.

We knew that the Soviets were going to ferret through our stuff when we weren't there. For once I'm not being paranoid at all - we saw the things we lost, small things, some of my daughter's clothing, pairs of shoes, that kind of thing, when we went out of town to Finland. It would be hard to spot sometimes, but you would notice these things just disappear. But they, the guys who came in, would never be nasty, they were just light fingered when they were going through our apartment. Other embassy folk had things damaged sometimes, but perhaps they were more of a target.

So one of my wife's colleagues at ABC News, he was glad to get a better place to live for the month while we were gone. So he agreed to stay in our apartment, and we left on vacation.

But then soon after we came back, a month would have passed, the guy from ABC approached my wife at work and said, "You know, the strangest thing happened to me and I didn't know what was going on, but when moved into your apartment, we came in the front door and we heard some commotion in another room, in the bedroom, and one of your marines came out with a young lady and said he was doing an inspection of the apartment and they left.”

There’s some background needed here. In the years of all the increased security in the embassy, for a long time the marines employed Soviet cooks who would come to their quarters to work. The marines lived in the old embassy building, the same place where we all worked, but on a lower floor. Then, because of tightening security, the cooks were let go. I guess the marines had to start cooking for themselves, or more likely they brought in cooks from Finland or the U.S.

Anyhow, one of the cooks was a favorite with the marines. She was highly recommended, the marines loved her, she was a nice lady, we needed a nanny, my wife was working full time, and so she became our nanny, Nanny Galia. I don’t remember her last name. She spoke English. She was a very, very intelligent young lady, very good with my daughter. I sincerely want to be very complimentary about her in anything I say as she was a good person and I have no reason to think she was anything else. However, she was, as we know, working for the Soviet government, reporting on us. Of course she was and we didn’t mind that, we were very used to it, we knew what was going on. Working in the Soviet Union, we expected it. Who wouldn’t?

Unfortunately, one of the Marines, a Corporal Bracy, did get involved with Nanny Galia, who was a very attractive young lady. I don’t recall how we knew who the Marine was in our apartment, but we did, it was Bracy. And so as soon as my wife and I learned of what was going on, we got in touch with the embassy security officer and had a little discussion in one of the secure rooms in the embassy. Poor Bracy, I don’t know what happened to him, but he was such an innocent. He was a nice guy. We really liked him, we really like Galia. This all hurt.

Corporal Bracy later went on trial, I think, and maybe he did some time. They, whoever they were, they were looking for such compromising connections involving the Marine security guards in Moscow after the Lonetree affair earlier in the year, and we gave them one. It was a working assumption that these things were going on. Everyone was looking for spies.

I have no idea what happened to Nanny Galia. Golnar and I haven’t forgotten her. She was a good lady and my daughter really liked her.

A book called Moscow Station, How the KGB Penetrated the American Embassy, written by Ronald Kessler, who is a prolific author of books on intelligence topics, he quotes me at length and I don’t recall ever talking with him - but I must have.

In Moscow Station, Kessler attacks Art Hartman, “he must have known what was going on,” this kind of thing. But, no, it doesn’t work that way at all, that isn’t the truth at all. My quotes are accurate I think, if anybody ever wants to follow up on what was happening, but it’s a tendentious book.

I think you can find out more about all this stuff from the New York Times archives. They did lots of reporting at the time, and my memory on detail isn’t that great after some 25 years.

Q: Yes, well, again, ambassadors aren’t fully aware of what’s going on in their own embassies.

DU CHATEAU: Well, actually, if you look at it, as I've tried to lay this out, people did the right things. The ABC tech told us what happened. The Marine left, I think, and we never saw our nanny again. The weak link was the Marine guards and the Soviets very skillfully targeted them, just as I would hope we did the same to them here in the U.S.

So, that fall in 1986 was quite the interesting time. I've mentioned Walt Rogers and that my wife was working for him at ABC News. It was his American employee who discovered Bracy and Galia, and surely he told Walt. It's too good a story. But Walt never, ever, tried to get an exclusive story of any nature because of our personal connection to him. He was an honorable guy and we appreciated that greatly. Still do. Anyway, it was an interesting time.

Because of the Bracy affair, my wife and I got more than a little paranoid, living out there on Leninsky, exposed to anyone who wanted to do us harm. I said that earlier we only had very minor theft. Now I was worried. For one thing, we busted up their network, or whatever they were developing with Bracey. I expected something to happen to us.

In addition to that famous, empty, central office building, the embassy had built new housing on the compound. Nobody had moved into it, yet, or not many people. So there was housing there, they were moving gradually the pre-school in there, the pool was working, and I think the commissary had moved by this time.

So I was paranoid, but that doesn't mean I was wrong. I talked to people and made arrangements to move into a new apartment. I think I was one of the first because many of the apartments were not finished and we could not yet drive onto the compound. As I say, I felt very exposed, partially because we had relatives in Moscow and Leningrad, partially because "they," whatever you want to call them, knew us very well, we must have a dossier, my wife and I, who knows how thick, very thick, from a long time, lots of transcripts, I'm sure.

The embassy admin people said, "Yes, you can move in, but you have to make the move yourself. We don't have the manpower to do it." So we packed up the old apartment on Leninsky, scavenged every darn box we could find. I would take the P&C car, the one I went around town in to check for Amerika magazine, it was a station wagon, rather used, and I would carry boxes out of the apartment, into the elevator and down 6 or 8 floors, whatever it was, and out to the car. Down to the embassy, which was miles away, but I couldn't get into the compound and up to the townhouse we were given, because they hadn't finished the roads. So I would park outside the gate, take a load, put it on a dolly, take the stuff up to the townhouse, unload, go back. I suppose it would take maybe an hour and a half to make one trip, maybe more.

I did this for probably two weeks, on my own time, in the evening and on the weekend. All I can say is because I had done so much of this kind of moving and lifting with the exhibits, it was second nature, difficult, but doable. We did get moved in and I was very glad. The townhouse was wonderful, some of the best housing we ever had.

I guess, looking back, you can see from these examples the kind of pressure we were under. At the time we knew it, but it was part of the life. Perhaps because we knew the country fairly well for foreigners, we didn't expect much else and we just got along. And then, too, we knew how much better we were living than the Soviets around us.

Q: How was the embassy, during the time you were there, reacting to Gorbachev?

DU CHATEAU: I didn't have much to do with it, in truth. I would set up these press briefings, distribute the Wireless File, what have you, but my job would be dealing with the press at a lower level. I have no idea what the political section doing, although I suspect they had to be working hard. Also I've forgotten, pretty much, to tell you the truth. It's been a while. Maybe it's me projecting back, but you know for years everything in the Soviet government was predictable. Just dust off last year's cable, you know. But now, with Gorbachev, everything changed.

Q: You'd been there, going back to when you were doing exhibits and all. Had the Soviet citizenry changed, when you got back?

DU CHATEAU: No, but then as it turns out we hadn't been away that long. We left in the fall of 1977 and came back in the fall 1984, what is that, seven years. I guess that's a bit of time, but as it turned out, there wasn't much difference. The old guys were still in power, the shopping systems were the same, the embassy was in the same old building, and the same old crowded offices. Just like going home.

We left Moscow in July or August 1987, and everything changed in - when? - summer 1991, I guess, four years later.

But you know, as I keep saying, all this is clear in hindsight, the breakup of the Union and what have you. There are so many books written about it, and we were thinking about that, also, at the time. But you know, I'm a hundred per cent positive that nobody in charge, nobody really knowledgeable about the Soviet Union, in any way predicted what would happen a few years after we left, nobody.

Yeah, everybody figured the place was going to fall apart sooner or later, because that was our ideology. And you looked around and you figured, yeah, this is not working. But when and how? The place could have staggered on another 20 years, just on inertia.

Q: Apparently, our ambassador in West Germany, Vernon Walters, was telling his staff "do a study of whether maybe Germany might eventually reunify" and everybody was saying the guy had gone off his rocker. He had at least an instinct that ...

DU CHATEAU: I think that Germany would be, in its way, more easily predictable, in the sense that the two Germanys had not been divided that long - not even my lifetime.

Q: It really boiled down to, eventually, to what the Soviets were going to do, would they back the East Germans or not? There were a few mistakes that were made on the part of the East German Politburo, they really didn't realize the consequences of their actions.

I think what it does show, anybody who knows about foreign policy and all, we tend to straight line predict. You can think about alternative futures, yes, it could happen. Right now we're going through the Arab Spring. Time tested regimes have fallen in Libya and Tunisia and Egypt and now we're looking at Syria, which seems to be going through a very painful process, but less than a year ago, nobody was predicting this.

It's very hard, because what you're doing is, you're talking about unpredictable events and if you're in the foreign policy business, you have to sort of work on the assumption that things, this is the way they are, and how do we deal with present reality?

DU CHATEAU: Well, actually, in that sense, I'm fairly conservative. I think that that's probably the only way you can do it. You should never say things can't happen and you should be out there listening, but you have to deal day to day with what's in front of you, it seems to me.

Q: Did you travel much?

DU CHATEAU: In the Foreign Service? Yes, constantly. I think I've emphasized enough how easy it was to travel in Bulgaria. We basically got in the car and went whenever we wanted. The first couple of years we had a little Volkswagen diesel Rabbit, but then someone hit me in the side when I was driving home on my birthday in 1983. Poor guy, it was his fault. So we had it towed to Thessaloniki where it could be fixed, and then we sold it to another diplomat. Golnar's people in DAO were using Volvos, and we learned that they did not cost much more than the Volkswagen, and were so much safer. So we used the insurance and sales money, and bought a Volvo in Germany and drove it back. We sold eventually sold to an Iraqi diplomat in Moscow.

We traveled a lot with the exhibits all over the Soviet Union. We had paid free time between exhibit cities, when the exhibit itself was on the road to the next city, and we used it. I think I've been to almost all of what were then called "open cities" in the USSR, that is, the cities that foreigners were allowed to travel to. Never did get to Frunze, though. It's Bishkek now.

So we had seen much in the Soviet Union, but now we had a young child and travel in the Soviet Union never was easy. In Bulgaria we tended to travel most weekends. We would get into the car and go places, because that was easy, we could pack up, put the kid in the back, and she was happy as a clam.

But in order to travel outside of Moscow, it was a different story. We had to file a travel request several days ahead of time. We did it through the embassy travel office, which would send the request to the right people someplace in the Soviet bureaucracy. So in that sense one could travel as a diplomat in the Soviet Union, but you had to plan ahead, and my wife and I are really bad at planning ahead. But we did, we made a point of getting out and getting around as best we could, mostly to places we could reach within a day and return, Tolstoy's Yasnaya Polyana near Tula, for instance.

Also, in 1986 I think it was, my wife's mother moved back to Finland, to Kotka, a town east of Helsinki where she grew up. We would drive up to visit her. What that means is we would put in a travel request during the week, and then we would get up at five in the morning, get in the car and drive like hell. Of course you could not go off your route, and the Soviet traffic police checked on you as you went up the road. They had checkpoints outside each city where you had to slow down so that they could get a good look at you. We never had any trouble with them, but we obeyed their rules.

I should mention, anytime you left the Soviet Union you had to put your car in and have it inspected, to make sure it was up to international standards, they said. Again, the good folks in the embassy garage would expedite this. Our assumption was that someone was either taking in or putting out some kind of position tracking device. I think that's what I would do, so I'm sure they did it.

So we would drive like hell. On our way, sometimes we'd stop and visit my wife's relatives in Leningrad. Then we would drive up to the border.

But one time, we saw a church just off the road, over there a quarter mile to the right, something like that, so we just decided to eat our picnic lunch over there, it looked nice. We went there, we were there probably about ten minutes and a car came up, a highway policeman came out and said, "You've gotta go back to the road." So we did.

But how did they know we were there? We didn't see anybody behind us. We weren't trying to evade anybody. I think it's because we didn't check in to one of their checkpoints at their expected time, so they lost us and they had to find us.

Driving north to Finland was not much trouble as the trip was mostly in daylight, but coming south was harder. For some reason, the Soviets did not let you drive on the highway at night with regular beams, much less high beams. It was insane. If anyone was coming toward you, you had to put on your, I don't know, what do you call them, running lights. It was impossible to see anything on the road. It was horrible in the rain. I think I was told that the Soviets did this because their lights were always out of whack, blinding on-coming cars. Anyhow, it was nutty, and just added to our already low opinion of the Soviets.

We had a lot of trouble with spies in Moscow, but there was a spy and I forget his name now, it's well known (Ed: Vitaly Yurchenko, previously the security officer at the Soviet Embassy in Washington, of all things, and later a senior KGB staff officer in Moscow prior to his abortive defection. He actually managed to survive this escapade once he was back in Soviet custody, supposedly because he was a protégé of the KGB chairman, probably an unappreciated early sign that the savage internal discipline that made the KGB such a fearsome opponent was unraveling), he defected and got to the United States and then he re-defected, if that is a word, whatever, he changed his mind. Anyhow, he went back to the Soviet Embassy in Washington.

While this was going on, while he was in the Soviet Embassy in Washington, we took one of our trips up to Finland. Going across the Soviet border was never much fun. Well back from the actual border you would get to a building to go through passport control and they would look at the car, what have you. Then once checked, you would drive slowly to the actual border. I think maybe they checked documents again. It was all very, well, off-putting. Very controlled.

Well, being diplomats, they're not supposed to search our car, and being diplomats, we were not supposed to allow them to search the car. We took three or four trips out to Finland during that time and knew the routine.

But this one time, they said, "We have news that you have something wrong with your car," a bomb in the car, or something like that. They said that they were trying to protect us, that somebody had done something to the car and they had to inspect it inside.

We couldn't let them do that. Back and forth, back and forth, and I think we were there a couple of hours. I suppose we would not have minded so much, but Guzel was little, maybe 4, which made things uncomfortable. The outcome was we negotiated to the point where I would open the trunk lid, they would look inside, but not move anything, and I would close the trunk lid. That was the way we did it and we got on our way.

Looking back, I'm sure that the timing was such, they decided to hassle us at the border because of what was going on with the defector Washington. We happened to be the unlucky ones. If I recall correctly, we went into the embassy in Helsinki to report what happened, but nothing came of it. I probably talked with the RSO, the regional security officer, but I don't think anyone knew what to do with the incident.

Should I talk about when the Russians were taken out of the embassy? This is when we lost all our Soviet employees.

Q: Oh, yes, yes. As somebody who worked in Yugoslavia for five years, I'm well aware, of course, that all the local national employees were reporting. So there's no real problem. As a matter of fact, it's helpful.

DU CHATEAU: Well, we thought so and I believe people like Ambassador Hartman thought so, also. He knew what was going on. He was not an innocent. Nor were the political officers, the DCM, what have you.

Who did what and in what order, I've pretty much forgotten. This would have been in late fall in 1986. I had already moved the family into the new embassy housing, thank goodness. Anyhow, details of the back and forth spy expulsions, it's all in the books. But, essentially, what happened was, people I knew had to leave the embassy and Moscow very suddenly. We now know they were CIA agents, and had to leave suddenly because they'd been exposed. This had happened at least once before while I was there and we now know probably why they were exposed.

In the United States we picked up some of their agents, in retaliation. Or maybe it was the other way around, we kicked out their people and they retaliated. As I said, I can't recall the exact chain of events, but I remember well that we were all wondering what was going to happen next, waiting for the other shoe to drop. What would Gorbachev do? And the assumption was that some of us were going to get kicked out. I remember well thinking what would happen to my family and me if the Soviets fingered me and kicked me out. I was no spy, but that didn't make much difference. It would have been bad, as we had no place to stay in the U.S. We didn't want to leave. It was a tense time.

And then all of a sudden I learned when I got to work one morning that Soviets were going to pull all of their employees out of the embassy. Right then. That day. No one had predicted this. It was new times with Gorbachev, for sure. UPDK, the Upravlenie diplomaticheskiiy korpusov, that is the Soviet government agency that was the monopoly supplier of local national staff to foreign embassies in Moscow, was told to pull all the Soviet employees from the embassy, all of them, gone. They had to clear out their desks, they had one day to do it and in fact we had to escort them around, to make sure that no sabotage was done.

I had about six employees that ran things, Wireless File delivery, running the enormous Xerox machine, people like Yuri Zarakhovich that I mentioned earlier, translators. Everyone gone, cooks, cleaners, repair people. All of these people were gone that day. I really hated it. – these were good people, some of them I had known for years.

Lots of stories were written about this, but generally everyone pitched in and did what needed to be done. The embassy admin people really had to work. They organized us into work crews to clean up the building, I had already learned how to run the 35mm movie projectors for those dissident film showings at Spaso House. I already knew how to run the Xerox machine and how to get around Moscow. I think this whole business did not bother me much except for losing the Soviet employees that I really liked working with. That hurt. I still think of them and hope things worked out for them. At least the people that worked with me, these were good people. I still remember the shock that I saw in them. Working for the embassy was a good life for them, and now it was gone, just like that.

In addition to my folk, I especially remember the lady who ran the embassy snack bar. She was tough, kept us all in line, kept order, played no favorites. She was famous, or I guess famous among those of us who were privileged to know her. She was gone. Her life gone. She had worked there all the time I had been going to the embassy, at least from 1973. All gone in a moment.

As it happened, I did not mind physical labor, and my wife and I were very comfortable working on our own in Moscow. We had language. I was really good at cleaning, at improvising solutions. I knew how to do it, because I had done it for so long with USIA exhibits. In fact, except for losing good people among the Soviet employees, I thought it was great fun, didn't bother me at all, especially as I was fairly bored with my regular job at this point. I now had a perfect excuse to let slide any tasks that I did not want to do.

Cleaning the embassy and keeping things going inside was the easy part. But it was a pretty rough winter for we had to figure out things like how to submit travel requests. Those Soviet bureaucratic details didn't quit. So we had to figure out how to do them ourselves and where they went in the foreign ministry. I remember making deliveries to this rather anonymous side door in the foreign ministry skyscraper.

I suppose there's a positive side to this, because we got to see things now for the first time that we didn't do before. We'd have more contact, in a way, with the bureaucracy than we'd had before, because earlier we'd had our Soviet national employees as a buffer between us and reality.

Eventually we got contractors in to help. I remember the company name, PA&E, for some reason. American contractors came in that wanted to work in the embassy. Also, at the beginning that winter, for a short time we had American military Seabees helping out until the contractors could arrive. They did things we couldn't like automobile maintenance.

Q: I would think one of the problems with contracting things out, in many ways you're having a greater problems with security, because if you hire a guy from Des Moines who knows how to do some skilled labor task, he's an American, so you kind of have to trust him to a certain point, but the thing is, he's not accustomed to dealing with the Soviet system. If you have a Soviet who does the same job, you know where they stand and you can take necessary precautions, but your guy from Des Moines is more problematic.

DU CHATEAU: I agree entirely. That was my attitude toward the whole thing, but try to tell that to the Congressional committees. Anyhow, we did not kick out the Soviet employees, as much as they might have been a security risk. Gorbachev and friends did it. But you know, I know of no such security problem that arose from the contractors. But that doesn't mean much, I simply may not have heard of the problems. There was such a stir of new people, someone could have been gone without this AIO knowing.

Q: How about radiation bombardment at the time?

DU CHATEAU: Well, indeed while we were in Moscow, there was this whole issue about microwave or some kind of radiation beamed at the embassy from a building across the way, across that ring road. I think the business predated our arrival, but I'm not sure. Anyhow, my office was right on target.

I cared about it, but not because I had an office door out to a balcony that I would never go out on - it was a Soviet-built balcony. Scary. In fact, in the winter, the snow would come under the door. I cared because my office was one floor above the political section and the ambassador's office and it faced directly onto the big ring road and the Soviet buildings across the street where I'd heard the radiation supposedly came from.

Q: In order to eavesdrop.

DU CHATEAU: Well, eavesdrop in some fashion. There was no question that something was happening, as folks came in and measured the radiation that was coming at the embassy, but nobody could figure out what was going on, what it was good for. At least that's what I heard. As I recall it, I heard that best speculation was that they probably had some kind of devices in the embassy that they were accessing through that radiation. Who knows? I don't know. That's not the kind of thing covered in the ambassador's press briefings - what it was for and what they were getting - although the question would come up.

But it was the health issue - that came up a lot in my press briefings. Nobody was able to ever pin down a cause and effect health problem, in other words, there was no statistical difference between our embassy staff and any other comparable group elsewhere. I think probably the real worry was cancer, but no one could prove any cause and effect.

We had screens on the windows to stop the radiation. I've no idea if they worked. Maybe someone someplace figured out what the Soviets were really getting, but I never heard.

Q: Well, was there any movement among our Foreign Service people, through their union or whatever, to threaten essentially go on strike over the issue? There was a way of stopping this, by saying we're going to cut diplomatic relations unless you stop doing this to our people.

DU CHATEAU: It's a good question and I don't know the answer. I don't recall any talk about doing that. It's been a long time now, but I seem to recall that we're not talking about lots of radiation, maybe stuff that was not much above normal background in the city. And then there's the constant paranoia in the embassy. I think that the Soviets probably denied anything was happening.

Q: You put up monitors that show this is happening and then say, "Cut out this stuff, or we're not going to play anymore."

DU CHATEAU: I suspect that the radiation was found to be low enough level that we could not show a real health hazard.

Q: Maybe we were doing it, too. I don't know.

DU CHATEAU: I have no idea. It's the kind of paranoia that we lived with at that time, too. You're right, maybe we did do it.

For instance, it was well known that with the new housing compound I lived on, there was a church across the street, and it was well known that they had their listening devices up there. You did not have a serious conversation on the street in the compound. It's probably still true today, though I think the church is now what we used to call a real "working church" with regular services. That doesn't mean it couldn't be used still for other purposes. Actually, also we were line of sight from a very tall apartment building to our north. We lived – we were down in the fishbowl.

It was there, it was part of the way we lived. Living in Moscow then, it was pretty hard on folks. I've been back to Russia a couple of times since, once to Moscow, and it's certainly much nicer now than it was then.

Q: How was morale?

DU CHATEAU: Well, it depends upon the person. Moscow was a hardship post with extra pay, and people who didn't come in with our background, my wife's background, a feeling for the country, maybe family background and language, lots of time they found it very difficult, especially support staff personnel, anybody in communications or anything like that. They couldn't talk to Soviets, they had a hard time going out, and rightly so, I'm afraid. So it was pretty rough on them.

We had a pretty good commissary and a big effort to keep stuff in there and keep it stocked up, especially beer, which I appreciated. We had weekly mail runs by train to Helsinki. Everyone had an opportunity to escort the mail on overnight train out to Finland.

To be the escort on a mail run was a paid weekend vacation to Helsinki, overnight train both ways. We accompanied the mail bags so that the Soviets couldn't get to them. And that was a morale booster. That chance came to everybody in the embassy, it was on a rotation. Probably once a year you got that trip.

We had a very good snack bar, it was the place to eat in Moscow. It had Italian and Peruvian chefs who lived in Moscow with their families. Tasty stuff, I still think of breakfasts and lunch there most fondly. Soviets that worked in the snack bar eventually got kicked out, as I said. They'd worked there a long time.

Q: Who instituted the removal of the UPRK staffers?

DU CHATEAU: Oh, Gorbachev. It was a beautiful thing. We went after their spies. He said there would be consequences. And as I mentioned earlier, there was a day when everything was in limbo and we were trying to figure out what's he going to do. He decided to do kind of what you suggested a few minutes ago with the radiation business, except what he did was more effective. He knew we depended upon our Soviet employees and so he pulled them out. We could not do the same thing to the Soviet embassy in Washington because they did not have many American employees, maybe a couple of translators. It was a beautiful move if you want to think about it that way.

They, the Soviet employees, were all protected in the system, in a way - they got jobs and what have you, but it wasn't fun at all for them, either. I talked with my people and they were very unhappy. They liked working for us, at least my people did, they had a good job, I didn't hassle them. They did their work and they went home.

I'm sure - in fact I know - they went down the street and reported on us, but who cared? It was the way the system worked and everyone knew it. It just made no difference.

But it wasn't a disaster for all the Soviets. I've got a little side story here. Earlier I mentioned my friend Yuri Zarakovich, whom I first met working as the so-called protocol assistant with the Outdoor Recreation exhibit in 1973 and 1974. Then he was hired by the Press and Culture section as a translator, and - you've got to love it - I became his supervisor when I came to Moscow ten years later.

Anyhow, Yuri was exceptionally gifted. He was a poet and a published author in Russia. He could knock out any work we gave him in a few minutes. By the time I got there, he was totally bored. More than once he came to me and asked to be fired. You see, if we fired Yuri, then UPRK would have to find him a new job. That's how the system worked. Of course I could not fire him.

Then all the Soviet employees were pulled out. Within a week or two Yuri found work at the local Time magazine bureau. He was terrific. Eventually, after the Soviet Union fell apart, he became a full-blown correspondent for Time with his own by-line.

And then his daughter moved to the U.S., to Florida, went to school here and became a lawyer. And a couple of years ago, Yuri and his wife followed and moved to the U.S. But we never got to see him in the U.S. He died of pancreatic cancer maybe a year after he got here.

I'm very bothered by this whole story, the assumptions made back in the 70s, the strange road we all took. Yuri Zarakhovich, bless him, he was a good guy.

Q: What about cultural life there, from your perspective?

DU CHATEAU: Well, first of all, things were cheap. You could go to the Bolshoi for almost nothing, you know, a good seat for five dollars. Anything that's high culture that the Russians had, we had access to.

There were things going on underground that I knew less about. I was kind of a homebody, I'd be tired at the end of the day, and I wanted to be around my wife and daughter. But younger people and especially our P&C cultural folk got to know a lot of people, because there were things going on with music, with pictorial art, what have you. It was their job to know these people. I personally, I confess, had less to do with it.

Vladimir Horowitz, the pianist, he came to Moscow to play. That was a big deal, because he had his special demands and his wife had her demands. My colleague Mark Taplin was responsible for the visit. It was constant small things he had to do. Horowitz was famously demanding.

We had constant delegations coming in: former President Carter came in, the Secretary of State came in, I had to arrange the press conferences and do the transcripts. Charlie Wick, the head of USIA, came at least twice. He needed a lot of special handling. Everything he did had to be recorded and transcribed for him, he thought everything he did was important. We'd send cable the transcripts back and then they put out on USIA's Wireless File the next day. It was horrible, a total waste of time.

We would spend hours listening to the tapes and making the transcript, usually me and one other AIO or ACAO, whoever I could drag in. We'd do it by hand, as it were, transcribing, listening to the tape going over it again, and typing on a Wang word processor. It had to go out in a cable that same day and took hours to do.

Then in the summer of 1987 we had to leave our beautiful townhouse with its hand built parquet floors. It was probably the best housing we ever had. Well, maybe not, considering where we lived in Jerusalem and Helsinki, but it was wonderful all the same. In the evening I would go across the street and use the sauna. The embassy had a full swimming pool right next to the sauna. The commissary was there. It was good living, a good time after all the years of not-somuch fun living in Soviet hotel rooms, what have you.

But it was time to go. Art and Donna Hartman had left a month or so before that summer. I'd really liked working for them. I met Ambassador Matlock out at the airport. Things were changing and we had our next assignment.

But maybe one more thing before we go, how we met some people we are still friends with today.

By 1985 or 1986, our little daughter Guzel was old enough to go to pre-school. There was an international preschool in our embassy, international because all sorts of folk from other embassies or western private companies in town had their little kids in there. I recall that the wife of the British ambassador was a teacher.

This preschool had wonderful facilities in an apartment in the embassy south wing, one floor up the stairs from P&C down. I think kids went for half a day. We'd truck little Guzel up the stairs for a good time. Actually, it was a wonderful experience for her. But perhaps more important in the long run, somehow Golnar got on the school board, and a fellow board member was Ulla Høy, the wife of Leif Davidsen, who was the Moscow correspondent for Danish Television. They had two children in the school. Their older boy, Thomas, was Guzel's good friend. He's now the correspondent for Danish Television in Japan, following in his father's profession. But more important to me, we've remained friends with the Davidsens all these years. He's now one of the most popular writers in Denmark. It's the good part about the Foreign Service, the good people you work with, the luck you can have.

JANE MILLER FLOYD
General Services Officer
Leningrad (1985-1987)

On-site Inspection Agency
Ulan Ude, Soviet Union (1988-1989)

Jane Miller Floyd was born in Washington in 1954. She received a bachelor's degree from the University of Washington. She joined the Foreign Service in 1980. Her career included positions in the Former Soviet Union and Moscow. Mrs. Floyd was interviewed on December 6, 2004 by Charles S. Kennedy

Q: You were in Leningrad from 85 to 87. I think this might be a good place to stop. And I'll put at the end where we'll pick it up. We'll talk about your time as a GSO in Leningrad. 85 to 87.

Q: Today is the 16th of December 2004. You were in Leningrad 85 to 87. What was the status of American relations with the Soviets?

FLOYD: As with any good relationship, it had its ups and downs. The most notable series of events was the cascading expulsion of diplomatic employees. It began with U.S. objection to the size of the Soviet, Ukrainian and Belarusian missions to the UN. We asked them to reduce the size. They did not. Therefore the State Department declared a number of them PNG and asked them to leave the United States.

In retaliation for that, the Soviets designated a smaller number of American diplomats in the former Soviet Union as PNG and they left. Then we kicked a few more out from the UN. And in the interesting twist, the Soviets next action was the withdrawal all Soviet local employees. Because the Soviet government is who provided our FSNs, they were able in one fell swoop, in one sweet evening, to cause all of our FSNs to cease working for the consulate, and the embassy for that matter.

Q: Hadn't some of this taken place anyway because of the Sergeant Lonetree business?

FLOYD: It is highly likely that that was mixed up in there someplace and certainly the mission in the Soviet Union had re-looked its security requirements. But what the Soviets did was took away drivers and cooks, and translators and ticket arrangers. They took everybody.

Q: How did we respond to that?

FLOYD: We initially had a remarkable group of people who pitched in and did an amazing number of things, including consul generals who shoveled snow from their own residence steps. But what we eventually did was went to an American contractor, PAE, Pacific Architects and Engineers, to provide us with support personnel. For years it had been clear that X Americans, one American, could do the work of four FSNs, or that sort of proportion. And that was somewhat the rate with which we were able to get the money to then hire cleared American contractors to do those jobs. It took several months – I would have to go back and check. I'm going to say six to eight months. – before the first PAE employee got to Leningrad.

Q: Who was the consul general when you got there?

FLOYD: Ed Hurwitz was the consul general for the vast majority of my time. Charlie McGee was there initially, but Ed was there for the majority.

Q: How did you find, the tit for tat thing through the UN and all, was at the upper level. But down at the Leningrad level, how . . . ?

FLOYD: At the level of our employees, when they were finally allowed by the Soviet government to come back to the consulate to pick up the things they had left in their desks – their sewing kits, their shoes – they were in tears. They were traumatized by this level of petty reciprocity. Retaliation is how they saw it, primarily.

Q: Irrespective of work, it must have developed a sort of bitterness on the part of our American employees to the Soviet authorities.

FLOYD: Certainly to the Soviet authorities. We totally recognized that the decision to leave their employment had nothing to do with the individuals. I would have loved to have been a fly on the wall of the discussions as to what the Soviets were going to lose in intelligence access to us. But the decision was made to simply totally inconvenience us. Because the bad guy was the Soviet state – fairly large, fairly amorphous – what I found it created was an incredible camaraderie among the folks at the consulate. It was no longer send the driver to deliver invitations or pick up milk orders from Helsinki, it was okay everybody, we are all in this together and we are all going to take turns. And that's what happened.

Q: Well I would assume that being GSO, which you had never done before, had you?

FLOYD: That is correct. I'm a political officer.

Q: The GSO is the gopher, the person that does everything, and you must have become the key person in the consulate.

FLOYD: That is overstating it because I may have been the telephone person, but it was the whole group that made things happen. I may have posted the list of who is going to do the mail run, but I didn't have to do it all. Amazing cooperation from everyone. Our Marine detachment probably gets the most credit because they had been restricted, in terms of the jobs that they could take within the consulate, within any diplomatic entity, simply because the Marine Corps was worried about them being used as manual labor. And so they stepped up very nicely. Also tremendously easing my burden was the fact that a key partner for any GSO in the former Soviet Union was the Seabee folks that were around – the mechanical skills, their ability to do so many of the jobs that FSNs had done on the technical side. I had the tremendous advantage of being married to that Seabee and therefore the advantage of encouraging his cooperation. That was also aided clearly by the fact that the embassy, recognizing that certain tasks you could ask for volunteers for, but some had to be paid for, made funds available so that we could hire folks who were willing to do it – to paint apartments during staff transfers, to do some of the after hours work that simply had to be done. So it was a combination of the embassy was willing to fund, organizations willing to release their employees to do things outside of their job descriptions, and then simply amazing cooperation from a team.

Q: How about on the Soviet side, the people that handle the housing and all that? Were they sticking it to you, or were they completely out of the picture at this point?

FLOYD: The Soviet organizations within the Soviet structure, for example the Main Directorate for Servicing Consular Institutions, continued to do its job as before. The difference was that there was no one in the consulate as an intermediary, so that Americans had to go and directly do things. I had a funny advantage in that for a couple of months that I had been on leave without pay waiting for tour timing to mesh, I was at the consulate on my husband's orders. During that down time, I asked for and received permission from the person I was going to replace – the GSO who was in place – for me to hang around with the FSNs. So I had gone on the customs run. I had schmoozed with the Soviet officials. I had gone on invitation deliver rounds. So I knew the backdoors. I knew the secretaries. I knew what our FSNs did when they left the consulate. I knew where our FSN plumber kept parts because I had sat down in the basement and had tea with him. So we used to laugh and say that it couldn't have happened at a better time in the sense that we had an American with a fair amount of exposure with what our GSO FSNs did.

Q: Did the other foreign consulates there give a hand?

FLOYD: No. Nor did we ask them to particularly. It was not unhelpful, it was just that we never identified what they could have done. We couldn't have subcontracted their Soviet employees. The Soviet government wouldn't let us use them. And we weren't going to ask the German guards to come over and shovel our snow.

Q: There was no possibility of hiring any Russian off the street?

FLOYD: Absolutely not.

Q: Were there any problems in your work? What sort of things were you doing with the Soviet authorities?

FLOYD: As you put it out, GSO keeps the water flowing, the lights on. Housing was a big issue, meaning everything from where you put people, how you move them in and out, customs lists when they were coming, packing lists when they were going, repainting apartments between occupants, airplane tickets for R&R, telexing Helsinki for milk and broccoli. Lots of time paying utility bills. Fixing hot water heaters at the consul general's residence when they blow valves in the middle of the night.

Q: At the Leningrad level there wasn't harassment? It was business as usual?

FLOYD: As I said, as soon as we reached Soviet officials in their roles within Soviet organizations, things were just fine. When you got to the customs depot at the airport to send out somebody's air freight, they were not obnoxious. Towards the end of our tour in Leningrad, I was pregnant. And when I would show up with air freight shipments and noticeably pregnant, I actually got a fair amount of attention. And the first time I tried to drive a 26 foot step van through the archway of the 18th century building that the consulate was located in, even the militia guards out front were prepared to give me a little coaching as I maneuvered that monster.

Q: 85 to 87, things were happening in the Soviet Union.

FLOYD: Absolutely.

Q: I realize that you were busy with the water heaters, but you must have been picking up quite a bit of stuff.

FLOYD: Also because I was a political cone officer – one of the people PNG'd from Leningrad was our political officer. That meant that it gave me the opportunity to pick up some of that work as well. Notably, with some of the refuseniks who were in Leningrad, which was a great source of rumor and general public information. And, as you point out, as part of the changes within the Soviet government, from glasnost to perestroika, they were increasingly getting exit permission so that they felt more free about talking about a number of things because they knew they were getting out.

Q: What were you picking up from you contacts about – was there a change in the Soviet system? Were you seeing that coming? First place, where was Gorbachev at this point?

FLOYD: This is embarrassing. I have trouble remembering exactly when he came into the general secretary position. He was there probably for most of that time period.

Q: You were beginning to feel the . . .

FLOYD: Absolutely.

Q: This is an Earth change, wasn't it?

FLOYD: Leningrad was always a very culturally active location. Not in terms of quantity, but in terms of quality, our interaction with the cultural elite was probably higher, conceivably in part because our contact with the political elite was less because they were in Moscow. One of the events that we sponsored at this time was the visit of Vladimir Horowitz, who came to perform at the Leningrad Philharmonic. And that was a major cultural experience in which we found tickets actually available to the public instead of being solely under the control of the political or party elite. We saw a greater willingness to allow student exchanges of what we thought might have been questioned in the past. Things as simple as Americans of Russian heritage were allowed on some of the exchanges with greater frequency than in the past. Less following, less harassment. Still there, but it was more monitoring than intrusive.

Q: Were you able to get into some of the traditional way of Russian life? The sitting around a kitchen table and talking?

FLOYD: Much more so with the refuseniks, who had much less to lose. Most Russians were very confused. They did not know what was going on. They had seen lightening up decades earlier and then the clampdown. So they were a little leery. I think we discussed the last time we spoke the event that told me that this was going to work, which was our farewell gathering when people actually got to make their own choices. They got to decide something as mundane as a social appearance without having to clear it with somebody. And they got to act as individually responsible professionals, which for most was quite amazing.

It was the next wave – I would say – from the late 80s up to the 90s, which really broke down that barrier of access and personal revelation beyond the small slice of Soviets that had rejected their system earlier. We spent hours with refuseniks.

As a digression, you keep referring to the Lonetree events. In fact, it was in a subsequent time back in the former Soviet Union when my husband – being an active duty military person – had to go to Frankfurt to have a lie detector test relative to his activities. One of the questions that was difficult for him – actually difficult for the questioner – was “have you ever been alone with a Russian woman?” And he would fairly directly say “yes,” because while I was in the living room drinking tea with the men discussing exit visas and political issues, he was in the kitchen with the lady of the house discussing eggs and teapots and . . . which was a reflection of job responsibilities and vocabulary. But for better or for worse, the good guys from NCIS just couldn't grasp that a military person might be married to a political officer whose job was contact with Russians. But that's just one of the delightful twists of American security cultures coming into contact with each other.

Q: In the Leningrad context, who were those refuseniks? Were they mostly Russian Jews?

FLOYD: Almost exclusively.

Q: What was the motivation? What were they saying? Why were they the refuseniks and not some others?

FLOYD: Many of them were very bright and very ambitious and the mere fact that one line in their Soviet passport said they were Jewish created incredible barriers to their professional and personal lives: where they could work, what they could do, where they could live.

Q: This is sort of ingrained in the system?

FLOYD: Absolutely.

Q: Were they talking about going to Israel or were they talking about the United States?

FLOYD: United States from day one. They all knew how to bail out of the processing train, usually in Rome, and run to the US.

Q: Israel was not really the . . .

FLOYD: For a very, very few of them. For the Sharanskis, yes. But for the vast majority of people that we dealt with, it was the United States. In part, mind you, because even before the mid to late 80s, there had been a trickle of departures and many of them had ended up in the United States, not unlike Irish or Swedish or any other stream of immigration. They were going to folks that they knew.

Q: Oh yeah. On the side, were you getting anything about Israel? How did they feel about Israel?

FLOYD: The vast majority of the refuseniks who we dealt with were not deeply religious. And it is my belief that they were uncomfortable about the need to exhibit a greater foundation in their religion if they were going to successfully live in Israel.

Q: How Jewish were they, would you say?

FLOYD: The best comparison that I can come up with is to parallel their degree of belief, identity and practice to what is fairly frequently seen in many other religions. The average American Lutheran goes to church on Christmas and Easter, knows what a crucifix looks like, has some idea what a Madonna is, but if you asked them to discuss in great detail the difference between Lutheran, Methodist, Episcopalian and probably even Catholic, they'd be hard pressed to distinguish with much degree of specificity, particularly on a theological line.

Q: How about with the Russian Leningraders? Did you have much chance to talk with them?

FLOYD: Clearly the FSNs. Clearly the folks in the neighborhood stores where we always shopped. But never with the sense that they were revealing their souls.

Q: I was talking about whether you were picking up any feeling towards the refusniks.

FLOYD: Varied. There were those who would joke that they wish they were Jewish because at least they would then have a chance of getting out. There were others, particularly in Leningrad, who saw them as traitors for wanting to leave the motherland. Some Jews took the same approach towards refusniks. Stay here and make it better. Don't leave.

Q: Well what constitutes a refusnik?

FLOYD: Someone who had applied to emigrate from the former Soviet Union and had been refused exit permission.

Q: And what were we doing about it? What was being done about?

FLOYD: Every time we had human rights or immigration discussions, we provided lists of people who we knew that had legitimate places to go – that was one of the Soviet's frequent statements, "We can't let them go, they would be lost because there is no country that wants them." So we would constantly give them lists of people for whom we had issued entry documents, but they couldn't get out because they lacked exit documents.

Q: Was anything happening?

FLOYD: Trickle, all throughout the 80s. It opened up more once you got into 86, and by 87 a lot of the old backup was breaking through. The big flood didn't come until 88 or 89.

Q: Was there a change in the attitude of Soviet officials? Were they more forthcoming, or not?

FLOYD: Up until our departure, I would not say that I would characterize Russian officials as notably, totally opening up. If you take it from a totally closed, totally controlled, only if I'm told to, only if I'm authorized to attitude, to a total independent, empowered professional, they were probably about, maybe a third of the way. You would get a couple occasions when a couple officials would actually lean forward. But it was certainly not on their shoulders. It was still "let me check." It was still "I'll have to get permission." It was still "we're not cleared to do that."

Q: Were you picking up any reflections of ethnic divisions? I realize you are off in Leningrad, but still.

FLOYD: Well Leningrad has always been the touching off point for a lot of – even Soviet – relations with people of the far north. It's where their biggest institution is for that study. It's what took us out to Yakutsk to look at permafrost with the US Army Corps of Engineers. There are tremendous ethnic divisions in Russia today and in the former Soviet Union. The major distinction that you usually find in Leningrad is between ethnic Russians and the Balts. There are not many central Asians, who are the scapegoats for every Russian.

Q: Was Leningrad our window on the Baltic states?

FLOYD: Yes. Pretty much.

Q: Could you get over there?

FLOYD: You could drive to Estonia. You could drive to Tallinn.

Q: Was there a growing international community in Leningrad at this time?

FLOYD: There has always been a huge Finnish presence. And the consulate took huge advantage of that. Our moving company was Finnish. They were our shipping company. They were our source of paint and light bulbs and water fixtures. But they were well and thoroughly there. Germans were present a little more. It's a port. It's a big shipping center for most of northern Russia, northern Soviet Union.

Q: As a political officer, were you getting feelings about the Soviet economy and how it produced and all? Because I think this is the big thing that, in a way, the intelligence people felt that the Soviet Union would hold together forever and all – and it seemed to be that economics . . .

FLOYD: I would take it the other way and say that the Soviet economy was not going to be able to maintain its hypocrisy and continue to function either in terms of developing its military or – and here's where the falseness was displayed – in its relations in an increasingly globalized world. If they were going to depend on American wheat imports, if they were going to depend on American drill bit imports, they had to more closely approach Western accountability standards, from the beginning of the plan to its execution. The falseness of the Soviet system is what killed it.

Q: I mean, we are sitting here and you have a laptop computer sitting on the table there. The computer was just coming into its own at that point.

FLOYD: Including in the consulate.

Q: Yeah. State Department does not reflect the cutting edge of technology. Did you get any feeling that the Soviets were beginning to fall behind in this very important aspect?

FLOYD: Absolutely. Telephones alone were going to bring it down. Not only did they not feel empowered in terms of policy to communicate with each other, they could not mechanically communicate with each other.

Q: So by the time you left there in 87, what was you feeling about things?

FLOYD: It was clear that the Soviet Union had turned a corner, that things were going to change, led in my opinion by economic changes, which I argued and in hindsight I don't think I would have seen it differently, even then, that while the Soviet Union might engage in more economic autonomy for its subdivisions, I couldn't imagine it breaking into the pieces that it has. I could not imagine Latvia wanting to try and stand up against Germany in North Sea area economic competition. I could not conceive of the Uzbeks breaking away to the extent that they were willing to stand up to China on their own. And in the end, they still retain a tight link to Moscow. But I didn't see that degree of breakup coming.

Q: What about the Finnish role there? Was there irredentism in Finland about Karelia?

FLOYD: No. I perhaps did not meet enough drunk Finns to get that to come out, but while they would talk about what went on in Vyborg, when it was Finnish, or show you where the line used to be, whether it was history, whether it was the degree of corruption – and I mean that both in terms of environment and development, and mental corruption – that had taken place in those areas, I never heard a Finn say that they wanted it back.

Q: Was Finland the place you went to get some fresh air?

FLOYD: And give birth. Yes, Finland was certainly the consulate's window on the world. It is where we went for medical and dental care. It is where we ordered a huge amount of our fresh food supplies. It is where we ordered a tremendous amount of local support material. Literally light bulbs.

Q: I remember seeing in Kyrgyzstan about ten years later where people were selling used light bulbs – I mean these were light bulbs that didn't work any more.

FLOYD: No, but you get your old light bulb, you go to work, you put the dead light bulb in, take the good one home, and the next day turn to your boss and say "My light went out." And make the boss replace it.

Q: Yeah.

FLOYD: The fact that such simple service items were not available. And also the mentality that said you can steal from your boss. That you have to go through these kinds of machinations to live your daily life. You can't run a modern economy on that level.

Q: Then nine months later, after your period of gestation in the bureau of human rights, you are off to Moscow?

FLOYD: No. To Ulan Ude, out in Siberia. To implement the INF treaty – the Intermediate Nuclear Forces treaty. One of those delightful bureaucratic twists and turns, I was assigned to the Department of Defense's On-Site Inspection Agency. It was an organization that was literally just standing up. And they wanted to assign State Department and DOD folks to be diplomatic escorts at the two points of entry. Well, one was Moscow. That was easy, you had the embassy. But the eastern one was harder to staff.

The treaty was set up that you declared a random inspection at the point of entry and the host government had X hours for this kind and X hours for that kind of inspection. Well if you were sitting in Moscow and wanted to inspect Sarawak, you could not, even if they instantly put you on the airplane, you couldn't get there within the time frame. So we created an eastern entry point. It was supposed to be in Irkutsk, which is a real live city. But their airport was undergoing capital repairs and couldn't handle C-131s. So the nearest available useable airport was Ulan Ude.

Q: Can you spell that and explain where it is?

FLOYD: Ulan Ude is two words. U-L-A-N U-D-E. Ulan being Mongolian for red. And Ude being the river that flows through the city. And I'm sure it has a meaning, but we never found it out. It is a hundred plus miles east of Lake Baikal and about a hundred and fifty miles north of Mongolia. It is slam in the middle of what would be called eastern Siberia. It is also the headquarters for the eastern Siberian military district and therefore had always been a closed city. But it did have a good sized airport, including a military alternative, which was one of our requirements knowing that things happen at airports. And so the Soviets, who wanted INF to work, said okay, you can base your operations in Ulan Ude.

Q: You were there for how long?

FLOYD: We were there from September of 88 until December of 89 and then we were pulled back to Moscow. We then periodically went out to Ulan Ude until summer of 90.

Q: You say we. Now what was your husband doing there?

FLOYD: My husband was the Department of Defense representative.

Q: Sounds like somebody was cooperating there.

FLOYD: It was serendipitous. The State Department wanted to send a rep. DOD wanted to send a rep. They wanted to send married people, coming out of Lonetree.

Q: Keep from messing around.

FLOYD: Yes. And they didn't want to send a whole troop. So with some creative networking, they found the Floyds, who had just come out of Leningrad, and we were willing to go. It did ruffle a lot of feathers. My husband is reasonably convinced it is the reason he never again got promoted. It certainly got me a reputation among Soviet hands for being brave, creative and probably a little crazy. But I don't think the personnel system liked that either. My CDO went bananas because they had to break my assignment to Human Rights. And in order to not have to do all the full advertising and recruitment and make some other provisions, they actually had to direct my assignment. Not with my opposition, but with Human Right's opposition. So they had to do a directed assignment and my CDO was not at all happy at having to do that paperwork.

Q: What was the situation in Ulan Ude? I mean, this is not a name that reverberates in the corridors of diplomacy.

FLOYD: It does not. The U.S. Government had been making due with TDY folks out there. I went out and met them prior to actually being transferred out there. We looked around the city for where a family with two kids could conceivably live. We drafted charts of hotel room reconfigurations. We looked at a couple Soviet apartments. And said, "it's not going to work." So the local official who was technically a deputy minister on the Buryat Council of Ministers took us over to the communist party guesthouse and said "Would this half of the house work for you?" And with some tolerance on everybody's part, it turned out to be a pretty nice setup. We had a two room, bath, vestibule type setup that had a door that we could lock, and that was our space. And then we used the guesthouse's kitchen. In fact we restocked it with a washer and a dryer and a freezer and a side-by-side refrigerator, and shelves and cupboards, all of which came in from Yokota Air Force Base.

Q: I assume that the communist party headquarters was delighted to have . . .

FLOYD: Absolutely, because I know that that equipment was not pulled out after we left. We were the only folks that they kept there permanently. When we left, the US representation went back to a TDY status. Partly because of where the treaty was and I also would hazard a guess partly because they couldn't find anybody adventurous enough to do so.

Q: What about living there?

FLOYD: It was the perfect time to be there in the sense that the Soviet Union still existed, which meant that there was still fairly strong central control. And the Soviets wanted the INF treaty to work. And therefore, when we identified a legitimate living need, they made it happen. On the other hand, perestroika was well and fully in place. And everybody talked to us and we talked to everybody. The actual workload was less than fifty-percent actually engaged in the INF Treaty. A goodly part of the reason for having someone there permanently was to convey the image to the Soviets that we were prepared to inspect at any time. The INF Treaty provides for twelve spot inspections a year, across the entire country, which would say if half went to Moscow and half went to Ulan Ude, it would still only be six a year. So our work was not heavy day-to-day, but what we were was the presence. The Soviets could never be sure when we might inspect.

There was also routine inspections through Ulan Ude because of where the Soviets destroyed their missiles. They launched to destroy. And those were planned, those were advertised. So essentially every morning we got up and we called Moscow and said "Is there a plane coming tomorrow?" And 200 days out of the year, they said "No." So we hung up and we were done with INF for 24 hours. But it could be Saturday, it could be Sunday. The rest of the time we did public diplomacy. We did outreach. We were there.

Q: Let's talk about the public diplomacy. Were you called up on to speak at schools?

FLOYD: Yes. I did a weekly lecture at the local pedagogical institute, so I figure that had corrupted an entire generation of teachers in Siberia. We also did spot lectures at other educational institutions and appeared at cultural events.

Q: Were you getting good questions from the audiences?

FLOYD: Of course it crossed the whole range. The most thoughtful ones were the comparative ones. You always had somebody who asked you the nice hostile ones. But one of the advantages of being an American is that you don't always have to agree with your government. You can argue their position and then you can say "But not all Americans agree," and go down that path too. And just that fact – whatever the issue – that you as a U.S. government representative could present both sides as valid was . . . You could see these gears going "Oh, that hurts."

Q: Were they reveling in the fact that they could get up and ask questions?

FLOYD: Yes. And when it was a larger group, particularly at schools, they tended to ask more logical, policy, history type questions. When it was smaller groups, or social groups, it was all about American life. And so many of them reminded me of questions that we had gotten on United States Information Agency exhibits. "How much?"

One of the advantages of living at this guesthouse was that the maids at the guesthouse also cleaned up our spaces, which was nice. And the first time one of them saw a J.C. Penney catalogue, her first question was "Who can order from here?" Because the assumption was "Do you have this because you are a government employee? Do you have this because you are a diplomat?" "No. I have this because I have dollars."

Q: Who were the people? Were these transplanted Russians?

FLOYD: They were all sorts of folks. One of the big historical sites out there was from when there were a lot of Decembrists that were exiled out there in the 1800s. An amazing number of current residents were folks who had come out to Siberia in their youths to help build the trans-Siberian railroad and stayed. Most of them fell in love with the adventure, the distance, the cowboy mentality.

Q: Like Wyoming and Idaho, or something like that.

FLOYD: And there's an indigenous population, the Buryats.

Q: How were they treated?

FLOYD: Not well.

Q: Were they essentially an Asian group?

FLOYD: Yes. They are kin to the Mongolians. In fact the languages are mutually understandable.

Q: How about the local authorities? Were they concerned about you?

FLOYD: It was the next step in being convinced that things would never go back to being as controlled as they had been. We always joked that because Ulan Ude had been a closed city, they had never been on distribution for those memos from Moscow about how to be obnoxious to foreigners. And instead, their very human Siberian warmth came out. All we had to do was mention that we might sort of like to try and do something, and they would make it happen. They set our kids up in nursery school. They got my husband into a gym. I said that I like to swim and they set me up at the airplane factory to use their swimming pool. And of course, because I was the beloved foreigner, they had to do it during the executives' hour. So I'm swimming with the director. I remember the locker room conversations with his wife.

You talked about did we ever have a chance to sit down and drink a lot of tea. In Ulan Ude I drank enough tea to float Noah's ark. In part because we had time. In part because that was a lot of what I could do. I went to English language classes and competitions, and Veterans day celebrations. And we were on the podium for the May Day parade. And all of the holidays, they thought we were pretty cool.

Q: What about the inspections?

FLOYD: We were the diplomatic air crew escorts. So our job was, when this 141 flies in, make sure that . . .

Q: C-141 is a large transport plane.

FLOYD: It's a large cargo plane coming in from the American air force base in Yokota, Japan. American air crews, an interagency group of American inspectors. We made sure that the plane was taken care of. We made sure that the crew was taken care of. We made sure that the inspectors had what they needed in Ulan Ude. And then we put them on Soviet military aircraft with Soviet escorts and they went off. We were babysitters. We did not do the inspections.

Q: Did you get any feel for the hand of Moscow there, our embassy?

FLOYD: That's who I called once a day. That was it. They were helpful, in the sense that we had to do our own accounting. I mean, we had to do all the paperwork for paying the rent. For buying the garage, for some really funny stuff. Whenever we sent in these papers, I'd say "I've done this to the best of my ability. If I've violated some rule or regulation, tell me. Or, you can always send me to Siberia."

Q: Did you ever feel the fine hand of our intelligence services wanting to know what was going on there?

FLOYD: I wouldn't even characterize it as intelligence services. I would characterize it as the role of an American diplomat. My collection was all entirely open, from local newspapers, from local officials. While we were there, the Soviet Union had one of its first multi-candidate local elections. We talked to a number of the candidates. We went to polling places on election day. I had no classified reporting capability, so everything that I wrote back to Moscow was all unclassified. But this was a time when, for the first time, the embassy had incredible access to developments outside of Moscow and Leningrad.

Q: Was the view of America different from the middle of Siberia?

FLOYD: Oh, very much so. Because there had been so little contact with America. They knew America from those very few films that the Soviets would allow to be shown. And then they knew it from Soviet propaganda. I was always amazed at the Soviets' ability to read into second and third level effects. They would watch some horrendous movie about gang warfare in the United States - the Soviet Government let it in to show how violent, disturbed and dysfunctional American society was. But what the Soviet viewing audience would see would be the latest models of cars or that even that the crack junkie was wearing Levi jeans, which was the ultimate status symbol. They were so used to being lied to by their government.

The biggest problem was when what was shown was right. They had all along assumed that if their government said white, it was black. And if the government said black, then it was white. They were so imbued with hypocrisy that they assumed that that was the way everything worked.

Q: The old story is that at one point right after World War II - showing how awful things were - that the movie the Grapes of Wrath was shown and many of the Russians said "Look, their driving Model T Fords." It looks pretty rickety, but these are people who were able to move around in cars.

FLOYD: That they had a car, that they were able to move, and that there were government officials nominally trying to help in some minimal way. And honestly, without a bribe. So as I say, those secondary messages were sometimes pretty amazing.

Q: Was there any opening up of American movies, American TV or anything like that?

FLOYD: No. The Soviet media system was still highly government controlled and, quite frankly, from talking to my cultural affairs people back in Moscow, it was often a matter of money. They would acquire pirated material. But what you did start to see more series that the Soviets were able to buy from other countries. Cheap series.

Q: Well there was this Mexican serial. Was that going at that time, of the little girl who came from the small pueblo in Mexico? I was there some years later just for a short time, but this was hot stuff.

FLOYD: I watched much more of the news programs and not many of the serials. But that would have been the type of program that they acquired.

Q: Were you getting any reflections of dislike of Moscow and central command?

FLOYD: Always. But I know of few organizations that haven't hated the home office.

Q: He's the son of a bitch from out of town, you know. But anyway, so you were . . .

FLOYD: Wherever you go. If you are in a school system, it's always the superintendent's fault. If you are in a military system, it's always the generals. Same in Siberia. It's always Moscow.

Q: You mentioned an airplane factory and all, is this a military airplane?

FLOYD: Yes.

Q: Did that cause problems?

FLOYD: Apparently not, because they let me drive out there. They gave me the ID badge to get past the guard. Now, I didn't go wandering around. I did not abuse the hospitality that they had extended to me.

Q: By the way, did our inspectors find any hot stuff?

FLOYD: No.

Q: I suppose we had that place covered and they had us covered with satellite pictures and all that.

FLOYD: The treaty was successfully implemented.

Q: The feeling was one of cooperation?

FLOYD: Yes. Keeping people sticking to the rules – the funny one was that the inspectors were not allowed to carry personal cameras. Well every single group wanted a picture of themselves in Ulan Ude. One of its claims to fame is having the largest bust of Lenin. So they all wanted to go down to the main square and get their picture taken with Dead Fred the Head Red. But they were not allowed by the treaty to have a camera. But we were, so we took more pictures in front of that stupid statue. So the Soviets made them stick with the requirements of the treaty, but also provided all of the requirements of the treaty.

Q: How efficient did you find the airport personnel when dealing with them?

FLOYD: Spooky. One of the facts of Soviet air control operations is that they give you altitude from landing and not from sea level. And Ulan Ude is at about five thousand feet. So that the air controllers would tell our guys in the 141 to descend to 10,000 feet. Well they would descend to 10,000 feet above sea level, which was only 5,000 feet above the city. So our big green "crocodile" frequently came in very low. And when they would come out of the clouds, you could hear the crew over the tower going "-----." So we briefed crews with the initial factoid that Ulan Ude is at about 5,000 feet above sea level and you will be given instructions relative to landing height, not sea level. So they'll land you safe, but you will have varying impressions of the height they think you think you are at.

Q: Sounds like fun. What about refueling and that sort of thing?

FLOYD: They were very good. We demanded a different standard of safety and performance, notably no smoking around fuel trucks. But they caught on that that was what they were expected to do. They were very respectful of our requests for operational safety. "You have to stand back this far. We need these kind of barriers." And for the Floyd family, we were also exceedingly appreciative of their understanding that in addition to the provisions of the treaty, these flights supported the Floyd family. So that when the cases of diapers and the cases of water and, closer to the 4th of July, when the multiple watermelons and cases of beer for the 4th of July party came off, we made provisions for a local customs official to be there and properly clear them.

Q: Did you throw a 4th of July party?

FLOYD: We had a wonderful 4th of July party.

Q: How did that go?

FLOYD: It was seventh heaven. It was amazing because we invited the full range of people that we came into contact with. We invited the general who was head of the operation. We invited the little lady from the hotel next door who gave my kids haircuts and wouldn't take money for it. We invited nursery school teachers, theater directors, customs officials, all of the military guys who worked at the airport, everybody at the airport, from the airport director to the fueling guys. And you could see them having some difficulty with the democracy of that collection. They loved our beer. When they found out that we didn't have any vodka, they went out and got some and brought it in. So we had a lot of really happy people. But it was a great success.

Q: By this time the video tape business was going. Were you able to get U.S. programs?

FLOYD: We lived on video tapes. We had regular mail service on the 141 that came it. And so our family could send us tapes. We could order tapes. We re-taped over them and sent tapes out to convince the grandparents that their grandkids were still alive.

Q: Would you have people over to see things?

FLOYD: Oh yeah. The other big parties that we had were Thanksgivings.

Q: Were you getting any reflection of people wondering what the hell was going on back on Moscow? I mean Gorbachev was doing his thing and this was such a revolution, really, that it must have made local people both happy, but pretty uncomfortable. I mean, they'd been used to one thing . . .

FLOYD: Exactly. And holding in their background the fact that one part of their heritage was exile. They were nervous about what was coming. Excited, but still a little antsy. The first round of elections, there were a few sort-of-independent candidates who didn't do very well, but they don't do well in our country. It was the folks who came with organizations – labor unions, communist party – that won. They are the ones who had name recognition. No overwhelming amateur observations of ballot box stuffing. But the first time you do anything, you tend to lean towards the familiar.

Q: Did you have visitors from our embassy?

FLOYD: Yes. They came out regularly to exchange paperwork, to make sure we hadn't gone native. They also came out and physically stayed in our apartment so that things like, I could go to Moscow for pre-natal care. That we always had the post manned. Even when we knew there wasn't going to be an inspection, you still kept somebody there to present the ability to receive an inspection.

Q: Where was the decision made to inspect? Do you know?

FLOYD: I was never involved in that decision. But my guess is that some of those other national technical means revealed an unusual movement of trucks, or a build up of personnel, or some sort of indicator. And then my guess is that every now and then somebody just went . . .

Q: Flipped a coin.

FLOYD: Flipped a coin.

Q: I'm sure. That's the way you do it. At this point, was there any feeling of tension between the United States and the Soviet Union?

FLOYD: No. It was a pretty good time. The tension for most Russians was internal and it was uncertainty. Not civil war type tension, but just "I think I like it, but where are we going and what else is going to change?"

Q: We're talking about seventy years of one type of rule.

FLOYD: It was uncertainty, and that meant that most of the focus was internal.

Q: Well then, you had another child. You were a real producer, weren't you? How many children do you have?

FLOYD: We have three. That was the end. I got my girl and I stopped. It was one of my frequent lecture topics because people always asked me how I could be a mother and work and all this sort of stuff. And I talked about being able to make choices and having a supportive husband, and having an economy that was developed enough to provide me disposable diapers.

Q: This is probably a good place to stop.

FLOYD: Sure. I do need to get into . . .

Q: Okay. And so we will pick this up next time. You left there when?

FLOYD: We left in December, supposedly on R&R. But our daughter was born on the 10th of January. So we came to Washington State, stayed for Christmas, had the baby, and then my husband and older son went back to Moscow in early February and the baby and our youngest son and I followed later in February.

Q: So we'll be talking about February of 90 and we'll talk about your time – you were in Moscow for how long then?

FLOYD: Again, just from February until that summer. June, July maybe. July I think. Normal summer turnover.

Q: Okay, we'll pick it up there.

Q: This is tape three, side one with Jane Floyd. And we are not sure what we have covered, so we are . . . You came back from Ulan Ude, you went to Moscow and you were there for . . . ?

FLOYD: Approximately nine months. Most of 1990.

EDWARD HURWITZ
Consul General
Leningrad (1986-1988)

Edward Hurwitz was born in New York in 1931. He received his bachelor's degree from Cornell University in 1952. After serving in the US Army from 1953-1955 he entered the Foreign Service in 1956. During his career he had positions in Moscow, Seoul, Washington D.C., Afghanistan, Leningrad, and an Ambassadorship to Kyrgyzstan. Ambassador Hurwitz was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in August 1996.

HURWITZ: Yes. It was extremely useful for them. They were very interested in my experiences throughout the course.

Then I took a Russian refresher course having been assigned as consul general to Leningrad. I went out to Leningrad in September, 1986.

Q: You were in Leningrad from 1986 until when?

HURWITZ: September to end of August, 1988.

Q: When you got to the Soviet Union this 1986-88 period, what changes did you find from your previous tour?

HURWITZ: Well, I had been there in 1981 for two months as acting political counselor, and then I went back in 1982 for a month as acting political counselor, so it wasn't as if I hadn't been there since 1972 when I last left. I had also made a number of trips with congressional delegations while I was on the Soviet desk. In 1986 if you read the press carefully you could see it was much more open, but on the ground there was very little difference, if any. It did begin in Leningrad, in fact, Leningrad was the spawning ground of a movement that later became very important. What began in Leningrad was a kind of real grass roots, organizational kinds of public activity in opposition to the government in one way or another. I remember I was walking along the street one Saturday and I saw down one side street a lot of young people, a big group. There was a guy on a truck with a camera and I thought they were filming a picture, which they often do in Leningrad because it is an old city. It turned out from the press that this was a group of young people, environmentalists, architectural historians, who were demonstrating to preserve one of the old buildings that was going to be torn down. I later wrote in a cable describing this because it was so unusual in the Soviet Union. I said that this had to be organized with complete sanctions from the government, but let the group try to demonstrate on other issues. Well, it wasn't officially sanctioned. It turned out to be something that caught fire in Leningrad, the preservation of the old buildings, and spread to such issues as factories that were spewing out pollution. You found groups demonstrating around factories. There were rather large Jewish demonstrations in Leningrad. The Moscow press covered the first demonstration I had seen. In time these groups took on a life of their own. They began to be called informally, "not formal," and you began to get interviews in the press. This really did mark a change and is something that never stopped. Indeed, it went into areas that no government would be pleased about. There were anti-Semitic groups which had their own demonstrations. There was a bubbling up.

Q: Did you feel there was a lack of will on the part of the authorities for sitting on these people?

HURWITZ: No, no. It was clear that the Soviets had made a conscious decision to let this go forward. And as Gorbachev sort of defined what he was doing, it became clear that this was very conscious, and I think on his part quite calculated. He wanted to instill life into the system and he realized you can't do this by fear from above. You have to bubble up from the bottom. I believe he realized you are not going to get to where you want to go without having people be creative. Without having people bring to the public's attention issues that have to be solved. Basically the Party is not interested in solving a lot of issues, they want to let things go as they are. People are watching their own goodies, their own perks, and don't want to rock the boat. This means you are just going to fall further and further backward. He realized you have to let these problems come to the fore before you can deal with them. This process continued.

Q: Were you beginning to see an either disquiet or concern among the Soviet intellectuals by the growth of easier communications within the West, with word processing, faxes, etc.? It was rapidly changing how people do things in the Western world.

HURWITZ: It wasn't specifically put on those terms, but there was a growing realization that they were falling further and further behind. Just before I went out I read a report done by a group of academics from the Academy of Sciences, social scientists, and they were very much aware of how much the Soviets were falling behind in terms of ideas. And this, of course, is one of the things that helped bring everything down. The Soviets realized that to go forward you had to plug into the West, you couldn't keep computers out. People would get them one way or another. The trend was not to keep things tamped down like they had for decades, but if they wanted to move forward they would just have to open up. They had no choice. The late-'80s were the beginning of this.

Q: During this time, 1986-88, which was towards the end of the Reagan administration, had you sensed a change in the administration's attitude towards the Soviet Union at all?

HURWITZ: I think Reagan sort of moved from evil empire to a fairly businesslike approach to the Soviets. I think he started, and certainly Bush carried out, a policy which I thought was very sound. That is not to jump on the Soviets at every turn, let Gorbachev develop in the way he wants to, because basically that is in our interest. As you recall, Bush took a lot of heat later that Gorbachev hadn't supported the break up of the Soviet Union fast enough. Leaping into something like that and saying, "Hurrah, go to it!" would have been dangerous I think. It could have created some concerns within the Soviet Union that what was happening was only playing into the hands of the West.

Q: How did you find our contact with the local authorities, the mayor, local parties, etc.?

HURWITZ: Oh, that was easy, with the exception of the first secretary, Solovyov, who was a candidate member of the Politburo, very high ranking. I only sat down with him when Matlock, our ambassador in Moscow, came up and called on him. But other than that it was not difficult at all. We saw the whole range of people.

Q: Were you continuing your practice of going out and going to these lectures?

HURWITZ: Yes. Sometimes I went three times a day.

Q: I have been interviewing Gary Matthews who said he picked up the idea from you. Did you see a change in the environment of these lectures?

HURWITZ: Yes. Some of them were completely public, some were not. I went into the Army Club, for example, on a number of them and finally I was asked not to come. They were quite frank, and as time went on became much more frank. For example, I went to this army lecture in the officers' club and the lecture was on discipline, the whole atmosphere in the army. What was said would never have been said unless it was really tightly controlled. They were complaining about their terrible raising system, the way the non-coms treat...

Q: It really did not help the discipline of the Soviet army to continue that....

HURWITZ: They were talking about religious activities in the army which they didn't like. There was a frankness there. At one lecture, really an open lecture, you bought tickets to it, the lecturer was complaining that attendance in church in Lenin Oblast, which is the city and the area around it, out numbers all sporting events, all plays and theater events over the course of a year. The most eye opening lecture was by the economics editor of Literaturnaya Gazetta from Moscow, who came up from Leningrad and spoke at the Writers Club. It was the most incredible indictment of the Soviet system that I ever heard from a Soviet in a Soviet setting. It went from A-Z about everything they had done was wrong. Marxism is a hoax. Marxism economics is a hoax. Stalin was a criminal. The reason our army stood strong at Stalingrad was because Soviet soldiers would be shot in the back if they tried to retreat. Just A-Z. I wrote a long cable on this and got a commendation on it. People were just amazed in the Agency. But, this told you where they were going. This was December, 1986 as I recall. He talked about Sakharov. He talked about a riot that had just taken place in Kazakhstan in which two Russians were killed. And stuff that was not yet getting into the press, but within another period of time it would. So, there was a distinct change in the way they approached problems.

Q: Were you able to talk to the intellectual?

HURWITZ: Oh, yes.

Q: Were they talking about a new age or was their disquiet?

HURWITZ: There was both. I think it was very unsettling for Russians. I have been amazed that the changes happened in the Soviet Union without more turmoil than we have seen. There has been almost no turmoil, except in the Caucasus, and that sort of thing. But, when you realize that not only economically was everything pulled out from under them, but also intellectually. Jettisoning the whole ideology was beginning in 1986 and had gone pretty far by 1988. So, yes, people would talk about it. Some people would be disturbed. Most people were happy.

Q: Were you able to see much happening in the universities, where often ideas bubble up from the students?

HURWITZ: Well, you know Soviet students traditionally have not been in the forefront of the dissident movement or new ideas the way they are in most other countries.

Q: Why not?

HURWITZ: I don't know. Maybe it is a stage in their lives they have not been able to break out of. Unlike American students who break out very early, they were unable to break out of the strict discipline that they had. They always seemed to be very interested in getting ahead, like we portray now our students in the '50s. That may have changed, I don't know, but I never found in my early years in Moscow and then in Leningrad, that the students were in any way in the fore front. Students with special interests might be Jewish students for example, or those people who were very interested in architecture, who had their own interests.

Q: Did you have any contact with the Jewish intellectual group? How were they pointed? Were they pointed just to get the hell out and go to the States?

HURWITZ: There were two major concerns. The first one was that the Soviets had sort of clamped down on the Jewish people getting out. Brezhnev let an awful lot go out in the '70s, but that came pretty much to an end with the Afghan war. So, when I went there the major issue was Refuseniks. Secondly, as time went on, and I mentioned to you the sort of freeing up of the atmosphere did lead to a rise of sort of home ground anti-Semitism, a movement called Pamyat, and there was a growing fear on the part of Jews in Leningrad that anti-Semitism was bubbling up. The economy at that time was in terrible shape and they felt, as in the past in other countries, they would be the scape goat. I know when I was there we had not only Pamyat meetings, but a number of incidents in Jewish cemeteries where stones were overturned. So, we were all concerned that this might develop into something serious. It really hasn't. This is an amazing thing, a very encouraging thing. But, despite all the economic turmoil throughout the Soviet Union, we have seen only a flourishing now of Jewish life. You pick up the "New York Times" and synagogues are opening, Yiddish is being taught. If that had developed the other way it would have presented us with a major human rights problems and would have been bad for the Jewish community in Leningrad.

Q: Did you have a particular brief in Leningrad?

HURWITZ: Oh, yes. That was part and parcel of US policy since the '60s that we would follow this issue and so we did. The main thing was Refuseniks.

Q: Could you explain what a Refusenik was?

HURWITZ: A Refusenik, an English word with nik tacked on, is someone who has been refused visas to leave. In my time a number of them left. One must bare in mind that Leningrad traditionally was a hard place, very backward in political terms place. A good example was this lecture I mentioned which was a complete eye opener. That guy had to come from Moscow. In fact, I wrote something shortly thereafter because it was another example of what we noticed that whenever Gorbachev wanted to push the reform line in Leningrad he had to send somebody up from Moscow to do it because the Leningrad party line organization was very conservative. Over the years our consulate had more trouble in Leningrad with officers being PNGed or officers being roughed up, than Moscow had. When I got there the atmosphere was quite good and I can't remember any incidents like that at all. But, just before I got there somebody got roughed up. Oh, somebody was PNGed while I was there. A guy who was aggressively Jewish, he has since left the Foreign Service and is very active in Jewish affairs in the States, was PNGed. He had great contacts and great Russian. But, that was an exception.

Q: What about on just the normal consular things? This was a time when more Americans were coming in. Did you have troubles with American tourists?

HURWITZ: Lots of problems. We had a small consular section, really just one officer who did consular work. There were a lot of tourists and many the kind that just got into difficulties. I don't mean sailors and people like that, but elderly people. A number of them got sick and one or two died. The other type were student groups. Their problem was usually drinking. We had one 16 year old kid who literally drank himself to death by drinking a bottle of vodka and he died. He was the only child of a divorced woman. A real tragedy. The other one was a 18 year old girl who committed suicide by slitting her wrists and then jumping out of a fifth floor window. We had a consular officer who handled that very well.

My view on consular work is that we really should bend over backwards because this is where the rubber hits the road, probably the only contact an American citizen has with an American embassy and State Department. We had some good people who did a good job. For example, on one woman who was in the hospital, Larry, who was a political officer who spoke good Russian and the duty officer, went to the hospital to see her. This woman sent us back an article that appeared in the St. Petersburg, Florida newspaper praising the State Department and how solicitous the people were. This is the sort of thing that really counts. Tourism was big business. Boat loads of people would come in from Scandinavia. Big tours. I would talk to groups once a week.

Q: Gary Matthews was telling me that one of the problems about Leningrad was that after there would be big meetings in Moscow of American delegations they would send them off to Leningrad to see the Hermitage and all which meant on weekends he would end up escorting them around. Did you get into that?

HURWITZ: Congressional delegations required that but not too many came through. However, the tourist groups didn't require that at all.

Q: What about dealing with the Baltic republics during this time? Any changes?

HURWITZ: Yes, something had changed and I must say that I wasn't quick enough to see it. We got a note from the Estonian foreign ministry that from now on they would like to have their visas issued by the consulate in Leningrad by simply sending a note from the Estonian foreign ministry to us asking to have a visa put into a Soviet passport. Previously the visa request had come from Moscow on a Soviet ministry of foreign affairs note. I said that I didn't like this idea because I think they were just trying to have us recognize somehow the Estonian foreign ministry when our position has always been that we don't recognize forcible cooperation. Moreover, we were never suppose to deal with anything other than the cities. We were only accredited to the cities, not to the republic. In retrospect, what was probably on the way was actually an attempt on the Estonian ministry to exercise some independence from Moscow, but you could see it both ways. I took it the conservative, negative way. A positive way would have been to bring those guys in. Of course as things developed with the Baltic states during 1989-90 with students fighting and Soviet troops marching into Lithuania, this could have been a feeler along those lines. My reaction was not to have anything to do with it and we didn't.

Q: Then you left Leningrad in August 1988. Why don't we pick it up the next time after that.

HURWITZ: Great.

GARY L. MATTHEWS
Coordinator for Soviet Union Affairs

Washington, DC (1987)

Gary L. Matthews was born in Missouri in 1938. He received a bachelor's degree from Drury College in 1960, a master's degree from Oklahoma State University in 1961, Columbia University in 1969, and a master's degree in international affairs. He served in the U.S. Army from 1955-1958 and joined the Foreign Service in 1961. His career included positions in Germany, Poland, Vietnam, Malta, and Washington, DC. Mr. Matthews was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1996.

MATTHEWS: We are in May of 1987, well, almost June.

Q: So you went where?

MATTHEWS: Just to recap, I was closing on two years at my ambassadorial post in Malta. And over a period of some months there had been incidents at our Embassy in Moscow. Naturally, since I was basically an old Soviet hand, I had followed this in great detail, and hardly missed a word that I could pick up. There had been a series of terrible problems involving the operations of our embassy in Moscow, and as it turned out subsequently, other operating problems and other problems in Eastern Europe. But there were two biggies which had occurred. One was the big blow-up of the "discovery" that the new office building, the new chancery building, which had been under construction for years and years in Moscow down the street from the site of our long existing old building which was a fire trap, that the new building had been determined to be totally penetrated, bugged, rendered virtually useless for any purpose whatsoever. And as a result of that...

Q: We're talking about Soviet...

MATTHEWS: ...by the KGB, by Soviet intelligence. That was brought to a head by, and I forget what specific event it was, but this is something that had been building for a long time as it subsequently proved to be the case. The other companion big scandal, and scandal would certainly be an appropriate word here, was the Marine security guard scandal which took place in '86, when it came to light that a Marine security guard, Lonetree by name, had been involved in contacts with the KGB, and it was a classic sort of use of female entrapment, etc.

Q: A honey trap.

MATTHEWS: ...honey trap, they had the very expression, and this grew as the investigation unfolded, led to the discovery and revelation that other Marine security guards had been involved, at least in lax practices of various and sundry nature. So, a long way of saying, as happens in Washington, the clouds of scandal were billowing about the State Department to say the least. So in casting about for in typical State Department tradition, for a way to handle this, it was deemed appropriate to find a special coordinator to deal with the many, many problems, and the many, many movers and shakers who were interested in having something done about those problems as soon as possible. So who knows how many people they considered in their deliberations, but I got a call from George Vest who was Director General of the Foreign Service at the time, in early spring of 1987, when I was in Malta. He asked me if I would be willing to come back to take this position on short notice which had a lot of oomph behind it as I subsequently determined, a lot of knives behind virtually every door, which was no surprise to me, since that's the way these things happen.

Just a few specifics perhaps as stage setting for the year that then ensued: you had at least three if not four, as I recall, major high level investigations of both the embassy bugging scandal, and the Marine security guard scandal. I know that former Defense Secretary Laird chaired a very high level prestigious panel that made a major report and found a number of inadequacies, to say the least, in security practices, etc., at the embassy in Moscow. Former Defense Secretary, and secretary of other things as well, Jim Schlesinger conducted a study which was focused specifically on what one might do, one might best do, to solve the problem of the bugged new embassy building. This was more of an engineering, security study. But that also had a lot of high level oomph behind it. I dealt with the consequences of that study when I got back to Washington just in time to go with Jim Schlesinger up to the Hill for briefing of Senators, Congressmen, on it. That actually wound up having a lot to do with the very frenetic year which I then undertook. There was a third major study by the PFIAB, the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board, whose members believed they should be properly seized of this, and I'm sure that there was at least one or more other panels, not to mention of course the Department's own internal investigations, etc.

What to say? Sort of related to this, although deriving from other antecedents, really, was the problem of local employees. The local employees as you recall, Stu, from your own service in embassy Belgrade as well as in other posts in communist countries, were by all means trying to the extent they could to find out things, to spy on the Americans. And, of course, a lot of the internal security mechanisms which we had at our post whether it was the embassy in Moscow, or the embassies in Eastern Europe, or some of the consulates, were geared very much toward insuring much as we could that they really couldn't find out anything that useful. At any rate, I can't recall quite the exact timing, but suffice to say it was generally in this time frame, the US took some measures to tighten up the access and utilization of Soviet national employees at our embassy in Moscow, and the Soviet government retaliated, or reacted, by withdrawing all, repeat all, of the local employees in the motor pool, the carpentry shop, the plumbing, and cleaning functions, and so on and on. Essentially, embassy Moscow was left totally on its own to operate all of these services which had been done by armies, if you will, of Soviet nationals, with its own rather meager American staff. I mention all this because this was all the scenery, the architecture as they like to say now about great events, that I found when I returned to Washington. Needless to say, coming back to a number of investigations, and hearings, and finger pointing by Congress...it seemed at one point to me that virtually everyone in the Congress had something going on this. Goodness knows, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and the intelligence committees, corresponding committees on the House, all had their own separate fact finding missions, reports. So a lot of what I came back into immediately was being thrown up to capitol Hill to some way, somehow, try to assure these outraged members of Congress that something would be done to get a handle on this.

Q: Could you give a little background about, as you saw it at that time, the antecedents of getting a new embassy, and how we conducted that? That would be a good place to start.

MATTHEWS: I can, and the reason I can do it with some degree of precision is that one of the major things which was done, and which I also paid a lot of attention to as soon as I got back, was the need to see what the dimensions of these terrible problems were...a look back to see just what the antecedents, what the origins of all this were. It started with the agreement for the construction of new embassy sites. This of course was reciprocal. We needed a new embassy in Moscow, the Soviets needed a new embassy in Washington. The antecedents of this went back to the early summits between President Nixon and Communist Party General Secretary Brezhnev. It may have been, I believe, the 1972 summit which actually produced the agreement for the exchange of sites. There was controversy surrounding this from the very beginning because the US gave to the Soviet Union the Mount Alto site in Washington, DC, which as you know, Stu, is one of the relatively few high ground areas in Washington.

Q: For someone who doesn't know, its just below the National Cathedral on Wisconsin Boulevard. It's up high, and you'll explain why that's important.

MATTHEWS: The site for the new American embassy in Moscow was prime real estate. There was no question of that, but it was lower in elevation by some considerable degree than the Soviet site. This led to subsequent criticisms of the stupidity of the deal. And I have an anecdote in that regard. This has to do with electronic intelligence gathering which it is said was conducted by the Soviet Union in its installations, and it is alleged that US embassies engaged in this as well.

Q: At line of site of course, the higher up you are, the more you can beam at things.

MATTHEWS: And that had a lot to do with the technology of the 1960s-'70s. In more recent times as technology has become ever more sophisticated, these concerns are somewhat diminished. But at the time it was red hot. So you might say in that sense the situation, the clock started ticking way back when the ink went on that agreement before ever a spade of earth was turned in either Moscow, or Washington.

At some point in the '70s the Soviet construction organization, a totally Soviet government controlled and operated organization began to clear the site in Moscow. As I say, it was just down from where our present embassy is located. It was, and is, a large site, it was some ten to twelve acres as I recall. Much of it by the way consists of town house type units, plus a huge cafeteria, gym, storage rooms, etc., and at the very head of all of that is this massive ten-story chancery building, extremely massive in terms of size, heaviness of construction materials, etc. So Soviet workmen, including to be sure full time members of the KGB, would have been involved in the clearing and excavation of the site itself as time went on, and the actual construction began...of course, you put in your footings, bearing foundation, etc. That was all done by Soviet workmen, and indeed after the fact, investigations revealed that there was only very sporadic US counter intelligence surveillance of the site at any given time. Not that in the event that counted for very much because the thing that really caused the problem was that at some point in the construction process, there was a need, because the structure is so massive, to precast major concrete beams, members, spandrels...I became quite knowledgeable by the way on the whole range of construction issues. Those were all done off-site at the one, or several, places around Moscow where the Soviet construction firm did such things. They basically did it and brought those huge members, trucked them over and little by little up went the structure. Suffice to say with literally no supervision as far as I am aware of the precasting process of those major members, beam spandrels, any and everything could and no doubt was inserted into them. By that time the Soviet government, in effect said, here we've completed the construction contract according to the specs as laid out. I can't remember the exact sequence, I know always in terms of new construction projects in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, we would have the governments prepare the structure up to a point, and then we would say that thereafter we will take care of handling those things that we wish to construct on our own, using our own American cleared workmen, often Seabees, and others. But the timing on everything came sensationally to light in what you might call from the standpoint of a major scandal, the most sensation timing vis-a-vis the Marine security guard scandal. And that's why the avalanches and abuse were being heaped on the State Department, and if you will on the US government more generally because of the terrible security lapses that led to these situations, they all came together at once. So they were major problems. And in the wondrous ways of the State Department bureaucracy, not to mention the many other organizations in Washington which had a role, and sometimes a significant role in these projects, there was no one entity that other agencies felt comfortable with in trying to pull it together, determine priorities, do the footwork up on Capitol Hill, oversee the implementation, or after action reports is perhaps the better term of these studies that I mentioned earlier.

Well, I had no illusions whatsoever when I got off the phone with George Vest. This was a barrel of worms even before I knew all of the gory details. Even what I knew already from reading the wireless file while I was sitting in my sunny little office in Malta was enough to tell me that this was a mess. But hey, may you live in interesting times and I was coming up on my two years, so I said, what the heck. I came back to take this on.

What can I say? It was an extremely hectic, frenetic, even ugly year, twelve months or so in terms of all the things that I was trying to do. The Department tried to be helpful to me, certainly in terms of letting me chose an able staff, and giving me the space, and the resources, and the funds that I needed to crank up this extraordinary effort. As I look back on it, and I have reflected on this many times, I believe we came out about where I thought we should come out after some months of my initial labor. There had been a number of schemes, and here I'm talking just about what to do with the building problems.

Q: Before you get to that, could you tell what the Sergeant Lonetree thing was too? Because both these come together.

MATTHEWS: The Sergeant Lonetree, corporal Lonetree, whatever he was, thing was in fact his confessing. He had finished his assignment as a Marine security guard in Moscow and I think he transferred to Vienna to the detachment there. But through whatever means that it came to light, I simply cannot recall now, there were allegations that the KGB, the secret police, had been given entry into classified areas of the American embassy in Moscow, to wit, the communications center and such places. Obviously security people from various organizations descended upon Sergeant Lonetree, and a number of other Marines who were stationed in Moscow at the time, and months and months later it's my recollection that it was concluded that in fact neither Sergeant Lonetree nor anyone else had opened the doors of the embassy in the dead of night to let KGB folks roam throughout these classified areas. Although during the course of my very intense year with those responsibilities, that was the operating assumption that this could have happened, and that therefore we would act as if it had happened, not without reason taking a worse case scenario in that regard. So there were lots of problems. Needless to say, I was not a sole actor, nor did I have the kind of authority to go with the kind of responsibility that would have been needed to create solutions. That this and this will be done, to take care of the problem. As in typical State Department, and indeed a typical Washington fashion, I was given that post ambiguously. All titles of "tsar" which I've seen given to people many times, are always with the same result. The title of coordinator really means that everyone feels free to do in-runs, and use you for carom shots where it serves their purpose. But since I was somewhat a veteran of such 7th floor politics, and other such things around Washington, it probably bothered me less than it would have someone who was less knowledgeable about all of that.

Secretary of State Shultz strongly supported my operation, along with John Whitehead who was the deputy Secretary of State. As a matter of fact, I won't say the crisis ever cooled, but it at least didn't become the number one compelling thing for the Secretary of State every day. Whitehead was the one to whom I would normally report, although I would give Secretary Shultz an update every few weeks as well. But I was working very closely with the assistant secretary in charge of diplomatic security, of European affairs, the foreign buildings operation, FBO, and all manner of other folks in the Administrative.

Soon after I got back to Washington, and of course my attention was totally compelled by the problems of just Moscow, at some point we began at least to sort out a few priorities. Even though there was immense work to be done, I remember a meeting with Secretary Shultz where he said, I know that our posts in Eastern Europe have bad operating problems also. We hoped nothing like the Moscow thing. So in a sort of offhand way, my responsibilities, at least from Secretary Shultz, were expanded considerably to include our East European posts. In fact, it would have been beyond the ability of any human being, let alone one with a staff as small as I had, 5, 6, 7 people to try to handle everything for all these posts. But I like to think we did some good in terms of setting up coordinating mechanisms which by and large got them more attention.

Q: In a way there are two approaches of this thing. One is to find out who is at fault, and hang somebody out to dry. And the other one is, what are you going to do about it?

MATTHEWS: When I got back I said to the Secretary of State, and to everyone else, I said, I'm well aware that there all kinds of people here who want someone to hang. I'm not naive, I realized that that's the way it is. And had I been naive, I would not have remained naive long because many members of Congress were delighted to have me come up so they could punch on me, and tell me just how much someone needed to hang for this. But, without any doubt in my mind then or now, my job was to try to do something about the problem, not to sit there and say, oh, this is terrible. I'm all for responsibility and people taking responsibility for their actions, but I saw most of my effort as geared to do something about it, and that's where I in fact directed the staff effort.

The first time consuming thing was to follow through with Secretary Schlesinger, Jim Schlesinger, the results of his study. He came up with a study, and he used some very good intelligence analysts, and construction experts in the security field, to help him with his study. He came out with the recommendation that rather than demolish the present structure entirely, or chop half of it off, or three-quarters of it off, that you in effect construct an adjoining structure which would be constructed entirely with American cleared labor, etc. That would be the area that the ambassador and all other classified operations took place in. And, of course, there was and is immense respect in town for Jim Schlesinger. In presenting testimony before a Congressional committee, I accompanied him along with others needless to say, but I was always introduced as the person who was going to follow through and make sure these problems are taken care of, by God! Jim Schlesinger, of course, was always asked, as indeed I was, how could something like this have happened? How? And early on he quoted Napoleon, if I'm not wrong, as having said of some such terrible scandal situation back during the Napoleonic era, that there are limits to rascality, but there are no limits to stupidity. So I found this actually not a bad line to use myself subsequently. Oh, goodness sakes, there was finger pointing everywhere, and every which way between individuals, between government departments, between branches of government. But little by little, not that I had a heck of a lot of time, I set up a structure. We commissioned a very focused engineering study of options of what we could do to the existing building. This was without prejudice I hasten to add to Secretary Schlesinger's recommendation about the separate structure. But as I recall, several mover-shaker committee chairmen on Capitol Hill said look again at what we can do to the present structure. So we commissioned a very, very detailed study. I believe it was by BDM, a major Washington area contractor who has a lot of government contracts. And they came up with several options. They looked at tearing down the structure entirely, this massive ten-story building, and excavating to sever any and all cables, and then partial deconstruction. A new word appeared in our lexicon, deconstruction, we used it all the time. And in the event we made recommendations to Congressional committees, to the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board, just about everyone who had any stick in this at all. And over the course of some months I managed to forge an inter-agency consensus on presenting to the Congress a recommendation that we go for something that came to be known Top Hat, which was to deconstruct the top several floors of the embassy structure, and then rebuild using state-of-the-art, state of technology methods and procedures, our own secure area. This ran into predictable opposition from those, especially in Congress...well, almost entirely in Congress, who wanted the building totally torn down, and excavated. We ran into opposition from them, and on one committee side, a very powerful committee chairman, we ran into opposition because he didn't think that we really needed to do much of anything. He didn't see why you couldn't just use the building and watch what you say, he finally characterized it that way. So there ensued an impasse which went on for several years, well past my retirement. And only in recent years, say in the last two or three years, did they finally come around, after all the passions had pretty much cooled in terms of political feelings about it...I don't mean cooling of the sense that something good needed to be done to solve the problems, they came back to the recommendation that essentially you go with Top Hat, you lop off the top floors, and rebuild.

I might add in all this, that it was extremely complicated, a complex matrix because throughout this whole period, even going well back before the scandals broke, the US side had insistently, and properly so, said that the Soviet Union could not use its new chancery site, which it had already constructed, that building was already in place on Mount Alto...

Q: With its own workers?

MATTHEWS: Partially with its own workers, but they would use American workers for some things, but they were very closely supervised. The Soviet embassy people would, of course, use American contractors for certain things, major casting, etc., the concrete trucks would come in from wherever firm, but the Soviet embassy counterintelligence security people were always very much on top of this. In other words, they were doing it the way it should have been done on the other side, you might say, by our people in Moscow. I don't know how long construction had been finished, and handsomely so I might say on the new Soviet chancery on Mount Alto. Now, most of our construction on the ten-twelve acre site in Moscow was residential, and commissary, gym, storage, etc., about which there was no controversy. You assumed that obviously they had put listening devices in that too. Similarly, the Mount Alto site contains many, many residential units. So at some point, because we had terrible space problems in Moscow, we had cut the deal that the Soviet embassy people could move into their residential units at Mount Alto, and we correspondingly moved into our residential units at that new site in Moscow. But the chanceries remained unoccupied.

So coming back to more recent times, sometime in the last two or three years, '93, '94, '95, the Russian government now, I think this is the end of the Soviet Union, in effect cut a deal that said, you, the American government can have the entire property, which is a large expanse of property which lies between the present old American embassy in Moscow, and the new ten acre site, and do with it as you wish. We said, okay in view of this we will now let you move in to your new chancery building. We, of course, are not going to move into the chancery building in Moscow because only now would they be even getting underway with the major reconstruction of that building, which will cost tens of millions of dollars.

Q: While this was going on, what was the reaction of the Soviets? I mean, during the time you were involved. Did they play any part?

MATTHEWS: Oh, yes. They were somewhat between bemused, and amused. Chortling is actually a very good description. The reason I had some insights into this is, I made some incredible like ten or eleven trips to Moscow in a nine month period, which is definitely more travel than one would care to have. And most of those trips to Moscow involved meetings with Soviet officials about what we were insisting on, etc. I mean, there was certainly never any question of their being arrogant or critical because we had essentially caught them with their hands in the cookie jar. We, however, of course were the ones responsible for making it so easy for them to put their hands in the cookie jar all the time. In effect, the exchanges with the Soviet officials came down to do whatever you feel you need to do. We delivered our part of the bargain, we constructed the embassy according to the specs, gave it to you and you say there's some problem with devices. We don't know anything about that. Obviously they weren't fessing up to...

Q: You're a child of the Eastern European Bureau, and yet you were coordinating and trying to do something, but there couldn't help but be as you got into it sort of blame going around. What was your impression of how EUR/SOV or whatever it was called in those days, responded to this thing?

MATTHEWS: These were my friends and I'd known them for years, of course. But they were very tender about the issue of being by-passed or having blame attached to them, and goodness knows the people then in charge of the Bureau, or of Soviet affairs, the office within the Bureau, had no role in the decisions and in the actions which led to these unfortunate events. There was never any question of that. I found, as is almost always the case, that although the various bureaus in the State Department said sure, they thought it was a good thing to have a coordinator appointed to coordinate these issues... that when it came down to those things that inevitably I had to do which involved my impinging on their turf, they did not like that. I expected that. This is hardly worth mentioning. A lot of my long, long days and nights was spent in bureaucratic engagement to pull parties together to do this, to do that, to not do this, not do that, toward what I hoped was the common good. And I'd say that in all of this, needless to say there were a number of agencies involved and I spent a lot of effort coordinating with them, and I got generally quite good cooperation. If I had to characterize it looking back, I would say I got more cooperation and support in the initial blush to much of what I was doing from other agencies, including the intelligence agencies, than I often did from the respective bureaus in the State Department which were involved in this. That, of course, doesn't surprise me since that's the way the State Department has operated for a long time in terms of the fiefdoms, if you will, that prevail. I might add that in all this, I think I noted earlier, that I worked directly under the Secretary of State, George Shultz, and then some months after I got into the job, most of my at least weekly direction, came from John Whitehead, the deputy Secretary. But I was actually part of the immediate staff of the Under Secretary for Management, Ron Spiers. As I think I also noted, everyone gave me great support. I, of course, had a lot to do with the Director General's office, personnel, and others as we looked into what we could do to handle the very immediate concerns of giving our people some support and help out there at embassy Moscow, and looking a bit ahead as to whether we might want to follow that model, or something close to it elsewhere in Eastern Europe. But since the primary immediate crisis was embassy Moscow, and consulate general Leningrad, my old post, that was where we concentrated our efforts. I certainly was not the one responsible for the idea, but someone came up with the idea, which I did help implement, to go to...do you know the major engineering contractor, PA&E? They were in Vietnam.

Q: Oh yes, the Pacific Architects and Engineers, Morris & Newson were the two big ones in Vietnam.

MATTHEWS: That's right, and I remember the PA&E folks from Vietnam, they did our road graders, in fact, they were brave enough, they would actually go there and plow where we thought there were mines, and bang them off for us. A bit above and beyond..., but I digress. Suffice to say that PA&E bid on it and won a major contract to provide support people, drivers, plumbers, carpenters, electricians, you name it, to embassy Moscow. These were Americans and of course you can imagine the bumps and grinds and problems that ensued in the first part of this, but little by little over quite some months, the good people among them, including some remarkably good young people who had come out of American universities with degrees in Russian, who I guess had some affinity for sawing boards and doing plumbing tasks. They would show up on the contracts, be retained, others who were critically unsuited, God only knows what they thought they were getting into, they would be removed. So that was sort of our bridge which worked at least as a vital Band Aid which worked until such time as, and I forget what year it was, it was some years later...well, of course, I had retired, that the two sides, the Soviet and American sides, quietly came to an agreement that there would be selective return of national employees, with appropriate safeguards. But that added a tumultuous note because it was a time that you were trying to deal with all of these other horrible things. I mean, you had dust, dirt, crud, all over embassy Moscow which until you got somebody there to wield mops...the ambassador at the time, Jack Matlock, he and embassy counselors would put in their turn as bucket brigades, swabbing down the steps of the embassy.

Q: I've heard two things, sort of in the corridors, and I didn't follow this very closely, one was the accusation that Nixon and Kissinger were in such a hurry to get some sort of an agreement going, that they sort of brushed aside security concerns when this first happened. And the other was, since it happened on Arthur Hartman's watch, particularly the Lonetree thing that he didn't do enough. Did you get involved in either of these?

MATTHEWS: I'm very aware of both, and my very firm view based on having had quite a bit to do with the issues, is that when it comes to the first, if that is correct, that political considerations rode roughshod over the terms which could and should have been made much tighter, much better, and I believe it to be the case that my dear friend, and boss on several occasions, Walter Stoessel, was the assistant secretary for European Affairs during the 1972 summit, and in particular, went to the Secretary of State and said that he did not believe that the agreement should be signed. And my understanding, based on the things to which I am privy, is that he was instructed over his protest, to sign the agreement.

Q: The Secretary at that time would have been...was it Henry Kissinger at that time?

MATTHEWS: I believe that to be the case. With regard to the second, Ambassador Hartman, and his very fine staff, I really believe that to be unfounded. Arthur Hartman and the others had all been capably managing, running, embassy Moscow. They were simply the ones there when it all broke. Certainly, when it comes to the "discovery" of the bugged new embassy building, that had been going on for years. As far as the Marine security guard thing, these kinds of problems could have happened at other posts. Obviously in the wake of this, there was a lot of pulling up of socks and what have you, etc., as there always is after a flap. But in my own view, and I have thought about this a lot, I really wouldn't consider that Ambassador Hartman and his staff deserve any blame for something that could have happened anywhere.

Q: Well, out of this episode, you obviously already had experience, but this is when your feet were put to the blow torch, what was your impression of the role of Congress in this? What did you come away with?

MATTHEWS: Oh, Congress was interested in scapegoating, Congress was interested in being seen politically to be, by God, doing something about these building and administrative things which they normally wouldn't have cared a fig for. In general, even though there were some people in Congress who were supportive and helpful, I mean who wanted to be supportive and helpful, many of them were posturing. Most of them were posturing. That particularly was the case with respect to virtually all of the key committee chairmen who were involved. There were a couple of exceptions to that. But that was clearly the case. For years before that, and God knows for years since that, the State Department has often had poor relationships with members of Congress, and with Congress as an institution. And clearly a lot of the hostility and downright meanness that I observed and encountered while I was doing this job was part of that larger neuralgia.

Q: So, why don't we stop at this point, and we'll pick this up after you left this coordinating job. Unless there is anything else you want to add, we can put it on here, and you can talk about it the next time. Is there anything else we should talk about do you think?

MATTHEWS: That's probably about it. About all that's left to talk about is my retirement. I did like someone once advised us to do in Vietnam, I declared victory and left.

PHILIP C. BROWN
Counselor for Press & Cultural Affairs, USIS
Moscow (1987-1990)

Mr. Brown was born in Massachusetts and raised primarily in Pennsylvania. He was educated at College of Wooster (Ohio) and the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy. After serving with the Voice of America, in 1965 he joined the United States Information Agency Foreign Service (USIS), where he served several assignments at its headquarters in Washington DC. His foreign posts include Dakar, Douala, Yaoundé, Paris, Vienna and Moscow, where he served twice. At these posts his assignments ranged from Assistant Branch Public Affairs Officer to Counselor for Information, Press and Cultural Affairs. Mr. Brown was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2012.

Q: You went to the Soviet Union from when to when?

BROWN: My first tour was 1978 to 1981. So this was the summer of 1987.

We drove down to Italy, visited our daughter who was in school in Florence and doing a summer program there. When we said good bye to her, we basically headed off by road to Moscow. We drove all the way across Germany, visited friends in Lubeck and took a boat from Travemunde across the Baltic Sea to Helsinki. It was mid-summer, a lot of daylight in the summer. Drove from Helsinki across the border. With that we were back in the Soviet Union. It was symbolically meaningful for us getting back in the Soviet Union. Stopped in Leningrad, met with people at the consulate there.

We met with a young USIA officer. There was a branch public affairs officer in Leningrad and an assistant branch public affairs officer, a young fellow named Ian Kelly, who was there with his wife and small children. It wasn't too long after that that Ian Kelly was transferred to Moscow and became a key member of my staff there. Today Ian Kelly is the ambassador in Vienna to CSCE. It didn't take much brain power early on to see that Ian Kelly was a rising star.

Then we drove from Leningrad to Moscow. I remember stopping along the way. There was a lady along the road selling flowers or tomatoes or something. We stopped and had a little chat with her, told her we were diplomats, how astounded she was. She was of a certain age, her saying to us “no more war, no more war” in Russian. It was that spontaneous emotion that came from Russians out in the villages. We arrived at the embassy as I had timed it late on a Friday afternoon. I wanted to get there on the weekend so I didn’t have to go to work the next day. I would get in the swing of things but not right in the office.

One of the members of the P&C staff came down and saw me because I had called to say I was there. She thought I was one of the contract employees that had been hired to replace the Foreign Service nationals. She was very apologetic.

Thus we would begin our second three year assignment in Moscow, 1987 to 1990.

The question is always “how was it different, how did it compare?” It is a daunting task to try to answer that question. More generally, as I have been going through my notes, it has been a daunting task. How am I going to summarize this experience? The first three year assignment was full of activities, full of memories. The second was even more so. It was the nature of the times and it was the activity level imposed on us. I don’t have a simple checklist of items of how to compare.

Early on, we went out with some friends to a restaurant which wasn’t something you did very often there but by 1987, some little restaurants, they were called coops, were opening. At the end of the meal, we were down on Red Square and there was a demonstration by Crimean Tartars. Not a violent demonstration but people were out protesting and they were being allowed to protest. That was something we had never seen before; a protest of any sort let alone on Red Square. It set the tone and for three years and in varying ways, frequently at the embassy staff meeting the next morning, you or someone else would say “you can’t believe what I saw, what I read, the play I went to, the conversation I heard.” It was a transformative period, no question about it.

This was especially true for someone with the perspective of having been there ten years earlier and who saw people harassed and arrested. By the time we returned in 1987, André Sakharov had returned from internal exile in Gorky. He was back in Moscow. If you didn’t have perspective, things probably still looked pretty grim physically. Moscow was still a pretty dirty city; people lined up for food. The newspapers all printed the same articles especially about political subjects. Voice of America, Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty were jammed. People did not have the freedom to travel. We had wonderful Jewish refusenik friends whom we were very close to on our first tour. They were still there waiting and their prospects for emigrating seemed little better in 1987 than they did in 1981 when we had last seen them.

Q: What was there at that time when you got back, what was their relationship to the powers that be?

BROWN: Our Jewish refusenik friends?

It was pretty much the same it had always been. Yuri was still working as a janitor at a maternity hospital, hired just because they needed those kinds of people and his wife would teach English at home. Their daughter, whom we had known as a very small girl, was now 11 years old. We quickly set about pushing their case. We had a lot of friends in the press corps and we would say to them, "Would you like to meet an interesting Jewish refusenik family?"

That was too good an offer to turn down and one woman in particular, Ann Blackman who worked for Time magazine, reported regularly on them. Her husband, Mike Putzel, was bureau chief for the Associated Press. Ann did a lot of stories with these particular friends. It was a year later, right after the Reagan visit, that they received permission to emigrate.

Back to your question, when we returned in 1987, there were many refuseniks and many people who wanted to change their lifestyle but couldn't. So I use the old cliché about glass half full, glass half empty. It depended a little bit upon what you were comparing it to; for the most part, right from the beginning, the comparisons that we made were "wow, gee. Something has really changed here. Things are changing."

I will say right away if anyone ever tells you that he knew at that point that the Soviet Union's days were numbered and that in four years the Soviet Union would exist no longer, ask them to show you where they put that down in writing in 1987.

Q: You are the public affairs officer. What did you see as your priorities or opportunities at the time of your arrival?

BROWN: Let me go to one little detail here. Moscow was the only place in the Foreign Service world where we didn't use the term USIS, U.S. Information Service. We referred to the section as press and culture or P&C.

I was replacing Ray Benson. Ray had had two four-year tours as public affairs officer. He was completing his four-year assignment and one of the last big activities on Ray's watch was a visit by Charles Wick, USIA director. This was symbolic of what was happening.

Mr. Wick had called on I don't know how many people in the Soviet hierarchy, in government, radio and television and the rest, and he had gone back and written follow up letters and now action had to be taken on those follow up letters. I think there were a dozen of them.

You asked me what my assignment was. One major part of my assignment was following up and implementing the ideas in Mr. Wick's letters. We were working on those letters for much of my three years or much of the time that Mr. Wick was still in office.

For another, I was working for Jack Matlock. Ambassador Jack Matlock had been back for about a year. He saw the enormous opportunities and he was a demanding taskmaster. He had his own agenda so I had Mr. Wick's letters and Ambassador Matlock's agenda. He wanted, for example, to set up a monthly lecture at Spaso House. This would involve bringing a noted figure from Washington, having that person lecture around a dinner. This was modeled on something he had seen elsewhere.

Mind you too, we were doing all of this without any Foreign Service nationals. They had all been withdrawn, gotten rid of and they were only gradually being replaced by contractors under the title Pacific Architect and Engineers, PAE.

Q: I knew them in Vietnam when I was there.

BROWN: They were doing a few of the little tasks. We had none in our operation.

My title was Counselor of Embassy for Press and Cultural Affairs. By the way, it translated easily into Russian. I had responsibility for the whole press operation and all of the cultural activities.

I had previously been press attaché. I determined that I was not going to be a super press attaché. I had enjoyed that job very much in both Moscow and Paris but I was going to let the information officer/press attaché do that job and not constantly look over his shoulder. The model for me was Paris. When I went there as press attaché, the PAO was Jack Hedges and Jack in a previous assignment had been press attaché. I very much appreciated that he let me do the job rather than looking over my shoulder all the time.

I also mentioned last time that USIA had created a special office, D/R, which was Russia reporting directly to the director headed by a fellow named Greg Guroff. Greg had serviced in Moscow as cultural affairs officer and he had his own agenda, his own programs that he was pushing over and above those that normally came out of USIA -- exhibits, America magazine, speakers, cultural exchanges, IV program.

So we had an unending list of assignments. This was 1987. That year, Gorbachev would go to Washington and in 1988 Reagan would come to Moscow. A presidential visit, especially given my familiarity with the White House press office and the fact that they knew me, was also going to be a very time consuming activity.

We not only had a presidential visit but just about anybody and everybody in Washington wanted to come to Moscow to see what was going on; not only government officials but people in the private sector as well. So we had an unending stream of prominent personalities.

An example of the expanding area of activity was something called the Chautauqua exchange. This had begun in Jurmala, Latvia a couple of years earlier as a meeting of citizens from both countries. It was stimulated by the program in Chautauqua, New York. It was blossoming and was going to become an annual affair. I had been back in Moscow less than two months when I returned to the U.S. with a huge Soviet delegation to Chautauqua for the meeting there. Some people in the embassy questioned our involvement. "Do you really want to get that close? Remember, these are still Soviets, still Communist Party members." I argued that it was an opportunity I should not miss to accompany a cross-section of 250 Soviets going to the United States on a charter flight. So I did. I went back with them. So did Rebecca Matlock, the ambassador's wife.

I remember the flight on a Soviet-built Ilyushin-86 aircraft. You fly from Moscow to Shannon, Ireland. You refuel, you fly from Shannon to Gander, Newfoundland and you refuel and you fly from there to New York City.

We were hosted that evening at the apartment of George Soros on the Upper East Side of New York. We were a pretty tired group but I went. There must have been 200 people, more than even George Soros' apartment could comfortably accommodate. I was seated at a table for theater people including some Russian actors and Americans such as Colleen Dewhurst and the wife of Jason Robards.

After a full day in New York City, where I was joined by both of my daughters, we went to Chautauqua for five days of meetings – ABC did its Good Morning America show live from Chautauqua -- and then on to Washington and a barbecue at the home of Esther Coopersmith.

Many of the contacts I made were long lasting. I remember talking to a man who was in the information department of the Central Committee. I said "I hope we will be able to continue this contact when we get back to Moscow." He said, "Well, of course. Why not?"

I will give you several reasons why not, I said. I know from my past experience, I have had contact with Russians outside the Soviet Union but when we go back, you are operating under very different rules. I was recalling the Vienna summit meeting of 1979 where I talked to journalists and party officials who said "let's talk now because when we go back to Moscow, I won't be able." They were that candid about it.

This was a man named Leonid Dobrohotov. He said in so many words, test me and I did. He became an invaluable contact in the information department of the CPSU.

Back to Moscow (another Aeroflot charter with stops in Gander and Shannon), I could go on and on about my duties and my responsibilities. What we lacked were the resources. We simply didn't have the tools to do all the things that were being asked to do. People would come out and say "I've got an idea." I would respond: "We have no shortage of ideas. What we need is help in implementing ideas and perhaps weeding out the good ideas from the bad ones."

The one thing I had was a really outstanding staff of younger officers. I sometimes say it was as if P&C Moscow had had about six or seven first round draft picks in the NFL.

I may as well name several of them and I want to make sure I don't forget people. Every one had some previous involvement with Russia, either living there as a child, studying there or whatever. In the press office, there were two assistant information officers, Margo Squire and Mike Hurley. In the cultural section, we had assistant cultural affairs officers Rosemary DiCarlo, Ian Kelly, Susan Robinson and a young woman who came out for a year named Ann Lowendahl.

These people were devoted, hardworking and so capable. I am happy to say all of them went on to very successful careers.

What I did best of all was to give them the freedom to do their jobs. I was able to stand between them and the ambassador and the other people who had ideas on how they should do their jobs, to provide a buffer. I represented our section to the ambassador, to Washington, to the visiting firemen and let my youngest staff, the assistant cultural affairs officers and assistant information officers do their jobs and they did them extremely well.

Q: Let's sort of take apart some of the elements. What about the press? How had it changed or had it changed?

BROWN: When I was there the first time as information officer/press attaché, it was much different from what I would experience in Paris. Paris was a much more representative press attaché job. By 1987, we were still spending a lot of time with the American press corps and to some extent still defending their working rights under the Helsinki Convention, looking out for working conditions for journalists.

The Soviets, however, were beginning to loosen up a bit, not in a Western sense. We could work with the Soviet media. One of the first activities I recall was the editor of Ogonyok magazine, Vitaly Korotich, doing an interview with Ambassador Matlock. It was an interview that was fairly done. Ogonyok was a weekly magazine that was doing some very interesting stuff. They were publishing materials on the Stalin era and all of a sudden, people were lining up on the day of the week when Ogonyok came out. For them to do an interview with Ambassador Matlock was symbolically important. Little by little, both the press and the audio visual media gave us opportunities to get our point across.

Mr. Wick was responsible for something called U.S./USSR information talks. We had bilateral meetings in Washington and Moscow on an annual basis. Those talks and the preparation for them was also extremely time consuming, extremely labor intensive. We, of course, would push the argument to the Soviets that there was still an imbalance, that you have so much more access to American public opinion than we have to public opinion in the Soviet Union.

That was the case but notwithstanding, we were getting an increasing number of opportunities to have our point of view put across in the press. I myself did some interviews, not on high political subjects but quite often on the life of a diplomat.

But it was up to the political section, I didn't get involved, to sit down every day and read the press and analyze it for nuance.

Let me turn to something I did right after Moscow when I went to the Fletcher School as a diplomat-in-residence. I asked myself: "When I look back on my Moscow experience, what jumps out at me? What really strong memories do I have?"

They certainly included the visit by Ronald Reagan. The President of the United States comes and you are at the airport and shake his hand or you're in the Kremlin when he says goodbye to Gorbachev. That's an indelible memory. Or when your wonderful Jewish friends finally get permission to emigrate, that's an indelible memory. I traveled, continued to travel; went to all the republic capitals. Those are very strong memories.

But the common theme that jumped out at me -- and I thought I might talk about it today -- was music, particularly events that left indelible memories not simply for the music but for what they seemed to be saying about politics and the changing climate. So I thought I would highlight some of those moments.

Even before I got to Moscow, I heard that someone named Billy Joel was going to be performing there so I went to my daughters and said “who is Billy Joel?” I remember my daughter Sarah saying, “Dad. You don’t know who Billy Joel is?”

So I went out and got an audio cassette of this rock performer named Billy Joel. Indeed he was giving two concerts in Moscow right after we got there, within a week of our arrival. I went to the ambassador and asked if he wanted to go to the July 27 concert?

I don’t think Ambassador Matlock ever said no to anything as quickly as he did to that. He said, “No. You go. You represent us. I do not want to be involved.”

I went and it was an experience. Billy Joel performing in one of the stadiums built for the 1980 Olympics, 20,000 people, packed. The Russians knew who Billy Joel was and it didn’t take much advertising, a few posters and word of mouth to attract an audience. When we got there, we had a couple of extra tickets. I remember giving them to some teenage girls and they were delighted.

The thing I recall about the concert is not so much the music, although that was part of it, but Billy Joel’s ability to master an audience with a little hand-held microphone. He walked around the place, amidst 20,000 people and a lot of security; by the way, they were a little nervous when he got off the stage and walked around. I think a lot of the Soviets were as impressed by the technology as they were by the music. But I will never forget Billy Joel singing “For the Longest Time,” one of his signature tunes. Anytime I hear Billy Joel singing, I am transported back to that concert.

It was loud. I remember my wife put cotton in her ears. We were sitting way in the back. I was representing the embassy but hardly. I wasn’t in any prominent position. Billy Joel was there with his wife, Christie Brinkley. The second night, I think, he was unable to really rev up the audience the way he wanted to and he started smashing the piano. You read some newspaper articles and you will see that was picked up by the American press more than the concert itself.

The important thing was that Russians were allowing in an American rock performer. Up to that point, rock was considered decadent. The other part of it was that 20,000 people filled that hall each of two nights for Billy Joel. To me that was as much of a barometer as anything of change.

Less than two months later, September of 1987, the Empire Brass Quintet out of Boston came, a really high quality cultural musical group, five brass musicians. Their first stop was Vilnius, Lithuania. This was one of the first, if not the first, American performing arts group to go to the Baltic States. I arranged with the assistant cultural affairs officer, Rosemary DiCarlo, that we would attend the concert. But on Friday afternoon, we got a call from the Foreign Ministry saying we couldn't go because there were no hotel rooms. We had permission, we had the plane tickets. I said, "Rosemary, we are going" so we got up early Saturday morning, flew to Vilnius and went to the hotel. No, there weren't any rooms but by the end of the day we had worked it out.

This concert wasn't 20,000 people; this was maybe 200 people in a small hall but they were just blown away, to coin a phrase, by the skills of the Empire Brass quintet. The scene afterwards was remarkable. Young musicians came up and wanted to see instruments. The Russians and the Lithuanians have a great history of music but they didn't have access to this quality instruments; the trombone, tuba. The American musicians were very, very accommodating, signing autographs, giving out scores and that kind of thing.

A week later, they arrived in Moscow and they were pretty worn out. They had been to various cities on an itinerary put together by a Soviet concert agency, Goskoncert, and were now in a dreary Soviet hotel. We were living on the compound in a very nice townhouse that had three levels. I asked the group if they would like to come by on Friday night for pizza and beer. I hardly had the words out of our mouth; were they ever happy to come by for pizza and beer.

And we said if they needed a place to practice, they could use our place. So they came and from our three level townhouse, you could hear tuba on one floor, trombone on another, trumpet from another floor. I loved it. We saw them here in Boston several years later and they remembered us well and favorably. They did a couple of other great concerts in Moscow. It was one of the first times we did a reception on the compound.

Because of the Lonetree scandal and the spying scandal, it was pretty obvious we were not going to be working in the new office building. We were going to be consigned to the wretched old converted apartment building up on the Ring Road for all three years, terrible working conditions. Right outside our bedroom, they were doing constant work of some sort, looking for microphones in what should have been a modern new office building. And the work would go on all night with noise and bright lights.

But we did have the compound which included the snack bar, the school, an auditorium, a garage, apartments and the townhouses, much better living arrangements. On the first assignment, we were happy to be away from the embassy in a Soviet apartment building. This time it was much to my advantage to be within walking distance of my office and to have a townhouse where I could invite visitors to stay.

By now we had a young woman, Sara Fenander, living with us. We called her a nanny but she wasn't there to take care of small children. She was there to help us out with representational events. I'll talk more about her later.

The big question now was how we would get Soviets to our townhouse for representational events. Things had so totally turned around. It used to be you had to escort Soviets into your apartment building past their militia man. Now it seemed I was going to have to check with American security if I wanted to bring Russians onto the compound. The Soviet militia would let them come in but was I going to be violating rules, our own security rules?

Fortunately it wasn't a long distance from the gate to our front door and we were able to escort people in pretty easily.

The Empire Brass provided the first occasion for us to invite some Soviets guests after the concert. We did and they came. Eventually, we hosted many, many events, they came in great numbers and we were able to manage. But initially, it was nerve wracking for us to think that all these years, we had been fighting the Soviets so we could have Russians in to our apartment. Were we now going to be fighting American security? We won the battle.

By the way, another American who happened to be in town at the time the Empire Brass Quintet was Fred Rogers who did the programs on television for kids, Mr. Rogers. Mr. Rogers was there on his own and my wife ran into him and went swimming with him.

Mr. Fred Rogers and staff people came to our reception that night with the Empire Brass Quintet. I have to guess that he was out there because he saw and heard that things were opening up in the Soviet Union. They had always had excellent programs on TV for children. It was a very non-political area to exploit and that is probably what brought him to Moscow at that time.

In November of 1987, we got the word the famous violinist, Yehudi Menuhin would be performing in Moscow. He had Russian Jewish connections. He had performed in Moscow a few years earlier and had raised eyebrows there because he criticized the human rights record and here he was coming back in 1987, performing.

We went to the concert at Tchaikovsky Hall. Americans have trouble understanding that in the Soviet Union, a poet could fill a stadium of 20,000 people and there would still be people outside struggling to get tickets. That was the nature of society there. This Menuhin concert was sold out. I got tickets through connections. I went back stage afterwards to greet him in the name of the American Embassy and he handed me a list and said these were people he would like to have at a reception.

I went to the ambassador and even though he was going to be in Geneva and there was some question about whether Menuhin was an American, a Swiss or a British citizen, he agreed that we could host a reception at Spaso House nine days later.

The only way to get these invitations delivered was to spend half of Saturday driving around Moscow personally delivering them to people like the sister of Rostropovich, to the ballet dancer Maya Plisetskaya and her husband Rodion Shchedrin. A colleague of mine in the embassy delivered the invitation to Andrei Sakharov and his wife.

Then there were people whose names I didn't recognize, the parents of a young Russian named Mikhail Rud; he had emigrated and was playing piano in Paris at the time. I finally found their apartment in some distant part of Moscow and knocked on the door. A lady came and then a man came wearing only an undershirt over his pants and I said, in Russian of course, "Lidya Petrovna, My name is Philip Brown. I'm from the American Embassy." I remember she stepped back as if she had been struck by a bolt of lightning saying "Bozha Moy" or "My God." I explained the circumstances. When they picked themselves up off the floor and I handed them the invitation, they actually believed it.

That Sunday evening, these well known figures from the Moscow musical world along with André Sakharov and Elena Bonner and the British, Swiss and Dutch ambassadors came to Spaso House. For Sakharov it was the first time, perhaps the only time, he was ever at the American ambassador's residence.

There was a couple named Oleg Kagan and Natasha Gutman; one was a violinist and the other a cellist. We knew them from their performances. They walked into the room and Menuhin was sitting on the couch. They got down on the floor, sat there like children at his knee and talked about how they had heard his performances, his records when they were growing up and studying music and it was as if they were in the presence of their mentor and role model.

Before the evening was over, the African American singer Barbara Hendricks and the composer Sarah Caldwell also showed up. It was really a very touching and memorable evening.

Q: This sort of thing must have really touched you, didn't it?

BROWN: It did. We walked out of that evening with a special feeling, knowing that this was one of the events we would never forget. And by the way, from the reception, we went to the second half of a concert at Tchaikovsky Hall featuring the violist Yuri Bashmet playing a new work by a Russian composer named Edison Denisov. An artist friend of ours, Boris Birger, introduced us to Denisov afterward. It sometimes seemed as if it was non-stop but it was rewarding.

I knew that events such as the Menuhin reception were having an impact on the elite, the cultural elite; the people who attended had all gone out and talked about this evening, this experience. And I would have an opportunity to mention it to my official contacts.

In April, 1988, we had a visit from Yo-Yo Ma, who was even then a world famous cellist. He gave a special concert at Spaso House. This again was where Ambassador Matlock was such a wonderful ambassador to have because he would offer Spaso House. We would invite in an elite group of people to hear Yo-Yo Ma perform. Then he did a couple of public concerts.

You think of the Soviet Union as being isolated, cut off from the rest of the world but you didn't have to explain to people who Yo-Yo Ma was. They knew he was one of the world's great cellists even back then.

What I especially remember about his visit was that he was there on Russian Easter weekend and after his concert, he went with us to one of the cathedrals just to be part of the mass of people outside or inside the church observing the Russian Orthodox Easter.

My wife mentioned to him that we had a daughter in school in Boston and that she would be there in the spring. Yo-Yo Ma lives in Winchester. I don't have the details but when she went there in the spring and there was a concert, there were two tickets waiting for her thanks to Yo-Yo Ma. He was, and still is, a genuinely gracious, friendly human being.

President Reagan came in June of 1988. One little vignette in connection with President Reagan's visit. Anyplace where he was going to be making an appearance, whether it was the university, the Writers' Club or Red Square, the White House had a team assigned to that location. My staff was all divided up and I was working with the White House press office.

We had an assistant cultural affairs officer, a woman named Susan Robinson married to the consul general and I assigned her to work with Mrs. Reagan's people. Susan came to me one day saying this was sexism, that just because she was a woman working in cultural section didn't mean that she should work with the First Lady, that she should be out among the guys in one of these other spots, the Writers' Union or whatever.

I said, "Susan, I hear what you are saying but really it is not sexism and we have to have somebody work with Mrs. Reagan's staff and you will have opportunities that you won't believe."

Well, the visit came and went and a lot of us who were assigned to various spots did a lot of standing around and were upstaged as always by the White House staff. By contrast, Susan Robinson told me she got to go to the bowels of the Tretyakov Museum to see art works and icons that were never made available to the general public. She got to go to musical and theater events that were specially put on for Mrs. Reagan. Her ego was assuaged and she had opportunities the rest of us didn't have.

They did a special gala ballet at the Bolshoi for President Reagan but it coincided with a meeting arranged by the State Committee on Education and Mr. Wick sent me to it to represent him. I did manage to put my ticker in my wife's hands.

Right after the Reagan visit, the New York Philharmonic conducted by Zubin Mehta came to Moscow and did an opening concert in a concert hall. Then they were scheduled to do an open air concert in Gorky Park. Reagan had gone so the embassy staff cleared out. The ambassador was in Germany, the DCM had gone to the States for his son's graduation and I was the ranking person in the embassy.

For a week, I was the chargé and I went to a few cocktail parties and such. I asked the ambassador what should I do and he said "you act as if you are the chief of mission" so I rode around in the Cadillac with the flag flying, including to Gorky Park for the New York Philharmonic concert, feeling somewhat self conscious, I must say. I didn't take to the role too comfortably.

It was an outdoor concert with a little bit of rain at the beginning but by the time they played the Stars and Stripes Forever at the end, the rain had stopped symbolically. It was another big splashy American presentation with Zubin Mehta conducting half the program and a Soviet conductor, Gennady Rozhdestvensky, doing the other half. I did not get to speak to Mehta or make my presence known but I did make sure the car was there with the flag flying so they knew somebody important was in attendance.

That week was also the millennium of Christianity in Russia; 1,000 years since Christianity had come to Russia and there was a gala concert at the Bolshoi. I still have the program from that and since I was the chargé, I represented the U.S. The invitation from His Holiness Pimen, the Patriarch of Moscow and all of Russia and the Holy Synod inviting us to the festival jubilee meeting on the occasion of the millennium of the baptism in Russia at the Bolshoi Theater. It was a wonderful concert that ended up with the 1812 Overture, cannons, bells and all of that.

Leading religious figures from all over the world came for this event. Billy Graham was on stage. The church had never been entirely suppressed despite what we heard about the lack of religious freedom. The hierarchy of the church was probably on pretty good terms with the hierarchy of the KGB but still, the fact that they had this splashy event was another example of the changing times. Raisa Gorbachev was in attendance.

A year later, June of 1989, Paul Simon came through on his Graceland tour. This was something he was doing with African artists including Miriam Makeba and they did a big outdoor concert in Moscow. Graceland was the name he had given to this series of concerts featuring African music.

A month later, returning for the first time in 31 years for what he called a sentimental visit, was Van Cliburn who had won the Tchaikovsky competition back in the worst days of the Cold War. He was there because in 1987, when Gorbachev came to the White House, Van Cliburn came out of retirement and did the something at the White House as part of the Gorbachev visit to the United States so Gorbachev expressed the desire that Van Cliburn would come to Moscow. His name was still very well known there.

On July 2, I went to the concert. Our house guest that night was a woman named Madeleine Albright. She was there on a USIA-sponsored speaking tour. At the time, she was a professor at Georgetown and I don't recall why but she ended up as our house guest. There was always an extra bedroom. I still have the thank you note from Madeleine Albright. The ambassador was in attendance as was Gorbachev.

This was one of these theaters that was not well maintained and before the music began, right above where Gorbachev was sitting, there was this terrific explosion. If these had been American secret service people, they would probably have thrown their bodies over him. A light bulb had blown out but other thoughts went through our mind.

At the end of the concert, the ambassador was invited back stage to talk briefly to Gorbachev, not for courtesy sake but to be informed of the death of André Gromyko, the Soviet foreign minister. Word had just come to Gorbachev that night that André Gromyko had died. Gorbachev simply referred to Andrei Andreyevich but it was clear who he was talking about.

So you had all these elements -- Van Cliburn, Van Cliburn of 31 years earlier, Van Cliburn of the Gorbachev visit to Washington, Madeleine Albright and the death of Andrei Gromyko. There were a lot of things at once.

Q: Did you get any feel from your Soviet contacts that the times were changing for them. This must have been every disconcerting for some.

BROWN: I think for some of the older generation, we could see people who were fearful or who felt threatened by the changes. Take the case of one family we knew quite well. The oldest generation, one generation older than ourselves, were shaking their heads in disbelief and wondering if this wasn't a little bit too much too fast. But the grandson was already jumping at the opportunities for interaction with Americans and new opportunities. If it were today's world, he would be writing an app for the iPhone but then he was envisioning going into business, being an entrepreneur.

The great masses probably didn't see any great benefit. Their living conditions were still not that much improved. They were still standing in line to get food. Housing hadn't improved.

Q: This brings to mind one of the things about Russia is considered a great power but when I think about it is there anything that comes out of Russia that I would want to buy? The answer is no. Maybe if I wanted to buy a fighter plane or something like that but it just isn't an industrial power in the advanced sense but yet these are people with this tremendous mathematical and science ability. You would think that something would start stirring there.

BROWN: That has always been one of the mysteries for me. No one ever questioned their innate intelligence. They produced mathematicians and chemists, great writers, ballet dancers, sports figures but they have never manufactured a product you wanted to go out and buy. That was certainly very much the case at this time. If we had extra rubles, we'd go to the art market and buy little paintings or some of the stacking dolls or a samovar or something that might have a little bit of artistic value but there wasn't a product that I can think of that you would go and buy for its mechanical qualities.

Q: What about on the cultural side? My wife was taking Russian literature and there was a series of books that were coming out, this was in the '50s and earlier. I mean big books on Russian life and all and they were considered very good but since that time I haven't been aware of any major writer or writers. Were the Dostoyevskys only working under because they had the ____ or whatever on top of them or what?

BROWN: I am embarrassed to say I don't know much about what is happening in Russian literature these days. Whether there is a Dostoyevsky or not.

During the time we were there, there was not to my knowledge any explosion of great writing. There was a lot of stuff being produced. People were writing stuff for the theater. They were publishing in magazines but whether any of it is of lasting quality or being thought of today as having particular artistic merit, I am not sure.

Q: There is no particular reason for them to be suppressed. I think some of the so-called top writers of the somewhat earlier period mainly because their books were smuggled out and they had that cache.

BROWN: I can think of people we associated with at the time and who we thought of as quality writers. Some of them have ended up at George Mason University or various places in the West but where they really stand in the world of literature these days, I don't know. Were we simply giving them more credit than they deserved at the time because they were having an opportunity?

Back to the year 1989. The Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra came out and offered several concerts. They were very well received. They were conducted by Lorin Maazel. Talk about a controversial figure in the world of conducting. Their accompanying artist was the famous Irish flutist, James Galloway. He wowed the audience with his abilities on the flute.

The orchestra was staying in the Sovietskaya hotel which wasn't very fancy. I was hosting a lunch on a given day for a bunch of educators and people from Washington. Fortunately, for some reason, the lunch wasn't to start at 2 o'clock. It was going to be at my townhouse. Late morning, I got a phone call saying Lorin Maazel and James Galloway were sick of the food in the hotel. Could they come by for lunch?

My secretary was a wonderful woman named Anne Edwards. She was born in Wales and a naturalized American citizen and she loved music. I said, "Anne, drop everything you are doing. You and I are hosting Lorin Maazel and James Galloway for lunch."

Well, she couldn't believe I was serious. But she had been to one of the concerts; she knew they were in town and sure enough, we managed to escort the two of them and a couple of others. We ended up paying for these guys, which we shouldn't have done, but it was worth it for the conversation.

Lorin Maazel, a very haughty and somewhat controversial figure in the world of conducting. There were not a lot of tears when he left Pittsburgh because he was didn't associate much with the musicians himself. But on this day, he was dependent upon me for his lunch and Anne Edwards, my Welsh- born secretary was walking on air to be sitting at the lunch table with James Galloway.

We Americans were not the only ones bringing cultural presentations. La Scala, the famous opera company from Italy, did several operas at the Bolshoi. They also did a performance of the Verdi Requiem at the Conservatory and that was a tough ticket to get. You'd go down there and people were swarming around, trying to get in. My wife and I had tickets but there was such a large crowd it was even hard to get in the building. As we were caught up in this mass of people, we saw people in uniform, Russians of course, saying "make way for academician Sakharov." We turned around and sure enough, escorted by two big militia men, were Sakharov and Elena Bonner looking very small behind him.

The crowd did part and let them come through but then you had the same phenomenon as when a fire truck is coming down the street and the cars all go aside to let the fire truck go by. As soon as the fire truck is gone, everyone tries to get behind and make it through the next several lights. All of us went swarming in, including a lot of people who didn't have tickets. I remember because it was the last time I saw Sakharov alive. It was a couple of months later he died. He was such a frail figure.

That night, our guest was a man named Paul Plishka who recently retired after many years at the Metropolitan Opera and who had Ukrainian roots and had been singing in Kiev and came by Moscow and stayed with us a couple of nights.

A month later, in November, 1989, my wife and I went to Yerevan, Armenia, for the opening of a USIA-organized children's book exhibit. Ambassador and Mrs. Matlock went along with Tom Graham from the political section. This was one year after the terrible earthquake in Armenia that had caused massive destruction and led Gorbachev to cut short a visit to the United States. At the time, that earthquake symbolized a lot of things. Instead of asking for visas to come in to cover the event, journalists just went across the border between Armenia and Turkey without visas. Aid agencies brought in materials that way. A lot of standard procedures went by the way in 1988 at the time of the earthquake in Armenia.

The ambassador didn't want to go down there in the immediate aftermath, wisely feeling he didn't want resources devoted to him that should be going to the earthquake recovery, so it wasn't until a year later that he took advantage of this book exhibit to go to Yerevan. We were staying in guest quarters there. This was the occasion when I heard the news on the radio that the Berlin Wall had been breached. On this particular night, the ambassador was torn because he was being invited to a concert but he was also invited to a dinner hosted by the hierarchy of the Armenian government.

So Phil, never wanting to miss an opportunity said, "Mr. Ambassador, could Bobbi and I represent you at that concert?" "Oh, perfect idea", he says. "Please you go represent us at the concert." It was perfect from my point of view because I would much rather go to music than to another official dinner.

We went to the concert. It was the Armenian symphony orchestra conducted by an American named Loris Tjeknavorian and we were seated up in a very nice box. At the intermission, we went downstairs and I introduced myself to the conductor and explained the circumstances, that the ambassador could not attend but that my wife and I were representing him and we were delighted to be here on this evening and probably we should leave now and go back to this dinner.

He said, "Oh, you can't leave. You must stay." It didn't take too much work to twist my arm to stay. We went back up to our box. After the intermission, the conductor came out and said a few words in Armenian and the next thing I knew, he was pointing to us and we were being asked to stand and everyone in the audience was giving us this enormous round of applause. It was explained to me that he was saying "our guests are from the American Embassy and we want to thank them for all that America has done to help us with earthquake recovery." It was a moving moment. I have never felt more than on that night that I was representing my country, that I was being thanked for all we had done to help them recover from the earthquake.

The conductor himself had amassed the funds so the orchestra could play this concert. He was providing them with the wherewithal, not only the conducting but many of the instruments they used to play the concert. Some of the music they did that night had roots in Armenian musical history. It was a very memorable evening.

Another memorable musical evening came in February, 1990, when the National Symphony Orchestra came to Moscow and returning as their conductor was Mstislav Rostropovich. It was the first time he had been back in the Soviet Union since he had been exiled. Years earlier, when he and his wife Galina were traveling abroad, his passport and his citizenship had been taken away but during that period, he had done well. He was now the conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra.

So his return was an event. I went to the airport with the ambassador and the minister of culture for his arrival and it was a mass of journalists and well wishers. I knew his sister and her husband quite well so we were swept up in the arrival of the orchestra. There were press conferences and luncheons in his honor and two concerts.

At the first concert, he conducted the same program as the last time he had conducted on that stage before he went into exile – Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 and Shostakovich. Shostakovich was one of his mentors so there was symbolism all over the place. The audience included in a special box Raisa Gorbachev. He did a number of encores.

All of the encores were by Russian composers until the very last which he didn't introduce at all. He simply turned, picked up his baton and conducted the orchestra in "Stars and Stripes Forever." The message was clear. All the other music was Russian. That's where he came from. What he knew best was Russian music. But the final encore said something about where he was now. Politically he was now an American, Stars and Stripes Forever. People stood and clapped rhythmically. It was a moving event.

The next night, he not only conducted but he played the Dvorak Cello Concerto, one of the pieces he has recorded and one of the most famous pieces for cello. Then he went on to Leningrad and did another performance there. If you didn't know it before, you knew by then that things were changing in the political world and what better medium to express it than music?

Finally, just a month before we left in 1990, they had the quadrennial Tchaikovsky competition. This is the same competition that Van Cliburn had won in 1958. For all our years in Moscow, this was the first time we had been there when the Tchaikovsky competition took place. So we went to several of the performances and knew that one particular American woman was really outstanding.

We were not at all surprised when Deborah Voigt received the first prize in the soprano competition; Deborah Voigt is today a staple at the Metropolitan Opera, one of the leading figures in the world of opera. I did see her one time in Washington and again in Pittsburgh and I said to her on both occasions, "I heard you when you sang in the Tchaikovsky competition in Moscow." She smiled and remembered; it was a stepping stone for her.

So I have gone through my major Moscow musical memories. There are plenty of other lesser Moscow musical memories but you get the gist.

Q: I think all of this is extremely important and as one talks about Russia, music is important.

BROWN: The point I am trying to make is these weren't simply concerts. These were concerts that said something about what was going on at that time. They had political symbolism that conveyed to the Russians that times had changed.

Q: Did you have American visitors come and say what the hell is this all about? In other words, being rather skeptical? Did you find yourself saying things really are happening?

BROWN: I didn't find Americans were skeptical about the musical events or any of the other activities that we were involved in. Whether it was a concert or a book fair or a speaker or an exhibit, it was quite easy if you had a particular visitor in town to say "hey, do you want to go out to one of these?"

It was both fun and instructive to include your visitors, whether it was Madeleine Albright or a foot soldier from Washington. There were people who were maybe a little more sober about the changes and who said "yes, but." That wasn't bad to have people come say "let's keep this in perspective. Let's keep their feet to the fire." I think Mr. Wick did that in a funny way through his information talks. There were a lot of people saying "they are just like us; they are just people." Sure, they are just people. That was not a great discovery but the system was still based on very different ideas.

I had an excellent desk officer in USIA named Rick Ruth. He had been an exhibit guide. He didn't stay in the Foreign Service. When I came back for that first Chautauqua Conference, we had these pins that somebody had produced with the joint Soviet and American flags and we had given them out on the airplane. The Russians loved these flags and I was wearing one and Rick called me on it and said he wouldn't be comfortable wearing an American/Soviet flag pin. I thought about it and concluded Rick was right; that Soviet flag still stands for a lot of things that I do not believe and am not comfortable with. It was good to have reminders from time to time that there were still a lot of differences.

Q: As you were doing this were you able to see or place or one way or the other more favorable treatment of the United States in the media?

BROWN: By and large, not only in the media but in almost all aspects of our bilateral relationship, things were improving. The way we communicated with each other officially, the number of visitors in both directions, things like the Chautauqua exchanges which involved hundreds of people both ways, the number of people getting visas to emigrate and by and large press coverage. It was still controlled but it was much more favorable especially in connection with the Gorbachev trip to the United States in December of 1987 and Reagan's visit to Moscow in 1988.

Somebody will say to me that I am forgetting that along the way there were bumps in the road. There were issues that still arose, though there weren't major roadblocks. For most part it was a pretty harmonious period.

Q: I almost had the feeling you had almost a separate entity being the KGB which tried to screw things up from time to time such as taking a correspondent like Daniloﬀ and others. You could almost count on it.

BROWN: Yes, as we've discussed before, there was the Daniloﬀ arrest in 1986 right before the Reykjavik summit and right after the Reykjavik summit, with the Daniloﬀ episode sort of resolved, you had the mutual expulsion of diplomats. We didn't have during my time there anything comparable to that. We didn't have mutual expulsion of diplomats or symbolic arrests of people. There were annoyances and issues would pop up but by and large, this was a period of good, improving relations and of people continually talking about that.

Q: Did you have a positive feeling toward Gorbachev or not? Did you really feel he was behind making this change or at least the person who was?

BROWN: I think people pretty much did associate it with Gorbachev and also with his foreign minister, Eduard Shevardnadze. James Baker and Shevardnadze developed a very close working relationship so it was personalized to that extent. Not only could you contrast Gorbachev to his predecessors, who were just stumble bums. Gorbachev was out there, active, speaking. Margaret Thatcher said it better than anybody else, "a man we can work with" so yes, it was associated with Gorbachev. He was accessible. I think the ambassador, if he needed to, could get to Gorbachev. He certainly could get to Shevardnadze.

Q: How did you find Matlock as someone to work with?

BROWN: I always begin by saying I was very privileged to have Jack Matlock as ambassador during my three years in Moscow. He was there for a few months before we arrived and was there for a full year afterwards. He was the only ambassador we had on our second tour. Outstanding, professional, good Russian, knew the history of the country, had served there at various different levels. He was not an easy man to work with. He was a difficult taskmaster, he could be cutting in his criticisms, he could really squash people's morale but he was a first-class professional.

I used to laugh because he did as much chest thumping as anybody about how we could get along without local employees. "We can do it on our own," he would say and then he would also ask why there weren't more activities at Spaso House. He wanted these monthly seminars. He wanted us to get a whole new group of people into Spaso House.

Then he would come in some morning grumbling because we were doing so much at Spaso House and they didn't have local employees to help out. "We are doing this with our very limited resources," he would say. Don't we know? Aren't we all operating under that kind of situation where we have more on our platter than we can handle? We don't even have the human resources to deliver invitations.

Q: I would think that on the information side of diplomatic business you relied heavily on the local employees with their connections. You usually get an extremely high caliber; the niece of prime minister or what have you. It was a sought after job and we benefited tremendously.

BROWN: I remember people who had been our Foreign Service national employees from my first assignment. On my first tour, Yuri Zarakhovitch was the chief FSN for the press section, working with me. I earlier recalled some of our experiences together. By my second tour, Yuri was working first for the Associated Press and then Time magazine. When he died a few years ago, Time featured him in their inside cover page for all that he had contributed to their coverage of the Soviet Union.

People used to fret that the Soviet employees were a threat to our security and were nosing around, finding out what we were doing. That to me reflected badly on the American supervision, if that was the case. You used these people where you could and you didn't get them involved if you didn't want to. Sure, if you were working in the defense attaché office or certain other parts of the embassy, you didn't use FSNs directly. In our business, it would have been extremely useful if we had had some of them just to help us out with some of the mechanical things, drivers to deliver invitations and that sort of thing, but we didn't have them and we managed.

Back to Ambassador Matlock, he was a most willing participant in any of our programs. When we had an exhibit opening, he always wanted to go out and deliver a speech. He, of course, would do it in Russian or even try his hand at some other language.

He counted on us to provide the speakers and make the arrangements for what we called Spaso House seminars. Ambassador Matlock wanted to have a once-a-month evening at Spaso House, each event with a whole new guest list, not the same old people, a dinner, a lecture by a prominent American, preferably in Russian but if not in Russian, we would use simultaneous interpreters. We would get find people in Washington and elsewhere, pay their way and bring them out to lecture.

At one of those events, the speaker was a woman who had been on Jack Matlock's staff when he was at the NSC and who he saw as a bright, upcoming, future high ranking official in our government; her name was Condoleezza Rice. We brought her out as the featured speaker at a Spaso House seminar.

Q: Were these speakers all government people?

BROWN: Government, non-government. Matlock felt there were enough resources in Washington that we could get someone out there once a month. We'd have people in economics, politics, occasionally in a cultural field. The other thing was he didn't want us, quite legitimately, to be inviting the old reliables, people we already knew. He wanted new faces. It was a little hard sometimes because there were people who had come reliably to our film shows or whatever during the toughest times and they were no longer on the guest list because we were trying to expand, get new people.

A partial list of those who appeared would include Murray Feshbach from the Commerce Department, an eminent scholar on Soviet demographics. A professor from Princeton named Steve Cohen who was writing a biography of Nikolai Bukharin; this was a subject that would have been completely off bounds a few years earlier. We had Alan Greenspan. I don't know what hat he was wearing at the time.

We also had Marshal Goldman, the Soviet scholar at Harvard. Speaking of Marshall Goldman, during those three years his son, Seth Goldman, came to Moscow to work for a family there as what was called a "manny," a young man to come out to help with the family and that kind of thing. Seth didn't have mail privileges so his dad sent things to me and I passed them on to Seth.

A few years later, I was teaching at the Fletcher School and I went down to Harvard to an event chaired by Marshall Goldman at Harvard. We went around the table introducing ourselves. I introduced myself and said, "The most important role I played in Moscow was to deliver mail to Seth Goldman." At that point, eyebrows went up as he remembered who I was. Seth Goldman, in his 20s then, is today the owner of the very popular product called Honest Tea. He did not follow in his father's footsteps of being a Harvard professor but he has done well.

Q: Were we trying to spread the word of American culture, Tom Sawyer?

BROWN: The Soviets did a lot of Mark Twain because again, Mark Twain stuff did not depict us in the best possible light, race relations and that kind of thing, so a lot of Russian kids grew up reading Tom Sawyer.

We were spreading American culture more broadly, as through the exhibits. Anyone who doesn't know about the exhibits might not know what I am talking about but you'd take a theme like agriculture or design and around that you would build an entire mini expo. Thousands of visitors would walk through the large exhibit area seeing aspects of design in the United States. At each stop along the way, American guides would answer questions and interact with the visitors. There would be brochures and souvenirs handed out at the end. People would line up by the hundreds and thousands and these were not only for Moscow and Leningrad. These were for places like Rostov, Dushanbe, Magnitogorsk and cities that had never before been exposed to Americans and American cultural life.

Q: We are right on the cusp of the Soviet Union disintegrating and all these various republics, the 'stans' and all coming up. Were we getting out to Dushanbe and the Bishkek and Almaty and all and were we also seeing anything there, the seeds of discontent or disunion?

BROWN: Yes, we were getting out and no section got out any more than the press and cultural section partly because we had the mandate, partly because we had the tools, for example, a book exhibit in Novosibirsk.

On my first tour, as I mentioned before, I traveled to every republic capital except the Baltics states. I made multiple trips to Tbilisi, Georgia. We had the mandate to go to Central Asia and I traveled to republic capitals like Tashkent, Dushanbe, Frunze and Alma Ata, as they were then called. I went to Khabarovsk and Nakhodka in the Soviet Far East.

The area I didn't go to on my first tour but that I did visit multiple times on my second tour was the Baltics and it was here, more than any other area, where you began to see the seeds of disintegration of the Soviet Union. In the Baltics, more than any other area, they were talking about independence. Not in 1987 but by 1990, Lithuania and other areas were talking seriously about breaking away from the Soviet Union.

Q: Did you sort of feel you were in the middle of a historic moment?

BROWN: Yes, I did. I was smart enough to know that this was a sweep of history. Things were really happening there. There was no country that had a higher priority in American foreign policy during this time than the Soviet Union. There was no place where the changes were more revolutionary, where the stakes were higher, where the opportunities were greater than Moscow during this period.

My wife and I regularly discussed whether we should stay on for a fourth year. We didn't but I was not alone. I think many of us in the embassy knew this was a historic period. And again, no one was more aware of this than Ambassador Matlock. He authored a book, Autopsy on an Empire, which is a definitive work for scholars and journalists on what happened during this period. David Remnick likewise wrote an excellent book covering this period so it has been very well documented in a scholarly fashion.

Q: How did you view events in East Germany and Czechoslovakia that were, when that started?

BROWN: I guess it was part of the pattern, part of what was happening.

Q: When the Berlin Wall collapsed, was that seen as well, there goes the ballgame or something like that?

BROWN: I clearly remember where I was at that moment. We (my wife and I) were in Armenia with the ambassador in November of 1989 and I heard on the Voice of America that the wall had been breached and that people were freely moving back and forth by the thousands. I brought that news to him at breakfast. He first looked at me skeptically but it was then confirmed. It was confirmed through the Voice of America broadcasts.

You knew that things were happening, that historic events were occurring but every new event seemed to outdo the other by such a degree that it still amazed you. On that morning, if I had said within two years the Soviet Union would no longer exist, I don't think anyone, including Ambassador Matlock, would have believed me. It was happening so fast and each new phase was so revolutionary it was really hard to believe it was occurring.

When you think of the fall of the Berlin Wall or what was happening in Czechoslovakia, the question was always the contagion. How were the Soviets going to control this? Change was happening within the Soviet Union but it was still controlled change.

Q: Did you have someone somewhere within the Soviet government, an official, not a secret source but someone go and talk to and say what the hell is going on?

BROWN: This man I mentioned earlier, Leonid Dobrohotov in the Information Department of the Central Committee, was someone we could talk to about what was happening; you could get an honest answer to a question if you needed to for business purposes.

I think better sources were people like Vitaly Korotich, the editor of Ogonyok magazine or people in the intellectual, creative intelligentsia, because there wasn't that much of a gap between them and the people in the Kremlin. For a big country, there was a relatively small group of insiders.

Just as Obama can name all the basketball players in the NBA or NCAA playoffs, people in the Kremlin knew all the movers and shakers in the media world or in the theater. All you had to do was talk to those people and they could tell you that.

Q: When you were there were American entrepreneurs, missionaries flooding into the country or did this come later?

BROWN: If by missionaries you mean purely religious?

Q: Yes.

BROWN: No, I am not aware of that. But missionaries in a broader sense, people coming in with ideas.

My notes say something about Frank Perdue, the chicken man. At one point, someone in Washington suggested I might facilitate his entrepreneurial interests in Russia.

Q: I would think that would be a natural.

BROWN: It would be a natural but I managed to persuade people in Washington it was not for me to do. We had any numbers of people coming out with ideas.

Q: I am a film buff. Anything about films one way or the other?

BROWN: I went quite often to Dom Kino to see movies and quite often at the invitation of a producer but I am not enough of a film buff to be able to remember the movies that I saw. The excuse that I can use is that a lot of them I saw were not terribly memorable.

A visitor we did have during that time was Robert Redford. He came out in May, 1988, to show his film called "Milagro Beanfield War." There was a special showing and enough people knew Robert Redford that he attracted quite a crowd.

The next night, after a reception for Redford at Spaso House, we asked Redford and his party if they would like to go to a special theater event. It was at the Taganka Theater which was then directed by a man named Nikolai Gubenko, who later became the minister of culture. The show had to do with the life of the singer/songwriter Vladimir Vysotsky. At the end of the performance, there was an appearance on stage by Yuri Lyubimov, who had founded the Taganka Theater. He had been forced into exile and this was his return. He was greeted by applause, cheers, tears and flowers.

It was an experience for Redford not simply to see the play but to see how Russians adored theater and how Lyubimov was being rehabilitated, reintegrated into the world of theater. We went to Lyubimov's office. I remember Robert Redford adding his name to signatures on the wall. Famous people had written all over the walls of Lyubimov's office.

The Redford party was being escorted. I got back in their vehicle and as we were driving back to the hotel, Redford said, "Where can I get a beer?" I said, "Why don't you come by my place?" So we went by my place and Robert Redford came in with me and picked up a couple of beers and I said, "Well, why doesn't everyone come in and have drinks here?" He said, "We'll go back to the hotel" so he took my beer and went back to the hotel. I can never claim that he was in my house for drinks but he did drink my beer.

And then there was a very special night at the House of Cinema. All of the various artists or members of the creative intelligentsia had their own clubs. There was the Writers' Union, the Composers' Union, the Journalists' Union, the Cineastes' Union and with it, the Dom Kino or House of Cinema. They invited the ambassador and members of his staff to come for an evening, to be on stage, talk and answer questions. So the ambassador put out the call. I am proud to say I was the only counselor who accepted the invitation. There were four other guys, three of them mid-level Foreign Service officers, all with beards, plus the Ambassador's special assistant. I have a picture. That hall must have been filled with several hundred people and many of them asked questions.

We were on that stage for a couple of hours. The ambassador with his excellent Russian answered 90% of the questions because a lot of them were political. At some point, someone wisely said "tell us a little bit about yourselves. Tell us what you do. Tell us something personal about yourself." That is where I made my biggest contribution because I humanized things a little bit.

I said, "I am 47 years old." I told them my birthday was November 7th which, of course, is the anniversary of the great October Revolution and that produced laughter and amusement. I told them I had recently seen on Soviet TV video of events on Red Square on November 7th, 1941, during the war. That happened to be the day I was born and I explained how I looked with great interest and respect at that video of what was going on in Russia on the day I was born. I think they appreciated that.

It was all done in Russian and we got a lot of compliments from the ambassador. He was very pleased with the evening, that he didn't have to carry the entire load. Of course, he wanted to carry the ball but he appreciated the rest of us coming along and participating in the evening. It was one of my more memorable public diplomacy opportunities.

Q: Today is the 29th of May, 2012 with Phil Brown. And Phil, I will let you pick it up where we left off.

BROWN: I spent from 1977 to 1990 overseas, a period of 13 consecutive years, a little longer than normal. As I look back on it, I was really fortunate. I was in interesting places at interesting times.

We are now covering the last phase, 1987 to 1990. I returned to the Soviet Union for my second tour there. In preparing for these interviews, it has been a daunting task figuring out how to approach that period when we were amazingly active. We were very fortunate to be in the Soviet Union during a period of great change. I think even among people who don't have a great sweep of history, if you talk to them now about the Soviet Union and Gorbachev, a light will go on. People remember that period.

The last time, I talked about an exercise where I just blue skied. I recalled the things I really remember from that period and there was a link to them; it happened to be music so I treated you last time to a baker's dozen of different events ranging from Billy Joel to Mstislav Rostropovich. That is a pretty wide spectrum. It wasn't just the music, it was music in a political context that struck me but I left out a lot of other things.

Going through my notes this week, I happened upon a newspaper article that really captures what I have been trying to say, what an amazing period it was. It was an article written by my friend Dan Fisher of the Los Angeles Times. The first time I was in Moscow, I was the press attaché and we had about 25 American journalists including Dan Fisher of the Los Angeles Times. Dan and I had the normal kind of relationship you have with a journalist, a very professional relationship, but we were also good friends. We played paddle tennis together. Dan and his wife, Candy, came to our apartment for Thanksgiving with their three daughters, roughly the same ages as our two daughters. We were good friends.

So Dan came back to Moscow. I am not sure if he was on an overseas assignment somewhere, had been in Poland or Israel or came from the States. I don't know but he looked around the Soviet Union he saw in 1989 and he had the same impression everybody else had. My goodness, this place has changed. He wrote an article that captures so much of what I have been talking about. I want to quote a little bit from it.

Q: Please do.

BROWN: The headline (Los Angeles Times, January 29, 1989) was "Friendly Soviets Roll out Red Carpet for Americans" and it referred right in the first paragraph to the different world of journalists because Dan knew what it had been like being a journalist roughly ten years earlier. He talked about the changing environment for businessmen and then he referred to the U.S. Embassy saying it has become the hub of a busy bilateral social life. He wrote: "All this reflects the 'new thinking in Kremlin foreign policy' and the change this has wrought in the day to day life for Americans here."

Then he quoted me: "'Four-fifths of what I do wasn't even in the job description three years ago,' said Philip C. Brown, the press and cultural affairs counselor. He is back in Moscow for a second tour after having served here in the late 1970s."

I distinctly remember sitting down with Dan for that interview. It was a relaxed interview. I knew I could be completely open with Dan as I talked about how much things had changed. I made up the quote on the spot but it was entirely accurate. Four-fifths of what I was being called on to do wasn't even in the job description three years earlier.

To quote more from the article, Dan wrote, "Just last week, for example, most of the Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra showed up at the embassy's theater for the premier of 'Maestros in Moscow,' a video concert of American Soviet compositions and the video is narrated by actor Gregory Peck. Such an evening would have been inconceivable a few years ago, conductor Dmitri Kitayenko said.

"The next night, Ambassador Jack F. Matlock, Jr., an accomplished linguist and expert in Soviet literature was host at a poetry meeting reading for Soviet and other guests at Spaso house, the ambassador's residence. And the day afterward, Matlock gave an unprecedented background briefing, in Russian, for the Soviet press.

"At the famous Tretyakov Gallery, Soviets flocked to see a photo exhibit marking the centennial of America's National Geographic Society. It all adds up, Matlock has said, to 'the most intense relationship since the (World War II) alliance'."

I thought that article really hit the nail on the head. This is what it was like halfway through my second three-year tour so I thought I would take off from there.

Q: At some point I wonder if you could touch on the other Russia and that's the village Russia. I have talked to people and I go back to my little experience of five years in Yugoslavia. Their transportation often was an ox drawn cart. In the world there is a difference between village and city. Were we trying to reach them and frankly, did it make any difference?

BROWN: If you talk purely about village Russia, we were restricted to the area 40 kilometers around Moscow. I do have a distinct memory of going out with our very good Russian friends one day for a picnic in the woods. Not too far from where we were having this picnic, there was a little pond, a natural pond, and boys sitting there with fishing poles that were not much more than sticks with a line on the end. I thought to myself: "This is the 19th century. This could be Mark Twain" and if you multiplied that by thousands of little villages each with a couple of thousand people, you would describe much of Russia at that time.

Were we trying to reach those people? No, I don't think so. I don't think that most of them were all that concerned about the bilateral U.S./Soviet relationship. They were pretty much concerned with what people in villages are concerned about, their daily routine.

Were they poor? By some standards, yes. I don't think the medical care was good. The teaching may have been pretty good in their schools. Teachers were probably very committed. It was certainly not a big city environment.

In 2006, my wife and I went back to Russia and we took a cruise between Moscow and St. Petersburg. I joked I had never before been to St. Petersburg; I had been many times to Leningrad but this would be my first visit to St. Petersburg.

I was looking the other day of that map of that cruise. We went through some eleven different bodies of water -- rivers, lakes, canals, reservoirs. I would be hard pressed today to name even four or five of them. It is such a complex water route from Moscow to St. Petersburg. On the way, we stopped in a couple of villages. We had left behind the Moscow, the glittery Moscow that you see today with Gucci and all the other luxury stores within a stone's throw of the Kremlin.

You get out to these villages and it doesn't look as if a whole lot has changed. I think the way of life is much as it has been for a long time, both for good and bad. On the good side, relationships are probably simple. Families are close. But in other ways, it is not a wealthy life and a lot of young kids are probably anxious to get out of the villages just as they are in many other countries of the world.

But during the period of 1987 to 1990, I did not make many trips to villages. I went to some cities that were really pretty remote, places where I wouldn't want to live. Two that come to mind are Magnitogorsk and Donetsk, both industrial towns, both a couple hours' flying time from Moscow. They struck me as grim places in which to live.

BROWN: Back to the article which quotes Ambassador Matlock. I talked about Ambassador Matlock last time. He was a tough taskmaster and at times he was too tough, unnecessarily critical of a very hard working staff. But it was a privilege to be there at a time when he was ambassador. No one was more qualified for that position -- as a career Foreign Service officer, as a gifted linguist, as a political analyst, as a full time participant in just about anything (except a Billy Joel concert) and as, we learned later, on as a scholar.

Dan Fisher's article referred to a press briefing. The first time I was in Moscow, as press attaché, we had weekly press briefings done by Ambassador Toon and they were de rigueur for the American press because you didn't have many other sources and you might pick up some little tidbits from Mack Toon.

On my second tour, Jack Matlock started out doing press briefings for the American press but interest diminished. It didn't have anything to do with the quality of the briefing; there were simply a lot more sources of news apart from the embassy. So we reached the point where we did them on an ad hoc basis. That was a very excellent evolution.

Related to that, I remember the case of an American official -- governor, mayor or someone like that -- who made a visit to the American school. He was talking to kids and he asked somebody at the school, "aren't there aren't any journalists?" They laughed and said no. Once upon a time, when an American governor or mayor came to the American school, there would be journalists, American press, but it became so ordinary that no one was interested.

But Matlock did do background briefings and even on-the-record interviews for the Soviet press. That was interesting on several different levels: one, that the Soviet press would come; two, that we had an ambassador who felt comfortable doing it in Russian, though there were times when he was careful and might prefer to say something for the sake of record in English. That, I think, says a whole lot about the change.

Getting back to Dan Fisher's article he wrote, "American correspondents who were much derided here as 'bourgeois scribblers' are today (1989) being invited to write guest columns for the government newspaper." That was very definitely the case. We and U.S. government officials had access to the Soviet media.

But I want to talk about some other particularly memorable moments from this period.

1988 marked the 30th anniversary of the U.S./Soviet cultural exchange agreement. It dated back to the Eisenhower period and his granddaughter, Susan Eisenhower, came to Moscow for the anniversary. Susan Eisenhower was a fairly regular visitor, very interested in the Soviet Union. There was a ceremony at the Hall of Columns in Moscow. Jack Matlock was on stage. From the Soviet side, someone delivered remarks from Gorbachev and Matlock asked me, "Do we have Reagan's remarks?"

I said, "No, we don't." I didn't know that there were supposed to be Reagan remarks for this occasion.

So I scrambled. My counterpart Aleksandr Churlin from the foreign ministry got on the telephone and took down a dictation in Russian of President Reagan's remarks. Meanwhile, the ceremony was going on. We found a secretary who typed the remarks in Russian. I passed the text to Ambassador Matlock with a note saying here are President Reagan's remarks in Russian. He took them, walked over to the podium and delivered them even though he hadn't had a chance to read them beforehand.

This was an act of faith that the Russians were on our side, that they weren't coming up with their own distorted version of Reagan's remarks. We could hand the text to Jack Matlock and know he could pull this off.

I used to joke that Ambassador Matlock -- who went to Moscow first as a young consular officer in the 1960's, went back as DCM in the 1970's, returned briefly as chargé in 1981, then went back as ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary (and he certainly was that) in 1986 for four years -- should really go back to Moscow one more time as cultural affairs officer. He should have done so both because that's where his interests lay and because it would have been good for him to get his hands dirty and see how much work went into putting together some of the programs. He knew his Russian literature, opera and theater. He kept us on our toes.

In addition to the ambassador, we also worked for USIA Director Wick. This was the heyday of Charles Wick's directorship. We felt it in many different ways, not least of which via something called U.S./Soviet information talks. These were annuals talks involving on the Soviet side the head of state television and radio, state publishing and certain counterparts in the United States to try, from the American point of view, to make sure we had more access to Soviet audiences and that we could call them on issues of disinformation when they were putting out something we felt was not honest.

We had several rounds of talks, both in Washington and in Moscow. The Moscow meetings in 1988 marked what I described as the busiest programming week in the history of P&C Moscow. We had virtually every senior USIA official in Moscow at that time, mostly because of the information talks, but because the talks coincided with the Chautauqua exchange in Tbilisi, and the opening of the exhibit that we called Information, USA in Leningrad. And oh, by the way, we had a musical group, the Cleveland Quartet and the musical, Sophisticated Lady; all in the course of one week.

As I have mentioned before, these exhibits were not just pieces of paper on a wall. These were multifaceted, three-dimensional displays of American life complete with young Russian-speaking guides. Sometimes it wasn't only Russian; for non-Russian cities, we tried to recruit people who spoke those languages.

Under the Cultural Exchange Agreement, we took these exhibits to six cities around the Soviet Union and the Soviets had the right to go to six cities in the United States. They never came close to matching our programs. For anyone not familiar with these exhibits, the best point of reference would be the Nixon kitchen debate with Khrushchev back in the '50s. That same program was still going strong in the late 1980's.

Over the three years 1987 to 1990, I went to every one of the cities in which the exhibit was staged. I went to a city called Rostov, south of Moscow. What I distinctly remember from that trip was that the person who came out from Washington for the opening was our deputy director, Marvin Stone. Marvin Stone's was formerly editor in chief of US News and World Report. He was a strong anti-Communist and told me that he could never have imagined coming to the Soviet Union under these circumstances. But I heard him on the phone one night with his wife saying that he wished she had come with him. He called it a real eye-opener of an experience. It was an experience that far surpassed what he thought it was going to be.

This was October of 1988. It coincided with the stock market crash. I told Marvin Stone the Dow Jones had gone down more than 500 points in one day and he said what? He was quite convinced I was wrong and would only believe it when I had a better source. That drop in the stock market crash was going to affect his portfolio pretty seriously.

I went to Tashkent, Central Asia, for the opening of the exhibit there. We were going to go to Tashkent for the opening and then on to Samarkand and Bukhara. The guy who came out was not the most scintillating personality. But I went. It wasn't the first time I had been to Samarkand and Bukhara but now that I think back, what an exciting place to visit. These were Silk Road cities with wonderful architecture, wonderful history.

I was trying to describe Samarkand to this man who came out from Washington. Goods would travel east and west and people would come to Samarkand to tie up their camels and get refreshed. He said, "Oh, yes. I know what you are talking about. It's like Breezewood." He was referring to a place that I know well on the Pennsylvania Turnpike where people come from north and south and east and west, tie up their “camels,” get gasoline and go on their way. I thought that was a perfect analogy; Breezewood on the Pennsylvania Turnpike and Samarkand on the Silk Road in Central Asia.

I mentioned two other cities I went to for an exhibit opening. One was Magnitogorsk and the other was Donetsk, two of the grimmest and grimmest cities I can recall. Magnitogorsk is east of Moscow a couple of hours. There was a sign that pointed in two directions; one said Europe, the other Asia. It was true. It was in the Urals and a pretty much the dividing line between European Russia and Asian Russia.

Donetsk was down in the coal basin. Both cities were described as the Pittsburgh of their region. Magnitogorsk because back in the ‘20s and ‘30s, moguls from Pittsburgh went there to help them establish their steel industry and Donetsk because it was a coal mining area. Having grown up in Pittsburgh, I didn’t really see much of my hometown in either Magnitogorsk or Donetsk.

We also went to Minsk, the capital of Byelorussia for the exhibit opening or, if not for the opening, to visit with the guides and see how things were going. Minsk is a city that got wiped off the map by the Nazis. They have Napoleon and Hitler to thank for the lack of any architecture there. That visit coincided with the earthquake in Armenia in December of 1988.

I recall clearly at the time that Gorbachev was in the United States meeting the president-elect, George Bush. He cut short his visit and returned to Moscow to be back home for the recovery efforts following the earthquake in Armenia. It said something at the time. The head of the country was personally involved in this terrible tragedy in Armenia.

Charles Wick was succeeded by Bruce Gelb as Director of USIA and Bruce Gelb and his wife came to Moscow for an exhibit opening. They were with us for an entire week so we needed a variety of activities. We decided he should visit Tbilisi. I had been to Tbilisi many times and so I proposed that we do something different. Despite objections and questions from a number of quarters, I got my way. We flew to a city called Vladikavkaz and from there, we took the Georgian military highway to Tbilisi. I had heard about this route from someone years earlier and it fascinated me.

My counterpart in the foreign minister, Mr. Churlin, was not keen on this at all. I think that he felt it was dangerous, and maybe he was right. We were picked up at the airport in Vladikavkaz and driven at breakneck speed down the old Georgian military highway to Tbilisi, getting out just once or twice for the view. It was really an exciting trip.

Q: How well was it maintained?

BROWN: The road was maintained but what I think they were concerned about was even then, there was unrest in this area. At one point when we stopped to take pictures. I stood so that it looked as if I was standing right on the edge of this cliff though I wasn’t; people were concerned. It was an exciting addition to the trip to Tbilisi.

For the exhibit in Moscow, I asked Mr. Gelb, who was traveling with his wife Lueza, how he would like to visit it. It was in Sokolniki Park, one of the parks outside the center of the city and Gelb was staying at the ambassador's residence. I said: "There are two ways we can go there on Saturday. We can get in a vehicle, the ambassador's vehicle and drive out there with all the comfort or we can do it the way an ordinary Russian would do it; we can go over and get on the subway."

He said, "I'd love to go on the subway" and so Mr. Gelb, his wife and I walked to the subway, made our connections and arrived with the general public. I think he really appreciated it. It gave him a better feel for Moscow and, when we got there, for the big crowds. This wasn't the formal opening but there was a big crowd and long lines. He stood in line a while just to get a feel for things.

We also took Mr. Gelb and his wife to visit friends of ours, Misha and Flora Litvinov, in their apartment. Misha was the son of Maxim Litvinov, one of Stalin's foreign ministers and also Ambassador to the United States during the war. It was just a personal call but a chance to meet someone with an interesting personal experience.

Q: He's Jewish, isn't he?

BROWN: Yes.

And there were two other cities I went to in connection with the exhibit. One was Kishinev, the capital of Moldova. The Moldavian Soviet Socialist Republic at the time. Today, the capital is called Chisinau.

Q: Did you feel a division there between Romania

BROWN: I guess because we were told that this was a country that was ethnically closer to Romania than it was to the rest of the Soviet Union. I remember it as quite a poor city.

These days, in my current role accompanying international visitors, we occasionally get people from Moldova. There is no reason to be surprised but I would note that some of them are very capable, very committed people.

Q: We had an intern here from the university. She is very good.

BROWN: I think of some of these countries like Albania and Moldova, what we used to think were the dark side of the moon. Sure, they are still poor but I think one of the things we can be most satisfied about is that with the end of the Cold War, a generation later, there are good, capable, committed people.

Then I went to Almaty, then the capital of Kazakhstan. Ambassador Matlock went along. We had a senior official from USIA named Michael Pistor. Ambassador Matlock was willing to take a couple, three days to go out there because he saw the exhibit as a catalyst, a way to call on local officials.

I should say parenthetically that on an early trip I took with him, he called on local officials; when we came back, he realized there had been no note taker. We in P&C had our hands full with the exhibit and everything else we were doing and were really not in the role of note taking so from there on, he would add someone from the political section to go along and be a note taker.

I remember one time hearing him boast that he had reached the stage where he would be a note taker only for the president. Even for the Secretary of State, he would not be the note taker. Somebody else would. Here's a guy who grew up on the mother's milk of a junior Foreign Service officer's note taking. He had now reached the level where he would be the note taker only for the President of the United States.

I think that was the occasion where at some meal we were served the entire head of a beast, perhaps a goat or a cow, which included the tongue and the eyeballs and everything else. Jack Matlock played along with this in his toast, likening the body parts to our relationship. Whatever he said, it was vintage Jack Matlock.

There were many other facets of USIA/USIS programming. To mention a couple of them, we used books in several different ways. We participated in book fairs in Moscow. I remember going one time to the University of Tartu in Estonia and making a special book presentation at the university there; we had a nice little ceremony as we gave a book donation to the director. I went to Novosibirsk in Siberia and to the adjacent city of Akademgorodok, this created scientific center, for a book exhibit.

We also brought out or facilitated the visits of individual artists, speakers, specialists. My list here shows the name of clarinetist Charles Neidich, the Dance Theater of Harlem, the Louisiana Repertory Jazz Ensemble, the Beaux Arts Trio, pianist Ruth Laredo, the Aspen Wind Quintet, the Verdehr Trio, Disney Gillespie, Joshua Bell. All these individual artists and groups performed in the Soviet Union during this time. If we were not the entire sponsor, we were facilitating. We were very involved in their presence.

We had an evening at Spaso House featuring the U.S. poet laureate, Howard Nemerov and the eminent Russian poet, Bella Akhmadulina. She and Nemerov shared the stage. You have to know how seriously the Russians took poetry to understand the impact an evening like that would have.

The eminent architect Richard Meier came out and met with counterparts.

We also inaugurated a high school exchange program. This is something that had the blessing of President Reagan. Somewhere along the line, he had said he wanted to see thousands of high school students exchanged every year. One of the first schools to participate was Bethesda/Chevy Chase High School, which is just up the street from where I live right now.

Let me mention the visit of Voice of America Director, Richard Carlson. He was another of these persons whose visit it would have been hard to imagine. The director of the Voice of America, Peter Strauss, came out on my first tour but by my second tour, it was a totally different relationship. By now, the Voice of America was not being jammed and Richard Carlson could have meetings with Soviets.

Even more interesting was the fact that the Voice of America assigned its first full time correspondent to Moscow and they could not have picked a better person than André de Nesnera. André was a fluent Russian speaker and a delightful guy. He and his wife and three young boys lived in a hotel for quite a while and I remember inviting his wife one day to come over and use our washing machine for their laundry. She did and was so grateful; little things like that you could do for people but if you are living in a hotel with three small boys, you really appreciate it.

Q: When you are talking about the Voice of America there was a man who for years ran the jazz program. He was quite a hero. You might explain what he did.

BROWN: Yes.

In connection with Voice of America and long before jamming was ended, the name of Willis Conover was better known in the Soviet Union than it was in the United States because he did a jazz program on the Voice of America. For many Russians, everything they knew about jazz was through Willis Conover, his programs. I dare say the jamming was less intense when his program was on.

To clarify, what the Russians jammed were language programs. They didn't jam Voice of America in English. Willis Conover's programs would have been on VOA English broadcasts. In any case, the important thing is that Willis Conover was a household word in Russia.

So by the late 1980's, we had a full time VOA correspondent, André de Nesnera, in Moscow. André, I think, was the first person to report the death of André Sakharov. At least that was where I first heard the news.

A footnote: The same year I retired, in 1996, I became a licensed tour guide in Washington, DC. For a number of years, working for Meridian International Center, I led any number of Russians on three-hour tours of Washington; they were here as part of the international visitor program. So I used to point out the Capitol or the Smithsonian, they would take their pictures.

But when I'd say, "Over here on Independence Avenue is the headquarters of Voice of America, Golos Ameriki," that got their attention. They wanted to go in and quite often they would do so later and meet some of the people whose names they had gotten to know over the years. It was just as if a radio station we regularly listened to for years had been off limits and suddenly we could go in and meet those people. It was pretty interesting.

Q: In my walking I have often found Russians speaking tourists around the Einstein statue. Was this popular?

BROWN: It is a nice spot for a group photo, yes. Sometimes if the group is on its way to State Department, we will stop there. I don't know if it had a particular connection with Russian visitors.

Another spot that Ukrainians like to visit is the Shevchenko statue over on 23rd street. Likewise with the Russian Orthodox Church on Massachusetts Avenue, the Soviet embassy and various other landmarks.

Q: The visitors exchange and all, were we breaking away from we were sending young people to study architecture and they were sending middle aged scientists?

BROWN: Yes, we were breaking away from that. I think it was probably always a little bit overdrawn. In the first place, we really didn't accept all their people going off to study nuclear technology and submarine warfare and that kind of thing. I don't recall it being much of an issue in my second tour.

If anything, and how quickly we forget; I don't want to overdraw this, but people started to ask if we need exchanges anymore? People can travel so freely now and that kind of thing. This is something I felt less than ten years later in my last overseas assignment.

One of the issues that came up on my second tour in Moscow was a cultural center in Moscow, an agreement for reciprocal cultural centers. We had long, lengthy negotiations and an agreement, if I recall correctly, was signed in 1990 at the Bush/Gorbachev summit meeting in Washington. There were a lot of negotiations about the diplomatic status of the building and the people working there. We all felt it was important that we have a cultural center in Moscow.

Six or seven years later, when we had carte blanche throughout Eastern Europe, the feeling among some was we don't need cultural centers now. They are wide open societies. Why are we spending all this money on bricks and mortar? I don't know what the status is these days of libraries and cultural centers.

BROWN: It is true they are expensive and in some countries they can become targets but there was this other element at work, the idea that we had won the Cold war. We didn't need to worry about any of these things anymore.

But let me go back to some of the other people who came out to Moscow during that time. In some cases, it was the place to be and so we had a continuous stream of either high level people or people who'd always somehow wanted to get involved in activities there and now had the opportunity.

In 1988, an American theater director was invited for the first time to direct a play on a Soviet stage. It may not seem like a big deal; perhaps it wasn't but at the time, it was looked upon as a very interesting breakthrough. His name was Mark Lamos. He came out to direct Eugene O'Neil's play called Desire Under the Elms.

What I especially recall is that we hosted a reception afterwards at our townhouse and I had no idea how many people were going to come. It seems everyone involved in the project came in our door that night. We pulled out everything we had in the refrigerator and people scarfed it up. It was heady. You had the feeling you were part of something.

There was a Neil Simon play called Biloxi Blues. There were new productions on Soviet stages. Again, I use the word Soviet deliberately because they were dealing with issues that had not been touched on before. These weren't your classic Russian plays.

A journalist for The New York Times, Felicity Barringer, was sufficiently impressed by this that she wrote an article about this phenomenon of American theater coming to Moscow. She called it a "milestone" and used phrases like "Broadway on the Moskva" and "the Soviet theatrical world . . . speaking with an American accent."

You have to understand culture in the Soviet Union to understand why theater was such a barometer. I don't have the memory right now to go over all the specifics but I can tell we went to a lot of plays. We were conscious of what a barometer this was of perestroika and glasnost, that this was the real reworking of Soviet society. This was a new openness. There was no area where that was more evident than theater.

Some more names: Ted Turner. I don't know what brought Ted Turner of CNN out but Ted Turner and all his retinue coming. I remember being invited to a reception for him. Father Hesburgh of Notre Dame came for a human rights meeting and we had an opportunity to brief him, have lunch with him. The artist Robert Rauschenberg was there for an exhibit. In Brezhnev's time, Rauschenberg's works would not have been tolerated in the Soviet Union but now he was on a world tour, a peace tour going to countries like Cuba and the Soviet Union.

Jeanne Kennedy Smith, the sister of President Kennedy, came out to plug the very special arts program for disabled, handicapped athletes. Walter Cronkite, whom I had seen in Normandy on the 40th anniversary of D-Day, came out for an event in Leningrad.

Bob Hope came back. Bob Hope was there on my first tour and I talked earlier about how I walked across Red Square with him, helped him buy blue suede shoes, enjoyed his special show at Spaso House for the embassy community. He came back the second time in the late 1980's. This was a commercial production that they did on the new embassy compound with lights and cameras. I couldn't get close to him. It involved gags held up on a big card that he would read. Very disappointing.

Q: What about missionaries, do-gooders? They were all over the place.

BROWN: I don't recall that. Many of the people I mention had an agenda of their own. They were there for a reason. They were pushing some project and they thought this would be to their own benefit. Sara Caldwell came out from Boston and wanted to create a festival of American music. It went nowhere and the Russians, as I recall, were rather disappointed. It would have been great to have a musical exchange but Sara Caldwell did not manage it very well.

Leon Uris, the author of Exodus, came out in connection with Jewish literature, is the way I want to say it. He gave me a signed copy of Mitla Pass.

Q: Did you get any feel from your cultural friends concern about the hemorrhaging of very talented Jewish Russians going to the United States from the Soviet Union?

BROWN: No, I don't remember people expressing that as a concern. They may have thought about it but I think that would only be people who had a think tank view of the world. What's this going to mean to us when all these really good people leave? I can't tell you that my Soviet contacts ever once said "gee, we are losing our good people." More likely, they were wondering if perhaps they should do the same thing.

Q: I can't help looking at Germany today and the horrors of Holocaust. The other thing it did to Germany was it took out a tremendous cultural collection of talent. Either dead or who left. Hollywood and the United States has benefited tremendously by this.

BROWN: No question. America, Israel and a few other countries have benefited greatly from Russian Jewish immigration. The country is much poorer intellectually and otherwise from this loss. No question about it in my mind but I never sensed that people were frightened. In fact, they were probably saying "be gone if you want to leave." I don't think they felt it was ever going to affect them adversely.

What is interesting, and Rostropovich comes to mind, are the cases of those who found fame in the West but wanted to be buried on Russian soil. There are also people who symbolically took a little bit of Russian soil when they left. The talent is gone.

In addition to the steady stream of eminent Americans, we had an unending series of high level visits. I came back to Washington for Gorbachev's visit to Washington in 1987. President Reagan came to Moscow in 1988.

In 1990, Gorbachev went to Washington again. I did not go back for that visit. We had any number of visits by Secretaries of State Shultz and Baker. In 1988, before the Reagan visit, the consul general, Max Robinson, who lived a few doors up, invited us to a reception for some of the human rights dissidents, refuseniks and other people who were trying to emigrate; we made sure our Russian Jewish friends got to that reception. George Shultz was there, Colin Powell was there. I kidded my friends later they were not Jewish enough, they were not pushy enough. "You gotta get in there and introduce yourselves" to Colin Powell and others, I said. Let them know who you are. One way or another, they became very well known and were at the top of the Reagan list when he came out to Moscow a few months later.

We had any number of congressional delegations and many of them were groups of senators. Senator Bradley of New Jersey is the one whom I remember best. I would have to go back and see how many times he came out but he made the most favorable impression. He did not come out for show and I am not saying all CODELS came for show. But he really came for substance and he was particularly interested in economic issues. We did have him one time at our townhouse for lunch with our Russian Jewish friends but he wanted to know about things like Soviet demographics and the whole economic situation.

Despite his interest in economics, I was quite often the control officer, partly because his point of contact in Washington before he came out was my friend Greg Guroff at USIA. I did not travel with Bill Bradley when he went to Central Asia. People from the economic section did but I did go with him on any number of appointments and these were really substantive. He asked deep, probing questions. He came back with a lot of information.

We had other senators such as George Mitchell and John Glenn. Senator Glenn met with the first woman cosmonaut, Valentina Tereshkova, and they talked about space flight. But it was Senator Bradley whom I remember most prominently.

I don't think that any USIS post anywhere in the world was busier or was receiving more attention during this time than Moscow. But not everyone understood that. There was something called the USIA Advisory Commission and in June of 1988, they had a meeting in Berlin, right after the Reagan visit to Moscow. They invited the PAOs from London, Paris, Bonn, Rome, all the traditional West European posts with senior PAOs who were mostly ten years older than I was.

I said to people back in Washington "don't you think they should have the PAO from Moscow? There is no other post that has more going on from the USIA point of view right now. We just had the President of the United States. We have all these programs and issues." So at the last minute, they invited me to attend that meeting in Berlin. It wasn't for my ego that I wanted to go. I had plenty of chances to travel but I felt they were trapped in old thinking. These guys had to be reminded you might want to have the PAO, not just from Moscow but from Warsaw and a few other places.

I have another category here in my notes called perestroika and glasnost, different ways in which those concepts came to life. I mentioned earlier that soon after we returned to Moscow in 1987, we went out to dinner at a place near Red Square. When we came out, we observed a demonstration by Crimean Tatars on Red Square. Demonstrations of any sort were unheard of at one time, let alone on Red Square.

On November 7th, 1987, I was one of two people who represented the embassy at Red Square. We were in the grandstands next to Lenin's Tomb for the parade. As I stood there, I thought of the contrast with my first tour when, on this great public holiday when you think people come out to cheer and watch the tanks go by, several of us from the embassy decided to see what it was really like. What we found was that streets were blocked and you really had to be approved to go anywhere, not only to Red Square but blocks away to watch the parade go by. It was anything but a public kind of event.

In 1987, I had my own pass. I could go down there and sit on the bleachers next to Lenin's tomb. On the other side was a very attractive young woman, Gorbachev's daughter. Raisa Gorbacheva was also there working the crowd. I couldn't get over to talk with her but for me, it was instructive to see the general secretary's family.

A photograph that always made an impression on me was Gorbachev at the funeral of his wife, dissolved in tears. Many of us will be in tears when our beloved spouse passes away but as I looked at that picture, he seemed so very human to me.

Q: What did she die of?

BROWN: I think she had cancer of some sort. She died in 1999, premature, in her sixties. To me, the man, Gorbachev, had humanity and does to this day.

Q: I was in Washington in the '80s and was walking down the street. They had Soviet flags up and Hugo Chavez was making a visit but I wasn't paying much attention. All of sudden the crowd split an awful lot and people waving and all. Up pulled this limousine and there was Gorbachev and we were about five feet apart waving out the window, a world leader

BROWN: Did he actually get out of the vehicle at that point?

Q: He may have somewhere else but

BROWN: It was on that visit in 1987 that he actually got out of the vehicle on Connecticut Avenue and worked the crowd. That was one of those transformational moments.

Q: When you were at the embassy were people coming up with their thoughts about Yeltsin?

BROWN: Yes. I can remember seeing Yeltsin at the July 14, 1990, Bastille Day reception at the French embassy. He showed up there and people were interested in him. By then, he was a well known personality and he probably had had quite a bit to drink already. This was well before he basically pulled Gorbachev's fate out of the fire by getting up on the tank but you can imagine this man getting up on a tank. He was a larger than life personality. I think at the time nobody really knew the role he was going to play but you did know he was a force to be reckoned with.

Q: There was a time, looking at it from the Washington point of view, Yeltsin was being denigrated as a drunk and a fool. It is usually at the lower level, sort of the munchkins of the White House and all were sort of knocking Yeltsin.

BROWN: Even at the time, Yeltsin had a reputation for being a drinker and for being pretty unpredictable. Nobody at the time could foresee what a major role he would play. I stayed in Moscow until the summer of 1990. This was still the Soviet Union. I didn't know anybody at that time who said within a year the Soviet Union will collapse and this whole thing will come apart. We were still very much talking about evolution.

Q: Were we looking at all, was anybody at all sort of sounding the independent republics' temperature?

BROWN: I think in the Baltics. The Baltics was where it was first felt. These were people who were the most ready to talk not necessarily about independence but about something more than just evolution.

The December 2011 issue of the Foreign Service Journal was devoted entirely to the Soviet Union during my second tour. The cover read “When the USSR Fell: The Foreign Service on the Front Lines” and the lead article was by Ambassador Matlock. Other articles quote from some now-released telegrams that they did analyzing what was going on. Even if they were sending back highly classified telegrams, nobody in mid-1990 would have come out and said flatly -- or did come out and say flatly -- this Soviet Union will not last. We were still thinking in terms of evolution and still casting our fate with Gorbachev entirely.

Q: Knowing human nature, particularly human nature in a bureaucracy, there is a tendency to straight line to predict things. This is the way it is; this is the way it always will be.

BROWN: We were not dealing with someone we disliked at the time. We were dealing with someone who gave us the opportunities for an accord we could never have imagined.

Q: Could you give a definition of perestroika and glasnost?

BROWN: At the time people were using these terms, glasnost was probably the easier one. Openness, transparency. Perestroika would be restructuring with the prefix “pere” meaning to redo, to change. It would be the more fundamental restructuring. It didn’t mean getting rid of the Soviet Union.

Perestroika is easy to illustrate through examples such as the biography of Bukharin that American professor Steve Cohen wrote. He was given a forum to talk about this biography and Bukharin’s widow came. This name would not even have been mentioned earlier.

Such as the staging of a play that in Russian we called Bretski Mir. The English title is something like Peace Treaty of Brest-Litovsk. Names like Trotsky were referred to in the play itself.

There was a week of conscience to honor the victims of Stalin (this may have been the occasion for the visit by Father Hesburgh). It would have been in the same context of looking back at the Stalinist period and the horrors of that time.

Some other miscellaneous memories:

My wife and I went for a weekend in Tallinn, Estonia. We got in touch with a Lutheran pastor there and he invited us to come to his church on Sunday morning. We accepted and the next thing I know, I am being invited to come up to the pulpit and say a few things which I did spontaneously. I tried to make them appropriate to a church service. I also talked a bit about my country. They were translated and apparently well received.

We were invited that evening to the pastor's home, where we enjoyed a simple but wonderful meal with their family and children. The pastor pointed out that that morning in the pulpit, he had been wearing a blue shirt. He had on a white clerical collar and his coat was black, fairly standard dress for a cleric. But he explained, "A few months ago I could have been arrested for wearing this outfit."

Those were the colors of the Estonian flag. Every time I see the Estonian flag, black, blue and white, I think of that pastor wearing the Estonian flag. He was a man of God in the pulpit preaching his message and wearing the garb of a cleric but he was also very proud of wearing an outfit that could have gotten him arrested a few months earlier.

I mentioned the writer Vladimir Voinovich who wrote any number of satires in the Soviet Union. We had been fortunate enough to meet him in Garmisch the year before we went back to Moscow. During our tour, he came back and there was a whole night devoted to him at the Writers' Union. He could come back and bring his satirical literature to the Writers' Union.

A man named Edward Lozansky – he was born in Ukraine but by 1990 he was living in the U.S. -- came out along with Senator Phil Gramm of Texas. They were going to establish an independent American university in Moscow. I imagined it as a university that would preach capitalism and all the virtues of capitalism.

What I especially remember is that Senator Gramm at some point said that the only reason people go to work in governments is to wield power. I decided I'd had enough of this. I had to bow and scrape for CODELs but I said to him, "That's not why I went into government service. I went into government work because President Kennedy inspired me to do public service." I basically let him know that I was disagreeing with him and was offended by what he had to say. He harrumphed.

Q: At some point Phil Graham in Congress had made some remark about American diplomats living in marble halls and drinking champagne or something like that just at the time that two of our diplomats were killed in Sarajevo. Not only Foreign Service officers but also the press spoke out against it.

BROWN: Then there was that morning, December 15, 1989, when I turned on the radio and heard that Sakharov had died. It was a moving moment. On the following Sunday morning, there was a public viewing in a building a little outside the center of downtown Moscow. My wife and I went. We could have shown our diplomatic cards and gone to the front of the line but chose not to. It was a bitter cold day. I did what Russians sometimes do. I took newspaper and stuck it in my shoes just to keep my feet a little farther away from the cold. We stood in line a couple of hours just to walk respectfully, silently past the open casket as friends of ours played appropriate string music.

I wanted to walk past Sakharov's casket after having done it the way Russians did it and then I stepped aside and stood there watching other mourners pass by. The estimates on the number of people there were relatively small but the line was extremely long. It was a fitting farewell to a great man.

It was bitter cold that day. The weather the next day changed radically. It was raining as they took his coffin to a grave outside Moscow.

On our first tour, we went frequently to the old American dacha. By now we had a new dacha. We didn't go to it quite as often. It was closer. There was also an international dacha that we went to more often on the Volga River. We would go there and if the weather was cold enough, we would go cross-country skiing on the frozen Volga.

We'd also go out to a place called Ismaylovo outside Moscow where every Sunday the artists would come. They didn't have to be approved. They could sell their wares. There was a lot of junk but occasionally if you had a good eye, you could pick up some really nice souvenirs.

Then there was the February day in 1988, Wednesday the 17th. We had a tie line to Washington, a 24-hour telephone line. We could use it also for personal calls but during the day it was limited to official calls. If I recall correctly, P&C was allotted from 2 to 3 so if I wasn't out of town or at some other activity, I would get on the phone at 2 o'clock and talk to my desk officer back in Washington where it was 6 in the morning. Yes, we had telegrams but this afternoon phone call was a very useful tool.

On this particular day I was talking to him, Rick Ruth, and there was a knock on the door and a woman on our staff named Laura Hodges opened the door and said "Phil, there's a fire on the fifth floor." I relayed the information to Rick, told him I needed to check and put down the phone. I stepped out of my office and I heard one of the information officers, Mike Hurley saying "yeah, I smell the smoke."

I told Rick there was a fire, hung up the phone, put away some papers, locked my safe, grabbed my hat and coat and headed out.

Sure enough, we made our way down one stairwell and I kept hoping we wouldn't come to a door that was locked for some "security" reasons. When we reached the courtyard, we had a view of a raging blaze on the fifth floor and a column of black smoke that went up higher than the roof of the building. Soviet fire trucks arrived and the firemen were allowed into the courtyard; they put out the fire quickly and as it turned out with minimal damage.

That night, we hosted a reception for IREX students and the next day, we went back to work. It was business as usual except for the smell of smoke and the fact that we were invited to wear old clothes.

Somebody could write a small, or not so small, book on fires at or fires related to AmEmbassy Moscow. The building was a horrible fire trap. Everybody got out safely that day. As one of my colleagues said, "After everyone was safe, I was cheering for the fire." He and others would have liked to see the whole building go up in smoke.

It was a fire trap; it was hot, so dirty. We didn't have anybody to come in and clean our offices, even empty the wastebaskets, that kind of thing. It was a wretched place to work. It was one of the many physical challenges of working in Moscow.

President Reagan's visit in 1988 memorable. There were concerts. Charles Wick was there. President Reagan made a public appearance on Red Square. I missed my daughter's college graduation to be in Moscow for the visit. "Sorry. I'd love to come to your college graduation from Tufts but the President of the United States is here." I don't put it in the category of sacrifice but it was one of those little prices you pay.

A few months later, we went with our wonderful Russian friends, Yuri and Tanya Zieman and their daughter Vera, for a last picnic out in the woods before they were able to leave; at last, they had received exit visas. Less than a year before that, during the Gorbachev visit, I was in Washington and picked up a copy of the Washington Post; there on page one was a picture of Yuri's older daughter, Galina, who had received permission to emigrate, a picture of her on the front page of the Post holding up a poster saying 'Let My Parents Emigrate'. You look at the picture and you have to pinch yourself for a moment to remember this is someone whom you know very well.

I did come home for Christmas in December of 1988. I flew one day after the Pan Am bombing. If I recall correctly, every embassy received a notice, an alert from Washington that there might be an incident or be alert or something. Our embassy was one of the few that took that and put it in the form of a memo to the staff. As a result of that, a lot of people thought we knew more than we did. I think it was just coincidental but there were questions raised about whether AmEmbassy Moscow knew something.

Q: Oh, yes. It became quite an issue.

BROWN: I flew from Moscow to Frankfurt and on to JFK and I had a copy of the International Herald Tribune that had the famous picture of the fuselage on the ground in Scotland.

Q: Lockerbie.

BROWN: The flight attendant asked me to turn it over so people couldn't see it. And then coming back to me later and asking to see the article. It was haunting.

From 1987 to 1989, we had a young woman named Sara Fenander working for us and living with us. We didn't have small children but nevertheless, it was very useful to have someone who would help out at receptions and do a little bit of the housework. She had just received a Master's in Russian from Stanford. A very attractive young woman, particularly to the Marines, who picked her out. But Sara was at arm's length with the Marines. She had no interest in that world at all. We gave her a great deal of liberty, far more than we were allowed to under the restrictions at the time, to go out with friends and have interaction with Russians just because we had a great deal of confidence in her. She had excellent Russian.

We were fortunate that by the time she came, there were any number of people in their 20's who were recruited as nannies or under the PA&E contract. Many of them were very bright, wonderfully outgoing young people. I remember one fellow who I realized was the great-grandson of Robert Frost.

Sometime in 1988, Sara and a group of these people went to a part of the Soviet Union, a part of Russia, that to this day very few people visit; Yuzhno-Sakhalinsk at the southern part of the Kamchatka Peninsula. It is that peninsula where the Korean airliner was shot down. They came back with the stories, amazing stories about salmon and people who had seldom met anyone from outside their own villages. It was a tribute to these people to go out and explore but it was also another example of what you could do at that time.

We attended the wedding of Susan Eisenhower and Roald Sagdeev, one of the Soviet Union's eminent scientists. A nice wedding at Spaso house on the same weekend that Secretary of State Baker was in town but we managed to find time in that high level visit.

I went back to Paris for the dedication of a new organ at the American Church in Paris. I sang in the choir (what a wonderful balance that was to my busy life in Paris) and to go back for the organ dedication; Ambassador Rodgers had been very "instrumental" in fundraising.

We found time even when the USIA inspectors were coming to make a weeklong trip to Ireland. I was pretty casual at that time about travel; I had so many opportunities to travel and I said to my wife that I would make this trip only if we simply winged it, no advance planning. So we got on this midnight Aeroflot flight from Moscow to Shannon. All the Russian planes refueled in Shannon and if there were 150 of us on the plane, 148 went on to Havana. My wife and I got off, rented a car and had a wonderful week completely spontaneous, unplanned, just going from one B&B to the next and then flew back to Moscow.

The Aeroflot return flight began in Lima, went from Lima to Havana, from Havana to Gander to refuel, from Gander to Shannon, from Shannon to Luxemburg and from Luxemburg to Moscow. If you had boarded in Lima on Friday, you would not get back to Moscow until Sunday. It was not an atypical Aeroflot connection. Even when it landed in Ireland, it was accompanied by some fire trucks.

I mentioned that Ambassador Matlock wrote a masterful book on the Soviet Union as did David Remnick of the Washington Post. We were privileged to be in the company of outstanding American journalists. One night, we were invited to a party for Bill Keller of The New York Times. He had just won the Pulitzer Prize for his reporting from Moscow.

P&C finally was assigned a couple of these young Americans under the PA&E contract. I was fortunate enough to pull away from Spaso House a young woman named Nancy Carney. She came and worked for me for the last six months of my assignment. She was so enthusiastic and so delighted to move away from the situation which she was serving drinks to actually come over and do something of substance. It seemed like the more assignments I gave to her, the more she thrived.

As I thought about saying farewell to people, I recalled that you could actually rent for a night an entire boat, a large boat, and do it with rubles. You could use it as a party boat for a night and I said, “Nancy, could you help me with this?”

She did help me. We did it on two separate nights, once for my official contacts and again for friends. It was summer so the days lasted long and we went out for several hours on the Moscow River to a big, wide bay. You had drinks and food. Even my Soviet contacts were awestruck by the fact that I could arrange this. What a nice way it was to say farewell to people rather than just another cocktail party.

Our tour ended on a weekend and on Sunday, we were invited to the Rostropovich dacha. He was not living there anymore but we were friends with his sister and her husband and they said, “Come out to the dacha” and we did. What a lovely place it was, the furnishings, the furniture, the hangings on the wall.

I have two distinct memories of that day. First was how relaxed I felt. I had a great job but I was pushing all the way for three years and that weekend, I knew I didn’t have to go to a country team meeting the next morning. I was totally relaxed.

The other recollection was that out in a corner of the garden was where Solzhenitsyn, with Rostropovich providing him refuge, sat and wrote Cancer Ward. I found it inspiring.

The next day, before we flew Aeroflot to Beijing, we had a meal at the newly-opened McDonald’s on Gorky Street. McDonald’s was attracting a huge crowd of Russians just because it was the first McDonald’s in Moscow. It was like a vicarious trip to the United States. McDonald’s soon learned they couldn’t put out trays because the trays walked out the door real fast but Russians were lined up outside for the McDonald’s experience.

My wife and I had decided we’d come home via China. We flew to Beijing and spent the better part of two weeks there and in Hong Kong. It was great to be able to look at China and think about the Moscow we had left behind. We had a hotel in Beijing that ran circles around any hotel we ever experienced in Moscow.

We had made the arrangements for our trip through American Express in Moscow. We got to Beijing and were escorted up to our room. There was a bowl of fruit on the table. I called American Express and said we are here for our tour. The man said, “Tour? The only tours we have here are going to Singapore” or something like that. I explained how I had made the reservation through American Express in Moscow and his tone changed. He said, “Oh, Mr. Brown, you are the tour.” This was one year after Tiananmen Square. There were no American tourists. So for ten days or more, my wife and I had a driver and a guide and we were it.

GREG THIELMANN
Russian Language Training, FSI
Washington, DC (1987-1988)

Political/Military Affairs Officer
Moscow (1988-1990)

Mr. Thielmann was born and raised in Iowa and was educated at Grinnell College and Princeton University. A specialist in Political-Military Affairs, he held a number of positions dealing with such matters as Strategic Proliferation, Arms Control and Missile Programs. He also served abroad at several posts in the capacity of Political Officer and Consular Officer. His last position was Chief, Office of Analysis for Strategic Proliferation and Military Affairs in State's Bureau of Intelligence and Research. Mr. Thielmann was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2004

THIELMANN: In '87 I went to Russian language training. So that was one of the nice things about my year on the Hill that I knew from the first that I would be entering Russian language training a year hence and then going to Moscow two years from the time I started on the Hill. That certainty about the future certainly helped me order things better. So in '87 I entered Russian language training in a ten-month program, realizing early on that I was at a certain disadvantage because so many of my classmates had either studied Russian in college or they were coming back from a tour in Yugoslavia with at least three-three Serbo-Croatian or they knew Polish or something like that. So I was really in the minority that had to struggle from scratch -- no Slavic languages. Some unexpected marginal benefits were knowing German and having other foreign languages. I mean, as the saying goes, the second foreign language is easier to learn than the first. I found out that interestingly Russian has a whole slew of words and expressions that come directly from German, mostly in the areas of science and war. So there were a few bonus words thrown in at the beginning that I already knew. But it was tough, and I didn't quite make it up to three-three at the end of the ten months. I got that six months into my tour. But the language was a frustration, because, while I got a minimum level of fluency that would allow me to do business in my area in the language, I never achieved the kind of fluency that I would've liked and I think that would've been possible if on the Russian side the security situation would've been different so that there would've been an easier way for me to plug into the society in which I was living. Diplomatic security in Moscow kept us from receiving any Russian television, for example. They wouldn't allow any cables to go into the embassy compound. We had our antennas, but it was very hard to get any kind of reception of Russian television. So we didn't have that opportunity to enhance our language. There was a conspiracy between the KGB and U.S. diplomatic security to prevent us from knowing any Russian. I say that somewhat facetiously. But in the real world that was a double barrier. Even our Russian language teachers at post at one point were sort of expelled from the embassy. I was going to a Department of Commerce office outside the embassy where we were sort of unwelcome. Then for a while diplomatic security told us we should meet in a little sort of Pizza Hut-like building through which we passed to go into our compound, which was totally inadequate. It seemed at one point when we were literally or at least figuratively told, well, just meet in the snow banks somewhere because we don't want you anywhere near embassy property. So that made it very hard to both solidify and improve the fluency level in Russian.

***

Q: You were there from eighty—what '88?

THIELMANN: '88 to 1990.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

THIELMANN: The ambassador was Jack Matlock. He arrived a few months before I did and then served another year after I left.

Q: Well, what was the, in '88 when you got there, what was the sort of Soviet-American situation?

THIELMANN: It was a fascinating time to be there because in general our relations were improving with the Soviet Union. Gorbachev was in charge. He was sort of solidifying his power base at the time, much less tentative than when he first took over in nineteen, as head of the Communist Party in 1985. It was, in 1988 the CIA was still fighting a rearguard action to say that Gorbachev was just like all the others. There was nothing new here. He was just a little bit smarter. Our evidence on the ground from Moscow I think showed a different picture that there were a lot of very encouraging and interesting things going on in the Soviet Union. I was right in the middle of one of the most promising changes in Soviet arms control policy.

Q: You're job, what was your job?

THIELMANN: My job, I was the political section's political military affairs officer. So interestingly that portfolio for a number of years before had been handled by one person. It was handled by one person when I was there. Although during the time when I was there, there was also a new office opening up to run the new arms control implementation functions of having inspectors coming into the Soviet Union and everything. So they had several people on that staff, but it was still one person to engage the Soviets on arms control matters to report on what Soviet thinking was both official thinking and in the institutes that wrote on policy and from which some of the ideas derived. It was an overwhelmingly heavy burden. I mean, early on when I arrived there I said we've got to have at least two officers here to take advantage of the new opportunities that were opening up. Because it was only shortly before I arrived that if the embassy political officer wanted to make a demarche on his counterpart on the Soviet foreign ministry, you would write a letter, say what you wanted to talk about, send it over and then wait for days or weeks for a response. There were all kinds of other meetings that you would arrange with similar difficulty or you couldn't arrange them at all. But during that two years that I was there, everything opened up. I mean, when I was there, it was much like in the arms control it was much like serving in a western European embassy. I would call up the phone, ask to talk with my Soviet foreign ministry counterpart, request a meeting, often get it the same day, walk down the street, go into the office and conduct business.

Q: I mean there's a story that I've heard from several sources at some of these arms control meetings between the Soviets and the United States that we would say well, we understand that you have so many war heads and you have this and that. The Soviet military would sort of get white and basically go over and say, “look, our people, these civilians over here, aren’t cleared to have this information” even though we had gotten it. They weren’t passing it on. So my question is how well plugged into the Soviet military affairs were your counterparts in the foreign ministry?

THIELMANN: This evolved over time. It’s certainly true that it was frustrating from the point of view of a military specialist at the State Department because we knew so much more about both our own military force posture and the Soviet military force posture than our Soviet diplomatic counterparts did. So in a lot of ways it was the military that was the more interesting to talk to about these issues. Yet there is a big cultural divide there. The Soviet military did not feel comfortable talking to American diplomats for the most part. They felt much more comfortable talking to their U.S. military counterparts. So we were going through a period of time when one could actually talk with a relative degree of quality from a same general vantage point talking to one of the members of the institutes like Alexei or Bartov, one of the defense specialists.

Q: This is Canadian-American Institute.

THIELMANN: USA and Canada, and then there was another one, ENEMO (European Network of Election Monitoring Organizations?). I can’t even remember now what that Soviet acronym stands for, but there were basically two different institutes that had kind of well rounded staffs on a number of foreign policy and international theater questions. Those people would study our own literature pretty extensively. So they knew a lot about Soviet military forces through our literature. Then through their own means they would buttress that with a little bit of knowledge of the Soviet order of battle. But it was a very fascinating time because of all the new things opening, the new possibilities. As a mid-level foreign service officer, much of our work was made more interesting and new opportunities created by both Matlock’s efforts as ambassador and also the high level officials coming from the United States, like Defense Secretary Aspen who came to the Soviet Union when I was there. He came actually from the East as I recall, going to Soviet test site in Kazakhstan as well as the space launch Cosmodrome, gaining access to ICBM (intercontinental ballistic missiles) sites, all kinds of things that the U.S. had never done before. I also went with Ambassador Matlock to the Crimea for the first visit of U.S. war ships since World War II to a Soviet port. So all those sort of new experiences were there to be reported on and chronicled by political officers.

Q: What role did the military attachés play? Were you both working on the same thing or how did that work?

THIELMANN: It actually worked very well in Embassy Moscow. I served enough that I’ve seen that defense attachés sometimes don’t work very well with their political section counterparts. The embassy in Moscow at least during my two year window seemed to get some of the most impressive officers. There were two generals who were head of the defense unit in Moscow when I was there, first General Rock and then General Gavin, very different kind of individuals with different kinds of strengths but both very impressive representatives of the military who had good contacts, who were respected by their Soviet counterparts and who would have access to a different kind of things than we would have access to. So once we gained mutual respect, I thought it was a very smooth working relationship in which we both sort of specialized even though the overall subject matter was very similar. We both specialized in making our own individual contributions, and I think I feel pretty good about reporting coming out of Embassy Moscow on the Defense side and the State Department side during that period.

Q: My impression of that period is "trust but verify," Things were really changing in attitude. But the whole idea is okay, but we'll go out there and take a look on the ground. I think this would be very difficult for Soviet officials to adjust to.

THIELMANN: Very difficult. It was a completely different way of life for them. I mean, they were much more indoctrinated with secrecy and secrecy from their own society. I mean the spending amounts, none of those things were anyone's business except the Soviet military. That meant that when later on, when the Duma was introduced, it was an enormous hurdle to get over the idea that members of Congress should know something about what the Soviet military wanted to do or actually fund it. That was really revolutionary.

Q: Well, when you arrived there in 1988, was there any feeling about what would happen in the end of 1989? I mean, the Berlin Wall going and essentially the Soviet bloc falling apart. Was anybody saying oh boy, they're on the brink? What were you getting?

THIELMANN: I think Ambassador Matlock was probably a better authority on this because of his senior position and the kind of correspondence he would have with the top level of the State Department and his being privy to meetings with high level Soviet figures. Not all of that stuff was transparent to us at the time as I've seen from reading some of the things Matlock has written since. I would have to say in general that we did not have a sense of imminent collapse. We had a sense that very important, very significant changes were taking place and that there was some tectonic shifts going on, and I was amazed at the time. I remember being amazed contemporaneously at the kind of things that Shevardnadze would say as Soviet foreign minister. I mean he would say things, he would kind of ridicule the notion, which was really the official Soviet propaganda line, that the NATO countries were looking for opportunities to invade the Soviet Union. I mean, he would more or less say, "Why would they want to do that? There's nothing we have here for them." He would talk fairly openly about the disaster represented by Afghanistan and the deployment of SS-20 missiles as being things which showed the bankruptcy of the Soviet decision making process. Well, this was incredibly sharp and open criticism. This would be quite sharp for a democratic society let alone the kind of the Soviet society represented. So all that was actually going on at the time, and I think a lot of us were saying that because of all that there were more real opportunities here for making arrangements with and dealing differently with the Soviet Union than we had before. I don't think very many people envisioned the speed with which this would happen and what happened in Eastern Europe in the couple months leading up to the fall of the wall. One can certainly point to memos and other things being done only months before the fall of the wall to document that feeling that this really did come out of the blue.

Q: Was there a feeling of comfort with President Reagan at the end of his time and a feeling that here is a man who'd come out of the quite far right in the American political spectrum dealing with the Soviet Union. I'm talking about among you officers there and all that. How did you feel about all this?

THIELMANN: Well, just speaking personally, I mean I was disconcerted from early on at how little interest Reagan had in the details of defense and foreign policy. So I saw him as representing a profound sort of bottomless pit of ignorance which left me feeling very insecure. The thing that made me feel much more calm about Reagan--and I think this extended to many of my colleagues--was that, once he did develop a personal relationship with Gorbachev, after his own demonization of the Soviets as simply being part of an evil empire and as some sort of broodish automatons as part of this Soviet monolith or whatever, Reagan himself developed a different mental image of his negotiating partners. That made a big difference because one got the feeling that now this Administration at the highest level actually wanted to establish a modus vivendi with the Soviet Union, whereas before it seemed like the administration wanted only to intimidate and vanquish this country. So I think the IMF agreement, the signing of that agreement, and the personal relationship that Reagan and Gorbachev developed made everyone feel a little safer and a little more hopeful about the future directions of policy.

Q: Well, now the foreign ministry of any country usually consists of more sophisticated people particularly in a totalitarian, closed society like the Soviets because they've had to deal with the outside. Did you find sort of a relaxation and kind of a sense of fun and enjoyment of doing the job there among your equivalents in the Foreign Ministry?

THIELMANN: I really did. That was one of the most pleasant and satisfying parts of the job. Obviously in the back of my mind was the knowledge about the great divide between the Soviet Union and America. The ideological hostility, the sort of the zero sum notion about U.S.-Soviet relations and all of that very heavy Cold War baggage was in the back of my mind. So it was a special thrill when you thought that you were actually connecting with a Soviet diplomat and that together you were actually advancing the relationship in a way that would benefit both countries and third parties. That was really among the most satisfying parts of my career. I had the good fortune to be dealing with a portfolio that allowed me to engage with some of the most Americanized of all the Soviet diplomats, people who had been engaged with the United States and arms control negotiations previously, some of whom who had served in the United States. Those who had both a good command of English but also -- I wouldn't want to overstate this -- a more western way of thinking than some of the other diplomats. So I actually went through that time with close contacts with, well, people like Pavel Polischenko the bald-headed face you would see as Gorbachev's interpreter everywhere he went.

Q: Oh yes, the moustache.

THIELMANN: He was actually a Soviet diplomat as well. I would be able to talk to them. With these people I developed a level of trust, which I think is really the prerequisite for effective relations between diplomats. Not to say that one would share all of one's secrets but enough understanding and information that you could rely on what they were saying about making arrangements, or if you could get insight into what the real reasons for a country doing something was going beyond what you were reading in the paper, that kind of relationship. So that was something that I really treasured from the experience, and then of course there was what we would call the "institutniki," the people at the institute, Alexei Bartov, Andrei (inaudible) who were more or less contemporaries in terms of age and had similar professional interests.

That too made it a special relationship. I had my fortieth birthday party in Moscow and was able to invite professional contacts to a birthday party in the American embassy compound. I actually felt I was inviting friends who were representing the Soviet government as well as people who were important for me to have as contacts. That just is a little parenthetical aside. That party apparently created fits for the diplomatic security because they were very worried about any Soviet visitors committing a technical attack on the American compound even though our instructions were that we should assume that everything from our bedrooms to our houses was all bugged on the compound. So I don't know if they were worried if the Soviets were going to change their batteries or something, but we actually had to escort them to the bathroom and everything.

Q: This sounds like in a way you were almost viewing the diplomatic security as the equivalent to the KGB. I mean it was almost the enemy.

THIELMANN: They were working for us, and I did at least have sympathy for what they were trying to do. But I didn't have much sympathy for the way they executed it or their degree of sophistication. I mean we got the strong feeling that diplomatic security would be most happy if we would just shut down the embassy and go home or else that we would never leave the embassy. That is, you didn't get a very strong sense that they understood what we were there for, what our mission was. Obviously their mission was to protect our safety and protect our secrets from migrating to the Soviets, but I would argue an important part of their job too was to remember the prime reason we were there. So yeah, it was at times a not terribly cooperative relationship. I spent a lot of time arguing over who should pay the extra guards hired for my birthday party, and diplomatic security wanted to represent it as something that I had requested. I didn't request it at all. They're the ones who insisted that there be special guards hired and paid overtime to protect the bathrooms while this party was going on and to keep the Soviets from going to the Saint Patrick's Day dance that was just a few feet away in another area of the embassy compound. So we sent memos back and forth about who should pay for this for a long time. It was quite an episode.

Q: I served five years in Belgrade where probably the degree of observance was not as heavy, but it was still there. At a certain point you get to realize how little of what you do really, I mean our phone was tapped and I must say the Serb security service learned a great deal about organizing a Girl Scout troop by my wife in the international community. Most of what we do really is trying to communicate our ideas anyway.

THIELMANN: That's right. If you're having an affair with someone or you have some deep family problem, that's obviously the kind of thing that can be exploited by the other side. But, I don't think that if, as diplomatic security requests of us, any time you want to discuss finances you must be sure to do it in the bubble of the embassy. I think that's going a little bit overboard, and I noticed that, whenever we would want to schedule the bubble, it seemed like diplomatic security was always in it meeting. It was kind of hard to find time. So you have to use some commonsense in these things and realize that, as you say, most of your business is not sensitive at all and not really of use to the other side. Part of being a professional is understanding what is really sensitive and where you have to be careful, talking at home to your wife and others about it. So I think the reminders that many of our conversations were vulnerable to interception were good, but we weren't really given as much credit as we should have been for our professionalism and our ability to use commonsense.

Q: Well, was this security a result of the Sergeant Lonetree affair?

THIELMANN: Much of it was. That was the whole other element of our life in Moscow, which was much more difficult because of the events that started with Lonetree. The combination of the penetration of the Soviet embassy.

Q: You mean the American embassy.

THIELMANN: Yes, I'm sorry. The American embassy. The facts of this are still sort of murky. I don't really know to this day how much of it was penetrated, but clearly there had been some connivance between some of the Marines, and some Soviets did get to places in the American embassy they were not supposed to. So the consequence of that and the discovery that the new chancellery had been wired in a way that our technical experts had not anticipated or understood -- those two things together left a very sort of heavy security cloud over the embassy and much more stringent demands on us than there would have been otherwise. Then to add to all of that, we had expelled Soviet diplomats from the mission in New York in great numbers a couple of years before I arrived there -- at least one year before I arrived. So the Soviets then retaliated by pulling out all of their Soviet employees from our embassy, which meant for a while there we were the only embassy in the world that had no nationals from the host country working in the embassy. Because labor is very cheap in the Soviet Union and there was much to be done, of course there was a lot of work that all of a sudden American embassy members had to worry about. So the year before I arrived there were all kinds of horror stories about diplomats maintaining boilers and doing a lot of manual labor whether it was snow removal or other things that significantly kept them away from doing the jobs for which they had been sent to Moscow. By the time I had gotten there, the U.S. had started hiring contract Americans to come and do some of these critical tasks. For example we had a few American embassy drivers who had some minimal Russian language training. So they were considered secure and could take us around town unlike the previous Soviet drivers that we had to assume were working for the KGB. The problem here was there were very few, and so as a first secretary in the embassy, I always had to drive myself everywhere. This meant, if I had to make a demarche or go to a reception or to one of the institutes, I had to get out my CIA-made Moscow map and get in my Sputnik, my Russian car and drive on roads, which were usually not cleared during blizzards and had inadequate signage and bizarre Stalin-era traffic rules. This required a significant skill and caused stress. That of course only added to some of the other things like even cleaning the political section. We were the ones who had to vacuum, clean windows or whatever else needed cleaning. These private contractors couldn't bother doing something like that.

Q: We're talking about the working conditions. What was happening while you were there in the political-military section?

THIELMANN: Because of the inspections opened up under the INF treaty and some other ...

Q: This is prior to the fall of the Berlin Wall and all that.

THIELMANN: That's right. When I arrived the INF treaty was already being implemented. It was a 1987 treaty. So the unit in the embassy that was interfacing with the Soviets was up and running. We had a port of entry at Ulan-Ude deep in Siberia, and there were American military personnel and other inspectors going in and out and a whole series of exchanges with the Soviet military, which were a new thing. I mentioned the Sixth Fleet visit to Sevastopol, homeport of the Soviet Black Sea fleet. There was a lot of interaction with members of the Soviet military that had not occurred before, and they would be receiving high level delegations in ways that they had not done before.

Q: Did you talk to the Soviet military too? I mean was this--

THIELMANN: I did some, but even though we had access, I probably wasn't able to exploit it quite as well because I was not in the military myself, not in the U.S. military. My Russian, while adequate was not at the level of fluency that would allow me to, let's say, easily develop a rapport with Soviet military that was already disconcerted by talking to American diplomats and most of whom had no English or no serviceable English. This would all be in Russian.

Q: Were you there when Admiral Crowe made a visit, I mean with the head of the Soviet military. I can't think of his name? He committed suicide.

THIELMANN: Sergei Akhromeyev.

Q: Yes.

THIELMANN: I don't think so. I'm not quite sure.

Q: I'm not sure when that happened.

THIELMANN: I'm drawing a blank on that right now. I was there, I mean, I was recalling the other day in connection with an op ed I was writing about Condi Rice. Before saying some not so nice things about Dr. Rice, I was recalling my accompanying her as a member of the NSC in 1990 to a meeting with Akhromeyev in the Kremlin on a Saturday, a one-on-one meeting, in which I was very impressed by Rice. She was speaking fluent Russian, dealing with Akhromeyev who was in uniform but at that time a special advisor to President Gorbachev. I remember being somewhat amazed that for this sixty-six year old World War Two veteran that he was doing business in Russian with an African American, a young African American woman talking about Soviet military policy. To me it was a credit to Condi Rice that she could establish that level of professional respect by someone representing a macho, racist cultural perspective.

Q: And generational.

THIELMANN: And generational. That's right. So I was very favorably impressed and increasingly less impressed with Condi Rice as the years have gone by.

Q: Did you go down to the Sevastopol visit?

THIELMANN: Yes.

Q: How did that go?

THIELMANN: That was an incredible experience. It was incredible because it was not a Moscow event. It was in an enclosed military area. It was an area that had never seen -- I mean most of these people down there had never seen -- an American in their life. All of a sudden there were hundreds of sailors in white uniforms walking the streets. Then there was even General Greg Govan in a green uniform, a U.S. Army general. Govan was very fluent in Russian. He had a politician's manner. He would walk down the streets of Sevastopol surrounded by Russian kids, and he was clowning with them and joking with them, and it was an amazing spectacle. There were some organized exchanges, I think some sports contests, but just sort of Americans walking the streets and you'd hear these Sixth Fleet sailors saying this was the best port visit they'd ever had. I thought, "What? These guys who sail around Greece and Italy, and this is the best port visit." I think it was simply because the Soviets were so friendly, and it was such a novel experience. It was like a carnival atmosphere. Of course the U.S. naval attaché had to do a special video for the Sixth Fleet members reminding them about the no fraternization policy, and we heard at the time that there were hundreds of prostitutes coming down to the Crimea for the occasion. Then I did notice late at night as I was going back to my headquarters, there seemed to be at least a couple of American sailors who were walking alone with a woman on each arm. So I'm not sure if the policy was adhered to completely.

Q: Well, we've gone through that one before a number of times with complete lack of success.

THIELMANN: Yes.

Q: How did the events of 1989, because this was a cumulative thing, hit you from the vantage point of Moscow. I mean, was this sort of something, you understood that things were happening. I mean this was going to be a year that would shape the world more or less. Were you understanding the significance of it all?

THIELMANN: I think -- and again my specific beat was arms control and not sort of what was going on in Eastern Europe -- but I think as those unusual events occurred in Czechoslovakia and Germany, we certainly took note and this is very significant. But even then one or two months beforehand the breaching of the Berlin Wall came as a real shock. I remember getting a call from my wife in my office in our splendid isolation. Of course we didn't have CNN. Only the Soviet foreign ministry had CNN. My wife said something like the Berlin Wall is falling, but there were people crossing over on the wall and it was so electrifying. It was just an incredible piece of news, and then to see the way it played out from the Moscow point of view was also fascinating. I think that month after that was one of the most interesting of my career because for one thing the political officer who was responsible for following German-Soviet relations was gone. I was his backup. So I was the one who went around to the people in the Soviet foreign ministry who were responsible for relations with East Germany. I would go to events where the East German military attachés were invited to our defense attachés. There were good contacts with the Germany embassy, which I maintained. So to see that from all these different perspectives of people whose countries were not only intimately affected by all this but whose lives were intimately affected. I mean, East German diplomat or an East German general officer -- I mean these people -- their lives as they had known it were coming to an end. So it was an incredible perspective. Then also to realize, again no particular insight here, but to realize how worried the British and the French were about unification. I mean the three parties that seemed to be the most worried were our World War Two partners. The Soviet government, the British and the French were deeply worried about what this would mean. To get that sort of firsthand kind of emotional impression about that -- this is something that I think was very important that we reported at the time, to get a sense of how the Soviet people were much less worried than the Soviet government about the consequences of unification. I mean one would have thought from an American perspective that this nation so traumatized by the German invasion and Nazi atrocities would rise as one in opposition and fear to seeing a unified Germany. But I think for us from a Moscow perspective it was much more the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the highest and oldest levels of the government -- they were the ones who were panicky. My counterparts of my age and others who grew up in the post-World War Two era, they were not traumatized by a united Germany. A lot of these people had seen Germans too, post-World War Two Germans. The images of Germany as the evil empire were already significantly altered by the reality before the fall of the Wall.

Q: Leading up to this time was there any occasion where things were beginning to get wobbly to use a term. Were you, was there concern that maybe the Soviets would move into East Germany because it's really a matter of, will the Soviets move or won't they?

THIELMANN: I think there was definitely real concern about that. That's one of the things, which I think made everyone's pulse go up a little bit. There were huge numbers of Soviet troops in place. There was always the possibility of some unscripted incident occurring between the German population and Soviet troops. Looking back on it, that was something we were very lucky about. All of those hundreds of thousands of Soviet soldiers heavily armed, sitting surrounded by not so friendly populations and all these countries of Eastern Europe, and we managed to escape the whole thing with not only no incidents, but the Soviet Army withdrew on schedule. I mean that's an amazing thing. So I think we remained tense for quite a while after the fall of the wall.

Q: Well, were we looking at the Baltic States? Was this also a place that was a concern to us? I mean what was happening there?

THIELMANN: As I remember at the time we weren't quite as concerned about the Baltic States as we became later because the Soviet Union was still intact at that time. The Baltics were fairly well integrated into the Soviet Union -- I mean integrated in a sense that an awful lot of Russians lived there. An awful lot of powerful Soviets would have vacation plans in the Baltic. Even at that time it was still hard to imagine the Baltics becoming independent countries when the Berlin Wall fell. I had a trip to Riga, Latvia in my last few months. I think this would have been the summer of 1990. A couple of things came out of that experience. One is just to be reminded again that Latvia was a very different kind of place than the Soviet Union. I mean the manicured lawns, the art deco architecture of the city, the overall Hanseatic League flavor of the city that remained after all this time was so palpable that I remember thinking at the time that with economic opening that whether this country was independent or not, this was going to be the kind of place which exploits the opening and takes advantage of new possibilities here much faster than other places. But to my memory I don't think even at the time I left in 1990, that we were looking at the Baltic States as soon to be independent.

Q: Was anybody within the embassy, political officers, economic officers, looking and saying, Kazakhstan and all the other stans and the Ukraine, might split up or not? Was anybody even contemplating that?

THIELMANN: We were certainly watching things at the time. There were some bloody protests in Georgia that were put down fairly brutally. There were movements in Kazakhstan, anti-nuclear testing movements. There were other things which were clearly creating serious problems for the Soviet center and control problems and manifestations of ethnic and cultural identities that we hadn't seen manifested in a long time. Of course we didn't know where that was going to end either. But again I'm trying to remember what was in our minds when I left in 1990, and I'm not sure then that we had any idea. I don't think a lot of us saw in the immediate future the break up of the Soviet Union. That was still kind of an unfeasible thought even after the Berlin Wall.

Q: Well, this was your first time there, wasn't it?

THIELMANN: Yes.

Q: Did you also come away with a feeling that God this place doesn't work or did you feel that maybe economically it may not work, but it's certainly a strong, strongly held society through military force, political force, that sort of thing? How did you feel about it?

THIELMANN: I definitely had the feeling that this is a very dysfunctional country. This is sort of a pathetic place that even in the summertime can't come up with decent produce. What kind of a place is it that we bought our vegetables all year round at the Polish frozen food store or ordered things from Stockman's in Helsinki to be delivered on the train. I mean, a city of Moscow's size, a city where there were just starting to be some co-op restaurants where you could get some decent food. It was just starting. But it was still the kind of place where, when we went to Leningrad our first fall there in 1988, the city still had a lot of the decaying splendor of Catherine the Great who built most of the building that remained and the canals and everything, a great potential for beauty and a candy for the eye. But the whole city was just extremely hostile to tourists and had no place to sit and have a tea, no place to walk and get in out of the cold, just that sort of a feeling of just barren wasteland where all these millions of people are living. Then there was a kind of brutality of society. One of my favorite metaphors is right outside the U.S. embassy there was a ring road there with like seventeen lanes of traffic. They had the pedestrian stoplights timed so that people literally had to run across the street. To see like old babushkas with grocery bags in both hands walking who knows how many miles sort of slipping and sliding on the ice across the street before the completely unforgiving huge trucks would gun their way through this intersection. I thought, what a society this is! Then in spite of the fact that there were little pockets of great beauty from the past, there was the incredible ugliness of the housing stock, the decay of everything. I mean the average apartment building's door, the sort of decrepit condition of the entryways, all of this stuff was depressing to the spirit, and one got the feeling that hardly anything really works very well in this whole country.

Yet one remembers World War Two and the German underestimation of the determination of the Soviet people. One remember the space program. I mean they did beat us in putting a cosmonaut into orbit. They beat us in landing a robot on the moon, I think, or at least the far side of the moon. There were some aspects of the space race that the Soviets did first, and then of course they developed ICBM missiles before the United States and to this day have a record of reliability in their space launch vehicles which exceeds our own. So what a contrast and how hard it was to put the evidence of incompetence and lethargy and decay together with those genuine achievements in the society.

Q: Well, then Greg, it's probably a good place to stop. You left there when, in 1990?

THIELMANN: Summer of 1990.

WILLIAM BROOKS
Office of the Legal Advisor: Moscow Embassy Arbitration Case
Washington, DC (1988-1989)

Mr. Brooks was born in Wisconsin and raised in Michigan. He received his advanced education at the University of Michigan and Wayne State University. Entering the Foreign Service in 1980, Mr. Brooks served several tours of duty at the State Department in Washington, D.C., and abroad at Toronto, Khartoum and Brussels. In his assignments Mr. Brooks dealt primarily with economic and trade matters as well those concerning Anti-terrorism and Nuclear Risk Reduction. Mr. Brooks was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005.

Q: So you then went to the Moscow arbitration case. This was when?

BROOKS: It probably would have been '88.

Q: What is the Moscow arbitration business?

BROOKS: It was an international arbitration case against the Soviet Union over the construction of the new embassy building in Moscow, which had a number of problems, including ordinary construction delay and shoddy construction issues and the rather unique issue of having bugs implanted throughout it.

Q: You were doing this for how long?

BROOKS: I was on a detail assignment to the Legal Advisor's office for one year.

Q: Now what was the state of play when you got there? This was in ...

BROOKS: I think we decided in '88. We already filed claims. During the year that I was there we revised our claims to make them more specific, especially in quantifying the monetary damages. I prepared a memo while I was there on the chain of custody of the evidence of the bugging that we were removing from the embassy and did some other tasks as well. However, things were moving rather slowly at the time. Part of the problem was that the old Soviet Union, the evil empire, was becoming our new best friend, sort of, and there were some doubts within the administration as to how we wanted to proceed. That continued after I was gone. The new administration did a study and I think in the end the arbitration case just went away, and we made whatever decisions we made with regard to the embassy building based upon other considerations.

Q: What was the state, again, when you got there, of the embassy building?

BROOKS: It was built but it was not occupied. There was also a housing complex that went along with it and we did begin to move into that, but because of the evidence of the bugging that we found we stayed in the old embassy and didn't move into the building.

Q: At one point, Ambassador Robert Strauss was handed, by the then-head of the KGB, the so-called plans of all the bugging, as things were changing rapidly. Was that during your watch?

BROOKS: No, that would have been after.

Q: What were you supposed to do?

BROOKS: What were we supposed to do? We were supposed to proceed with this arbitration case and hopefully get a decision from the arbitrators that the Soviet Union was responsible for all of our claims and collect monetary damages so that we could use those to reconstruct or build a new embassy.

Q: Who was the arbitrator?

BROOKS: The arbitrators hadn't been chosen.

Q: Where would they come from in something like this?

BROOKS: There are international arbitrators. International arbitration cases are not unusual and there are people who do this more or less for a living. There were procedures in place for choosing the arbitrator. The United States was to choose one. There would have been three. The Soviet Union would choose another one and then the two of them would choose a third.

Q: What about the workmanship? All of us are familiar with these huge apartment complexes in Moscow that are falling apart before they're even occupied over the years. Was there anything different? Did you get a feel that we had made extra, even extraordinary efforts to get good construction?

BROOKS: It didn't seem so. I was never on this team, but I heard stories that during the construction process ... Whereas we do a construction project here in the United States involving concrete — you're familiar with the big trucks that turn and mix the concrete? There are none of those. They pour concrete and mix it by hand at the site and frequently you get problems with hardening before you get it in place.

Q: And well-mixed, too?

BROOKS: Well-mixed, too? Certainly. I've also heard stories about little old women in babushkas digging in the dirt, where we would use cranes.

Q: While you were doing this, was there a feeling this was a futile effort, wasn't going anywhere?

BROOKS: I think we tended to reject that idea but at least in the beginning, the first six months or so, we felt that we had gone to great lengths to build a timeline for the construction project, how it was supposed to proceed and all the elements of it to be delivered on time. We used the same process to construct a timeline for our arbitration case. When I first arrived we were more or less on schedule. A year later we hadn't made much progress and it was clear we'd fallen behind schedule. By the time I left there it was pretty clear that it wasn't moving forward very vigorously.

RICHARD M. MILES
Consul General
Leningrad (1988-1991)

Ambassador Miles was born in Arkansas in 1937. He earned an associate degree from Bakersfield College, Bachelor's degree from University of California, Berkeley and a master's degree from Indiana University. He joined the Foreign service in 1966. His overseas posts include Oslo, Belgrade, Moscow, Leningrad, Berlin, Azerbaijan, Bulgaria and Georgia. Ambassador Miles was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

MILES: I already had the assignment to Leningrad as Consul General. When I was offered the assignment I was told I could either go to Moscow as Political Counselor or Leningrad as Consul General—what did I want to do? My inclination was to go to Moscow because it's the capital and consuls general in Leningrad had tended to die an early career death and also frankly to be rather bored. I mean, you can only go to the ballet and the opera so many times. But Sharon convinced me that the times were changing and that it would be a lot of fun to be out there and to be a big fish in a small pond rather than to be lost in Embassy Moscow where, whenever anything really sexy would come along, the Ambassador or the DCM would snap it up and the Political Counselor and his people would just be expected to provide them the back-up that they needed. So it didn't take much convincing and we went off to Leningrad. I have often thought about it—I have been a principal officer five times since then, and I must say the Leningrad assignment was the best assignment I ever had. It was a fascinating time, I had an excellent team and we really covered the waterfront.

Q: You were there from?

MILES: Eighty-eight to '91.

Q: Eighty-eight to '91, which is—did you leave Leningrad or did you leave St. Petersburg?

MILES: It was still Leningrad. I left in June 1991. It only changed later that year after I left.

Q: Okay. When you got there in '88 how would you describe the situation in the Soviet Union?

MILES: Well, it certainly was different from when I had last been there on my first assignment to Moscow, '76 to '79. The economic conditions had gotten much worse. Leningrad is a city of over four million people; it's bigger than many countries and it's the second largest city in the Soviet Union—or now, in Russia. I was appalled by the deterioration of the infrastructure in the city. The streetcar tracks, for example, had not been repaired in such a long time that they would suddenly give way and street cars would fall over on their sides. Street lights were often burned out and not replaced. And when you would go into anything except the highest class museum, like the Hermitage or the Russian Museum, you'd be appalled at the fact that the walls needed painting or the floor needed shellacking or the windows needed repair. I mean, it was just incredibly shabby.

And then on the personal front, there were actually food shortages in Leningrad at that time. When we first went there people—Soviet citizens—would complain to us, and it was clear that the large variety of things which had been available to the ordinary consumer in the 1970s had been severely diminished. The example which the Russians used to use all the time was salami. Before, they would say, we used to have a choice of 10 or 15 different kinds of salami and now we get our choice of one or two if it's available at all. And that was quite true. Then later, around 1989, they actually had to introduce food rationing all over Russia but, again, Leningrad is a city of over four million people. That's a lot of people to feed. And so you had to have ration coupons in order to go and buy things like meat, milk, eggs, cheese and butter. In other words, the key items that you need to survive, with the exception of bread. You could usually find bread. And in the state stores where prices were set by the government, it was almost impossible to find basic staples—potatoes, cabbage, onions, and carrots. They were only available in the outdoor markets where prices were less controlled. The communist system was beginning to break down right in front of our eyes. We diplomats were given as many ration coupons as we wanted. There was no limit on the number that we could have, so we used to share them with our Russian friends, you know, to help them buy things. But then you had to find things to buy because the stores themselves were not supplied with a sufficient quantity of goods to meet consumer demands, even with rationing. Corruption became a big issue and at times you could get these grocery items only under the table, you know, by paying more than the going price and then your coupons didn't help very much. Our daughter Elizabeth was a student at Leningrad State University. She's a vegetarian and she relied on cheese and other dairy products for protein. Every day after classes, she would scour the city looking for cheese, yogurt and kefir;

she would queue up in long lines only to find maybe one kind of cheese, if that. Fortunately, we were able to supplement our diet with food ordered from Finland, so we were not in any way suffering as the Soviet people were at that time.

Q: This was before the real collapse of the Soviet system, but what was our analysis? Why after all these years? What was happening?

MILES: Well, we didn't know where this was going to lead. We could see clearly deterioration in the power at the center. The center was no longer holding. And by the way, while these conditions in Leningrad were bad, they were even worse in the military and on the naval ships. Sharon and I developed rather warm and friendly relations with the Soviet military in Leningrad. In general, U.S.-Soviet relations were not bad at that time; the Soviets had announced that they were going to withdraw from Afghanistan and this helped ease the tension between our two countries. Sharon and I and the staff of the Consulate General worked hard to develop relations across the board including with the local military there. Leningrad has always been an important military town. There is an air force base nearby, the naval base has a very long history going back several hundred years and Leningrad was home, as St. Petersburg is today, to the headquarters of the Leningrad Military District.

Q: This is tape five, side one, with Dick Miles. You were talking about the Soviet military?

MILES: Well, if I may say so, we got to know them pretty well, maybe, partly because of the absence of defense attachés. The only military people attached to the Consulate General were the six Marine security guards. The Soviet military didn't feel like we were trying to pry secrets out of them or anything. And after we did get to know them better, when we were in a position to have smaller meetings or to chat with the senior officers at a reception or an event of some sort, they would admit that they were having great difficulties feeding and housing their people. And even though the military establishments in the Soviet Union—and I think they still do this in Russia—actually have their own farms and their own dairies and so on, they were having trouble feeding their people and giving them an adequate diet, let alone housing them properly. Keep in mind, this was about the time that the Soviet forces in Germany, what was then called the Western Group of Forces, were beginning to come back to the Soviet Union. So, in north-west Russia, where the quality of life for the military people was already deteriorating, another several hundred thousand people were coming back from Germany and had to be housed and fed.

Q: Well, at the Embassy and the Consulate General, were we taking a look—was there the feeling that this whole place might implode or something like that? Or had this been going on for so long that the attitude was this was just the Soviet Union?

MILES: We could see a loss of control by the center and a great deterioration in the ability of the center to manipulate the economic system the way it had for the last 70 years but I don't think we foresaw, even at that late point, the pending collapse of the Soviet Union. We saw perhaps a kind of power struggle developing in which another strongman would rise and would use firmer measures to restore order and force people to improve the deliveries of food and other goods. The five year plans were still in operation and the linear economic system they had where X enterprise is supposed to make Y deliveries to Z enterprise at such and such a time—that was all still in place, but it just wasn't working. It was breaking down. For example, let's say you're in a factory that has—this is a real example that I witnessed with my own eyes— you're in a small factory that manufactured pots and pans for kitchen use. Well, the workers would be paid in pots and pans and on “payday” they would each take a cart full of pots and pans out on the highway and try to sell them to passersby. I mean, this was pretty damn pathetic. It was a breakdown of the system and that was not so clear politically as it was economically, but politically it began to be clear also.

There was a democratic opposition that grew and later we can talk about the Baltic States, which we also covered out of Leningrad, but in Leningrad itself, there had been an ecological movement which had been tolerated because in a sense it was politically neutral. The authorities underestimated its political potential. That ecological movement grew into a more organized democratic opposition involving different factions. It was not a terribly unified thing but the people involved were able to talk to each other and to work together. The authorities would sometimes allow them to meet and have their discussions and present their petitions, and sometimes the authorities would try to break up their public rallies and demonstrations, so it was kind of a tug of war that went on.

The first sign that things were changing in a serious, political sense came with the elections for the Supreme Soviet in the spring of 1989. Traditionally the First Secretary of the Leningrad Obkom [the Regional Party Committee], the Commander of the Leningrad Military District and people of that ilk would be elected as People's Deputies. They would then go off to the Supreme Soviet and vote as they were told and so on. Well, to make a long story short, and pretty much to everyone's surprise, they were not re-elected to the Supreme Soviet in that election.

I remember very well how I was called that day by a journalist, an American journalist from Moscow, who said that she had heard that some informal exit polling indicated that these big shots had not been re-elected to their positions in the Supreme Soviet. And with stereotypical State Department arrogance I said, “Well, I can assure you that even in the unlikely event that that has actually happened, the authorities will not allow it to be reported and these people will in fact be returned to the Supreme Soviet.” And the next day, I had to call her back and eat humble pie because it had been announced that these people had in fact not been returned to the Supreme Soviet and that members of the democratic opposition had been elected. It was an amazing thing, followed shortly by the forced resignation of the First Secretary of the Obkom, Yuriy Solovyev. I still can't believe that an honest election, and one on that scale, took place in the Soviet Union—but there you are!

Then that was followed about a year later by the election of the Leningrad City Soviet, the Leningrad city assembly. The leaders of many of the democratic organizations sometimes would meet in my residence in Leningrad. We had a palatial residence, really a lot of space, and they said that this is the only place big enough where all could come, and they said they also liked it because it was reasonably free of surveillance. Now, I'm sure there were bugs in the walls and all that, but there weren't KGB goons hanging around. They weren't in danger of being hassled by the police while they were there, so they liked to meet in our residence. They worked hard and they were certainly all over the place, holding election meetings, putting up posters, handing out leaflets and our people were in touch with them and giving them mild encouragement and more just trying to stay in touch with what was going on so we could make reasonable predictions to the Embassy in Moscow and to Washington, because the Consulate General had the authority to report directly to Washington. And lo and behold, the democrats took control of the City Soviet. It was an amazing thing really, less of a shock than the previous year's upset election of the Supreme Soviet deputies, but still startling enough.

And then the democrats had a problem because they couldn't agree among themselves about who should head the City Soviet. In other words, who should become the Mayor of Leningrad, a fairly important position? There was a prominent lawyer who taught at the Law Faculty, Anatoly Sobchak. I think he met Putin at Leningrad University because Putin, just back from his KGB assignment in Germany, had been assigned to the International Relations Office of the University. I met Putin at that time myself, when I enrolled our daughter Elizabeth as a student at LGU. I still have his business card with his name and title in that capacity. Sobchak had been one of the democrats who had earlier been elected to the Supreme Soviet. He had used the Supreme Soviet as a forum to speak out against some of the ills of Soviet society. He was quite an interesting man. Well, the democrats who now were in control of the city Soviet wanted him to become Mayor when they couldn't agree among themselves who in their ranks should have that position. So they asked him if he would run in a special election for a couple of unfilled seats on the city Soviet. You had to be a member of the city Soviet to be elected Mayor. He did, and they urged everyone to vote only for Sobchak so that he could be elected Mayor. And that, in fact, is what happened. He became an energetic, democratically-minded reform Mayor of this major city but, even more interesting; he brought Putin along as his economic advisor, even knowing that Putin was a KGB agent at that time. That was not uncommon in the former Soviet Union. And so that's the story of how Putin got his start in normal politics, and how I met Putin, and how Putin made his first step toward becoming President of all the Russias. Very interesting bit of history, really.

Q: Was this breakdown in the economy and all, was this a fairly recent phenomenon? I mean, was something happening or—?

MILES: I think these were the first really dark days since recovery after World War II. I mean, there were obviously some pretty hard times right after the war, '46, '47, you know, going from an economy on a war footing to a civilian economy while still trying to build up Soviet nuclear power and coping with the great loss of manpower during the war. The Soviet economy was always slightly warped in favor of the military sector but having said that, this was the first time in the memory of the people that I knew and spoke to, since those dark days of '46, '47 up until about 1950 or '51, that things had been so difficult.

Q: There must have been considerable apprehension, because this was a fairly recent phenomenon, wasn't it?

MILES: Yes, yes it was. It didn't go back very far.

Q: People must have thought, "My God, what's happening?"

MILES: Russians would say, “What are we going to do? What is going to happen to us?” Well, Russians are great survivors, and a number of people had dachas or access to private plots or friends in the country. Even in Leningrad it was not difficult for an ordinary person to have access to a small plot of land, maybe the size of this room or slightly larger, where you could grow some potatoes and onions and things like that. If you had a dacha, you could do even more of that. And then they tried hard, although it was not always practical—we’re talking about four million people or so, that’s a lot of people. Anyhow, you tried hard to develop ties to people in the country, relatives or friends or whatever, where you could get 50 kilos of potatoes or cabbage, some onions, maybe, and survive through the winter. So Russians had various ways to get by but, in those hard times, they were not getting by in a healthy way, and they had to spend an inordinate amount of time on these various food-getting schemes or standing in line waiting for nonexistent vegetables or meat or cheese. It was damned difficult for them.

This caused considerable angst but I don’t think there was fear of famine. Agricultural conditions themselves were normal and people knew that the produce was there, but they could also see that the supply system had broken down. Generally bread was available. I don’t recall a shortage of bread. That was reassuring to Slavs because bread is a crucial part of every meal and in a way you can live on bread, at least for a while. But there was day to day concern, that’s for sure.

My wife, Sharon, was home one day when a neighbor came knocking at the door. It was a rather scrawny, older man with a British accent. He introduced himself as Victor Zorza and he asked Sharon if she happened to have any yogurt because his doctor had recommended it and he couldn’t find any in Leningrad due to the conditions at that time. Now, I expect that Sharon and I were probably the only people in the entire city of Leningrad who knew who Victor Zorza was. Maybe they would have recognized him at the British Consulate General if there had been one, but there wasn’t. Victor told us later that he had knocked at our door just because he saw the flag hanging from the second floor balcony and it had attracted him. Zorza had been a rather well-known syndicated columnist, working out of the Washington Post. I used to read him but stopped due to his rather virulent anti-organized labor pieces, but I always respected his insightful and well-drafted pieces on foreign affairs. Well, we became good friends there in Leningrad and, through him, we organized one of the first ever fundraising musical evenings held in the city since the October Revolution. Victor’s daughter had died in a hospice in England and he had come to Leningrad to start a hospice there in her memory. To my knowledge there was no hospice in the entire Soviet Union at that time. His daughter had been good friends with the famous pianist, Vladimir Ashkenazy, and Victor prevailed on Ashkenazy to come to Leningrad for the sole purpose of playing at a benefit concert in our residence. We invited all the political, military and cultural big shots but, more important, we invited the Leningrad “Captains of Industry”. I remember some of them saying to me, “We’re happy to give you money, but we have never done this before. How much do you think is appropriate?” And, off the top of my head, simply thinking about how big their enterprise was, I would say, “Oh, $5000, $10,000,” you know, whatever I thought the traffic would bear.

I happened to be near Ashkenazy and a small crowd of acolytes from the Leningrad musical world the afternoon of the concert. He didn’t know I was there. Ashkenazy sat down at the piano, started to play something and then drew back, saying—in Russian— “Playing this piano is like driving a tractor!” Admittedly, it was an old piano, but it was well-tuned and, of course, he played brilliantly that evening. He is a lovely man. We have seen him a few times subsequently, in Berlin and in Washington, and he always remembers that event in Leningrad.

There is an interesting follow-on story. We had placed a huge silver punch bowl on a chest of drawers at the head of the entry stairs. People deposited envelopes with cash or pledges and we really did raise a lot of money. I told Victor I would lock all this up in the safe at the residence and he could take it to the bank the next day. Well, after everyone had gone, about 11:30 that evening, Victor and I went to collect everything from the punchbowl. The young man that Victor had asked to guard the bowl was gone and so was all the cash! Victor was beside himself. Anyhow, we called the police, they went to the young man's apartment that very evening and found him and the cash. I guess he had never seen so much money in his life and he simply couldn't resist the temptation.

Q: How did these people who were well-placed in Soviet society view the changing situation there in Leningrad?

MILES: They were probably concerned not only at the dreadful economic conditions but also at the deterioration of their authority—the fact that they didn't enjoy the same kind of respect they used to have, that their orders were not carried out with the same alacrity. When they asked for things to be done or even demanded that things be done, this didn't always happen. It must have worried the hell out of them, but I confess I know less about this phenomenon. I knew the Obkom First Secretary. I knew the managers of the major industrial enterprises, the military commanders, the KGB chief, the Chief of Police and so forth but, frankly, this was something we didn't talk about very much. I had a decent relationship with these people but trying to talk to them about this would have not gone over well. I could do it only obliquely. For example, I visited the shipyards and saw what they were doing to try to convert to civilian production. That was a sad day, by the way. Here they were, management and workers alike, proud builders of beautiful war ships—the guided missile cruiser Peter the Great was still being fitted out at the dock—and what were they showing me? Electric pelmeni [like ravioli] cookers. Maybe it was unpatriotic, but I genuinely shared their dismay.

Q: From the viewpoint of Leningrad and reporting on it, how was Gorbachev viewed when you got there?

MILES: Well, it was clear that he was putting things in motion that were upsetting to the people in power. He forced the resignation of the Leningrad Obkom First Secretary and forced the election of a political nonentity to replace him. This caused some grumbling in Party ranks. But, again, the leadership didn't talk about this very much. Actually Gorbachev didn't come to Leningrad often. I don't suppose he came to Leningrad more than two or three times during the three years I was there. And the diplomats—there were 14 consuls general there—and we were never invited to meet with Gorbachev. It was always considered an internal political thing and we were not included in those visits. So I never met Gorbachev at that time. I only met him later when I went back to Moscow in 1993. Anyhow, I don't know exactly what ordinary people thought of his reforms. I suppose they felt this was a breath of fresh air but they probably didn't know exactly where all this was going.

Q: I was wondering whether—

MILES: They certainly appreciated the freedom of the media. Leningrad TV was out ahead of the state TV in Moscow, for example, and was broadcasting some very interesting things indeed. And Leningrad TV was viewed all over the Soviet Union. So I know that people appreciated that and they attributed that to Gorbachev.

Q: How did you deal with that? I mean, did you have good ties with the media?

MILES: Yes. I would give interviews and, in contrast to the past, these interviews would be printed or shown on TV. I gave one very lengthy and rather personal interview which took up a whole page in Izvestiya, which had a circulation of something like twenty million! I still hear about that interview from my Russian friends. I guess that was my personal “fifteen minutes of fame”. And I appeared on television. I remember there was a famous plan put forward by an economist named Shatalin, the “500 Day Plan”, in which the Soviet economy could be completely reformed in 500 days. I was asked to appear on a television talk show to discuss that plus the history of the development of capitalism in the United States. That TV appearance turned out to have its funny side, and this shows you the freshness of Leningrad television, not to mention their audacity. On this program, the host would ask me a question and I would pontificate about this or that. It was informal, but I had my suit and tie on, very much the Consul General. Well, when the program was shown, the editors had interspersed my serious bits with little snippets from various movies, like Liza Minnelli and Joel Grey in Cabaret, singing the song about “money makes the world go round”, and dropping coins down into Joel Grey’s underpants and stuff like that. And then on the tape I would be asked another serious question and I would—I don’t think I was pompous but I was certainly serious—and I would be asked about Shatalin’s plan and I would say, “Well, 500 days is not much time to reform the communist command economy, is it?” You know, this and that, and then they would—they asked me about violence in the capitalist world and I said, “Well, sometimes in our early days, the robber barons would apply strong-arm methods and all, but we have outgrown that and it has been exaggerated anyhow.” In other words, typical, pious Foreign Service answers. And on the taped program, they followed that particular comment with a cut from the movie The Cotton Club, where a bunch of gangsters go into the club and machine gun down about 100 people plus tables, chairs, mirrors, bottles of liquor and chandeliers. When I saw the program on Leningrad TV, I thought it was hilarious. I thought, this is very clever journalism. And I never got burned for that inadvertent comedy act; the Department just took it as a reflection of the new times.

Sharon and I did an enormous amount of entertaining at the residence, and it was always well covered by television. One particularly memorable event occurred with Mstislav Rostropovich brought the National Symphony to Leningrad. This was Rostropovich’s first visit to the Soviet Union since 1974 when he left and was later stripped of his citizenship. The concert they performed at the theater was sold out and there were hundreds of people outside the theater. Loudspeakers were placed outside so those who couldn’t get in could hear the concert. The audience went wild; they kept calling him back for encore after encore. Finally the concert ended and we adjourned to a large reception at our residence. Rostropovich arrived, sat down at our piano—the one that Ashkenazy had said was like driving a tractor—and belted out The Star Spangled Banner. I know that he performs this from time to time, but in this venue it had real special meaning. There wasn't a dry eye in the house.

Q: You were there when the Berlin Wall came down?

MILES: Yes, I was. That's right.

Q: How did that, I mean, was that seen as a seminal event or not?

MILES: Well, there were some related things. You remember, there was a large number of people who wandered across from either the border of Czechoslovakia or Hungary, I don't remember, exactly.

Q: Yes, they ended up in a West German compound and all.

MILES: Well, again, I think it was taken as this loss of Soviet power, this deterioration of the system and it lent itself to an air of confusion more than apprehension. There was a feeling that things were changing, that they, the Russians, were part of this change. "We don't know where it is going to end and we hope it's for the better, but it might not be for the better." But, yes, everyone was fascinated by that for sure. But at that time the Russians didn't exactly apply what they knew was happening in Berlin to themselves. They didn't think, well, gee, if they can do that in Germany, we can do it in Russia. I don't believe that thought of a fundamental change in the system really crossed too many minds. It was more like, Germany is Germany and a long way from us; we have more immediate problems, like where are we going to get something for our kids to eat tonight.

Q: Who was our Ambassador in Moscow?

MILES: It was Jack Matlock.

Q: How did Matlock use you and what was the relationship?

MILES: I was given a very strong, a very free hand and I appreciated that very much. Jack and I are quite different people but I worked for him three times in my career and we always got along very well. I respect him very much. His intellect, his language skills and his scholarship raise him way beyond the level of the average diplomat.

I used to go down to Moscow periodically and report in, you know, attend the country team meeting, and meet with the Ambassador and with others. Usually I would stay with Matlock in Spaso House and we would talk at breakfast. Then I would make the rounds in the Embassy and then go on back to Leningrad. Basically we were doing a good job of reporting what was going on in Leningrad and he just wanted to be sure that we had everything we needed in the way of resources and that we were covering things adequately which I believe we were.

I did try hard to keep Embassy Moscow civilians out of the Baltic States. You remember our policy at that time was that the U.S. Ambassador was not allowed to visit the Baltic States. This was because the United States never recognized the incorporation of the Baltic States into the Soviet Union. Ever since the War, the Consul General in Leningrad was the highest level American official who was allowed to go there. When I went there, I would fly the American flag on the car so that everyone would know that I was there. Of course, I had no problem with the defense attachés from the Embassy going. I just wanted to know when they were going and what they intended to do there, so we worked that out easily enough. But as for the Embassy civilians, people from the Political Section or the Economic Section or whatever, I told Matlock and he sort of grudgingly agreed, that we could best handle that kind of reporting out of the Consulate General and that I did not want to complicate our sometimes delicate lines of communication over in the Baltics by tripping over every Tom, Dick and Harry from the Embassy. The Embassy people, the people in the reporting sections, wanted desperately to go over there because a lot of things were happening in the Baltics and they wanted to observe it and report on it.

We had a crackerjack team of people working at the Consulate General, mostly young officers but a few mid-career people. Our front office was managed by an amazingly resourceful and hard-working person, Linda Price, who later would accompany me to three embassies when I became Ambassador. And three of the officers later became ambassadors themselves.

Q: Okay. Let's talk about the Baltic States and what was happening while you were there.

MILES: Well, all hell was breaking loose. I can't give you a precise timeline for each country, but the spirit of nationalism and even of independence was definitely in the air. Each one of the three separate Baltic States—and they are really quite different, their languages are different, they represent different cultures, they look to different foreign influences in their history, and so on. But in any case, each one of them had a pretty well developed nationalist, opposition movement. And, again, I don't recall, I would have really have to do some research to come up with the exact chronology, but the nationalists had seized control of the Estonian parliament and established checkpoints to keep Russians from coming in and ousting them. In Lithuania, Russian tanks had actually surrounded the parliament building which the Lithuanian nationalists had taken over. This was a very dangerous situation which could easily have come to an armed confrontation. For months, you had the Soviet tanks surrounding the parliament building with their guns pointed inward at the building. Then you had check points near the entrances to the building, manned by nationalists with red armbands and rifles and shotguns over their shoulder. When you went into the building there would be these sleepy guys sitting around, you know, asleep in an armchair or something with a rifle, a hunting rifle or a shotgun propped up on their lap. Always a fuggy atmosphere in there—the air was full of cigarette smoke, dirty coffee cups everywhere and so on. I thought it had a certain resemblance to the Smolny Institute in 1917.

Those were very dramatic days and as the situation heated up around, I suppose 1990, I began to go over increasingly often. At this time, the National Security Council—through the State Department—asked us to keep a continuous presence in each one of the Baltic States, which was damned difficult because I had a very small staff. For security reasons, we always sent two officers at a time and at least one of them had to come back to Leningrad periodically and write the reports. Consequently there was a lot of pressure from the working stiffs in the Embassy in Moscow to use that as an excuse to send their political officers and their economic officers over to “help out”. I didn’t want that to happen because I wanted to maintain a fairly tight control on what our people were doing in the Baltics and what we were reporting. So what I did was to ask non-POL/ECON officers to take part in all this to help stretch our manpower. So, the Public Affairs Officer or his deputy would go over, the Administrative Officer or the General Services Officer would go over; if they had a diplomatic passport, I threw them into the fray. They would report dramatic developments that might be taking place by phone. The KGB allowed that—probably because, in that way, they would know what we had been able to find out. But in order to do a real report back to Washington, the officers had to come back and write their cable out in longhand and send it up to Helsinki by courier to be typed in Helsinki and sent out that way. You see, our security system in Leningrad had been compromised some time before. Of course, at all overseas locations, we were told to assume that, with the exception of a few “cleared” spaces, the buildings we occupied were subject to penetration by hostile—or even friendly—foreign intelligence agencies, all the more so in the Soviet Union. While I was Consul General, a TDY security engineer actually discovered the listening devices which had been embedded in the construction materials in the walls of our building ever since its modernization 15 years or earlier. As an immediate result, we lost our ability to type and transmit classified material. We could send unclassified stuff out of Leningrad but classified reports had to be written down by hand and then carried up to Helsinki by diplomatic courier. We had a dedicated secretary up there and the poor woman had to struggle with our sometimes hurriedly written messages, full of foreign names and places in four different languages, and produce the classified reports which Washington and Embassy Moscow were eagerly waiting for.

Q: How did you get it to Helsinki?

MILES: We had couriers who would go back and forth. Helsinki was good enough to send people down most of the time to take care of these classified bags. I think they got a kick out of it—sort of like a visit to the front lines. And also we were sending our people up to Helsinki periodically to pick up our regular mail. Anyone with a diplomatic passport can be designated as a diplomatic courier to carry classified material on a specific trip. We were used to that arrangement because we had always carried the unclassified diplomatic pouch and the personal mail bag back and forth from Helsinki.

Q: How were you received by the Estonians, Latvians and Lithuanians?

MILES: Oh, they loved these demonstrations of support. I mean, they loved nothing more than to see that big American car with the flag come rolling up between the tanks in Lithuania, for example. And frankly, even some of the communist politicians were feeling the spirit of the times. I remember talking to Arnold Rüütel who held the highest position in the political structure of Estonia at that time. We had a good relationship and I always saw him when I went to Estonia. I remember going out of his office once and walking around in the garden with him; he showed me a pistol he kept in his pocket. And he said, “You know, this isn’t going to be like 1940 when the Soviets occupied our country. We know what happened then and this time I’m not going to go without a fight!” It was a very moving moment, and frankly all I could offer Rüütel and people like that was moral support. The official U.S. policy was always to support the independence of the Baltic States and we were certainly consistent in that regard. But we also had to be careful not to make false promises to the nationalist leaders. If the Soviet authorities had decided to crush these nationalist movements by force, and that was a very real possibility, there was not a hell of a lot which the United States could have done about it. So I was reasonably discreet in what I was doing and I made sure that my officers understood the delicate role we were playing. But we were certainly showing support for these national aspirations of the people in the Baltics and I think that is what Washington liked. Washington wanted to be able to say—for example, if the Soviet government had protested our activities in the Baltic States, Washington could have said, quite honestly, “Well, Miles doesn’t have orders to do this; he’s just doing this on his own. We’ll talk to him about it and calm him down.” But in the absence of that criticism from Moscow, which never came, by the way, Washington was happy enough to be able to tell the Baltic-Americans here in the United States—constituents who vote—that the Consul General is over there, he’s showing the flag, literally. He’s in touch with the nationalist leaders. We are doing everything we can to stay on top of this situation.

So everybody was happy pretty much, except, I suppose, the Soviet authorities, but the Soviet authorities never complained. Well, they had a lot on their hands at that time—economic collapse, unrest in Azerbaijan, in Georgia. It was an amazing time.

Q: Would you, for example with the tanks surrounding the Lithuanian parliament building, I mean, would you just drive up there and say here I am?

MILES: Yes, although I admit, this was always a nerve-wracking experience.

Q: Well, this was a provocative act.

MILES: Well, it was a provocative act. And, again, because of the breakdown of the previous system of control, the Finnish Television was often there and Leningrad Television was often there. They would photograph me doing this and it would be shown on television—and, again, no protest from the Soviet authorities.

There were several messages here. First of all, the Soviet authorities were allowing this to happen, they allowed me to do it and then they allowed the video people to be there and film it, and most amazing, they allowed it to be shown. Truly amazing. And I don’t understand it to this day except I think people in positions of higher authority realized that times were changing and they were afraid of being on the wrong side. And Moscow center—the government, the Politburo, the organs of force—was not issuing firm instructions. And out in the field, with some very dramatic and bloody exceptions, the Soviet political, police and military authorities didn’t know what to do. Maybe the officials and officers on the spot were afraid of taking unauthorized action and being punished by their own leaders. Well, I really don’t know what they were thinking sitting in their offices or in those tanks. Of course, this ambiguous situation was not without its dangers.

In January 1991 I had three officers, an unusually large number, who happened to be in Riga, Latvia, when a rather famous incident occurred. This was right after the violence that had already occurred around the television tower in Lithuania.

Q: They sent some special Soviets, except—

MILES: They were special police; they were the so-called OMON [Otryad Militsii Osobogo Naznacheniya] police units, which were kind of like a SWAT team—guys with black ski masks over their faces who were not terribly concerned with human rights or anything like that. Well, I guess some of them just became incensed over these nationalist activities that were taking place so they went on a little bit of a rampage. It was never clear to me to what degree this was sanctioned by a local commander, let alone by anybody in Moscow. I don't think that Gorbachev ordered it. If Moscow had ordered something like this up, it would have been on a bigger scale. But in any case, these fellows came rampaging into one of the streets in downtown Riga. At one end of the street—it was a street about three blocks long bordering a park. A hotel was on one side of the street near one end; the Ministry of Justice or of Interior, I don't recall which, was at the other end. They opened fire on the Ministry building with automatic weapons and also managed to kill some people in an adjacent park. It wasn't clear why they were shooting at the people in the park. Maybe the people in the park were killed accidentally; I don't know. Anyhow several people died that night.

Then they came up the street to the hotel where our people were staying; this was in the evening, after dark, as I remember. Well, as luck would have it, the President of Latvia was having a private dinner back in the recesses of the hotel. One of the OMON fellows came in to the lobby of the hotel with his automatic weapon. My officers were up on the mezzanine behind some glass panels, and the President's bodyguard had just come out from the room where the President was having dinner to see what was going on, all this shooting and all, and he happened to be up on the mezzanine with his pistol out when the OMON fellow came into the hotel lobby. I'm not sure who opened fire first. Happily neither of them hit anyone. The OMON fellow opened fire with his AK-47, kind of spraying a whole string of rounds up the staircase and onto the mezzanine area. My officers were up there on the relatively small mezzanine where, thank God, there was a large square column, so they formed a kind of a snake line behind that column where they were reasonably protected from this automatic weapons fire.

When they came back to Leningrad, I had our people print up a little badge for them on a laminated plastic card with a pin on it and it read, "Diplomat Hero, Third Class"—for coming under hostile, communist fire in Riga, Latvia, on such and such a day. And I signed it and gave it to them at a staff meeting. I think it was the best award they ever got in their lives. And they asked, "What do you have to do in order to get Second Class?" I said, "Well, for Second Class, you have to be wounded." And they said, "OK. What do you have to do to get First Class?" I said, "First Class is only awarded posthumously." They said, "We'll take Third Class!" True story.

Q: We were pretty much just plain observers to this, weren't we?

MILES: We were observers and providing mild encouragement. We never sat down with the nationalist leaders and planned out what they should do next, what provocative act they should do next or anything like that. But we would say things like, "The White House—we'll make sure that the White House is informed of your activities. Everyone is very proud of you. You are a great credit to your nation. We wish you the best of luck and we'll see you again next week." It would be more like that.

Q: Were we concerned, you know, sort of with the 1956 Hungarian uprising and all that we weren't getting too — pushing revolutionaries too far, who would then end up in harm's way? Was this—?

MILES: It was always on my mind and I didn't want to put the American government in that fix again. I felt that we successfully walked that fine line. I was certainly aware of the 1956 events; I didn't want to lend them any false hopes. And so sometimes when they would talk about declarations of independence or whatever, I'd say, "Look, the U.S. policy doesn't recognize your incorporation into the Soviet Union but we do believe in a peaceful resolution of these issues." I urged them to maintain the peaceful evolution of their nationalist aspirations. I tried really hard not to lead them out on some kind of a limb that might break and which we could not support.

Q: How about the other, particularly Western powers: Germans, Brits, French and all. Were they involved in it or what were they up to?

MILES: They would come periodically, including people from their Embassies, because in Leningrad those Consulates General were very tiny—much smaller than ours. The Brits didn't even have a Consulate General in Leningrad. The others would have maybe two or three officers in Leningrad and they would spend most their time doing consular or commercial work. Sometimes they would visit the Baltics but they would more often send in people from their embassies in Moscow. So, they would come periodically and our officers in the field would usually meet with them and compare notes.

Q: Were the Finns—how active were they?

MILES: Quite active, more so than the others. And they had very good people in Leningrad.

Q: At that time could you differentiate between Estonians, Latvians and Lithuanians?

MILES: Oh, quite. In fact, I think almost the only time when there was anything like a unified movement was this famous human chain that they formed; I think it was in the fall of 1989. I had been invited down to Vilnius by a Lithuanian fellow I had met at Harvard who wanted me to observe the human chain. So Sharon and I went down together to do that. And when we arrived on the scene with our friend, he, of course, joined it, and everyone said to us, you must join too. I thought that was maybe pushing the envelope. I didn't go down there in order to do that and I didn't think that this was really appropriate behavior for a diplomat, but quite frankly, in the circumstances, I didn't see any way not to do it. It was all linked hands, you see, all the way across the three Baltic States and you could see the KGB people driving up and down the street taking photographs and video, so when I would see them coming along, I would raise my hand and my friend's hand or Sharon's hand to cover my face or turn aside so that at least I would not be emblazoned all over the TV or whatever. But, you know, the Soviets never complained about that, not even to our Ambassador privately, and I didn't make a big deal out of it. I never mentioned it to any of the nationalist leaders. I didn't feel comfortable doing that, to tell you the truth; I thought that was going a little bit too far for a diplomat, but I just didn't see a way out of it at the time. And that was about the only demonstration that I saw of concerted activity among the three.

In fact, you could see the opposite phenomenon. Believe it or not, as the independence movement continued to develop momentum, toll gates and customs houses began to appear on the major highways connecting the different Baltic states. Now, this was pretty silly. Technically, these were just administrative borders; I mean there hadn't been national borders there since 1940. Anyhow, someone—the local authorities, I guess—began to put up these little World War II-type customs houses with the diagonally striped paint, because they really wanted to demonstrate their “sovereignty”. So they immediately erected customs barriers—basically against each other. That was one of the first things they did as “national” entities.

I remember in Lithuania once, when things were looking particularly dark, I was asked to help one of the members of the nationalist “government” to leave Lithuania and go abroad to form a government in exile in case the communist authorities clamped down on the Lithuanians. And I said to Landsbergis, Vytautas Landsbergis, who was the chairman of the nationalist parliament of Lithuania—effectively, he was the nationalist President of the country. I said, “I’m very reluctant to take someone out in my official car with the flag flying. I’m not sure the situation is sufficiently dire that I would want to do that, but I would like to help in some way. What else might I do?” And he asked, “Where were you planning to go when you leave Lithuania?” And I said, “I have meetings scheduled in Riga. I’m going to drive up there.” He said, “I’ll talk to our friends in Riga to take in this member of my cabinet and try to get him abroad. You won’t need to have anything to do with it, but would you ride with him in my official car if I send it up there? It would be a measure of protection for him and you would be accompanying him rather than him accompanying you.” That seemed reasonable to me, rather clever, actually, and so I did that. We left that night. And we had no problem. We weren’t stopped by anyone; we went on up, in Landsbergis’ big Zil limousine, and my companion—it was Emanuelis Zingeris—dropped me off at my hotel in Riga. He went on abroad but the need to form a government in exile did not materialize and he soon returned to Lithuania. So that was an example when there was cooperation between the nationalist authorities in Lithuania and in Latvia. But I would say that was a relatively rare thing. Basically, as far as I could tell, each one was operating on a little different basis—along similar lines, but reading about each others’ activities pretty much in the media and then maybe letting that influence their own activities or not. The Estonians, while they certainly had their difficulties and their fears, because they were very near Leningrad but very near Finland too, and were a much smaller population, probably a million-and-a-half—and half of that ethnic Russians—so they were in a little tighter, dicier situation. They actually signed a treaty of sorts with the Soviet Union and as a result they were not subject to the same degree of armed pressure that the people in Latvia and the people in Lithuania were.

Q: Did the Estonian and Lithuanian and Latvian communities in the United States play any role? Were you getting people coming back at that time or not?

MILES: Not much of a role. There were a couple of expats there who had come back to help out in this nationalist revival that was taking place; one was later accused of being a KGB informant, in fact. I don’t know what the truth was in that case. But no, not at that time, not a whole lot. A wave of people returned after the collapse of the Soviet Union and some were elected or appointed to positions of pretty high authority, including President in one case and Minister of Defense in another. But at the time I was there, there were very few such people playing a political role; you could count them on the fingers of one hand.

Q: What were you getting from the Russians in Leningrad about these developments?

MILES: It was quite interesting; that's a good question. I didn't bother asking the authorities about this because I knew what the answer would be. But what I got from the democratic Russians was very interesting. It was basically, "We don't really care what happens over there. They have never considered themselves part of the Soviet Union; they were reluctant members of the Russian empire. Lenin himself let them go back in 1918. We really don't care." But then they would add gratuitously, "We do care about Crimea!" They were quite exercised about Crimea, which Khrushchev had given away to Ukraine, you remember. And people in Leningrad felt much more strongly about the fact that Russia no longer possessed Crimea than they did about the fact that they had pretty much lost control in the Baltic States. It was quite interesting. And Estonia was no more than 50 miles from Leningrad, quite near, but it could have been on the moon as far as the people in Leningrad were concerned.

I had a memorable Fourth of July event in my residence. Actually, that year I had two Fourth of July events; this must have been in 1990 although it could have been 1991. Sharon and I had a pre-July Fourth sit-down dinner to which we invited the presidents and the foreign ministers of the nationalist governments in each of the three Baltic States and I think most of them came. That was a very emotional day, I must say. Lots of heartfelt toasts to liberty and freedom. We invited a few Russians but not very many; only people that we knew would not be offended by all that was going on. And we invited some of the Leningrad-based diplomats and my own people, of course. There were some really very emotional remarks that were made on their part about their gratitude for the measure of support which we had shown them and which the United States had always shown them and the fact that we were here celebrating the American independence and so forth. So that went over very well indeed. I didn't clear this with the State Department beforehand because I doubted that they would approve, although they liked our reporting cable on the event. The next day I had my regular Fourth of July reception for the officials and the people from Leningrad itself.

Q: Did these states become independent? That was after your—

MILES: I would have to do my research but they had declared their renewed independence. See, they felt they always had been independent, that they had been illegally taken over and puppet governments had been established. But they did issue declarations of renewed independence even while the Soviet Union was still in existence. But I would have to check the facts to see which state did what and when, exactly.

Q: Okay. Well then, Dick, did you want to put anything in here? What else do you want to talk about on this period of time?

MILES: Well, let me think about that.

Q: Okay.

MILES: We just haven't quite finished that.

Q: Because we haven't quite finished. We've been talking about the Baltics.

MILES: Yes. And I'd like to say a few words about the coup attempt—the putsch, as it's called—which occurred in the fall of '91 after I left. I think the prior activities of the Consulate General played a positive role in helping to form the Leningrad reaction to the putsch.

Q: Okay, today is the 3rd of May, 2007. Dick, well, do you want to talk about the—.

MILES: Just to close out the conversation of a couple of weeks ago. While I had left Leningrad in the summer of '91, I followed very closely the events that occurred there and I wished I were there, of course. These events were pretty exciting. And Leningrad, I do believe, having read a lot about it and having gone back and talked to some of the Russians who were leaders in Leningrad at that time, I think Leningrad helped to keep the Soviet Union heading toward a democratic solution of its many problems. The Deputy Mayor of Leningrad, Vyacheslav Shcherbakov, was a good man. He was a former nuclear submarine commander and had eventually reached the rank of Admiral. I had many useful and serious conversations with him while I was still in Leningrad. I loved his comment on the Chernobyl disaster: “The Chernobyl reactor was safe enough, but they [the engineers] acted as though they were tending a samovar!” He was conservative, as you can imagine, but he was very intelligent and was an independent thinker. He was still important in the Communist Party apparatus and my understanding is that, in the early hours of the putsch, he played a big role in convincing the Commander of the Leningrad Military District, General Samsonov, to stop the tanks that had begun to move toward the city in accordance with the orders that had come from Moscow. Samsonov, who I also knew and liked, was initially on the side of the conspirators in Moscow.

Now, the democratic Mayor, Sobchak, was out of town at the time. According to one account, Putin played a role in finding him and bringing him back to Leningrad. According to another firsthand account, Shcherbakov did this. I don't know which version is correct; most likely, they worked together. In any case, if Shcherbakov had gone along with Samsonov—who, after all, had the tanks at his disposal—if he had gone along with the request of the putsch leaders and had brought the KGB and the Ministry of Internal Affairs people along with him, it might have been quite a different story for Mr. Yeltsin and the crowd down in Moscow. Leningrad is the second largest city in Russia, it's a huge city, and because of the significance of what the Leningrad leaders did in defying the coup leadership, and all of this was covered on Leningrad television, pretty much everyone nationwide was aware that in Leningrad there was serious opposition to the coup attempt. I do believe that this was very important to Yeltsin and the leaders of the opposition in Moscow and encouraged them to stand fast there as well. The whole history of the world might have changed if things had gone a little bit differently.

During my time in Leningrad all of us on the Consulate General team worked very hard to cultivate the liberal democratic crowd and the nationalist Estonian, Latvian and Lithuanian leaders. As Americans this was the natural thing for us to do but we also cultivated the conservative crowd—the Army, the Navy, the Police and the KGB chief. I believe I was the first American Consul General to call on the KGB chief in Leningrad, maybe the first to call on the head of the Ministry of Internal Affairs there in Leningrad, in other words the Chief of Police, in Leningrad and so on. Sharon and I became good friends of the Colonel, later General, in charge of the City Garrison—a historically and militarily significant post. People like this and their spouses had been to our residence, not once but many times. So we didn't just spend our time talking to people we agreed with. We spent a lot of time talking to people that we did not necessarily agree with. They would come to the residence for receptions and lunches and dinners, concerts, film showings, fashion shows and whatnot, and their wives would come. I very well remember one time when I got a copy of the Schwarzenegger film, Red Heat, and showed it to the brass of the Leningrad Ministry of Internal Affairs. We had a great movie theater right in the residence with synchronized 16 and 35mm projectors in a sound booth. An MVD General even came down from Moscow to see this movie. His comment? “We changed that style of epaulets last year.” And, “That's a ridiculous pistol. We don't use anything like that.” This, despite my best effort ahead of time to remind everyone that this was a Hollywood movie and did not necessarily reflect reality either in America or in the Soviet Union. The General did loosen up over drinks after the movie.

I mean, it was a different—it was a very dramatic time in the Soviet Union at that moment. I think, and in fact Sharon and I have often talked about it, and I do believe that even though I have been ambassador or chief of mission four times, principal officer six times, if you will—I still think that the consulate general assignment, 1988 to 1991, was the best that I ever had. Those were exciting times. We had an excellent team there and I think we were doing the right thing.

Q: You were mentioning all the time Leningrad. Was it called Leningrad when you were there?

MILES: Yes. Public opinion was divided on the issue of whether to change it. There was a reputable public opinion poll that was taken after the democrats took control of the Leningrad city Soviet—while it was still the Soviet Union, in other words. And in that poll, as I recall, it was something like 55 percent preferred to keep the name Leningrad while 45 percent would like to have seen it go back to St. Petersburg. And the reason is World War II. Everyone knows about the blockade of Leningrad and the incredible suffering of the population. It was not the Blockade of St. Petersburg. It was the Blockade of Leningrad.

Q: The 900 days of—

MILES: Yes. Well, it's known even in the West let alone in Leningrad itself. The name “Leningrad” itself was just part of their fabric, their very being, so it was not an easy thing for them to agree to change. But I forget exactly when it was changed. It was either after the failed putsch or a little later after the collapse of the Soviet Union; I just don't recall. At any rate, soon after I left, within six months after I left, the citizenry had changed their mind. The majority now favored changing the name and the Leningrad city Soviet agreed to change the name to St. Petersburg. Although I believe that neither the Leningrad Military District nor the Leningrad Oblast' [the region around St. Petersburg] has changed their title.

Q: Well now, you left there when?

MILES: I don't recall exactly: the summer of '91. I think it was July of '91.

ROBERT L. BARRY
Soviet Refugee Program
Washington, DC (1988-1992)

Ambassador Barry was born and raised in Pennsylvania. He attended Dartmouth College, Oxford University, St. Anthony's College, and Columbia. He served in the US Navy and entered the Foreign Service in 1962. He served in Yugoslavia, the USSR, Sweden, and Indonesia. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1996.

Q: WorldNet being, could you explain what WorldNet is?

BARRY: It was a worldwide television broadcast and the television was fed by satellite to local television stations around the world who could pick off what they wanted from the satellite and replay it on their own television stations. So, a lot of the content was press conferences, speeches by prominent public figures and things like that. It would be broadcast from studios in Washington, it would be sent by television and picked up there.

Q: Not terribly interesting.

BARRY: Not terribly, no, it all depended on the willingness of other stations to use the material.

Q: Well, then you did this really for about two and a half years?

BARRY: About two years I guess. Then the Bush administration came in and as usual there was a full-scale changeover in the State Department. So, I went to see the new undersecretary for management Ivan Selin. I said, "Look I've been over there at VOA for two years. I don't want to spend the rest of my life there. I don't know anybody now in the hierarchy in the State Department. I think I could be of some use. What I would really like to do eventually is go to Moscow, as ambassador, but you know, in the meantime, could you find something for me?" So, he gave me a special project, which was to change the way in which we processed refugees from the USSR. That was at the time when they were allowing large scale Jewish emigration and most of these people, although they might have applied for an exit visa to go to Israel, really wanted to go to the U.S. We had moved a very large number of the several tens of thousands of them to a place in Italy where they were held while INS went through its endless process of trying to figure out who was eligible, who could come in and Selin said, "Well, we've got to stop that. It's costing too much. We need to process them in Moscow." The embassy in Moscow didn't think this was feasible. The immigration service was certainly against it, but I was given this, perhaps because of my success with TV Marti, as a project and spent the next several months trying to do this. That was the time that the embassy in Moscow had this fire and it was being rebuilt; we structured the embassy so that we had this huge area where you could interview several dozens of people at the same time. We found a lot of people who were retired Foreign Service people who went back there and took on these interviewing jobs. We hired an outside contractor to do all this and eventually it worked. I remember once overhearing a discussion between some people from the Bureau of Consular Affairs and INS saying this was absolute nonsense, it will never, never work. Selin was also a determined kind of person. Of course, the OMB and everybody else was for it because it was going to save us a lot of money. As I say, eventually it worked. We got through a backlog of people we didn't have to send them to Italy anymore. It required some negotiation with the Soviets about the extension of these peoples' exit visas because it sometimes couldn't be done over the period of two or three months that they usually give you exit visas for.

Then in 1990 I had just been given the job of chief negotiator for the Open Skies Treaty. In the meantime, the wall had come down and the Congress had put together, a big package of aid for Eastern European democracies, the SEED Act, which involved several hundred million dollars of assistance each year. Larry Eagleburger was Deputy Secretary at that point. I had written a memo to Ivan Selin saying, "You can't handle this money through this traditional AID bureaucracy. They've never done this kind of thing. You need to have a dedicated office working on this project." Eagleburger was the coordinator of the whole thing along with the deputy secretary of the treasury and the chairman of the council of economic advisors. Selin passed my memo on to Eagleburger who bought off on it and made me the head of the Office of Eastern European Assistance reporting to the deputy secretary. We organized that. We got a bunch of talented people, many of them quite junior, but also some colleagues from before who'd been on the delegation in Stockholm and we set up this office. The first thing we did was say to AID, look you've got this idea that you're going to send retired AID employees to make a needs assessment in Eastern Europe. What are they going to do? They're going to go to the U.S. embassy and say, "Well, what do you think they need here." It's going to take you almost a year and in the meantime Congress is going to say, "Where is the money going?", so "Why don't you just drop that whole thing? Cut out the middle man, don't hire the retired AID employees and we can tell you what they need because we'll go directly to the embassies and to the governments concerned and come up with projects for you to spend the money on." I mean, they didn't like it, but Eagleburger was quite capable of stiffing the director of AID and the person who was the assistant administrator Carol Adleman, Ken Adleman's wife, was quite prepared to go along with this. She saw that that was where it made sense to do this. So, we set up a lot of programs.

We had some new ideas, such as these Enterprise Funds, which took some of the money appropriated by Congress and created a revolving investment fund. We brought together a bunch of people from the private sector to manage that and they were supposed to invest in small or medium sized businesses that needed to be privatized. Some of these were a big success. The Polish American Fund was a great success. Others were failures because of the quality of the management that went into it. But we resisted the idea that there would be AID missions in each of these countries. We said this is bureaucratizing the whole process. Let's find some new ways of delivering assistance and of course, this was a huge pot of money. I think at that point it was $500 million and so everybody from around town was coming to want a piece of it. Some of it was spent quite well; things like the National Endowment for Democracy, NDI, the Republican Institute. They all put good programs in these countries. We sent a lot of people from the business community out there to work in newly privatized firms to try to improve management. We set up some legal reform things, the American Bar Association projects. There was a lot of business interest in going out there to do some of these things, but there was a plethora of consultants hanging around.

G. PHILIP HUGHES
Executive Secretary, National Security Council
The White House, Washington, DC (1989-1990)

Ambassador Hughes was born and raised in Ohio and educated at the University of Dayton, Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy and Harvard University. His career with the US Government included service at the senior level with the Congressional Budget Office, the Departments of State and Commerce, and the White House, where he served two tours with the National Security Council. In 1990 he was named US Ambassador to Barbados, where he served until 1993. Ambassador Hughes was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1997.

Q: We're in January 1989 and you've talked about your perception of what the role of this job on the NSC is going to be, how did it develop? Then let's talk about the personalities and issues. Can I get the dates you were there?

HUGHES: I came to be executive secretary of the National Security Council at the very end of January or early February 1989 and I left in March or April of the following year to enter the ambassadorial seminar in anticipation of going out as ambassador to Barbados.

You asked at the end of our last session how I came to the job and how that came about. In a very curious way. I had my eye so to speak on being Executive Secretary of the National Security Council for some time. If anyone had asked, and a few people did ask actually, well before the election that brought George Bush to office what role I would like to play in the Bush Administration, I readily said I would like to be the Executive Secretary of the National Security Council. Most people wondered why, because it was a pretty awful job in Washington. It has that reputation, at least among some of the insiders, because unlike the Executive Secretary at the State Department who's got a couple of Deputy Executive Secretaries, the director and deputy director of the secretariat line, the line, and a number of other offices supporting him, here it is basically you and your deputy, a few clerical assistants, and of course the White House situation room. There is not much more to support at least as enormous and varied a set of tasks as the Exec Sec at the State Department. It was one of those around the clock, on call all the time, rather thankless behind the scenes jobs.

Several of my friends wondered why I wanted to serve in that kind of role in the Bush Administration. The answer from my point of view was very clear. I thought it was the place in which I could best deploy all of corporate knowledge from when I was Mr. Bush's deputy foreign policy advisor for more than half of the Reagan Administration: who knew where he had been, what he had done, what positions he had taken on the issues, all of that sort of thing. That might be very useful to whomever Mr. Bush would pick as his National Security Advisor, as his deputy. I was certain that those were roles for which I wasn't yet, frankly, prepared. I was in my very early 30's and while I've had a fair amount of experience under my belt, I didn't think either looking at people who had been appointed National Security Advisor or deputy National Security Advisor in the past, that I was quite ready for that kind of role or had that kind of ambition. Here was a place where I could serve Mr. Bush with all my corporate knowledge, help the National Security Advisor and also I thought help build the National Security Council staff from a rather out of the spotlight, behind the scenes sort of role.

In the Reagan Administration, the National Security Council staff had gone through, as far as I could see, a number of you might say additions or convulsions. There were a number of different experiments in how he managed his staff. There was of course a lot of turbulence when the Iran-Contra matter broke. Many people were sort of swept out and many people were brought in. There was a sort of new model of staffing that emphasized very senior, perhaps ex-ambassador or flag officer types and senior most ranks. That had pluses and minuses. I thought I had witnessed that all, seen that all, and could possibly help bring a measure of stability and pick from the best management styles that had worked with the NSC and contribute that to the Bush Administration.

In the Reagan Administration the role of the Executive Secretary hadn't always existed. In the beginning there was a staff director who was a regular member of the NSC staff, who was a senior economic analyst and dual-hatted as staff director. That didn't work because you couldn't have somebody directing staff who was staff. The next effort was to have a staff director who was only a staff director. A military officer actually as I recall, two different military officers, were brought in for that. The military officer style worked fine. It imposed a measure of discipline and kind of kept the wheels turning but it was less than satisfactory I think from the standpoint of the substantive interaction with the staff. Many members of the staff didn't view the military administrator as anything more than a functionary, not as an intellectual co-equal and as someone that they could end run or get around or wouldn't necessarily have to pay heed to.

Finally Bob Kimmitt, who himself came out of a military background and who in the Bush administration became Undersecretary for Political Affairs in the State Department, persuaded Bud McFarlane that what really needed to be done was that the Executive Secretary's job needed to be reestablished. Henry Kissinger had abolished it. When Kissinger had arrived in the White House in the Nixon administration, there was a very powerful figure who was occupying the position of executive secretary of the NSC staff. I am trying to remember his name. It is not a household name but it is rather famous inside Washington. He was among other things a mentor of Dick McCormick, former Undersecretary for Economic Affairs at State Department. Kissinger, I was told, didn't want to see a powerful, entrenched, independent figure there in the White House sort of astride the line of communication between him and his staff, and eventually between him and the President. So he abolished the role and installed a clerk, a woman named Jean Davis, whose job was basically to push paper around. To staple together the agenda for the NSC meeting with the accompanying documents and make sure that they were at everybody's place and make sure that paper moved on time, and nothing more. She played no substantive role at all in Henry Kissinger's arrangement.

It was from that experience that this whole evolution that I was describing evolved. When Christine Dodson was the staff secretary, as I think she was called, of the NSC staff in the Carter Administration, her role was sort of an evolution on the Kissinger model. The Reagan Administration grappled with these different approaches. Kimmitt finally persuaded Bud McFarlane, hey, we should have an Executive Secretary, someone whom the staff respects substantively as at least their substantive equal. Someone whom the National Security Advisor can lean on, not just for ministerial functions but also for some substantive advice and if you would kibitzing on policy. Someone who quite conceivably could end up carving out, or bearing responsibility for, particular portfolios within the range of things that the National Security Advisor and the deputy were grappling with. Bud bought on to that. Bob became the first Executive Secretary under this new dispensation. He stayed for about two-and-a-half years and then in rapid succession after him came three other Executive Secretaries, Bill who would become deputy secretary of energy, Rob McDaniel, Grant Green, and then I'm also forgetting the last Reagan executive secretary before I came to the job.

How did I get this job? When Bush was elected, once the election was over I was at my post at Commerce. I began to let it be known basically through my friends in the campaign and in the circle of Bush advisors that I had been working with for many years that I really would like the job as Executive Secretary of the National Security Council. I would like to serve in the Bush administration. I was asked what roles I would like to serve in and I had specified that role particularly. I didn't specify any others. I called on a number of people in the quest: the person who was in charge of presidential personnel transition, Chase Untermeyer; Dennis Ross, who had been foreign policy advisor during the campaign; Craig Fuller, who was sort of chief of staff of the transition effort; Boyden Grey, who had been counsel for the Vice President and then would be eventually counsel for the President; and so forth.

Along the way in the transition process, fairly early on, it was announced publicly that Brent Scowcroft would be the National Security Advisor. Not long thereafter that Bob Gates would be named his deputy. My friends and my colleagues passed along to Brent and recommended to Brent that I would be a good candidate to be the Executive Secretary to the NSC and sort of put me forward. Brent and I made a number of efforts over the phone to get in touch during the transition. At one point we scheduled to meet and then his schedule was such that it got blown off. We actually didn't talk about this job until literally the night of the inaugural ball. I was getting dressed at home in my tuxedo when a phone call came from Brent's office and he said something like I gather that you're interested in being Executive Secretary and so forth. On the phone even he said "you know I had in mind a different role for this thing than in the past. I had in mind that it would be a rather low level clerk type job and I'm not sure that it would be something that you would be interested in." I said that "I would like to talk to you about it." So he said that we'll set something up shortly. I went to the ball.

Very early on the next week he called me over for an interview. I went to the interview with Brent and Bob. I had never met Brent before. I knew Bob rather a lot from the Reagan Administration. We had an interview that I would say was so discouraging that I left the room thinking I'm the last person in the world that Brent Scowcroft will pick for this job because he described the role that was very much Jean Davis style. In fact, he alluded to Jean Davis: a paper pusher, non-substantive, bureaucratic. Quite honestly I couldn't imagine that the Executive Secretary's role at the NSC staff would ever go back to being that. It may be youthful arrogance on my part or determination, or call it what you will.

As I listened to what he had to say as we talked through the interview, as I knew how the NSC had worked in the preceding eight years, what I was thinking was: general, you've been out of the White House for a long time, 12 years at least. Scowcroft Commission and all that notwithstanding, the way this place works has changed a lot in those 12 years. I didn't say this of course to Brent but what I was thinking was, once you get here and once you dig into this job, you are going to, I think, find out that the role of an Executive Secretary as Bob Kimmitt carved it out and what turned out to be my predecessors were carrying it out, was going to be so valuable to you that that is exactly how you will end up using me. I told him that I remained interested in the job and so forth and I left the interview thinking I was the last person in the world to get the job.

I really needed to think then about other roles in the administration that I hadn't been thinking about because I wasn't going to go to the White House. I had in the meantime a talk with my old boss, Don Gregg, who had been Bush's foreign policy advisor in the vice presidency and had done that role for nearly seven years, six-and-a-half years and through some very troubled turbulent times. Bush stuck with him and he stuck with Bush through the whole Iran Contra thing. Don had made a bid to Brent to be Deputy National Security Advisor or have some senior role in the White House national security establishment. I knew Brent had sort of brushed him aside or ruled that out in ways that Don didn't think were very flattering through all these years of service to George Bush. Anyway, I left the room thinking I'm not going to work in the White House. I've got to think of other options. What about DOD? What about State? Do I want to stay here at Commerce? I knew that I did not want to continue in that particular role in Commerce other than perhaps on a short term basis. A couple of days later I was conducting a staff meeting of my crew at Commerce when a call came from Brent. To my total surprise he said "I talked to the President about you. He speaks very highly of you. Are you still interested in that job?" "Well, yes, I am." "Well it's yours. When can you report?" I reported on the first of February.

How did the job evolve? I would say that it's hard to describe. In fact why don't I pause there and let you pepper me with some questions and that will sort of frame up how I describe how the job evolved.

Q: Brent Scowcroft had been on the National Security Council way back. You are really catching him quite new on the job. How did he initially sort of deal with his staff and see it going? What sort of picture was he giving you? Then I think we can talk from there about how maybe there were some changes.

HUGHES: Brent of course was inheriting a staff from the Reagan Administration. I think he made clear that he wanted to put his own people on that staff. You could think about the NSC staff a little bit like a layer cake. Top is the National Security Advisor, his deputy, the Executive Secretary and the secretariat structure that sort of manages the staff. Then you have the senior directors, or special assistants to the President, the directors and the deputy directors, and then the support staff. So you could think of it like a layer cake. Within the staff that Brent inherited I think he made it reasonably clear that he intended to have all new senior directors. These would be his guys, his picks. He intended to have a lot of the directors and deputy directors remain holdovers from the Reagan administration. Most frequently they were detailees from other agencies: from CIA, Defense, State, sometimes from USIA.

We were under an edict, I guess, (it seems like every White House begins with this) to cut back the number of White House staff. One thing that was done was some fancy footwork and a little bit of juggling of the books to make the NSC staff smaller, leaner, meaner than the last Reagan staff that Frank Carlucci and Colin Powell presided over. How to do that? One thing Brent decided to do was to combine some of the functions of senior directors so you could get kind of double duty out of one or two senior directors. A second thing we decided to do was basically change the counting rules for how we dealt with support personnel like from NSA and so forth who were detailed to the situation room so the rolls didn't look quite as large. I don't think that was necessarily sort of intellectually dishonest. I will let other people decide whether it was dishonest. The Clinton Administration has done the same thing. Every administration does this.

Brent's picks for the senior director roles in the NSC staff started to dribble out into the press well before he and I ever talked about my being the executive secretary. I knew who many of the people were whom Brent was going to lean on as his senior directors on the NSC staff: Bob Blackwill as the senior director for Europe and Soviet Affairs, Richard Haass as the senior director for Near Eastern Affairs, David Miller as the senior director for Africa Affairs and also for what you might call drugs and thugs, counter-terrorism and counter-narcotics. David had been ambassador in Tanzania as I recall and in Zimbabwe. Ginny Lampley, who had long been associated with Brent (she had an ex-military background) was to be his senior director for legislative liaison or the congressional things. There were several areas of the staff where it seemed Brent had people in mind and he wanted to fill those roles.

Then it seemed there were other parts of the staff where Bob Gates had more say about who was picked. For example Bill Working as the Senior Director for Intelligence Policy or eventually Dean Hoffman who was brought from the Agency. Dean had been NIO [National Intelligence Officer] for international economic matters and he was to be the senior economic officer on the staff.

It seemed like at first Brent didn't have sort of crystal clear view of who they wanted to run the Latin America shop. Bob Pastorino, at that time out in San Francisco, was a holdover from the late Reagan Administration in the senior director's role for Latin America. He was (inaudible) and so were the rest of the crew who were working under him including a great guy from the CIA. Another of the guys that Brent clearly picked for a senior director's role in the staff was Arnie Cantor to be the senior director for the defense function. Brent picked a number of senior directors. He also picked a couple of director positions under them of people who he was particularly close to or regarded particularly highly professionally. One of those was Condi Rice, who is now the Provost as I recall of Stanford but who was an extremely bright, extremely able, young black Soviet specialist. That was sort of the structure of the staff as we came into the Bush Administration. These people arrived quite quickly right with Brent and we got down to work.

Many of the other directors I should say on the staff did remain as holdovers from the Reagan Administration. In the Near East area Shireen (I can't recall the last name) and Sandy Charles stayed with Richard Haass and his group and so forth. Some stayed, some went, many were Brent's picks, a few seemed to be Bob Gates' choices. The choices Brent made seemed to be in the areas of his particular interest and concentration and people whom he had worked with or known, or come to regard highly professionally through his years as a defense intellectual.

Q: One of the things as you talked about the composition that seems to be missing here is the conservative representative from the Senate or the House that had been in the Reagan Administration. Somebody who was you might say from the right wing intellectual or something of this nature, or at least a political animal if nothing else. You really are talking about pretty much a professional group.

HUGHES: That's exactly right and I think that is exactly the way Brent wanted it.

Q: It could be that Brent wanted it but there are other considerations. Sometimes you have to throw some meat to particularly the conservative wing of the Republican Party but this doesn't seem to have been a matter.

HUGHES: If you look at the National Security Council staff as sort of a curve or development over the course of the Reagan Administration, I think you would see at the very beginning of the Reagan administration this point of contrast with Brent's and George Bush's approach. I think you would see at the very beginning of the Reagan Administration a much more highly ideological National Security Council staff from Dick Allen and Doug Mann, his deputy, through the choice of senior directors. People like Richard Pipes, who had well known views about the Soviet Union, and director level people like Smetty Kramer on arms control in the staff.

You also saw a pronounced shift in the way detailees were used in the NSC where probably at the end of the Carter Administration most of the detailees on the NSC would have come from the State Department. There was scarcely a single State Department detailee in the first Reagan Administration NSC staff. The detailees were drawn from the intelligence community and from the military services. These were institutions that were regarded as more politically reliable and ideologically correct. Institutions with more backbone.

While that pattern persisted over time, I think a general trend that you can see in the Reagan Administration is that it was progressively diluted over eight years. I would say that it reached its zenith, that style of the NSC staff, with the period of Bill Clark as the National Security Advisor in the second part of the third year of the Reagan administration. Then with Bud McFarlane and John Poindexter and then certainly with Carlucci and Colin Powell it eroded, so that at the end there were very few identified ideological conservatives that were sort of imbedded in the Reagan NSC staff. For example, Constantine Menges who had been for a time senior director for Latin American Affairs and before that the national intelligence officer for Latin America at the CIA, was certainly a well identified figure in conservative circles and very well regarded and respected in those and many other circles intellectually. Constantine found favor in the later stages of the Judge Clark regime but found, I think, professional difficulty in the later stages of the Bud McFarlane era with the NSC staff. By the time Frank Carlucci arrived on the scene, I don't think Constantine was any longer on the staff. That just gives you an idea of how that has gone.

I think that it was partly the tone set by President Bush. I don't think he wanted his NSC staff to be loaded up with ideological people or political people or people with political preconceptions about policy. He was very much a respecter of professionalism and professionals and even though some of these professionals were not drawn from the ranks of career services (Arnie Cantor came from Rand, Condi Rice came from university), they were clearly all professionals in the national security business.

Q: Before we talk of issues we might finish off with the staffing thing. Did you find yourself stapling agenda? How did your position evolve?

HUGHES: I might say by the way just as a last comment on that last point, that if you actually looked over that staff you might say that even though I consider myself to be a national security professional first and foremost, I may have been the person on the staff with the most political, if you would, kind of experience. That political experience wasn't what you had described, being the darling of conservative circles or the protégé of conservative Congressman Y.

Q: Usually the typical one would be the special assistant to Senator X from Georgia or something who wanted his person and the President would feel compelled to do this in order to assuage that particular wing of the party. But Bush didn't play that gambit?

HUGHES: No. There was only one occasion on which something akin to that game was played and it didn't last long and it wasn't particularly successful. We can get into that. It had to do with the staffing of the Latin America function.

To answer your question: did I end up stapling agendas and pushing papers? The role evolved into I think a particularly difficult one partly because of the approach to managing the staff that Brent had, and partly because of just the pace of the way the Bush White House operated. What do I mean by particularly difficult and what are we talking about? Brent as an operator tends to from my experience, operate very much as a lone practitioner. He is the wise man with years and years of accumulated experience. He knows his mind about most of the issues that he is going to grapple with, particularly if they are in his main areas of expertise: Europe, security, U.S. Soviet or U.S. East bloc relations at the time, perhaps China, Japan relations.

My perception was that he made it his priority to develop a particularly tight personal relationship with the President. Whenever you were with the President he saw his job, as far as I could tell, as oriented totally on serving the President, serving the President's needs, responding to the President's wishes. Here you have a President who wasn't at all passive about what he wanted to do in foreign policy. He was very active. The morning briefing of the President which began an hour earlier than President Reagan's did, frequently ended with the President giving Brent direction to get so and so, President Mitterrand, Prime Minister Thatcher on the phone. He wanted to talk to them now. He I think worked very much toward the President.

Bob Gates worked very closely with Brent. They went almost everywhere together whereas very often it's a case that a principal is working with the President and the deputy is handling things back in the office. These two men went to almost virtually every meeting together. They did almost everything together. Brent also tended to work not, I think, very closely with other members of his staff.

At the time, except for a couple of what I would say favorites or intimates on particular issues like Condi Rice or Bob Blackwill or perhaps from time to time Richard Haass, I thought Brent tended to use the staff like a library. That is a set of references, or a set of resources that was sort of on the shelf and when he needed them for something he would pick one of them down off the shelf. He would have them come over to give him a briefing. He would give them some taskings, put something in action and then put them back on the shelf. The staff's interaction with the National Security Advisor was actually very limited. We had a morning senior staff meeting every morning. I had to persuade Brent that it would be useful to reinstate the Reagan Administration habit of having a general staff meeting at least once a month held in a big conference room on the other side of West Exec so that the rest of the staff, the directors and the deputy directors who also felt that they were part of the National Security Council and often did a good deal of the grunt work, could actually see their boss. They could actually hear what he had to say and get a little bit of a briefing about what was going on in the West Wing.

Regarding my role, yes it had a lot of administrating to it, there was no question about that: getting the National Security Council meetings set up, scheduling them, distributing agendas, getting papers in on time and so forth, but that all comes with the territory anyway. It also turned into a particularly difficult mediating role if you would between the staff and Brent because the staff in the early months anyway became, I think, very frustrated that paper didn't move. It was sort of like "we sent Brent a memo on this two months ago and there is no action" or "we sent Brent a memo on this two weeks ago and there is no action. We've had no response. Can you get something out of him." In fact I had very little personal access to Brent. I myself worked mostly with Bob Gates because Brent was mainly either with the President or closeted in his office behind closed doors. Through Bob or through his secretaries we would keep trying to get action on different things that the staff had proposed to Brent but where he had not yet gotten around to attending to them.

The staff I think felt very much out of touch with what was going on day-to-day in the West Wing except for a handful of intimates that Brent tended to rely on, the favorite references that he pulled off the shelf most frequently because they were the hottest issues that he had to grapple with or that the President had to grapple with. I ended up trying to play the role of the shock absorber as it were between the staff frustrations and the realities of the front office. It was a very uncomfortable role particularly without the kind of personal access to Brent that would have made that so much easier to do.

What else can be said about the role? I didn't, unlike my predecessors, have the privilege of attending the National Security Council meetings themselves. The effort was to shut down the number of people who were actually in the room because among other things the Bush Administration was very, very concerned about leaks. President Bush was practically phobic about leaks and I think regarded leaks as disloyal. As efforts by lower level subordinate people to essentially make policy through the press or sandbag their superiors on what policy decisions could or couldn't be made through the press. He was absolutely determined that things would not leak. It was one of the dominating mind sets of his White House, and it resulted in frequent exclusion from meetings of people that in the Reagan Administration would in the normal course of things have been there. I was the least consequential probably of the people who weren't regularly in certain meetings.

There were instances where our ambassador to Germany was disinvited if you would, or not invited, to sit in on the President's meeting with Helmut Kohl or our ambassador to, I'm trying to think of a couple of other countries... Germany was really sort of the drop-dead surprise like what do you mean the ambassador to Germany isn't welcome to sit in on the meeting? It undercuts him terrifically.

There was clearly a great concern with keeping the group of people participating in virtually any kind of meeting as small as possible. If that meant either undercutting perhaps someone's official position, like the ambassador to Germany for example, or if it meant even passing by the opportunity to through a sort of a visible demonstration elevate the stature in the eyes of say a foreign visitor of a particular functionary in one of the departments whose job was going to be involved working closely with that government and perhaps trying to extract things from that government, that person might well not be included nevertheless. There was much less discretion actually on the part of the staff, on the part of really anybody in the chain of command, to recommend who would be in that meeting. It was much more a personal decision of Brent, the President and Secretary Baker, a very tight inner core of decision making in the White House.

Q: This is parallel to some extent in the State Department, isn't it, under Baker?

HUGHES: That's what I heard but I wasn't of course there, I wasn't on the State Department staff. But when I was ambassador of course, you get a different feel of this from the field than you do from the Seventh Floor, but yes, that was the reputation in the State Department as well.

Q: Did you have the feeling that the motivation sounds different than under Kissinger. Kissinger seemed to have a relationship with Nixon, but egos seemed to have played a major role. He wanted to control things but also, egos may be the wrong word, he wanted to make sure that he was the central figure. Whereas I take it that this was not coming from Scowcroft trying to cut other people out but it was coming both from Bush and also just the personal style that Bush and Scowcroft had developed.

HUGHES: I think that is right. Unless I misjudge, and I certainly hope I don't, I don't think that Brent's motivation or Bob Gates' motivation was at all sort of ego driven and I don't think that either of those men were power tripping here. I think that this was much more of a shared personal style and a tone that was probably set at the top by Mr. Bush himself: I want it to be tight; I want it to leak-proof; I want it to be my intimate trusted advisors whom I know and regard highly.

At times in the Reagan Administration there was a sort of ebb and flow of the interaction of the members of the National Security Council staff with the President. When Judge Clark was the National Security Advisor, because he didn't have a deep substantive background, or he didn't have the reputation for such in the national security area, he tended to bring the individual members of the National Security Council staff into the oval office for briefings with the President frequently. In fact he often would bring them in every morning. For the morning briefing he might bring in a different expert depending on what the topic of the day was going to be or what was hot to handle that day.

In the Bush Administration, especially in the early months of the Bush Administration, my impression was that the members of the staff, even senior directors, had very limited contact with the President himself. Brent tended to be the intermediary between the staff and the President. It was he and Bob reporting, advising, and so forth to the President. As time went on and as certain crises unfolded, crises like Panama and some of the events that transpired in the Middle East, certainly when it came to the Gulf War, staff members did become much more intensely involved with the President and were frequent visitors to the oval office.

One of the real ironies is that at a human level, whereas Ronald Reagan as President may not have remembered and recognized the faces of and associated names with all of these NSC staffers who cycled through his office, most of Ronald Reagan's NSC staff felt that they knew him. They saw him regularly in the Oval Office and in action in the National Security Council meetings. Whereas Mr. Bush who had a great memory for names and faces, and a tremendous personal touch with people, probably only knew a very small number of his NSC staffers. Some of them he knew more from the Reagan days when he interacted with them there, than he knew from his presidency because they just didn't have very much contact with the President.

Q: We will come to the developments during this time that you were with the NSC later. One thing that always strikes me is when you have a president who is very conversant with foreign affairs, and the head of the NSC and his deputy director are conversant with this, that you don't use the staffs as much. This is all fine but there is always something that is going to come out of left field and they really don't know the territory. Problems will show that sort of in an open discussion somebody will say but this isn't going to work in Ouagadougou or something like that. Did you see any cases where the President and Scowcroft would head off in one direction and yet you or somebody was trying to say wait a minute, this is fine but what you're doing won't work because of the situation in such and such a country?

HUGHES: I guess I could think of a couple of examples in the direction that you're referring to. I am not thinking so much as country specific examples as I am thinking of issue examples. Maybe I should say a little bit more about Brent and Bob as a team then this point will make more sense. Brent Scowcroft clearly has been around the national security world so long that in a sense he is what in cricket terms is called a good all-rounder. He clearly has greater depth of expertise in certain areas, or had at that time, than in others. He was profoundly steeped in military affairs, arms control, strategic questions, NATO issues, east-west security issues, Russia as I mentioned. Those were mostly Bob Gates' areas of strength as well. Neither of them was probably terrifically deeply expert in Africa, or Latin America. They probably had shared considerable expertise in the problems of the Middle East since we had been grappling with these for decades and they were always front burner issues. But I suspect that neither of them was particularly deeply expert in any of the functional areas of activity that came up from UN issues, to international environment issues, to export control issues, things of that sort that I had worked on.

In fact one of the ways that their areas of strength and some of the areas where they may have been not so strong showed up was in the National Security Decision Directorate Number One that the President issued on something like the first day that he was in office. It set up the NSC structure as he intended it to function and established a number of what we used to call senior inter-agency groups. Those groups were basically on every region of the world plus arms control and disarmament.

There were a whole number of inter-agency groups that functioned in the past and that needed to function in the future because we needed a mechanism to handle them. No provision had been set up for an inter-agency mechanism to adjudicate export control matters or to adjudicate international organization or environment, or drugs, terrorism, or those kinds of issues. I persuaded by a memo working with the other parts of the NSC staff that were responsible for those areas and noticed that all of a sudden the inter-agency mechanisms that had existed before to adjudicate their problems disappeared. We put up a recommendation to Brent that another directorate be established that would set up several additional committees to deal with these functional areas that perhaps Bob and Brent didn't have clearly in mind when they started out. He eventually approved that and I gathered suggestions from around the staff and wrote that particular decision directorate. It went out in I forget what number it was, maybe it was 12 or maybe it was 11. That was how we rounded out the inter-agency process.

When it came to an issue like what the President should do with respect to the Brazil environment problem or the Rio Conference which came later of course in the administration, or what posture the President should take on various international environmental initiatives, my perception was that the NSC front office tended to not take a view on this. They tended to want to let that issue go because it wasn't front and center in their scheme of things. As a result the action tended to be driven by parts of the administration that were mostly vested in that agenda, particularly Riley in the EPA. They tended to want to chart a much more, if you would, liberal or environmentalist oriented course than some of the conservatives who were either in the administration or in the Republican fraction on Capitol Hill. What ended up happening was, on for example many international environmental issues, the position of the administration was sort of pulled along by the environmentally sensitive elements of the administration. The NSC didn't play much of a role in this even though it may have concerned an international conference undertaking. The position that would be sort of heading toward the president would end up getting headed off by John Sununu, who was more of, if you would, an ideologically centered figure in the administration. He was Bush's Chief of Staff. He'd short stop that issue. That may be partly also an artifact of not having an NSC staff with people on it who had ideological or conservative ideological moorings. They were more policy professionals, national security gurus. That's an example.

Another example of a different sort is more in the personnel area. Latin America had been an explosive, contentious issue between Congress and the presidency over Central America. When Bob Pastorino was recruited from the NSC staff by the former deputy National Security Advisor John Negroponte, who was designated to be ambassador to Mexico, to go down to Mexico as his DCM, the question became who would become the head NSC guy on Latin America? Brent and Bob Gates didn't seem to have particularly strong views about this. My impression was that they didn't have an Arnie Cantor or a Bob Blackwill specifically in mind and they were looking for ideas. Various candidates were proposed. One candidate that surfaced was someone who actually had a political background, or a campaign background, but he proved unacceptable to Bernie Aronson, who was the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs at the time. They almost got a candidate, then the position was sort of left hanging.

Then I got a call from my director of administration telling me that Bob Gates had called her, not me, (this will give you an idea a little bit of how the staff worked) to say that she should put on the NSC roster the name of a particular officer from the State Department who was going to be the new senior director for Latin American Affairs. I assumed that this was a nomination of the Foreign Service or that somehow Brent after talking to Larry Eagleburger, or someone from the State Department putting it up through Larry Eagleburger to Brent, had said that this would be a good idea. At my next meeting with Bob Gates I said "I understand that this person is going to come on board. You realize that there will probably be a problem with this." He said "no, I don't know what you're talking about." Then I told him what little I knew about this officer, and I didn't know very much at that time but I knew enough. This officer had a very difficult relationship with a number of the conservative senators and congressmen on Capitol Hill who were deeply involved in Latin American issues. It would be sending at a minimum a signal to them that we were sort of turning sharply left in our Latin America policy or Central America policy, that it was not going to be run by rock ribbed conservatives and so forth as in the past. This was not Jose Serrano or Constantine Menges. It was not the sort of people who had been running this part of the NSC in the past.

Bob didn't profess very much concern about it, but within about 48 hours my phone rang as I was sitting at my desk, informing me to take this officer off the rolls. He never actually arrived in the compound. What I understood subsequently had happened was that as soon as word filtered around, and it does filter around in this town, that he was going to come to the NSC staff, Senator Helms and perhaps others called Sununu, not Scowcroft. At least I understood that they called Sununu, not Scowcroft. They basically raised hell about it. He got so hot that the preferment was canceled.

There was then a quest for a new person. The new person that was finally settled on was someone who had credentials. This was one of the few times that I ever saw a semi-politically motivated choice of an NSC staff senior professional in that period. He had some credentials and some credence with Helms and the very conservative Republicans in Congress. That officer came on board and was there for about four months.

Q: Who was that?

HUGHES: Ted Briggs, who had been our ambassador just before in Panama. He came on the staff and was there for about four months. He ran into various battles with Bernie Aronson at the State Department over the way we would conduct Latin America policy. He was very much in the framework of the Reagan approach to Central America. Clearly the Bush Administration intended to turn in a very different direction on Central America and cauterize this issue and get it off the table politically so the administration didn't burn up endless political capital in Congress wrangling over lethal aid to the Contras and all of those issues. We did not talk about this in detail but I am sure Ted dissented from the path that the administration was taking. How he expressed that dissent, with whom he shared it on Capitol Hill or whatever, I don't know but I am sure that it filtered around. I am sure that as a result, Bernie Aronson and maybe Larry Eagleburger and others at the State Department decided that this just wasn't working to have someone with that strong a personality, with such strong convictions on this issue, pointing in a different direction inside the NSC staff. My understanding is that basically the State Department dictated that there had to be a change there so Brent made a change. It was something that I also had never seen a National Security Advisor do.

Q: Let's move to the issues. During this time, the ones I can think of was the Gulf War was sort of developing. No, it hadn't developed.

HUGHES: No. It started after I left. The invasion began in August of 1990. I was in transition actually to the embassy at that time.

Q: When you were going through the expertise of Scowcroft and Gates, one glaring omission was Asia. Did you feel they also did not quite have the same feel for Asia as they did for other areas?

HUGHES: That's hard for me to say. In fact I was trying to remember whom they chose as the senior guy on Asian affairs. It was Carl Jackson, as I recall, who came from DOD. Carl then went on to be Dan Quayle's National Security Advisor in the second half of the Bush term. It is hard for me to evaluate, for what my judgment is worth, how comfortably they dealt with the range of Asian issues. They clearly knew their mind about who they wanted to pick as their senior Asia person. They kept on Doug Paul from the CIA under Carl in the Asia shop. I am trying to remember who else they brought on in the Asia shop. Maybe it was just a two person Asia shop now that I think about it, for a time anyway.

Whatever their depth of expertise, they clearly knew whom they wanted to draw on for expert advice so I wouldn't say that that was like an area of weakness or myopia or anything like that. It is clear that you knew where these men's heart was, what were the things that they really knew about and what were the things that they were really, really interested in. The job of the other staff members on other issues was largely to tend those fields, to keep those issues off the President's desk so to speak, and handle them themselves so that they did not burden the upper echelon at the White House.

Q: The problem is that the world is not a tidy place so that if you are really interested in one thing there is always an outbreak coming from somewhere else. Anyway, during this year that you were there, what were the major national security issues?

HUGHES: The first major issue if you would that came up was that there was of course to begin with the reviews of our policy. We did a policy review on practically every major substantive area of the world and every functional issue.

Regarding the relationship with the Soviet Union, Gorbachev was in power. There was a period of change; glasnost and perestroika were going on and new leaders like Yeltsin were starting to emerge. The President and Brent Scowcroft were trying to define what should be our relationship and what should be our posture towards the Soviet Union. One of the early decisions of the Bush Administration was to have a kind of pause in the relationship with Moscow while we did an assessment. At a recent conference on the Bush presidency, Gorbachev actually spoke about this and said that he was surprised. He expected when George Bush was elected the pace of rapprochement and of working together with the U.S., interacting with the Soviet Union and with his efforts to bring about change, would pick up. In fact he was surprised he said and disappointed that there was this pause in our relationship while we did this review for 60 or so days.

Once the review was done there were a series of initiatives toward the Soviet Union. One was the offer of an Open Skies Agreement, another was the offer of an early meeting with Gorbachev and it was arranged for, as I recall, November in the Mediterranean. The idea was having it on board ships on nobody's territory, not on land. Bush had a naval background so they thought this was kind of interesting with a Russian ship and a U.S. ship doing trade visits and so forth. It didn't work out that way in the end but it sounded interesting. The relationship with Russia was one key issue.

The Middle East was a perennial issue and we almost have to sort of go line by line through where we were in the Middle East peace then. Shamir was in office and the Bush Administration had clearly decided that it wanted to advance the process of Middle East peace substantively. They saw the Israeli government, then a Likud government, as being one of the major impediments to further peace progress, in particularly the settlements policy. In Shamir's earliest visit to the White House, Bush pressed Shamir, as I understand, to desist settlement activity which was creating a fait accompli. At least I think the administration regarded it as creating a fait accompli on the grounds of just complicating the possibility of a peace settlement. I understand in his meeting with the President, Shamir said things that were taken to mean yes we will cease and desist, and he didn't. Bush felt betrayed and double-crossed by Shamir, and that colored the relationship from there and led the administration to actually do some very courageous things to try to pressure Israel to stop the settlements process and to engage in serious peace efforts with its neighbors.

Central America was a significant issue but it tended to be partly because of personnel turbulence in the NSC, partly because of the way that Brent, the President and Baker wanted to handle it. More of the initiative shifted over to the State Department under Bernie Aronson to craft a sort of a way out of our dilemma over Contra aid and Nicaragua. Hence was crafted the set of meetings that led to the Esquipulas Agreement and that led to the holding of elections in Nicaragua which turned out to be free and which turned out to produce a non-Sandinista victory.

Along the way the administration faced a series of if you would, crises or opportunities. Probably the first major one was Panama. I am trying to remember the exact sequence of this, whether Panama came first or the Philippines came first. The Philippines imbroglio or crisis as I recall came in August if I am not mistaken. It certainly came at a time when the President was away. It was largely managed by the Deputies Committee involved under Gates, meeting in the White House situation room. We received word that a coup was under way against Cory Aquino. We received a request from the Philippine government to intervene somehow and stop the coup makers. Deliberations were organized very quickly in the White House Situation Room among the deputies. Decisions were recommended to the president that we couldn't intervene directly but what we could do was basically keep the Philippine Air Force on the ground by flying CAP over Manila which would be a demonstration of support for Cory Aquino. It wouldn't be belligerent. It would keep the Philippine Air Force on the ground and therefore kind of confine the resources available to the coup makers. It proved to be an extremely wise decision. The coup failed, Cory Aquino remained in office, and for the remainder of her term was forever, of course, in our debt.

We went through a couple of episodes with Panama. A major issue was what to do about Noriega. It was blatant drugs trafficking. It was clear that he was an unsavory character. He had promised elections, held them and then disrespected the results. The candidates were brutalized in the streets and very ugly public ways. At one stage we were actually in the middle of preparing for a White House arrival ceremony, I can't recall for which dignitary, when information arrived in the Sit Room. It was actually an appeal from some officers in Panama for assistance because they were in the process of having a coup. We received a little bit of advanced information about this earlier as I recall, that such a thing might happen and these officers were mounting a coup.

The question was what to do? They didn't actually ask for assistance as I recall. They just told us what they were doing. We scrambled around. I spent most of my time making sure that this arrival ceremony actually occurred believe it or not, because without any longer someone responsible for protocol functions in the White House, those things fell to me to do. I was trying to juggle two things. Making sure that the Sit Room kept information flowing to the NSC staff members, Brent and the President about what was happening in Panama, while we set up this ceremonial function. The coup quickly collapsed. It became clear that the coup wasn't going to succeed. It was not the opportune time to intervene. I think from that episode, the administration began then looking for what would be the next opportunity to intervene. I think it probably put on the mind set that we would not want to miss the next opportunity to somehow get Noriega out of the way. That was my impression.

That opportunity came several months later, as I recall in September or October, when Noriega's troops began a campaign of increasing harassment against Americans in Panama. They picked up a sailor and his wife. They beat up the guy in front of his wife and threatened his wife with rape or something. This story got to Mr. Bush and he was very livid about it, very clearly. It was almost a metaphor for his experience at the prep school where he saw some boys beating up on some underclassman and as a respected and physically strong upperclassman, he got them off of him. He said that we're not going to take this. We are not going to have our people in this kind of jeopardy. So there were a series of deputy meetings and National Security Council meetings that led in very rapid order within a few days to the intervention in Panama. Again a major issue that we faced.

Another issue that we faced is the whole issue of counter-narcotics strategy. The President, from the days of heading the south Florida task force and the National Narcotics Board interdiction system when he was Vice President, clearly wanted to do something about the drugs problem in Latin America. The drugs law enforcement agencies working with the NSC staff under the office of the drug policy czar, Bill Bennett, developed an approach, a strategy to focus on the kingpins of the Latin America drug trade. Bush decided that one of the things that could be done to give impetus to this effort was to propose a four presidents' summit in Colombia. It was a very brave thing to do, to go to Colombia.

He actually went to Cartagena, one of the places that was sort of safe in Colombia, to the Colombian President's summer house there on the bay. He went down for a one day summit with the presidents of Colombia, Bolivia, Peru and Ecuador, as I recall. No, maybe it was just Bolivia, Peru and Colombia. Out of that grew, among other things, the Andean Trade Preference Act, sort of a decision directorate that there would be a multi-pronged attack on the drugs trading which would include an enhanced interdiction effort, a kingpin enforcement strategy, pressures on the governments to do as much eradication as possible, and economic incentives to try to give the countries other economic outlets beyond illicit drugs. Hence the birth of the Andean Trade Preference Act.

Q: On the Panama incursion, invasion, takeover, intervention, what was the role of the NSC at this point?

HUGHES: A very good question. I am even trying to remember who was in charge of our Latin America operation at the point that Panama came down. I think that it was probably by then Bill Price because I think that Ted Briggs had come and gone. He had brought Bill to the NSC staff, his old DCM from Honduras and from Panama. He had brought Bill to the NSC staff and Bill was sort of the acting-senior director and then became senior director and stayed on for the rest of the period.

The role of the NSC staff, having said I didn't attend the National Security Council meetings or the deputies meetings but I did read all the minutes and look over the outcomes that came out, my sense was that this was very much a top-down operation. Again that tight circle of decision making - Bush, Brent, Gates, Baker, perhaps Aronson, certainly Eagleburger - decided that something needed to be done. They were relying more on the NSC staff people, (in that case I think it probably would have been Price and Checelli) to be sources of fine tuning device, filters of information or interpreters of information, and transmitters and guiders of direction to the agencies to implement what basically was decided at the top.

My own mental model of this is that it was not the case of Grenada. In the case of the Grenada rescue operation, I wouldn't describe it as an entirely bottom-up exercise. I did have the opportunity to participate in the crisis pre-planning group meetings and some of the special situation group meetings that led to the decisions to go into Grenada. In that case, it was clear to me anyway, the President and the Vice President had not made up their minds about what they were going to do. They were taking advice from the military, from the State Department, and from the NSC staff about what to do. There were advisors in those roles, people on the NSC staff, John Poindexter himself, and others, who were urging or suggesting that this was a ripe opportunity because we were of course protecting the lives of American students and responding to the call of the OECS and all of those nice legal formalities. But it was also a ripe opportunity to rid the Eastern Caribbean of the Maurice Bishop Marxist government threat, and to send a powerful signal to Nicaragua and Cuba on the cheap, and again cauterize a little regional security problem and keep it from festering into something bigger. It could probably be done very quickly and relatively cheaply in terms of cost of human lives and everything else.

Through that process of sequential decision making, learning that there was a task force on the way to relieve one of the carrier battle groups that could be diverted south for “evacuation” operations and then eventually the intervention operation, the President came around to supporting the idea of yes we should go in. Part of the reason I think that was done was because George Bush and George Shultz in this Special Situation Group expressed the view that this was something that should be done.

In the case of Panama, without unfortunately the advantage of being in the room when these sessions occurred, my impression was not that members of the bureaucracy at lower levels were pushing the senior most levels in the administration to take advantage of this opportunity, but rather that the President had made clear that he didn’t want the next opportunity to depose Noriega to go by. He certainly didn’t want American service people being brutalized and beat up by Noriega’s [inaudible] battalion. It was rather that tight circle of people saying that if now’s the time, then now’s the time. Taking advantage of I forget what the specific provocation was, I think it may have been Noriega’s forces blocked access impermissibly to some U.S. facilities or the use of our transit of certain areas in Panama that gave us the excuse to say well now is the time to lead the intervention.

I think there were two different decision models and I don’t have the impression, I hope it doesn’t do Bill a disservice, that Bill came to Brent with the idea that here’s the perfect opportunity to intervene to cauterize the problem in Panama. I think it is rather the other way around, that Bill provided expert advice, Checelli may have provided expert advice about some of the parameters. The military people would have provided a lot of advice about the situation on the ground with our facilities and what we could do, what we could bring in and so forth, how we could get it in. But the decisions were driven from the top.

Q: What about the way the NSC was structured when you were there, did they have a narcotics person staff or not?

HUGHES: Oh yes.

Q: What sort of a role did that play in the Cartagena meeting and structure?

HUGHES: We had a sort of drugs and thugs unit if you would, that dealt with counter- narcotics, counter-terrorism and I guess you might say international crime related problems. David Miller headed it, Randy Beers, I think he might still be on the NSC staff, two or three other guys, detailees from DEA and from the military staffed it. David was dual-hatted as the senior director for this global issues director and the senior director for African Affairs. Brent very much wanted it that way and David tried to get relieved of one or the other of those hats on a number of occasions but Brent very much wanted it to be a dual-hatted role.

I would say that was a unit that had more latitude to plan, direct and initiate policy, than say the folks who were working Europe, Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. This was an area where clearly there was an important administration priority but where at the same time I don't think Brent or Bob claimed particular depth of expertise or absorption in those issues. So David Miller and his crew were able to take a lot more initiative in planning policy. If they didn't actually themselves propose, they certainly had an important hand in developing the idea for the Presidents' Summit in Cartagena and of this drugs strategy that emerged from that. They worked very closely at the same time with the staff of OMBCP, the national drug control policy office at the White House, Bill Bennett's staff and John Walter in particular. This is one of those cases where a unit of the NSC staff reached out and worked very, very closely with another unit at the White House in OMBCP to craft the administration's policy. The NSC staff would write up the directives that drove the international side of that effort, monitor the implementation of those directives, and kind of drive the agencies to fulfill and be responsive to the policy that the President laid down. Does that give you a little bit of a sense of it?

Q: Yes. I would think the overriding thing during this time was the great changes that were going on in the Soviet Union. Here is our mortal enemy doing almost a 180-degree turnaround and although we probably weren't as sure then as we knew later that they were basically headed for collapse and dissolution. This was THE issue. How was the NSC used to deal with this?

HUGHES: Here I will have to share impressions with you because my detailed memory is a little hazy on this. My impression is that events were changing more rapidly in Russia, in the Soviet Union, than practically we at the NSC staff could keep up with it. Frankly, again this is my impression, I think that through much of the first year of the Bush Administration anyway, we were playing catch up ball so to speak. We began as I said with a pause to assess relations. We then decided to go forward with some initiatives to try to hold out something to Gorbachev, to seize opportunities like open skies. This was supposed to be capturing the high ground.

Q: Open skies meaning what?

HUGHES: Open skies was a probably unnecessary initiative in my view but it was a proposal to negotiate a treaty that would permit fixed wing reconnaissance overflights of U.S.- territory, Russian territory, NATO and Warsaw Pact territory by all the participants of the treaty. We would work out some scheme that somehow (there were obviously a lot of technicalities involved, and pre-clearance and flight safety and so forth) we would be able to basically overfly the territory and photograph, observe and so forth. It was supposed to be a confidence building measure and a way to leverage our inherent openness into greater openness on the Soviets' part.

Q: This incidentally was proposed by Dwight Eisenhower back in the '50s.

HUGHES: Yes, it wasn't a fresh idea, was it? In any case we proposed this notion and began to try to get closer to Gorbachev. At the same time we had visits. There was a first visit by Yeltsin to the White House. I forget exactly what role Yeltsin was playing at that time.

Q: Mayor of Moscow.

HUGHES: That's right. He was pegged by many as an up and coming leader. He was received in the White House. He was then publicly derided by some nameless NSC staffers as a drunk and a not very serious person. This struck me as a very strange way to do business with a country that was changing so rapidly that we couldn't really predict events. Today's mayor might be tomorrow's leader.

Q: Did you get involved with this because this is not a minor issue? This was an effort to make Gorbachev THE person and to knock down any opposition to him. It struck me as I was on the outside and out of government at the time, what the hell was happening, because doing this, and particularly coming apparently from the NSC?

HUGHES: I'm not sure, I'm not in a position to say. I absolutely don't know how calculated that particular remark to the press was from the unnamed NSC source. My own interpretation was very much like yours, that it was a combination of trying to reinforce Gorbachev as the leader we were betting on and the leader we wanted to work with. To also maybe downplay a little bit any sensitivity that there might have been in Moscow about anybody else but Gorbachev being received in the White House and at the same time just an expression of what particular individuals perhaps thought as their impressions of Yeltsin on first viewing. I gather that he didn't seem like he was entirely with it when he came to the White House.

Q: Let's say he has a drinking problem.

HUGHES: It didn't seem like very calculated statecraft to me. I had no involvement in the episode. I read about it in the newspapers like everybody else. I just scratched my head, like why in this environment do that or allow that to be done? It did not make sense to me but I think your and my guesses about the logic of it were pretty on target. I do believe that the Bush administration made a very calculated bet. They bet that Gorbachev was the guy to back. Why did they do that? They bet on him because he was bringing about reform. He was willing to move with us on arms control issues and bargain evidently reasonably. He was the leader we knew and they bet I think also on stability in Russia.

I'm not expressing this very well so let me try a bit different tack. The Soviet Union and Yugoslavia were two multi-ethnic, multi-national composites that were coming, both at the same time, under great strain with international division, factional fighting, and so forth. What was the Bush Administration's reaction to these? I think in both cases the reaction was to do whatever we can in a situation where we may have little leverage, to try to keep the country together. Not to have it fragment or fracture into a bunch of warring little nationalities and/or warring nationalisms. Try to preserve the status quo. Try to reform the status quo so that it is freer, it is less threatening, it is less repressive, it is more congenial to deal with. But certainly not to try to bring about a fundamental change in the geo-strategic order like the dismantlement of the Soviet Union.

Let's imagine that there might have been someone in the Reagan White House, the Reagan NSC, whose views would have been such that they would say here is a great opportunity to actually foster the dismantlement of this artificial creation of the Soviet Union into a series of independent nationalities and permanently reduce the capability of this entity to ever threaten our security or world security again. I think that view would have been very unwelcome in a Bush

White House because it would have been regarded as oh heavens, opening Pandora's box. Where would that have led? How would that have been seen by the rulers in Moscow? It would have been seen as aggressive, belligerent and threatening and it would have excited all the wrong reactions that we would want to excite. No, we should not be seen at all as fostering anything but stability of the leadership and continuity of the Soviet state.

I think that was sort of our approach and the result was that I believe that we ended up playing catch-up ball constantly. I think that we were playing catch-up ball when the Berlin Wall came down. I don't remember anyone anticipating it. I think we all watched it on CNN as I recall. I don't remember anybody getting more than 24 hours advanced notice that this was likely to happen. I think we were playing catch-up ball when we saw other countries in Eastern Europe even before the Wall came down (Czechoslovakia and Hungary) start to let people out including letting East Germans out through their borders, events that made the collapse of the Wall practically inevitable. As far as I could tell I think through this whole initial period from the review onwards, events were outpacing all planning in the East Bloc and Russia and we were reacting. Reacting to Vaclav Havel's rise in Czechoslovakia and bringing him to the White House at an early stage. Reacting to the fall of the Berlin Wall and so forth. I think it was a very reactive mode.

Q: In the NSC at this time, could you sort of compare and contrast at whatever sort of get-togethers you and some others, or people that you were aware of, to sit around and say what would happen if Germany unified? This is the type of almost academic exercise that sometimes it at least gets the brain cells working towards something. If people are so busy, they don't have time to talk about this.

HUGHES: Actually when I took my first job in Washington and had the idea that the NSC was this institution way off in the clouds that I might be lucky enough to come into contact with but probably would never be lucky enough to actually work at, I thought that that was part of the routine and part of the reality of the NSC staff. That these were a bunch of very wise deep thinkers about national security and foreign affairs issues who took the time in the White House to sit down and think about what would happen if..., or what should we be doing here. The reality is that it is an unending fire drill. Every day in every way it is an unending fire drill and if the drill isn't about something sublime, it's about something ridiculous. Clearing the text of the President's speech for the next event, getting a bunch of letters out to the President's frequent correspondents overseas, and so forth. Between the sublime and the ridiculous, it is an unending fire drill.

I never had, and I don't believe anybody else on the NSC staff ever had, the kind of little brainstorming session that you are referring to. We had some informal staff gatherings, it is true. One started off very early in my time with a sort of an ambush gripe session about why things weren't moving faster in the NSC staff. Why paper wasn't moving? Why things didn't flow more smoothly and efficiently? Those were natural growing pains of a new administration coming in and also a factor of personal style. I used that initial gathering to then basically offer a series of regular Friday afternoon open door meetings in my office to staff members who wanted to talk about what was going on in the staff. But that was more related to staff morale, internal communications, keeping people happy, understanding what problems staff were facing so that we could try to alleviate them. Actually taking time out of your day to think about what would happen if Germany unified and how we would react to that? Unthinkable.

Q: I think this is important to get this on the record for people to understand how these places work because there is too often the idea that you had, and that I had, that these are people thinking the unthinkable and to have a plan for it.

HUGHES: The reality of life at the NSC staff is that the work probably all makes sense, or can be made to make sense, to the National Security Advisor who is on top sort of directing things and working with the president. It may make sense that individual staff members are working on their particular account in their particular field. But the staff members worked in remarkable isolation. Many of them don't interact a great deal with their compatriots up and down the hall. There is not a lot of cross-functional interchange. Many of the staff members I found, both during the Reagan and the Bush years, didn't know each other as well as I knew them because in my Bush assignment I was working with all the different parts of the NSC staff. Often the economic people didn't know the defense people or the intelligence people and didn't have any contact with the regional people and so forth.

It is also a place where as I said the range of work runs from the sublime to the ridiculous. It's hard to describe to anybody the range and variety of different tasks that a typical NSC staff member has to undertake, the rapidity with which they have to be done, and the never-ending flow of this stuff. What am I talking about? Cables to be cleared. There are established guidelines at the State Department about what cables going out to post dealing with what issues, at what level of policy, need to be pre-cleared with the White House. When those cables come in, they have to be routed to the appropriate staff member. A clearance has to be got within basically a deadline period of time. Changes have to be sometimes accumulated from several different parts of the staff and then they have to be given back to the State Department authoritatively through the executive secretary to get the cable cleared. That is one distinct process.

Presidential speeches have to be cleared by the NSC staff if they have anything to do with foreign policy. They have to be received from the staff secretary. They have to be farmed out to the members of the staff and they have to be gotten back on time. The input has to be authoritatively given by the National Security Advisor to the speech writers. This is what it should say: we don't want it to say happy, we don't want it to say glad. That has to be done.

Presidential notifications, treaties and agreements have to be sent to Capitol Hill on time in a certain legally prescribed procedure. A typical National Security Council staff member, particularly in areas dealing with aid, dealing with counter-narcotics certifications, dealing with reports on military procurement items and so forth, may have a number of annual reports that they have to make sure are transmitted by the President timely to Capitol Hill or funding is cut off for a particular program automatically perhaps. Those things have to get done.

Presidential correspondence. George Bush had pen pals all over the world. He received a huge number of Presidential letters. Not that we sent him the ridiculous, but one of the most persistent, and sort of vexing, irritating problems that we had in the early days of the NSC of George Bush, was just getting a handle on his correspondence with foreign leaders. He was so frequently on the phone and so frequently personally in touch with foreign leaders that he didn't want to be in the embarrassing position of getting on the phone with Helmut Kohl and having Helmut Kohl saying, "Did you read my most recent letter?" and he had not seen it and had not known that it was there. He wanted to see his letters.

In the past in Ronald Reagan's Administration, correspondence from a head of state would have been handled in actually a routine way. It would have come in to the State Department or the NSC. It would have been routed to an NSC staff person and a Presidential reply would have been drafted. It would have been cleared with the State Department and so forth. It would have been sent up to the President through the National Security Advisor to be autographed, if you would, and it would go out. The process might take several weeks and the President might not see the incoming correspondence until he saw the outgoing correspondence.

George Bush wasn't going to have it that way. He wanted to see the incoming correspondence when it came in, immediately when it came in. The President received correspondence from everybody imaginable in the world about things ranging from how to conduct arms control negotiations with the Soviet Union to congratulations on your dog's birthday. But he wanted to see it all. He wanted to see it now. Rounding it up was no mean task so that he could see it now because correspondence for the President actually doesn't come into one mailbox, it comes into a whole bunch of different mailboxes through a whole bunch of different means. It can come in a cable through an embassy. It can come directly physically in the mail to the State Department somewhere, to the National Security Council, or the White House personal correspondence office. It can come to a whole bunch of different places. Just trying to round the stuff up so that we can give the President a compendium on a reasonably timely basis like twice or three times a week of who had written him what and giving him some kind of little summary of what it said so that he doesn't have to read every letter, was a major challenge to adapt to George Bush's style.

It was a major challenge to adapt the White House to the style of a President who might literally pick up the phone, at one case he picked up the phone and it rang right at my desk and he said, "Philip get so and so on the line for me." This President might be anywhere in the world. Maybe he's in France and there is six hour's difference but what if he is making a state visit to Japan? It might be 3:00 in the morning. These were the kinds of challenges that we faced. What I'm getting at with all these anecdotes is that this never-ending flow of work from the sublime to the ridiculous, even clearing routine Presidential correspondence to citizens who've written about some issue of concern to their congressman, occupy every imaginable hour of every NSC staff member's day. My starry-eyed illusions as a youth that there was time to sit around and operate the NSC staff like a think tank, that is just not the reality.

Q: On this, you have a President who is a telephoner and major issues are developed on the telephone. How did the NSC handle this because policy is made on the telephone?

HUGHES: Sometimes. It certainly was during the Gulf War.

Q: Yes but also at other times. If the President is talking to another President or chief of state or something, this is pretty committed. How did you handle this?

HUGHES: Basically totally differently from in the Reagan Administration. In the Reagan Administration a Presidential phone call would be scheduled in advance. Even if there was an incoming from another country there was always a stall: "The President isn't available right now but we'll get back to you." Then there was a mad scramble and I participated in several of these on the NSC staff. It was a mad scramble to find out what is this person calling the President about? Call the desk, call the embassy, call the foreign embassy. What's up with this country that is precipitating this call? Get talking points to the President before the call goes. Schedule the time with the foreign government when the call will happen and then get the two leaders on the line. On our President's end there would be a scripted conversation for him to have and he might or might not draw on it.

In one episode that I went through with President Reagan, the President of Mexico was calling about something that had nothing whatsoever to do with Mexico. It had to do with world events but we had written him a script that had only to do with Mexico so the President kept returning to the issues on Mexico even though they were kind of non sequiturs in the conversation.

With Mr. Bush it wasn't that way at all. The President didn't necessarily have a script. In fact he usually didn't have a script for his conversations. The script was in his head. Our challenge was to get an interpreter there and to get an NSC staff member to monitor the call. Brent and Bob would typically be with the President when the call went down in the White House or in their offices. Also to get minutes done of the call and then to do implementing and follow-up actions that were necessary. Either they would be self-evident in the call, or Brent or Bob would be given directions by the President, or they would themselves give direction after the call about what was to be done. That is basically how we handled it but in a sense it simplified the whole Presidential phone call business because there was a whole part of the Reagan scenario that was cut out, called preparation. All the concentration was on monitoring the follow-up. Not to say that there weren't some Presidential phone calls that were prepared and scripted and all the rest.

Q: Yes, because this was his style and the fact that here was somebody who his Rolodex, his telephone listing, was renowned. Over the years he had developed a contact and a style that catered to this.

HUGHES: I think that it really was an exercise for the situation room and the White House operators, the WAPA operators particularly, in compiling sort of frequently dialed numbers list for the President because the rate of phone calls was just so much greater than in the Reagan administration.

Q: Did you find that his style of doing this prompted other leaders around the world to call him too so we were getting more backwards and forwards?

HUGHES: Yes, clearly. Also I would say that from my experience, incoming calls were handled differently than in the Reagan Administration. Whereas in the Reagan Administration the call would invariably be stalled, (I didn't work on European issues on the Reagan NSC staff, but maybe it is possible that Margaret Thatcher got through immediately) everything else would be basically short stopped while there was preparation, research, and so forth. I believe that for Mr. Bush there was a much longer list of people who if the President could possibly physically do it, he'd take the call right then and there and not go through some elaborate hoo-ha about waiting. He would take the call right then and there.

I might not have mentioned this, but I know we've gone through five tapes so I may well have said this earlier, but in the vice presidency I recall him once coming back from a hospital visit with President Reagan when President Reagan had been operated on for polyps in his colon in cancerous or pre-cancerous condition. He came back and the President was well, recovering well and so forth. Mr. Bush thought after his morning briefing that it would be a good idea for him to call the major western leaders and tell them that the President was doing fine. My boss came into my office after the morning briefing and gave me a list of people and said set up these calls with the Vice President, I actually knew many of the deputy diplomatic advisors in the respective leaders' offices. We did a little bit of time line with the time differences to figure out what time is it in different capitals and where will people be. We got WAPA working on the calls. In no time flat my phone was ringing off the hook from all of my counterparts in these other offices basically either apologizing that their man wasn't available right then, he's in a cabinet meeting but we can draw him out if this is an emergency and what is this about? It became clear that these calls coming at that particular time, far from being reassuring were scaring them because they thought that Mr. Bush was going to tell them that the President was dying. It had exactly the opposite of the intended effect.

Q: This might be a good time to stop. Is there anything else we should cover here before we move on?

HUGHES: I think we've pretty thoroughly covered the NSC staff. There are probably other issues that came up during the course of that first year-and-a-half of the Bush administration but I think we've hit most of the highlights and certainly the style of the NSC staff as it operated then. I can't think of anything else.

Q: Just one final comment. From what you are saying, because of Scowcroft's style and the way it developed, it sounds like yes this was an interesting job but in a way a year might have been enough.

HUGHES: Yes, in fact I wish I had asked for another job in the administration because, to be honest about it, it wasn't nearly as significant and meaningful a role as it had been in the Reagan Administration. There the Executive Secretary was looked on as like a third deputy and frequently substituted for the National Security Advisor on trips or things of that sort, minor trips, domestic trips with the President. The Bush Administration cut down on the President's entourage very drastically so there wasn't always someone accompanying him necessarily. That was something Brent and Bob did themselves. There were some aspects of the role that were frankly disappointing: not to participate in the NSC meetings themselves; to being the shock absorber so to speak between a staff that was often not very much in touch with the people higher up the line but somewhat frustrated; and between them and a boss with whom you actually didn't have that much communication and where you worked mainly through Bob Gates' deputy. Yes it was not exactly the role as Brent described it, but it was so very different to the way the role was performed in the Reagan Administration that it was in a sense almost a waste of time to do the job. So when the opportunity came to take an embassy, needless to say, it was a welcomed opportunity.

THOMAS MACKLIN, JR.
General Services Officer
Moscow (1989-1991)

Thomas Macklin Jr. was born in Fort Worth, Texas in October of 1935. He attended San Diego State University and majored in political science, later receiving a masters degree in history. He entered the Foreign Service in 1965 and took his first post as a Consular Officer in Amsterdam. His career took him to The Hague, Vietnam, Barbados, Israel, Russia, and Italy as well as several posts within the State Department. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in September 2000.

Q: Today is November 27, 2000. You're off to Moscow. You were there from '89 to when?

MACKLIN: '91.

Q: Let's compare and contrast Moscow to when you were there previously, which was '83-'85. What was the situation from your perspective?

MACKLIN: From '83-'85, the relationship between the Soviet Union and the U.S. was at one of its low points. When I arrived in '83, it was Andropov as Secretary General of the Party and the Korean airliner incident had happened and there was the business with the missiles in Europe. When Andropov died and Chernenko came in, it was no better. Soviets were afraid to talk to you, really afraid. There were a handful of dissidents who would talk to the embassy people, but it was generally thought that half of them were there for the KGB. The government was not cooperative. There was no access to the public at large. The political section spent a lot of their time wading through these long polemic editorials hoping to find some nuance phrase that they could use to report a change in Soviet policy. So, it was pretty basic Cold War stuff with dirty tricks occasionally and a lot of snooping.

In '89 when we went back, Gorbachev had been in power for several years. He had been promoting his policy of glasnost [openness or candor]. What he wanted was to correct the problems with communism. They had a centralized economy, a government that made all the decisions, and the government because of corruption and because the system had basically broken down, didn't get the kind of information he needed. The government from the provinces, people reported what they thought the next hire rung of the bureaucracy wanted to hear. There was an emphasis on production quotas without regard to other factors such as pollution or ecology or the per unit price. So, the system had basically stopped functioning somewhere under Brezhnev. So, what Gorbachev wanted to do was he wanted candor within the Soviet system. He wanted production managers to talk about their real problems. He didn't want people hamstrung with production quotas which were unrealistic or which were self-defeating in the long run. He wanted to make qualitative improvements in the way people lived. He recognized that the Soviet Union basically hadn't been able to provide the means for people to enjoy life. The health system was no good. There were just problems in every base of life. So, he opened it up, allowed and encouraged criticism, but the problem was that the whole system had gotten so corrupt and so inefficient and people were so cynical that once the complaints started to come in, it was difficult to channel them. There were so many complaints, the government couldn't deal with them. They really couldn't deal with open economic problems with other countries and with the West. So, on one hand, the government couldn't deal with the magnitude of the problem and as the people saw that the government wasn't really responding to anything, they became more cynical. So, it got worse rather than better. At the same time, the hard line wing of the Party felt very strongly that what was needed was more discipline, to reign people in. The West and the U.S. were offering strong incentives to open up the economy to outsiders and to open up the media to outside sources. So, whereas in the early '80s, there was nothing in the papers that wasn't controlled, there was a newspaper called Orgin Yolk, which was a youth journal which occasionally let people write letters to the editor that were kind of honest. But that was it and it was very controlled.

When I got there in '89, people were writing letters into "Literaturnaya Gazeta" asking things like, "How can I establish a Swiss bank account?" The newspaper would answer them. So, as people began to find out what it was really like on the outside, they became more interested in change. So, there were two main themes during that second tour. One is, the government and the people in the Soviet Union wanted to change. On the other hand, the U.S. embassy was still smarting from the whole business with Lonetree and was over concerned over security. So, you had on one hand a government which is finally opening up and you can meet people and security- (end of tape)

We couldn't meet with Russians. You couldn't talk to a Russian alone.

Q: That's crazy!

MACKLIN: Well, it was. For once, they were anxious to spill their guts. Matlock, who had replaced Art Hartman, who was kind of a big picture guy who was very smooth socially and oozed charm, was an expert on the Soviet Union. He knew some of the dialects. He spoke good Russian. He had been working for 30 years on the Soviet Union. No factoid was too small for him to want to file away. He insisted on volumes of reporting far and beyond what the community was interested in back here. I think the intelligence community jumped on everything they sent in. Over at Spaso House, the ambassador's residence, they were able to bring in large numbers of very important Russians. We got along with the Matlocks and got invited to a lot of functions over there. I liked Jack Matlock. He was an interesting guy. But he was full of contradictions. Whereas the first tour in Moscow, there was really no one who ever came to a social event at Spaso House other than the dissidents...

Q: Which is really not a real picture at all. This would be true if you only invited extreme left-wing communists to the White House.

MACKLIN: Yes. There were Soviet policemen out in front of Spaso House in the old days who would check the invitations and then still not let some people in. Well, this time, he could ask anybody he wanted and there was no particular problem getting in as a rule. There were some wonderful conversations at Spaso House. It was fascinating. I remember one night I - the economist from Novosibirsk, Abengayneyen, who was one of the first people to puncture holes in some of the Soviet economy policies and was part of a group of economists from Novosibirsk who were kind of on the Russian cutting edge of understanding economics. He came to a lot of those functions. We got people from the foreign minister and the UPDK. It was really a renaissance. The security policy at the embassy was, you can not speak to a Russian unless you have a substantive reason to do so. If you work in political or economic, you have a reason to go out and talk to Russians. But you can't do it alone. You have to have somebody with you. If you speak to a Russian by mistake, you have to file a report. There was a form on an index card so that they could cross-check anybody you may have talked to.

Q: The Lonetree thing was obviously way down the line as far as... Who was calling the shots on this sort of thing?

MACKLIN: Well, there was concern from the White House. They didn't want any more embarrassment. Then the Under Secretary for Management was Ivan Selin, who himself desperately wanted to be ambassador to Moscow and tried very hard to get that job and quit when he didn't get it. But he had told people when they went out to post, "I don't want to see another security embarrassment." There was Lonetree. There was the Howard affair. The CIA guy who... But this was before they knew about Ames.

Q: Ames being a CIA officer well placed who turned out to be a Soviet spy. He was fingering all the agents.

MACKLIN: Yes. When we were there the first time, they couldn't figure out how the Russians kept such an accurate tab on who was and who wasn't with the Agency. So, there was still a lot of this paranoia and there was an awful lot of right-wing resentment of Soviet spying on us as if we didn't spy on them. So, the regional security officer, Mark Sanaa, was sent out there having been told, "Keep a tight reign on things. We don't want any problems out there." So, he did. There were problems with the rest of the embassy. It was this strange juxtaposition. There were people in the embassy who ignored it. A couple of people in the political section were kind of free spirits and really were working for the State Department just because they liked Russia and wanted to work in U.S.-Soviet affairs. They developed a wide range of friends and entertained a lot and basically said, "Screw you" to the RSO. Some of them got in a little bit of trouble and some didn't. There was also the question of the local employees. There was a perception amongst certain elements in the U.S. government that we had been extraordinarily stupid in the old days to employ Soviets at the embassy. Matlock had been on the NSC staff at the time and said, "We don't need them. I can get graduate students from universities in the U.S. and go out there and do the same thing." Well, if you want somebody to work in the political section to do political analysis and to translate, that's by and large true. But if you want a phone operator or a carpenter or an electrician or a plumber who knows how to work the pipes in those old buildings over there, it's kind of nice to have somebody who knows how they do things in Russia. We tried hard to get the front office to agree to hiring Russians. We were able to finally do that, but it was a long fight. The State Department had a contract with Pacific Architects and Engineers [PAE]. They would hire a lot of people to go out there and work in the consular section, in GSO, etc. We had about 180 of them working out there at one time. All of them we had to house and provide special allowances for and pay a king's ransom. Some of them were pretty good and some of them weren't. We certainly needed Americans to run an air conditioning system and some of the highly technical elements of the compound. But there were two ways we were able to run a chink in this. One was, the embassy had two dachas that we maintained. They were both quite nice. Frankly, when you work like a demon for 12-14 hours a day for long periods of time, every now and then you could reserve the dacha and go outside of Moscow and it was beautiful out there. The air was clean, it was a birch forest, it was really gorgeous. It was a wonderful getaway. What was called the "old dacha" was out in Terasaco, a small suburb town. It had been abandoned because we had put an A&E couple out there and they had gone stir crazy and they got so nutty they had to pull them out. They couldn't get anybody to live up there because they were so isolated. So, they left it vacant. The minute it was left vacant, in came all the neighbors and started taking off doors and windows and pulling out wiring and stuff like that. So, we went over about a three month period to the front office, to the DCM, and then later to Matlock and sold them on the idea of hiring Soviets to watch the dacha. We'd have to go through UPDK, which had also changed. We'd have to go to them and we'd have to find Soviets who could go out there and maintain it. What they did was, they lived there. There was a small, little bitty dacha up near the gate and they lived there at all times. So, they were also a night watchman, made sure nobody broke in and stole anything. Not only were we able to do that, but we were able to hire back two of our old dacha caretakers who loved the old building and knew all of the problems with the grounds and stuff. Then with GSO and not with the Russians, we went back in and replaced the wiring and all of that stuff. It was always understood that the place was bugged. Nobody cared. You never discussed anything out there that was sensitive, but basically, we restored the old dacha and it became popular again. We used it for community picnics and stuff like that. But it was a long fight and the only way we were able to make it functional was by hiring Soviets to serve as night watchmen out there.

The other area where we had a big problem was drivers. We had a political section of 30-40 people and a front office that was demanding and in bad weather, you don't necessarily want to be walking across town. We didn't have enough drivers. So, we sold the embassy and the Department of State on the idea of signing a contract with a Russian organization to supply drivers. The drivers would not be able to enter the compound. They would have to stay outside the compound. But you could order a car and say, "I need to go to the airport" and you'd go to the gate and driver number seven would be there. They provided the vehicle. They'd drive you out to the airport, wait for you while you picked up whoever it was, and come back to town. In those days, as things broke down, there became less discipline and people became less afraid of the cops and cab drivers at the airport would rip people off and say, "Well, it will cost you $70." From time to time, people would arrive at the airport, put their bags in the taxi, and the taxi driver would drive off into the woods, take away their money, bags, and passports, leave them out there in the cold, and drive off. So, it was important to have drivers. So, that was one of the big issues that affected the admin section concerning security.

Q: How about the char force and that sort of thing?

MACKLIN: The chars were Americans. After I left, we were able to get them to let Russian chars on the compound to do some of the basic stuff.

Q: My experience with hiring Americans to do essentially menial work is that you get a pretty low quality and these people in a way are much more susceptible. They're not as sophisticated and are more susceptible to getting involved in black market deals or romance. In other words, you're not really getting rid of the problem. In fact, you have a false sense of security when actually you're bringing people in who are more susceptible.

MACKLIN: That's true. There were problems with some of them and some of them had to be sent home. It is a problem. Also, there is a big cost factor. If you don't let people in the secure areas of the embassy, it was generally thought that they're not a threat. We all felt that our apartments, even on compound, were bugged and therefore you couldn't discuss anything sensitive in the apartments, including who worked where. So, what difference did it make if there was a Russian who came by and shoveled the snow off the stairwell rather than you, who didn't have enough time, or some PA&Eer who was pissed off about it. That was a very difficult issue in those days.

Q: I worked in Yugoslavia in the '60s and we had local employees. We were quite sure that there were some who were probably more willing than others, but they all had to report to the UDBA, the equivalent to the KGB. But at the same time, you could have conversations with them. You were picking up quite a bit from them. They're people and you're a person and you just sort of talk. Particularly translations and things like this. You were getting people who were intellectually engaged and they would start pointing out things.

MACKLIN: I can remember the first tour in the early '80s, we had some of the locals, Soviets who worked in the consular section who had been with us a long time and really liked the U.S. They were on a short leash from the Soviets, but they were good at working the system. There were a lot of cases where you had Americans who had come there as tourists who were injured way out in some far flown province where the phone system didn't work very well and these locals could talk through... You couldn't just dial an area code and get Tashkent. You had to go through different telephone exchanges. Sometimes you got there and they didn't want to talk to you or they would only speak a certain dialect. We had FSNs who were wonderful at getting through to the right people, who knew which hospitals they might be at, who saved lives. We lost that the second time around. They were missed. The same with the phone operators, who were admittedly Soviets and did they pay attention? You bet. But since all calls were strained before they came to the embassy anyways, what the hell difference did it make? They were strained first by the KGB and then they went to the switchboard. But the second time, we had Americans who spoke Russian but not so well who if you called them up and said, "I need to speak to somebody at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs or over at the Kremlin," it was very difficult for them to operate. So, we lost a lot in effectiveness by being overly paranoid.

Q: Did you feel that Matlock was facing that problem or was this just a price he paid to do his thing?

MACKLIN: He did not face it. He did not agree with it. He said the old system was best. He said he wouldn't want to meet with a Soviet alone, that you were better off to have somebody with you, it was just good professional practice. But he had been one of the people who – it had been hard for him to get that job. That was his dream job and he was there at a dream time.

One of the other themes that went on at that time was the intellectual fight between the political and economic sections. Matlock believed very strongly that the most important element was political, that everything in the Soviet Union was controlled by the Party, the Party was political, the political developments were the dog that wagged the tail, that economics was important only as an adjunct to that. The political counselor, Ray Smith, who is very bright, kind of felt the same way. Ray Smith had 30-40 people working in the political section, divided between external and internal. They had an enormous group. John Blaney was the econ counselor. He had a staff of three. He used to say, "This nation is collapsing economically. It's in freefall. They can't provide the goods and services for the people. It's falling apart economically and that's going to have a bearing on the politics." Well, they'd get into these arguments at staff meetings over what was more important. Matlock and Ray Smith on one side and Blaney on the other. It was tough on old Blaney. When it came time to fight about resources in any way, Blaney always lost out. Economics just wasn't that important. Well, as history unfolded, Blaney was right and they were wrong. But that was another opinion.

Q: It's interesting to see it coming at that point. We had this huge operation focused on the Soviet Union. We were doing everything you could think of to find out about this country and yet when it fell apart, we didn't get it.

MACKLIN: There is a tendency to want to deal with the government in power and to not offend the government in power by developing a close relationship with the opposition. So, what happened there was that the embassy said, "Gorbachev is our man. He is changing this country. He is the first guy since Peter the Great who's really changing things. He will keep changing. He has agreed to all of these disarmament discussions and he's prepared to cut nuclear weapons. This is a guy we should talk to and we should help him stay in power." Then along the way, people started saying, "You know, Gorbachev is losing his grip. We should pay more attention to Yeltsin." There was great pressure from the front office not to get too close to Yeltsin. So, this was another strain that was going on. Later on, when Yeltsin was in power and it was falling apart, there were those who said we were too close to Yeltsin. But back then it was Gorbachev and the Bush administration in particular was behind Gorbachev when the Baltic countries split away. We were very slow to recognize and we kept trying to hold this union together, to help Gorbachev hold it together, even though the Baltic countries and some of the others wanted our support to break away.

Q: Was this a theme that you could feel in the embassy?

MACKLIN: Yes.

Q: You've got a political section with 30-40 people. What the heck were they doing?

MACKLIN: Well, they did a lot of reporting. They were by and large good officers. They got out. You could talk to people and people would talk to you. So, there was a lot of information to report.

Q: Did you see any change in the support people that you were dealing with in the Soviet Union?

MACKLIN: I went back as admin counselor, but I was in fact number two and in fact for most of the time I was number three. It was a strange thing. I very much wanted to go back. In EUR/EX, I got along very well with Clark Rogers, the deputy executive director. I didn't get along at all with Ken Peltier, who didn't like me. I really wanted to go back and I had expressed an interest in going back as admin counselor and Ken Peltier wouldn't hear of it. They assigned somebody else and even picked somebody for number two. But then the person who was supposed to go as number two developed a family medical problem. So, there was nobody in the wings. So, Clark Rogers called me up and said, "Would you like to go to Moscow?" I said, "I'd love to." So, it was all set up and I went. But I went as number two. Ward Latrelle was the admin minister counselor. Then I was his number two, the admin counselor. I said to Ward, "What I'd like to do is run this the way Embassy Bonn runs. The minister counselor for administration deals with the other agencies at post and with the ambassador, sort of up on this interagency level. The admin counselor runs the mission. I supervise GSO and the budget people, etc." Ward agreed, "You run the thing and I'll deal with interagency problems." Then we were there about eight months and Ivan Selin, who was Under Secretary for Management, still didn't think we were doing things right, we as an embassy in general. At the same time, there was all this concern over the bugging of the new embassy building. This was an issue that had gone through that whole period and was part of the outrage of the right wing – how could we let this happen? So, Selin wanted his man in Moscow. He said, "I am sending Joe Hulings out there. He is going to be kind of the second DCM. Joe Hulings is going to be minister counselor for management. He will supervise the admin and consular sections. Max Robinson, the CG, will report to Joe Hulings. Ward Latrelle, the admin minister counselor, would report to Joe Hulings." When that happened, Ward Latrelle said, "Screw you. I want out of here." He left the next summer. I said, "I'd very much like to take Ward's place." They said, "Okay," and I said, "Can I get a TDYer out to take my place just because it will all work here?" They said, "Okay" and I went out and recruited somebody. Then one day out of the blue I was informed that Bob Austin was coming to take Ward's place. I was very upset but I stayed on through the year. I got promoted out of the job. Bob Austin got tossed out of the Service more or less. But Joe was there the whole time. So, I had to deal with both Joe... There was about a three month gap before Bob arrived, so I ran things. Then he came to post, was there three months, and went on home leave for two months. So, about half of that year, I was in charge. So, it wasn't so bad.

Q: How about morale in the embassy?

MACKLIN: Have you talked to Mike Joyce?

Q: No, I haven't.

MACKLIN: Mike Joyce lives in Virginia. He was DCM for about three years under Matlock. He is a wonderful guy. He did a good job. Matlock is very difficult to work for. Frankly, most of the time I was out there, Mike Joyce looked like he wouldn't live through the week. He was grey, had pallor, shook constantly. Look at him now and you'd think he is a picture of health. But Matlock just worked him nuts.

Q: You were saying that Matlock had his idiosyncrasies. How did Matlock manage?

MACKLIN: Matlock couldn't manage. He was a political officer. He was your basic political officer, promoted up to be the chief political officer at the chief post in the world. That is what he ran. If you talked to him and said, "We've got to pay attention to this," and you convinced him, he would do it, but he didn't believe it. We went to him... I liked the political stuff and I like to know what's going on. I told him or maybe Mike, "If you could give us a monthly briefing, you really know this stuff. You know what's going on. Most of the people are here because they're interested in the Soviet Union. They're interested in Russia. If you could give us monthly briefings, people would better understand what's going on and it would help them relate their jobs to the overall mission." I had actually done the same thing in Tel Aviv with some success. So, Matlock started these monthly sessions. They were great. He would take a lot of time and pay a lot of attention to that. He was not the kind of guy... There are some FSOs who like to stick the stiletto in somebody – people like Lannon Walker, who delight in putting the stiletto in somebody and watching them squirm. Matlock was not like that. He didn't like to hurt people. But at the same time, we didn't have FSNs and they were entertaining at Spaso House every goddamned night. They needed written invitations to go out. He would have FSOs in the political section sitting down, filling out invitations by hand. He would review them himself to make sure that they were all done right and he would send back batches of them because they got the case wrong or some grammatical element. These were people who were working themselves sick like Mike Joyce. He did it without thinking. He'd send them back and say, "Do it over." So, he just didn't understand. It wasn't part of his nature to understand how to manage things. He kind of thought, "Everybody is excited as I am to be there." He has an active mind. I doubt if he slept five hours a night and didn't think anybody else did either. I liked him, but he was very difficult to work for.

Q: Back to morale.

MACKLIN: The biggest problem with morale was the security thing. Most of the people were there because they wanted to be in the Soviet Union, they wanted to be in Moscow, they were interested in the history and the culture. On the other hand, you had Security saying, "Don't leave the compound." When I had been there the first time in the early '80s, there were a lot of people who were very happy not to leave the compound, but this time people couldn't wait to get out there and see things and talk to people. Security drove them nuts. Mark Sanaa, my friend, a good guy, really went around the bend. They started keeping files on all of the Americans at post without telling anybody. They would have internal ciphers and then not tell somebody. There was a cipher at post where you entered the secure area and there was a Marine booth. Inside the door to get out, there was a cipher, but they wouldn't tell people what the cipher was, so you had trouble getting out. We had a fire marshal at post on contract, so we would unleash the fire marshal to get internal ciphers changed.

One of the biggest problems at post was in secure communications. There was pressure from the front office to do reams of reporting, but since it was all classified for the most part, classified cables had to be typed up on computers which were kept in vault boxes. There were only three of them at post and they would only hold two or three people at the same time. They were double locked things. We had a lot of admin problems with the building. There was a construction problem. We had the new embassy building which was full of intelligence agencies who were tearing it apart to make sure they found all the bugs, who lived there 24 hours a day around the year, tearing bricks apart. Then in the building itself we had a $20 million project redoing major parts of the building. So, there was always construction going on and we'd have electrical outages all the time. So, sometimes, people working late at night would go into the vault, open the first door, which is an electronically operated sealed lock, go in, then open the second one, and you'd go inside. Then you'd close the first one and the second one and sit down to work and the electricity would go off. You're stuck in there and think, "God, is there another fire. Am I trapped in here? How do I get out of here?" They can't see anything. People would get the wits scared out of them. You'd go in there and there were only two or three machines and somebody was using them. You've got to get this cable out before you can go home tonight and your kid's having a birthday party, so you need to get it done and get home. You try to hurry up somebody and they say, "Goddammit, don't bug me. I'm writing." It's not just typing something you're written. They wrote while they type. One of the things that Security did... People were hurrying. You'd finish up and they'd say, "You're done." You know these people. You're trying to cooperate with them. So, "Okay, it's your machine." Off you go. One of the security officers used to go into those vaults at three in the morning, and find out if anybody had by mistake left a document on the hard drive. Well, if they had, it was treated as leaving an unattended classified document, so you got a security violation. If you get two or three, you're going to be put on LWOP, it goes on your record. We know the problem people are having now with security violations. Nobody wanted a security violation. But it's all because somebody forgot to clear the hard drive when they left or they were pushed off the machine by somebody who pulled rank. Who is to know? So, there was a lot of bitterness. So, someone from the embassy used to go into those vaults late at night and type up bogus classified messages in the name of the security officer who was going around tracking people down. But he wouldn't give himself a security violation for this. But the Security people got so angry that they put out an admin notice that described what was happening and threatened the people. It said, "We think we know who you are and we're going to get you." They never got them. But there was stuff like that that went on.

Let me give you two more quick examples. After we had been there about a year, a group of Soviet ex-pats from New York came in. These were guys who had immigrated to New York about 20 years ago and had had a thriving business with a video store and they wanted to get in the hotels in Russia which were opening up. They thought there was a gold mine but "We want our foot in the door in Moscow." So, they came to the embassy and said, "We'll set up the video shop for you basically free. We'll charge you the cost per video about what it costs to maintain this operation. We'll give you a library of 4,000 videos." Wow. Everybody loved that. Long, dark winters. You can watch a video movie. You don't have to worry about somebody from the States sending you the stuff. They'd bring out all the new movies and a lot of kids movies. They'd say, "The way we work it at home, we do this on a computer and the computer tells us every month which videos are moving and which aren't. If there are videos that aren't moving, you send them back and we'll replace them." Well, in admin., we agreed that we could go ahead and draw up a contract and the Security Office wouldn't clear it. They said, "Well, is this computer a Tempis hard drive computer?" "Well, no. It's an unclassified area in the compound." They said, well, then the Soviets can pick up the emanations from this unclassified computer." "Yes, I guess they could." "Well, then they can figure out what movies we checked out and from seeing what movies you check out, they can do a personality profile and they can find out your weaknesses.” We said, “Shit, most people leave their blinds open anyway. If they want to see what movies they’re watching, the KGB is in the building next door.” “No, we can’t do it.” So, we argued and they finally said, “Well, if you code everybody’s name and you code every movie, we’ll agree to it.” So, everybody had to have a name serial code, like a bar code, and every movie had a bar code. So, you’d go in there and barcode yourself in and you’d barcode the movie out. It was things like that that just really...

To keep the Marines on kind of a sense of mission, they would have monthly hostage simulations. They were never announced. Just sometime during the month, you could tell when they were coming... We lived right next door to the RSO. You’d see him going out in his flack jacket with a helmet and they’d ring an alarm bell and have a hostage scenario develop. Usually somewhere in the embassy someone, an outsider, had entered and had taken a hostage and was somewhere in the embassy. So, the Marines had to tumble out of the rack, get in full battle gear, run up to the chancery, which was a quarter of a mile away, go inside fully armed, going down the hallways safely, to try to find out where the hostage situation was. They’d run those things at least once a month. People in the political, economic section, etc., would be working late at night and they’d stumble into these armed Marines. Nobody was ever shot, but it was just... There was a lot of tension.

Q: With the Marines, one of the things that is sort of unwritten history is, how does one take care of the Marines that are young men with normal sex drives. How was this taken care of in Moscow?

MACKLIN: The second tour there, there were lots of Americans on compound. Of the 180-some PA&Eers, at least 40% were female. All of them were young, interested in a good time. There were a lot of businesses that came to Moscow in those days and they often hired young Americans. So, suddenly, whereas the first tour in the ‘80s there really wasn’t much available in the way of a social life for the Marines, the second time, there were just loads of girls.

Q: I suppose this was the graduate students’ year abroad.

MACKLIN: Yes. Or even people who hadn’t finished. There were a lot of them.

There were other incidents that I don’t remember right now, but it seemed like every week there was some sort of hassle. While we were trying to get drivers on contract, the Security Office fought it constantly. Trying to get people for the dacha and we had to overcome their resistance. We had a lot of problems... UPDK the first time I was there was barely polite. The second time around, we needed a major expansion in our housing. OFM had come along. So, if we didn’t get good housing, the Russians over here didn’t get good housing. It worked. It worked so well that people back here kind of loved to stick their finger in the eye of the Soviet mission. One of the first housing problems we had... I went over there with Ray Smith and we got harangued at by the head of UPDK, whom I had never seen the first time, and somebody from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs about some housing block they had been putting Soviets in here that they really hated because they were identified there and were being bothered by dissidents over here. I became convinced that the Soviets probably had a pretty good case. Maybe if we were helpful there, they’d ease up in Moscow. So, it took a couple of months of trying to persuade the Department of State, mostly EUR/SOV, that we should cooperate with them on this one particular housing development. I think it knocked the socks off of everybody on the Russian side. They couldn't believe that we were suddenly being nice. Things kind of opened up. We got permission to go private. At the same time, UPDK was told, "You've got to be self-sufficient. You're no longer going to be funded by the KGB."

One of the things Gorbachev did was say to various ministries and various divisions of the government, "You're not going to get funding from the central government anymore. You've got to come up with your own funding and develop a budget accordingly." So, UPDK that dealt with apartments and rentals, etc., were told, "You've got to be self-sufficient. You've got to make enough money off rents and other services to pay for your personnel requirements." So, they became a little bit nicer. At the same time, we were given permission to go out on the private sector. At that time the Russians had invited in people from the private sector to build apartment buildings. There was one Swedish guy who made a lot of money inside the Soviet Union that he couldn't export. So, he said, "Well, I'll build an apartment building and then rent out the apartments and then maybe I can get paid offshore." There was stuff like that going on. So, we were able to start renting apartments from organizations other than UPDK. That made UPDK a little more anxious to be user friendly. So, there was a change in the general attitude of government. The head of UPDK was an Armenian named Karis Dechian. I had a really good relationship with him; he was very helpful to us. He looked a lot like Gene Hackman and he had a deep guttural voice.

MACKLIN: At one juncture, I said, "Do you have access to a video machine and is it multi-system?" He said, "Yes." I said, "I'll get you a couple of Gene Hackman movies," so I did. He was really proud that he looked like this American actor.

What else was interesting? There were some strange people at post, but there is no advantage in talking about that.

Q: Maybe you can call them "Mr. X" and "Ms. X."

MACKLIN: There were a few of the types who really did like the Russians and were kind of naive about it but there were only a couple of them and everybody knew who they were. One of the big events there was the fire. It changed personalities a lot. In March of the second year, 1991, they were still working on the chancery. The chancery on the ring road contained the entire embassy except some elements of admin. It had several apartments in it. It had the political, economic, science, consular sections, parts of various other organizations that you find in embassies. All of it was there. The front office, security office, etc. at the same time, they were working on the building, redoing floors. They'd vacate a floor and then redo it. They were doing a good job, the contractor who was in there. One of the things they were doing was putting a big freight elevator on the back of the building. The embassy had two crummy Soviet elevators. One was a glass elevator that would only work about half the time. I remember one time in the first tour, it was stuck somewhere around the seventh floor with Art Hartman. Then there was an inside elevator that went up to the ninth floor that was very small. It was jerky. So, they were putting on this big, enormous freight elevator on the back of the building, which it desperately needed. That was about the end of the whole project. Well, there was a material that was being used on the inside of that elevator that had been provided by a certain organization back here and cleared because it would somehow shield the embassy. You could send out certain kinds of electronic signals through this sheeting. It was procured by this other organization. It was guaranteed non-flammable. Well, there was a welder up on the eighth or ninth floor who was welding away that day early in the morning. A piece of slag from the thing he was welding fell down inside to about the second floor and it got wedged up against some of that sheeting, which turned out to be highly flammable. Within about five minutes, the whole elevator was a roving candle. Of course, it opened up onto every floor of the embassy and so we had to do an evacuation of the embassy. It went all the way up to the roof. The fire lasted all that day, started up again on its own the next day. We had to call in the Soviet fire department. We had our own fire people. The Marines got in on it. Part of GSO, the security guys. It took forever to put that fire out. Basically, it obliterated the mission. Even the consular section down on the ground floor couldn't function because of the smoke damage. There was really no floor on that embassy where you could work again. It was either burned out or the smoke damage had charred everything. They went into my office. The Russian fireman stole some stuff out of there in the process. There was great danger over secure safes and stuff like that. But it was a really bad fire. It looked at one time like the whole building was going to come down. Why it didn't, I don't know.

When it started, I ran down to the new embassy office building on the compound and saw the construction engineer, Carl. I said, "Why don't I get my video camera?" I lived on compound. He said, "Do it." I came back about a minute later with my camera. We went to the top and spent the day up there videotaping the fire. Most of the best fire footage I provided. The Security Office back here, FBO, etc., and the CIA and some others, did a reexamination of the fire to see if it could have been started by some other means. I just turned over my footage to them lock, stock, and barrel. But it was a massive fire.

Q: I've heard people say that the first firefighters in were very professional and doing stuff, but then another crew came in and seemed to be KGB types.

MACKLIN: There was a second crew that came along that was well-briefed on what to look for. Who knows what they got away with. There was one woman in the political section, Tatiana Deford, who had a brooch. She was of European extraction and her French mother or grandmother had given her a brooch that was about 200 years old. It was very valuable to her and kind of valuable because it had jewels in it. It was in a safe that was not a secure triple locked safe and it was stolen. I told her afterwards, "You've got to know the firemen took it. My suggestion is, you see our fire marshal and get an introduction to the fire chief of the city of Moscow and say, 'I don't care who took it. I don't care what the circumstances are. But here is $500 green. I want it back.' I'll bet you you'll get it back." Well, the fire marshal said, "I resent the allegation that a fireman would steal." She wouldn't push it, so it never went anywhere. A couple of times, people said they stopped Russian firemen from trying to break into safes and take things out of the building. But it caused a lot of excitement and a lot of stress. Then when the fire was over, there was no place to go to work. So, here I was, I was the admin. section. As I remember, Bob Austin wasn't there. So, I had to get together with Joel Hulings and we went down onto the compound and we had to find places for people to work. We went to the Soviets. The consular section of the new building had never been affected because it was on the ground floor. So, they gave us permission to use that even though we didn't allow them their building here. Then there was a big meeting room auditorium. We divided that up. We took the bowling alley and put down a false floor and put DOD in there. We threw people out of townhouses. The army attache was a wonderful guy and was very cooperative and was due to leave post in three months. We said, "WE'RE sorry. We've got to move you into a small apartment." He didn't bellyache. We put the whole admin office in that townhouse. Then in this auditorium was the political section, the econ section, the science people, and agriculture and certain other organizations. We got makeshift tables in there, flat picnic tables and stuff. Nobody had enough table space for all their offices. So, if a table was allotted to the econ. Section, but they went out to lunch, they'd come back and find political officers sitting there working at their table. We set up one vault in the basement, in the motor pool area, of the building with two terminals. People would line up outside those terminals waiting to get in to use them to type their cables. There were often 5-10 people in line.

Matlock, the day after the fire, I expected him to say, "We've had it. Let's reduce to about half of our staff, send about half the people home, and let's prioritize what we're going to do." Well, he made a promise to the White House the day or so after the fire that this was a full performance embassy, that everything would continue at the same level it did before, and that was it. That's what he expected from everybody. So, everybody was trying to do the same job-

Q: Spaso House, was it used?

MACKLIN: It was not because they didn't want them over there. Mrs. Matlock was rather more difficult to get along with than he was. We had a maitre d'. There were two problems with Spaso House that I got involved in. One was, because they entertained so much, it was very difficult to come up with enough food to have food for all these dinners. You couldn't do it through official channels. So, the head cook, Pietro, who was an Italian who had married a Soviet and who spoke Russian with an Italian accent, was a master at knowing the black market. He would go off in the morning armed with vodka and cigarettes and come back with fresh veal and vegetables that you hadn't seen for weeks. He was wonderful at that. Well, some of the security guys said, "Well, he's trading on the black market and I don't really like that." The deputy budget officer was on his first overseas tour. His only job in the U.S. government before had been as an IRS inspector. So, this was all the kind of impropriety that gnawed at him. I said, "Look, damn it, it's a false economy here anyways. We've got to provide food for those people at Spaso House. He does it." Well, they put it in writing. I said, "We've got to deal with it." Lo and behold, Sherman Funk came out about three weeks later. I reminded him that I had written him a letter from Rome outlining some of the problems with an investigation at that point that had been counter to accepted legal procedure in the U.S. I said, "Gosh, I was hoping I'd get a response" and he said, "Didn't I ever respond to you? That was a wonderful letter. On this thing at Spaso House, do what you're doing. Don't worry about a thing. I'll send you a letter in a couple of weeks reaffirming this, but I want you to go ahead and let that guy keep dealing on the black market." Of course, he never sent the letter, but the guy kept dealing on the black market.

Q: How about the consular section? Did that cause any problems?

MACKLIN: No, he didn't cause me any problems. The guy who was the consul general, Max Robinson, was very bright and very competent. He was a good guy. Max and I got along. We had no problems at all. The first year I was there, my GSO was a guy named Jim McKeezer, who was on his last tour in the Foreign Service. He was a strict constructionist. You don't do anything you don't have to do. Just stick your neck out and you get into trouble. Well, in the old days, the Soviets didn't give people exit visas. Now they did. So, we suddenly got a large volume of visa applicants. It was unheard of in the old days. They didn't have enough space. So, Max Robinson came and said, "Maybe we could issue visas outside, but it's hard. Maybe if we took the side of the building and built kind of a lean-to and created windows out there." I said, "Makes sense to me." Well, the GSO really didn't like it. He just rubbed his heels and we finally had to order him to do it. He said, "Damn it, you let Max do this and the next thing you know he'll want walls. Then once he puts up walls, he's going to want it heated." I said, "Well, I would presume he will, so let's plan for it." "Well, then they're going to want bathrooms." Damn it, these people have to go to the bathroom, too. In any event, that was a constant battle to try and provide enough service for the consular section. They really needed it. They had their hands full. There were more Americans coming over, more Americans getting into trouble. Max Robinson did a good job. He was a good officer.

Q: You said the security people wanted to keep you all on the compound. What about life off the compound?

MACKLIN: Life was much better. I don't remember anybody being victimized the way they had been in the old days. There were incidents. I didn't notice that the second time. In fact, life off compound was nice. They had allowed free enterprise restaurants to spring up, so you could find new restaurants around town. If you paid them a little on the side, you could get good food. There were nightclubs that kind of sprang up, nothing special, but kind of interesting. The two circuses improved a lot. Then you had other firms come to town – McDonalds was a huge hit. At McDonalds, they started out providing hamburgers - at Russian prices. So, that meant a Russian could afford to get a hamburger at McDonalds. For us, it meant you could get a hamburger for about three cents. The Russians, you would see them lined up for blocks around McDonalds, waiting to go in. It was good food and it was cheap. Pizza Hut came in after the first year. Ice Cream, Baskin Robbins. Pizza Hut provided pretty good pizza. So, there were things like this. They restored some of the hotels. The Metropole was restored beautifully. So, there were social attractions outside in the city. The flea market sprang up. When I had been there before, Russians couldn't sell anything. The only way to sell anything was through what we called the government commission. You'd go there. It's kind of like a pawn shop. You could buy things and most of the stuff was crap. But at the flea market, it was really free enterprise. You could get some good stuff. Individual Russians had a shot at getting some hard currency. So, it was fun on the weekends, if you didn't have to work, to go off and buy things.

Q: Did you get out at all? By this time, we had some consul generals around, didn't we?

MACKLIN: Actually, we only had Leningrad while I was there. I got three or four times. That was a lot of fun. It was a fascinating city. They had a lot of problems down there that we tried to help them with. Yekaterinburg didn't open until later on when I was on the desk and the same with Vladivostok.

Q: Kiev?

MACKLIN: We tried to open Kiev. Finally, it did. The last year I was there, John Gunderson went down there with two other people and opened it up. But the problem was, the Department wouldn't give us any money. We owned four apartments in Kiev, but they had fallen apart and they needed to be redone. We didn't have an office building. John Gunderson was assigned down there as consul general. He's a good guy who did a good job. He was a tad arrogant and kept coming up to see us and saying, "Why can't you guys give me what I need?" We couldn't even support the Moscow mission on the budget we had. So, there was a lot of friction developed. We tried to get money from Washington from FBO and just came up empty handed.

There was one other problem I can mention in the admin side. When I arrived there, the budget section basically didn't work. The budget officer never knew how much money he had. Our accounting staff was maintained offsite in Bonn. There were five dedicated FSNs who handled the books for Embassy Moscow. But there was no computer link between the two. He wasn't a great manager and wasn't particularly liked. What he would do was, about every two or three months, he'd take his books and fly out to Bonn and spend a week going over the books and find out how much money he had. So, it was a terrible way to run things. He was too conservative when you needed to buy things. Then we'd find out later on that we could have made purchases that we desperately needed. So, I basically sacked the person who was doing our computers, who was incompetent. We got with a lot of nagging and persuading somebody who was very good at computers who was able to work up an e-mail line between Embassy Moscow and Embassy Bonn. So, it was a permanent line and the budget section was then able to get information daily. It worked really well. It allowed us to straighten out the budget section. The head of the budget operations was going through a lot of personal problems. His number two was this guy whose only job had been working for the IRS and he felt his main job wasn't really to help with the budget, but to try and identify people who might be cheating somehow. So, it took a long time, but we finally got that e-mail link and were able to straighten out the budget operation.

Then we had problems with the old guard from the Office of communications. This was at a time when the Department combined all of the computer people in the Foreign Service with the Office of Communications. The people from the Office of Communications, there was an old guard there who were very good at old technology but didn't understand new technology. They felt this woman we had who was doing the computer work was an upstart. They needed to rein her in. She was doing what we wanted her to do. So, OC sent out a representative, one of their regional guys, who felt he didn't need to talk to me and would go straight to the DCM. Well, the DCM said, "You've got to go deal with Matlock." We had a battle. They tried to knife this woman. They tried to spread rumors that she was incompetent and so forth. We were able to help her through it, but it was a stupid bureaucratic fight that we didn't need.

MACKLIN: We left a month before the coup. I always regretted it.

Q: What was your wife doing there?

MACKLIN: She went out to work in the political section. She was assigned to political internal. Did some traveling but really wanted to work in science, so she was able to do a switch with a guy named Ed Salazar and both were better off. She worked in science two years and liked it.

THOMPSON R. BUCHANAN
Consultant (Retired Foreign Service Officer)
Moscow (1990)

Thompson R. Buchanan was born in Beverly Hills, California in 1924. He received a bachelor's degree from Yale University. He served in the U.S. Navy from 1943-1946. Mr. Buchanan's Foreign Service career included positions in Germany, France, Russia, Burundi, Gabon, and Norway. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on March 15, 1996.

BUCHANAN: In 1990, I went back to Moscow working for INS, Immigration and Naturalization Service, as an interviewer of would-be refugees. I spent six weeks in Rome waiting for a visa, which was hardly a hardship, and then stayed at the Ukraine Hotel across the river from the embassy while I interviewed would-be refugees. Under the Frank Lautenberg amendment to the 1980 Refugee Act, there were certain categories of people who were given special dispensation. They were considered by definition to be persecuted...Soviet Jews, Evangelical Christians, notably Pentecostals, Ukrainian Uniates and Ukrainian Autocephalics. Jewish applicants, notably from Moscow, were obviously well briefed on what to say to demonstrate a fear of future persecution. Some incidents of anti-Semitism certainly contributed to genuine panic among some of the applicants. It was virtually impossible to reject even the most well-established Jewish applicant claiming persecution, and with them, all the members of their extended family. The Pentecostals were naively honest in what they had to tell us, but they came with huge, uneducated families, and we could anticipate that they would soon become a burden on our welfare system. As Pentecostals, they had refused to let their children join the Communist youth organization, the Komsomol, a requirement for higher education. As a result, they remained essentially manual or collective farm workers. Instead of being tied by these discriminatory criteria, we interviewers would have liked to be able to emulate the Canadians, who would look at a family and decide by more objective standards: How is their English? Will they assimilate easily in our country? Do they have skills that we need?

Under our program, many of the people accepted as refugees are old and difficult to assimilate. Brighton Beach in New York is an example of a community composed of dissatisfied immigrants, many of whom have made no effort to assimilate or even learn English. The Jewish community, however, has been very effective in providing a support system for its immigrants so that the percentage on welfare is lower, I believe, than with most other immigrants. We now have the phenomenon that Jewish refugees, who have become successful in America, are returning to Russia, protected by their American passport or at least Green Card, to show the Russians how to run a market economy.

The efforts of our applicants to prove that they qualified as refugees was sometimes hilarious, if also touching. Some Russians, whose parents had probably hidden the fact that they had Jewish blood by changing their names and documents, now tried desperately to find proof of their Jewishness. Or simply to invent the fact. Others discovered that if you couldn't claim any Jewish parentage, maybe you could prove that you were a Pentecostal. I had a lovely young couple and child, whom I would have liked to have let in. They had good English, were very attractive, had the right attitude and you knew they would have done very well in the States in a short time. They came in and said they were Pentecostals. I asked since when, and they gave me a date which was fairly close to the time when the decision was made to make Pentecostal one of our special categories. So, I asked some questions to determine whether they really were Pentecostal. "Were you christened?" "Oh yes, of course." And they gave me a date when they were christened. "By water?" How about "spiritual christening?" Well, "spiritual christening" refers to the moment when the spirit of the Lord is said to descend upon you and you speak in foreign tongues. Unfortunately, they didn't know what spiritual christening was. They looked up to heaven, but heaven didn't help them. I would have been overruled had I accepted them, but we would have liked to have had more flexibility.

Q: I know, as an old visa hand, exactly what you mean.

BUCHANAN: So, I was there in the visa mill churning these things out. It was always very sad because, under freezing conditions, you would find lines and lines of people, many with children, extending out to the street. Some of them had come from Central Asia and were dirty, often very smelly and some of them had very sad tales to tell.

I went back for six weeks in 1991 and had the luck to be living in the Ukraina Hotel in a room on the 21st story, opposite the "White House," the parliament building, when the attempted putsch took place on August 21. I was awakened at 4 a.m.. by the rumble of tanks coming down Kutuzovskii Prospekt under my window, fortunately to help and not attack Yeltsin and his supporters. It was a moving sight to walk across the bridge through the barricades to our Embassy on the other side. A lot of the young entrepreneurs and students of Moscow suddenly realized that their future was at stake and came to defend the White House. But the majority of Muscovites waited, in typical Russian fashion, to see what was the "correlation of political forces, " Kto Kovo. "

Four days after the abortive putsch, an older INS man of Russian parentage and I went down to the Caucasus. We were in Pyatigorsk and watched an open air meeting called to discuss the failed coup. It was obviously a time for a settling of accounts among local politicians and the citizenry. The Cossacks were very visible and vocal. The local Party bosses were shouted down as they tried to explain why they had waited so long before jumping on the Yeltsin bandwagon by sending a message of support. Speakers cited all sorts of misdeeds and corruption, including how city hall had sold licenses to friends to open offices in city hall itself.

We returned to Mt. Elbrus, where Nan and I had skied in 1978. We took the gondola ride to the top and then rode a chair lift that looked as though the metal chairs had been welded together by someone in their back garage. We said, "What are we doing on this?" Anyway we survived, but as we got off, a little old lady came up and handed me a tiny little booklet published by a German Protestant sect basically praying for our souls. I think, perhaps, she thought we would be vulnerable after our chair lift experience.

A company in Washington interested in doing business in Russia asked me to look up a particular lady who was proposing to sell a variety of raw materials like marble. She proved to be a very impressive woman who was an official in one of the more progressive districts (raions) of Moscow. Although she was Jewish, she was determined not to emigrate but to remain and fight for a better Russia.

In 1992, an old friend and Leningrader, Bob Barry, who was then Deputy Assistant Secretary for European Affairs, asked if I would help out the Embassy in Moscow with humanitarian aid shipments that were getting underway, consisting of military surplus supplies from Europe. Beginning in February, I became the liaison between the Embassy and the Russian organization that handled the receipt of aid. I was given room 401 in the Russian aid headquarters, the former Gorbachev press center. As an illustration of the times, I ran one day into an interesting young man, who was a deputy in the parliament. He was red in the face and spitting mad. It seems that he had arranged to get our building for the aid organization, with Yeltsin signing the proper decree in January. Suddenly an official from Yakutiya in Siberia appeared with a document, also signed by Yeltsin, giving the building to the Yakuts. Naively I said, "Oh, I didn't know that the Yakuts had so much influence." He replied, "Influence hell, diamonds!" Like South Africa, Yakutiya is rich in gold but particularly diamonds. It has ties with the South African diamond firm, De Beers. The Yakuts had obviously paid off someone, who probably forged Yeltsin's signature, to get our building. In a typical bureaucratic compromise, the Yakuts ended up with two floors, including my room, while the aid organization retained floors one, five and six.

The hard-driving Richard Armitage ran this humanitarian effort. For State, I helped his representative in Moscow decide what Russian organizations would receive what supplies and monitor the arrival of those supplies at the airport, and their receipt by the agreed organizations. We sent Russian-speaking American students with the supplies to monitor their actual delivery to the needy recipients. A number of times I stood for six or seven hours at the airport in freezing temperatures, while we wondered where the trucks were that were supposed to meet the shipment. I personally accompanied only one delivery of supplies, in this case to a prison about five hours from Moscow -- the only time we made such a selection. We arrived late at night. Our packages were supposed to be for the young men in the prison, many of whom had been cooped up 29 to a room for as much as two years, with very little food -- not for the older male inmates. To my embarrassment, most of our boxes said "women" on the side, containing everything from tampons to facial cream. The rather fatherly officer in charge of the prison reassured me, saying that the 256 women on his staff would greatly appreciate the shipment. And since the wardens in prisons in Russia often do not live much better than the prisoners, I didn't mind.

As part of my liaison function, I was invited to accompany the Minister of Social Affairs, a very attractive lady, to Frankfurt, flying on an AN 140, the largest transport in the world at that time. The Russians wanted to show that they were helping with the shipment of humanitarian aid.

Q: What about military supplies?

BUCHANAN: We liquidated many of the military warehouses in Western Europe for dairy products, food, clothes, canned goods, chili (the Russians didn't know what to do with it and didn't like it), and things like that. A lot of the stuff you had to cook and we had a little brochure on how to do this. A great deal of what we sent was of very little direct use to the Russians. It was symbolic more than practical aid, often probably being used for barter or sale.

Q: This was because of the basic sort of collapse of the internal system of the Soviet Union?

BUCHANAN: Yes, that is right. It followed the release of prices when everything became tremendously expensive and people couldn't afford to buy very much. It was not famine yet, but people were hungry.

We had a query from Montclair, New Jersey, regarding the situation in its sister city, Cherepovets, northwest of Moscow, so I went up there on a weekend. What I determined, as in most of these places, the people were not starving. What they really needed was medical supplies. I went to a 1,000 bed hospital there run by a very impressive surgeon. Among other things I said to him, "You know Westerners are concerned about going to Russian hospitals; it is weeks before they are released. Why?" He said, "In all of my hospital I have one EKG machine. That is the only apparatus that I have. I have to keep people a long time in bed to get some idea what may be wrong with them. I don't have any equipment. We would give anything for even secondhand equipment."

That was really my major push when I came back. I wrote a long report on Cherepovets stating they could use notably medical equipment, funneled through some of the private organizations that were beginning to be established in Cherepovets. The USSR, as you know, had no tradition of charity; in fact it was forbidden for non-state organizations to do charitable work. But charity organizations, both church and private, were slowly beginning to be put in place. Some of our aid could be channeled through these organizations. That was one of the conclusions of my visit.

The most interesting visit that I had was to Semipalatinsk in Kazakhstan. Secretary of Defense Cheney's daughter worked for Ambassador Armitage, head of our humanitarian aid program: she was in charge of conversion of military industry to civilian use. She asked me to go out to Semipalatinsk to prepare the way for two members of the Executive Corps to go there to see what they could do to convert the Russian "Nevada testing grounds," if you will, to peaceful use. The idea of dropping a couple of American businessmen with no Russian on the cold plains of Kazakhstan didn't seem to make a lot of sense to me, but I went out anyway. I went out prepared for a warmer climate and arrived in a blizzard and practically went into shock I was so cold.

The mayor of Semipalatinsk had just come back from a year in a business school in Tokyo. He had all sorts of bright ideas of what he thought could be done for his town. There is the town of Semipalatinsk and then there is what they call the "polygon" or military research complex. When I was in Semipalatinsk, I learned that there was a delegation of American high temperature experts visiting the polygon. I concluded that, where there is something of serious scientific interest in Russia, American corporations will send out their own delegations without any nudging from the US Government.

Among my more interesting visits in Semipalatinsk was one to a factory producing amphibious vehicles, and other small vehicles for the military. It was a caricature of a filthy Russian plant, with debris strewn all over the place. The youngish, arrogant director had his own ideas of what he wanted to produce in the new market economy, namely, an amphibious, all-terrain vehicle that he planned to sell on the world market. He was totally scornful of the suggestion by the mayor of Semipalatinsk that he convert his plant into the first vehicular industry of Kazakhstan. His clearly racial reaction to a proposal by a Kazakh, much better educated than he, belied the frequent claims made by Kazakhs regarding the racial harmony pervading in their country.

From the military vehicle plant we visited a Kazakh plant for cutting marble. The contrast was striking. The Kazakh plant was immaculate. I had seen this in Central Asia where the Russian quarter was dirty and the native quarter was kept clean and neat. Different cultures and traditions. The marble plant manager complained to me because some fellow from New Jersey had swindled them. He had promised to do all sorts of things, and he had a contract, but he wasn't following through, etc.

My visit to Semipalatinsk told me a little bit of what we needed to do in Russia as a whole, namely, do something to promote local small industries -- for canning, producing bricks or glass factories -- enterprises that would provide local employment and also provide the consumer goods that Russia needed. AID was not doing this. That became a main theme of an article I wrote after I came back.

The most difficult part of my trip, besides persuading, particularly the Russian military that was very suspicious of my whole mission, was hospitality. The great thing in Kazakhstan is horse meat and horse sausage, which I found virtually inedible. The mayor invited me back for potluck dinner. The advantage of potluck was I was not the honored guest and didn't get the sheep's eye. But what I did get was an enormous platter of very tough pasta with piles of this inedible sausage on top. Aside from the fact that the lady of the house insisted that I take a second helping, they were a charming family. They insisted that their son be present to learn how to behave in public.

I came away from Kazakhstan with a variety of ideas of what could be done and what I would suggest that our Executive Corps guinea pigs look at. First, I suggested that they choose men who grew up in desolate areas like Cheyenne, Wyoming. My whole trip proved to be academic, or worse. I was told when I asked when the executives were leaving, that it had been decided that the radiation level in the Semipalatinsk area was too high to risk sending someone there. Thank you very much!

Q: And would you mind standing a little away from the desk!

BUCHANAN: On the basis of that humanitarian aid assignment, I wrote an article that appeared in the April 1993 Foreign Service Journal concerning the type of aid that we should be trying to provide to Russia, and how we needed to understand that Russia would work out its own path to development in its own good time. What was required of America was patience and understanding -- not an American forte. 1992 was my last professional contact with Russia. In 1994 I concocted a project which would have provided me with an excuse to keep going back to Russia, namely, promoting a sister resort relationship between Jackson Hole, Wyoming, where I vote, and Teberda, which is a nature reserve near Dombai, which is an Alpine ski and climbing resort, both in the Karachai-Cherkess Autonomous Republic on the Russian border with Georgia. This spectacularly beautiful area was former Premier Kosygin's favorite retreat and the most luxurious hotel inn in the area is still referred to as Kosygin's dacha. A local businessman is trying to convert it into a retreat for the rich and famous. I went there with letters from the mayor of Jackson, and a box of medical supplies for the local hospital. I arranged the trip through the divorced wife of our former Elbrus friends, now remarried to an American in Oklahoma. Her friends in Moscow must have thought that I was coming with big bucks, because they arranged for me to meet upon my arrival with a Vice Minister of the Economy. My most intriguing contact claimed to work for the Federation of UNESCO clubs, one of whose functions was to promote sister city relations with the West. This supposed schoolmate of the vascular surgeon-alpinist, who was accompanying our small delegation of three Americans to Dombai, was quick to tell me that he had retired from the KGB only two years before. He said that he was now a member of the international organization of retired intelligence officers founded by Bill Whipple of CIA, and that he had toured 33 cities in the US lecturing about the KGB. He was presumably coming along to see what this old "cold warrior" was doing at his age, trying to set up some project in an ethnically sensitive area of the Caucasus. He had done his homework, reminding me, for example, who had been my station chief in Leningrad. Actually, he was a quite amusing and helpful fellow, a former dean of the consular corps in, I believe, Osaka, Japan.

As the oldest man present, I was regularly named "Tamadan" or master of ceremonies Caucasus style for our evening banquets. To judge by my frequent hangovers, I was not the drinker of vodka that I used to be. The skiing in "Dombai also left something to be desired: ungroomed slopes and a chairlift that broke down, leaving me freezing, floating in air for two and a half hours, unlike my companions too high to jump. A young lady seated in the chair beside me probably saved me from hypothermia by periodically rubbing my back. Dombai has great tourist potential, but the facilities for the 600-800,000 Soviet tourists who used to throng there are now virtually empty, as Russians who can afford to travel prefer to go to Switzerland. I did not generate much interest in my project when I returned to Jackson. The mayor who sponsored me had been fired, and I doubtless deterred skiers by my overly frank description of what needed to be done to make Dombai a modern ski resort. I have not returned to Russia since 1994, but I am again planning a trip there, this time via Anchorage, Alaska, to explore Siberia and the Maritime Provinces. I cannot explain this addiction for Russia. It is rather like reading a fascinating, disturbing novel that you want to put down but can't.

The Foreign Service is not the career that it used to be. But still, life in the Service can expose you to a language and culture, and human experience, that can become your life passion, if you are as fortunate as I was. It is worth the gamble.

GORDON GRAY
Soviet Desk Officer, Near East Affairs
Washington, DC (1990-1992)

Ambassador Gordon Gray was born in New York in 1956. He received his BA from Yale and MA from Columbia University. He joined the Foreign Service in 1982. His overseas assignments include Karachi, Amman, Ottawa, Cairo, Baghdad and as ambassador to Tunisia. Ambassador Gray was interviewed in 2016 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

GRAY: As desk officer I went to his confirmation hearing before the invasion. As I mentioned before, Skip was my DCM in Amman. In addition, when I was on the Kuwait desk I worked with his desk officers when he was a Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense. I then worked for him when he was Deputy Assistant Secretary of State.

Q: How did you find your work with the court in exile I imagine you dealt with the court in exile didn't you?

GRAY: No, because my tour ended right at the time of the invasion due to the way the assignment and transfer process worked. I left the desk shortly after the invasion, and moved across the hall. I was the Middle East watcher on what was then the Soviet desk and so I was dealing with the same issue, just from a different perspective.

Q: What was your job and title?

GRAY: On the Soviet desk?

Q: Yeah. What were the responsibilities?

GRAY: I had the Middle East portfolio on the Soviet desk during the three-quarters of my tour. Once the Soviet Union dissolved (on Christmas Day 1991), I focused on Russian foreign policy in general.

Q: Okay you talked about the initial Soviet reaction to the invasion to Kuwait, and our concerns. What were we up to?

GRAY: There was a real schism within Soviet policymaking circles about the invasion of Kuwait. On the one hand, just as Syria today is a client important to Russia, the same was true of Iraq at the time. There was a very strong relationship between Soviet diplomats and the Iraqi government; a large number of Soviet diplomats had served there. There was also a strong military and intelligence relationship. Yevgeny Primakov was a confidante of Saddam Hussein. In sum, there were many within Soviet foreign policymaking circles who reflexively and with great determination supported Saddam and the invasion. On the other hand, there were those like Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze who saw the bigger picture of the changing U.S.-Soviet relationship. Fortunately for us, Secretary Baker had developed a very strong relationship with him. I do not want to make it sound as if it was a foregone conclusion that the United States and the USSR would cooperate on this issue, because it certainly wasn't. But at the highest levels, the Baker-Shevardnadze relationship succeeded in keeping the Soviets on side. You'll recall all of the Security Council resolutions passed. The Soviets supported them and did not use their veto.

Q: What was your impression of being in the Soviet sphere of influence in the State Department? Was it a different world?

GRAY: The Soviet what?

Q: I mean dealing with Soviet affairs it must have been quite a different world wasn't it for you?

GRAY: It was, and particularly for me as I had only served in NEA to that point. Moreover, the Soviet desk was sufficiently large and sufficiently influential that it was in effect a mini-bureau. I found it a very collegial place to work. I really lucked out in the sense that being there at such a pivotal time when the Soviet Union disintegrated.

Q: Did you find that your colleagues appreciated the various sensitivities and currents that ran in the Middle Eastern bureau?

GRAY: I'm not sure that I fully understand the question.

Q: The issues of the Middle East I mean they were dealing with one of the two major concerns of the State Department at the time; the Soviet Union and the Middle East.

GRAY: If the question you are getting at is was there any friction with the Near East Bureau or anything like that, I didn't...

Q: Yeah, well that's it or a difference. I mean you are a new boy on the block and I was wondering if you felt any strains or difficulties in dealing with the Near Eastern problem.

GRAY: No, I think in some ways the people on the Soviet desk appreciated the fact that I had good relationships with people in NEA personally, and had insights as to what was going on. I think the opposite was true as well; my friends in NEA appreciated that I could share perspectives from the Soviet desk. There is a great expression in Arabic which is that "the fish rots from the head." Getting back to my comment before, wiring diagrams are never as important as the people. We had a very strong leadership on the Soviet desk and it was also extremely collegial leadership. Sandy Vershbow was the director my first year; he later became Ambassador to Russia. The deputy director during my entire tour was John Tefft, who is our current ambassador to Russia. The director my second year was Larry Napper, who was later named ambassador twice, including to Kazakhstan. The head of my section was John Ordway, who, like Larry, was also named ambassador twice, including to Kazakhstan. While they were all obviously very accomplished, they were also low-key and collegial individuals, so there was no "us versus them" mentality.

Q: Were the people dealing with the Soviet Union per se having problems in our taking their longtime colleague Syria on as an enemy?

GRAY: I'm sorry – again?

Q: Was your group getting reports of this policy of siding with Kuwait against Iraq causing difficulty within the Soviet Union or Russia at the time?

GRAY: I wouldn't put it as with Kuwait against Iraq; it was more siding more with the United States. It did cause problems within, and we saw manifestations such as Primakov trying another shuttle mission to Baghdad to get Saddam to back down, virtually at the last minute. But at the end of the day Gorbachev and Shevardnadze had the upper hand and their perspective prevailed. I am sure that behind the scenes there was a lot of bureaucratic intrigue that was opaque to us at the time. Maybe we'll learn more when the Soviet archives are opened.

Q: Were there any particular problems that you dealt with while you were on that job?

GRAY: It seemed as if I was doing press coverage every day Primakov said something or traveled, but that's the life of an action officer in the State Department. Iraq was obviously the big issue for my first six months on the Soviet desk. We were also working on Soviet disengagement from Afghanistan. The policy direction was clear and the Undersecretary for Political Affairs at the time, Mike Armacost, very much led that effort. While there was plenty of work to do at the action officer level, it was not contentious. The third issue was the transformation of the Soviet Union. There was a failed coup attempt against Gorbachev in 1991, followed by his Christmas Day 1991 announcement that the Soviet Union was no more. We then saw the rise of Yeltsin. It really was a new world in U.S.-Russian relations. (I'll say 'Russian' now since the Soviet Union had dissolved.) It affected the work of everyone on the Soviet desk because just about everything was possible. We were cooperating in ways that had been unimaginable before. On a lot of issues, we were able to find a resolution. I think we all had an appreciation at the time that we were living in special times and that the bilateral relationship was so good it could only go in one direction.

Q: It really had a terribly exciting time.

GRAY: It was great. That's why one joins the Foreign Service – to see history being made. I wasn't the one making history, and I wasn't a Soviet expert, but if you are interested in foreign policy it was just a tremendous experience. I was fortunate to be surrounded by not just experts, but collegial ones at that. If I may, let me digress again with a personal story. It was the day after Thanksgiving, when offices in Washington tend to be under-staffed. There may have been a couple of other people on the Soviet desk that day, but it seemed like my colleague and I were the only two in the office. Neither of us had served in Moscow, and neither of us spoke Russian, so of course we got an urgent request from the White House on how to translate the term "make way for ducklings." You may remember that Barbara Bush, then the First Lady, was going to Moscow, and she wanted to present a replica of the statue of the ducklings from the children's book to a park in Moscow. (The original is in Boston Commons if I am not mistaken.) Jack and I looked at each other and we said, "There's got to be an interpreter somewhere - we sure can't answer that question." Those were the easy crises to deal with.

Q: Were we concerned about developments in Russia at the time or was it a positive feeling?

GRAY: At the risk of giving a very State Department-like answer, I would say both. It was a very positive atmosphere because there were so many avenues for cooperation. At the same time, the experience we had had with Soviet policymakers over Iraq was illustrative of the very strong currents that resisted Gorbachev and the Gorbachev-Shevardnadze policies. To quote Alan Greenspan in a completely different context, I don't think there was any "irrational exuberance."

Q: You know from the outside I felt a great deal of pleasure for George Bush I and his State Department in dealing with a whole post 1989 period.

GRAY: There was a masterful vision of what the post-1989 world should look like. The strategy was strong and there was also was a terrific execution of the policy.

Q: I think one of the amazing things I looked at was we were very careful not to exude triumphalism at the top. Other people were but we weren't.

GRAY: That's right - there was no gloating. I certainly don't recall a "no gloating" memorandum, but that was clearly the message. I don't know if you've read Jon Meacham's biography of the first President Bush but it makes it very clear that was the way his mother raised him.

Q: You don't gloat.

GRAY: I think that translated very effectively into the way he and Secretary Baker managed the post-1989 world.

Q: Did you feel like you are sitting in the midst of masters of the universe at the time?

GRAY: Very much so, because the State Department had two extremely effective Secretaries of State who had the great confidence of the President. Once when Secretary Shultz was traveling, his staff – who knew that the staff assistants toiled in the vineyards – invited us to his inner office. Secretary Shultz had Captain's Chairs with a seal from each of the Cabinet-level posts that he had held. So there was one from when he was director of OMB, one from when he was Secretary of Treasury, etc. Secretary Shultz's value was not just his experience, but his integrity. He didn't need to be Secretary of State - he had already done it all and could go back to Stanford and live a much less stressful life. My guess is that President Reagan understood that. And certainly the relationship between President Bush 41 and Secretary Baker was even closer. When the Department has a Secretary who is that close to the President and that well-regarded, it makes everybody's life in the Department a lot easier, and, I suspect, everybody's life in the interagency community as well.

Q: One has the contrast it when Henry Kissinger seemed to want to accept all the glory to himself and personalize it so much.

GRAY: Yes.

Q: Well, what did you do after this time? Is there anything else we should talk about on the Russia desk?

GRAY: No, I think we hit the high points. As I said, it was a wonderful time to be on the desk, and a wonderful time to be in the State Department for that matter.

Q: I was just going to say were they still paying you for having this wonderful job? I mean what the hell.

GRAY: They were still paying me, which was good as I had growing family. They may have been paying me my market value, but I would have accepted more money as well.

GREG THIELMANN
Chief, Office of Strategic Forces Analysis, INR
Washington, DC (1990-1993)

Mr. Thielmann was born and raised in Iowa and was educated at Grinnell College and Princeton University. A specialist in Political-Military Affairs, he held a number of positions dealing with such matters as Strategic Proliferation, Arms Control and Missile Programs. He also served abroad at several posts in the capacity of Political Officer and Consular Officer. His last position was Chief, Office of Analysis for Strategic Proliferation and Military Affairs in State's Bureau of Intelligence and Research. Mr. Thielmann was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2004

THIELMANN: In 1990, I went to the Bureau of Intelligence and Research (INR) and became the division chief for strategic forces analysis, which in a lot of ways was a continuation of my time in the Soviet Union, because our main concern in that job was with the breakup of the Soviet Union -- who had their finger on the nuclear trigger? It was of course Soviet strategic forces much more than Chinese or any nascent nuclear power that we worried about. That was our focus.

Q: So we'll pick this up in 1990 when you're off to INR.

Today is March 14th, 2005. Greg, how did you find the atmosphere of INR at that time. Were people listening? In general, what was your impression?

THIELMANN: I had a very favorable impression of INR, once I was inside it. I remember having had occasional contact with INR from the policy bureau perspective. I remember at the time they were obviously the keeper of secrets and had some interesting information, and they were capable people in it, but I did not really appreciate what a resource it was until I was inside it. Then I realized that for example the department had a chair in the intelligence community when the fifteen agencies or some subset of them got together to decide on a national assessment or some lower order of intelligence community proclamation. The State Department was there to put in its interpretation. One of the things that I had not appreciated until I got into INR was that there were very few entities in the intelligence community that did not have what I would call a kind of institutional bias which sort of skewed their assessments. All of the entities of the intelligence community have institutional biases I believe, including INR, but some of them seemed to pose a real threat to doing things that would, let's say, cast a dim light on their own agencies policy proclivities. If I can just put that another way, in the State Department it really did not matter if our analysis was critical of current U.S. foreign policy. This was little understood outside the INR, but certainly inside the building I quickly came to realize that the leadership of the intelligence bureau would fiercely protect the intellectual integrity of the line analysts. So an analyst didn't really have to worry about a judgement or a conclusion that would embarrass the others in the building or elsewhere in the U.S. government. The job was about as objective as one could imagine inside a government context. You obviously had to worry about people continuing to listen to you, and, if you got to be such a nag or if your tone was too snide and everything, you might turn off the kind of policy consumers that you wanted to pay attention to your product. But it was really refreshing to realize how academic in a sense INR was. You were expected to be on top of your product and to use evidence intelligently. But you were encouraged to use your judgement, make a leap when necessary as long as you made clear that this was a guess and that you reported accurately on what the confidence level was based on the evidence available. But it was quickly apparently to me that this was the kind of place where one could go home satisfied in the evening because you had done the best job you could given the evidence available to help policymakers understand what we knew from existing information. Much to my surprise I found out that, in many ways, that was more satisfying than being a cog in the policy machine and very often supporting policy with which you had serious reservations. Although broad of course as the implementer of policy you would also have a heavy responsibility to report what the foreigners thought of the policy or what the situation was in a foreign country. So being an objective reporter of facts had its own satisfaction. But I found that for me personally it was very satisfying to have a few layers between me as an analyst and the Secretary of State, the highest level consumer, and to be in that role of controlling the end result of your output much more than you did as a policy player.

Q: Well, one of the things we'll talk about if the interagency discussions and the biases there. One of the things, and you correct me if I'm wrong, was that in a way State had a certain exclusion from the budgetary process. I'm sure as regards the CIA and the Defense Department an awful lot of their analysis was based on how much money they'd get in order to collect this information, all sorts of equipment and paid sources and all that. Essentially we were doing it with what we had. So that nobody was saying well, if you think if you're knocking our product, what you're doing is you're cutting out a big slice of our budget.

THIELMANN: That's right. That's an important observation about the way things worked. The State Department's INR was on such a shoe string that, if one looked at the billions and billions being spent by the intelligence community, INR didn't even show up as a blip. INR's budget was basically the personnel costs of 220 people or something like that. Other elements of the intelligence community would have a big stake in people appreciating and valuing their own particular sources of intelligence information whether it was photographic imagery satellites, signals intelligence apparatus or human intelligence. All of these things were costly, and there would be a bias toward making whatever contribution your agency specialized in seem extremely important. The best example of that I think really is CIA and Human Intelligence. The CIA was the agency responsible for putting all of that evaluatory language on any kind of spy reporting. So any espionage would or should've been labeled in terms of what access that source had, what their record of reliability was and any kind of other information that, while protecting the name of the source, would allow the consumer to have some sense of what kind of information this was. From my point of view that was a really flawed part of the system because the CIA had an institutional interest in praising the value of its sources, and over the course of my career there were a number of times when I saw that those labels were not accurate. This is apart from the whole experience in Iraq where the Iraqi National Congress and others had obvious motives to slant the information. In that case even the CIA often said these sources were unreliable. But I'm talking about sources that the CIA kind of incorrectly labeled. As a foreign service officer abroad there were times when we caught this on information that we knew could not be true. Yet the CIA label is consistently reliable, and in at least one instance we found out it was someone who had left the job a year before he was claiming to still hold it. It was obvious because of what he was saying that this person could not be plugged in, and yet the CIA was not rigorous in their labeling. So to me that's an example of how the institutional interests of some of the other agencies would rob them of objective and hard-nosed assessments.

Q: Well, also too I think that, I'll make a comment on this while we're talking in general terms. INR probably is closer to "what does this mean for policy?" In other words it's really very close to action. Do we change our policy or not? Other ones are the accumulation of data, and the people who are on the intelligence side are not having to ask "what do we do about this tomorrow?" When INR is much closer to the policy development process. Does that make sense?

THIELMANN: That points to another institutional advantage we had over many others. We were so close to the consumers of information, literally minutes away, people down the corridor, a couple floors up, other people in the building. This was an advantage that hardly anyone else in the intelligence community had. DIA (Defense Intelligence Agency) was mostly not in the Pentagon. They were in a separate building. CIA headquarters was on the other side of the river from most of their key intelligence consumers. Those agencies were so large that it would be very unusual for the producers of the intelligence and the analysts to really hear directly from the consumers the reactions to their product. So if there were any reactions at all, it was sort of filtered down through many layers. Their activity would be much more like thrown over the wall or shot in the dark as regards its utility. We had a better sense not because we were better analysts but because of the proximity and the constant contact with the policy consumers. We had a much better notion of what was important to them on a particular day or what was relevant given the overall policy context in terms of our analysis.

Q: Well, another thing and then we can move long. I think size also has a factor because the more people working over something, just means more layers. I'm told that the Jordanian desk in CIA has maybe ten people. The INR desk has one or two at most. You end up with the usual government thing of massaging something, editing it, and it doesn't come out. It gets neutered as it goes through the editing process of too many people going too far. It means that something can be wrong. But it also means, if you just have one person or two people working on something, it comes out as a little more stark, unedited as opposed to one that goes through the bureaucratic process of layers, that takes away all the bite, is safer but not perhaps as valid.

THIELMANN: There are a lot of different dimensions to the truism that small really is beautiful, and it is for intelligence analysis as well as a lot of other things. You've referred to some of the ways in which that's true. Certainly the layering is one way. Whatever ground truth you're starting with or keen insights of the line analysts, if you go through too many layers, you're going to weave around and get a product at the end which may be rather far from the original analytical insight. The CIA in particular had so many resources and such polished presenters in terms of wordsmiths and editors that you had a lot of very glossy products and some good writing in some of those products. But by the time it was ripe for publishing and presenting to others you may have strayed rather far from the ground truth that the line analyst originally developed. That just wasn't the case in INR. Usually the Secretary would be reading words of the line analyst. They were sometimes edited or massaged through an office director or the assistant secretary or deputy assistant secretary but not nearly as much as in the other agencies. So that was certainly one advantage. Another advantage of being small that I came to appreciate at INR was that it's almost impossible to lose sight of the forest because you can't be a specialist in all the trees. It's a very good thing that the U.S. government has specialists on the trees and on small detailed issues, but you have access to them as an INR analyst so you don't need to have that in-house. What you do need to have is someone who can put the various things together and describe the forest. I found that one aspect of that was that my office dealt with technical issues, weapons intelligence basically, political-military things, but it was always in the context of some complicated geo-political situation, about which INR experts were in frequent contact with us and also very nearby. If we were doing something on Iraqi weapons of mass destruction, we would always be doing it with the Near East/South Asia office and the Iraq experts. I think that easy access and frequent interaction on a personal level with those people meant that, even though we didn't always agree with their spin on things, there was a close interaction and working relationship, which in the other larger agencies often became a very formal thing. I think it made us a little bit more nimble and more integrated in our end product than some of the other agencies. Also it had an advantage from a supervisory aspect. The assistant secretary and deputy assistant secretaries knew the people whose product they were editing. They knew the eccentricities of the analysts. They knew who was green and who was mature, who was very careful and precise about language and who wasn't. They could make compensations. I just can't imagine in the larger agencies when you got to something that was going to be published in the National Intelligence Daily or whatever that the editors personally knew the people who were writing the product. In this brief conversation we're talking about three different ways that small size can be an advantage. There are obviously also disadvantages. If one analyst gets sick, INR is in trouble. Usually there is one person who can fill in, but that one person has a lot of other responsibilities. So there are obviously advantages and disadvantages, but when it comes to integrated analysis, self confidence, and fidelity to the evidence, I think it's hard to beat the size that INR had.

Q: Who was the head of INR at the time?

THIELMANN: Stapleton Roy was the head. Well, let me go back. Douglas Mulholland was head of INR when I came in 1990. This was someone who had been part of the small Treasury Department intelligence operation under President Bush, I think. So he came over to the State Department. In my second iteration in INR it was Stapleton Roy who had been ambassador to China and Indonesia. And Phyllis Oakley. They were basically, Phyllis Oakley, Stapleton Roy and then Carl Ford, those were all people I served under.

Q: Well, the first time 1990 to when were you in INR?

THIELMANN: 1990 to 1993, I extended one year.

Let me just throw in one other head of INR toward the end of my first tour there. Toby Gati, G-A-T-I, became assistant secretary so I had a very brief period with her. It was mostly Mulholland but then Toby Gati.

Q: How did you find Mulholland?

THIELMANN: Mulholland was a competent person, a nice person. I don't think he'll be in the list of INR greats. He was not a product of the foreign service or the State Department culture, but he was a gentleman and competent so people had no real complaints. If there were any secret desires it would have had a more feisty or stronger voice maybe in the interagency—

Q: Now coming from Treasury was he a sort of Baker confidante.

THIELMANN: Yes, he was. Yes, he was.

Q: So did you feel that you had—

THIELMANN: We felt that we were plugged into the Secretary because of that association, and that's always important for the analyst to feel that they have an entrée into the Secretary's office.

Q: Well, let's talk now about 1990 to '93 and your job was on the military side. I mean this had to be a fascinating time because we're talking about the rapid demise of the Soviet Union, all sorts of weapons up for grabs and everything else. Talk about your job.

THIELMANN: I was acting division chief because I didn't have the foreign service rank that fitted the position at the time. That job had been one of the most important in INR because it was trying to monitor and analyze Soviet strategic forces, which obviously were the large existential threat to the United States. It was also the office that worried about providing the relevant intelligence on that subject which would be used by those negotiating the strategic offensive arms treaties, the SALT treaties and then the START (Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty) treaties. So that was kind of the traditional main focus of the job, worrying about Chinese forces obviously and other countries that had nuclear weapons as well. It was overwhelmingly Soviet military power. Once the Soviet Union fell, one little dimension of the job really bloomed. The traditional efforts to look at the reliability of the command and control structures and how operationally orders to attack would've been conveyed to the missile forces. All of that which was before a very small subset of the job became much more important as the Soviet Union broke up into a number of different states including Belarus, Ukraine and Kazakhstan, each one of which hosted significant numbers of Soviet strategic forces. So that first tour in INR corresponded with this very delicate period of the U.S. working very hard in a number of ways to try to insure that these four countries with nuclear weapons transitioned to only one country with nuclear weapons. Or to put it another way, the Soviet control over the nuclear weapons would morph into a Russian control over nuclear weapons and Minsk, Kiev and Alma-Ata did not end up having their own nuclear forces bequeathed to them because of the breakup. It was particularly sensitive in the case of Ukraine because Ukraine more than the others had some of the largest and most sophisticated missile assembly plants, had a lot of indigenous expertise on how to make both the delivery vehicles and also the nuclear weapons.

So the Ukrainians had some real choices for keeping some of those nuclear weapons. What actually would have happened if they had continued along that path or if they had seriously pursued that path, we don't know. Obviously the Russians were very intent on them not having those options, but it was a real concern. There were a number of scenarios that were seriously considered that would have featured war between Ukraine and Russia. Most of those scenarios I think we thought were unrealistic, but that they were even seriously discussed showed what a real crisis this was and what a delicate period of time it was.

Q: Well, in a sort of peculiar way we and the Russians were both on the same side, weren't we?

THIELMANN: It was a very curious form of cooperation because we shared an interest with the Russians in ensuring that Russia maintained control over all those nuclear forces. In some respects we rooted for the safe transit of nuclear weapons from these other countries back to Russia so they could then be put online aimed at the United States. There was certainly some irony in that, but it was considered a far worse outcome if we had new independent centers of power that might also have targeted their weapons at the United States. So part of the irony also was that, as much as we wanted Russia to maintain control of the weapons, we genuinely wanted Ukraine to evolve in a western direction and to reanimate some of the traditions that were really alive in Ukraine as a European country. It was much more oriented toward the U.S. than the more Asian-oriented heartland of the Soviet Union was. So we were trying to encourage that. We were trying to get Ukraine to see itself as a country that would be benefited much more by pursuing a German or a Japanese model of obviously being capable of having nuclear weapons but, by pursuing a non-nuclear path, could find a better way to reintegrate itself into the western economy.

Q: Well, how did you find dealing with particularly the Defense Intelligence Agency and the CIA on this particular issue? I mean were there any problems or divergences?

THIELMANN: There were certainly some divergences and, while my memory is not terribly sharp on this, I think in general I would like to say we were a little bit more sophisticated in the scenarios that we used. Some of those probably from the Defense Department side of things put more credence in the outbreak of war between Ukraine and, Russia, and when we thought through those scenarios, it just seemed extremely unlikely. I mean for one thing there were so many Russians living in Ukraine. The eastern part of Ukraine was basically ethnic Russian. It just got kind of incredible to think about any scenario in which you would have one of these countries lobbying nuclear weapons at another. So I think, to put it neutrally, it was because we were closer to a more sophisticated analysis of the internal dynamics of Soviet society and the new emerging societies that we weighed the likelihood of those scenarios a little bit differently.

One of the other things that I remember about this era is that we received some very valuable human intelligence from some of our foreign allies. Without going into too much detail, I was impressed at the quality of information of one of our special partners in intelligence. They had presumably at much lower cost were providing better human intelligence, more critical useful human intelligence than our own U.S. agencies.

Q: Were you concerned about rogue scientists in the Ukraine or elsewhere exporting their knowledge of nuclear things to people such as Iran, Iraq and all that?

THIELMANN: That was definitely a constant concern. Even in INR where we had such limited resources, we tried to start keeping track of certain individuals about which there was intelligence. We tried to stay plugged into the other agencies who had the resources to look closely at this because this was seen by almost everyone in the intelligence community as a source of concern that in the end would be much greater than the prospect of Ukraine developing independent nuclear forces. The collapse of the Soviet economy and all those incentives and privileges and everything else that made life for weapons scientists about as good as it could be in a Soviet context led to people not getting paid month after month. The temptations became very great even though in that respect I think those who were not as familiar with the Soviet society maybe saw the temptations as being greater by putting ourselves in their shoes. I think there was for those who were not as close to the way the Soviet Union actually operated, it was just easy to imagine hundreds of thousands of scientists just contracting out to Libya or other countries.

Q: Yes, I mean when one looks at it, one thinks about oneself.

THIELMANN: Yes.

Q: If all of a sudden the State Department stopped paying me my pension, my God what would I do?

THIELMANN: That's right.

Q: But I guess they had support systems and other things.

THIELMANN: They had support systems and sort of a deep nationalism so that a lot of Soviet scientists would not be particularly comfortable working for the Iraqis or the Libyans, or the North Koreans or anyone else. I say that even in the knowledge that there were Russians and Ukrainians who did just that. The magnitude of the problem was probably not what we might think putting ourselves in their shoes. It was certainly a serious enough concern that we needed to inform the policy people who could actually do something to mitigate that danger and did in fact by aiding some of the labs and the weapons manufacturing facilities to give them another alternative at home for using some of their skills.

Q: What about the Soviet Black Sea fleet because it was a pretty sophisticated set of ships and all that including nuclear missiles. The problem was where did it belong?

THIELMANN: That was another incredible development that occurred as a result of the breakup. Sevastopol, the headquarters of the Soviet Black Sea fleet, was a very Russian city. It was extremely important in the Russian military context. It had this sort of glorious World War Two history as a heroic defense against the Nazi invasion. It was about as rock solid as any Russian city could be, and yet all of a sudden it found itself in the Ukraine. So all those Russian war ships and the Russian personnel were all of a sudden in another country that had its own designs on Russian ships. So that was another messy problem and of course one of the serious irritants in the Russian-Ukrainian relationship. Having been to Sevastopol while in the embassy in Moscow and having seen that firsthand, it was another way in which I suppose I benefited from having been a foreign service officer and our office benefited a bit from that kind of perspective. But we also understood that in terms of strategic forces, the Black Sea fleet was fading in significance, and it almost was almost irrelevant in terms of the strategic impact of the Russian Navy. I mean, it was all the Northern fleet and the Pacific fleet. That's where their sea-based nuclear deterrent was based. So the Black Sea fleet and those military capabilities, during the height of the Cold War had been exaggerated by the U.S. partly because it was good for raising funding. But no one I think ever really saw the Soviet Navy in the Mediterranean as being able to last very long if there were actually a war. So I think the Black Sea fleet in that conflict with Ukraine was of great significance in political terms but less so in military terms.

Q: With naval intelligence and all looking at the Black Sea fleet, did the defense people have a sort of a different view? Because as you say it's pretty obvious it's a write off. But in order to maintain enough ships in our Navy you've got to have a threat.

THIELMANN: Yes, I think it's pretty hard to ignore that dynamic entirely. This isn't to cast aspersions on the integrity of defense analysts or the Navy. But there's just a natural interest in looking at the order of battle of Russian ships and arguing that we had to have a comparable order of battle matching them cruiser for cruiser ignoring all these things like the bases that ring the Mediterranean with fixed wing aircraft that can attack those ships. It was just a horribly hostile environment for the Soviet Navy in the best of days to operate. I mean they could use port facilities in Syria or Egypt perhaps but—

Q: And get out of the Basra, exactly.

THIELMANN: I mean so vulnerable to being bottled up. I mean I would say that the U.S. Navy didn't have an institutional interest in presenting to the public the full dimensions of the Russian problems -- what the Soviet problems would be and what the U.S. problems would be if there were an actual conflict.

Q: While you were there, did you see any crisis coming up regarding missile control in this Soviet-Russian-Ukraine context during this '90-'93 period.

THIELMANN: There were some very delicate moments in which we analyzed what the Ukrainian options would be if they really wanted to seize control of forces, and it wasn't evident that the Russians could keep them from doing it if they really chose to. There were elements in the Ukrainian political spectrum that were arguing for that course of action. So it wasn't just a theoretical excursion of Western analysts. There were real Ukrainians who wanted to do that. I think my memory is that we were a little less alarmist about the prospects of that happening than some in other agencies. We recognized the danger and certainly highlighted it as a danger and treated it as an analytical priority because of the consequences, but we were a little less pessimistic about whether or not it would happen than were some in the other agencies.

Q: Was looking at the Israeli nuclear force sort of a no no at that time? I mean in other words for domestic political reasons, you just didn't talk about it.

THIELMANN: This was one of those areas in which it seemed to me that the long arm of the policy world stretched into the intelligence world. I remember from that period in INR working on national intelligence estimates, looking fifteen years out at the nuclear powers, I was somewhat amazed at the invisibility in these top-secret intelligence community surveys of world nuclear weapons. It was almost like the Israelis didn't exist. At that point it was really a very bizarre thing because the Indians and Pakistanis didn't have nuclear weapons at that point. We had the five MPT nuclear powers that existed in 1968 and the Israelis. The Israelis had a very significant nuclear capability with sophisticated delivery systems that could for example allow them to attack Ukraine or parts of Russia and a kind of nuclear force that in size was kind of approaching the British and French nuclear forces. Yet it seemed to be politically incorrect to say anything in these top-secret internal documents about Israeli nuclear capabilities. I remember protesting at analytical sessions and trying to push them to a more objective academic look at the issue not colored by the fact that the Israelis had their policy of ambiguity and did not want to admit that they had nuclear capability. I said that's no reason for us not to describe it as we know it. I mean whatever policy the U.S. wants to take in terms of subscribing to Israeli ambiguity we should not be kidding ourselves about the objective realities.

Q: Well, did you feel that this was self-censorship on the part of the intelligence community of saying, oh God if we do this it's sure to leak and it's sure to bring all hell on the Israeli lobby and Friends of Israel will be all over us? In other words this was not somebody from up above doing it. Where did you feel it was coming from?

THIELMANN: I really felt it was self-censorship. Now I wasn't maybe high enough in the hierarchy. Maybe it was more direct than that, but I think it was political savvy -- senior intelligence officials thinking this is a problem we don't want to have. We don't want the pro-Israeli lobby coming down hard on the U.S. government because of something that we did here so let's just not talk about it.

Q: Yes. It really is amazing. Well, what about China? How did we view China at that time, '90 to '93?

THIELMANN: What I remember about that era is that it was so difficult for the intelligence community to not use our own model of strategic forces development in thinking about the Chinese. So what I remember from that era was how strong the other agencies pushed in their analytical product for the assumption that China would have many more strategic nuclear weapons within some number of years, that they would have multiple independently targeted reentry vehicles on each of those missiles and that they would be telling policymakers the Chinese are basically going to take off. One of the reasons I remember that so strongly was because I was uncomfortable at the time since we had seen a history of the Chinese being very modest in their nuclear weapons programs. I mean they acquired nuclear weapons, and then they increased their capabilities at a very slow rate. It was nothing like either the U.S. or the Soviet development pattern -- kind of exponential increases in warheads. I remember at the time feeling that I didn't really have enough time as an analyst of Chinese strategic forces to really pound the table too hard on this issue. I remember being skeptical, but these memories came back to me several years later when I reentered the picture and found that lo and behold the Chinese hadn't done any of those things that the majority of the intelligence community seemed comfortable in predicting. But they were still at that same low level of strategic missiles that could threaten the United States.

Q: Well, as you are looking at this, did you find the normal military assumption of a worst case scenario. You can't say the United States will roll over the Iraqi Army in a matter of days practically. You have to say well, maybe such and such, whatever it is. It's always, you have to plan for the worst case. Was this coming through in the what you are getting out of the analysis people?

THIELMANN: I think that's certainly part of it, and I'm not as hard as some on the worst case analytical predisposition of the Pentagon. I mean I call it responsible prudent worst case analysis.

Q: I agree.

THIELMANN: But that's what they need to do. But that didn't mean that we had to do that. The way I would put it, our obligation in advising the senior State Department leadership was to present them with our best estimate of what was likely to happen and not what could in the worst circumstances happen. I mean we can identify that and encourage people not to forget that this most likely course could be wrong and that it could be even worse than that. But that shouldn't be our headline on intelligence products because that's very misleading. If you end up writing products that use screaming headlines and saying this country could do this when that's a ten percent probability, you've fundamentally mislead the Congress and the senior leadership because they don't read that as being something that's very unlikely. So to me that's the real difference. You do need to look at the worst case, but you also need to have perspective properly presented to the policy makers. So I think what was happening here was a reflection of the natural and understandable instincts of the military side of the intelligence community. But then the irresponsible senior intelligence officials who come up with the community products giving it more weight than it deserves and the kind of presentations that are made. I would also say even for those who understandably should look at the worst case, I don't think there was due deference to what the track record was of China even in that 1990 to 1993 interval. They should've drawn some conclusions from how China had behaved in the 1980s instead of just saying well, of course China could technologically develop independently targeted reentry vehicles. In order to provide the sort of U.S. level of protection of their modest force, there is an imperative they increase the number of warheads. I mean that's the way we would think. We would think you assume the worst of the other side so you have to make sure that you can survive an attack that the other side makes against you. The Chinese obviously didn't think that way because their forces in the early 1990s and certainly in later 1990s were getting perilously vulnerable to a first strike U.S. attack. But the Chinese weren't thinking the way we were about that because they were obviously willing to accept that kind of vulnerability.

Q: What about the powers in this time period of North Korea, India, Pakistan? Was this part of your portfolio?

THIELMANN: It's interesting in terms of portfolio our office in INR was still treating this as something the proliferation division looked at and not the strategic forces division. I was already a little uncomfortable with that because it's such an artificial distinction really. I mean the putative strategic powers or the countries that were emerging nuclear powers or had an apparent intent to continue pursuing that at least had to be something we were looking at because the expertise and the criteria of maintaining strategic forces and command and control and all those things were something that was in the realm of the strategic forces analyst not so much in the realm of those who were worrying about whether this missile production equipment was being transferred or not or range testing or range radars for testing missiles in flight. I mean ultimately there was a merger toward the end of the period of the missile proliferation into the strategic forces, which kind of took care of the problem for me anyway. That was a logical development. But in 1990 to 1993 it was still on the horizon. We knew that India and Pakistan were working on this, but we didn't know in either case for sure that they had made a decision to actually go forward. I'm going to have to take a break.

Q: Yes. Were there any either incidents, crises, amusing things or anything like that happening during this particular time?

THIELMANN: I don't think so. I mean I'm sure there were, but I'm drawing a blank at the moment on whether other developments—. One of the things that struck me about the particular office that I served in was we had a very able office director named Gary Dietrich, and he had a deputy named Alan Locke who I then went to work for later. It was a real sense that this particular office was one of the hardest working and well managed in the bureau. That made an impression on me because it was very easy to compare offices in a small bureau. You would see the office directors represented at morning meetings, and so it was very impressive in terms of the way the office was managed and the recruitment of personnel and everything. I was impressed with this particular office.

Q: Well, did you ever feel that you were outmanned, outgunned or something at the joint meetings with particularly Defense and CIA?

THIELMANN: Yes, we always felt that one of the particular frustrations in INR, and I experience this much more when I became office director, was it always seemed like we were just on the verge of getting the minimum number of people. We could never quite get there. There was always some critical shortage in the office, some critical issue that you had to cover that for one reason or another you just couldn't get people on board. Either security was taking a long time or veteran's preference indicated that you had to choose someone that you didn't want to choose or INR seemed to be always at its personnel limit. It was always a real juggling act to bring someone else onboard, and then there would be freezes and everything. So personnel was a constant problem and the State Department had not been particularly generous over the years either. When it took the various cuts that it experienced over those decades, it was always tempting to shave a few more analysts off of INR.

Q: Of course this is a particularly bad time.

THIELMANN: Yes.

Q: Personnel wise throughout the State Department.

THIELMANN: Yes. That's right.

Q: Throughout the government but—

THIELMANN: That's right.

Q: But the State Department was taking quite a hit. There just wasn't the pressure from above. Baker was not very interested.

THIELMANN: Yes, that's putting it mildly. I mean, we all noticed it at the time. This gets back to that exact time, 1993, that the Soviet Union broke up, and Baker gained points on the Hill by saying well, we can eat all those cuts. We can established fourteen new embassies, and we don't need more people for those fourteen new embassies. It was an absurd statement and we paid for it in a terrible way.

DAVID M. SCHOONOVER
Agriculture Minister-Counselor
Moscow (1990-1994)

David M. Schoonover was born and raised in Illinois. He received a bachelor's and master's degree in Agriculture Economics at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign. He joined the Foreign Service in 1984. He served in Beijing, Moscow and Seoul. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2004.

Q: You were in Moscow again from '90 to '94?

SCHOONOVER: '90 to '94, yes. Four and a half years on that tour. The previous time had been about three and a half, so altogether about eight years of my life were spent in Moscow. It was interesting to go back after about 25 years. I went alone to Moscow on my second tour, although my children, Brian and Kathryn, who then were in college, each came to visit about once each year, and we were able to do some interesting personal travel together.

Q: You went back and you were there to see the demise of the Soviet Union, weren't you?

SCHOONOVER: Absolutely.

Q: Would you talk a bit about what was the situation when you got there in 1990.

SCHOONOVER: I found it changed in terms of the social and political dimension and very similar in terms of the physical dimension. Going back to Moscow in 1990, frankly, it looked about the same as it had back in 1967 when I left there the previous time. However, it was a much more open environment. Gorbachev had been in power for about five years, as I recall, at the beginning of 1990, and people would talk with us; people were talking and discussing with each other. I'd been there only a month or so and there was a huge demonstration. There were people marching through the streets of Moscow. You never would have seen anything like that in the earlier years. In earlier years, it was a very tightly controlled police state, and there was no doubt about it. People were scared to death to talk to foreigners back in the '60's. It was very different when I went back in 1990.

Q: But it was still the Soviet Union.

SCHOONOVER: And Gorbachev was still the General Secretary of the Communist Party, and that's how he was the dominant official at the beginning of 1990. That changed drastically during the four and a half years that I was there.

Q: What was the title of your job?

SCHOONOVER: I was the Agricultural Counselor, the head of the Agricultural Office at the Embassy. Actually, they upgraded it to Minister Counselor, I guess, while I was there. So, I was the Minister Counselor for Agricultural Affairs.

Q: Who were the Ambassador and the DCM then?

SCHOONOVER: OK. We had three different ambassadors while I was there, and also three DCM's. Jack Matlock was the Ambassador when I first arrived, and then after about a year and half, Bob Strauss was Ambassador, and the last year that I was there Tom Pickering was Ambassador. Jim Collins was the DCM for the longest period of my stay.

Q: When you arrived, what was foremost on your plate agricultural-wise?

SCHOONOVER: That's quite interesting because it changed so dramatically in the course of the year. When I arrived it was pretty much still a reporting post, with the largest amount of our time spent reporting and analyzing the activities that were taking place. I remember making a crop observation trip in the Ukraine and North Caucasus in the spring of '90, much as I had done 25 years earlier. We were tailed by Soviet internal security workers, just as in the old days. I had to point them out to the young staffer from my office accompanying me, who was unaware the Soviets were still practicing tailing. Some things hadn't changed. By the way, our office soon became extremely busy, so that was my last crop observation trip, although my staff still made a few more before we had to stop completely. Besides reporting, we had an active exchanges program assigned to our office. Visitor support is always a task at an Embassy, and if I have neglected to mention this work previously, I should note that Senator Leahy, then head of the Senate Agricultural Committee, visited Moscow in '90, and I escorted him on his meetings to Moscow, and on to Leningrad, and then Minsk and Gomel in the Byelorussian republic (now Belarus). We had some market development activities, similar to the ones I described in China. We didn't have any big demonstrations projects like model feed or flour mills, but we had a lot of activities. There were a couple of big activities jointly with the Commerce Department. I remember that first year working with some of their agri-business officials on agri-business activities. For example, there was an agricultural equipment and supplies show. Our office was involved peripherally with that show. USDA is not directly involved with promoting sales of farm equipment and some other farm supplies. That's more the task of the Commerce Department, but at the same time, because we had the agricultural contacts and the knowledge in the field, my Commercial Counselor friend at the Embassy would call on us.

Q: Who was that?

SCHOONOVER: Jim... you'll forgive me if I can't think of his last name at this moment. I had several different Commerce colleagues while I was there, and I would probably have to go back, and check my records, which unfortunately are boxed up at the moment. But anyway, we worked together on several of these types of projects. I remember that USDA and Commerce jointly hosted a large group of Soviet food industry officials at a conference in Washington that year. I guess in my own assessment at the time I was feeling that working with agriculture officials in the Soviet Union, and improving our relationships with them would be to our advantage in the Agricultural Office, as well, and it would provide us with contacts. But this is the sort of thing that we were doing that first year, and it included accompanying several teams of U.S. government and private sector officials on travel and visits in the Soviet Union. Later in the year it was decided that we would initiate a credit guarantee program for the Soviet Union for the purchase of agriculture commodities. It had been quite a few years since we had an active credit guarantee program with the Soviet Union. As best I recall, that was about late 1990, toward the end of the year. And so we had quite a lot of interest in that program, and that was about the point in the beginning of '91 when things really started changing. I can't recall exactly when Gorbachev became President as opposed to General Secretary. I believe it was March 1990. But it was during this period of '90, '91 that Gorbachev was no longer just the General Secretary of the Communist Party but also held the position of President, which had been created for him. The republics began asserting themselves much more during this period. The nationalistic feelings of people were quite obvious already in the spring of '90 in Estonia, when I made a trip there. As early as the beginning of 1991 Lithuania had demonstrations in Vilnius, including the incident when Soviet military put down the demonstrations at the TV tower in Vilnius. A lot was going on, not only in Lithuania and the Baltics, but in other republics, too. Yeltsin was beginning to rise to the forefront.

Q: He was mayor, wasn't he, of Moscow?

SCHOONOVER: He had been Mayor, earlier, and then his position among the Soviet leadership had slipped. Then the elections for Presidency of the Russian Republic took place in June of '91, and Yeltsin became the Russian President. A lot of political ferment and changes were going on during this period, and the republics were beginning to individually assert their independence, and Gorbachev was resisting. There was a lot of discussion about working out new charters for the relationship between the republics and the union. '91 was a very turbulent year, of course, in the political relationship between Gorbachev and the “Center”, and the individual republics. I remember one trip I made to Georgia to participate in a conference either late in ‘90 or early in ‘91. Outside the conference site, a huge number of Georgians were demonstrating for independence and filling the main street of Tbilisi. For me, ‘91 was a fascinating, but extremely busy year.

So much happened in that period in the Soviet Union. It seems almost impossible now to remember exactly what day everything happened. There were things happening every day. One just got up each day and wondered what major development would take place today, and pretty soon became blasé to the sorts of things, which in most places would happen once in a tour. It was absolutely fascinating, but after a while I was almost on overload. It really got started after the ‘90/’91 winter, as I recall, except for the Baltic incidents...there was an incident in Lithuania and also one in Latvia. I recall coming back to the United States on leave in March ‘91, perhaps on R&R. I had been there over a year. And life had been fairly predictable up to that point. While I was back in the United States, I turned on the TV one day, and heard there had been a fire at the Embassy in Moscow, and that’s how I learned about the fire. Again, just like Tiananmen, I was away from the capital at the time that it happened. But it was very fortunate. We had been going through fire drills, I recall, while I was there. Everyone got out of the embassy. No deaths. They said there were a few smoke inhalation problems with the last few people who got out. I’ll put this in for fire drills: If we had not been doing those drills, I expect the fire would have been much more catastrophic. Well, anyway, I got back from leave, and we were all working in one big room on sawhorses. On my trip back I carried in a little laptop computer for our office to work with, and a few files, and that’s how our office got started again. The entire embassy worked out of one big common room on the residential compound, and got operations up and running again and eventually, of course, everything started coming back together again. After the common room, our office worked out of my townhouse for a while. We weren’t able to relocate the Agricultural Office back in the regular Embassy building till the end of my tour there. We moved our office into one of the hotels; for most of my tour in Moscow, we worked out of the Penta Hotel. That was one tour when I lived at the Embassy and commuted to work away from the Embassy, as opposed to the other way around.

My life got real busy that year. It was one of the busiest years I remember. Our Under Secretary of Agriculture—his name was Dick Crowder-- that particular year was very much focused on what was going on in the Soviet Union. And he organized many, many visits. I think once I figured out he spent about two months of that year visiting in my territory.

Q: You don’t want Under Secretaries on your turf.

SCHOONOVER: I had the Secretary also before the year was over but the Under Secretary alone, I think, was there for something like five or six separate trips because each one might be one or two weeks. So add them all up--about two months of his visits. But it did make the time busy and fascinating, I’ll say that for it. It was still Soviet Union in 1991. Remember, the flag didn’t come down on the Kremlin till Christmas of that year.

I think one of the Under Secretary’s first visits was to Lithuania. That was about April, and he had decided not to come in through Moscow but go through Poland. We met him at the border between Poland and the Soviet Union in Belarus, in what would be the country of Belarus. We drove from there to Vilnius, and met with the president of Lithuania. The Lithuanians said they were independent, of course, and Gorbachev and the Soviet Union didn't recognize them as independent, so Lithuania was in kind of an uncertain category at the time. It was fascinating to be there right then. We visited not so long after the incidents that had taken place there. The parliament building in Lithuania was barricaded. All sorts of things were plastered around the perimeter, such as, "Soviets Go Home" and those kinds of slogans. There were tanks, Soviet tanks, not Lithuanian tanks, lurking around behind buildings and in various places in the city, so it was a kind of dicey situation at the time. But it was an initial outreach by the United States to Lithuania, although we didn't get around to recognizing the independence of Lithuania until later.

Q: But remember, we didn't really unrecognize them.

SCHOONOVER: That's right. You're right. We never recognized them as part of the Soviet Union, so it was sort of a peculiar situation. But we didn't formally, I guess, get around to reaffirming their sovereignty and sending in an Ambassador until later.

Q: ...sending in an Ambassador?

SCHOONOVER: Right, Right. But it was a fascinating time to be there. That was April '91, and it was just the beginning. In May the Under Secretary came again for a visit. He wanted to visit not just Moscow, but in particular to go to Ukraine and meet with leaders there. Also, we wanted to go out to a couple of the Russian provinces and just take a look at the situation there. Again, as was his want, usually I didn't know about his visit until a few days beforehand. Sometimes I had maybe five days notice or so to organize a visit. At that time, the Soviet Ministry of Agriculture, which had been functioning rather well in 1990, was beginning to become dysfunctional. They weren't always able to do the support work that they normally would do for an Embassy. So, for this visit, I phoned Ukrainian officials and worked it out myself. About one day ahead of his arrival, I hopped on an airplane and went down and finished up the details with the Ukrainian officials rather than working with Soviet Ministry of Agriculture officials. It kept us hopping around to work during that period. In the past it had been so centralized and we had to work through the Soviet Ministry of Agriculture, and all of a sudden it couldn't work that way or didn't work very well, and we had to do it ourselves. Fundamentally, this was good. In most countries, that's the way it works, but we weren't accustomed to doing that in the Soviet Union, and generally we were just beginning to develop the necessary relationships. I had made a couple of trips to Ukraine and established a few good contacts, fortunately. We were moving from a very centralized situation to something that was much more decentralized.

Q: What was our interest from an agricultural point of view?

SCHOONOVER: Well, we had rather large agricultural credit guarantee programs with the Soviet Union, and we were looking at the needs for agriculture commodities. There also had been so many reports about food shortages, and because supplies had dried up in stores, he also was assessing the food shortage situation. I think it was near the beginning of the recognition that things were disintegrating. I talk about hosting the Under Secretary of Agriculture, but most of the delegations also included someone from the White House staff, someone from State, and someone perhaps from other agencies. So it was usually an interagency group that came. I think there was a recognition that things were coming unstuck and we needed to get discussions going with officials in places other than just Moscow. But a key objective was to size up the food situation, to try to make some sort of an estimate...some kind of projection of the kind of programs we had to get going there, whether it would be food aid programs or technical assistance or additional credit or whatever, so that we could be a player there in the appropriate way. By the way, the Lithuanian visit was only the Under Secretary of Agriculture. The visits to Russia, Ukraine, and other republics, as I said, usually included people from the White House staff, and other departments and agencies. This was a period, of course, of such drastic and rapid change and such uncertainty trying to stay abreast of what was going on, that people in Washington I think wanted to have the kind of feel best attained by having someone actually coming in from Washington as opposed to relying solely on reports from the Embassy.

Q: It was an exciting time. When did this happen, I don't know what the Russian term for it...

SCHOONOVER: Decollectivization?

Q: Decollectivization or at least the attempt to? Was that allowed to spring up?

SCHOONOVER: I won't say that they had done away with collective farms or state farms, but they were allowing private farms. So there was a beginning of establishment of private farms. I do recall in one of the early visits we were able to set up meetings with the head of the private farmers organization and also a meeting with private entrepreneurs throughout the agri-business community and give a flavor to our Washington visitors of what was going on in that sphere. It really was a time of crosscurrents. The private farms were allowed, but they certainly were not officially encouraged in any way. A lot of the prerequisites for successful private farming were not in place, and they were having difficulty to be able to buy supplies and goods. Their land holding status was uncertain, and just a great many things were uncertain for them. This all perhaps fit into the technical assistance area that came along later. As I mentioned, the USDA Under Secretary and his delegations were sizing up the food situation and the overall situation and assessing what programs the U.S. Government might offer. I think that agriculture was viewed as one of the key areas where the U.S. could start offering a program. We already had the credit guarantee program for the Soviet Union. We had not yet had food aid or very much in the way of technical assistance, but it was the period when we were looking at those programs, and they came along very soon afterwards. Before long we were heavily involved in all kinds of programs.

But again, that year, we had the visit I told you about in May to Ukraine, and a few months later the Under Secretary was back again with another delegation, and we went to Central Asia and Armenia, as well as some other places in Russia. And because things were disintegrating, we began to want to have contacts with the republic officials. And I can't place it exactly in time now, perhaps late in '91, but I remember we had a meeting in Moscow at some point where we met with the Agricultural Ministries and Grains Ministries or supply officials of all the republics, or all that would send representatives anyway. We were talking not only to Soviet national officials, but we were meeting with all the individual republics, beginning to get their own assessments of their needs, beginning to look ahead towards the time when we might be dealing with each other.

Now, the Soviet Union hadn't collapsed yet. It was in August of 1991 that there was the so-called coup when a certain group in the Soviet leadership decided to put Gorbachev under house arrest, you might say, and to take over the country. And we had tanks in the streets of Moscow in August that year, which, as you know, did not succeed and, in hind sight, probably was the thing that triggered the actual timing of the collapse of the Soviet Union. It was happening, but probably no one could have made it happen more quickly than just that coup attempt. That particular incident really set it off, and the Soviet Union did finally collapse that year. That's when Ambassador Bob Strauss came in. I recall that particular day he arrived right as the coup was collapsing. There was a lot of activity around the Embassy, lots of demonstrations. I was riding the Metro from our office at the hotel back to the Embassy when I heard people talking on the Metro that the coup had collapsed. I got to the Embassy, and Ambassador Strauss had just arrived from the airport at that time. It was exactly at the time that the coup collapsed when he arrived.

I think one of the very first public events he attended was when Gorbachev was brought back and Gorbachev addressed the people, and the Ambassador stood side by side with Gorbachev, sort of saying we're back with you again, you know.

Q: When the coup happened, the first couple of days when Gorbachev was under house arrest down in Yalta, I guess, or Crimea or somewhere, was there concern that, oh my God, we're going to go back to Stalinist times or something?

SCHOONOVER: Well, for a few days there, yes. Yes. These were clearly hardliners who had attempted to take over the Soviet Union. No one knew exactly where we were heading and yes, I think there were concerns that the opening up of the society that Gorbachev had permitted would be brought to an end. Everything was going back down under clamps again. I think there was concern for just a few days. Of course, we gave a lot of moral support, shall I say, to Yeltsin during that period.

Q: Was contact with Soviet officials in your area of responsibility, was that sort of stopped or cut off or were you going out and trying to find out what they was doing?

SCHOONOVER: During the period of the coup?

Q: Yes During and then after.

SCHOONOVER: During the period of the coup, it was pretty chaotic. It only lasted a few days. I don't recall having a lot of meetings with agricultural people precisely during those two or three days. We did continue to have contacts, certainly, with officials, but I think everybody, including Soviet officials themselves, kind of hunkered down for a few days. I don't think they didn't want any contact. They just didn't know which way the wind was blowing. One of my better contacts was not in the ministries, but headed the Agricultural Committee of the Supreme Soviet. In '90 I had gone to stay for a few days with him on his farm in East Siberia, so we had established a close relationship. I can't recall having any meetings with him that week, but he was often a good contact for staying abreast of what was going on. And another was the assistant to the Deputy Prime Minister for Agriculture. They had an Agricultural Minister, but they also had a Deputy Prime Minister, who was over the Agricultural Ministry, as well as related ministries, such as those involved with agricultural equipment, procuring farm products and so forth. So he had the whole area under his jurisdiction. As it happened I knew his assistant, sort of his personal secretary. This maybe shows the advantage of some of the exchanges and of being involved for a long period of time. This assistant in an earlier incarnation had been involved with the exchanges back in the '70's, and he was sort of an old friend already when I arrived in Moscow. When I really had to have help putting a program together for a delegation or setting up meetings with senior officials--and the Agriculture Ministry at that point clearly was incapable of doing it--he was the one I usually called on to get help. After the coup, an interim government was established, headed by Ivan Silayev, who had been Prime Minister for Russia, and who now in effect became the Prime Minister for the Soviet Union. There were only five key officials heading the work of this interim government, and food and agriculture fell under Yuri Luzhkov, who later went on to become Mayor of Moscow. One of Under Secretary Crowder's visits came at this time, and I remember spending a weekend calling Silayev's appointments secretary both at office and at home, trying to set up the appointment. As best I recall, we met eventually with Luzhkov, but not Silayev. It is hard to imagine the work load these five people must have had trying to manage the affairs for the entire Soviet Union, which was collapsing around them.

Q: When you got there in 1990 and made your calls, I assume you started getting out into the field. How much progress or lack therefore had you seen on the ground and in collective farms and other agricultural distribution systems in the time between the 1960's when you were there and the 1990's when you came back?

SCHOONOVER: Well, some of their activities and their plans had changed, but the system was pretty much, I think, like it had been. I mean, there had been a lot of shuffling around of people on the deck of the Titanic, so to speak, but I think the situation was still basically the same. I don't think the collective and state farm system was ever destined to function very well in terms of the more complex aspects of agriculture. They did pretty well in terms of basic crop production, basic grain production, as long as the planners could keep them supplied with equipment and fertilizers and they produced some pretty good fields of grain. Actually, I've seen some beautiful fields of grain in the Soviet Union. So as long as the operation wasn't too complex, they could do pretty well with it. When they started trying to get involved with livestock production, which involves some fairly careful programs of feeding and disease control and overall good management with people being responsible for those livestock at all the required hours, they just weren't able to handle that very well. The system did not have the responsibility built into it that we would believe necessary to have successful programs for livestock production. And they were having a hard time getting any kind of measures of efficiency that we would consider acceptable. But again, like I said, I saw some beautiful fields of grain in the Soviet Union.

Q: Of course, they've got that wonderful soil and that grain. Isn't there a certain type of soil named after...

SCHOONOVER: Chernozem.

Q: Black soil.

SCHOONOVER: Right. In the Ukraine, and Kuban, as they called it, in the North Caucasus and in the central black soil region. Some wonderful black soil, and I saw some wonderful crops there. But I did not see a great deal of progress when it comes right down to it, over that period of time. Yields went up. Yields went up because they used a lot more fertilizer. One could see almost a direct correlation between the increasing amounts of fertilizer they were putting on, and they were applying huge amounts, and the yields of grain.

Q: Speaking of fertilizer, did you get involved in that disaster, I guess, of cotton down around the Aral Sea and all that? How was that going?

SCHOONOVER: I had visited cotton regions in Central Asia, but around the Aral Sea I had never had an opportunity to visit there. As I recall, it was a closed region, and it was impossible to get in there.

Q: Did you run across this thing...we were talking about the Soviet era now, ....about this almost complete disregard of environmental concerns because production was everything.

SCHOONOVER: Right. And I think that's the way it was. Sometimes they would get results, but they were just ruining the resources in getting those results. I mean, if you force everything to its maximum until there isn't anything to force anymore, and I think they were doing that in some areas, you sometimes get results at the expense of the resource base. The example that you cited about the Aral Sea was one. They were talking about diverting Siberian rivers to try to bring more water into that region. And who knows what environmental consequences that might have had if they actually had been able to pull that off. But there were some rather wild schemes going. But yes, a lot of the irrigation projects in Central Asia, I'm sure, had long-term disastrous consequences for the region.

Q: From our perspective...your perspective... as Agricultural Minister-Counselor then, were we concerned in doing something in this '90, '94 period and doing something about the environmental damage from an agricultural point of view or was this something we were reporting on and just feeling well, the more they ruin things, the better the market for our stuff is?

SCHOONOVER: I wouldn't say that. The work of the Agricultural Counselor typically was not so much on environmental matters. We had a Science Counselor and a Science officer in the Embassy, who generally had more responsibility for reporting on relations in the environmental area. The Agricultural Office was more involved with trade and less with technical assistance programs. That's just the way the U.S. bureaucracy divides up its functions. However, in the case of Russia, when the Soviet Union finally did collapse at the end of 1991, the U.S. Agriculture Department, using its appropriated funds, did undertake technical assistance activities with Russia through our office at the Embassy, and we ended up with some rather extensive programs. I don't recall any of our projects precisely on the environmental consequences around the Aral Sea. That's a major disaster. I wouldn't begin to say how one goes about correcting that disaster once you've created it. But in terms of generally trying to be of assistance with technical assistance programs, our office did get quite heavily involved in the first post-Soviet years. And that's really more of an exception to the rule than the standard Agricultural Office activity, because in most countries, the Department of Agriculture, through the Embassy Agricultural Office, is involved primarily with agricultural trade promotion.

Maybe I should wrap up '91, and then jump on ahead, to Russia primarily. The attempted coup was in August. In October U.S. Agriculture Secretary Ed Madigan brought a large delegation of government and private sector agribusiness officials to the Soviet Union. At that point, the Soviet ministries were practically non-functional, but we managed to put together a program that included visits also to Ukraine, as well as Russia. I believe the situation then was entirely too chaotic to conduct very successful meetings, although it always pays to get in on the ground floor, and perhaps the visit was useful for providing a better perspective to the Americans on the delegation. As ministry staff could no longer assist as well as before, we found ourselves calling directly for senior appointments. One of my assistants soon was on a first-name basis with Gorbachev's appointment secretary, calling him not only at the office, but also at his dacha—a heady experience, I would think, for a first-tour officer. By December the Soviet Union had collapsed. The flag went down on the Kremlin, as I recall, on Christmas, and we were engaged in relations with Russia, then, at that point. We had a lot of things that had to be worked out. We had continued to have a credit guarantee program with the Soviet Union. I particularly remember the last credit guarantee agreement we concluded with the Soviet Union. USDA had wanted to change a few words in one of the agreement provisions, but owing to a communications problem, we didn't get this information until after the agreement was signed. As I recall, the Ambassador and a Soviet Minister or Deputy Prime Minister had signed the agreement, and when I returned to the office I received the message to change it. Those are the kinds of things that can spoil the end of the day, or disrupt a quiet evening. I had to call in a few chits from Soviet acquaintances, especially as the change appeared to be slightly less favorable to their interests, but in the course of about four hours, we were able to substitute a page in the agreement with the revised language, with the concurrence of the Deputy Prime Minister, and all old copies were destroyed. One doesn't want to have this kind of misunderstanding too often.

Anyway, we had this agreement that had been announced shortly before the Soviet Union collapsed, and all of a sudden we didn't have a Soviet Union to deal with. It was for substantial amounts, as I recall. We're talking about a billion dollars worth of trade, or something like that, and we didn't have a country to deal with. So, that was one occasion where we invited all of the republic representatives to get together and, as I recall now, almost all of them signed the agreement. We made up an agreement that simply carried-over the Soviet agreement to the republics. We had to allocate it, and I think they were able to work amongst themselves and come up with some way of allocating the amounts. I've forgotten a few of the details at this point, but I recall that we were successful in making the transfer to them. Ukraine decided to opt out which left a strange situation because they weren't going to get their share unless they signed on. I recall that I made a trip to Ukraine and met with their Grain Minister and Deputy Prime Minister and explained the situation more carefully that they weren't going to be getting U.S. grain on credit unless they decided to sign the same agreement with all of the others. The situation lasted a few months, but eventually they decided to join in, too. So there was a period for a few months where all of the former Soviet Union republics, but Ukraine, were party to this grain credit agreement, and Ukraine was left out. I should note that the Baltic Republics already were on a separate track, and not party to this agreement. Anyway, there were a lot of things like that to work out in those early days.

Not long after that, USDA began some Food Aid programs with Russia and the former republics of the Soviet Union. They had gone into default on the credit programs. There was a period when payments were sort of erratic, and then payments just stopped. They simply couldn't keep them up. And we went into a different mode—food aid. The first food aid had already begun at the very end of 1991, just about the same time as the Soviet Union collapsed. But this was something the Defense Department had carried out, and it was meal equivalents, I forget what they called...

Q: MRE's. Meals Ready to Eat.

SCHOONOVER: MRE's. That's it. MRE's.

Q: That's what your military...and we use for refugees instead of canned food that are used to sustain people under different circumstances.

SCHOONOVER: Right, right. That program was the beginning. That was the first food aid, but, of course, that was a pittance compared to what we got into later. It made a lot of publicity, but it was small amounts. But in '92, and I can't remember exactly when, USDA started up food aid programs for Russia and the other republics. As best I recall now, the first programs were in the spring of '92, and mostly were directed through non-governmental organizations (NGO's). Larger government-to-government programs, I believe, came along later. I know that by '93 we were engaged large-scale both in government-to-government and NGO programs. I frankly hadn't even briefed on USDA food aid programs in 1990 when I was going to the Soviet Union. That's how far that was from my mind. I didn't even go by the food aid office. And suddenly, we were involved in programs that added up to...if you counted all of the former Soviet Union, I think to over a billion and a half dollars of food aid, maybe a billion dollars for Russia alone. And our largest food aid programs in the world were going on in my territory. About that point I wished I had stopped by our food aid office for a briefing to learn more background on some of the programs. But I soon became aware! So, we had a number of programs. We had some out-and-out grants, and we also had some that were sales for their currency, and some were sales for at low interest rates with long payback terms. Not quite grants, but almost. Anyway, they fell into a number of different categories depending upon the commodity and the country. I think we had programs for each of the republics, but we had huge amounts going to Russia. A lot of the food aid was given through private voluntary organizations (PVO's), or non-governmental organizations (NGO's). And so not all of the aid was government to government. I can't remember the breakdowns now, but the largest amount was through the government, but certainly in terms of the complexity and numbers of programs, the NGO programs were probably more dominant and involved a lot more elements to them. Many of the NGO programs, again, differed in how they distributed the food. Some of them provided humanitarian foods through food distribution centers, but there were other techniques, as well.

Q: We talked about this in your previous tour. One of big problems in the Soviet Union was distribution. It's got a rich soil, a lot of stuff comes, but getting to the market, as you pointed out, wasn't well done. What about this? Our money. I think we would be very concerned about is the stuff being distributed.

SCHOONOVER: We were. We were, and at the same time we were trying to handle such a huge amount that I would say we probably couldn't scrutinize it as carefully always as we might have liked. We were concerned about how it was being distributed, and made our best efforts. When trying to handle a huge amount in a short period of time, we gave it the best scrutiny we could, but there was a limited amount of time and resources to spend on it. One could design a more perfect formula if there were more time to deal with it. Food aid went through a number of channels and procedures, so there wasn't any single way of handling it. It went through a whole variety of means of distribution. In that sense, if one of them failed, at least you didn't have all your eggs in one basket. The NGO's, for example, some of them would operate individual food distribution centers, and they would work through local authorities trying to come up with lists of needy citizens. And they would check off lists. I've visited some of those centers. I think they did the best job that they could under the circumstances. You couldn't be everywhere in a huge country like that, but there were a great many of them involved working in different assigned regions of the country. So, a great deal of the country was covered in one way or another. If, for example, you have a food distribution center in Yekaterinburg, that's the Urals region, it doesn't necessarily mean that all of the people in the Urals region were getting access to it. You do the best you can, and some areas get left out.

Q: We weren't alone in this. Western Europe was making contributions, too. Or not?

SCHOONOVER: They did. They did get into it eventually. I believe that they were a little slower off the mark than we were with any substantial programs. They were watching us I think before they decided on a large-scale involvement. I mentioned direct food distribution as one of the means of handling food aid. The Russian government set up a Humanitarian Commission, so from the government level, another way that we handled food was to make it available to the Humanitarian Commission, and then they became responsible for the actual distribution. That's probably one of the areas where I said if we'd had more time to study the system, we might have been able to do a better job. But anyway, we worked with the only government unit that was available in terms of direct humanitarian distribution, and perhaps they did the best they could. But keep in mind, they were just created suddenly and out of nowhere, and they probably didn't have the experience or know-how to handle it real well, and they were dealing with the politics of the aid that existed among different provinces and organizations. So, how well they did...that book probably is still waiting to be written.

Q: Of course, we'd done this what, in the 1920's, hadn't we? Under Hoover, I think. He wasn't President. He was in charge of helping feed the famine in the Ukraine, wasn't it?

SCHOONOVER: Right, right. But the 1990's were 70 years later. There was no one around who knew the drill from then ...

Q: When you do something like this, in a way its something I'm sure that's certainly been forgotten by Americans what we did. Do you think there was much credit given to us within the Soviet population or not?

SCHOONOVER: Yes, I think there were a lot of people who were aware of our assistance and were grateful. I think there were a lot of people also who were disgruntled because they would hear about the programs, but didn't see them personally.

I think food aid has mixed effects. A lot of people benefit from it, and they're grateful. Some of these elderly people, you never hear from them, but they're grateful in their hearts that they have received the aid. There are other people who hear about the programs all the time but never see anything of it, and they're disgruntled. And there were others, including opponents of the programs, who tried to use it for political advantage. We had other ways of handling much of the assistance. For the bulk of the aid, the huge amounts of grain needed just to keep the mills and bakeries operating in the country, it wasn't a question of little individual food distribution points or working with the Humanitarian Commission. Here we worked with the Grain Minister of the Russian Federation and simply made grants or long term credits or other programs directly available through the Grain Ministry to provide grain. So, in this case, we were back to something more like the central distribution system that had operated in the past. That Minister didn't change, at least initially. He was the same person, who had been the Russian Grain Minister in the Soviet Union, and he knew the drill, and he knew how to get it to the mill. So, we worked with him. I'm probably talking too long.

Q: No, no, no. This is very, very important.

SCHOONOVER: Some things are just occurring to me as we talk about it. There were still two or three other ways that we handled commodities. I've talked about directly supplying the Grain Ministry, I've talked about the Humanitarian Commission, and I've talked about the distribution by NGO's. I remember in the case of butter, we had some surplus butter that was made available to Russia and it was monetized. I believe one shipment of butter went to the Humanitarian Commission, but in another instance, I think it was the old Soviet (now, Russian) foreign trade organization that had the nominal responsibility for it. They, in effect, said you handle it. So, basically our office had to contact different organizations in the distribution system and sell the butter to the organizations, nominally approved by the trade organization, which had proved relatively ineffective in actually handling the butter itself. We basically had to do it. So, we were marketing butter. Now, this was a different type of food aid. In this case it was actually being sold, perhaps at prices that were not so high, but it was being sold, and the funds then were to go into an overall fund for rural assistance programs in Russia. We can get into that when we get into technical assistance programs. Finally, we had one batch of commodities that was sold on the newly forming private commodity exchanges because we were trying to promote the development of markets. I won't say that was entirely successful, but it was an attempt. When there isn't experience with private markets, I think there can be a lot of sort of, I hate to use the word collusion, but it's a different situation. They were not used to competing with each other on prices. And so, I would say it was probably not an entirely successful experiment, but that was tried once with some of the food assistance. I probably left out something. We were trying many different ways to handle the food assistance.

Q: Did you find good coordination or problems with the non-governmental organizations? Were they able to say OK, we'll take care of the Urals, you take care of the Caucasus or things of this nature, or did they double up?

SCHOONOVER: The NGO's were basically American NGO's who then went in and worked with Russian organizations, perhaps Russian NGO's, which were just forming. The initial negotiations with the American NGO's were handled out of Washington, rather than out of our office in Moscow. So, I was not really involved in that. I think there was some guidance, at least, in the selection process, an attempt to ensure the different regions of the country were covered. I don't know whether the NGO's among themselves did the dividing up or whether it was a more competitive process. But, for example, an attempt was made to ensure that someone would be working in the Volga region, someone in the Urals, someone in the Far East, someone around Moscow, and I've only been talking about Russia. Similar things were going on in the Ukraine and western republics, the Caucasus, and Central Asia.

Q: When you were doing this, all these republics were brand new. Was there a withdrawal process of our embassy in Moscow or something happening in Turkestan or something like that? It had to be a process rather than all of a sudden...

SCHOONOVER: A process. It was. At first, we only had one embassy, leaving out the Baltics. I didn't have anything more to do with the Baltics after '91, so from the beginning of '92 I had three fewer countries to worry about. Apart from that, the only other republic, that is, country that had an embassy ready to go immediately was Ukraine, because we had had a Consulate General in Kiev, and they already had a site there, and they were ready to pick up and begin operations immediately. I don't remember when the first U.S. Ambassador actually arrived, but we had a presence there. In the other republics, now countries, we had no presence. As I recall, we had fly-in set-up embassies, and this took place in the early spring of '92. One week we would set up embassies in all of the Central Asian republics, or all of the Transcaucasus republics, or in Belarus or Moldova. Anyway, by the time we reached mid-'92, I think we did have embassies operating in all of the countries, sometimes from very temporary quarters. I remember going out to Minsk with our Economic Counselor at the time, helping a little bit to set up the embassy in Belarus. We took a fax machine out and rented a hotel room, and that was sort of the initial spot on the ground. And then a group came in from Washington, from the U.S., and actually did the full thing, but we had the first little operating presence from out of Minsk. As I recall, he went on to be our ambassador there later on, but anyway that's a separate story.

Our Agricultural Office at the Embassy in Moscow was still responsible for all of the countries initially, except for the Baltics. Now, this worked in various ways. First of all, Russia alone was big enough to cover. There certainly were enough programs in Russia, what with our largest food aid programs, and then technical assistance programs as well, plus all of the usual things that an Agricultural Office does. I certainly didn't need any other countries besides Russia. Russia was enough. But initially we had no one else responsible for the other countries, so I tried to visit some of them, but it was impossible to visit all of them. Several times, officials from these other countries would visit our Agricultural Office at the hotel to bring their business before us. I remember once having two Ministers waiting in line to meet with us. I think by now most of the other countries have been split off one way or another for coverage by Agricultural Offices in other embassies. I'm not sure whether or not USDA has anyone in Ukraine right now. I know for a while they had a separate Agricultural Attaché in Ukraine, and I believe that is still the case. I know when I was in Moscow I recommended an Attache in Ukraine and also an Attache responsible for Central Asia, either in Almaty (then capital of Kazakhstan) or Tashkent in Uzbekistan. They did not achieve that coverage while I was in Moscow. I was still responsible for all that territory during my tour. I think USDA covers Central Asia out of Turkey now, but I'm not sure. I believe that our office in Moscow still is responsible for Armenia, Georgia, and Belarus, as well as Russia. During my tour in Moscow, most of our Ambassadors and Embassies in the other new countries welcomed our involvement and urged us to spend more time than we were able on their country. After the collapse of the Soviet Union, I never made it to some of the countries, period. I usually tried to cover the bigger ones regularly or others whenever we had a major issue. I think the only one, I recall, that was really turf conscious was Ukraine. One U.S. Ambassador in Ukraine said he didn't want anyone assigned to Moscow responsible for Ukraine, and told us not to visit there. After he left, our next Ambassador in Kiev welcomed us again, but for a while we had a turf issue. These things happen, you know, in the U.S. Government, and that did happen to me in one case, and for a year or so I didn't visit Ukraine. During this time whenever I had to conduct business with Ukraine, I either had to do it by telephone or through the U.S. Economic Counselor in Kiev or however I could best work it out. Then I went back to visiting again. I tried to get to Ukraine about every three or four months, I guess. That clearly was one of the major countries beside Russia.

Q: That was the bread basket.

SCHOONOVER: Right. And again, we began having a lot of programs there. It was just a slightly smaller version of what we were doing in Russia. But at least by that time I had developed enough contacts when I really had to do something, I got on the telephone and since they also spoke Russian, I could do it. That's a little side note, by the way. When I went to Moscow in the beginning of 1990, there were no Foreign Nationals at the Embassy in Moscow. You may recall they had been withdrawn a few years earlier and...

Q: That was the Marine Sergeant?

SCHOONOVER: Right, right. That was before my tour. But anyway, there were none in 1990 when we arrived. Russia was one country where one, indeed, needed the four rating in language. You needed Russian to do your business because there was no one to help you. The Embassy had brought in some contractors, some Americans, who did service work at the Embassy, but when it came to having meetings with Russians or other republic officials, or just any business that had to be conducted, basically one needed Russian. There was a brief period, I guess, when we had some foreign affairs staff at the Ministry of Agriculture who spoke a bit of English, and we could do some English language business, but that was a limited part of our activities and most of the time we had to get on the telephone anyway. When things began changing so rapidly, we didn't have time to get around to pay visits to everyone. We had to be able to grab the phone and call an official in this ministry or that ministry or the quarantine bureau or wherever, and do our business, and we had to do it on the telephone. If we didn't have enough Russian to do our business on the telephone in Russian, we could not be effective. So, that's probably the only tour where it was shown so dramatically. In most of the other countries we could operate through interpreters at meetings. It was very helpful to have the language, but it wasn't 100% essential.

But it was 100% essential in Moscow at that time. About '92 we began reacquiring foreign staff, not full Foreign Nationals at first, but just through contracts with one of the Russian organizations. I can't remember precisely when it began. I know in our case what it meant was our office acquired a driver. Again, we had had no drivers, either. We not only had to speak the language, but if we wanted to deliver an envelope to the Ministry of Agriculture or elsewhere, we went out, got in the car, drove to the ministry and hand delivered it ourselves. There was no one to run any errands for us. So, I remember that through a contract about '92 or '93, we acquired a driver who could run some of those errands for us. He also could go out to the airport to meet visitors or take them back. It was a tremendous relief to have someone who could do these things for us instead of having to do everything ourselves. Then eventually this began to change. By the time I left in mid '94, I think we were contracting directly with foreign staff, and were considering hiring them again as Foreign Nationals. I know by then we were establishing a much more permanent arrangement with the Russian staff in our office. And in Kiev we had hired a Foreign National. But our arrangements were still evolving during the last year that I was there.

Q: This is probably a good place to stop, David. And you want to put at the end we're still talking about after the fall of the Soviet Union and the work you had done. You want to mention any of the things you want to talk about next time?

SCHOONOVER: Well, we can finish off Russia and some of the programs we were carrying on there. From Russia I went on to Korea and a couple of years back in the department, and then I retired.

Q: So we'll finish this off next time.

SCHOONOVER: Let's try and do that.

Q: Great!

Q: Today is the 8th of March, 2005. David, you were in Russia from when to when this term?

SCHOONOVER: This term was from the beginning of 1990 until the middle of 1994, so I experienced about two years of the Soviet Union and two and a half years of Russia. Apart from Russia, I also managed to spend time in all the other republics or newly independent states, except Moldova, Azerbaijan and Tajikistan, and I had been in Moldova and Azerbaijan during my first tour, but somehow I never made it to Tajikistan.

Q: I don't know how much we covered the last time here.

SCHOONOVER: We pretty much finished the Soviet period, and covered some of our work during the post-Soviet period. I had a couple of thoughts about our programs, and I wonder, maybe, if I could begin with them.

Q: Absolutely.

SCHOONOVER: Perhaps these thoughts apply a little more generally than any specific tour, but I think I can relate them to the Soviet and Russia experience. I'd like to mention the role of exchanges and study programs for people in our assigned countries, and how important they were to our work. I think it's worth focusing on them a bit because I haven't really brought them up in any of the specific discussions so far. We made use of the International Visitors Program that USIS was handling at the time, and soon after I began my second round of overseas experiences, we also had a USDA-administered program. We called it, for short, the Cochran Program because it was Senator Cochran who fostered the legislation for it. I think the official title, at least at the beginning, was The Middle Income Country Program. It enabled us to do study tours, training programs, and exchanges for countries that had "fallen between the slats". They weren't rich enough yet to do their own programs in the United States, and they weren't poor enough to qualify for some of the AID related programs.

Q: Was this an agricultural focused program, or was this broader?

SCHOONOVER: Well, the International Visitors Program, as I mentioned, was a broad one for which everyone in the Embassy competed. The Cochran Program was an agricultural-focused program, but broadly interpreted. It was not focused solely on technical training, but enabled us to provide broader developmental experience for the countries. It was pretty broad. We could do technical training, but we also could get into institution building activities. Also, the program could be used just for an orientation experience for those who had never had the opportunity to be in the United States or see a marketing economy functioning, for example. And also, it could be oriented toward market promotion and development. It was broad in its application, but it was only for agriculture. The program was administered entirely by the U.S. Department of Agriculture. These programs were extremely valuable. Let me give you just a couple of examples. I'll drop back to China. One of the first times that I used the International Visitors Program, we sent someone from the Rural Development Research Center in China, a very senior official, to the United States for about a month, and he had the opportunity to meet with policy officials in Washington and meet with policy research type officials in the universities in the United States. That proved to be extremely valuable later on. That particular research center was basically the research arm of the Communist Party in China on rural affairs, and it developed policy recommendations for the Chinese leadership in agriculture. The visit gave us tremendous access to the policy staff level people in China, and opportunities to get first hand explanations of the policy paths they were pursuing. It was an extremely valuable contact for us. And that was just one example. There were a number of others, and each one differs. When we began the Cochran Program while I was in China, in the beginning, it was only for Guangdong Province and perhaps a couple of neighboring provinces in South China. When I moved on to Moscow, and when the Soviet Union collapsed, we made great use of the Cochran Program to send people to the United States. It was an opportunity to provide some training, some exposure, some experience, and also a great way to develop or strengthen contacts. I can't remember the precise numbers, but I think at its peak, we may have been sending about a hundred Russians a year to the United States under the program, and substantial numbers from the other former Soviet countries as well. I was involved with some of those. I remember going to Kiev, and participating with the Cochran Program training officer to select people from Ukraine.

Q: There in Russian and Greater Russia and former Soviet Union, there in the period when you were there in the '90's, what sorts of things were the focus? You had these large collective farms, which had not been overly successful. I'm told one of the problems had been getting the crop. We've discussed this before. Of getting the produce distributed. Getting it out to the folks who eat it or want to sell it.

SCHOONOVER: The focus, I would say, as we moved from Soviet Union to Russia, was primarily on institution building. This does relate to what you're talking about, because a lot of the problems were related to the institutions, and as we carried out these programs in the early years, the first couple of years of the Russian Federation, we were primarily interested in institution building for our technical development and training focus. We had many programs, not all of them carried out through the Cochran Program. I cited that as one example, but we had also legislation that provided for funding for the Department for the Emerging Markets Program. Some of these titles get changed over the years, so I should talk generically about the programs and not dwell too much on specific titles. There were a number of programs that served the purpose of providing some funding for carrying out technical training and development activities. Some of them brought Russians and other former Soviet countries' personnel to the United States. Others were for carrying out training and activities in Russia and in these other countries themselves. To give an example of an activity that relates to what you were talking about, we had one program for trying to establish wholesale markets for agricultural products in Russia. And we had people from USDA's Agricultural Marketing Service, as well as other agencies and universities, who were trying to advise, to help, in the establishment of wholesale produce markets in Moscow and in some of the other regions. I primarily focused on Moscow, but with the idea that it possibly would provide an example for some other regions. We had people who spent quite a few months there, perhaps half a year, working with Russians. That was one example. We had others, for example, trying to set up commodity exchanges. These are instances that relate to the marketing of products and to attempts to improve the way products went from the farm to the consumer. We were attempting to help them create a totally different system from the way it had been before, when the collective and state farms simply were assigned everything, and there was very little incentive built in. Consequently, there was very little incentive to do a good job in taking care of the produce. It was a different ball game in the new Russia. There was an attempt to establish markets. I'll acknowledge that the way a lot of the things turned out had a quite Russian twist to them, and a different twist probably from what we envisioned. Nonetheless, it was in a different system than what had existed before we were involved with them. Markets are just one area. We also were working with them on things like land legislation, for example, trying to give them a basis for making adjustments in the way they were dealing with their land and to give them the legal and technical background to do it. In this particular program we took people to the United States, and gave them training there, but also brought some people into Russia and other former Soviet countries to share experience. At the micro-level, we also had placed a couple of American farm families in a rural area an hour or two from St. Petersburg to help private farmers get established. I visited them on a couple of occasions—in particular I remember celebrating with them the completion of their harvest—but also tried to bring some of their concerns to the ears of higher officials. There were too many projects to try and deal with all of them, but I might mention a few interesting vignettes from my involvement in these technical assistance activities. One involved a former U.S. Agriculture Secretary who at the request of USDA brought a small delegation to the former Soviet Union about a year after its collapse to develop some technical assistance activities, particularly in the areas of food processing and marketing. In a short period of time he was scheduled to visit not only Moscow, but also Novosibirsk in Siberia, Kazakhstan, and Belarus. In view of the difficulties we were experiencing with public air travel at the time, it was decided that we should charter a plane for the visit. We ended up with a plane from one of the oblasts or provinces, which had been equipped for aerial agricultural photography and a small crew, for whom we developed a genuine affection. The banking system at that time was undependable, and the ruble was going through a period of rapid depreciation, so one of my assistants was required to carry a grocery bag filled probably with several millions of rubles to the airplane leasing company. And during the trip, we encountered some sticky issues with airport service fees, particularly in the other newly independent states, which required substantial additional amounts of cash, although the other countries usually wanted dollars, and not rubles. Another vignette concerns my trip to Armenia to review USDA's program there to assist with the development of agricultural extension services. I think this was January '93, when Armenia was experiencing severe energy shortages, and most homes and offices were getting by with the minimum of electricity and heat. My plane from Moscow finally boarded about midnight, and a number of passengers carried cans of fuel onto the plane. Then the attendant, who was wearing clearly visible revolvers, asked people to reseat themselves to better balance the plane, as we were overloaded. We survived the journey, but arrived about three or four A.M., and my contact there, having been told that the flight had been cancelled, had gone. From the dark airport, and carrying the pouches that I was delivering to the Embassy, I caught a ride with one of the free-lance taxis waiting outside, who promptly told me that Yerevan was dangerous by night, and that he himself would not ride with a stranger as I was doing. As I was staying in private quarters and not at a hotel, I had to seek a place for the night, and ended up bedding down on a sofa at the barely-heated apartments of Doctors Without Borders, one of the non-governmental organizations helping Armenians with some serious medical issues. I'm still grateful to the organization. This is the kind of experience that leaves a deep impression, and I was happy when dawn came, and I proceeded to find the Embassy. I had some similar questionable experiences flying into Almaty late at night and proceeding on my own to take cars to find hotels. In hindsight, I might not do again what I did then, but one sort of became accustomed to living an adventurous life. While speaking about visiting former Soviet countries other than Russia, I also will mention a trip to the Kyrgyz Republic to negotiate an agreement for a joint council on agricultural development, which would use some of the monetized funds from our food assistance. This trip was much less adventurous, although on our nighttime drive between Bishkek and Almaty we were stopped and searched at checkpoints, whether for drugs, weapons, or what I don't recall now.

On technical assistance, we also were working through a number of U.S. non-governmental organizations, NGO's, providing some funding, and they in turn were working with a number of the Russians who were involved in land legislation. We carried out these training programs in many different ways, both directly as I said, either bringing Russians to the U.S., or bringing Americans to Russia and the other countries, and also by providing funding to Non-Governmental Organizations who in turn carried out a number of the programs. There were an immense number of programs going on to provide technical assistance in agriculture. The market development associations, or Cooperators, that I mentioned earlier in China, also were carrying-out programs, which provided a great deal of technical assistance in upgrading use of grains for food and feed, and for improving efficiency in livestock feeding and production.

Q: Did you still have the feeling at this point that Russia/Soviet Union the economy is essentially collapsing, but getting ready to revive in a new form? This was very much a very difficult transitional stage, or was that a way to characterize it?

SCHOONOVER: This was a fascinating period. As far as the first part, the collapse of the Soviet Union, no one could have predicted precisely what was going to happen, I think. Certain things happened that triggered the actual collapse. You could see the problems. You could see the failures of the centrally planned system, the way they were trying to carry out things, but certain things had to happen, and the attempted coup in August of 1991 and related developments led to the actual date of the collapse of the Soviet Union. The ferment that went on then in trying to establish new systems was tremendous, and it was very difficult to try and comprehend everything that was going on. There were so many factions and schisms, and movements and activities. In an established country, one works with the government, one has knowledge of certain groups in society and culture, and one has a pretty good feel for what is going on in the country. You can keep up contacts with a set number of people whom you know. In the early year or two of Russia, I'd say that was pretty hard to do. We did the best we could, we had our contacts, but the government contacts often weren't necessarily all that good in being able to tell us what was going on. We tried to stay in touch with different research centers, different groups in society, business contacts and so forth. We did stay in touch with the government, both the legislature and the executive organs, and with farm organizations and different people, but it was a very fluid time during that period. We tried both through our direct programs and through the NGO programs to identify those people who looked like they would be influencing policy in the years ahead. Sometimes that was successful and sometimes it wasn't. I can give you one example, and I'll go back to the exchange programs and how one of these activities was successful for us, in the very early months of Russia. We sent a Cochran Program team to the United States from the Agrarian Reform Institute, which was working on land reform issues and land legislation. About a month after they came back, the head of the team became the Minister of Agriculture of the Russian Federation. So, this made a tremendous contact for us to have picked him out in advance, not knowing that this was in the offing. I doubt that he knew it himself at the time, but it gave us tremendous access to higher levels in the Ministry of Agriculture. I should mention one other thing that just occurred to me, concerning the way we were working with them during the early post-Soviet years. We had a U.S. policy advisor assigned directly in the Ministry of Agriculture on the Minister's staff. He was not from the U.S. Government, but from a U.S. university, and financed by the U.S. Government. He was there for about a year, I believe, I can't remember precisely, working with the Russians in those early years. He tried to be a sounding board and to give some advice and recommendations, and reactions to proposed policies. A policy advisor in a position like that has mixed results, I would say. The Minister, obviously, is not going to turn to the American advisor all the time for his advice, but I think he did sometimes. I think he had a staff person who worked quite well with our policy advisor, and they had a good relationship. And that person in turn could influence the Minister. But in that kind of a situation, I don't think the Minister wants to be seen as always turning to the American policy advisor, and particularly in Russia, it was quite a new experience. But just the fact that we were able to do that showed how drastically things had changed from just a year or so earlier. By the way, we also placed a policy adviser in the Ministry of Agriculture in Kazakhstan.

Q: One of the problems with the Soviet Economy—and perhaps you had to go through it—but it was the opportunity for people who were well connected and all, the so-called Oligarchs or something, people who were essentially able to grab hold of great industrial combines and all that and turn it to profit. They became instant billionaires. They're working this out as a system now. How about in the agricultural field? Was this happening, too?

SCHOONOVER: When I left Moscow I would say agricultural reform was still in its early stage, even though I spent two and a half years there after the collapse of the Soviet Union. The names changed and some things changed, but the collective and state farms were to a large extent still there. Now, the rules of the game had changed some, and they were called something else. But it takes much longer than what Americans like to think it does to change institutions that are entrenched as they were. So, this is a way of answering your question, I think. I don't think that the changes that might have permitted reform had really taken place in agriculture in the farms themselves. They had some land legislation, I recall, but they had not actually gone so far as to just say privatize the land and turn it over to people. In one sense, that would have been parallel to the Oligarchs taking over the industrial economy. They had not permitted that to happen to the land. Farms were still very much the same, although now, perhaps, they were called Joint Stock Companies or something like there, but it was very much still the collective or state farms that were occupying most of the land. There was a growing development of private farms, which were largely occupying the land on the fringes, land on the margins, and occasionally they were getting a farm that was so bad that it was dissolved and turned over to private farming. On the whole, the collective and state farms and their people were still in place.

Q: Of course, in a way, the trend everywhere, has been to large farms anyway. Into the agro-business and the small farmer in the United States is a diminishing breed, and in Europe all their tremendous efforts are to keep the small farmers, but basically these people are not there, and they're going and it's turned over to large businesses. But these are much more efficient businesses than one thinks of the collective farm.

SCHOONOVER: One of the differences one observed immediately is that there may have been farms in the United States and in Russia that were approximately the same size--there were Russian farms that were much bigger, too—but the operations were different. The American farm of perhaps a thousand or a few thousand acres was probably run by one farmer, perhaps assisted by his sons, or perhaps he might have had one hired worker, but basically it was still a family farm, even though quite large. That same farm in Russia might have had 500 people working on it. It was a very labor inefficient operation. The Russians still had to go through the transition of moving the surplus labor off of their farms. Surplus by our standards, but, of course, by their standards if it were all moved immediately, why the whole thing would collapse. They wouldn't have enough labor to get things done. One has to upgrade the level of technology, the efficiency of the operation, to be able to do that. The Russian and American enterprises were very different types of farms. One was a very inefficient operation and the other was a very efficient operation.

Q: What about companies like International Harvester or McCormick or Caterpillar and all? Were they finding a market for their farm equipment?

SCHOONOVER: There were some farm equipment shows and exhibitions. There were approaches by American equipment companies first to the Soviets, and later to the Russians. I might add, by the way, that this is more the Commerce Department's sphere of marketing responsibility to assist American firms in their promotion of agricultural technology. But we helped out, too. There were some attempts to sell equipment, but I believe right at that point in the years of transition from the Soviet Union to the new Russia, there was not that much opportunity for U.S. farm equipment firms, owing in part to Russian capital shortages. I'm not sure what has developed in subsequent years since I left Moscow. This was a period of much turmoil--the rules were changing, and no one knew what the rules were--and it was very hard to work with organizations, which didn't know if they were even going to exist tomorrow. So, it was not a good period for building a stable marketing relationship.

Q: One of your big jobs is to estimate what the grain production is. How about statistics?

SCHOONOVER: There was a brief period where there weren't many statistics because the Soviet statistical system collapsed and the Russian and other systems hadn't settled into place yet very well. But after a year or so Russian statistics started coming out and I would say the quantity of statistical information was as great and/or greater than it had been before. It just took a short period of adjustment to move from the Soviet system to the Russian reporting system. There was a lot of statistical information available, certainly, by the time that I left Moscow in 1994. I should underscore that the most important focus of my stay in Moscow during the first half of the '90's was food aid and the technical assistance programs. By technical assistance I'm speaking in a very broad sense, not telling a farmer how to produce a crop, but institution building, establishment of markets, working on land legislation and assistance of this nature. So, food aid and technical assistance were by far the dominant elements of my work during that period. Reporting was still important, as were trade development and promotion, policy representation, and scientific exchanges--a lot of things were still important, but the dominant focus was food aid and technical assistance.

Q: How did the Food Aid program... I mean this was apparently a temporary program. Russia is a food producing country.

SCHOONOVER: It wasn't very clear during that period how long food aid was going to last, and how long U.S. funding would last to keep providing food assistance. But during that period a tremendous amount of food assistance was provided. I believe food aid did phase out after I left, but it was extremely important during those first years of Russia and the other newly independent states.

Q: This is Tape 5, Side 1 with David Schoonover

SCHOONOVER: We were talking about the food assistance that was going into Russia during the first couple of years of the Russian Federation after the fall of the Soviet Union. And, as I recall, around a billion dollars annually of food assistance went to Russia, and very significant amounts to the other countries, but in total to them, perhaps not quite that much. If I recall right, there were maybe six or seven hundred million dollars worth going into the other countries, also. As we discussed previously, a number of programs were used to move this food assistance. As a government representative we were directly responsible for some of it. Some of it was moved by sales or grants. When I say sales, generally I mean long-term loans. Also there were outright grants to the governmental authorities. Food products were made available to the Humanitarian Commission or to trade organizations, essentially with our direct oversight on how they were distributed. Others were made available to U.S. non-governmental organizations, and they, in turn, carried out the food assistance program. Some of these were direct distribution programs to poor people through relief centers. Other donations, at the other end of the spectrum, were monetized food assistance, where food aid was sold to organizations in the country, but then the funds were used for humanitarian purposes. As a consequence of this monetization, I found myself in a somewhat strange position as an Agricultural Minister-Counselor of overseeing the funding of diverse humanitarian projects. For example, the Humanitarian Commission sold a butter donation and acquired funds. To use these funds, the Health and Welfare Ministry developed lists of proposed projects, such as assistance to hospitals and various sorts of organizations that were working on medical assistance. I remember a project to manufacture artificial arms and limbs, for example. We would have a long list of projects, which we had to review and approve. There also were other organizations carrying out monetization projects. We created a joint council, of which I was a member, for Russian agricultural and rural development, I can't remember the exact name, to fund projects using some of these Russian-held funds. Members of the council included both U.S. and Russian Governmental and non-governmental organization members. I would say the council was a unique undertaking. It was rather difficult to identify and place Russian non-governmental organizations on the council, as they were in early stages of development, but we did have 2-3 representatives, including a representative of the Russian Orthodox Church. This council of about a dozen members, in total, reviewed various rural development project proposals for use of these funds. One interesting side note, I recall that the Russian First Deputy Minister of Agriculture and I jointly interviewed applicants and decided on the Executive Secretary for the council. That sort of confidence building came in handy a few years later, when he came to Washington as the Minister, and he and I had to work out the final details on an agreement. But, let me not jump ahead. A tremendous amount of activities were going on during my tour. They were extremely busy times.

Q: I would have thought that it also would be awkward for dealing with your Soviet/Russian counterparts. Here's a proud country and all of a sudden it's getting food aid and all this sort of thing from a country that had been its #1 perceived enemy. Did you find this difficult dealing with the diplomacy of doing this sort of thing?

SCHOONOVER: You know, reactions to the food aid varied a lot. I think still there in the system there were officials, who resented it very much. There were others who were very glad to see us, very glad to receive that assistance. There were individual people who really appreciated the food aid. For example, elderly people, who were receiving food assistance through some of these distribution centers, really appreciated the aid. There were others, and you would see articles in the newspapers, who very much resented the food aid. The reactions were very mixed.

SCHOONOVER: Summer of '94.

Q: '94. Did you see a new Russia emerging?

SCHOONOVER: Ah, yes. There were a lot of things that still had to happen, but it was a very different place by the summer of '94 in contrast to what I saw when I arrived there in the beginning of 1990. There was a blossoming of private entrepreneurship that one could just see on the streets of Moscow. One could see newly opened shops that looked very modern, very different from the old Soviet stores. One could feel it in discussions with people and officials who were thinking differently from the Soviet officials with whom I dealt in the early years. On the other hand, there were some old timers who still wanted to turn the clock back, too. So the changes weren't uniform by any means, but Moscow had a very different feel when I left in the summer of '94 than when I arrived.

Many of the changes did not come without problems. As you recall, in 1993, Yeltsin encountered serious differences with his Vice President Rutskoy and parliament chief Khasbulatov. The opposition entrenched themselves in the Russian White House, just across the street from the Embassy compound, and Yeltsin used tanks to blast them out of the building. The sounds of the tanks firing, and images of smoke and fire rising from the White House, are still vivid in my mind. There had been rowdy demonstrations in Moscow, and near the Embassy streets sealed off by Russian militia. On a Sunday afternoon in early October I went to my office at the hotel, and when I returned, there was a strange emptiness on the street. A guard let me in the compound—I noted that the Russian militia were on the inside, which was a great departure from normal--and told me quickly about the fighting that had taken place there that afternoon. There was sporadic shooting still in the vicinity of the compound, apparently instigated by those favoring the opposition. That evening, demonstrators attempted to storm the Moscow radio tower, and people were killed. Our Embassy staff evacuated the street-side buildings, and huddled in the gymnasium below ground level. As I recall, the standoff at the White House lasted a day, and the next morning, we heard the sounds of the tanks firing, and a lot of shooting. One of our Marines was hit, but otherwise our Embassy staff was safe, but on the outside, a number of people were killed, including some Americans. As you know, the opposition gave up and emerged from the burning White House, but some think that Yeltsin's image was damaged somewhat by his handling of the incident.

JOSEPH R. MCGHEE
Deputy Director, Office of Soviet Affairs
Washington, DC (1991-1992)

Joseph R. McGhee was born and raised in Pennsylvania. He attended Yale and Columbia University and entered the Foreign Service in 1975. He served in Rome, Prague, Panama City, and Bonn. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1997.

Q: You left this hot spot in June of '91. Where did you go?

McGHEE: I went to be one of the deputy directors in what was then EUR-SOV, office of Soviet Affairs. It was still the Soviet Union then.

Q: When did the Soviet Union cease to be the Soviet Union?

McGHEE: Just a few months after I got there. I arrived in that job early in July. I had to come over there early because the President was traveling to Moscow for a state visit with Gorbachev. At that point the main sort of tangible results that were expected were a series of cooperative agreements in the transport field and in developing low income housing and things like this.

The office of Soviet Affairs actually had five deputy directors: a senior deputy director who was John Tefft and then one for internal issues, one for external policy, one for economics and trade, and one for all the stuff that nobody else wanted to do. That last one was mine. They needed someone there at that time to supervise the finalizing of all these agreements that were going to be signed: there was one on space, academic exchanges. It was quite a long process. These things all had to be prepared in English and Russian and then the text had to be justified, compared and we had to make sure they all said the same thing in both languages.

It was a long process but we got the President off. He made his visit and it went off fairly well as I recall. The President came back and then after that Gorbachev went off on vacation to Yalta in the Crimea. He was seized down there during a coup attempt. This was in about August.

Q: So really you were just brand new on board?

McGHEE: That's right. There was a task force and so for three days or so everything was very touch and go as to whether this coup was going to succeed and whether Gorbachev was going to be hauled off and imprisoned or worse. Yeltsin was on a tank out in front of the so-called Parliament or white house and all of this. My job was running the task force during this period.

Q: What was the atmosphere? In the first place was there any indication from your perspective before it happened, was there any tip-off or any concern, and then what was our reaction when it unfolded?

McGHEE: Our immediate reaction was surprise and dismay. There was real difficulty getting a handle on it initially because it was not very clear who was in charge. I don't think it was even clear to the coup plotters who was in charge. We didn't have an ambassador there at the time. I believe that Matlock had left and Jim Collins was charge. He was in contact with some of the people involved in the coup by phone but in particular, of course, he was in contact with Yeltsin. At a certain point there was a phone call from the President backing Yeltsin and the notion of democratization. Yeltsin at the time was I believe Prime Minister or President, I don't recall quite what his title was, of the Russian Federation within the Soviet Union but he really took charge and of course the coup collapsed. People came out in the street, if not in support of Gorbachev, at least in opposition to the coup.

Of course Gorbachev didn't fall right away. He came back to Moscow and was still President and head of the Communist Party for a time but it was clear that his credibility was really fatally undermined by these events. Gradually over the next couple of months, he gave way to Yeltsin.

It was in this process also that various component parts of the old Soviet Union began to fall off.

Q: While you were on the task force was it more again a watching brief? Was there anything we felt that we could do?

McGHEE: Watching was a huge part of it plus we were scrambling around to stop various agencies from dispatching people off to Moscow helter-skelter. Our embassy there had its hands full. We had an open line around the clock with the embassy. Rosemary Forsyth who was my deputy on my shift of the task force was on the line virtually constantly. She was a real asset because she had just arrived back from Moscow so she knew everybody including who did what in the embassy so she could yell down the phone, get me so and so.

The other thing was keeping the White House, the secretary, and everyone involved closely informed on what exactly was taking place in Moscow and getting instructions to Jim Collins in a rapid and organized manner. Obviously we tried to get everything we could out by cable but there were times when events were unfolding so quickly that this all had to be done over the phone.

The other thing was press. There was a huge amount of press attention, obviously, and attention to the U.S. reaction. There was a real need to ride herd on the Department to keep people from talking through their hats. There was a lot of contact with the White House and the situation room there. It was very busy and it was very fast. Three days and that was the end of it.

Q: Here you had been dealing with one crisis and next thing you knew you were dealing with another one and you were trying to pick up information. You had Gorbachev, and then Yeltsin was coming up and we had sort of put our cards on Gorbachev. Was there concern about Yeltsin when you arrived because he had been portrayed at one time as sort of almost a clown or a drunk or something like that or did this change?

McGHEE: He has been variously portrayed as a drunk off and on, that was no secret. He had been mayor of Moscow and at one point rather close to Gorbachev but Gorbachev had unloaded him earlier that year or the latter part of the year before. Yeltsin had gone to this position in the Russian Republic government where he had a much lower profile but nevertheless he did come to the States earlier in that year in 1991. He was not invited to the White House or at least he didn't see the President and that of course was taken as something of a snub. So there was this concern there that Yeltsin would be hostile, if not towards the U.S., at least towards the administration that was in charge at the time. In fact none of that panned out and if Yeltsin had been prone to pursue some kind of a vendetta it was just the speed with which events unfolded that precluded him from doing anything but trying to make the right decision which by and large he did.

Q: While you were on the task force did you pretty much sort out information that was coming in and getting it to the right people and to make sure our press office was saying the right thing?

McGHEE: That's it, yes.

Q: Was the CIA contributing much to this process?

McGHEE: Yes the CIA did contribute information at various times on who was where and what they were doing. There was plenty of information available. It wasn't particularly information that was of great help to us on the task force and it was always information of that kind where unless you know what the source is, the information itself is devalued. Of course we never knew what the source was so it was very difficult to tell in the confusion whether they had it right or partially right, and what parts were right and what parts were wrong. They did have some pretty good information that proved to be quite correct on who was where and what was going on.

Q: Did we seem to have a fairly good fix that the coup was not going to be a fait accompli; that it might not work?

McGHEE: It became clear fairly early on that there was going to be opposition in spite of the fact that there were some uniforms among the coup plotters. They had not done the spade work in terms of assuring that the key military units especially those around Moscow, were aboard for something like this. As it became clearer that not all of the military was prepared to accept that and that there was going to be at least some resistance from the population at large as well, then it became increasingly clear that the coup plotters were in trouble. This developed I would say in the first 24 to 36 hours that the extent of the coup plotters problems became increasingly evident.

Q: After the coup was settled what was your job after the task force was over?

McGHEE: My job remained essentially what it had been which was the deputy director in charge of all the things no one else wanted to do. Part of that was the consular function. We had a visa operation in EUR-SOV that was run by a senior civil servant, Gladys Boluda and I supervised that although it meant essentially doing whatever Gladys told me to do.

Another thing was this question of exchanges. Lots and lots of NGOs, non-governmental organizations, and also government agencies, NASA, NOA, Department of Transportation, Department of Agriculture, you name it every agency that had anything going on in the Soviet Union wanted to get someone in there and start making connections with the new people if there were going to be new people etc., etc. We had to hold all of them off for a couple of weeks while things got back to normal in Moscow.

Basically we then had to establish some sort of control over the follow-on business because as countries started to drop out of the Soviet Union (the Baltic states, the Caucasus, the Stans, Ukraine, Belarus) they began to hold these referenda on the future for all of these countries and of course there was a real land rush to get in on the ground floor with all of these newly independent states. We had to make decisions about embassies, were we going to open them, how big are they going to be, etc., etc. Then we had to somehow maintain some control over this process of suddenly multiplying all of these cooperative projects that all of these agencies had, as to how they were going to go into these newly independent states and ensuring that it was done in an organized manner, to begin in a big way on the ground floor with these new countries but we also wanted to maintain some control over who was doing what and ensuring that in the rush to get out there that we didn't tread all over the Russians toes for example.

One of the things that I did was to oversee the EUR-SOV's participation in the process of identifying and implementing aid or assistance, sort of a presumptive new Marshall Plan for the former Soviet Union. Another was getting ready to send new embassies out to all of the new independent countries which was a long and convoluted process and it involved congress and getting money. The administration, by which I mean James Baker, had foolhardily, in my view, made a pledge to congress that he was going to staff all of these new missions, there were 15 of them, without requesting a single more additional position or any more money. He was going to find it all somewhere out there. Congress was perfectly willing to authorize virtually anything we needed and I thought at the time when I was dealing with them on this, that we should take what we could get while we could get it.

Q: What was the motivation do you think on Baker's part?

McGHEE: Of course I have never spoken to Baker but I sort of thought that at the time he was thinking about running for President and he wanted to demonstrate what an efficient hard-nosed administrator he was. What it meant was it just made everything that much more difficult. Positions had to be made free by disencumbering them somewhere else and then they had to be allocated among all of these new missions. It also meant that what we got out there initially didn't correspond to what was needed but rather to what was available. Obviously sometimes you have to do that but this was a case where we didn't have to do that, we just decided unilaterally to inflict it on ourselves.

Q: What was the ambiance or spirit of the European Soviet Affairs when it started to unravel? Was there concern that this was going to make things more difficult or this was a good thing because this was the disarming essentially of our mortal enemy for a long time? What were you getting from your colleagues?

McGHEE: I think there was concern that this was going to be a huge mess and in fact it was a huge mess. There was concern that the Russians were going to try to resist these independence efforts especially when Ukraine went. Concern also over the fact that every one of these new states had a sizable Russian minority that still looked to Moscow for leadership and just the sort of inertia that exists anywhere. It existed in Germany too, adjusting to a new situation where there was no longer an East Germany.

Think of all the people who had spent their whole careers worrying about the Soviet Union and suddenly there was no longer a Soviet Union. There was a lot of old thinking that had to be got rid of and certainly while I was there, it was not in any meaningful way gotten rid of. You couldn't even get people to stop referring to the Soviet Union and start referring to something else. I really wasn't there long enough to see the middle transition to the new situation.

In any event it was extremely chaotic. I don't mean to say that the office was badly run or anything like that, it was just a function of the situation. The situation was new and there were new and unexpected elements cropping up every day. Obviously our first concern was what was going to happen to the Soviet nuclear arsenal and that took up lots of time and lots of effort on the part of many people. Then trying to decide what on earth we could do for these people.

There was a lot of big talk about, as I said, Marshall Plans and new world order, and new relationships and things like that, but on a basic level there was no money to do any of these things. The agencies involved and even the NGOs were of course completely surprised by this and weren't ready to expand immediately into 15 new countries. The one organization that was quickest and most efficient in responding to this was the Peace Corps which managed to have people lined up and ready to go for that coming summer in I believe it was three countries. Plus they were fighting almost immediately in the Gladys Boluda so there was a lot of pressure.

Q: Having come from the Iraq-Iran business, were you at all concerned about Iranian influence or were you seeing this translated into concern about Iranian influence into what one would call the Stans: Tajikistan, Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan?

McGHEE: Actually the focus of where Iranian influence was of greatest concern was Azerbaijan. The Azerbaijanis have a long history with Persia because they are right there bordering the Caspian Sea. They have a substantial border with Iran and they have lots of oil. They were under attack almost immediately by the Armenians over Nagorno Karabakh and what have you; this long simmering ethnic dispute there in the southern Caucasus. There was concern that Iran would step in and stir up more trouble.

In the Stans, the Stans very quickly established good relations with Turkey. They speak basically Turkic languages out there and there was kind of a cultural link with the Turks. Also there was some resistance to democracy in the Stans which we were trying to turn around. In the case of Tajikistan which borders on Afghanistan there was overflow from the war in Afghanistan and almost immediately a civil war in Tajikistan. These were all things that were of concern. The Turks got out there very quickly and we were right behind them along with the Germans and some others. I would say that the biggest concern with regards to Iran in particular was Azerbaijan and I think it still remains that way.

Q: Were there any other either events or issues that particularly concerned you? In the first place, how long were you with the Soviet desk?

McGHEE: I was there until February and then I had to go to German language training.

Q: This would be February '92?

McGHEE: That's right.

ROBERT S. STRAUSS
Ambassador
USSR (1991-1992)

Ambassador Strauss was born and raised in Texas and educated at the University of Texas. After a stint as Field Agent with the FBI, he formed his own law firm in Dallas, where he became engaged in Democratic Party politics, eventually becoming Chairman of the Party. This brought him in close contact with both Democrat and Republican leaders and Presidents, who sought his advice and used his talents in Trade Negotiations and Middle Peace Negotiations. In 1991 President George Bush, a Republican, appointed him Ambassador to the Soviet Union, where he served until 1992. Ambassador Strauss was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: Mr. Ambassador, we left the last time when you were in, could you tell us how this appointment to Moscow go, and when did this happen and come about.

STRAUSS: One day I got a call in my office from an old friend who was Secretary of State, Jim Baker. He said, "Bob, come over and have lunch with me today." I said, "Jim, I can't today. I have a date already." He said, "Well break it and come over here and have lunch with me. I need to talk to you." I said, "Jim, I don't break dates. If I can be with you, I don't like to break dates." He said, "This is important, very important. I promised the President that I would talk to you about a matter before he gets back in town from a trip he is on. He will be back in mid afternoon, and he is going to want to talk to you."

Q: This is President George Bush.

STRAUSS: George Bush senior. That piqued my curiosity, so I said, "Well I will cancel it and come over." I went over and sat down. We had a nice lunch. Before we got really started I said, "What the hell is this all about." He said, "Well, you know we have been looking for an ambassador to the Soviet Union for over a year, and nothing satisfies the President. He called me this morning about seven o'clock and said, 'I have got our man; now all we have got to do is land him.'" I said, "Well what can I do to help?" He said, "Well, you can accept. You are the man." I said, "Are you out of your damn mind, and is the President out of his damn mind." He said, "No, he said he had been thinking about it and didn't know why he didn't think about it earlier. You are a perfect person to go for him. You know Gorbachev." I said, "I couldn't consider that. I am in my seventies, as is Helen. It is just not something we can think about." He called in the woman who worked for him, did his press stuff.

Q: Margaret Tutwiler.

STRAUSS: Tutwiler.

Q: I have interviewed her.

STRAUSS: Yes, she is splendid.

Q: Boy is she professional.

STRAUSS: Yes, she is a real pro. I said to them after I, Bush knew, I mean Baker knew that Margaret and I were good friends. I had been helpful to her, and she has been helpful to me. So he had her come in as we were having lunch. The three of us talked about it. I just really didn't seriously consider it. I remember Baker saying to me, "At least you will go over and meet with the President about it." "Well of course I would. I didn't want to be arrogant about it. I just think I am the wrong person. I don't know much about Russia. I don't know anything about this. I am too old. Baker said, "Fine." So at three o'clock that afternoon I went over to speak with George Bush. He told me how much he wanted, he said he wanted me to do this. I told him I couldn't consider it. He pushed some more, a long meeting. I was uncomfortable saying no to a President. Finally I said to him, "Hell Mr. President," keep in mind George Bush senior who was president then, and I are old friends. We chaired our respective parties at the same time. We were very close, good close friends, very good friends. Anyway, I finally said, "Hell, Mr. President, I didn't even vote for you. You don't want me." He looked back and said, "I cannot believe you voted for that other fellow." I said, "Damn sure believe it because I did. I didn't have a bit of trouble. I never considered voting for you." I laughed and he laughed. He said, "Well you just blew it, Strauss." I said, "Why?" He said, "You are the only person since I have been president who sat in that chair at this desk and looked me in the face and said he didn't vote for me. Now a lot of them sat there and said they did. I know that, but you are the only one who had enough guts to say he didn't and do it with a smile." So he said, "Now I know you have to go over there. I need somebody over there who can do business with Gorbachev.' That would have been his theme. He needed it. He said, "The limit to what we can do over there now; we don't have a budget; we don't have this; we don't have that, but if you know, you have been in Europe a lot. You have worked in Europe, and you know the heads of the government in most of those countries. The signal that you are leaving at your age and stature in life, station in life, that you are going to Russia for me will send the right signal. We are serious about really helping the Russians. It will really send the right signal to President Gorbachev." So he said, "Tell you what. Why don't you and Helen come to Camp David with me for the weekend. We will talk about it." I said, "No, Mr. President, I wouldn't consider doing that. That place is too seductive. You get up there; you can't use your good judgment. There is no chance. I have got to stay here." We laughed some more. He said, "Think about it overnight. Let me call Helen. I will talk to Helen about it." "Don't call Helen; I will talk to her about it." He said, "Let me talk to Helen," and told his secretary to get her on the phone. I said, "Not now. Give me 24 hours on this." I was worried about Helen saying, agreeing to anything he asked her to do. But anyway we had a couple of meetings over there, and I finally decided I ought to go. Larry Eagleburger and Brent Scowcroft both had considerable influence on me. I ran into them in the hallway when I went in for my second or third visit with the president. Eagleburger said, "You know, Strauss, the main reason that you ought to go is it does send a signal. Nobody else is sending it as well as your going. People have more background more knowledge, but this sends a signal and it will be well received. So I eventually before that week was out, I called him and said that, told the President I would go. I said, "I just have two conditions. One is that Helen goes with me, and the second is that I can take Vera Murray as my assistant. She has done everything with me for so long." He said, "Strauss, if Vera won't go with you, I don't want you over there. You can't work without her." We laughed some more. That's how the appointment came about.

Q: Let me just go back a bit. you said you knew Gorbachev. Can you talk about up to this point, we are talking about what year now?

STRAUSS: Well, we had to be talking about this was very early '71.

Q: '81.

STRAUSS: '81 yes.

Q: What about, not '81, '91.

STRAUSS: '91.

Q: Boy, this shows our joint ages here that these decades sort of get, yes, '91. Prior to this in '91, what had been your contact with sort of European leaders, particularly Gorbachev. We are still talking about the Soviet Union.

STRAUSS: I had, Nancy Reagan had called me to get an invitation to sit at the table with Gorbachev when Gorbachev made his first visit over here. I have told you this story about going upstairs at the White House. We discussed Don Regan and the fact that she wanted to get rid of him and wanted me to convince the president he needed to do it for his own political survival. That is on tape here we have. She, you remember the last thing I said in there when I sat down at the table with Gorbachev with that big state dinner and all those Republicans in the room. I knew a thousand people in there who wanted to be sitting next to Gorbachev, one of the leading Democrats in the country, how stunned they all were. So I had met him then and I had spent a little time with Gorbachev on that visit. Later I had, the office had come over. No, I hadn't seen the office; I hadn't gotten to know the office then. So that was about the only thing I had.

Q: When you met Gorbachev at that time, was he at all interested in the American political situation?

STRAUSS: He knew a good deal about it from our conversation, mostly our dinner conversation that one night. I don't remember having any other...

Q: I was just wondering whether you had the feeling, as you say he knew, he understood. The fact that you were a Democrat was important.

STRAUSS: Oh yes, he understood very vividly. I had been to Russia and had dinner with him, a small dinner of about 12 people in connection with the Russian Business council. I had gone over with about a dozen business people who were doing business in Russia at the time or trying to. So I had that evening with Gorbachev, a small dinner. So I had limited experience, but it was something, and it got press. So President Bush knew about it. I liked Gorbachev a lot then. Everyone did. Gorbachev was real I think.

Q: I recall just being on the street by happenstance, and all of a sudden this limousine came by and there he was waving at everyone. I mean he seemed to be having a delightful time.

STRAUSS: An amusing the story, he stopped right, the traffic, got out and greeted people. It happened to be in the building where Duke Ziebert had his restaurant, Duke's. I used to eat in Duke's regularly, and the mob around there. I said later to Duke, "You know why he stopped here and got out and all the people got around him?" He said, "No, why?" I said, "They had planned to go in and have lunch there and all these people got around him and were saying, 'whatever you do, don't eat that lousy food in that lousy place.'" Duke didn't think that was as funny as I did, but we had a good laugh out of it. But anyway, I had another condition on that for the President. I said, "You know, my daughter, our only daughter is approaching the age of 40 or is 40, and she is pregnant. My wife is not about to leave here until that baby is born the first of September." I think I said the first of September, something like that. He said, "We can work that out. I know you are not going to go without her." I said, "No, I am going to stay here with Helen on that." So he didn't have any trouble with that. Strange that story didn't break. Bush called a press conference which he had out in the garden there and had a couple of hundred press people show up for it. They didn't know what it was about. I walked out. He announced that I was ambassador to the Soviet Union that morning. It was a big story for a lot of reasons. Number one, our relationship with the Soviet Union then, primarily here is a leading former Democrat, who was one, being offered and accepting a job as ambassador to the Soviet Union in this Republican administration. So it made for a good story. It was very well received. The press has always been kind to me, overly kind. I am about the only fellow I know in public life who never cusses the press. They have always been generous with me, overly so. Helen and I started to get ready, and one thing we needed to do was take some Russian lessons and briefings over at the State Department. So I started getting briefings with various people at the State Department on Russian, Soviet issues. I also started language lessons; Helen and I both did that with a very good man that they provided. The time came for our summer vacation. We always spent about a month, half of July and half of August, most of August out on the west coast in a little cottage we have out there.

Q: Where is that?

STRAUSS: Del Mar, California. So Helen and I had been out. I had the man, the language tutor, come out at my expense, not the government's, and stay there for two weeks to give us both some intense Russian lessons. Two or three hours in the morning. That is wearing.

Q: That is very wearing.

STRAUSS: And at our age it was even more wearing.

Q: That is one of the things we all learn. The older you get, the harder it is.

STRAUSS: Exactly. So we spent, we were in the middle of the lessons when the coup came in August.

Q: The coup in the Soviet Union.

STRAUSS: Soviet Union.

Q: When the military and other groups tried to oust Gorbachev.

STRAUSS: Tried their best, exactly. In fact they took him physically. I guess he was in his home on the Black Sea there when they took over the home and stayed a house prisoner of theirs. So the phone rang. We were out for dinner with our tutor as a matter of fact. When we got back the phone was ringing. It was the White House calling saying that this coup had taken place. The President wanted me over there the next day, to leave the next morning. It was 9:00 at night I guess, when the phone rang in California, so midnight here. It was Brent Scowcroft who said the President wants you to come in tomorrow and stop and pick up Jim Baker, Secretary of State Baker who is fishing in Wyoming or Montana. I forget which. They can pick him up and bring you all back here, and you can get the last briefing and get sworn in. I had been sworn in, I had already been confirmed by the Senate.

Q: I assumed there was no problem there.

STRAUSS: I had no problem at all. So we did that, but Helen didn't go over. I went over without her, and stayed about five or six or seven days. About that time the baby was born. I rushed back home to be with my daughter when she had her child, and stayed there a couple of days. Then Helen and I went back together. A funny story happened when we went back. We got there, and of course tanks were in the street. We flew overnight to get there, and then the drive in the morning, worn out. It was a sight, bombs everywhere, tanks still in the street, Gorbachev still in captivity. They call house arrest captivity, and he did. I remember I went straight to the embassy and met with the staff. Jim Collins was out there, my deputy. I hadn't known him before, but he was very highly recommended by everyone. I had just met him; I had no experience with him. They suggested that rather than stay at the residence for the ambassador I ought to stay in the compound at Collins' house which I did. We started to work. The first thing that happened when I got there, Collins said to me, "The staff is here. They have been waiting. They are waiting for instructions and advice. The White House has called, and they are waiting for your impressions." I thought to myself this is a nice start for a fellow who doesn't know anything about Russia and even less about the Soviet Union. I said to somebody there, Collins I think, I said, "Why don't you see, I am sure we won't reach him, but why don't you see if you can get through on the phone system and we can get Ambassador Dobrynin." Who you are going to call, and he was the longest serving ambassador to this country, represents the Soviet Union and was a key player I think. As a matter of fact, I think Ambassador Dobrynin had much to do with keeping Russia, the Soviet Union and the U.S. from coming to grips with each other. It was the kind of communication they our presidents had with the Soviet Union through Dobrynin who told each side what they need to hear to keep them from each other's throats. I'll be damned if two minutes later, you rarely get anybody on the phone in those days when you tried because the system wouldn't work, and the phone books, but I'll be damned if in two minutes they didn't have Anatoly Dobrynin on the phone.

Q: By that time Dobrynin had moved. He was part of the Politburo at that time.

STRAUSS: Yes he moved back. He had given up his ambassadorship to this country. He was very close to the government but not in it. I said, "Anatoly," and he started laughing, sort of chuckled the way he did. "I thought I would hear from you, and I am glad to hear from you. What can I do for you?" I said, "Anatoly, I have got to tell our government, give our government some advice on how to play this thing. You know, I don't have to tell you, I am going to have to get that good advice based on other people's judgment better than mine. I would like to know what you think I ought to do." He said, "Bob, the best thing to do is do nothing. I think in 48 hours this coup will all be over. It has no leadership. What little leadership it has, they are petrified and drugged.” He just was very critical of the whole thing. He said, “I think the best thing you can do is nothing.” That made more sense to me than anything. I went up and told Jim Collins that. He said, “I think he is exactly right.” That is what we did. I called and talked to Jim Baker as I recall. It could have been Brent Scowcroft. I think Baker had gone back out on his vacation, maybe he hadn’t. Anyway I called either Baker or Scowcroft or both. I remember talking to Scowcroft. I had a long relationship already, and gave him that advice, the best thing to do is nothing. He approved course B. The best advice I could give him, don’t say anything; don’t do anything. Let it play out.

Q: Well this is like the three ton elephant. If you start tramping around you often do more harm than good.

STRAUSS: Oh yes, no question about it.

Q: I would like to go back just a bit. When you got together, I mean here is a coup. You go to the White house. What was the impression? What was the mood and the analysis that you were getting from the people in the White House about what the hell was happening and what did this mean?

STRAUSS: They obviously were terribly concerned about it, and the best advice they had was that these people simply despised Gorbachev and his reforms, and would do their utmost to get rid of him. But they had serious doubts that they would end up successful, be a successful coup. As a matter of fact, that very day while we were talking, a group of people were going down and thought they could get access to Gorbachev to talk with him, people representing various institutions in the government including several ambassadors, a couple of ambassadors from foreign countries. I was to go. I hadn’t been there, but I was on their list to fly down and see him. Jim Collins was to go, my deputy in my place. But there was - consternation is not a strong enough term. There was no panic. George Bush was very calm about it, very cool about it.

Q: Did you get the feeling that this was a, I mean obviously you knew most of the players, but did you have the feeling that here was a, in foreign affairs here was a White House with a president that really understood situations, when to let go and when not to. I mean you know, in other words, a White House that was comfortable with the crisis.

STRAUSS: Yes, I guess I would agree, that is right.

Q: I don’t want to put words in your mouth.

STRAUSS: I think that is right. I think George Bush was, generally speaking, comfortable. You see, this was the second year of his presidency and going into his third year really. He was comfortable, and he had good people. Jim Baker he had tremendous confidence in. They both had confidence in Larry Eagleburger, the Secretary of State and the deputy secretary respectively. Brent Scowcroft had a world of experience and sophistication. So he had a first rate team at that time.

Q: Well now, during this time, I mean this is before you went out. There had been people in the White House, kind of within the staff who tended to put their money on Gorbachev and in doing so, this is a staff problem often sort of denigrating Yeltsin and all that. Were you picking up any of this?

STRAUSS: No question there was a great deal of that there. There were people in the Bush administration at the highest levels who did not want him to have anything to do with Boris Yeltsin. As a matter of fact after I was appointed, and before I served, went over to start my service, Yeltsin came to town. They didn't want him to see the president. They were concerned it would send Gorbachev. As a matter of fact Yeltsin couldn't even get in to, he was going in a space bowl in Houston. They couldn't get him permission to do that. You could drive in off the highway. If he had just driven in off the highway and not asked, he would have been fine, but he asked, and they turned him down. I had to call Brent Scowcroft. He said, "I'll take care of that. That is dumb." He arranged for it. So that was the time...

Q: I mean this often picks up in a lower level. Policy can sometimes be affected by people who are just closing doors and all that.

STRAUSS: Oh, not sometimes; frequently I would say, more often than that sometimes, no question about that. There was a negative reaction to Yeltsin from top to bottom, just sort of a left wing radical. You remember there was the press saying at the time, they began to say that Bush was staying with Gorbachev too long because Gorbachev is already beginning to get in trouble. Just about the time I arrived Gorbachev was getting into trouble, so it was just beginning that. There was no big story yet.

Q: Were you picking up before you went out there, was anybody at the State Department or National Security Council saying power may be moving you know. Don't discount Yeltsin.

STRAUSS: Yes of course that was there, but people thought Gorbachev was a lot more secure than Gorbachev was is a better way of putting it. And Gorbachev was not as secure as he thought he was. Yeltsin was a major player already. What had gone on after that, I think he had not shortly after he became president of Russia. He may have been already.

Q: Just put this, in the Soviet Union there were presidents of the various republics. Russia of course was the major republic.

STRAUSS: The major republic. Yeltsin and Gorbachev at that time still on the surface still had some semblance of cordial relationship, but it deteriorated quickly. Keep in mind I am talking about August. By the end of the year on Christmas Day, Gorbachev gave up his job. Yeltsin pushed him out of his job is a better way of putting it.

Q: Well Yeltsin had, I mean when you got there at the embassy you were finding a different mood than say in Washington about this Yeltsin-Gorbachev power relationship, because Yeltsin by the time you arrived had already stood up on top of a tank and said no. I mean...

STRAUSS: Yeltsin was the popular figure in the country, no question about that. An interesting thing happened about that. I guess it was about my third day there or fourth day there. They had a big memorial service for three young men who had been killed in the coup. One of them was Russian Orthodox; one was, I think, Baptist, and one was Jewish. They had people from three different faiths there at this big memorial service. When I went over there, Collins didn't go with me. But Jim Billington of the Library of Congress happened to be in town, and he went along with me.

Q: Quite a scholar in Russian culture.

STRAUSS: Great scholar, yes, and was very helpful in what to say when we had a chance. When we got there, there must have been, hell I don't know how many hundred thousand people. Biggest crowd I have ever seen. I would have estimated a quarter of a million people they had in this big place. They had all the ambassadors from various countries who were going to meet and sit together during this service to show their support for Gorbachev, who had been out of captivity now two days. When Billington and Vera and I and the security guys started walking toward where the ambassadors were supposed to meet, there was something way over towards the edge of part of that crowd, and I turned behind and I looked around. I saw a flat bed truck with some type of microphone on top of it. Just a flat bed truck out there, that was the stage. I said to Vera, "Vera I think that is the stage. I bet you that is where things are going to take place. I don't want to go over there and sit in the bleachers. The action is going to be up on that truck." I told the security people, "Let's go over there." I turned to some of the ambassadors and said, "Do you want to go with me?" The Italian ambassador said he would like to go. So he and I and I think Billington went with us, I am not certain. But we all went over towards that flat bed truck. We got within 50 yards of it, and there were ropes. The security people said, "These are ropes here, Mr. Ambassador." I said, "Well lift the damn rope up and let's go under it, or push it down and let's get over it." I turned to Vera and said, "Vera, this is just like a Democratic convention. Everybody is in charge, and nobody is in charge, so if you act like you are in charge, you will be in charge." She laughed. Of course I was exactly right, and we then got right up to the edge of the truck. There were a lot of security people there and heavier ropes. We had the same discussion. I said, "Lift them up and go on." So we did. When I got to the end of that flat bed truck, the whole Russian power establishment, what little there was left of it was back there. The first person I saw, one of the persons was Gorbachev. I went over to greet him, and he greeted me. Very warm, and he said he was glad I was there, that he had been expecting me and was glad I showed up. I said, "Well so am I. Who is going to speak here today, Mr. President?" He said, "Well, I am going to speak. The mayor is going to speak, and each member of the clergy is going to speak for two minutes. It will just be a 40 minute program," something like that. Less than an hour program. I said, "Well I would like to speak. I have a message from President Bush" He looked kind of stunned and kind of said no. I said, "Mr. President, let me tell you what is going on in this world and in your country. People are wondering about you, what is going to happen to you, senior people having just attempted a coup. Nothing could be as important to you as having a representative of the President of the United States stand up and give you his support for you as President of the Soviet Union." His eyes lit up just as if a light went on. He said, "You will speak just before me." I said, "Thank you. President Bush would like that. He wanted to show you his support and the world his support." So before a couple of more minutes had passed down came a kind of a rope ladder. I found myself helping the clergy one by one get up and down on the ladder and helping this one up and that one down. I laughed and said, "Vera it is just another, I told you about the Democratic convention. You never know what is going to happen next.” After a half an hour or so, less than that, I spoke. I had a guy Hopkins who was my interpreter. He said he was a nervous wreck. He didn’t have time to prepare for this, but we had it all written out. Collins had it prepared for me before I left the embassy. I had marked it up some as we drove over, so it was a fairly scratchy three minute remarks is all it was. Three or four minutes. But I remember getting up and looking over that crowd and thinking hell his crowd is three or four times bigger than I have seen in Times Square during the Democratic convention. We got through it, and it was played over and over on CNN and other networks around the world. It was very meaningful to Gorbachev. The White House was tickled to death. I talked to Brent Scowcroft. I don’t think I talked to the President then. They were delighted that we showed this U.S. support. So my ambassadorship was launched in a very positive way.

Q: I wonder if something here, I wonder if you could talk a little about your working relationship with Vera. She is here today, and here I think it should be for the record.

STRAUSS: Yes, I thought we covered this earlier.

Q: I think maybe we have.

STRAUSS: Well, let’s do it anyway. It will be covered twice. When I took over, became treasurer of the Democratic National Committee in Washington in 1970, it was a mess. Fred Harris had been chairman and had no discipline, none, and the staff had none. It was a shambles. They were poorly trained. They were nice people. Some of them were and some of them weren’t, but it was obvious we had to get rid of a lot and better utilize and order what was there. About the second or third day I was there, this lovely woman whose name is Louise Roberts, had been Fred Harris’ secretary I think, or she had been with Pat O’Connor who was treasurer, his secretary. She was my secretary and I said, “Louise, who is that woman on the switchboard out there? She is the only person out here I have talked to that has any sense.” Louise came back in a few minutes and said, “Her name is Vera Murray. She is a temporary employee here; she is filling in.” I asked her to come back. I said, “Miss Murray, I need to talk to several hundred people in the next weeks, important people, difficult to reach. I need someone who knows how to talk on the telephone. You are the only one I have seen around here that looks to me like you have a talent for that. How would you like to come back here and work for me?” She sort of in a suspicious way said, “Well what would be expected of me.” That was about the time we had the scandals with secretaries who couldn’t type. She said, “You know, I am not a secretary. I don’t take shorthand. I don’t type.” I said, “You won’t be expected to. It is probably not what you suspect would be expected of you. I would expect you to talk to people for me and get me in touch with them in a professional way.” I said, “Why don’t you try it for a few days and let’s see if it works out.” She said, “Well, that is fair enough. I can do that.” Well then it was a few days job, and it is 30 odd years and we are still together, been everywhere together.

Q: Well now, when you got to the embassy, who did you find were the major players from your point of view in support and all at the embassy?

STRAUSS: Well, Jim Collins, my deputy, was in a different class than any of the rest of them. There was nobody in his class. I don’t remember the other’s names. There were staff people around there. If I took time I could dig them out. They were, there was a fellow named Ken Yalowitz I remember who went over and ended up being ambassador to one of the smaller republics after the breakup of the Soviet Union. Several of the fellows were very able. I had a lot of talented and able people around there. So we add names. We had a very substantial CIA operation there that kept to itself that we were responsible for.

Q: Talking about this, I mean obviously this is an unclassified entry, but various ambassadors have had various relations with the station as the CIA establishment is called abroad. In general terms how did you find your support there and its performance?

STRAUSS: Well I was unable to really pass judgment on their competence because I didn't have an opportunity to grade them carefully. I thought that they were fairly good. I never had tremendous confidence in them. I used to go back in their shop they had there, the offices they had in their place. I did it frequently and used to tell them the telephone system was so poor around there, they had a better telephone system... They were nice people. We didn't really monitor them. I got along with them fine, but they didn't ask for anything they shouldn't have, and I didn't volunteer anything I shouldn't have.

Q: I am just wondering, you are looking at this when you arrived there, was there a sense of God, I mean this whole structure that we have dealt with for the past 50 years or so was coming apart, or was this looked upon as well this is one of these glitches, and we are going to end up coming back to sort of the old Soviet-American relationship?

STRAUSS: I don't think there was any question in anybody's mind that it was going to be very tough to hold the Soviet Union together. There was a general feeling that Gorbachev's time was limited. There was criticism in this country that Bush was staying with Gorbachev too long, too close to him and trying to conduct personal diplomacy instead of nation diplomacy. Those were the kinds of things that were going around. I guess I saw Gorbachev every couple of days, which was amazing. No other ambassador did. I did for two reasons. The primary reason was I represented the United States of America. The second reason was he liked me. We got along; we spoke the same language. I came nowhere near a peer of his, but well a person of stature in his own country, and he treated me that way. As Bush said to me at the time he sent me over there, "I am sending you over there for a particular reason, to establish the kind of relationship, warm with Gorbachev, that he needs - that he talks straight to you and you talk straight to him, and that if he speaks to you, he is speaking to me. That is what I need desperately." He said, "We have had an ambassador over there who is a splendid ambassador, but he will never have the kind of personal relationship with Gorbachev that you will have." Of course he was a fine ambassador who preceded me, a career man who knew more about the Soviet Union in his little finger than I knew in my whole body, but he wasn't a particularly personable fellow in terms of relationship. Jack Matlock was his name. I don't know him very well. Whenever I saw him he was always courteous, and I was too. A disappointment came up. I called him. Of course, I had no background over there. I said, "You know my wife really doesn't know anything about this job. The call is to see what we need to take over there, sheets, food? What are the demands made on her?" He said, "Well my wife is very busy now and doesn't like, she is busy with her photography. I will have her call." I said, "Fine." She didn't call, and I called him again in Russia a few weeks later. He said, "I have talked to her, but she just doesn't have time. She is tied up with the fact that we are going to be moving in a month or so, and she has a lot of her photography that is taking a big part of her time.” I thought to myself this is the nuttiest thing I have ever heard. She never talked to my wife or me.

Q: It is unfortunate.

STRAUSS: An interesting thing happened on that. Tom Watson who was head of IBM and was ambassador there for awhile...

Q: Yes, he had been put in there by Carter, I think.

STRAUSS: I guess he had, by Carter.

Q: I think the idea was somebody who was a businessman and maybe this is time to do business.

STRAUSS: That is exactly right. But anyway, I got a call one day from his wife that I knew had been with him. He and I talked and then she called and said, “Mr. Strauss, I just returned from Russia recently, and they insisted that we stay at the embassy.” She said, “The sheets were torn, weren’t clean. I hated to put my head on the pillow case. It was ragged and dirty. You better tell your wife not to count on much of anything over there. I think the ambassador’s wife has let this thing run down there terribly. I was sorry we spent the one night there.” So we bought a bunch of sheets and pillow cases, everything you can think of and brought them over. I will never forget that lovely lady.

Q: A question, sort of a broad one, but one of the things I have noticed in my interviews that often is lost, and that is a political, and I emphasize political, not just a career person who maybe sold automobiles but somebody who has been involved in politics can often establish a rapport with leaders, maybe quite diverse systems, but no matter how you do it, the leadership is political. Did you find when you were talking with Gorbachev, and later on that your political experience sort of kicked in?

STRAUSS: I think that is an understatement how important it was. It was important to Gorbachev. With Yeltsin it was of vital importance in helping Yeltsin plan his trips to this country and state visits, things like that. We will get into all that. I probably ought to move into that. A couple of stories. When Helen and I came back a couple of weeks later, after I went home and stayed about a week. The baby was born, and we came back.

Q: Was the baby a boy or a girl?

STRAUSS: A girl, thank you.

Q: I think we should allow you to get on, does it have a name?

STRAUSS: Yes, Natalie Strauss is now, I guess, 11 years old, Breen, and the apple of my eye I might add. She is the youngest of our seven grandchildren. Anyway, when we went over there, Helen concerned about the whole venture. Not frightened but concerned. We got to the Spaso

House, the ambassador's residence. Before we could get across the threshold, one side, the big double doors swung open just like a scene out of an opera. There were about six or eight servants on one side and six or eight staff on the other side. The man greeted us in a tux. He said, "Mr. Ambassador, Mrs. Strauss, may I present the staff." He did, one by one. We still had the luggage and the security guy and everything behind us. We hadn't gotten in there yet. He said, "I am sorry I did this so poorly, but," his name was Angelo, he was Italian, but he said, "Mario," I think his name, "always did this. I have never done it before. That is why I did it so poorly." I said, "You did fine, but I expect to see Mario," whatever his name, something like Mario. "I expect to see him. Everybody told me he had run this house perfectly, and I didn't have to worry about it, and he would know how to do everything." He said, "He is dead." I said, "What happened to him? Dead?" I was stunned. I thought he was going to say he was killed in the coup time. He said, "Well he was playing cards and a man came in and accused him of having an affair with his wife and shot and killed him and the fellow he was playing cards with sitting next to him." Helen's mouth popped open, mine too. I turned to Helen and said, "There are two things. You have got all these worries. There are two things you don't have to worry about here. You don't need to worry about me gambling or running around with a wife." That story cured me about gambling or running around with somebody's wife.

Q: Did when you initially got there, were you looking for a power center or was the idea that we were going to do everything we could to show our support for Gorbachev and all, or were any hedging of the bets looking at Yeltsin?

STRAUSS: None. As a matter of fact, the press was already beginning to say, would be critical of President Bush for being too supportive of President Gorbachev, for staying too long with him. What we were worried about was we didn't have any money to do a damn thing. President Bush was not prepared to go to Congress and ask for a lot of money. They needed help. They needed food badly. They needed other kind of support. We knew we couldn't give it to them, so we had to give them more conversation than cash is the way I used to describe it. That was our biggest problem doing something for them, making the Russian people feel like we were doing more. When we had once sent some food over there, we took the food that was left over from that Mideast Gulf War, all that canned food that had been shipped, was shipped to Russia and Moscow and distributed. We didn't have money to buy foodstuffs.

Q: Why was there this problem? Here we had been spending trillions on defending against the threat of the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union was beginning to look like maybe it was coming around to being, it had supported us during the Iraq invasion of Kuwait and all. Why all of a sudden was the spigot off, there was no money? What was the problem? How did you see this?

STRAUSS: Well keep in mind this was a Republican administration. They were goosey about the conservative wing of the party thinking they were doing too much for those communists. They weren't prepared to take on a fight to fight for that, and didn't, I might add. Our primary concern did not involve a lot of money. I mean our primary thing we could do for them had to be things that didn't involve a lot of money. We got legislation passed that didn't need much help from me, it did some, but Senator Lugar had enough going for him. The first thing we were interested in more than anything else was getting our hands on and getting control of nuclear weapons that were scattered around in four different republics over there, get them all in Russian hands, which we were able to do and, interestingly, the Congress were a great help in that. They helped, now we have trouble with them, but then they were our strongest supporters. But that was the climate in which we worked. No one wanted to go to Congress and ask them for anything of any consequence.

Q: Well was the feeling that the conservative wing was so anti communist that they couldn't envisage doing something?

STRAUSS: I don't think that is an overstatement. I think that is the responsive statement. I know President Bush was intimidated to some extent by his right wing as most Republican presidents are, just as the left wing intimidates Democratic presidents. The right wing is structured. They have money and organization and structure. They can crush you. In our party the left wing can drive you crazy. They don't crush you; they buzz around you and sting and end up as I said driving you crazy. They don't have the structure or the organization or the money that the Republican right has.

Q: This would seem to be that ideological cohesiveness.

STRAUSS: No not at all.

Q: During your early days there, were you getting any indications or contacts with the Congress? I am not talking about something beyond the presidency, but I mean this is part of your competence. Excuse me. I want to stop this now, we are really talking about the first few days you were in the Soviet Union at that time. So we will pick it up. I had asked you a question about did you have ties to the political system in the United States? We are talking about Republicans and Democrats, but Congress of trying to get them to come along and understand, Gee things are really happening here and let's not...

STRAUSS: That is a very good point. I came back to this country quite often to go to Congress. I had more credentials, more credibility on both sides of the aisle I think than others in this administration had. A lot of things we were working on getting done, a lot of problems we had been solved for ourselves, I came back and solved it. Whether it was a problem of Representative Snowe or senator this or that, I had those kinds of relationships, and I came back here and lobbied for various things. I forget what particular problem it was. I came back and went before the republican caucus and the democratic caucus. I will never forget when I faced the republican caucus Newt Gingrich came up to me and said, "I think you are right, and I will help you. Anything you need over there, you call me, and I will help you." Now I had doubts about Newt Gingrich, but as far as that went he certainly delivered for me.

Q: I have just one other question I want to put in, a sort of philosophical one. Often a bureaucracy likes things, and diplomacy is particularly bad in this form, likes the status quo. They know how to deal with it. With the fast breaking thing, did you find that people were really getting uncomfortable with things changing in something which we had been used to since the days of Stalin. and I'll leave it at that.

***

Today is February 26, 2003. Mr. Ambassador, let's talk. First, would you like to talk about dealing with the political establishment in the United States because you know, most of these senators and congressmen had sucked off the teat of anti-communism for years? Russia was a great whipping boy and all this. Was this a problem for you?

STRAUSS: No question the statement you just made is 100% correct. But let me lead into this whole thing by backing up just a bit from the statements I just made about coming back to this country. To put it in proper context, while I considered myself to be more agile and sophisticated than the foreign service when it came to solving political problems in the foreign policy area with the hill, I also had enough sense to know that while I had uniquely splendid skills in that area, I did not have skills in foreign policy generally, and certainly not in Soviet Union affairs. I was hesitant as I think I said earlier in this tape some hours ago that President Bush sent me over there. His argument was, he had two or three arguments when I was hesitant about going initially. One was that he needed someone, when I was telling him I didn't know the issues, he needed someone with a background in Russian affairs. He said, "No, you are wrong. I need someone who for one can establish a real relationship with Gorbachev, because he needs someone on the ground. Most of these things we can help with from here, but the personal relationship I need with Gorbachev, you can establish for me and for this country. That will be your strength. And the fact that you understand the political process, that we won't get anything done over there, we are going to have to have some legislative support. There is no support for it right now to amount to anything." So that was kind of the setting in which I went over there. The truth of the matter is, simply stated is that President Bush was right. I was a non-traditional ambassador to the Soviet Union, and yet all the voids I had and all the negatives I had in that area, I had some unique strengths in areas that he thought needed attention, better attention than he could get with just another diplomat. So that is the setting for all this. I knew that people steeped in U.S.-Russian, U.S.-Soviet affairs wondered how in the hell he could turn it over to a rank amateur, or turn the embassy over to a rank amateur. The answer to that is very simple. He had some priorities where I had unique skills. Furthermore he knew that he could get good help for me. One of the things he did, for example, was assure me when I said that I would need the absolutely best number two man you have got, he said, "I will give you the best we have." That is Jim Collins who succeeded me later on with one person in between as ambassador and probably knows more about those affairs than anybody in the country. So with Jim Collins' help I did pretty well. Collins has in his office now, he has a picture with his hair dark. Now it is about the color of yours which is very grey. When I said, "Collins, is that your high school picture you have there with that dark hair?" He said to me recently his answer was, "No that was my dark hair before I met you, before you arrived in Moscow."

Q: Well I have talked to him and am going to get in contact with him in April. Now, what about this Congress? I mean who were some of the players and what did we want, what did George Bush want out of Congress, and who did you see were the key people you had to deal with and the problem people?

STRAUSS: George Bush knew, he felt like he didn't have any money to spend in that part of the world. As a matter of fact he and Brent Scowcroft who was the National Security Advisor both said to me, "One of the primary reasons for you going over there, Bob, is as a signal that we really give a damn about this country, because we are not going to be able to prove it with aid. We are not going to have an aid program of any consequence, nor did they really try for one I might add. But he said, "This had to signal people in Europe and around the world. Most of the leaders of the world you have met and done some business with over the years. They know I wouldn't send you over there, and you wouldn't go unless you thought you could do something. This sends the right signal that we care and we are going to be involved with you. I get more out of the signal this sends." I think it was Scowcroft once who said, "We will get more out of the signal by sending you over there and you going if you don't do another damn thing. It will be positive." So this was the kind of climate we were operating. Now keep in mind, my primary concern on the day I went over there was to first help stabilize the Gorbachev government. But even more important was to get our hands on the nukes, and get them gathered up. We had, I must say with practically no help from me, because Nunn and Lugar didn't need it, we had the Nunn and Lugar legislation.

Q: That is Senators Sam Nunn and Richard Lugar.

STRAUSS: Exactly, and their legislation was aimed at getting the money and a program together that would enable us to get our hands on nuclear material scattered in four different countries including Russia and three other Soviet countries. We did that successfully, they did. Sam Nunn and Senator Lugar deserve a lot of credit for that. Jim Baker had a good hand in it, and I helped him, so we all contributed, but the two senators played the leading role.

Q: Well now were there groups within the government, well let's talk about first the legislature, congress, that saw everything saying well these are just communists under a different name. They are trying to snooker us. I mean were there some?

STRAUSS: Yes, there were a lot of them. Some of them were sincere, and some was just politics and thought it played well back home. You have to kick somebody, kick the dog, kick the communists. But generally speaking, Congress went along pretty well. We didn't ask for very much, and I think that is one of the failures, and I am a big fan of George Bush senior as you know, a good friend. But I think one of the things they could have done is they could have asked for more in terms of aid. They really needed aid; they were hungry over there. We didn't do a very good job of putting an aid package together. We put stuff that looked good but really didn't have much substance.

Q: Well I sort of have the feeling that no matter what we did, things were so chaotic at that point in the economic sense. I mean you sort of had the communist leaders running around turning into capitalists, absorbing all the money that came in anywhere and sort of looting essentially the system.

STRAUSS: I don't think there is any question that was done, but I also think that there were a lot of people hungry over there then and we didn't really have an aid program. When I am talking about aid, I am not talking about economic programs needed. There was enough structure there to get to build the kind of economic programs they needed, but in terms of just food, those people were hungry there. It was a terrible time. We could have done more, but I think the times didn't permit President Bush to do much more than he did.

Q: We talked about us, but what about western Europe.

STRAUSS: Germany of course. Germany did more than any of us I suspect. They had their next door neighbor. It was an easier sale for them. They had economic interests that were far bigger than ours at the time. They were doing a lot of business over there. I was always amazed when you would go to a hotel, I might have mentioned this earlier. If you go to a hotel in France, you can register in English or in French, but there is also a line in English that tells you what line to write on. The same thing is true in Italy. But in Russia, when I went to a hotel it was in Russian or in German, no English.

Q: Well you mentioned the Germans had economic interests. Of course one of the charges that is laid on us, I am not sure it is necessarily a bad one, but whatever we do is economically motivated. You as ambassador, did you find yourself driven at all by saying we want to get this concession or open up business here? How much was this a factor?

STRAUSS: It really wasn't a factor then. We were really, every day trying to get through that day without something blowing up. By blowing up I don't mean exploding. A program that we couldn't get started or a program that was started and abandoned. Little things like getting our American school going over there was almost impossible. We finally got it done, but that was just a little simple thing and that was something that we...

Q: Did you find either chaos or obstinacy in the Russian bureaucracy or were they at sort of a standstill. They didn't know what the hell to do and so if you don't know what to do, you don't do anything.

STRAUSS: Well you have to realize there was no rule of law. There was no legal system that amounted to anything. There was no judicial system that amounted to anything. There was no way to enforce a contract to try and do business. It was a terribly difficult time. Nothing we would have done would have helped that in the short run in my judgment. I was talking about aid. I think I told a story earlier about our sending in a lot of food that was left over from the Gulf war. I opened it in front of all the television cameras, peach pie or peach cobbler or something. They expected to see potatoes and beans.

Q: Those meals ready to eat, MREs.

STRAUSS: Yes.

Q: A question I put at the end of our last session that you know in the Department of State or anything, it is a bureaucratic thing and you are used to the way things are. All of a sudden after 50 years or so of dealing with the Soviets all of a sudden the thing is blown apart. How did you find people responding? I mean were they still sort of working on the old assumptions? Did you notice a change around in dealing with this?

STRAUSS: Of course there were dramatic interludes where there were dramatic changes. There was a basic change of communism slipping away. There was a basic change of the whole Soviet Union disappeared on us. There was a basic change of Gorbachev was destroyed by Yeltsin and we start all over again with new people and new initiatives. So to say it was complicated and messy is an understatement. But with all that going on, we established some good relationships. I don't know whether I mentioned this or not, but I was thinking the other day again about the communication system in this country, and telecom problems we have, the bankruptcies and big companies. I remember getting a call from the chairman of Motorola, I may have told this story.

Q: It doesn't ring a bell.

STRAUSS: He said to me, "Bob, there is," I had known him before. He is a fine man. He said, "I am calling on behalf of our whole industry. There is a communications conference. They are allocating spectrums in a big international conference in Spain that is taking place in Madrid as we speak. The spectrum have been allocated in this conference is not nearly big enough to take care of our needs. Can you help? It had to be done in the next 72 hours. This conference winds up in three days, to turn this around." I said, "Good Lord, I don't even know what you are talking about. I don't understand the issue, but I have people here who will, and I will talk with them and see." I said, "But I can't do this just for Motorola." He said, "No, I don't want you to do that. I want the U.S. to get a big spectrum, a larger spectrum than we have. We need that. Once we get the spectrum assigned to our country, we will fight it out among ourselves as to who gets what allocation out of that. You get us the United States to get the right allocation, a big enough spectrum. That is all you have to be for, not for any one company." I remember going to Yeltsin and taking a fellow with a technical background with me who could explain. I couldn't even explain what I wanted. I told Yeltsin what we needed. He had a spectrum much larger assigned to them, and they hated it. We had one much smaller, and we did need a bigger one, and he could get by better with a smaller one. He didn't understand what I was talking about any more than I did truth is. They sent us to his person, Yeltsin did, and told the fellow to try to help right there. Within two days, they agreed to switch spectrums with us, and Yeltsin personally caused that to take place. So in that sort of thing they were cooperative. Again, that goes back, Bush wanted a personal relationship to get some things done. That was my primary responsibility over there to establish that kind of relationship at the highest levels in his government.

Q: Well you were right there, the coup against Gorbachev had already taken place hadn't it.

STRAUSS: Well it was in process.

Q: You had to rush out there because of that.

STRAUSS: Yes. When I arrived, he was still being held by the coup plotters.

Q: By the time you arrived, was anybody that you were getting from our embassy, were we doing anything to thwart the coup?

STRAUSS: No. We hadn't even said what side we were on. As a matter of fact, the Russians settled that themselves. I think President Bush and his team wisely kept their mouth shut for a few days until we could see what to do. As a matter of fact, I know, I am sure I have told this story in here, but I will repeat it. But I remember arriving, being met by Jim Collins. As a matter of fact he drove me to his residence I think it was. No I know it wasn't his house, the ambassador's residence. I don't think it was even the main embassy, but whatever it was, when I arrived and walked in that room, Gorbachev was being held by the plotters. Jim Collins said to me, "I have gotten the staff together. We need to make up our mind. We need to give them some guidance. What do we do?" I said, I wondered to myself now, of all the people in the world to be picked to decide what our country is going to do, I am maybe one of the worst. I said to Jim Collins, "See if somebody can get Dobrynin on the phone." I knew Dobrynin back in this country, had dinner at the Russian embassy many times. He and I had become friends. The Russian telephone system never works. There are no phone booths. There weren't then. If you got through it was a miracle and it was usually a wrong number. I'll be damned if the Lord didn't help because in 30 seconds this young aide out there came back and said, "Ambassador Dobrynin is on the phone, Mr. Ambassador."

Q: He at that time was part of the politburo wasn't he?

STRAUSS: Yes, he had come back. I said, "Anatoly, Bob Strauss." He laughed. He didn't laugh, he chuckled, and said, "I have been expecting to hear from you where are you?" I said, "I am right here in Moscow, and I want to tell you that I have just arrived within the hour. My people and my government want to know what is going on and what to do, any recommendations we have at the embassy. It is rather strange for me to be calling on a Russian to help make this decision but I need you. What should we do?" He said, "I will tell you what you should do, Bob. Do nothing. I am privy to some things taking place, and I think if you can keep from saying anything and doing anything for 48 hours, this might blow over. These are irresponsible people who don't really know what they are doing that have our President." I said, "Thank you, Anatoly, that makes sense to me." I turned around to Collins and told him what it was, Anatoly said do nothing. Collins thought that was very good advice too. That is what we reported to Washington. That again is personal diplomacy, personal relationships.

Q: Which is very important at a critical time. I have to say that the Bush administration showed a great deal of restraint. At the fall of the Berlin Wall, George Bush didn't end up dancing on the ruins of it and all, which is hard because normally the White House wants to crow. We did this and all that which is always counterproductive in foreign relations. It is hard in a way to control and discipline your staff to keep them from running around and saying I caused the fall of the Soviet Union etc.

STRAUSS: As we are speaking, you and I today, in late February the Iraqi situation is coming to a total boil now. I wish we had, I would be more comfortable if we had Bush senior instead of Bush junior. Now there are things Bush junior can do I am sure better than his father can do, but when it comes to the world possibly going up in flames, I would like to have the cool, calm, cautious Bush senior playing the hand for our country.

Q: Well now back to, when Gorbachev came back shortly thereafter, the coup went down. you were sort of sent over at the time to establish good relations with Gorbachev. What was the feeling that you were getting from the people in your own sense? That Gorbachev was a finished figure or were you kind of waiting for him to come back?

STRAUSS: I think people thought generally that Gorbachev was in the twilight. By that I mean maybe he had two years or maybe three years, maybe a year. I don't think anyone dreamt that his fall would come as quick as it did. There is no question that that is what was thought. I thought he would last longer than he did, as did my administration that I was working for, the Republican administration. I remember when I spoke before this large crowd of people at the memorial service there two or three days after. I think we have discussed that already. I remember, I think I have it in our notes here. If not just put it in. When I said to President Gorbachev when he greeted me behind that sound truck or that truck they were using for a platform there. I remember when I said, "I would like to speak; I have a message from the President of the United States." He said, "You speak? Why would you speak?" I said, "Mr. President, I can't think of anything more important to you and the people of the Soviet Union and the world than a message to you delivered to you by your ambassador, by Bush's ambassador, a message from President Bush saying that the United States is behind you. That would be the thrust of my remarks." You could see a light turn on in Gorbachev's confused head then because he was terribly confused still from the captivity. I guess it was the next day or two days after that. You could see in his eyes a light going on. He said, "You will speak right before me." So that was the climate there. We really were worried about getting him. We wanted to be sure that he got re-established as head of that government. That was the first concern. But did he think he was going to last forever, no. Did we think we would lose him in six months, no.

Q: As a political observer, one reason why often professional politicians or people who are quasi professional - I don't know what you would call yourself - are better observers and able to deal with politicians better than say foreign service people who you know, this isn't their world. They report on it, but were you watching, looking at signs of change in the Russian system. Gorbachev is back; Yeltsin had performed splendidly at the time of the coup. How were you observing this power business, and what did it hold for us?

STRAUSS: You could see that Yeltsin, it was a very hard hand to play. Keep in mind that two months before this, two or three months before this at the most...

President Bush strolled in the office informally, preplanned, of course, where he could shake hands with Yeltsin, then head of the Republic of Russia, not head of the Soviet Union of course, and greet him but not be caught with him. The press reported he went to the White House and saw Scowcroft, not that he went to the White House and had a visit with the President. President Bush, obviously properly, was concerned that if he met with him it sent a wrong signal to Yeltsin, to Gorbachev, because they were already jockeying for position. This is long before the coup. After the coup that jockeying became, instead of nuance, became open. Yeltsin started pushing and pushing for power. President Bush, of course, was concerned about that, his people were. They hadn't really established a relationship with Yeltsin. Jim Baker did a good job when he first went over and dealt with him the first time. He was Secretary of State when he went over. Yeltsin liked him almost from the get go. Yeltsin heard good things about Jim Baker, I believe, because I saw Yeltsin regularly, and it didn't take Baker long to show that he was even better than I was suggesting to Yeltsin. He handled it extremely well.

Q: How, I mean you arrived; you already talked to Gorbachev. We are concerned about the Yeltsin-Gorbachev relationship. Gorbachev was sort of our boy you might say. But when you arrived, how did you establish relations with Yeltsin, and how did that develop?

STRAUSS: Very loosely and very casually. I did not really have a relationship of any consequence with Yeltsin until he came to authority. I couldn't do that. We couldn't get involved in that game going on between the two of them, so the only thing I could do is nod in Yeltsin's direction from time to time. I was openly, and we were openly pro Gorbachev knowing that his days were limited. Keep in mind this coup was in August, and by Christmas of that same year Gorbachev had resigned. The new Soviet Union was in the process of breaking up.

Q: Well now, what were you getting from your staff, from Collins and others in the political section and all about where things are going when you arrived there. I mean were we beginning to take another look at Yeltsin, because you know, there had been this thing particularly from that Yeltsin visit of somehow if Gorbachev was our guy, Yeltsin was a drunkard.

STRAUSS: Radical.

Q: All this. I mean it was denigrating.

STRAUSS: I think erratic is a perfect term.

Q: So were we beginning You know, your staff saying hey we had better look at this guy.

STRAUSS: They of course, were looking at him before I got there. There was a big question about Yeltsin, you are exactly right. I used the term erratic. I think I told the story about Yeltsin visiting in the Seaview Hotel. Duane Andrews arranged for him to occupy one of his suites in that hotel. It turned out to be his daughter's suite who was not there using it. Yeltsin got drunk that night and went out in the water swimming at midnight the first night he was there and got a little publicity around, more than we wanted, so he was a difficult fellow to handle. That was before he came to power, before Gorbachev went out of power.

Q: Well I mean during this time August through December, what were you doing. I mean was there essentially a power vacuum at that time?

STRAUSS: No, Gorbachev, to all intents and purposes, he was the head of the Soviet Union. Now he was shaky, but he had me take the head of Kazakhstan who was a Gorbachev man. He wasn't a Yeltsin man. He later became a Yeltsin person, but many of the other presidents of those various republics were Gorbachev people. Some of them were beginning to be Yeltsin people. Some were beginning more and more to give up on Gorbachev as being the guy who could pull it off.

Q: During this Gorbachev period, you mentioned we were very concerned about disarming nuclear weapons in, actually at that point it was still the Soviet Union.

STRAUSS: Exactly.

Q: But still these were...

STRAUSS: They controlled their own nukes. They had their own nuclear programs in these separate republics.

Q: I mean these missiles were distributed as we had distributed ours through the states.

STRAUSS: Exactly.

Q: But these were under government, I mean these places as the Soviet Union began to fall apart, these elements within the Soviet system turning into independent states.

STRAUSS: That is correct.

Q: Now were you seeing Gorbachev about saying while there was still the Soviet Union in existence, were you seeing him about the disarmament?

STRAUSS: Yes, and keep in mind, more important than me seeing him was Jim Baker was spending a lot of time over there. It was far more impressive to have the Secretary of State making demands than the ambassador who was delivering messages from the Secretary of State, the head of our government. Baker had his hands all over that, and Yeltsin liked Baker as Gorbachev liked Baker. But the minute Gorbachev went, the pressure in the Soviet Union disintegrated.

Q: I think it was December.

STRAUSS: It was Christmas Day.

Q: On Christmas Day the Russian flag went up over the Kremlin.

STRAUSS: That's right, and at that time, I won't describe it as a mad scramble, but there was a great deal of additional intensity that went into the program that Jim Baker was leading. I went as ambassador assisting in getting his hands on those units and also getting Yeltsin to commit, which he did. He was very strong in his commitment. Jim Baker was very impressed as was George Bush with what he produced.

Q: Did you find that from Yeltsin on this issue, was he as concerned as we were about the proliferation, or was this trying to be nice to the United States during this?

STRAUSS: Oh I think he was some of both. Yeltsin knew he needed the United States. Yeltsin gave a firm commitment to Jim Baker that he had control and would keep control. I guess Baker relied on that commitment. He couldn't do anything but rely on it; it was the best thing he had was Yeltsin's commitment. I must say that to be sure there was no misunderstanding, Yeltsin, as Gorbachev before him, delivered on that commitment in terms of nukes, nuclear programs. They were gathered up properly. It took many trips by people back in Washington and efforts by me and others in our embassy, but we got it done.

Q: Were you seeing as this Gorbachev-Yeltsin thing, rivalry went and it was beginning to move over toward Yeltsin. Were you seeing a shift in the Soviet bureaucracy?

STRAUSS: Oh, sure.

Q: Who was the foreign minister at the time? Was it still Shevardnadze?

STRAUSS: No, Shevardnadze was gone. He stayed in all the way, I will think of his name in just a minute. He still comes over to this country all the time. He was the foreign minister is what he was. He was Baker's counterpart. He was most cooperative, very pro American by the way.

Q: Were you seeing a change in attitude in our embassy or staff there? This is too serious to play the Cold War business and let's get...

STRAUSS: I think what you saw there is what you see in any bureaucracy. There is a certain odor that comes before the death, and the odor was in his final year, final months. As a matter of fact, I was back in the States to celebrate Christmas with my family on the day Gorbachev left office and Yeltsin came in. I never would have left my post out there if we had had any notion that that was going to happen. As a matter of fact, very few of the heads of the republics knew it was going to happen. But it did.

Q: What was the sounding that you were getting about within Russia, well the Soviet Union at that time, about Yeltsin? Were there lots of reservations about nomenklatura about, because we mentioned this erratic business.

STRAUSS: He was a wild card as far as many of them were concerned. Keep in mind, he had a personality; he had an image of being a great reformer, so he had a lot of positive things about him as well as the negative aspect of somewhat erratic behavior. He was relentless in his drive for power. When he got power he used it. I say used it, that is a big term, but he liked that power and he had no hesitance about making decisions. He was a good decision maker. Gorbachev was far more a talker in many ways. I was and am a great admirer of him. He was no longer effective, let me say that, as far as the Russian people were concerned. So, though people had a question mark about Yeltsin, they were ready for a change. When things are terrible, you are always ready for a change. Anything would be better than what is going on.

Q: How did you sort of open up your initial contact with Yeltsin? I am talking about after December, he is in power. What were you getting from George Bush, Jim Baker about how to deal with him?

STRAUSS: They were cautious, but they knew they had to establish a relationship in a hurry, so I left my holiday in the States and went back to Moscow. I don't remember the details, but I remember the first thing I did was let Yeltsin's office know I wanted to come in and see him. Within no time it was granted. I had a lucky thing there I may have explained to you earlier in this - I think I did - that he came to this country shortly after I was appointed but long before I was confirmed, and so things he did, I was included in the things he was doing and got to know him pretty well. By pretty well, sitting next to him at two or three dinners and talking and relating to him as he related to me. I think I told you earlier in this he was trying to get into the Space Center in Houston. I had to call Brent Scowcroft. He was anxious to see it. Scowcroft was National Security Advisor. I called General Scowcroft and told him that it was the craziest thing in the world, a stranger could walk off the street and go in there, no security clearance of any kind required. We had this Russian who someday could be head of that government. That was before he became head of that government, but he was president of Russia, and he couldn't get into that program. Scowcroft said, "I'll take care of it right now," and he did. So that was a big thing in Yeltsin's mind that I had gotten that thing done. He was waiting, and almost as he brought up the problem, it was solved. He also was friendly with, he had come to know Dwayne Andreas.

Q: Dwayne Andreas being?

STRAUSS: At the time he was chairman of the company Archer Daniels Midland. They did a lot of business with Russia. He was reasonably well known in Russia. He was close to and friendly with them. When Yeltsin came to this country, I don't know, how he got in touch with Andreas or who recommended him, but Andreas, my recollection is, loaned him an Archer Daniels Midland plane to get him around. This is before he came into power, and Andreas provided him an apartment where he stayed for a few days at the Seaview Hotel in Florida. I went down and saw him there. So by the time he came to power, he knew Bob Strauss was a friend of friends of his and that sort of thing. When I called to see him of course the American ambassador is going to get to see him anyway. I could have been anybody, but I had the advantage of having a bit of a personal relationship with him. It grew. He was extremely fond of me by the time I left and I was of him.

Q: How did you find, you know, did he grasp the complexities of the situation? In other words you raise issues?

STRAUSS: Yes, he was very bright. He was very good at that, he really was. He was a good listener as well as a good talker. He had good people around him. He was a dynamic figure then. He was far more dynamic, I guess, at that time than Gorbachev who was worn out. People were tired of him. This is a new face, and this was the man who had saved the country from this coup. Remember the pictures of him standing on this tank and all this stuff. So he had an image of, a hero's image when he came into office. He knew how to take advantage of that.

Q: When you were there, how about the KGB? How did they, I mean, the KGB was the bête noire of the American embassy, provocations, enticements, you know the whole thing? I mean were you seeing a change?

STRAUSS: Yes and no. After came in, we saw the more dramatic change when he replaced a bunch of the older KGB types. There was a young reformer that came in with him whose name I forget, but he reminded me of a Midwestern governor in our country. He looked like it. He could have been governor of Indiana or Michigan, that sort of thing. He was a tremendous strength in reforming. I remember him saying to me after he and I came to know each other, talk some. I had fellow named Bill Reardon who was a CIA head for that whole part of the world. He was in an office in Germany. Bill Reardon, he is still around. He is not active in the CIA, but he was one of the colorful figures. When he came to visit, I introduced him to the head of the KGB. Bill said to me, "They really are trying to reform this agency to some extent, but you know, God only knows what is in those files, and I don't know when we will ever get to see them." Interestingly, that fellow who was head of the KGB, one day, called me to come over. He said that he decided he had permission of his government to turn over all the information on the wiretaps that they had planted while the building was being built - a six story building was being built on our land there for our embassy to occupy. He brought out what looked like two ordinary suitcases, old time suitcases. In them there must have been 30 different listening devices. In the other package were maps going everywhere. Every single one of those listening devices was placed in the concrete of the building we were building there by the Russian workers. They were KGB and were planting those things all over. I was stunned. I didn't know whether to take it or not. I came back and called Larry Eagleburger the Deputy Secretary of State. I said, "Larry," and I relayed this story to him. I said, "It seems to me I ought to take them," but I didn't want to take them until I got permission. He said, "Hell I don't know what to do. It seems to me we are better off taking them than not taking them." I told him that is the way it seems to me but I didn't want to get out of line here. So I called this fellow back. I can't think of his name, and told him I would be over the next day and pick it up. We picked up the two big boxes, big suitcases full of material. He invited me out to his dacha with my wife, and he had Shevardnadze and their wives. He said to me, "What did you think of the material we gave you yesterday." I said, "I was stunned by it, but I wasn't surprised that you had it, but I was stunned at what you did." He said, "We are going to turn this around, and that is a real demonstration of our efforts." I came back and went public with that.

Q: I remember it was in the paper. To me it was a great indicator things were changing. It is always hard to turn, as I mentioned earlier on, a bureaucracy does not respond well to sudden change.

STRAUSS: Exactly, and I was trying when I went public with that, it was because I wanted the American people to see. That was something they could really see instead of a theory that things are changing. This was something very constructive they could see and hold in your hand. I gave a speech at the press club when I was back on a trip. I told that story. That is when it got the publicity.

Q: What about, speaking of the embassy, where were you, I mean for years there had been this conflict over we knew we built a new embassy and we were sure the thing was bugged. We were talking about destroying it and all this. Did you have to wrestle with this problem?

STRAUSS: Constantly. We had trouble, you know, we were convinced that all those bugs were dead. They only last so long. We wanted to use the building. People in the Congress didn't want us to; there was a lot of objection to our using it. It was just sitting there wasting, going to rot and ruin, and all that money. As a matter of fact the head of the KGB, the new reformer said to me, "This will save your country many millions of dollars. You don't have to rebuild a building; you can use it. Here is a map of where all the bugs are placed. It will save you 50 million dollars. You are generous with our country, we can at least do this." So that was sort of the theme of that from the head of the KGB. I might add, they fired him about three months later. Somebody over there changed their mind I guess about him being so open. He had done it with Gorbachev's absolute approval.

Q: Well now, speaking of the embassy and running it, as an old hand who served five years in Yugoslavia, a communist country, what was the situation with what we would call foreign service nationals? In other words citizens of the country that worked in the embassy. These are usually a great strength even in a communist country. At one point we were replacing them with Americans. You know, to a professional foreign service officer it sounded like nonsense. It sounded like political correctness or something.

STRAUSS: It was Congressional demands. We couldn't employ locals. It cost us a tremendous amount of money to bring an American worker who worked for Bechtel Corporation, for Bechtel to bring a hundred workers over to work on our projects. The expense of that was 20-1 over the expense of using the Russians. One of the things we accomplished while I was there was I testified before the senate and house committees that we ought to reverse that policy. The government was willing, the executive branch was willing to do it finally, but the congressional committees were opposed to it. So we finally turned them around and we got permission to use in various non sensitive posts so to speak, non sensitive jobs, Russian nationals instead of imported Americans. It was a big savings of money, but I must tell you that within a month of the time that those Russians started taking the place of our Americans, the KGB people were pushing them to provide information. They were concerned what should they do. They were frightened. So it was an unpleasant situation.

Q: I mean those who have served in communist countries understand this, and you learn to live with this. I mean these are good solid contacts within the country who can give you ideas. They are not all that much tool. I mean these are ordinary citizens who understand the situation and have a certain loyalty obviously to their country, but also to their job. It is a strength rather than a weakness as long as you understand that you have got to be careful.

STRAUSS: Extremely careful. I can understand why there was hesitancy to let us use Russian nationals, but I must tell you the minute we started using them, and we were using them to mow lawns and keep the outside of buildings painted and things like that, but as I said earlier, within 30 or 60 days of them coming to work, the parties were squeezing these people over there for information. Happily they didn't have any. Several of them reported those efforts. They liked their jobs as you just mentioned. They didn't want to be involved in that kind of business. But we got it done; it was worthwhile, and keep in mind, we had tremendous budgetary problems. I think we had better quit.

Q: All right. We are going to stop at this point. A couple of questions I would like to ask, we are talking on the security side. I would like to ask you about during the time you were in the Soviet Union/Russia, did the KGB start picking up these provocations, tracking, following, you know generally harassing? I am talking about the Americans particularly, and our ability to get around and all that. We will talk about that. Also, could you talk about the decision that was made because of financial things that really fell at Secretary Baker's level, not to increase our State Department budget to take care of all these new embassies that we were establishing. To somebody like myself, this seemed like a horrible situation. Could we talk about that? And then we will talk about the post December when the...

STRAUSS: '91-'92 Christmas.

Q: Okay, then we will talk about what happened, issues you were dealing with and all that.

***

Today is March 5, 2003. Let's start with the KGB. You have already mentioned the bugging of the embassy and being given that portfolio full of stuff. What about, you know, you had KGB operatives, they had been doing this for 50 years, in a relatively weak government. I find it very difficult to think that they would all of a sudden turn into nice guys as far as we are concerned. In your experience, how were they treating American diplomats and others? Were you running across provocations? I mean was it still sort of the old game going on by reflex or by intent.

STRAUSS: It was dying off, but very slowly. For example, I came back here and met with some Congressmen and Senators to get them to get over this idea that we could not employ foreign nationals in our embassy for security reasons. Our people in our embassy worked out a plan where we would use Russians for certain tasks, repairing windows, mowing lawns, painting houses, all within the compound, various types of work that didn't put them in touch with anything related to security. The last person I needed to get was Senator Snowe.

Q: This was Olympia Snowe of Maine.

STRAUSS: Yes. And she was helpful once I came back and talked with her. Her committee had been blocking anything on this, but she was exceedingly constructive. She promptly got on it and helped us work it out. So we then started, let me back up and say bringing these Americans over there to work on these tasks cost a fortune. First you had to pay them six times as much or ten times as much as you would pay a Russian. You had their transportation; you had their housing, all that. So it was a major budgetary item if we could save it. So we replaced maybe 50 people which is big money when you do it.

Q: Oh, yes. You consider I can remember way back, you consider $30,000 just to pay somebody to be overseas.

STRAUSS: Heck, I think it cost $100,000 for a person over there.

Q: Yes, well I was going way back.

STRAUSS: So we had, I guess, maybe 30 or 40, maybe less, Russians working within the embassy compound. We cleared them security wise the best we could. We had good people. They did good work. It hadn't been going on for about three or four months until we began to get information that the Russian security people were contacting them and trying to get this information, that information, the other information. Interestingly, two of those people, I don't know how many were contacted, but two of them came and brought us identical stories. They didn't want to lose those jobs. They committed to something and they wanted to fulfill their commitment. We had a heck of a time with that, but stayed on top of it, and I think we finally worked it out pretty well. Now there are a great many of the Russians working within the compound, and very successfully so.

Q: Well what about, it used to be on field trips or something we were concerned about officers, you had to have two going out so the blond provocateur and lady did not approach them at night and that sort of thing. Was that still going on?

STRAUSS: I don't think we had that going on. I don't know that the CIA, I don't know what their rules were or that they were in line. They were housed with the ambassador in the same building and I was responsible for them, but I didn't set their rules. They set that within their organization.

Q: Was the chief of station in Moscow announced?

STRAUSS: No he wasn't. His identity was theoretically undisclosed.

Q: Because often it just makes it simpler.

STRAUSS: They just called him. They didn't know he was an embassy employee.

Q: Were you finding say relations with the state security service beginning to change?

STRAUSS: Oh it changed a great deal. As a matter of fact, I have a picture in the next room of Bob Gates when he was head of the CIA meeting with Boris and the head of the KGB and others around a conference table. That was '92. Boris was in that picture. We had it when I, I think I mentioned earlier when the KGB turned over to me this, the new reformer that had turned over to me this all these two bags copies of where all the things were planted in our building. was trying his best to be helpful there. I remember he said to me, "I know it is going to cost you $75 million. You do your best to give us financial support and other things which we desperately need. Maybe we saved you a little money if we give you this and you can use that building rather than tearing it down." I think they did tear down must of it eventually, but they still saved several floors of it they were able to use. He thought he was making it easier for us to use that building instead of having to build a new one.

Q: Well, of course, you are running across the difference... There is the political side, and then there is the professional spy thing. Professional spies spy. The political types come in and go in both our countries, but the professional spies stay on and they keep doing their thing.

STRAUSS: Also in both of our countries. When Shevardnadze and I were in a plane together coming. I don't know why we were traveling together, but he was a good friend. I was complaining about the intrusion into my privacy by the residence I lived in as well as our offices all being bugged. He said, "Bob, I will tell you, if you want me to I will bring you a whole basketful of U.S. made bugs that we have taken out of our own buildings, so it works both ways." I said, "Well yes, I am aware of that." He kind of shamed me a little bit.

Q: Were we seeing, when did we realize the Soviet Union was going to dissolve?

STRAUSS: I think we knew that in the fall of '91. What we didn't expect was that Gorbachev would step down as early as Christmas, '91. I know our CIA people didn't expect it that soon. We certainly didn't at the embassy. But everyone knew Gorbachev's days were numbered. People thought they were numbered in terms of years, not in terms of days or hours which proved to be the case.

Q: When all this was going on, I mean at the time things were going through this massive change, what were you getting from your Russian experts at the embassy, Soviet experts, about what brought about this? Was it economics; was it American star wars pressure; was it ineptness of the government? I mean what was bringing about this change? I mean what was the conventional wisdom?

STRAUSS: Well all those things you mentioned had something to do with it, but it was a combination of all those things. If the truth be known, the internal pressure on the communist party, brought by Boris Yeltsin was what caused that more than anything else. Now obviously Reagan's, everything he spent on dealing with the Russians in a military way had to make them discouraged and make them ready to give up to get a way out of that thing. But the differences you recall between Yeltsin and Gorbachev was that Gorbachev thought, incorrectly, that he could reform this government within the framework of the communist party. Yeltsin thought he had to get rid of the communist reform. That is the reason he had to get rid of Gorbachev. He was driven by that, and he was driven also by his own ambition which was to be head of that government. He accomplished both of them. I think there was a place for each within their own time. My judgment is that history will make him one of the prime movers of change in the world in the century.

Q: What happened when the embassy was faced with the dissolution of the evil empire using Ronald Reagan's terms, in '91/'92. What was this doing to you?

STRAUSS: Gorbachev and I always had a very comfortable relationship. I saw him in an average week several times. I don't know of another ambassador that saw him once a month, but the U.S. ambassador has a different role, particularly one that he was comfortable with and he knew the President of the United States was comfortable with who sent him over there. So he and I would talk about his problems with considerable frankness. His problems with the government, his problems with accomplishing anything. We talked also about his political problems to some lesser extent. He wasn't totally candid with me there, nor I with him. We talked with some frankness about it. You have to remember that 60 days, 90 days after I got there, he was in deep political trouble. Yeltsin pushed him. Every time he tried to have a meeting - Yeltsin standing up and denouncing him before his own people and that sort of thing. That crowded him pretty darn hard. Their relationship became terrible. Before I left Russia, when I went around to say my good-byes to the various people I worked with and the various agencies, I saved him for the last. I even saw President Yeltsin to say good-bye before I saw Gorbachev. I saved him for last. I had tried to tell him the importance the world would place on the two of them establishing some kind of relationship. That he had a responsibility as being the senior statesman of the two to reach out and repair that relationship even more than Yeltsin did because of how well he was known throughout the world, respected throughout the world. But I had no luck, and the last visit I had with him I went in and I told his interpreter, who was a nice man I forget his name, has a mustache.

STRAUSS: Yes, real nice man. He had interpreted for me for so many hours, both in this country as well as in Russia and the Soviet Union generally, that he and I had a good relationship. I went in to see Gorbachev for that last meeting. He was working for Gorbachev then, not for the Russian government. I said, "Now, I have got an hour that I can spend with the President, maybe a little more. But what I want you to do is see that I get ten minutes without him interrupting me, if you can do that in your role as interpreter. Let me make my speech to him, because I have never been blunt with him as I am going to be today. There is a great deal riding on it." He said he understood. I said, "Just don't let him interrupt me." He said he wouldn't and he didn't. After I had been there for about an hour I said to the President, former president, "Mr. President, I have taken a lot of your time in this good-bye and I have listened with great interest to everything you had to say." He was going through a litany of problems he had, problems he had dealing with Yeltsin, how bad Yeltsin has treated him. With some justification I might add. I said, "Now let me, I want to talk to you and I have arranged with your interpreter that he is going to let me speak for five uninterrupted minutes with you," because Gorbachev was great for interrupting in the middle of everything. I wound up and started telling him that he and Yeltsin having this kind of fight was a luxury neither one of them could afford and the world couldn't afford, and the Russian people couldn't afford. If he had any sense of responsibility and fully understood how the world looked up to him and his place in the world which gave him that responsibility, that he would go the last mile to cure his problems with Yeltsin. He was so nervous that he had a big leather chair he sat in. I could hear his finger nails. His hands were on each side of that big leather chair, the arms there. He was scratching that leather with his fingernails so loud that I could hear it clearly, and it was driving me crazy while I was talking. He was that intense over it. But when I finished that long speech, about five or six or seven uninterrupted minutes, I ended up by saying, "Now Mr. President, I have had my say, and I couldn't be more sincere. I feel strongly that I am speaking as my government would wish me to speak. I hope you forgive me having said all that, I am ready to have you throw my ass out of your office if that would make you feel better." I laughed and he laughed and got up and smiled and put his arms around me and kissed me on the cheek and said, "I would never throw your ass out of my office, and I appreciate what you said. But just so you will understand this, I can't tell you everything, but you just don't understand what the situation is. You can't because you have to be in my position to understand that." I said, "I am sorry, but I hope you will think about it." He said, "I will." That ended it, and then I left.

Q: While this power struggle was going on, were you getting from your colleagues and from your own observation at your embassy and from others, watching the bureaucracy which was so important a nomenklatura, beginning to move towards? Was this an apparent, I assume this was a struggle within the apparatus?

STRAUSS: Yes. Well, at the bureaucratic level you didn't see that, at the lower bureaucratic level at all. At the top of course, you did see that. There were a few people that were strong cronies of Gorbachev who you just didn't see anymore. In their place you saw Yeltsin's people.

On the other hand, the young man who was sort of a chief of protocol for Gorbachev stayed right on with Yeltsin. I was surprised when I went over there the first time after Yeltsin took over to find him doing the same thing that he had done for Gorbachev. Interestingly he became a friend of mine. I helped him get a job when the previous head of the UN, the Egyptian, Boutros Boutros-Ghali, Boutros-Ghali came to Russia just before I left. I said, "There is a young man over here who works at the Russian headquarters. I know you have got a few Russian spots at the UN. If you can get him a job. He has got a young wife and a young daughter. He deserves better than the kind of a job he has here. He will serve you well at the UN." Butros put his name down and said, "I'll take care of it." I thought he never would. I swear I got back here, 30 days after he left from being there I heard from my young friend that he had been offered a job at the UN. He is still there. I heard from him this past week that now he is going to get transferred to Geneva. He is still with the UN, so things have a way of working out now and then.

Q: You know over the years, fifty or more years, we developed this corps of Kremlinologists who would look at who was standing on top of the Lenin Mausoleum etc., and figure out who was on top. Did this serve you? In a way I was wondering with all this concern when a real change was coming, did you find that this group, this expertise served you, or were you pretty well relying on things on the ground?

STRAUSS: I relied on things on the ground more than I guess most ambassadors would. In the first place I had confidence in my own instincts on what was going on and the people I was dealing with - the ones that told me the truth and the ones that didn't. The French and the German and the U.S. and the British ambassadors met every Wednesday for an hour to try to put together all the intelligence we had to see if we could make sense of what was going on. We frequently had that discussion of what you were just talking about, who is up and who is down. I may have told this story earlier, but it is a great story because the rumor was always out that Yeltsin was going to change his foreign minister, whose name I don't remember at the moment, but I will get for you. Each of those three were convinced that the foreign minister was going to be gone by the next time we met. That went on for months and months. I would always say you are as wrong as you can be. They would always say why? My answer would always consistently be, "You fellows have to learn to read body language. When you see Yeltsin with his foreign minister, the body language is perfect, even when they disagree. I would rather bet on that than all this great information we are getting." Sure enough, at the time I left he was still there, and he stayed on as long as Yeltsin was there I might add. The last meeting I had with that group, they poured a little glass of wine to toast my departure. For the toast they said, "To the man who taught us about body language, something we never heard of before," and they laughed.

Q: That is a great story. How did you find as somebody who has been nursed at the mother's milk of politics for your entire life practically, did you find yourself comfortable in the rapidly changing political situation in Soviet Russia?

STRAUSS: Oh I was intrigued with it, perfectly comfortable with it. As a matter of fact it is strange, but as uncomfortable as I was with myself when I arrived in no time I settled in because of the competence of the foreign service officers we had over there, and the judgment and expertise of my deputy, Jim Collins. I just felt like I was getting the best advice around a guy could get. In no time I became comfortable. When making a decision of any consequence I discussed it with the appropriate foreign service officer and also with Jim Collins. Collins was the very best, so I really had the security blanket around me. I liked my job, and I was comfortable with it. I was glad when it was over. I promised the President I would stay through the election. I did that, and I left without any discomfort. As a matter of fact, Helen wanted to stay a few more months.

Q: Well, one of the things sort of professionally that disturbed me was that when the Soviet Union broke apart into its component parts, you know, the "Stans" and all that came into being. Secretary of State Baker did not go to Congress and ask for more money. It meant that we were trying to do this on the cheap which really impacted rather heavily on our people who served in some of these small posts. Did you get involved in this at all?

STRAUSS: I was involved in it quite often. Included in the situations I was comfortable with, I was perfectly comfortable being a Democrat in a Republican administration, and had very few differences with Baker and Bush, really no difference of any consequence. I was working for them. But one thing I couldn't get them to do was go to the Congress and try for more money when they should have. But they were both timid about it. I am not sure Baker was, but I am sure George Bush senior was. I know he was very cautious about going to the Congress and getting money for food relief, for the embassy staffs and office staffing and operations. We were really on an exceedingly thin budget over there. As I recall, even the car I was driving broke down often. It was eight or ten years old and with those Russian roads, that is old. We had trouble getting money to repair the embassy residence when it needed it. We particularly, as I have said earlier, had difficulty with our food relief programs. I mentioned earlier in this, we used canned foodstuffs that came out of the Gulf War to feed people with, that sort of thing. With respect to the embassies, we had to move very fast. They made the decision in Washington that they wanted to staff every one of those new republics with an embassy officer, an ambassador. That took a lot of people. They didn't have any real estate. There were no places you could rent over there if we had the money. So most of those men and women who went over there would go into these communities they were transferred to and live in a third rate hotel room with no kitchen or anything. So they were pretty miserable basically. I thought we could do better, but we didn't have time and we didn't have money.

Q: Were there any voices, I mean, was your voice among those saying gee we better do more?

STRAUSS: Oh, no question about it. But when the administration decided they weren't going to spend the money on that right now, they weren't going to Congress for it, that pretty well made the decision. My job was to do what the President wanted and the Secretary of State. Jim Baker, who by the way was a simply splendid Secretary of State in my judgment, he probably knew, it didn't do him any good in fact with the president. They probably had other places to spend that money. They just handled their Congressional business that way.

Q: Well, did your role change at all when the Soviet Union became Russia?

STRAUSS: No, really not a bit. My beat was really Moscow and environs. I would get out to these other places, but not very often, not as much as I wanted to or should have. There just was too much going on where I was.

Q: How about St. Petersburg? Was this another power center? Did you get any feel for it?

STRAUSS: Yes, I went to St. Petersburg any number of times. We had a very strong embassy officer over there who was very able and very well regarded by the St. Petersburg power structure. He had a nice residence he lived in. He entertained a lot. He was a first rate fellow over there.

Q: Do you recall his name?

STRAUSS: No, I don't recall. We can get that. He was not a political appointee like I was.

Q: No, but was there a political power structure in St. Petersburg that was different than the one in Moscow? You know, we talk about the New York group and Washington.

STRAUSS: Yes there was a great deal of difference between them. Keep in mind that the mayor of St. Petersburg had been one of the few people to stand up during that three or four days that Gorbachev was in captivity during the coup. He is the one who stood up for Gorbachev and against the coup. He was a former professor and a very able distinguished man. The mayor of Moscow when I arrived there was a semi academic who was very popular, but with the changes, even before the change came, he had been replaced by a fellow Bushov who is now the Mayor of Moscow. He turned it into a very strong political power center in the Republic of Russia.

Q: What about the disarmament process, getting rid of the nuclear weapons?

STRAUSS: I'd say the State Department with the assistance of the Defense Department in my judgment did a simply splendid job. Secretary of State Baker did a simply splendid job because he dealt with the various leaders of the republics in getting their hands on nuclear weapons and getting them moved out of Kazakhstan and other places they were put in under Russian control. I think it was very effective. I give those people who, it seemed to be once a month we had a State Department officer who had responsibility in that area come in and spend a week traveling around the various places that were repositories of nuclear arms, work going on. They were good, and they worked hard, and they worked around the clock. They accomplished a great deal, and that is the reason we have done as well as we have done in my judgment. They set the pattern.

Q: Prior to the breakup and after the breakup of the Soviet union, what about the Ukraine and the leadership there, because Ukraine has always had this potential of being a very productive, wealthy, progressive area, and has had lousy leadership and all. Was this apparent during your time?

STRAUSS: It was as apparent as a big wart on your nose could be. No one could deal with it effectively. As a matter of fact I think it is all those things you describe. Interestingly, about two or three years after I came back, a fellow I knew in New York told me that he was investing with a couple of Ukrainians who were raising a fund to acquire interest in Ukrainian businesses. They thought it would be very successful. I said, "Well, I have my doubts, but you are a very sophisticated investor. I will put some money, not as much as you want me to, but I will make a modest investment.” I did, because I thought it would work out well. I think that has been ten years, nine years, and I bet the investment is not worth what it was nine years ago. I always thought, I did think they were right. The reason I just put a small amount in was because the leadership at the top of that government, I thought it was corrupt; it would stay that way. It would hold back, and it has held them back.

Q: It has been one of the great disappointments.

STRAUSS: Great disappointments. Gosh, when you see the riches of that country.

Q: I have heard it compared the equivalent to France if it really got going. I mean, it has everything.

STRAUSS: I have heard the same comparison. It has everything. It could be a great place. It could attract tourists.

STRAUSS: Oh, yes, marvelous agriculture.

Q: Did you find as ambassador to Russia now that the fact that you had these other countries that had broken off, the other republics and former republics around you, did that weaken or distract our relationship with Russia, or was Russia still the 300 pound gorilla at that table.

STRAUSS: That is an understatement. It was more than that, Russia was. The Kazakhs came in. Kazakhstan became more important because they had a head of government at that time by the fact he was going to be the prominent reformer of his era. It turned out not so. We have problems with him right now.

Q: Well let me ask a question on the cultural side. Culture plays quite a strong role in Russia as it does say in France, more than in many other countries. How did you find sort of on the cultural side?

STRAUSS: I would say that on most of these sides, or some of these sides, because of the people I had around me, I would give myself a grade in many areas of B+ to A. On the cultural side, I would give myself a failing grade. They were accustomed to the U.S. ambassador who had more interest in cultural affairs than I did. The cultural side has not been a driving interest of mine in this country, and it was not over there. I think I neglected that now. We tried to support the various things, theater, the Bolshoi, things like that, but I didn't do a very good job. I would go sit in my box and be seen where I needed to be seen.

Q: Try to stay awake.

STRAUSS: That is exactly right. I must confess I think when my grandchildren were there, I took them to the circus instead of to the opera. I probably should be ashamed of myself, but I really give myself failing grades.

Q: What about the intellectual class, the writers and all that? Again as in France, they play a major role.

STRAUSS: Yes, and we worked hard on that. I worked hard on that, and I made some marvelous friends over there in that area and enjoyed it. I didn't have the luxury of leisurely developing relationships and getting into other interests. Keep in mind when you get to work rather early at the office, around 8:00 and you are there until 7:00, and you go home and have a drink and supper. You do that six out of seven days a week, you don't have much time. So I tend to do the things I have to do and am really interested in doing and let the others go. It served me well at times of my life, and other times it served me poorly. I wish I could remember the names of some of the people that I developed very nice relationships over there in the intellectual community. I did a great deal of work getting the American school over there. I spent a lot of time locating land and forcing the Russians to let us buy it and get the school open and getting people there. So I had that sort of thing and I did well in that. School is very important to the American colony as you can imagine.

Q: Was it open to other embassies?

STRAUSS: Yes.

Q: How about to Russians, could they go too?

STRAUSS: I don't recall. I think a few of them could get in each class. We had a pretty good mixture, but it was primarily the American school for Americans.

Q: I might point out that some of our other ambassadors who have been there, such as Arthur Hartman, express a great interest in the arts and all, but in a way they had time. You were dealing in a fast moving political situation as opposed to the rest of the time where we have a relatively static relationship.

STRAUSS: The reason a number of people, for example Ambassador Watson, left and Hartman was frustrated was there wasn't enough for them to do constructively because of the relationship. I was blessed in terms of having challenges that I could do more about. They couldn't do disarmament. I had the heavy responsibility in that area, just an obvious difference. I was there when the new republics were born, and I could deal openly with leaders and people like that. They couldn't. They didn't have that freedom. So I had the best of that world, and I was sensible enough to know it.

Q: Was there any problem, did you see the Soviet army, I mean the Soviet/Russian army, as a problem being a different power center? I mean they were dissolving the Warsaw Pact, getting troops out of Poland and East Germany and all this. I mean was this a matter of concern to us that they might not be responsive to the political masters as we would like?

STRAUSS: Yes. That was a concern. One of the real concerns I had, on several occasions I went out to visit military installations, particularly where I remember vividly going out to spend three or four hours at their air force academy where they train their crack pilots. When you saw the living conditions those pilots were living in, you wonder when it is they are going to break away and say, you know, turn on the government. The same thing was true of all branches of the military. Maybe in the early communist days, the military got the best of everything, but while I was there, they were on starvation wages, not getting paid, and living conditions you wouldn't live, you wouldn't let your puppy live in those conditions. Horrible.

Q: I guess this is probably a good time to stop. We have in a way covered at least for the time, your time in Russia. Now if there is anything else, we will come back and revisit this at that point. Next time maybe we can pick it up what you did when you came back, how you saw Russia and our future with Russia, what you were telling President Bush and Secretary Baker, and again Congress and your contacts, because this is a continuing relationship. I am sure that when you came back you were active in telling what you saw and observed and using your prestige to do this. We will talk about this, and then we will talk about what you are doing thereafter, because we will continue sort of the political side of things.

STRAUSS: That's good.

NADIA TONGOUR
Soviet Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1991-1993)

Nadia Tongour was born in Turkey and raised in South Carolina. She was educated at William and Mary and Stanford Universities and taught at several colleges before joining the Foreign Service in 1980. Primarily a Political Officer, her Washington assignments were in the fields of Soviet and Soviet bloc Affairs as well as Democracy, Human Rights and Labor. Her foreign assignments include Brazil, Barbados and St. George's Grenada, where she was Principal Officer. Ms. Tongour was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

Q: Well then, after this time in the sun, whither?

TONGOUR: Well, I also became a single mother as a result during this period in connection with a long term relationship in Barbados. Just before returning to a fairly high-powered position on the Soviet Desk, I found myself pregnant and decided to have the baby. Obviously, that's a much longer story but this is not the place for it. .

Q: Let me just ask the question about this because we are doing the social thing, being a single mother, you know, in a certain period this would just have been a no no.

TONGOUR: Absolutely.

Q: Sort of what were the calculations and how did this- did this cause any problems or not?

TONGOUR: Are you talking about in my life as a whole or-

Q: I am talking the Foreign Service issue.

TONGOUR: Okay. Actually I can make this a broader discussion inasmuch as timing may have made all the difference in the world -- my own timing and the times we were in for the Foreign Service. Had I been 22, perhaps the sky would have fallen. Who knows how the parents or my immediate world might have reacted. At this point in my life-

Q: How old were you?

TONGOUR: I was already in my forties, and parental disapproval was no longer an issue. In fact, my parents were quite happy to have a grandchild. Moreover, I was personally and financially self-sufficient. From the Foreign Service standpoint, I was very fortunate to wind up back in the proverbial "womb" of the Soviet Desk. When you earlier asked about being part of a particular community at State, I had already had one tour on the Soviet Desk, worked in Eastern European affairs, and these were, you might say, my people, and I felt as though I were going home again when I worked on the Soviet Desk the second time. I hadn't announced my pregnancy before starting the job, but that was not a problem. I took three months off after my son was born and then returned to work. I was fortunate in being able to afford a nanny, and, therefore, could return to work fulltime and carry my weight. Plus, my office was very welcoming to this new addition; except for an occasional bout of baby sickness, my child did not impinge on my work. You are absolutely right, though; a decade earlier and it might have been a real problem. I'm sure it would have been. Now, single motherhood seems to be quite common among women Foreign Service Officers, with some adopting and others having their own babies. That said, there is no question that in a broader sense, raising a child on one's own does impact on a career, and I know it did in my case.

For me, the main career problem or obstacle associated with single motherhood centered on assignment choices. I know that from that point on, each time I had to bid or make choices about where to go, I made decisions that I might not have made had I been childless. The system did not make it difficult for me; I basically made my own choices. Here is a perfect example: working on the Soviet desk, I sometimes worked long hours, but I was in Washington. Having worked on issues related to Moldova and Georgia, it would have been very logical and a real option to follow my Desk job in SOV with a tour in either Moldova or Georgia as Political Counselor. It was certainly a viable option. But when you have a one or two year old child, do you want to take him to new posts such as Tbilisi or Chisinau? The latter, in particular,, would have been a rough posting at that point, with out staff still living in hotels. Ultimately, I decided against these options and picking more "family-friendly postings, where the workload would be more or less normal, rather than perhaps seeking the "prize", if you will or more demanding, "serious" assignments in Moscow or other areas of the former Soviet Union. And as you know, there is a price to be paid for "lifestyle" tours.

Q: Well actually, of course, married people with children often made-

TONGOUR: That is right.

Q: I mean, you know, it just becomes part of the calculation.

We are talking about '91 to how long were you on the Soviet desk?

TONGOUR: That assignment was a regular Washington two-year tour, which started on a very significant date: August 19, 1991. I had returned to D.C. a few days before and was staying temporarily in a hotel. I recall watching the news before going to the office and seeing "breaking news" from Moscow to the effect Gorbachev was out. Meanwhile, as I'm sure I mentioned before, I had been thinking how different our bilateral relations were then as compared to a few years earlier and how much better the environment in this post-Cold War era. I was very much looking forward to a tranquil period in our relationship. Instead, we were immediately swamped -- churning out contingency papers and analyses on how to deal with the "day after".

Q: This raises a question. You know, again and again I talk to other people and ask them, what was sort of the contribution of the CIA and all, and you know, the answer, at least maybe at the highest level, certainly of the NSC or something but basically there does not seem to be much substantive input and I think the problem seems to rest in the Agency one, is too big, so as it moves up through the layers of reports and all it gets honed down and all, it loses all its bite. And two, it is not as responsive to policy problems. In other words, what do we do today? I mean, it is a little too almost academic.

TONGOUR: That was certainly the case then. They clearly had some papers but they did not have "the" paper addressing what might happen immediately thereafter or likely scenarios in the aftermath of the fall of Gorbachev.

Q: So, you know, huge amounts of money are spent for what?

TONGOUR: We did not know, but we were somewhat cocky at that moment. Perhaps that's the wrong word, but after getting over the shock that we weren't going to be provided with instant scenarios from without, we concluded we would just come up with our own. And we did -- drafting papers and sending them up our chain of command discussing the issue of "what is to be done".

Q: What was your responsibility?

TONGOUR: When I first came onboard I was expected to work on, among other things, a bilateral review commission intended to eliminate or minimize various, points of friction, such as the "25-mile" rule and other contentious issues. I actually no longer even recall what my initial portfolio was supposed to be since when you are assigned to a multi- person desk, you do enter with an assigned function. Given the fluctuating situation in the Soviet Union, our own individual assignments were also somewhat in flux. Still, we did prepare for a bilateral review commission which was eventually held, and we managed to get rid of the 25-mile rule and other outstanding headaches. But almost immediately we were all effectively drafted into small working groups based on the section to which we had been initially assigned. I was in the so-called bilateral section at first. Yet, within a few months the office configuration changed, with our office leadership deciding to divide SOV along geographical lines> My section dealt with Moldova, Georgia, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Ukraine and Belarus. Another group was responsible for Central Asia, and a third focused on the Baltic states. We spent considerable figuring out what we should be called. There was no more Soviet Union or Soviet Desk. At first, we called ourselves ISCA, standing for Independent States and Commonwealth Affairs. Later the office became known as NIS (Newly Independent States) or CIS (Commonwealth of Independent States) -- there were several iterations. Our Office Director Larry Napper concluded that since the Soviet Union was breaking apart into independent states, we would transform ourselves accordingly, and essentially divide the existing office into groupings of separate country desks.

Q: Did you sort of bid among yourselves?

TONGOUR: Kind of. But it worked out well. I wound up with Georgia, which was viewed as a potential hot spot. However, it was decided that I could handle a somewhat larger portfolio. At the time Moldova was viewed as a "sleeper" and deemed a good complement to the already busy "Georgia account. Well little Moldova wound up having as many conflicts as Georgia; consequently, I wound up covering two wine producing states that were both embroiled in major internal struggles. My role, like that of my peers was initially to do whatever was needed: preparing option papers, figuring out next steps, etc. whether on the prospective commission or other projects on the docket and gradually shifting focus to serving as the first ever desk officer for the newly emerging countries of Georgia and Moldova. Initially, it was not clear whether Moldova would survive as an independent entity or be swallowed up by one of its neighbors -- Romania or Russia -- because of the ongoing conflict in region.

Q: Still got an army, a Soviet army sitting there.

TONGOUR: That is right, and a major portion of my work was to ensure that higher ups in the Department understood the situation and recognized that it did matter.

Q: Well, in the first place, looking at the whole, I do not know what you want to call it, the former Soviet desk or bureau, how would you describe sort of the spirit of things? Was this a hell of a lot of fun with the adrenaline pulsing through you and all that?

TONGOUR: Absolutely. It was a heady time, an exciting period in many ways. After all, this is the end of '91 and early '92. Not only was the Soviet Union coming apart, but major change is occurring in America as well -- a new president and a different configuration of people at the top. At State, our Under Secretary was Strobe Talbott, who essentially oversaw, or basically was in charge of our policy toward the former Soviet Union. For us, there was real electricity in the air. I would not go so far as to say there was unvarnished optimism because we really had no idea what was going to happen but certainly there was never a dull moment. In our office, we were exhilarated by being a small part of the process associated with such monumental changes.

Q: Well let us take your two places; let us take Georgia first. What was the situation in Georgia?

TONGOUR: Georgia was in a state of real upheaval for several reasons. First, two active, full-blown conflicts were underway. One was the conflict in the region known as Ossetia, split between North and South Ossetia, with the former attached to Russia, and the latter remaining a part of Georgia. In adjacent areas with the same ethnic mixes, the basic question was whether they should remain divided or be united under one umbrella or another. Secondly, there was, and still remains, another active -- though perhaps a bit more subdued -- conflict in , Abkhazia, essentially a breakaway region in the western part of Georgia, where there was strong Russian influence, particularly along the coast. Then, too, a third region known as Ajaria had a strongman leader, who, while not attempting to secede, was ruling his territory as though he were an autonomous potentate. In addition to these tensions, was the issue of the "new kid in town", the new leader of Georgia being the former Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze, who was not universally beloved by the Georgians for several reasons. First, in their view, his longstanding, active service on behalf of the Soviets raised doubts questions about his bona fides as a real Georgian and his commitment to Georgia. I think he eventually persuaded them that he was but that cost him vis-à-vis the relationship with Russia. Secondly, he had come to power on the heels of the ouster of the heretofore quite popular nationalist leader Gamsakhurdia, which also made Shevardnadze a bit suspect. In addition to the previously mentioned struggles, his position was made more precarious by the fact that Russia and Russians had always regarded Georgia in a special way, as a civilized Christian nation amidst many Moslem groupings, one of their "own kind" in other words. For Russian, having their former (Soviet) Foreign Minister as the Georgian head of state was distasteful; adding insult to injury, he was also someone the U.S. very much liked.

Q: Yes, because he and Baker, our secretary of state, were practically the Bobbsey twins during the break up and the last gasp of the Soviet Union.

TONGOUR: Exactly. So that created a very exciting panorama. I recall sitting in on the meetings we held with Shevardnadze on the periphery of the UN General Assembly session, when he came to New York in his new capacity, which was fascinating. For our part, there was a great deal of sympathy for, investment and assistance to Georgia during that period, with considerably less activism, as I indicated in Moldova. But I have to admit that in some ways working on Moldova was actually more satisfying. There were certain parallels to my stint as the desk officer for Hungary and the Baltics. When the chain of command was not paying a great deal of attention to a particular area, the officer in charge could "push the envelope, put forward positions and even influence policy related to a particular country or situation. Basically, it was up to the desk officer to convince superiors that a particular country mattered and was strategically important. In the case of Moldova, my efforts seemed to work. I take personal satisfaction from having gradually gotten my bosses to focus more and more on Moldova. Although Georgia clearly started out as the regional darling, after a while Moldova increasingly was perceived as the "little engine that could". There was growing sympathy for the Moldovans standing up for themselves opting to make Romanian the national language while insisting on their independence, rather than being incorporated into Romania. Moldova wound up with a number of fans, if you will, in our office and the Department as a whole. Moldova was the little engine that could, you know. There was a certain gradual sympathy for the Moldovans standing up and the fact that they chose to have the Romanian language but that they did not want to be swallowed up by Romania gave them a lot of fans, if you will, in the European Bureau and the State Department as a whole

Q: Well, I want to stick to Georgia for a little while. How did we view, I mean, you had this dukedom off to one side, a warlord or something, and then you had the Russians in - was it Sochi, which I am told has beautiful- it is a great place for retired Soviet army officers.

Q: And then the other one. I mean, what were we doing about this?

TONGOUR: We were trying to keep it together but there was a limit to what we could do. We were certainly providing various forms of assistance to the central government and to Shevardnadze, but there were also issues of national sovereignty and the extent we could or should intervene on his behalf. There were several different ethnic different groups, some of whom opposed him as a usurper as a result of the ouster of the popularly-elected Gamsakhurdia, whom Shevardnadze replaced. There was definitely a three- ring circus feeling to the situation, but certainly we provided substantial assistance, guidance, and advisor on a host of topics -- how to write a constitution or hold parliamentary elections and so on. It was a booming enterprise. Our embassy there was a very lively place.

Q: And was there, in the first place was there a Georgian community, I mean, the head of the joint chiefs of staff was Shalikashvili who was from there but was there much of a Georgian American?

TONGOUR: Not really in the sense of a formal grouping, when compared to any of the other countries I have worked on -- and, of course, this may have subsequently changed. I do not mean to imply there were no Georgian groups; there were some, but they were relatively small. I remember in the Adams Morgan area there was one restaurant run by a Georgian, who even called it a Georgian restaurant, but that was rare. By now, there are probably more, but then it was all too new. Likewise there was no formal Moldovan community to speak of, or at least not one that pressed to make itself known..

Q: Well, did you ourselves trying to initiate anything that would sort of ease the civil war or not or was it really something we just kept pretty well- we just had to sit there and watch developments?

TONGOUR: No, we did do more and concern was also expressed in the UN and other fora aimed at helping out and encouraging others to do the same. Similarly, there were bilateral overtures toward the Russians, pressing them to back off, to stand down and indicating that we would view Russian military involvement as a matter of grave concern. So, we engaged in diplomatic efforts and provided all sorts of assistance. Not only in Georgia, but in general we were quite supportive of these newly independent states. In the case of Georgia, and especially in the early phase of its independence, we sought to bolster Shevardnadze to the extent we could and to convey to the Russians that we would not look kindly upon attempts to undermine him. On several occasions when we really thought the Russians were about to intervene, we did issue strong demarches to this effect.

Q: Okay, Moldova. You had this, what, Transdnier, almost republic which was- I mean, what I gather, I mean, this is a great market for us to buy up Soviet equipment and _____. Were you involved in that?

TONGOUR: Other offices more specifically focused on military affairs were the ones directly involved in this, but obviously I stayed informed. Looking back on it now, if you consider the geography of the region, this was one conflict zone that made sense from the Russian perspective -- much as Ukraine does as well. Given the large contingent of Russian speakers or ethnic Russians living there, both they and the Russian government saw them as but an extension of Russia. And from their standpoint, the "upstart" Romanians were effectively encroaching onto their turf. While willing to cede one side of the river, they were not willing to part with the Transnistrian region to the east, which they not only saw as theirs but where they had stockpiled military equipment and personnel. So, yes, Russian armaments and supplies were in abundance in this Russian-speaking enclave. One of the more interesting features of this region as a whole was that the populace had been educated in Russian for so long that while there were certainly plenty of individuals who spoke Romanian, especially at home, others who, regardless of their ethnicity, were more comfortable speaking in Russian. A similar situation prevails in eastern Ukraine, especially in the Odessa region, where many see themselves as both from Ukraine and ethnically or linguistically Russian; some of these do not speak Ukrainian well. And then, of course, in Transnistria there was General Lebedev, the general in charge of the military encampment in Transnistria, who had also been a major figure in the Soviet campaign in Afghanistan. He proved to be a key player in the Transnistrian conflict; later on, he actually ran for President of Russia as well. : He was quite a major figure at one time.

Q: Well, I would think that having Moldova you have the Romanians, you had the Ukrainians and you had the Russians.

TONGOUR: Moldova was quite ethnically diverse for so small a country. There was also a Turkic ethnic group, known as the Gagauz. This was a small contingent, originally from Turkey who maintain that they have been in Moldova for centuries. They and pockets of other nationalities made for an interesting mix. .

Q: Well, it used to be called Bessarabia, did it not?

TONGOUR: Part of it was Bessarabia, yes.

Q: Which was an oil producing-

TONGOUR: That is right.

Q: Are they still producing- Was there much oil there or not?

TONGOUR: There was some; I do not remember how much.

Q: Alright, we will stop here and we have been talking- you are going to review a little about Georgia but also Moldova and talk about the relationship of the Ukraine and with really- We have not talked really about the internal setup of Moldova and our relationship with them.

TONGOUR: I'll quickly mention that for the first year that I handled this portfolio, many months passed before a truly functioning government, in terms of inspiring confidence in its viability, really got off the ground. And there was considerable doubt as to whether Moldova would make it or rather that it would not be reintegrated into one of its neighboring states.

Okay, well we will pick it up then.

Okay, today is the 21st of February, 2008, with Nadia Tongour.

Q: Anyway, so, what were we talking about? What is the period- we are talking about when you were on the desk or were you going there?

TONGOUR: No. We had gotten up to basically 1991, and I think we had left off where I had returned from overseas in August of 1991 and begun working on the Soviet Desk.

Q: Broken your arm- had a baby and broke your arm.

TONGOUR: That came the next year but before I had that happened I had returned thinking I would be a desk officer on the traditional Soviet desk, working on U.S.-Soviet relations but my first day back coincided with the end of Gorbachev's rule. The period that followed was one of the most exciting and exhilarating of times, when we really tried to address a myriad "what ifs" an "what type of" situations.

Q: Bureaucracies interest me, particularly our State Department. Was there a fighting, did you sense a fighting and muscling, who was going to get the Ukraine and who was going to get Georgia, you know, this sort of thing?

TONGOUR: You mean when we were eventually breaking it up into desks?

Q: Yes.

TONGOUR: I don't know. Frankly, I think if it occurred, it happened at a much higher level. I think there was a sense that the people who were originally focusing on certain types of issues would naturally be assigned to certain portfolios, but initially we were simply divided into small groups. So for example, I was originally supposed to work in the Bilateral Section. As I previously mentioned, the office had previously been divided along functional lines. Now the Bilateral Section was basically reconfigured to be a regional office, with a few of us winding up working on Ukraine, Belarus, Moldova and another group worked on the Caucasus, etc. What was noteworthy at that time was the notion that certain countries -- not necessarily in terms of importance to us -- would be "busier" than others and take up more of an officer's time. And so what we knew from the outset was that one officer would focus on Azerbaijan and Armenia and another -- me in this case -- would handle Georgia and "something else". That something else turned out to be Moldova. In retrospect, our internal situation on the Desk in late 1991 and early 1992 frankly mirrored the fluidity of the former Soviet Union. We were very much focused on the so-called bigger questions associated with what it meant for the Soviet Union to no longer exist and how to tailor our relationship to Russia, first and foremost, in this new scenario. Overall, there was a sense of quasi-optimism, if you will, on that score. We certainly did not want to overlook Russian misdeeds, whether in Georgia or elsewhere, but we (I'm speaking of our office in particular) wanted to be forward leaning and we sought to find ways to resolve some of the longstanding bilateral issues. And in fact, in thinking back on this period, I recall that we still were working on the Bilateral Review Commission, something that had been set in motion before the demise of the Soviet Union, intended to be an annual event in which we met with the Soviets work on or at least iron out our differences. So for much of the first months of the new regime the central question was how does the dissolution of the Soviet Union impact on our dealings with "new Russia" and then down the proverbial food chain with the other countries of the former Soviet Union.

Q: I can remember the feeling, I think the feeling of optimism was everywhere and you know, you had Baker and Shevardnadze walking hand in hand in Wyoming, you know.

TONGOUR: That is right. And to add one small comment to that, looking back at Moldova in light of the fact that Georgia certainly received more attention then, it would be fair to say that initially the reasons for the limited attention paid to Moldova had little or nothing to do with Russia. Given the ethnic breakdown of the region, our starting assumption regarding Moldova was that it would either choose to unite with Romania or Romania would make that choice for the Moldovans in some fashion or another. It was not that we didn't care at that point but it was not exactly a top priority. It became a bit more of a priority as well as a somewhat of a shock when two things happened. First, "little Moldova", alone among former Soviet Republics paid off some of its debts, or rather its portion of the former Soviet debt owed to us, which endeared Moldova to us and fostered the image of Moldova as the little engine that could.

Q: You know, this goes back to after World War I when Finland paid off its debts and Finland won a place in our hearts that, you know, even I, as a small kid, were ever- say well, the Finns paid their debts.

TONGOUR: That is right. I do not know that Moldova completed the process, but the country made some good faith efforts on that score. Secondly, there was an election in Moldova and while I no longer remember the detail, the election basically was a referendum on unification with Romania. The general expectation going into the election was that the party favoring such unity would win; yet it did not. The actual winner was the more nationalistic "Moldova for Moldovans" or "Moldovans for Independence" type party. That took us back a bit. I would not say we were totally shocked but the outcome was somewhat unexpected.

Q: Did you figure out what were the factors; was it because Romania had been such a disaster under Ceausescu?

TONGOUR: Maybe, to a certain extent. However, there was another, perhaps more salient, factor. I think we just assumed that Moldovans generally wanted to be part of a greater Romania and would be happy playing the role of younger brother. Frankly, there was a certain arrogance among the Romanians vis-a-vis Moldovans, regarding them somewhat as the country bumpkin cousins, while others, including us were treating them as a potentially "real" country. While the vast majority of Moldovans would never deny their ties or linguistic and cultural affinity to Romania, I think many wanted to see if they could survive on their own. The real shock was that Moldova was starting down this path at the very time when they experienced a major blow, namely the onset of the Transnistrian conflict, when the Russian-backed forces in that region staged a rebellion and refused to recognize Moldovan government authority. That was the official beginning of the conflict, in the summer of 1992, between Moldova and the "Transnistrian Authority", which in some form or another has persisted -- more recently in a "cold war" manner --for lo these many years.

Q: What were you getting- were you in close consultation with the Romanian desk and what was sort of their attitude?

TONGOUR: We were. And initially, again, it was the Romanian desk that assumed the Moldovans would naturally gravitate to the orb of Bucharest. They were as surprised as w when the Moldovans opted for an independent path instead. Probably, my main contribution as the Moldovan Desk Officer was to convince my chain of command that it mattered that the Russian-back Transnistrian forces were undercutting the viability of this very fragile state and since it was a western leaning state, friendly to us and responsive in terms of its debt obligations, etc., we should either on our own or more likely in conjunction with regional groupings (e.g. the precursor of the OSCE) send observers and to some extent become engaged.

Q: What sort of role was Ukraine doing? I mean, Ukraine sort of sits a fork the lines of communication from the Transdniester region. How could sort of the Russian forces survive in that geographic position?

TONGOUR: Several years later I would be focusing more on Ukraine. At the time, I recall there was a somewhat fluid border situation, including the movement of some munitions and supplies. Overall, I'm sure the Ukrainians were more preoccupied with their own situation vis-a-vis Russia and focusing more on questions of immediate interest to them such as the future of Crimea and the Odessa region to involve themselves overly in what was happening in "Bessarabia". They clearly paid attention and may have offered some support but were not then seized with that conflict. .

Q: Well what about, what were we getting, what were you getting about what was going on in this Transdniester area?

TONGOUR: Officially our people were not even supposed to go to Transnistria and when they did, it was a major production, requiring permission from authorities on both sides of the river as well as from Washington. What was really remarkable was that we were the primary source of information, in the best sense of the word, for other, European countries, which were interested in the region but had fewer resources to commit to the area. Consequently, I wound up spending some time briefing European Embassies in Washington about what we were finding out about the Transnistrian situation, based on our albeit limited information. Gradually we got our own act together to inform the Russians that we were not indifferent to the fate of this small country, and encouraged them to stand down from real incursions or adverse actions.

Q: What was happening on the ground? Was the Soviet army, a division or what?

TONGOUR: Yes. I think it was called the 14th battalion or division (I can't remember) under General, Lebedev, who...

Q: Who later ran for president of the country.

TONGOUR: That is right, and he had been in Afghanistan and elsewhere. They had basically seized a major power plant that was in the Transnistrian region and were hindering Moldovan access to power. This was obviously a major problem for Moldova. The situation was dicey. It was not a "hot conflict" with major battles, but a conflict that was literally "close to home", with the establishment of the "Transnistrian Republic" just across a small river. In reality, it was somewhat of a standoff because the Moldovan military lacked the resources to really take on the sizeable Russian-Transnistrian forces, which called themselves the Transnistrian Army..

Q: Did you get a feel that, I mean, was this sort of a criminal conspiracy, I mean, was criminality sort of a major cause of the being for this Transdnierster thing, smuggling, human trafficking, that sort of thing?

TONGOUR: You know, anymore it is hard to know which was the chicken or the egg or rather what was cause and what effect. The problem, which one finds throughout the former Soviet Union, certainly existed in Georgia as well. Over the course of hundreds of years Russians fanned out and lived in enclaves in these regions. There was a legitimate minority group, ethnically either Russian or Russian-speaking, living in these former republics and they were certainly not comfortable with the sudden turnaround. For some of them it was a matter of national prestige. Imagine how we would if suddenly Hawaii went off on its own. For those people of the previously dominant group nationalism was definitely a factor. I think for Lebedev and others of his ilk the issue then had little to do with drugs or criminality. Drugs and crime would become more salient factors later on.

Q: Were we trying, at your level, I mean, passing on to your colleagues in other places, overtures to the Russian desks, tell them to try to help or something like that?

TONGOUR: Oh yes. Well, I mean, it was nothing so formal. The Russian desk was 50 feet from my office. It was not as though we had to cross town to communicate. We certainly did talk constantly amongst ourselves and all the way up our food chain again about whatever was happening.

Something else that warrants mentioning is that in some respects our staff in the field were operating almost as though they were in the "wild west". Keep in mind there had not been anything resembling an embassy in Chisinau, so initially our mission was "housed" in a small, rather interesting structure, in which the entire post ate lunch together with the char force doubling as cooks, who made soup and bread each day for the staff. It was a cozy arrangement which seemed perfectly normal at the times. The Ambassador was the only person then at post who actually lived in an apartment, and it was far from palatial; the rest of the staff were all still living in hotels then. And the U.S. Embassy was the lucky one, the first to get up and running -- opening up our shop as it were within the year. But there was a very positive feeling about the experience, and a great deal of camaraderie on the part of the staff. When I visited the post, I was very impressed with the high morale..

Q: Yes. I noticed it had gotten better when I went to Bishkek in, I think '94, and it was pretty primitive. You know, one place which would be considered a modest house here in Arlington and that is where the whole embassy was located.

Well, how about the role, and I do not want to get into details, but from the desk perspective were you getting much out of the CIA, from their analysis?

TONGOUR: Eventually we received some help from their analytical branch, and we received some useful support after the break up of the Soviet Union, but not much before then.

On another topic, I don't think we have fully exhausted our discussion of developments on the "Georgia front". Georgia, after all, was one of our top priorities. You asked if we nudged the Russia Desk. We certainly did on Moldovan issues and even more forcefully on George where we put whatever pressure we could on both the Russian and Georgian sides to stand down and not exacerbate problems in Abkhazia and South Ossetia --- continuing issues even to this day. In that period, our President actually sent forward letters to both of their leaderships that our office drafted. .

Q: Well, Georgia of course, just because of sort of the people; I mean, you had Stalin coming out of there, you had Shevardnadze, who was a great friend of Baker and I do not know where he was at this time but Shalikashvili was at one point the chairman of the joint chiefs of staff. So I mean, you had this Georgian connection with America, you know, it was recognizable and all.

TONGOUR: Well, even before Secretary Baker, his predecessor George Shultz had been very concerned about Georgian developments and close to its leadership. He was interested in Shevardnadze not simply as the leader of Georgia but as the former Soviet Foreign Minister and his primary interlocutor in the region when he had been Secretary. I remember, jumping ahead, the year after I left the Desk, I spent a year in San Francisco at the Asia Foundation and went down to Stanford, to the Hoover Institution at his request to brief him on what was going on in Georgia. By that point, he was already out of the government, but still interested in what was happening in that region.

Q: Well, were you involved in the shopping spree of the military and I guess intelligence agencies, trying to pick up Russian equipment which was up for sale, you know, surreptitiously or not, I mean, we were tried to pick up- and of course the former Soviet troops wanted to get rid of this stuff because they would get money for it.

TONGOUR: I was somewhat aware of these kinds of activities rather than directly involved. Several years later I had a job that involved assistance to the former Soviet Union, where we had a big program to "help" scientists who had previously worked biological warfare projects or nuclear research transition to civilian employment -- somewhat similar to programs for scientists following World War II -- and meaningful work. We weren't necessarily interested in having them emigrate but rather in ensuring that they were gainfully employed and not exporting their expertise or products to rogue states.

Q: Yes. Of course, this is a very big deal. Let's stick to Moldova for a bit, the government? Was it a relatively responsible government?

TONGOUR: At that time, very definitely. In a way, attaining power sort of hit them by surprise, too. Their leadership ranks included a group of young energetic types who seemed genuinely committed to Moldova. When I went there to visit, I recall meeting all kinds. I do not want to imply that everyone at the helm was a saint but in general there seemed to be a fairly decent group -- especially when compared to some of the other former republics -- then. But again, that was the early period. I have not followed Moldova closely in the intervening years, so I do not know what the current leadership represents.

Q: But at the time, I mean, these were-

TONGOUR: By the time we began to focus seriously on Moldova, the Moldovans were just having their first election and picking some fairly forward-leaning representatives who sought to assure us they wanted to maintain their independence and neither return to the Russian fold or unite with Romania.

Q: Did they have an embassy here?

TONGOUR: Not at the beginning, but, yes, by the end of my tour. All of the former republics did.

Q: Did we get involved in the training? I know we at one point here at the Foreign Service Institute where we are talking we were training, among others, Albanian diplomats. I, at about this time a retired Foreign Service officer, was sent to Kyrgyzstan to talk about setting up a consular service. I mean, we were trying to get these people into the community as fast as they could absorb the knowledge.

TONGOUR: Let's put it this way: I know they asked for guidance and support and acknowledged in many ways how unprepared they were to work in the diplomatic arena. Actually a few Moldovans had served as diplomats in the Soviet system but being on one's own was a different matter. But they had not reached the point of asking us to provide training for them at our Foreign Service Institute. I think we had gotten around to instituting International Visitor Programs for them, including programs for journalists traveling to the States. But in terms of formal training programs, I think we were further along with Georgia.

Q: Well, you were saying that you found yourself paying more attention to Moldova much to your surprise than you were to Georgia.

TONGOUR: No. I would not say more than Georgia but rather roughly the same; yet this defied expectations because where there were many people focusing on Georgia, relatively few paid attention to Moldova at the outset. Essentially, if there were papers to be written on Moldova -- and our business consisted largely in writing briefing memos and sending them up the ranks -- or if someone would be pushing the envelope regarding Moldova, it would basically happen at the midlevel officer level -- in this period basically me. As for Georgia, on the other hand, there were many other people equally willing to push for Georgia. Certainly, I was the desk officer, but there were others waving the flag. My main point here is that while my bosses expected that I would spend 75 to 80 percent of my time on Georgia, with the remainder on Moldova, in fact, Moldova took up its fair share. Gradually, with the blessings of my supervisors, there was an increasingly widespread recognition that more attention to this small country was warranted.

Another interesting factor worth mentioning is just how difficult the Russians were making it to get to travel to Georgia. If you wanted to go to Tbilisi, it was no mean feat. I remember taking an orientation trip to my two posts. It was relatively easy to get to Moldova via Frankfurt or Moscow or even Kiev, in short from various places. But for Georgia, at that time there was a commercial flight once a week from Vienna or the iffy alternative of flying from Moscow when gas was available. In that period, Aeroflot officially no longer flew to Georgia. An Aeroflot subsidiary supposedly had a contract for flights to Tbilisi, but the arrangement was fluid at best. As I was leaving Washington for this trip, my colleagues bet that I could not make it from Moldova to Georgia via Moscow in one day. The first part -- Chisinau to Moscow -- was easy, But once in Moscow, there was no sign that Aeroflot or any other carrier would be flying to Tbilisi that day. At least no flights were listed. Eventually I learned that I had to find a certain kiosk, a booth with a window, where one could pay for a ticket and be told that when sufficient money was raised to purchase gasoline for the plane, the flight would depart. I remember being told not to wander too far away because an announcement could be made at any time. This conversation was in Russian, which fortunately I spoke. I can't imagine what would have happened otherwise. As it was, I had to ask countless persons for information and guidance. The loudspeaker announcements were far from clear. In fact, the message concerning the departing Tbilisi flight was scarcely intelligible or audible. In short, I spent five or six hours waiting to see whether or not there would be a plane. After a time, people in that section of the waiting area began talking to each other, and we became sort of comrades in arms, all waiting for the same plane. Finally, the plane was called. Presumably, they succeeded in getting enough money for gas. And we walked across the tarmac looking a bit like refugees clutching our bags. I will never forget this experience. I have flown in a lot of bad planes but this may have been the worst. Standing at the top of the stairway was a guy who looked to be a character in a mafia film smoking a cigarette -- smoking very near the plane's gas tank. Once inside, I saw actual chickens in the open, overstuffed overhead compartments. Eventually, we took off and eventually landed, and the pilot, to give him his due, landed on an icy runway as though on a dime. The point of all this is that by the end of the week I was at the Tbilisi airport waiting for the flight from Vienna, and it was equally iffy whether the return flight would be able to take off because the availability of gas in Tbilisi, likewise provided by the Russian gas company, was also uncertain. So the Russians were not making it easy for the Georgians then.

Q: What did you observe when you got to Georgia, to Tbilisi and all? What was your impression?

TONGOUR: What I observed was that the country basically had an edgy feel to it. Everywhere you went, there was a sense that someone was probably armed and that there was probably a good reason for the metal detectors at the entrance of the main hotel for Westerners. It was common knowledge that there had been shootings at the hotel, involving supporters of the previously elected government and its opponents. As I mentioned Shevardnadze was not initially the darling of all Georgians, even if he may have been ours and that of other nations. After all, Gamsakhurdia had been duly elected president and then been ousted by forces deemed more sympathetic, with Shevardnadze emerging from the latter group. The story was more convoluted than this but basically he was invited to return by the elements opposing Gamsakhurdia, who still had a strong following in the western part of the country. And even further west was the region of Abkhazia where tension was and remains rife. Even in the streets of Tbilisi you could see where fighting had occurred, with old bullet holes and shattered windows still visible. If Chisinau seemed somewhat dull, or gray despite some nice buildings (some of a backwater like a setting for a Chekhovian play), Tbilisi seemed a bit dicey by comparison. This was in the beginning, when our support was only beginning to pour in. Our Embassy there, however, was a former palatial residence, if not an actual palace, though not a fully furnished one. There, too, the staff ate lunch together on the premises but in a room resembling a fancy hall. Moreover, our staff were already living in apartments -- another contrast to Chisinau -- and they were quite nice. Tbilisi had many interesting places to visit, but the slight feeling of danger in the air was definitely present.

Q: How well were we able to work with them, I mean, our embassy and all, to work with them in Georgia?

TONGOUR: Within Tbilisi?

Q: Tbilisi.

TONGOUR: In Tbilisi they were able to work quite well but there were some restrictions on their mobility; staff were not encouraged to roam around. On one level, the situation was quite positive in that the Shevardnadze government was very responsive and receptive to us, but Embassy personnel were told not to go out at night unless accompanied by "escorts". That was the way the people lived then; crime and violence were very real concerns.

Q: Who was our ambassador?

TONGOUR: Ambassador Kent Brown, a very good guy and very enthusiastic about Georgia. I have known several of the others: Bill Courtney who served there after Ambassador Brown and later still John Tefft, our current ambassador. And it seemed that everyone who served there somehow got hooked on Georgia and its people. The Georgians in general are very charming and the country is colorful, with a rich history, and a Christian countries which also adds to its appeal for Americans.

Q: Were you feeling any Georgian émigré influence when you were on the desk and all?

TONGOUR: Very little. We began talking about this last time. There may have been more later on, when I had another tour that dealt with the former Soviet Union. Certainly in the 1999-2001 period there was a much greater degree of coordinated activity. Frankly, the only desk in which I was exposed to substantial émigré activity was during my tour as the Hungary and Baltic Republics Desk Officer. Both had very active émigré elements here who were keen on staying in close contact with the State Department. I do not know how many Moldovans there are in the U.S. Certainly there were groups that called on us, especially when Moldovan officials were here visiting, but it was nothing comparable to the Ukrainian lobbies, which I got to know later. And there were definitely some Georgians too.

Q: Well, I would think that- maybe I got- I know from Armenia supposedly but with Georgia, I am told, that you know, there used to be almost daily flights of people coming from these Caucasian areas of the Soviet Union go to Moscow and they would have big baskets full of stuff which they would sell.

TONGOUR: Absolutely.

Q: And I was wondering, was that trade completely stopped pretty much?

TONGOUR: I do not think so. I think that the black market trade continued and that was where one found much of the so-called Russian mafia. This may have toned down a bit in recent years, but I don't really know. A recent movie called "Eastern Promises" dealt with just this theme with many people becoming very wealthy, and a number of these originating in the Caucasus and then making it big in Moscow. As for your question about the differences between the Georgians and Armenians here, I'd have to say that while the Georgians got to know our leadership and developed close relationships at the top, they had no enclaves comparable to places in California and elsewhere of strong Armenian communities having enormous influence.

Q: Was there any spillover of Armenians into Georgia?

TONGOUR: Yes. There is actually a southern province of Georgia with a large Armenian population, but it was a fairly quiet group and did not put undue pressure on the Georgian government. But, I don't know what the situation is today. Quite possibly as other groups began agitating for more rights within Georgia, the Armenians may have grown more vocal as well. We don't hear much about that area. Earlier, we spoke a bit about the conflict in South Ossetia and Abkhazia but there was also a strongman in another region known as Ajaria. He had not tried to break away but at the time was operating as though he was in control of his own fiefdom. So Georgia was plagued with a smattering of groups seeking to assert their own autonomy as well as other entities engaged in nefarious or criminal activities such as kidnappings and robberies.

Q: I assume that if one traveled by car, if you were a diplomat, that the police would stop you and basically ask, you know, you would have to slip them some money. I certainly found that in Bishkek in Kyrgyzstan and I am told this happens all over. That is how the police get their salary.

TONGOUR: That is right. That happens in other parts of the world as well. I know that was the way it worked in Mexico as well.

Q: How about, while you were there did you find yourself dealing with the non-governmental organizations? Because the former Soviet Union was awash with all these groups that were coming out to do good or do well or something.

TONGOUR: Some. I have to tell you that in recent years I have worked with NGOs so much more that by comparison that particular period did not seem to be as rife with them. In the beginning stages of state formation, much of the outcry, to the extent that outcries regarding who did what to whom existed, centered on what the Russians collectively were doing in a particular area. For example, there was considerable pressure from human rights groups regarding individuals arrested by Transnistrian authorities, persons languishing in jails, or complaints about mistreatment of civilians (both Georgians and Abkhaz) in Abkhazia, primarily by Russian-backed elements. At that juncture, the bulk of such criticism was not leveled at the "host" Georgian or Moldovan governments. .

Q: Well, were you involved in supporting our efforts in nation building?

TONGOUR: Yes, but we did not call it that then. That terminology seemed to emerge a few years down the pike. That was in fact what we were doing. We were seeking ways to aid civil society, promote elections, combat corruption -- all the things that we think of today when we speak of governance and nation building, and that we continue to do. However, at that point we were still at stage one, namely how to build a government or some sort of political entity that was not simply a throwback to the old Soviet system. Even more basic: how to stage elections in these regions, how to secure the elections and ensure non-interference by the Russians. Another focal point was how to foster a modus vivendi with a former giant in a now newly diminished status and help it move forward in a positive way and forestall its devoting too much of its energy on the "Near Abroad". A few years later, the orientation would shift, and we would focus more on providing "concrete assistance" -- giving grants, building schools (including business schools) and other practical support as well as opportunities for their people to come here for training. In some ways we felt as though we were helping to give birth -- delivering countries rather than individuals.

Q: Well, you were doing this in what, '91 to?

TONGOUR: To '93.

E. WAYNE MERRY
Political Officer

Mr. Merry was born and raised in Oklahoma. He was educated at the Universities of Kansas and Wisconsin and Princeton University. After serving briefly at NATO headquarters in Brussels, Belgium and in Washington, DC at the Department of the Treasury, in 1972 he joined the State Department Foreign Service. In addition to assignments on Capitol Hill, at the United Nations in New York City, and at the Departments of State and Defense in Washington, DC, Mr. Merry served abroad in Berlin, Tunis, and Moscow. A Russian language speaker, he was a specialist in Soviet Union affairs. Mr. Merry was interviewed in 2010 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: So you go to Moscow. In the first place, you were there from when to when?

MERRY: I was there from the beginning of August 1991 to the middle of the summer of 1994.

Q: When you went—I suppose every month has a change—but when you went, what was the situation there?

MERRY: August in Moscow tends to be a fairly quiet time. This one proved not to be, to an extreme.

I think it is worth starting this section by saying that anyone reading my recollections of the end of the Soviet Union and the Moscow experience of 1991-94 should also look at the oral histories of several of my colleagues. I suspect the reader will encounter something of a “Rashomon effect” as each of us recalls the same events in different ways. Each will have our own priorities in how we remember and interpret those events, and each of us is subject to the frailties of personal memory. Obviously any history of August 1991 in Moscow, let alone of what followed, should be a history of the Russians and their experiences, but I cannot help but believe the perspective of official Americans who were there, and often directly engaged, will provide a useful counterpoint to the various Russian perspectives. I also would urge any researcher not to trust entirely the recollections of any individual, myself included, but to review a range of oral histories, compare them with other sources, and be constantly aware of the sharp divergence in the official perceptions in Washington and at the Moscow embassy. Those of us at the embassy enjoyed the huge advantage of proximity to the events in question, and we were frequently frustrated that Washington was often so behind those events in comprehension. At the same time, large governments are slow-moving organisms, while we in Moscow were but minor players in the formulation of American policy. These contrasts, Russian vs. American and embassy vs. Washington, can help clarify not only what the United States knew but what our government did with its knowledge.

Coming back to my initial weeks in Moscow that August, it was a time of transition at the embassy. Ambassador Jack Matlock was just completing his four-year assignment. He and I overlapped for only three days. I had a chance to chat with Jack only in passing as he was departing. The new ambassador, Robert Strauss, had not yet arrived. Our chargé was the deputy chief of mission, Jim Collins, who would later become ambassador in his own right. The embassy was in a temporary working environment because of a major fire at the old embassy building in the spring. It would be a couple of years before repairs to that structure would allow it to be reoccupied. The chancery was located in temporary quarters in what had been intended to be the Consular Section of the new embassy compound plus in a series of large metal containers in the underground parking garage of the new embassy compound. The high-rise future chancery building itself was sitting empty and uncompleted because of the problem of Soviet electronic listening devices that had been discovered in it and figuring out what to do about them. So, even though there was a new office building sitting in the middle of the compound, it was not to be occupied for quite a few years to come.

The housing on the new embassy compound was all fully occupied. There were about 155 units, as I recall, which were already far too few for the greatly enlarged embassy staff. I had asked not to live on-compound. There was a gymnasium and a small swimming pool and a cafeteria and various support facilities, and then the temporary embassy working setup. The Economics Section and the Science Section were working in secure metal containers in the underground parking garage. The Defense Attaché Office was in space intended for a future bowling alley. The ambassador's office and the Political Section were better off as they occupied what had been intended as the future Consular Section. The ambassador and DCM shared a suite intended for the consul general and his deputy. The tripartite Political Section (Political/Military, Political/External, and my own Political/Internal) were all spread out in the consular waiting room. This was a big, open space, and we were working on sawhorse trestle tables. Some months later, we got cubicles which was sort of an improvement, but not much.

The Political Section in Moscow, at that time, was enormous by Foreign Service standards. It had well over three dozen people and I'm not counting cover positions in that figure. Political/Internal was half of the whole. At that time, it was reinforced with several officers called "circuit riders," young officers in new positions whose job was to travel around various parts of the Soviet Union for reporting and other purposes. In addition, two officers who were to open the new consulate in Vladivostok were attached to Political/Internal for reporting purposes for nearly a year. Thus, during this first year of my assignment, I was supervising 17 people; 16 reporting officers and a secretary.

Q: Of course, in Foreign Service terms that is absolutely remarkable.

MERRY: It must have been one of the largest peacetime reporting entities in the history of the Foreign Service. Within a year it shrank by a third, as several officers went to open new embassies in parts of the former Soviet Union. There was also a lot of turnover that summer. Political/Internal in August 1991 was an amalgam of about two-thirds new people and one-third carryover. Thankfully, one of the carryovers was my deputy, Ed Salazar, who, years later, would be head of Political/Internal in his own right.

Q: And whom I'm interviewing now.

MERRY: Good. He played an absolutely essential role during those months and was a real life-saver for me. I had Moscow experience, but not recent experience; so I had a lot to learn, but much less time than I needed. Hence, Ed was to me as Collins was to Strauss in some ways. The holdovers in Political/Internal were a very talented group and would by themselves have constituted a top-flight political section anywhere else. However, the incoming people were also a very talented group. Even though Political/Internal was unusually large, its quality was extraordinarily high. This team had been picked with some care, given the importance of the work we had to do. The Soviet desk in the State Department had a long tradition of emphasizing cadres and getting the very best people to serve in Moscow. I played no role whatever in the selection of my team, but doubt I could have assembled anything as good, let alone better.

Nearly a dozen of these people had just arrived in Moscow but without my experience of prior service there, with one exception. Most of the new arrivals, like myself, were in temporary quarters. I was camping out in a temporary apartment, and would not move into my real apartment until November because there just never was time with the political events taking place. Although my household shipment arrived in Moscow before I did, the crate sat in the embassy garage for almost half a year. Frankly, I got along pretty well just with airfreight. The physical working conditions of the embassy were not just provisional, they were chaotic. We were literally working on sawhorse tables in this huge room with almost 40 people, in what had been intended as a waiting room. Communications equipment and word-processing facilities were hopelessly inadequate, despite our status as the most important American diplomatic post on earth facing what soon would be the most important geopolitical events of our lifetimes.

The embassy was hobbled by a mass of security rules – much more than had been in effect during my previous assignment – despite the fact the Cold War was coming to an end. The embassy had experienced some real problems associated with bugs in the new chancery building, but also some alleged security compromises, especially involving one Marine security guard with a powerful fantasy life. The embassy security office in 1991 seemed determined to prevent anyone getting anything done, especially in the Political Section. That changed, thank God, after Ambassador Strauss took over. When I arrived, I learned that nobody was allowed to have any in-person contact with a Soviet citizen unless another cleared American was present. This was preposterous and completely impractical for Political/Internal. In-person contact was what we did, after all. So, at my first staff meeting as the new chief of Political/Internal, I gave everyone a blanket waiver from this restriction, but with the caution not to mention it to anyone. This worked fine until new, more rational, rules came into effect.

So, in the quiet period of mid-August everyone was trying to settle in and figure out where things and people were. I was meeting colleagues in other sections I would be working with. I knew some of the people, particularly in the Defense Attaché's Office, but there was only a single person in Political whom I had worked with during my previous Moscow assignment. Almost everyone was new to me, but then I was new to them. The city outside was the same; it was all fairly familiar but all very new and different.

I had been in town for 10 days, and had spent the weekend of August 17-18 in the office reviewing reporting files I had not seen for the preceding months—the reporting done by Political/Internal when I had been in the U.S.—so I would be up-to-date. I had not quite completed that task, so I decided to come in a couple of hours early on Monday, August 19, to finish it off, so I would start off that Monday, that week, fully read up and ready to get on with the job. Well, I never did get those damn files read.

I arrived at the embassy that Monday two hours before normal starting time—this was just at seven in the morning—by Metro, of course. I walked toward the north gate of the embassy compound, which is not the main gate; that was really the back gate and only for staff. There was a Soviet police booth in front of the gate with one uniformed Soviet police officer. He saw me and came out of the booth. This was no more than two or three minutes after the hour, after seven. I was reaching in my pocket to get my diplomatic ID so he would let me enter the embassy. He didn't bother with that at all. He stepped in front of me and immediately asked, in Russian, "Are you an American?" I replied, in Russian, "Yes," figuring this was about identifying myself. He said, "Do you speak Russian?" I said, "Yes." His third question was, "Have you heard about the overthrow of the government?" Stunned, I said, "What?" He had just heard, on the radio, the first announcement of the putsch against Gorbachev, the first statement from the so-called Emergency Committee, that Gorbachev was "resting," meaning under house arrest, in Crimea and the committee was in charge. He quickly described to me what he had heard just seconds before on the seven o'clock special news broadcast. I was the first person he'd laid eyes on after hearing it. Then he said, "I am afraid, very". I replied, "me too." Then I ran past him through the gate, which had a little cipher lock on it. There was no American there. Unusually for me with my bad leg, I actually sprinted down the embassy compound to the Marine desk. There I found Jim Collins, who had also just heard the news – his townhouse was on the compound – and was already on the phone at the Marine desk back to the Operations Center at the State Department in Washington, telling them what was going on. Jim was not a former director of the Ops Center for nothing; we were their main customers for quite awhile thereafter.

I quickly consulted with Jim. He told me to get the defense attaché's people mobilized to check the city for military deployments. DAO was located right inside the entrance to the chancery and, being military guys, they tended to be early starters, so I knew there would be people there. I raced into their office. None of them knew what was going on because we were not allowed to have radios inside the embassy core for security reasons.

Q: Because fear of transmission.

MERRY: We got that foolish rule overturned fairly soon. In any case, I shocked the hell out of them with what was going on and told them Collins wanted them to start deploying around town, to see what was happening in terms of movements of forces. DAO (Defense Attachés Office) is absolutely superb at understanding what they're looking at when they see forces. Most civilians are hopeless at reporting military movements. "Oh, there were tanks moving." DAO would know what kind of tank, what unit, and what structure that unit works for, is it ministry of interior or KGB or Army. They know what they're looking at, whereas most civilians in the embassy gave reports so vague as to be more confusing. Thankfully, our military colleagues were concrete in their reporting.

Then I raced down into the Political Section and, God love him, there was Ed Salazar, already there, all alone. He had also listened to the news and knew things were going to be hopping. He was already busily checking the Russian wire service and figuring out what we actually could tell Washington. We were the only ones there. He had been the first member of the Political Section to arrive and I was the second. The next thing I did was start calling all our staff at home. I don't know how many people in the Political Section—I called my own people in Internal, first, obviously—were either woken up or had their breakfast scrambled that Monday morning by me informing them that Gorbachev had been overthrown, and giving them their initial assignments. I could hear gasps at the other end of the line. They answered the phone, with "Oh, good morning, Wayne. What's happening?" I said, "Gorbachev's just been overthrown." "What?" Then, "OK, here's what I want you to do. On your way in, I want you to stop at the following places to see what is going on. Don't spend a lot of time because we're going to have a busy day. But on your way in, I want you to check the following." This was what Kent Brown had done with me the morning Brezhnev died, so I kind of felt at home. Then, of course, people started showing up in a hurry and we got ourselves organized.

At the time, not only did we not have an ambassador but the outgoing Political Minister Counselor, the person who supervised all three components of the Political Section, was literally packing out that day and the next. He had fairly limited time for the office. The newly arrived head of Political/External, Thomas Lynch, was on board, but the new Political Minister Counselor, Louis Sell, would not arrive for several weeks. Collins decided that we had to deal with this crisis on the assumption it would continue for some time. That was absolutely right. It was terribly important not to burn ourselves out in the first days, because embassies sometimes get so focused on dealing with a crisis, they don't pace themselves correctly. For reporting, he established a day team and a night team. This was not just for people in the Political Section but included reporting officers from the other State sections. Everybody focused on this crisis. The DAO and the CIA people had their own tasks to do. The administrative people had many tasks to do.

The State reporting people, which were from the Political, Economics and Science sections, were brought into this all-hands reporting operation. The night team was headed by Tom Lynch and the day team was headed by me. They overlapped. The day shift, as I recall, was about 15 hours long, and the night shift was about 12 hours because we needed a certain amount of time to pass the baton and get people briefed on current events. The idea was that when people completed their shift, they would go home and get some sleep. I found this was a problem, particularly with some of the more junior officers. They wanted to be involved all the time. I got short with some of them, exercising my nascent authority, saying, "We're going to be doing this for days, maybe for weeks, maybe for months." I had been on some 24-hour crisis teams before, and could appreciate that human frailty becomes a real problem if you don't pace yourself through these things.

Q: Let's say the first 12 hours, as you are all getting out, getting information and all, what were you coming up with? A couple scenarios, maybe two scenarios, three? What were our concerns?

MERRY: Our first concern was just trying to find out what the hell was going on. Another concern—not mine, but it was an embassy concern—was, of course, the safety of embassy personnel and other Americans in Moscow. Few people had ever imagined a coup in Moscow, so there was something of a tendency among tourists and contractors to panic. This is a primary consular function, and it was an important one, though there really was no danger if people stayed away from the key political points of the city. However, the situation for the embassy was very different, because the main focus of opposition to the putsch was at the so-called Russian White House, which is right across the street from the new U.S. Embassy compound. It is a wide street, but the locus of Yeltsin's opposition was within 200 yards of our compound wall. We were not just eyewitnesses. The embassy, in which 155 families lived, was potentially in the line of fire of anything that would happen. Two years later, it was very much in the line of actual fire: a lot of bullet holes and one near fatality. That was not the case in 1991, but there was no way of knowing how things were going to develop and how much violence might come with it.

Security was not my concern. My concern was reporting, making sure our people were getting out to the right places, including those who already had local contacts, that we were in touch with people: officials, semi-officials, dissidents and, in particular, as Yeltsin rallied the opposition across the way at the Russian White House, in establishing regular communications with his people, with him. We also had to regularize our reporting, for which there are standard Foreign Service procedures for situation reporting in a crisis. Fortunately, we had a few hands who had been through coups in other posts, so they knew the drill. This is not something an embassy should try to do ad hoc; following the established procedures for crisis reporting really does result in a better job. Obviously, we were doing classified telegraphic reporting – sit reps (situation reports) plus analytic reports – but also real-time telephonic reporting to the task force in the State Operations Center which, like it or not, had to take place over an unsecured telephone line. The secure telephone equipment we had then was just more damn trouble than it was worth. In any case, by the time the Soviets monitoring our conversations with Washington could get them transcribed and processed, the crisis would be over.

Q: When you arrived, just before this, how did we view Yeltsin? In the first place, talk about straight-line projections, Yeltsin was considered a little bit of a fly in ointment wasn't he? Gorbachev was our man and Yeltsin was ... How did you all feel about that?

MERRY: Washington, I think, regarded Yeltsin as a dubious character, but I had enough impressions from the previous year to know that Yeltsin was immensely popular, particularly in the city of Moscow where he had been a progressive head of the Moscow party apparatus until his resignation from the Soviet leadership. Yeltsin was a man who—in retrospect this might not be so obvious, but you can take my word for it—had real charisma, particularly face-to-face, in front of a crowd, in the flesh. Boris Nikolayevich Yeltsin had charisma by the bucket. I have never been in the presence of anyone else who exuded such an aura of dynamism and sheer force of will. He was a true leader, a commander. It was, I think, pretty obvious to all of us in Moscow that with Gorbachev under lock and key down in Crimea, and with the institutions of the Soviet government in the hands of the Emergency Committee, there was only one locus of opposition and that was Yeltsin. A lot of people who rallied to Yeltsin that week were not particularly enthusiastic about him personally or about his policies. But they understood that he was a true leader, in much the same way that in 1940 many people in Britain, such as the Labour Party, who had serious peacetime reservations about Winston Churchill said, “This is not peacetime. Whatever else Winston may be, he’s a fighter.” In 1991, in August, whatever people may have thought about Yeltsin in other terms, everybody knew that Boris Nikolayevich was a fighter.

Q: Did we feel that if we had our druthers, that this committee that was formed to oust Gorbachev was a bad thing?

MERRY: Yes, we certainly did. I do not recall so much as a moment in which that issue was in doubt. During that first day a number of things happened in Moscow and back in the States that were quite important in establishing Washington’s view. Now, keep in mind that most of this was communicated at the policy level by Jim Collins, our chargé.

Q: Whom I’m interviewing now.

MERRY: Quite correctly. He was the only one in direct touch with Washington at a senior level. My job, as head of the day shift, which was about 15 hours long for me, was to direct a very large reporting effort, which meant I was the guy to whom everybody fed information. I was not out on the streets. I was not out gathering information. I was not having conversations with Russians. That would have been my personal preference, but that was not my role. I was the person to whom several dozen people were providing input and I was making sure it went back to Washington in different formats. I was familiar with the requirements of crisis reporting and since, speaking candidly, I can get prose down clearly and accurately in a hurry, my job was like that of the editor of a news room at a major newspaper in a crisis. I was not the reporter, I was the editor.

We had—and this demonstrates how primitive things were—we had, between the embassy and Washington, one working telephone line. One. Keep in mind that there were pitifully few telephone lines between Moscow and the West at that time. That one telephone line was at a desk in the Political Section. At one point, someone foolishly hung up the phone and it took us I don't know how long to get another line back to Washington. Then we wrapped the cradle of the telephone in masking tape, so it could not be hung up. It looked like a mummy telephone, that stayed open 24 hours a day for the duration. That was the primary mechanism for quick reporting. This was an open international phone line, so it was certainly tapped, and not just on the Soviet end, it was probably being tapped by several governments before it ever got to Washington. The phone line was how we kept the Operations Center task force informed of quick-breaking news. Then the sit reps, the situation reports, were the classified telegraphic means to inform a broader official Washington readership on an hourly, and multi-hourly basis, of what was going on. Then there were the daily wrap-ups and evaluations, which I will come to. We were interrupted a lot with queries from Washington. I remember, I was supervising the preparation of a situation report . . .

Q: This is the first day?

MERRY: This is on the first day. Whoever was monitoring the telephone to the State Department Operations Center, turned around and said, "Where's Jim?" I was already getting annoyed with Washington always wanting to speak with Collins, because they needed to learn to talk to other people and not always bother him. So in a testy way I asked, "Who wants him?" The answer was, "The president." The room went dead. Total silence. I turned to somebody and said, "Get Jim." All of us then watched Collins, as the chargé, on his end of the conversation with the president at Kennebunkport in Maine. I think I will let Jim relate that conversation in his oral history. However, this led to what I think was one of the most important aspects of American policy that first day. We had violated the security rules and got a television into the political section...

Q: You had to.

MERRY: So we could watch CNN (Cable News Network). We had to watch CNN to know what people in Washington were seeing on CNN – often to correct something they reported wrong. However, I remember distinctly watching President Bush giving an impromptu press conference at Kennebunkport, and his statement, when somebody asked him if the United States would accept Gorbachev's removal, Bush said, "Coups can fail." I think those were three of the most important words that George Herbert Walker Bush ever said in public, because it was a message heard in Russia. In addition to the messages we were sending to Yeltsin personally—when Jim went over to see him, when other people we had working in the Russian White House gave messages to Yeltsin and to people around Yeltsin—this was a public message. This was a statement from the President of the United States that the United States was not taking this coup as a fait accompli (an accomplished fact), that we were keeping an open position.

Some other Western governments, unfortunately, were less far-sighted. Some European governments were already communicating that they were willing to accept Gorbachev's overthrow and proceed with the new order.

Q: Which governments are these?

MERRY: I remember the French government was a little precipitant in its willingness to take things as they appeared. However, the only Western government statement that anybody on the streets in Moscow, anybody in the Russian White House, gave a damn about was ours. President Bush's statement was not a condemnation of the putsch as such but was a clear statement we were not involved with the putsch, which some people might have suspected, and that we were keeping our options very much open. It was terribly important. It meant that people on Yeltsin's side understood that the Americans hadn't committed themselves to accept what had been done illegally in their country.

For many, many people in Moscow and in other parts of Russia, this whole crisis was about something which had scarcely existed in Soviet politics, which was legality. A large part of why people rallied at the Russian White House was not so much support for Gorbachev or what Gorbachev was doing—because by that time Gorbachev had lost much of his credibility and popular support—but because his removal was the result of a palace coup and was clearly illegal. That was extremely important and represented a watershed in Russian political history. A lot of Russians thought, "We going to put Gorbachev back in his legal position and then we'll change him, then we'll remove him legally." The focus on legality is what made the events of August 1991 unique in Russian history and why the American official position was so important to the people defending legality there.

At the end of the first day, we had to figure out what we thought it all meant. Jim Collins, and the outgoing Political Minister Counselor and I sat down in a tiny classified conference room to discuss this. Since I was the head of the day reporting team, it was my job to write the message. We discussed what it should say. This was Collins's interpretation, because it was his embassy, but an interpretation with which I entirely agreed, that as the sun went down the first day, the outcome of the coup attempt against Gorbachev was an open question, it was by no means clear how this was going to work out. There were a number of very strange things about this putsch. First, there was nothing up in the sky. There were no helicopters. They didn't have control of army aviation.

Q: In other words, the coupers did not have full control over the world?

MERRY: That's right. We also knew from our colleagues up at the consulate general in Leningrad that the navy was not on board. We had considerable indications that the air force was not on board. The very fact they were conducting a coup in the middle of the massive metropolitan area that is Moscow and there were no helicopters in the sky was a fairly strong indication that not everything was under control. Second, the telephones were still working in the White House. Yeltsin had telephones. What the hell kind of a coup is it when you can't control who's got a telephone land line? (This was before cell phones.) There were just a lot of things that were not clear.

In contrast, it was clear from our talking to people around the Russian White House that not only was there genuine large-scale popular support for Yeltsin—particularly among young people—but that the various military units deployed around the Russian White House were under different and perhaps contradictory chains of command. The junior officers, the company-grade officers, who were there in armored personnel carriers hadn't the faintest idea what they were supposed to do. They were receiving very conflicting indications from their respective chains of command as to what they might be ordered to do. Here were young guys in military equipment, with loaded weapons, looking around and unsure what the other units under other chains of command might do. If ordered to move forward, they did not know if the units to their right and left might do the same or perhaps open fire on them. It was clearly a very uncertain situation.

Then there was the famous press conference by the Emergency Committee, which was something of a shambles, during which the chairman, Vice President Yanayev, as he was reading their statement, was trembling. You could see on television his hand shaking like a leaf. For most Russians, that was the dominant visual image of the putsch. Most people outside of Russia think of the image of Yeltsin standing on the armored vehicle reading his statement. That was a CNN image, a global image. It was carried, at least once, on Russian television, but the dominant image for Russians, because it was live and unedited, was Yanayev's hand shaking as he read the statement. So it was pretty obvious to people this was a less than impressive bunch of coup plotters.

So, our assessment, in a fairly short telegram for high-level distribution in Washington at the end of the first day, was that the putsch was by no means a done deal. This coup was by no means a success. We would just have to play this situation as it developed, which as it happened took only three days. Then, to show myself as an example to the other day staff, I went home to bed.

The second day is one I don't remember very well except that there was a lot of work. It is striking that many parts of the first and third days of the putsch are crystal clear in my memory, but the day in between is pretty much a blur. The weather deteriorated, with overcast and rain, to match the political mood. We settled into a pattern of reporting activity, with everyone knowing what their duties were. The opposition forces also settled in at the White House, making it clear they were there for the duration. This presented the Emergency Committee with a problem. They may have expected public demonstrations to be short lived, but that was not the case. In their preparations for their seizure of power, the plotters had devoted inadequate attention to the White House, the seat of the Russian Federation government. It is not true, as many people think, that the plotters failed to secure the center of Moscow; they very much secured the Kremlin, the Central Committee complex, the KGB complex and defense ministry, the Moscow city government building, and most of the other important institutions of Soviet power. What they failed to move against promptly was an institution of the Russian Federation. The Russian White House was not an important Soviet institution. It was the headquarters of the government of the Russian Federation, which in the Soviet system had been a facade of an institution and even something of a joke, until Yeltsin made it otherwise. In my previous Moscow assignment, I don't think it had ever crossed my mind to seek an appointment in the Russian Federation government, because it was not a government in substance. I suspect the coup plotters failed to deploy forces early against the White House because it did not occur to them that this white marble building on the edge of central Moscow could represent power, let alone legitimacy, in Soviet affairs. They secured what for them were the bastions of Soviet power, like the Kremlin, but neglected the physical seat of Yeltsin's position, the Russian Federation government. By the time they recognized their error, the crowds defending the White House were too large to disperse without major bloodshed, something they wanted to avoid.

The second night the Emergency Committee sent in a small armored unit to probe the defenses around the White House. There was considerable confusion among the various units involved, plus a lack of clear direction at the top. They encountered serious resistance in one of the traffic underpasses just a block from the embassy, in which three young Russian men were killed. I was asleep at the time because that was not my gig; I was not doing night duty. It was not a very resolute use of force and demonstrated, if anything, the fissures within the plotters and their lack of will and of a thought-out plan.

The third day, the Wednesday, was the day the putsch collapsed—and parts of that day are utterly vivid in my memory. It's hard to convey, but in my chief-editor position, reports started coming in to me from our people and from other sources that made it clear things were falling apart, made it clear the coup plotters were moving towards a plan B. I remember a period in the early afternoon when I could almost physically feel the putsch disintegrating. Some of this was instinct, but the momentum of events seemed very clear to me. This may sound like a weak basis for telling Washington the coup was failing, but in Moscow there was really no ambiguity in my mind. After only two weeks back in Moscow, I was already drawing important conclusions from incomplete evidence, but that is part of what I was paid for. The conclusive piece of evidence was when we learned the coup leaders were headed for Vnukovo airport south of the city to fly down to Crimea to talk to Gorbachev. At that point, whatever residual authority they may have possessed disappeared, as everyone on the Russian side recognized the putsch had failed.

As it happened, this took place simultaneous with the arrival in Moscow of Robert Strauss, the new U.S. ambassador, who had been sworn in hastily in the Oval Office when the coup started. Jim Collins, the chargé, had gone out to Sheremetyevo airport north of Moscow to greet him and bring him to the embassy. As they were coming into the city along the Leningradsky Prospekt, they passed lines of armored vehicles going away from the center. The orders had been given to return to barracks. So, they could see what was happening even if they had no other information. I calculated—because we didn't have cell phones in those days, so you had to do these things by guesswork—when I thought it likely the car with Ambassador Strauss and Collins and some of Strauss's associates would arrive, and I raced out to what's called Townhouse One, the DCM's residence, where they were going to arrive. I got to the sidewalk just a couple of minutes before the vehicle pulled up. The doors open, and out steps Robert Strauss. I knew what he looked like, but I had never met him. He sees a disheveled guy in a dirty white cotton sweater—I hadn't slept much and I probably looked like hell—a rather improbable excuse for an American diplomat on the sidewalk, who was introduced to him by Collins. Jim didn't fully know what was going on during the time he had gone to the airport to pick up the ambassador. I quickly briefed them on what we knew and what I thought was happening. Strauss – always to the point – asked me, very clearly, “Are you telling me you think this coup has failed?” I said, “Mr. Ambassador, that's exactly what I am telling you.” Happily, my analysis was right. It was ironic that Strauss had been sent out to Moscow in a hurry to deal with one set of circumstances, one situation, and within minutes of his arrival was facing a very different one, and a much better one.

Things were somewhat confused for awhile. A group of western ambassadors was preparing to fly to Crimea to engage Gorbachev, and they wanted at least Collins to go with them. Fortunately, he did not, because Gorbachev was already on the way back to Moscow. Then came the important question how we would deal with the return of Gorbachev, which took place that evening, and our relations with Yeltsin. Keep in mind that Gorbachev was again the legal head of the Soviet power structure and Yeltsin technically was a second-tier figure as head of the Russian Federation government, at that time still a federal component of the Soviet Union. Obviously, their roles were reversed in terms of the legitimacy of their positions and their popular credibility. The Soviet structures under Gorbachev were either collapsing or transferring their allegiance to Yeltsin. This was a tricky time for the United States because, of course, governments deal with other governments. Strauss would present his credentials in a few days to Gorbachev. Washington very much wanted Gorbachev's return to constitute a restoration of his authority, regardless of the failing integrity of Soviet institutions. To anyone actually in Moscow during those few days, however, the contrary reality was manifest. You could see it and you could feel it. Power had shifted and the integrity of the Soviet state was irrevocably gone. I knew in my own mind that the only questions were of time and process, but not of outcome. I am fairly certain my view was shared by many of my colleagues. As we soon learned, it was not shared by Washington.

For me, personally, those three totally exhausting days were the beginning of what would be an exhausting seven months, and even three years. However, that evening I finally was able to get out to walk around, walk around the Russian White House, around the barricades where the young people had rallied to Yeltsin. There was still the detritus of the three days all over the streets. It was one of those beautiful, late-summer Moscow evenings, after a couple of cold and rainy days. Almost everyone had gone, probably in need of food and sleep, as actually I was. It was nine or later, which was as early as I could get out of the embassy. God, it was a beautiful evening and, for the most part, I had this great historic scene to myself. It was very odd to be on that historic ground while still daylight, but almost nobody else there. I remember walking, looking at all this, and thinking, “Hundreds of years from now, a thousand years from now, people will be writing and debating about what happened right here this day. And I'm here. I'm seeing it and I was part of it.” I had a profound sense of being on one of the cusps of history, of being an observer and, in a small way, a participant, in what I already clearly understood was the greatest geopolitical transformation of my lifetime. I understood this was the end of the Soviet Union; that the Soviet Union could not recover from this. Although it was warm, I felt chilly just from the realization of standing on the edge of an historic tectonic plate that had just moved. I would not trade that evening for any other of my life.

Q: The planes are going down, Gorbachev is released and coming back, was there the feeling, with the armed forces, the KGB and all that lined up against them, that they were going to go down quietly? Or were you thinking of Red and White armies?

MERRY: We didn't know too much of what was going on behind the scenes, though there were plenty of rumors, of course. The one really important thing was the largely peaceful collapse of the putsch. Other than the three young men who had been killed in the night fighting the second day, there was no lethal violence. Jim and I represented the United States at their funeral a few days later. There were three suicides among those involved in the coup attempt. A real loss was Marshal Akhromeyev, a very honorable man and not one of the original organizers of the putsch, who joined it from a sense of duty, and then committed suicide. His entire life had been defined by the military slogan "I serve the Soviet Union." I suspect that is why he aligned himself with the putsch, despite reservations, to try to preserve the state to which he had devoted his life. I know his death was very much regretted by his counterparts in Washington. I understand Colin Powell thought the world of him. Here was a man who felt his honor required him to atone with his life. For the most part, the organizers of the putsch passively accepted the outcome and they were sent to—I think they were in Lefortovo Prison. I'm not absolutely sure. I believe it was Lefortovo where they were imprisoned.

Once Soviet willpower failed at the top, the intimidating aura of the police state more or less evaporated. Moscow in the ensuing days had a party atmosphere. The first two-and-a-half days of the week had been gray and rainy. The end of the putsch brought with it the sun. Then there were several days in Moscow of those lovely, late-summer Russian days that were just made for the festive atmosphere which came pouring out. On the Thursday evening, the day after the putsch collapsed, a colleague and I were on Dzerzhinsky Square, in front of the KGB building, as they were taking down the huge statue of Felix Dzerzhinsky, the creator of the Soviet secret police. There were fireworks in the sky. We went down to the Communist Party headquarters building on Old Square, where a number of Yeltsin's associates had taken possession of the building, so the files couldn't be taken away or destroyed. There is a street that looks past the Communist Party headquarters and into Red Square, along which you can see the flagpole on top of what's called the Senate building inside the Kremlin. Instead of the red flag with the hammer and sickle on it, there flew the white, blue and red Russian tricolor. I practically put my neck out as I did a violent double-take as my peripheral vision spotted what, to me, seemed the wrong flag on the flagpole. I physically catapulted around when I saw the Russian tricolor above the Kremlin rather than the Soviet flag. I had not expected that change to come so quickly, but whoever it was within the Kremlin who flies the flag understood which way the wind was blowing in every sense.

The next morning while taking the metro to work I decided to stop by Dzerzhinsky Square to see if anything was still going on after the festivities of the previous evening when the statue was removed from the massive pedestal in the center of the square. It was, for many people, a normal working day. As I came up the steps to ground level, I walked beside a Moscow matron with her shopping bags, shuffling up the steps. As we came into the open, she gave a casual glance to her left onto the square, stopped dead in astonishment, and asked of nobody in particular, "Where's Felix?”

As busy as we continued to be professionally in the embassy during the days after the putsch, we could enjoy the festive atmosphere, the sense of celebration, of triumph, of a kind equal to Berlin with the fall of the Wall. This was a genuine expression of what is sometimes called “people power”. Now, that statement simplifies what happened. I’m not for a moment saying these events involved more than a tiny fraction of the population of the city of Moscow, or the city of Leningrad, let alone the population of the country. This was not a mass movement as had been true in Poland and in East Germany and then Czechoslovakia, but these events certainly had mass resonance. This was a failed palace coup. But unlike the palace coup that removed Ceaușescu in Romania, the palace coup in Moscow failed in large measure because of mass popular opposition on the streets, particularly in Moscow and in Leningrad, and because there was a political force in opposition, centered around Yeltsin. The coup plotters bungled things. They took physical possession of the wrong center of power in Moscow. They deployed in force around the Kremlin and Red Square, but were slow to move against the Russian White House. They didn’t understand there was an alternative source of political legitimacy, or that Yeltsin could rally mass support a couple of miles away from Red Square. Perhaps with more resolution and better coordination, they could have pulled it off, but they could not turn back the clock to the era of Brezhnev or Chernenko.

This was really a question of willpower. I don’t think anybody can deny that Boris Yeltsin had guts and he had determination. For all his later failings, which I have written about elsewhere, he was the unquestioned man of the hour in Russia in August 1991. Not Gorbachev. If Yeltsin had failed, he would have paid for it with his life, and he knew it. He showed leadership, and he displayed backbone and determination, which inspired a lot of other people to do the same. The people on the other side were internally divided, bickering, sometimes drunk, and unable to get their own institutions, particularly the military, to back what they were doing. It was the unwillingness of the military to rally around the coup that was its ultimate undoing.

I think some of the real heroes of this episode—the unsung heroes, at any rate—were the senior military people who themselves regarded the putsch as illegal, who hewed to their own sense of duty, and maintained their professionalism rather than participating, because they certainly had ample forces with which to crush the opposition. I don’t think there’s any question they could have done so. But it was not clear who was going to give the orders and who was going to obey those orders. It was a remarkable moment in the history of any country, let alone the history of a place like Russia, to have an event of such political importance take place more outdoors than in; more on the streets than behind closed doors. That fact was reflected in the thousands of people who participated, even in a small way, and who could feel real pride. There have not been many events like that in modern Russian history.

Q: Did we have any contact or encouragement role, during this first day, with Yeltsin?

MERRY: The first day or first days?

Q: Well, first day.

MERRY: The first day, yes. Collins went over to see him with a message from the president.

Q: What was the message, essentially?

MERRY: Well, I'm not sure I should be the one to discuss that. Since you're interviewing Collins, maybe he should deal with that.

Q: OK. Were we talking, at your level, with people down below?

MERRY: Oh, yes. And we weren't simply maintaining sources of information, we were communicating sympathy and support. Fortunately, that turned out all right, but it might not have. As a diplomat you've got to be careful about the perception that you're promising more than you're actually going to be able to deliver. Obviously there was the risk that people would interpret any indication of support from the United States as more tangible than just political. That was a problem.

Later in the week our involvement lost any ambiguity. We very publicly welcomed the failure of the putsch and the return of Gorbachev. We cheered Yeltsin. Strauss spoke for the United States at a mass rally on the weekend – entirely without authorization from Washington and without a prepared text – to associate our country with what had happened. I don't think most people in Washington understood that Gorbachev was returning for his last hurrah—he returned to Moscow, but not to power in any real way—and that Yeltsin had emerged from this event the unequivocal leader of Russia. That was soon manifest in a combined session of the Soviet and Russian Supreme Soviets when Yeltsin overtly dominated Gorbachev, almost forcing him to read aloud the names of those who had conspired against him, a list of men he had himself put into positions of power. Anyone watching that event could see both that power had shifted to Yeltsin and that he would not accept anything like a subordinate position to Gorbachev again.

Keep in mind that there was a lot of bad blood between the two men, and that Gorbachev had several times publicly humiliated Yeltsin. Boris was getting some revenge on Gorbachev, a man who was much more haughty and arrogant at home than his Western image. Yeltsin had endured a lot from Gorbachev in a very personal way and would now return the favor. However, the basic issue was not personal but political. Gorbachev had, to the very end, staked his banner to the Communist Party of the Soviet Union as the vehicle of his power. When his own team within the Party and Soviet power ministries lost faith in Gorbachev and betrayed him, he was left with no real basis of power and authority. In contrast, Yeltsin had built a new vehicle in the Russian Federation after leaving the Party and, with his triumph of August, enjoyed massive legitimacy. What made this process so post-Soviet was that legitimacy was the core component of power; legitimacy actually mattered. That was Gorbachev's legacy, though it pulled the rug out from under him.

This began a difficult process between the embassy and Washington. In the weeks and months to come, Washington was continuously behind events in Russia and frequently, I would have to say, in denial as to what was happening. There were debates, legitimate debates, about exactly what was happening. Within the embassy there were conflicting views whether Gorbachev was finished or was now going to get his second wind. A few thought that, restored to office and with the putschists out of the way, he would be able to fulfill his program. There were other people who said it was only a matter of time before his lack of political authority would be entirely exposed, as well as his own responsibility for the crisis of August. Remember, the people who tried to overthrow Gorbachev were people he had trusted despite warnings from Shevardnadze and others that they were going to move against him. Gorbachev was the man at the top, so the ultimate accountability rested with him, which he was not willing to accept.

These were legitimate debates, toward the end of August, as to what was happening and what was going to happen. To me, as someone who was on the scene, who had daily engagement with these events, not from a distance but with immediacy, it was quite clear that Gorbachev was politically finished, expended, exhausted, whatever term you want to use, and that Yeltsin had emerged from these events the unambiguous winner. There was not going to be a duality of leadership, there wasn't going to be both a Soviet and a Russian Federation leadership for more than an interim period. No repetition of the "war of the laws" of the previous spring. There was going to be just one power in Moscow, and it was going to be Yeltsin.

I must acknowledge that in one of my early messages after the putsch I fudged the question of Gorbachev's future. This was an analysis summarizing the events of August and what they meant for the United States. I recall I used the phrase, "we should not abandon Gorbachev." I regret that now. I would not have recommended actual abandonment of the man, but I should have stated clearly that he was finished politically. My hesitancy reflected the split views within the embassy and, I suspect, my position as a relative newcomer. I recall a spirited conversation with Robert Clarke, the head of the Science Section and a good friend from my first Moscow assignment, in which he argued forcefully there would be only one man standing and it would be Yeltsin. I agreed with him, but was not yet willing to be so forthright in what I wrote to Washington. That would change quite soon, but I was still a bit uneasy in my new role as political analyst at the most important embassy of the United States during this immensely important global transformation. I was still somewhat intimidated by the role and the responsibilities it entailed, and unwilling to stake my views to the mast for all to see. Events would change that soon enough.

It was also pretty obvious that the Soviet Union as a multinational empire was coming apart; the three Baltic states were not only going but, for practical purposes, were already gone. Yeltsin made it clear publicly he was happy to cheer them on. I remember in late August getting a phone call—how he got the phone call through I still can't comprehend—from one of our officers from the Leningrad consulate who was in Vilnius, the capital of Lithuania, calling me from the KGB headquarters building in the center of Vilnius. He had accompanied a number of Lithuanians who went to the KGB headquarters to see that files didn't get destroyed. When they arrived, at about six o'clock or so on a summer evening, the building doors were open; they went in and everything was intact. The staff had simply removed their personal belongings and had left everything entirely in place. After a while he picked up the telephone and was able to get a call through to me at the embassy in Moscow. I can still remember the awe in his voice that he was calling me from inside the KGB headquarters in the capital of a Soviet republic. His Lithuanian friends were in possession. Clearly Soviet power in the Baltic states was a thing of the past. Things were also beginning to move fairly quickly in Moldova, in western Ukraine, central Ukraine, in Georgia, in Armenia. Less so in the central Asian countries, but I think the fragility of the Soviet system was becoming pretty clear.

Q: What about Leningrad/St. Petersburg, what was happening there?

MERRY: That was second only to Moscow as a place where interesting things were happening. The mayor, Anatoly Sobchak, was one of the leading reformers in the Soviet system. He actually was the first political sponsor of Vladimir Putin, who was one of his students in law school and became a deputy mayor sometime later. One of the first things Sobchak did after the putsch was change the name from Leningrad back to St. Petersburg. The consulate-general had done superb work covering the Baltic states for several years, but Washington imposed an abrupt halt to that work when we recognized their independence, which cut off a large number of valuable contacts in those countries for months.

At the start of September, the new minister-counselor for the Political Section, Louis Sell, arrived. He was in overall charge of the three components of the section and was the management layer between it and the front office, meaning Strauss and Collins. His arrival changed what had been a pretty informal and very collegial working environment into something more structured and layered, as was probably inevitable. I had been in the habit of working directly with Collins morning, noon and evening. As the events of August were overwhelmingly the responsibility of Political/Internal, it was natural that the embassy front office should engage us without an intervening layer. Probably I was spoiled during the putsch and its aftermath. However, it was time for the embassy, with something like 1200 total staff, to function in a more structured way. Political would always have pride of place with the front office, and we were physically the closest to the ambassador and DCM, but they had a lot more to worry about than us.

I had never worked before with Louis Sell and had met him only briefly while in Washington on consultations. He had a background in Soviet and Yugoslav affairs, but I really knew very little about him. I came to have considerable professional respect for Louis, but unfortunately never a true collegial relationship. Our personalities contrasted quite a bit: I am a compulsive wit – even a smart aleck – while Louis is not real strong on irony. He arrived in Moscow with the declared view that the failed putsch demonstrated the failure of reform in Russia, while I saw it as a huge step forward. I came to see Louis as more comfortable with the unambiguous confrontation of the Cold War than with the messy post-Soviet and inchoate Russia we were dealing with. Louis can be, at least in my perspective, somewhat Manichean in his political outlook, whereas post-Soviet Russia was nothing if not morally ambiguous. Our contrasting views and personalities would cause problems in the years ahead.

Political/Internal emerged from the events of August a genuine team. I do not mean to say there were no personal tensions, but they were few. It was the hard work and strain of August that forged the team, much more than I ever could have done. This was a genuine blessing for me, because for the following two years I had a reporting instrument in my hands that largely functioned on its own; in the third year with new people this was not the case. I never was able to overcome the tendency of FSOs to want their own personal portfolio rather than sharing their work with colleagues. People in our line are quite territorial, and I had hoped to change this in Political/Internal based on my experience with the Marine Corps. I failed, as each officer hewed to his or her own turf. It is part of our institutional culture and, much as I deplore it, my management skills – such as they are – were insufficient to alter the culture. Otherwise, my management duties were remarkably light. I had to provide direction and definitely had to exercise quality control on written product, but this was a group of self-starting and self-motivated professionals of a very high order. Some were outstandingly good writers, though not all.

As the editor, it was a joy to receive drafts that I knew would receive keen attention in Washington, opening up new perspectives on local realities. My view was that there were thousands of people working on Soviet affairs in various parts of Washington and we should not duplicate work they could do any more than necessary. Our task, as the comparative handful of official Americans on the spot, was to observe, report and interpret in ways people in Washington could not. Our comparative advantage was proximity to the events, so that should be our focus. I encouraged my troops to get out of the office and on to the streets and into contacts with as wide a range of official and non-official people as time and circumstances allowed. Then, of course, they had to produce reports on what they had learned, preferably of a topical character rather than just a recitation of a conversation. Some drafts needed a fair amount of reworking, as I could be very demanding in terms of quality of written product. I considered we were the most important reporting section of the U.S. Foreign Service, so we owed Washington top-quality output. They suffered daily under my illegible blue pen, but I hope they emerged as better reporting officers from the ordeal. It is hard to know how you are regarded by those under your authority; I still do not know what they thought of me.

During these months, and even well into 1992, we at the embassy had access to Russian official and non-official contacts of a kind most diplomats could only dream about. I think it is not an exaggeration to say we had better access in those days in Moscow than we would in Ottawa. Indeed, our level of access was unnatural, and I warned my staff and official visitors that this was an abnormal period which could not last. It simply was not normal for a government, any government, let alone that of a great power with deep traditions of pride and of paranoia, to open itself up so completely to foreigners, and still less to foreigners from its former adversary. This struck me forcefully one evening when escorting a Congressional delegation to some meetings in the former Communist Party Central Committee building. This was a structure no U.S. Embassy official had set foot inside during my first Moscow tour, or ever expected to. Now, I was allowed by the Russians to wander around this inner sanction of Soviet Communism without an escort of any kind. The corridors were piled with official portraits from the old regime waiting for disposal, even though that regime supposedly still existed. There I was strutting along like a conqueror looking at these relics of the Leninist system. It was a gratifying feeling, but I understood this was no more than a moment in time of Russian weakness, against which they would recoil, and those doors would close on us again.

As September progressed, it was pretty obvious the political competition in Moscow was coming to a crisis. By this point, Yeltsin had very little use for Gorbachev. The two men had once been allies, but with their political separation had developed a very deep personal antipathy. Really, neither of them could stand the other. Gorbachev's great historic achievement was in ending the Cold War, but he did so in order to preserve and perpetuate the Soviet Union and the Leninist system. Yeltsin, by contrast, came to regard the entire Soviet experiment as a mistake which could not be reformed and should be abandoned. This was an extraordinary transformation for a man who was not just the product of the Leninist system but had risen almost to the top of it. This was, I think, as much a personal journey as a political one. After his first trip to the United States some months earlier, Yeltsin had told one of his closest associates, "Our system is shit!" In my view, Gorbachev was a great historic reformer, but Yeltsin was a great historical revolutionary. August and its aftermath gave him his opportunity. Yeltsin certainly had a very strong instinct for power, and understood he was the winner. Gorbachev was little more than a figurehead who was very popular among Western heads of government and Western journalists, but not within the Soviet Union, or within Russia. Gorbachev was a shadow of his former self, because by this point the Communist Party had been declared illegal. Since Gorbachev had been general secretary of the Soviet Communist Party, that pretty much rendered his main source of power null and void. He still had his role as executive president of the Soviet Union, but what was the Soviet Union at this point? Who was there to command and who was there to obey? Increasingly little.

Strauss initially asked official Washington to stay away until things sorted out a bit. Senator Larry Pressler insisted on coming anyway just after the putsch, and I spent a Saturday handholding him when I had plenty else to do. Then came the flood of visitors and delegations. James Baker, the secretary of state, came for the first of his innumerable visits. I can't even remember how many times he came. With all of this activity, we were trying to explain what was happening within the limits of what we could understand. It was a changing tableau, and a rapidly changing tableau. The Russian cast of characters involved many people whose names now are no more than historical footnotes, but who were very important people then. For a few months there were parallel structures of governments and ministries, Russian Federation and Soviet Union, that obviously were not going to last very long. As the economy started to crumble and inflation started to soar and the integrity of basic livelihoods began to erode, Russians focused more and more on immediate issues: the coming of winter, among other things, which is a big deal every year, let alone that one.

There developed, during September, October, and November, an increasing gap within American official perceptions, a contrast between what seemed obvious in the embassy but either was not accepted or even rejected in Washington. Let me give you a vivid example. This is something I can talk about because there was a study done a couple of years ago for which the various documents were declassified. I was consulted for the study, so I know about it. I think I can legitimately discuss it now. In late October 1991, George Kolt, who was the National Intelligence Officer for the Soviet Union—he was the leading Soviet specialist at CIA—sent a memo to the White House, to the NSC, saying that Ukraine might become an independent country within five years. The leading Soviet specialist at the National Security Council, Edward Hewitt, rejected this entirely. The two of them—they're both now deceased—Kolt and Hewitt, got into what reportedly was quite a confrontation over this issue. They were two of the most senior Soviet watchers in the United States, and, in fact, probably the two most senior specialists on Soviet affairs in the government, and they were arguing into early November of 1991 whether Ukraine might become an independent state within five years. It happened within less than five weeks. They had been told that Ukraine was heading toward independence through a national referendum at the end of November in detailed reporting both from the consulate in Kiev and from the embassy in Moscow. The Russians knew Ukraine would be independent before the end of the year, whether Russia liked it or not. Washington still perceived the Soviet Union as an intact and viable entity when its demise within weeks was no more than a formality. By mid-autumn we could see this, quite vividly, because we were at the very heart of the process. Washington was in denial. For example, having refused for decades to recognize the forcible incorporation of the Baltic republics into the Soviet Union by Stalin, the United States was one of the last Western governments actually to welcome them back as independence states in 1991 for fear this might somehow undermine Gorbachev.

This inability in Washington to see what seemed so obvious in the field was a major disconnect. It was reflected in October, when President Bush had his last summit meeting with Gorbachev, in Madrid. I did the scene-setter telegram for that, which I entitled Gorbachev's Last Hurrah – a reference to the Edwin O'Connor novel about Boston politics. I said very bluntly this would be Gorbachev's final performance as a statesman on the global stage. Ambassador Strauss went to Madrid for the summit and later debriefed a number of us on his return. He said he had given the same message to the president and the president's entourage before the meeting and told them, "Mr. President, you're looking at the last U.S. ambassador to the Soviet Union and I'm going to be the first U.S. ambassador to a place called Russia." And evidently, Sununu, who was one of the president's top White House advisors...

Q: He was chief of staff, I think.

MERRY: Chief of staff, but not a foreign policy advisor, interrupted rather rudely and rejected what Strauss, the ambassador on the spot, had said. Sununu declared he had read all of the intelligence reports, that Yeltsin was just a flash in the pan and Gorbachev was the guy we needed to stay with. Strauss evidently told him off in fairly blunt terms. Here was a meeting with the President of the United States, the secretary of state, the director of Central Intelligence, Robert Gates, Scowcroft, the national security advisor, Sununu and a few others, and the only person in that room who understood what the hell was going on in Russia was Bob Strauss, a Texas politician with no background in Soviet affairs, but who had been ambassador in Moscow for a couple of months and who absolutely did know what the hell was going on.

Q: And he's also a politician. Being a politician, he knew power.

MERRY: He knew power very well. This actually might be a good moment to say a few words about Strauss...

Q: I interviewed him, by the way.

MERRY: For whom I had and have the greatest admiration and personal affection. I've often said that a couple years earlier or a couple years later, he might not have been the right man to be ambassador in Moscow. But in 1991, Strauss was exactly the right man at the right place at the right time because he brought to Moscow no intellectual baggage. Not being a Soviet specialist or a Russia hand, he didn't have any particular unlearning to do. He had extraordinary instincts and understanding of power relationships. This was a man who could walk into a room full of people he didn't know, with whom he didn't have any language in common, and when he walked out of the room he'd know exactly who was hot and who was not. I don't know how he did it, but he did.

This was also a man who was absolutely no bullshit in his conduct of his ambassadorship. He never pretended to know anything he didn't know. He strongly took the view that other people in the embassy should candidly tell him what he ought to know. He frequently said that if you put himself and Collins together you had a pretty good ambassador. He never hesitated to give credit to Jim and others. He never considered himself to be anything he was not, but he was a superb leader of the team and terrific in making people in the embassy feel that what they did was important, that it mattered, that their judgments, their work, were feeding right in to the top of American foreign policy, that he was taking what they were telling him and giving that directly to the president in phone calls, in meetings and such. He was also remarkable at accepting the speed with which things were changing. He had a great metaphor, which was that we – including Russia's leaders – were all like a pissant riding on a log in a river going downstream imaging it determines the direction the log is going and its destination. So, anybody who thought they were in charge of Russia's future was like this pissant on a log. Strauss knew neither Gorbachev nor Yeltsin was determining where things were going. They were going with the flow like everybody else. Strauss understood that the United States could not affect that, either; that we shouldn't even try.

I got to know Strauss during these months pretty well because he liked to interact directly with members of his staff who could help him understand the place. He had brought along a staffer from the State Department who, among other things, was supposed to be his speechwriter, but the first speech draft the guy produced, Strauss hated. Strauss went to Collins to identify someone else to write his speech. Collins fingered me and I wrote a draft that Strauss, frankly, loved. So, from then on, for the remainder of his time in Moscow, in addition to my other duties, I was the ambassador's speechwriter. Not that I needed any more work, but it did give me access to and contact with Bob Strauss that allowed me to appreciate that, behind the good-old-boy bonhomie of the Texas politician, was a man who was smart as hell. I also enjoyed getting his genuine voice into the speech drafts, based on our respective origins in Texas and Oklahoma.

Strauss was extremely well connected in Washington, and he understood how to use his ability to pick up the phone and get anybody in Washington to take his call. Two congressmen later told me that what became the "Freedom Support Act" of assistance for Russia and the other new countries should have been named for Strauss, as it was his personal lobbying for the legislation which got it passed. He also knew how to lead an embassy and make the embassy serve not just his own purposes but serve the broader purposes of the United States through him. He had not wanted the job in the first place, but knew he was a key man at a key time for the country, so he was going to do his best, but he had no false ego issues. Yeltsin warmed to him immediately; they were very sympatico. The Russians were impressed as hell at the things he could do, like picking up the phone and getting the president, senators, any Cabinet members on the line. A few months later, in early '92, the Russians were putting together their first presentation for the International Monetary Fund and didn't have a clue what to do. I happened to be in Strauss's office when he put a phone call through to Paul Volcker, and the conversation was, "Paul? Bob. I want you to get your butt over here. I've got a job for you." Two days later, I was sitting across the table from Paul Volcker, briefing him on the domestic political situation.

Q: Paul Volcker was, at that time...

MERRY: I'm not sure what he was at that time. He was the former Chairman of the Federal Reserve System, but Paul Volcker was then, as now, one of the biggest names in American financial policy. To have somebody tell him to just drop everything and get on an airplane and fly to Moscow demonstrates the kind of thing that Strauss could do. No Foreign Service ambassador who ever lived could get away with something like that.

Strauss was also extremely good, as an ambassador, at lightening the mood. People were working very, very hard and there was an immense amount of stress, and some people were grinding the enamel off their teeth at night. People had a lot of trouble sleeping, and the embassy medical unit had to get extra supplies of various medications just for the Political Section. I was still on strong medications for my back injury from 1983 in New York, and the stress certainly did not make it any better. Strauss was great at getting people to lighten up, getting people to relax. He had an unlimited stock of jokes and funny stories which he used to lighten the mood and the load, which is also, I think, a characteristic of leadership. I will never forget watching Bob tell off-color Strom Thurmond jokes to a Senate delegation which included Strom Thurmond. Strauss was also very approachable, not at all at a distance from embassy staff. For example, most days he had lunch in the embassy cafeteria, standing in line like anyone else, often wearing a cardigan sweater. Anyone could sit with him and chat with the ambassador, which made people feel that the boss was one of them. This was a nice touch, from which Strauss also got access to a variety of views about post operations and such.

Above all, Strauss was known to be very close to the president and secretary of state—who were, of course, old friends and political rivals—and with practically every member of importance in the Senate and House of Representatives, and various other Cabinet members, everybody in Washington who was anybody. He was the man who could convince these people that, whatever Washington might want, the Soviet Union was coming to an end, Gorbachev was exhausted as a political force, and Yeltsin not only was the person we were going to deal with but Yeltsin was a person that we could and should deal with. Getting this message to Washington was, of course, my job, but in terms of effectiveness in communicating the message, nobody could compete with Strauss. I probably achieved more communicating through him than through reporting.

Strauss and Collins were very supportive of my role and my work, which was twofold. First, I was the editor for a huge reporting section, of 16 talented and productive reporting officers who pushed out a lot of reports. We were covering not just events in Moscow and in Russia, but in the Caucasus, Central Asia and Moldova. Our consulates in St Petersburg and Kiev covered lots of territory, but we still had most of the Soviet Union to report on. Members of my team were on the road constantly, and often in very difficult and dangerous situations. I vividly recall receiving a phone call at home in the middle of the night from one of my teams in Tbilisi when the civil war there was in full swing. They were calling from their hotel room in the center of the city, and I could hear the heavy shooting outside and even the impact of rounds on the wall of the hotel; not surprisingly, they were on the floor, but they managed to get a report through to me. This is the kind of work Political/Internal FSOs were engaged in. They routinely met directly with the top figures in the republics, who were eager for contact with the United States, even if that meant a first or even second secretary from our Moscow embassy.

There were many days when the volume of the reporting we sent to Washington was simply exhausting for me. I rarely got home before ten. I tried to be a light editor in some ways, in that I almost never rewrote anyone's text, but I could be a demanding editor in requiring them to rework their own texts to what I considered Moscow standard. Some of my staff produced drafts which required nothing more from me than my initials, with perhaps an occasional suggestion. Others, I regret to say, would turn in a basic draft which they had never bothered even to proofread themselves, depending on me to perform the quality control. This did not amuse me much, especially when I had to deal with this kind of thing several times a day. I found it was, in part, a generational thing. FSOs in their 40s produced drafts of a much higher quality than did the younger colleagues. One talented but erratic younger FSO explained to me that in school she had been taught to get in touch with her feelings rather than how to spell. That may be true, but I still believed that a member of the U.S. Foreign Service should not require a supervisor for things like subject-verb agreement.

The second part of my job, and the part I found most rewarding, was writing longer analytic reports to explain the broader picture of what was happening and what it meant. These are sometimes called "think pieces" in the Service, to distinguish them from normal day-to-day reporting. Now, even our routine political reports usually had a concluding comment paragraph or two explaining what the event meant for the United States. A busy person in Washington could read the summary of an embassy report and then flip to the back for the comment section and skip the main body of the message. Our reports contained the standard "who, what, when, where and why" of good reporting, but also tried to answer the question "so what?" I several times encouraged the entire Political/Internal staff to apply themselves to longer "think piece" analyses, telling them Washington needed multiple points of view about events of this magnitude, but none ever took me up on the offer. In part, I think they all felt they had more than enough to do, but in part I think there was some reticence to put themselves in the shoes of George Kennan, so to speak, and interpret for Washington the broad directions of Russia's future.

For myself, the "big picture" writing was what I found most enjoyable, although time consuming. I could not imagine a context better suited for broad-scale speculative analysis than the collapse of the Soviet Union and, as nobody else seemed interested in the task, I took it on with enthusiasm. It was part of my job, to be sure, but to be in charge of Political/Internal in Moscow was for me not just a challenge but a welcome opportunity. Unfortunately, the only time available for such writing was at night or on weekends (and I worked every Saturday and Sunday through the end of 1991 with the exception of one Sunday I was in Petersburg for consultations). I pulled many all-night drafting sessions in order to produce "think pieces" during this assignment, in part because there were always new and important things to interpret for Washington. The demands of combining my editor day job with my writing job were exhausting, but I always emerged from a solitary nighttime session working on a longer message with a deep sense of personal satisfaction. In part, it is the pure craftsmanship of writing that I love.

I was rather surprised at what I was able to get away with in terms of approvals for my messages. Any policy-relevant message required front-office approval as a matter of course. Often Louis Sell, the Political Minister Counselor, had reservations about some of my views, but he rarely challenged my drafts, as he recognized this kind of writing was inherent to my job. Collins and Strauss were remarkably accommodating in sending in very expansive analyses which had one of their own names at the bottom. I already mentioned my scene setter for the Madrid summit, and there were others during the autumn. Later, when Yeltsin went to Camp David in early 1992 to meet with President Bush, I wrote a message trying to explain the Russian leader. Strauss appended a short paragraph at the end of the message saying he was not sure he agreed with all of the analysis, but wanted Washington to have the benefit of it. How could one not admire an ambassador with that kind of tolerance and self-confidence?

In early November of 1991, I became very frustrated by what I was hearing from Washington about lack of understanding of events in Russia, and especially the dispute between Kolt and Hewitt I mentioned earlier. It seemed incredible to me that Washington could not see that the Soviet Union was within weeks of its end, that they were still debating how to support Gorbachev. I worked out my frustration by writing a real zinger of a message, a report intended to be a bucket of ice water in Washington's face. I deliberately over-wrote the draft in anticipation the front office would tone it down quite a lot; I expected to sacrifice some florid language to get clearance on the basic arguments. Wouldn't you know, Collins and Strauss signed out the whole damn thing with only minor changes. I have a redacted copy of the message here with me, obtained by the Public Television program "Frontline" under Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) several years ago, so I can quote from it openly. The subject line pretty much conveys the tone of the message: The Bolshevik Goetterdaemmerung: End of Empire and Russian Rebirth. It is over 20 paragraphs intended to shock the State Department, or at least whoever might actually read the thing, out of their complacency about Soviet events. The lead paragraph opens with, "Leninism is dead." You get the idea: attract their attention through overstatement.

In the message I made the following arguments, each getting a paragraph or so: Soviet Communism failed due to its own deficiencies and deserved to; "the Soviet government is disappearing before our eyes like a sandcastle at high tide;" Gorbachev's days are numbered, and in days rather than months; "the Russian leadership is slap-happy from the ceaseless torrent of events;" Russian members of parliament "are struggling to determine what their role should be and how to stand up to their dominating (and sometimes domineering) president;" the Russian loss of imperial stature is unprecedented; for most Russians a greater shock than the failure of Soviet power is the independence of Ukraine; however, the separation of Russia and Ukraine will be peaceful, and not like Yugoslavia; while the response of Yeltsin and his team has been "remarkably moderate," "it is simply not in human nature for great empires to proceed graciously into extinction;" Russians "are not humbled by the mess they are in: frustrated, angry, confused, even humiliated – yes; humbled, no. Russians feel deeply their own greatness as a people;" August was not just the end of the Soviet era but "the onset of a dramatically new era in Russian history;" the newly independent states will be "something far less workable and dynamic" than the EU; the new Russian state will be the core of American interests; Russians "want a genuine partnership with America (not tutelage);" "Russia today is looking outward; it may not do so for long if it does not find answers to its problems;" the Marshall Plan is the wrong model for our engagement with the new Russia.

Unfortunately, at this point, the redacted version I have from FOIA blanks out the entire last two pages, which were the recommendations for U.S. policy. I do not cite this message just to demonstrate my own prescience, because Sell, Collins and Strauss all agreed to it. This was not a message of dissent by an individual, of a kind I did later, but of dissent by the Moscow embassy. Sending this message certainly made me feel better, and I heard it received a very wide readership. Who knows? It may actually have done some good in persuading Washington that its preference, a restored Gorbachev with authority over a reformed Soviet Union, was simply not going to happen.

Q: One of the things, I think, for somebody looking at this in later times, is that Gorbachev, back in the establishment in the United States, was a darling.

MERRY: Very much so.

Q: Because he really had started things going. He was a steady force. And for that reason, you can't have two darlings, so Yeltsin was being denigrated. Yeltsin had drinking problems and personality problems, but the point being that he was really being knocked down by the munchkins, the little people in the White House and State Department and all, because their boy was Gorbachev. So this was not just cold analysis. No one would bet on this horse.

MERRY: Of course, it had taken Washington a fairly long time to warm to Gorbachev. Washington had been very skeptical about him for several years. So was I, for that matter. He was not a product of the Brezhnev era for nothing. He gets too much retrospective praise, in my view, because he remained a Leninist in thought and motivations. His biases and ignorance about America were much worse than Reagan's about Russia. Much worse. When American elites finally did adopt Gorbachev and decided he was our boy they, as is often the case with Washington, just went whole hog. Washington so often tends to personalize foreign countries and governments and attaches U.S. policy to foreign leaders as they are on the way out. In late 1991, Washington could not see that, in the historical transformation underway, Gorbachev's time had past. Gorbachev was an immensely important figure; I don't want to denigrate his role in the slightest, but revolutionary changes tend to chew up political leaders at a rapid rate.

Q: Revolutions eat their young, as the phrase goes.

MERRY: Yes, Gorbachev had his time, and then his time was gone. Washington was extremely slow and reluctant to accept that fact. This led to one of the more interesting roles I played before the end of this momentous second half of 1991. During the latter part of November and through December, I was in regular contact with a member of Gorbachev's personal staff, whose identity I will protect. This was a backchannel that was, so far as I recall, not authorized by anybody on either side. Gorbachev's inner team needed somebody they could talk to directly on the American side because they were terribly frustrated that he was constantly receiving phone calls from people in the West, including Washington, telling him to hang in, "we're with you, stick with it, don't resign." This was in December, when Gorbachev's inner circle was telling him to face facts, that it was time to exit the stage. Gorbachev received contrary advice from leading people in Europe and the United States – including people in high government positions. Gorbachev's staff wanted to communicate to somebody who they believed was not part of the problem, and that happened to be me.

I learned, among other things, that a number of senior people in Washington were talking to Gorbachev directly and encouraging him to hold on. These were semi-official communications and constituted policy freelancing directly with Gorbachev. Certainly they were not going through the Department of State or through the embassy. The delicacy of this particular backchannel was that I learned about things emanating from my own government that I wasn't supposed to know about. For me, the key point in this backchannel was to learn when Gorbachev would finally face the inevitable, finally exit the stage. He wanted to wait for a better or more dignified moment, but his own staff told him there was never going to be a graceful moment, and the longer he dragged it out the worse it was going to get. When he finally resigned, Gorbachev had little more than a handful of staff and electricity for a few offices in the Kremlin. If he had waited much longer, I think Yeltsin would have pulled the plug literally.

One of the interesting historical questions I like to raise is exactly when the Soviet Union came to an end. Most people would identify it with Gorbachev's resignation on December 25, 1991. I reject that view as conflating the man with the state. Even at the end, the Soviet Union was more than just one political figure. Within the Soviet constitutional system, Gorbachev was an unelected executive president, but he wasn't an emperor or a king. He wasn't the state and he did not incorporate its sovereignty. My own preference is to look at the juridical origin in the Treaty of Union which created the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in December of 1922. Within the Union Treaty, I see the USSR as an asymmetric federal system, whose cornerstone was the Russian Federation. Other Union republics could come and go without affecting the juridical integrity of the whole – as, indeed, they did over the decades – but the loss of the Russian Republic would remove the heart of the Soviet state. So, in my view, the Soviet Union came to an end when the Russian Federation, at Yeltsin's behest, abrogated the Treaty of Union on December 10, 1991, and the Russian Supreme Soviet confirmed that act. To me, the Soviet Union was a legal nullity two weeks before the world perceived it to be, and Gorbachev's abdication was from a state structure devoid of sovereign authority. This is just my view, and perhaps somewhat pedantic. I know people who agree that Gorbachev's resignation could not terminate the Union, but point to the final session of the USSR Supreme Soviet to vote itself out of existence a couple of days later as the final moment. However, I consider the corpse was dead before it was pronounced dead.

This was not an entirely scholarly issue, as it affected the date of transfer of applicability of all the treaties to which the USSR was party. As it happens, Russia and the other successor states took on those obligations without the West ever much quibbling about what date in December was the date of transfer. It says something about the pace of events that the December 10 Russian abrogation of the Union Treaty passed with almost no international notice. I wrote a short message, in which my comment seemed stirring to me, even if nobody else cared. I said, "The core of the Leninist project, Soviet Russia, is Soviet no longer." I remember that line because I thought it was a very big deal.

In any case, Ukraine held its national referendum on December 1, which overwhelmingly voted to leave the Soviet Union. The other republics, other than some of the Central Asian states, were already gone or going quickly. When Mikhail Gorbachev finally bit the bullet and agreed to his resignation, it was a somewhat tawdry and shabby end to his official political life. Yeltsin was willing to tolerate his rival till then only to maintain his own good reputation with the West.

Yeltsin could have turned the lights out on Gorbachev much earlier. Yeltsin and his counterparts from Belarus and Ukraine had met together in early December and agreed on a new entity they called the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS). They did this in part in response to a last-gasp Gorbachev proposal for a new "Union of Sovereign Republics." The CIS in its origins was just a slap in the face to Gorbachev by the new Russian, Ukrainian and Belarusian leaders. Russia then abrogated the Union Treaty. For all practical purposes, there was no Soviet Union in either substance or form. There was just a man named Gorbachev sitting in an office in the Kremlin.

I must tell you about one absolutely absurd episode during this great historic drama. The agreement to establish the Commonwealth of Independent States specified that its secretariat would be in Minsk. We thought nothing much of this, but somebody in Washington evidently did. The embassy received a telegram from the Foreign Buildings Office in State stopping any further work on the new embassy complex on the logic that the United States would not need such a large diplomatic establishment in Moscow as we would be moving the focus of our diplomacy to Minsk. Really! I am not making this up! People in Washington actually imagined that Minsk was going to be the new metropole of the post-Soviet region. Obviously, this nonsense did not last very long, but it tells you something of what we were dealing with during this period.

Q: I'm looking at time. Why don't we pick this up the next time. 1992.

MERRY: Well, let me just complete the vignette of Gorbachev's denouement. Gorbachev arranged his resignation in conjunction with CNN, and was interviewed by Steve Hearst, the Moscow bureau chief of CNN and a top-notch broadcast journalist. The head of CNN had come over from Atlanta to make this all happen.

MERRY: No, this wasn't Turner. This was Tom Johnson. They did the interview, which was live worldwide, and Gorbachev goes to the desk to sign his letter of resignation and, with supreme irony and appropriateness, there's no ink in the desk pen. Johnson whips out his Meisterstück and that's how Gorbachev signed the letter. Johnson got his pen back, which I understand he still has, that signed Gorbachev's resignation. What could be more appropriate to bring the curtain down on the Soviet Union than an abdication ceremony a couple of weeks after the Soviet Union was already gone and with no ink in the desk pen? It's confirmation of Marx's dictum that history repeats itself. First it's tragedy and then it's farce. This was farce.

Q: We'll pick this up at 1992.

MERRY: At the beginning of 1992, because there were a lot of interesting things that happened for New Year's Eve.

Q: Today is the 25th of May 2010 with Wayne Merry. Wayne, where did we leave off?

MERRY: We are at the end of 1991 in Moscow and the end of the Soviet Union. Gorbachev has just resigned in his famous gesture, finally recognizing reality and stepping aside. I remember those last few days of that year because of a different episode, when the United States Government decided to recognize all of the successor states of the former Soviet Union. This didn't involve, obviously, Russia or the Baltic states and, initially, Washington made a distinction between recognizing all of them and establishing diplomatic relations with only some, though that distinction was swept away within a very short period. We received instructions from Washington to deliver letters from President Bush recognizing these countries, and to do it before midnight on New Year's Eve. We delivered the letters to the Moscow representations of each of these former Soviet republics.

Q: Was anybody home?

MERRY: We called them to make sure that somebody would be home, and they knew what we were bringing. This shouldn't have been too difficult except that, in Washington, they made a hash of the five Central Asian countries, the 'Stans. In the letters, they mixed up the five countries with the respective capital cities and the names of the leaders. Your tax dollars at work. The United States was recognizing five countries and, literally, didn't know which was which. It fell to me to sort this out. At least, I knew which city went with which country and which leader. So, I revised five presidential letters without reference to Washington, although I sent a back channel a few days later to let them know I had done it – never heard a word back, not surprisingly.

Then we divvied the letters up for delivery among a number of embassy staff. For some reason which I cannot recall, I got Moldova and Turkmenistan. I went first to the Moldovan mission, at a place called Kuznetsky Most, where the Soviet foreign ministry had been until after the Second World War. The place was lit up and crowded, because they knew I was bringing their first diplomatic recognition as an independent country. I was greeted like Moses coming down off Mount Sinai. All the staff was there, and they had television cameras, and a huge spread of food and booze, which doubtless had been laid on for New Years. They were obviously going to party all night, and they graciously invited me to stay and participate. But I had to get over to the Turkmen, to deliver their letter. At the Turkmen mission, the place was dark. It was totally dark. I knew they knew I'm coming, so I kept ringing the bell until, finally, from the back of the place, emerged a young man who, it turned out, was the junior-most diplomatic member of the staff. They hadn't had time to check with Niyazov, the big boss in Turkmenistan, whether he wanted to be diplomatically recognized as independent by the United States. For fear of making a mistake, they assigned this role to the most junior member of the staff, and everybody else decamped. As I presented the letter from the President of the United States recognizing his country as independent, this young man looked like I was giving him his death warrant because he assumed he would be the fall guy if it turned out not to be what their leader wanted.

This episode illustrates that not all of the emerging countries from the Soviet collapse were entirely enthusiastic about independence. A number certainly were—the Baltic states, Moldova, Georgia and Armenia, Ukraine—but the farther east you got, the more of a mixed picture it was. Among the Central Asian republics, independence was thrust on them by the circumstance of the Soviet collapse, rather than reflecting a genuine desire for an independent role on the world stage.

Q: It wasn't just the form of it. Actually, I was Kyrgyzstan a little bit later and they were getting more money than was being taken out. They were coming out ahead, as I suspect most of the 'Stans were. They were coming out ahead in this union deal.

MERRY: In addition to the resources from the "Center," for many there were significant security issues. The Central Asian countries were all near Afghanistan, which was still engaged in civil war. Several of them were near Iran. Several had borders with China. They cared deeply about who would provide them security and what would be their future—not so much their future as countries, but their future as ruling elites. This was, I think, uppermost in their minds in those capitals. I mention the contrast between the way I was received by the Moldovan and by the Turkmen missions to demonstrate this was a somewhat contradictory experience across the length and breadth of the Soviet empire.

Q: What was happening to some of your colleagues that were recognizing? I take it the big ones were happy. It was the 'Stans which were problematic.

MERRY: In most cases, it was fairly straightforward. I think my experience with Turkmenistan was the only one where the attitude was, "Please leave the letter and we'll get back to you."

Q: They had good reason. They had a guy who outdid Stalin.

MERRY: Yes, that was the problem with the Turkmen. They had no way of reading Niyazov's mind. Since they couldn't get instructions in time, they didn't want to refuse to receive a letter from the President of the United States, but, on the other hand, they weren't sure what the consequences would be.

Q: They could always say, "Well, the young man acted on his own and here's his head."

MERRY: Yes, that's what he thought. That's exactly what he thought.

Speaking of fear, there is another vignette from that December which has remained in my memory which illustrates why people who are nostalgic for the Soviet Union – including some in the West – are wrong. In mid-December, Isaac Stern came to Moscow in his first visit to his native country in a quarter century. He played two events. The first was a concert in the Great Hall of the Conservatory, which was packed to the rafters – even I had trouble getting a seat on the benches in the balcony. Then he did a recital in a small hall in the Pushkin Museum, which could seat only a couple of hundred. For that event, I had two tickets. As it happened, Secretary Baker was arriving that day, and I was the only person at the embassy willing to blow off the Secretary of State for Isaac Stern. I went to the back entrance of the museum before the event, where there was a crowd of music lovers hoping to catch a glimpse of the great violinist, and picked out an older gentleman to go inside with me. He was stunned, but initially delighted. We were third row on the center aisle. It turned out he was a Jewish amateur violinist, for whom Stern was almost the Messiah. So, this should have been a wonderful evening for him. However, when he learned I was from the American Embassy, the classic fear of association with foreign officials overcame him. He was genuinely scared someone might report him and he would get into political trouble. Mind you, this was within days of the end of the Soviet Union, but habits endure. During the intermission he stayed as far away from me as he could and left in haste as soon as the recital was over. The poor man should have enjoyed one of the finest evenings of his life, but it was spoiled for him by the fear he could not overcome of sitting next to a diplomat. I imagine everyone who ever lived in the Soviet Union has similar stories to demonstrate the sickness of the political system, but this one is particularly strong for me as it occurred when Soviet power was already finished. For this old man, the fear lived on.

Q: Leading up to this, was there a point when all of a sudden you said, "You know, the Soviet Union is going to fall apart?" Or did that gradually evolve? I'm saying before it actually happened. At our embassy.

MERRY: We discussed that at some length last time. Certainly, in my own mind and that of some of my colleagues, it was clear in August the Soviet Union was falling apart. This was an imperial power system which collapsed, rather than succumbing to conquest by foreigners or overthrown from within. I thought, in August and early September of 1991, the Soviet Union would probably survive, in some truncated shape, through the winter. I thought it would last until the spring of '92. That was optimistic; in fact, of course, it was gone sooner than that. But the question in most of our minds was not whether, but how quickly and with what ramifications? With how much broken crockery? What would be the consequences in terms of disruption, destabilization, and problems, not just for the countries involved, but for the outside world?

The uncertainties affected daily life at the most basic levels. I will give you an example from my own experience. As the economy deteriorated during the autumn of 1991—which it did very quickly—a lot of people in Moscow who had dogs couldn't afford to keep them and feed them, and so just let them go. The dogs reverted to genetic type and formed packs, and went out hunting to survive. In a big city like Moscow, that could be perilous. One evening in early November, I came home quite late, just before the Metro closed, so about one in the morning, and was walking from the Metro station to my apartment building. There wasn't a soul in sight, and it was snowy and cold, early winter. About a hundred yards from the gate to my building a group of seven or eight dogs spotted me and decided I was dinner. They started coming after me. I'm not much of a sprinter, but I want you to know that I ran like hell. As I got close to the gate, I yelled ahead to the Russian guard on duty. He stuck his head out of his little booth, saw what was happening, came out quickly, and got the gate open just enough for me to leap through – and I mean leap through – and he then slammed the gate closed and dropped the latch, as those dogs ran up against the chain-link fence. Not my favorite Moscow experience, by a long shot. I mention it because there were other people in Moscow that winter, particularly the elderly and the inebriated, who didn't get away from those dog packs.

Q: I might point out something that surprised me in my short time in Kyrgyzstan, how many very large dogs. We're not talking about little Yorkshire terriers and all. I take it it was a sign of accomplishment. The bigger the dog, the fancier you were or something.

MERRY: Oh, indeed. Exactly. It was in these last months of 1991 that I first started seeing, for example, serious breadlines. Long lines of people at the bread store, including the store where I bought bread, because of shortages and rumors. People started seriously working the land on their dachas or even new land they were pioneering outside the city, to grow some of their own foodstuffs because they were genuinely concerned about what would happen.

Something that tends to be overlooked when people make an historical or retrospective examination of an event like the collapse of the Soviet Union is the things which did not happen, but might have and which occupied a great deal of the time and concern of governments. During the final months of 1991 and into the following year, the embassy and Washington were concerned about potential developments which, in the event, did not develop, but would have been damn important if they had. At the top of our list was what was called “loose nukes,” meaning the danger that nuclear weapons might fall into the wrong hands, be sold to terrorist groups abroad or simply be compromised in their security in the chaotic conditions associated with the Soviet breakup. In fact, the Soviet and post-Soviet militaries which had possession of these weapons exercised stringent controls over them. That was not the case with many of the huge stockpiles of chemical and biological weapons and with nuclear materials other than actual weapons. They could not control all the fissile materials, related technologies, and the personnel with nuclear expertise, but they held onto the nuclear weapons with great responsibility.

We also worried about “warlordism,” that some generals out in the provinces might try to seize local power and set themselves up as feudal lords or provoke the further breakup of the Russian Federation. There was particular concern this might happen in the Russian Far East. However, except for the start of the secessionist movement in Chechnya, in November of 1991, this phenomenon was entirely absent during the Soviet collapse.

There was also concern in Washington, although less in the embassy, about a massive social breakdown leading to large-scale hunger or even mass migration by millions of people westward into Europe seeking food. None of that happened, although the worry in Washington led to a little-remembered effort called “Operation Provide Hope” in which large quantities of surplus U.S. military rations were airlifted into Russia and neighboring countries to supplement local food stocks. This was, in the event, a program looking for a problem rather than being a genuine solution, as reserves in Russia were adequate. The Soviet Union maintained huge stockpiles of commodities of all kinds. In many localities, our representatives were assured the donated products would be put to good use, but were not really needed. The gesture was a genuine one and conveyed the right impression, even if it reflected a tendency in Washington to see the problems of post-Soviet countries in terms of historical analogies which were often irrelevant. Within the embassy I dubbed the program “Operation Provide Photo Op” because it was used by Washington to portray a much more active American engagement with Russia than actually existed. I personally advocated a program to provide a daily vitamin supplement to every school child, hospital patient and elderly person in the country, to counteract the real problem of vitamin deficiency, but this was not something the U.S. government had in surplus.

Looking back, I think the most important dog that did not bark during the night of the Soviet collapse was active politicization of the military. There was nothing like what happened in Weimar Germany, no “Stahlhelm” (steel helmet) movement, although there were a few field-grade officers who tried to inspire something like it and failed utterly. There was nothing like the role of the French military in politics after Algeria, no OAS (Secret Army Organization). Thank God, there was nothing like the role played by the military in the breakup of Yugoslavia. Within Russia, Ukraine and Belarus, the post-Soviet militaries retained their non-political professionalism. That was not the case in Georgia, where there was a vicious civil war, or in the war between Armenia and Azerbaijan over Nagorno-Karabakh, or in the developing Tajik civil war. However, in the Slavic core of the disintegrating empire, civilian control of the military prevailed. This was one of the positive legacies of Leninism, the subordination of the military to political authority. This useful principle survived largely intact through the Soviet imperial collapse, which was really an extraordinary thing given the many historical precedents to the contrary in other countries. I have long thought that Western commentators are remiss in not acknowledging this positive aspect of the Soviet military. It was, in large measure, the unwillingness of the military to be dragged into politics which made the August 1991 putsch fail. Had the Soviet army leadership really wanted to perpetuate the Soviet Union, it could have done so for some years, until the final collapse would have been a more destructive process, and bloodier, than what we experienced. So, just a tip of the hat to the Soviet men in uniform who through their political passivity made our world a better place.

Then, in the early weeks of 1992, when the new Russian government abolished price controls, the country experienced massive inflation. This was not what I consider hyper-inflation but rather mega-inflation. To me, hyper-inflation is when the rate of increase of inflation goes up continuously, in logarithmic progression. In Russia there was inflation of a couple of thousand percent in the first few months, and then a sharp leveling off to more moderate levels of inflation. To me that's mega-inflation, it's not hyper-inflation, but certainly it destroyed the savings of almost everybody in the country. I knew a case of a little old lady who didn't have any family, who'd been saving out of her pension for years for a church funeral when she died. I think it was about 600 rubles she had saved up, which of course was turned to nothing by the inflation. So, this poor woman, who had suffered loss and indignities almost beyond number, starting in the '30s, through the War and the post-war period, now at the end of her life had one last injustice and indignity levied on her. That sort of thing happened to enormous numbers of people.

The winter of 1991-92 was a very difficult one for many people. The basic life support systems of the society did not fail. Food was still delivered and, for the most part, power and heat and water continued. But things got pretty dicey. Most industrial enterprises and many other places of employment failed because they had been living off of state subsidies and that money ended. Very large numbers of people either were out of work or were still employed but were not paid or paid in some kind of product. There was the onset of massive asset stripping by new entrepreneurs, including the later "oligarchs," who discovered they could make more money in many factories by stripping the copper wiring out of the machines and selling it abroad than operating the production lines.

This was a difficult period, not just for the economy but, of course, for ordinary people. Moscow, being the capital, was less adversely affected than many of the several hundred cities in Russia that have only a single employer, a town built around one factory. In Moscow, with a much more diversified economy and with the government, things were not as difficult. During this period large numbers of elderly people went onto the streets to sell their possessions—antiques or something they had kept in the family for generations—and even beg. These were not socially marginal people but often from fairly successful middle-class backgrounds, whose income was now reduced to the government pension, which was woefully inadequate due to the inflation, and who didn't have any other means of survival. I kept money in my outer coat pocket for old ladies who were reduced to begging on the streets in the dead of winter.

During this period I wrote a longish cable – I cannot recall what the subject line was – trying to explain to Washington how different this new Russia was from the old Soviet Russia. I had personal knowledge of both, with a lot of on-the-street experience which convinced me that there was absolutely no going back. This was a point of serious concern in Washington, a return of Soviet power and institutions, but I had seen the Soviet collapse and knew the credibility of the Leninist project could not be restored. If nothing else, there were no resources for a restoration. What was very unclear was what kind of Russia was going to develop. I pointed to things that had never existed in the Soviet period which now shaped life in the new Russia, things like free media and real exchange and interest rates, plus the younger people – by which I mean under 30 or even under 40 – were simply not willing to let the clock turn back. The future looked pretty grim, however, during this difficult winter and average people wanted to see some tangible progress. About this time, Yeltsin stated publicly that if Russians worked very hard they might be able in five years to live like Poles did then. I thought that was a pretty realistic assessment: no quick fix and no easy transition. In fact, it was optimistic.

Q: Did you note a change in the effectiveness of the government? Did corruption increase? Did you get something from the government or was it a more benevolent attitude on the part of people?

MERRY: With the end of the Soviet Union most Soviet state institutions were incorporated within the government of the Russian Federation. It was a whale swallowed by a minnow. In other parts of the Soviet Union, All-Union institutions broke apart and remained with various successor republics. Many individuals had to make a choice as to their new nationality. This was often a very difficult choice. I knew people whose ethnicity may have been Ukrainian or Azeri or Moldovan or Kyrgyz, but whose professions militated that they should stay in Russia, either in Moscow or Petersburg or somewhere else, because that's where their lives were, that's where their families were, that's where their careers were. But they had to make a choice, and this was not always an obvious or an easy choice. If you're a Ukrainian living in Moscow, should you pick up and go back to Kiev and seek to create a new identity for yourself in an independent Ukraine? Or should you maintain your sense of commitment to whatever it was you had been doing previously in Moscow? You had ceased to be Soviet, but now what were you?

This was a particularly serious issue for the military and the security services. Where is your loyalty? The great slogan of all of these institutions, for generations, had been "Sluzu Sovetskoyu Soiuzu" (I serve the Soviet Union). Now, if you were in the army, or air force, or Ministry of the Interior, or KGB, you no longer serve the Soviet Union. Where is your loyalty? For some, that might be defined by nationality. I knew a man who was a Soviet Navy submarine commander but was Moldovan. Obviously he wasn't going to be able to operate submarines for the new Moldova, but he chose to go back to Chisinau and develop a new military identity for Moldova, despite his own background as a naval officer. For a lot of people Russia became the substitute for the Soviet Union; Russia, as the core of the Soviet Union, and Russia, as the historic imperial great power, attracted the loyalties of a lot of people whose ethnicity was something else. For several years, Russia's deputy minister of foreign affairs in charge of dealing with the United States was an ethnic Azeri. The later Russian ambassador to the United States, Sergei Kislyak, is Ukrainian on both sides of his family. These issues were not just the product of the collapse of the Soviet Union. They often were the detritus of the Russian imperial project itself, in which the questions "What am I?" and "What do I want to be?" and "Where do my ultimate loyalties pull me?" were common dilemmas. In 1992 these questions were imposed on millions of people almost overnight. Many had to make very difficult and often very disruptive choices, not just for themselves but for their families. They had to bet on where they thought they would have a better future. For many ethnic Russians in other republics, this meant abandoning what had been "home" for many years, even generations, to return to a Russian "home" which was entirely new to them, and without employment or housing. Often the experience was a form of involuntary emigration, with all the attendant disruptions and stress.

Most of the institutions where people worked, including the military, were broke. There wasn't any money to pay salaries. There certainly wasn't any money in the military for things like fuel for training or operations or almost anything. There was at least one instance of actual starvation in a military unit in the Far East. The crisis ranged from august institutions like the Academy of Sciences down to primary and secondary schools, to the people who provided basic hygiene services in hospitals, and the people who manned the fire stations. These were people who didn't know where their next paychecks were coming from or what those paychecks would buy. It was an extraordinarily disruptive period for all of the peoples involved.

In some areas, it was also a violent period. In Moldova, in the Transnistria region; in the conflict between Armenia and Azerbaijan over Nagorno-Karabakh; in the gathering disputes in Georgia both among Georgians and with ethnic minorities; and worst of all in the developing civil war in Tajikistan. The break-up of the Soviet Union is often portrayed as bloodless. That was essentially true within the three Slavic core states. It was certainly not true around the edges of the Soviet Union, where there was more than ample bloodshed, creating situations which either took years to resolve or, indeed, never have been resolved. It was a bloodless end of empire for the imperial Metropole, but not for the periphery of the empire.

Q: What was our embassy doing? In the first place, we had a consulate in Kiev but that was about it, wasn't it?

MERRY: One of the first challenges the U.S. Government faced was how it was going to establish tangible diplomatic relations with all the successor countries, which meant to establish embassies. This is a fascinating story, to which I was more of an on-looker than a participant. Other than losing a third of my staff in Political/Internal, I played no direct role. As I understood, the State Department did not have the money to establish new posts, did not want to go to Congress for the resources, and got the money by making deals with the intelligence agencies and the Pentagon. The State Department decided it would take on this formidable task within existing budget resources, which meant it never would have been done without financing from other parts of the government. This shows what a nickel-and-dime institution the American foreign ministry can be.

Q: Apparently, Secretary of State Baker did this. Many people felt it to be a really terrible mistake. It's the sort of thing you can make in Washington. He had no feel for the operations of the State Department.

MERRY: None at all. They put out word for adventuresome people to open embassies in 10 new places. The consulate in Kiev became an embassy, so that was fairly straightforward. There were already people establishing embassies in the Baltic States, but then there were all of the others. This was done faster and better, with the posts open and effective, than I would have expected. I thought it was going to take half a year, if not a year, and for the first six months or so, that most of the actual reporting would go through Moscow. I was wrong. In point of fact, these little vest-pocket embassies established their individual identities and their direct reporting vis-à-vis Washington very quickly. They did so in part because they saw the importance of avoiding the appearance of going through the embassy in Moscow which, in retrospect, was quite valid. They also understood that, if they were going to be effective, they had to function on their own. Most initially worked out of hotel rooms. They did, I must say, an extraordinary job.

This process had a big impact on me, as some of my reporting staff was taken to help staff these new embassies plus the opening of our consulate in Vladivostok. Some of my most talented people went to other posts, where their talents were needed. Pol/Int still had a dozen people, of course, so we were hardly impoverished. While my resources declined, at the same time my reporting responsibilities declined, since we were no longer responsible for reporting on internal affairs in Tajikistan or Moldova or Georgia. There was a transition period when we still covered remnants of the Soviet Union while the U.S. Government was getting squared away to deal with each of them separately. I hope the colleagues who opened these embassies didn't feel they were condescended to by the big mother embassy in Moscow. However, the fact remained that, for most of the U.S. Government, the relationship with Russia was not first among equals, it was just first. The others were not equal.

The principal priority for Secretary Baker and the Bush Administration was to get the nuclear arsenal and nuclear resources of the former Soviet Union under single-party custodianship, meaning Russia's. Baker's great diplomatic achievement was to strong-arm and cajole and persuade the new governments of Belarus, Ukraine and Kazakhstan to surrender all of their nuclear weapons and delivery systems to Russia in return for various commitments and support from the United States. This was a stupendous diplomatic accomplishment, one of the most important ever carried out by a Secretary of State. Although I do not like the man, I think Baker merited a Nobel Peace Prize for the denuclearization of the three post-Soviet states. Without him, it might not have happened. He then persuaded all of the successor states to sign on to a variety of international agreements, some which the countries did not understand, such as the human rights and civil liberties commitments under the OSCE (Organization for Security and Co-Operation in Europe). Some of the new governments signed those documents without reading them and without any notion they would have obligations to fulfill. The Russian Government, as the successor to the Soviet Union, took those commitments much more seriously. We had an internal debate whether the Central Asian states, and perhaps those in the Caucasus, should even be invited into the OSCE, as they manifestly were not part of Europe. I thought it a bad idea, but the desire to tug them away from Iran or China was dominant among policymakers.

With the breakup of the Soviet Union, the Joint Chiefs of Staff were very concerned about what would happen not just to nuclear systems but to the vast inventories of weapons and munitions of the Soviet military scattered across eleven time zones. They wanted to deal on key issues with only one counterpart, their Russian counterparts. The senior Russian military were people the Chiefs respected, with whom there were some good personal relationships. Probably the most pro-Russian group in Washington at the time was the Joint Chiefs. The anti-Russian centers in Washington clustered on Capitol Hill, where ethnic groups not only wanted to support the newly independent states but to take an anti-Russian approach as well. Yeltsin's government in Moscow was as accommodating with the imperial breakup as it could reasonably have been expected to be. Yeltsin's own view was the sooner Russia got the other countries off Russia's back, Russia could stop pouring resources into those places and, hence, the sooner would come some kind of prosperity for Russia. If anything, Yeltsin was happy to cut bait.

Within Yeltsin's team, and within the broader Russian elites, there was an understanding that it wasn't going to be so simple or easy. They knew their own country, especially its weaknesses. The states of the former Soviet Union were tied together by much more than historical experience, but also by infrastructure and by enterprises that depended on other enterprises across new political frontiers. There were immense disruptions when nobody knew who was in charge of an enterprise and who had legal authority in many areas. For example, there were only two pharmaceutical facilities producing sulfa drugs in the whole Soviet Union. One of them was in Azerbaijan. Because of the disruption of the Azeri economy with the breakup of the Soviet Union, that plant stopped producing, which meant people actually died. People in hospitals and clinics died because there was a shortage of sulfa-based pharmaceuticals to deal with infections. Likewise, there was only one factory for computer punch cards in the entire Soviet Union, in Lithuania, where independence separated it from most of its traditional customers.

In December 1991 I traveled with Bob Clarke of the Science Section to Syktyvkar, the capital of the Komi Republic, about 1,000 kilometers north of Moscow. The Komi is a region very rich in natural resources, but the problem they faced was how to market what they had. In a series of meetings, including with the republic president, the range of their difficulties seemed almost beyond human capacity, and this was a region with many advantages. We met an informal trader from Latvia in the bar of our hotel, who gave us a vivid description of his business, which was barter trade of sausage from Latvia for rare metals from the Komi. It was pretty basic, but it worked. On another trip, to the Solovetsky Islands in the middle of the White Sea, I stayed with a man seeking to develop tourism in these northern islands. There was much to attract people, including one of the most stunning monastery-fortress complexes I have ever seen plus Stone Age relics and the site of the very first Soviet political prison. His key challenge was getting fuel in this remote locale, which he managed through a chance encounter with a bureaucrat who had connections in the fuels ministry. All this was very primitive in market terms, but it was also taking place without any basis in legality. In Soviet law, almost all private enterprise, even of the most primitive variety, was illegal, and the political culture regarded private initiative with great suspicion. There was no corpus of commercial law, just the traditions of Soviet law which were hostile to business. Nobody could say what could be done, let alone how it should be done. Obviously, the door was opening for enterprising people, but also for unscrupulous and ruthless people.

There were many, many instances of disruption across the new borders. People wanted to continue their work and to produce and be paid, but nobody knew who was going to pay the bills, who could sign a document. The ruble was the single currency for Russia and many other countries, but the viability of the ruble was in question because of inflation. It was not a convertible currency with the West, only within the so-called "ruble zone." The rapid loss of value of the ruble was a problem well beyond Russia, for other countries which used the ruble, including enterprises and individuals. Finance ministries and state banks in the new states were more a matter of theory than of reality. Most enterprises had been centrally-planned and centrally-funded organizations in the Soviet period where management did not even use double-entry bookkeeping. Here were a dozen countries with no corpus of commercial law. Who owned anything? Who could make trade commitments with anybody abroad? These were enormously complex and difficult problems that were, of course, all emerging simultaneously.

One evening, Jim Collins and I paid a call on General Dmitry Volkogonov, a prominent army historian who had become anti-Soviet during the late Gorbachev years and was a senior advisor to Yeltsin. He later produced a groundbreaking series of books on Lenin and Stalin based on his unique access to archives. A really insightful man. He told us that Russia's basic challenge was that it needed good people in every field – politics, business, law, education, administration, you name it – and there simply were not enough good people to go around. This meant the transition would, of necessity, be carried out by inadequate people and the result would be far short of what people hoped for and expected. I think he got it dead right: there simply were not enough good people for all the demands of such a great historical transition, not in Russia and not in the other countries either.

Q: Was there at all a change in the role of the embassy officers becoming almost consultants or colleagues?

MERRY: Parts of the embassy became intermediaries between Washington agencies and Russian counterparts. Embassy staff were spending a lot of time within Russian bureaucratic institutions. CIA officers were actually conducting meetings with the KGB, something previously almost unthinkable. People in the Political/External Section who dealt with Russian foreign policy had meetings in the Russian Foreign Ministry of a kind that would have been unimaginable in earlier times. One guy was even taken into one of the ministry's classified typing rooms, something that would never happen in Washington. The Economics and Science Sections were loaded down with visiting delegations and with taskings from Washington to establish contacts and programs. For Political/Internal, it was more a matter of reporting and analysis, though we in some ways had even more access to people who made and influenced policy. We met with most of the top people around Yeltsin. We had relatively few programmatic duties at that point, though we did support programs in legal affairs and in rule of law. Heaven knows, Political/Internal had enough Washington visitors, but nothing like the burden on other sections.

The role of the United States in policy formulation in Russia eclipsed that of all other governments and multilateral institutions and, at times, went much too far. I do not mean to say that the ultimate responsibility for policies did not rest with Yeltsin and his team; certainly, it did. But it is difficult to overemphasize the influence and the intrusiveness of American official and semi-official activities in all aspects of Russian public policy. Much of this influence came through multilateral institutions, like the IMF and World Bank, but it was American influence just the same. To all intents and purposes, the United States was the primary external source of influence on the Russian reform process. I know quite well that other countries were involved and sometimes had better programs and advice than we did, but all other countries combined did not exercise anything like the influence we did. Everyone understood this. Countries like Germany, Britain and Japan were largely guided by what the United States did, and their embassies in Moscow always wanted to know what we thought and how we planned to proceed.

The pervasiveness of the American role was, in my view even at the time, as much a curse as a blessing. A more multi-national approach would have been better, with Europe more in the lead than ourselves. The Europeans had more realistic expectations of reform in Russia than did Washington, with American faith in the miracles of macroeconomic stabilization and the ideology of the “Washington consensus.” Americans also approached post-Soviet Russia with far too heavy a hand, with arrogance and often a missionary mentality. The consequences of that period live on today, as many Russians blame us for the failures of reform in the '90's and believe we deliberately set out to ruin their economy. We forgot that it is basic human nature to resent dependency, which is why teenagers rebel against their parents. A great nation like Russia could not experience this foreign tutelage – and that is what it was for several years – without building up a reservoir of resentment. Russians are perhaps more likely than many other peoples to blame their troubles and shortcomings on someone else, and the United States almost went out of its way to assume that role.

One of my colleagues in Moscow recently reminded me of something I had forgotten from 1992. At a G-7 summit meeting, the United States more or less dictated to the Russians the terms under which they would receive large-scale Western assistance. Keep in mind, we were giving them a lot of money with little assurance of how it would be used, this was an assistance program. In a staff meeting of Political/Internal, I commented, “They will never forgive us for this.” I felt the humiliation would last longer than the money. While covered in good intentions, much of our assistance efforts from that period achieved little while leaving behind a thick residue of resentment.

In the Political/Internal Section, we were not operationally involved with U.S. assistance policy, so our views about how to interact with the Russians on reform were pretty much ignored. The one area where we were directly involved was in judicial cooperation, as the embassy link for programs of the American Bar Association and the Justice Department with Russian counterparts. This was quite useful, as it opened doors for us in the courts, in judicial training centers, and with legal reformers. We learned a lot from that. Personally, I got to know the Chairman of the Constitutional Court, Valery Zorkin, who had great hopes and plans for judicial progress in Russia. He told me he wanted to be remembered as the John Marshall of Russia. While things took some odd turns for him later, Zorkin still is a very important figure in legal reform in that country.

In terms of Russian political figures, in the government or in the legislature, we had access that was almost unprecedented, not just in Russia but in most of the other new countries. I several times told my staff this couldn't last. As I mentioned earlier, we had better access in Moscow during those months than the U.S. Embassy would have in Ottawa. I told people, including Washington visitors, “This is not natural. This is a transitional phase, and we should be careful because this is all about Russia’s weakness. The Russians will remember their weakness and they won’t remember kindly those who they perceive as taking advantage of the weakness.” A large part of the problem was that Moscow was now flooded by visitors from Washington and from other Western countries, with their advice, counsel, opinions. Russians soon called it “assistance tourism,” and they were right. Russia particularly attracted advocates of the “Washington consensus,” a neoliberal economic doctrine blending macroeconomic stabilization and reforms—so-called shock therapy—which was pushed on the Russians with religious zeal combined with almost total oblivious ignorance and disregard for Russian realities.

It’s fair to say that many of the Russian architects of economic policy during this period were already sold on the neoliberal program. They didn’t need it to be forced down their throats. However, the fact remains that the U.S. Treasury and the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank and others, particularly associated with Harvard University, regarded post-Soviet Russia as a gigantic laboratory for macroeconomic experimentation, while their knowledge of the conditions of the laboratory and its occupants was extremely shallow. This was not just a matter of comprehension, but of lack of human empathy. After seven decades of Soviet-style political and economic mismanagement, the problems were deeply entrenched and intractable, meaning the transition to something else would be enormously complicated and time-consuming. The human costs were a topic the ideologues swept aside with masterly derision. I heard some pretty vicious jokes about things like little old ladies freezing to death, which was not a joke to me as I actually saw those old women on the streets every day. The advocates of the “Washington consensus” had their ideology, which they believed was applicable everywhere on earth and, with just the right amount of shock therapy, Russia would, in a short period of time, emerge as a practicing, viable market economy.

They ignored little things, like the fact Russian enterprises didn’t even use double-entry bookkeeping. There was no basis for contract law, there was no ability to enforce any kind of an economic agreement in a court system. I recalled that Margaret Thatcher used to say the basis of capitalism is not money but enforceable contract. The means by which agreements were conducted in Russia were personal relationships, handshake deals and occasional violence. The neo-liberals had very little sense that Russia was, as a market economy, extremely primitive, even though it had a highly-literate workforce, massive industrial infrastructure and modern technology in many areas. The truism is that Russia was neither developed nor underdeveloped. It was mis-developed. Policy mechanisms that might work in a developed country would not in a mis-developed country. We had no relevant policies, so we used ones we thought applied to everyone, everywhere.

The embassy was very much at the center of this issue. This initiated a conflict which would develop in the following years—for me especially in 1993-94 and for those who came later—a fundamental division within the embassy between people who knew something about Russia and those sent out to enforce the “Washington consensus” policy. This is getting ahead of things, because it happened mostly in the third year of my assignment. In the first two years, there were excellent professional relations within the embassy, thanks to Ken Yalowitz, the economics counselor, with whom it is almost impossible to have a bad relationship. Then Washington sent out ideologues to run the Economics Section. The conflict was also within the Economics

Section, because there were very talented younger people there, who did know Russia, who were also skeptical about the policies we were pushing. It became a conflict of those associated with the Treasury, International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, with the “old Russia hands,” of whom I was one, who were not just skeptical but increasingly opposed to the policy.

However, looking back on the very early post-Soviet period, I am struck by the intensity of embassy activity from late 1991 through the fall of 1993. Russia's transformation in every area of public policy created work for us, as the embassy was responsible for following, reporting and explaining everything to Washington. Much of that was, of course, in the political area. The dynamic of 1991 and the breakup of the Soviet Union, continued on into the following years. In addition to the real events were the rumors and scares. I don't know how many false alarms there were of new coups, which Washington always treated seriously as many people there expected Yeltsin to fail quickly. There was a bizarre episode in early 1992 when a coalition of die-hard communists announced a rally at which they were going to “restore the Soviet Union.” This was ludicrous, but Washington heard about it and perceived a serious threat to Yeltsin. We were under intense pressure—“What's happening? What's happening?” We eventually produced eight reporting telegrams on this non-event, four or five in advance and three or four in the aftermath. In the normal course of things this rally would have justified one reporting message. The same Washington which had denied the reality of the oncoming Soviet collapse now anticipated Russian collapse on almost a weekly basis. We devoted serious reporting to this silly matter for over a week, trying to get Washington to calm down.

During that winter, there were so many false alarms I became quite blasé about them. On one occasion, I behaved pretty irresponsibly. During these months, Washington had the very bad habit of phoning us in Moscow without regard for the time difference, so we were always getting calls in the middle of the night. I know Jim Collins, as deputy chief of mission, rarely went through a night without a phone call from the NSC or the State Department or somebody. In his own self-defense, he told the State Department Operations Center (which he had once directed) that, when it was about Russian domestic affairs, to call me. I didn't entirely appreciate this move, but I could understand it. On one occasion I got a call about four o'clock in the morning from the Operations Center, because some office in the Department had heard there was a coup d'état going on in Moscow. The Ops Center didn't see anything about it on the wire services or other sources. There was nothing on it, no intel, but they wanted to check with me. I told the guy, “OK, hold the phone.” I went into my kitchen, which looked down on October Square and the intersection of Leninsky Prospekt with the Garden Ring road. This is one of the major traffic intersections in the city, particularly for traffic leading toward the center, toward the Kremlin. A headquarters building of the Interior Ministry was across the square from my building. I stood there for a few minutes, watching absolutely nothing going on, and decided there was no way anyone could conduct a serious coup in Moscow without some activity at that intersection. So I picked up the phone and told the watch officer in Washington, “Nope, no coup in Moscow,” and went back to bed. The next day, I got in touch with the Operations Center and found out the whole thing was the result of an article in a magazine about the potential for a coup in Russia which a senior official (whom I will not name) had read over the weekend. This had evolved through staff layers into a belief a coup was going on that night. For this, I lost valuable sleep.

I probably should have checked more thoroughly before dismissing this rumor to Washington. If I had been wrong, it would have been really embarrassing. By this point, however, I had become pretty short-tempered with nonsense when there were so many really important things going on. I could also be short-tempered with visitors from Washington, of which we had an unending stream. Embassy working conditions were still very primitive, and many visitors demanded almost constant hand-holding and special services. I recall one visitor who had a fit because there was no towel service at the embassy swimming pool; I pointed him to a paper towel dispenser. It got to the point where, again in his own self-defense, Jim Collins made sure that whenever Baker or somebody like that was in town, I was assigned to maintain our reporting. I was not assigned to control officer duty because I could be less than hospitable. This was just fine by me, because it allowed me to continue doing what I considered to be the serious work of Political/Internal. I was control officer often enough later on. To keep some balance in this self criticism, I certainly did yeoman's service in briefing visiting officials and journalists every day.

On many days I gave multiple backgrounders to American journalists and officials, and it was a rare day I did not have to devote an hour or more to briefing visitors of some kind. I had done many backgrounders in previous assignments, especially in Athens where there were no resident American journalists, but nothing like what I did in Moscow. It was not unusual to give two, three or even four a day. This reflected the masses of American journalists coming to Moscow, almost all of whom wanted an embassy backgrounder on the Russian political scene, while even the resident journalists wanted to keep up with the embassy viewpoint. I spoke with many non-Americans as well. For the most part, I like journalists and see them as friendly competitors to our diplomatic reporting. I also think an embassy profits from trading notes with knowledgeable resident journalists, of which Moscow had a lot in those days. In any case, I considered that we were not just working for the State Department or even the government, but for the American public which had a right to know what we thought was happening in Russia, even if they got it second hand through journalists. Some of my embassy colleagues disliked or at least did not accommodate journalists, so much of this work came to me. It was a burden, but I thought then and still think it was among the more valuable things I did, in influencing how the American media presented these events to our own public.

There were fringe benefits to not being a control officer very often. It gave me at least an iota of a life outside the embassy, for some time with my Russian friends and to enjoy the wonderful classical music life of Moscow. There was no place in that huge city I valued more than the Great Hall of the Conservatory, one of the great concert halls of the world. I had a fistful of concert series subscriptions, which were dirt cheap on a dollar income, but I was unable to use most of the tickets due to press of work. However, any evening I could break away from the embassy would find me in the lap of Russia's magnificent musical traditions. I already mentioned the visit by Isaac Stern in December 1991. For many Russians, this was the musical event of the decade. The Horowitz visit marked the 80's and the Stern visit the 90's. His concert in the Great Hall was defended by three cordons of police to control gate crashers. It was a wonderful evening. I already described how his later recital in a smaller venue was bittersweet. For my money, you can have James Baker any day, but Isaac Stern in Moscow was a once in a lifetime opportunity. There was later a visit by the National Symphony from Washington under Rostropovich with the young Ignat Solzhenitsyn as soloist in the first Shostakovich piano concerto. They also did the Shostakovich Ninth Symphony, which Rostropovich had first heard at the Moscow premier shortly after the War. A magical evening, including a conversation I had afterwards with Rostropovich. It is experiences of that kind which make a Foreign Service life really special.

I was not able to travel in Russia in my second assignment even remotely as much as in the first; that was a burden of my position. However, the opening up of the country to the outside world did offer some opportunities I was able to take advantage of. We opened a new consulate in Vladivostok, with a huge consular district that was almost entirely new territory for the United States. Our two-man team out there did terrific work in showing the flag and finding investment opportunities for American business. I made one trip in the Russian Far East in the company of Randy LeCocq, our principle officer in Vladivostok and an old colleague. It was in the dead of winter, but we visited a number of cities, including Komsomolsk-na-Amure, where the local authorities told us we were the first Americans ever to set foot in the place. Komsomolsk is a large military-industrial city, which was desperate for foreign investment, so they really let us see a lot. The change of pace from my desk in Moscow was just wonderful. I also led an embassy survey team to Yekaterinburg in the Urals to determine if that city should be the site of our next, and final, Russian consulate. This was the city where Yeltsin had been party boss for many years and the center of the Urals industrial region. It was a fascinating place, with much more in the way of history than most Soviet cities. It had been tightly closed to Westerners when it was still called Sverdlovsk, so the only proper accommodation they had for us was Yeltsin's former dacha. I got his own suite, including what had been Yeltsin's bathtub, which was huge. We recommended that Yekaterinburg be the home of the next consulate, which it duly is.

My life in Moscow was mostly work, with some free time for music and Russian friends. I think I visited the embassy dacha only twice in three years. As a section chief, I had a large and modern apartment, but I was not there very much. To my taste, it was too large and sterile, with new government-issued furniture. However, it was just as well I had three bedrooms, because during these years I almost ran a pension. I had more visitors in Moscow than in all my other assignments combined. Many friends just wanted to visit the new Russia, but some needed a place to stay while trying to establish business connections. I had several friends in place for a month or two. That was fine, but they were more or less on their own as I rarely got home before nine or later. I did make the time to show around some old American and German friends with no Russian experience.

One oddity of this assignment was that I had supervisory responsibility for the POW/MIA unit. This was a team of military and retired military officers who worked with Russian authorities to locate the remains of American service personnel from the Second World War and the Cold War under a new bilateral agreement. They did good work, but their activities had nothing to do with Political/Internal. The decision to attach the team to me was made while I was out of town, and made no logical sense. They did not want to be associated with the DAO, to avoid any implication they were involved in intelligence work. However, they should logically have been attached either to Political/Military or Political/External. They were not much of a burden to me, as they were a self-administering team and needed me only to authorize their reporting. They gave me no trouble, but it showed the danger of leaving the office for even a short domestic trip; something would be dropped in my in box while away.

In that regard, I got into hot water in the embassy due to one trip. I had given Ambassador Strauss – at his request, I might note – some thoughts in writing about post management out of frustration at the slow adaptation of the embassy to the new demands on us. I was fed up with always hearing the excuse that something could not be done because this was Moscow. Tasks that could be accomplished in real hardship posts in the Third World were routinely ruled “impossible” in Moscow. Strauss had reached similar conclusions on his own and, while I was away, sent Secretary Baker what he called a “Come to Jesus” telegram about what the embassy needed, but he incorporated my memo in the telegram in toto. Naturally, that message circulated within the Department and then came back to Moscow, where it won me no friends in Admin, though I maintain everything I said was valid.

During early 1992, Washington and Moscow were settling into a new relationship. Yeltsin made his first visit as Russian president to Washington, where he was greeted with the public enthusiasm previously enjoyed by Gorbachev. I wrote the scene-setter telegram for his February meeting with Bush at Camp David, in which I tried to encapsulate what made Yeltsin different from Gorbachev. I quoted Aleksandr Yakovlev's view that Gorbachev was by nature a democrat, but always afraid of democracy. In contrast, I said, Yeltsin was not by nature a democrat, but not afraid of democracy. He believed that empowerment of Russia's people, both political and economic, was the solution to the country's problems and the road to its future. The meeting was a success and overcame some of Bush's earlier doubts about Yeltsin. Also, at Camp David, Yeltsin discovered M&Ms, which we later supplied to him.

At the end of the Russian winter, I really needed a break. I hadn't had any leave at all from before the August putsch right through to the spring of 1992, except for a short illness in February. I had had very few Sundays off. I had just finished the annual performance evaluations on my very large team and, I am happy to say, everyone who was eligible for promotion was promoted. Nothing like being on the cusp of history to provide good material for an EER. In the spring I went on home leave, the only full home leave I ever got in the Foreign Service. I did several weeks of camping with friends in the wonderful national parks of Colorado, Utah and Arizona. Just what the doctor ordered! I also saw relatives and friends in the Midwest and on the East Coast, and returned to Moscow with the strong impression that President Bush was in real political trouble. In the embassy the view was Bush could not lose, as he had won a war to liberate Kuwait with subsequent sky-high popularity numbers. When President Bush lost the election, I was one of the less surprised people at the embassy, because I had heard so much on home leave that, while Bush was respected, he certainly wasn't liked and was seen as out of touch on domestic issues.

Russia was not an election issue in the United States in 1992, because the view of Yeltsin as a good guy was pretty consensual among Republicans and Democrats in Washington. Strauss had a lot to do with that. Personal encounters also helped to overcome skepticism. A number of congressional delegations came to Moscow initially quite skeptical about Yeltsin because of things they had heard about him. After a meeting the Congressmen would come away dazzled with his charisma, his convictions, just his sheer political dynamism. I recall one House delegation that had three meetings in one day. The first was with the speaker of the parliament, Ruslan Khasbulatov. The second was with the vice president, Alexander Rutskoi. The third was with Yeltsin. That evening, they were prepared to give Yeltsin almost a blank check, because they had seen what some of the alternatives might be.

We had one congressional delegation which I actually enjoyed – though I should say I think congressmen need to travel abroad more, not less, as part of their duties. Jim Collins asked me to shepherd Newt Gingrich during a delegation visit because Gingrich wanted to speak with someone with experience of August 1991 for a book he was writing. I complained, as I thought of Gingrich as the “Peck’s Bad Boy” of American politics, but I was given the job. As it happened, Gingrich was great, one of the best congressional visitors I have ever experienced. He was very low-maintenance, courteous, intensely curious about everything Russian and very smart. I took him on a long cross-town walk to show him things while briefing him, and he liked it a lot. The next year, when the same delegation returned, I actually volunteered to be control officer for Gingrich, which I have never done for any other Hill visitor. Years later, I traveled to Russia with him in a different context and found him again unusually interested and sympathetic to Russia’s reality.

However, 1992 was the year which demonstrated the fundamental weakness of the constitutional and legal constructs of post-Soviet Russia. The Russian Federation had a government system and a constitution, but they were of the Soviet-era Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic, the RSFSR with some modifications. This was not a viable legal foundation for the new Russia because the RSFSR had always been kind of a legal fiction within the Soviet Union. In the turmoil of 1991-92 there was never time or political energy to replace the existing constitution, although everyone understood that constitutional reform would be necessary for post-Soviet Russia. What kind of government the new country should have was a critical question. Many Russians, including many Western-oriented political figures, worried about Yeltsin exercising too much power. They worried that a presidential republic would not break from what later was called the “vertical of power.” After decades of Soviet over-centralization and excessive executive power, the inclination among many Russians was for a parliamentary type of government like that of Germany or Britain, rather than a presidential system like France or America. Given the pace of other changes, constitutional reform was pushed back from month to month until brought to the fore by political confrontation at the end of 1992.

Yeltsin and his prime minister, Yegor Gaidar—who was never confirmed in the job, he was always acting prime minister—were operating under one-year emergency powers granted to Yeltsin by the Russian Federation legislature in November 1991 which would expire at the end of November 1992. Almost everything the Russian government did in economic policy during 1992, often in cooperation with Western governments and the International Financial Institutions, was under this temporary emergency power. That included the first stages of “shock therapy,” the elimination of price controls which created massive inflation, the collapse of many industries with consequent unemployment, the dramatic increase in poverty and the growing crisis of public health. The negative consequences of the Soviet collapse were attributed, by much of the Russian public, to the economic policies of the government, with Western sponsorship. Not surprisingly, these policies were not popular in Russia and were deeply resented by most of the legislators who had given Yeltsin his emergency powers. As the year went on, it was difficult to convince Washington that this situation was not going to last; the emergency powers were going to expire and almost certainly would not be renewed. The legislature of the Russian Federation was a real legislature, and it contained many people opposed to the policies plus many opposed to Yeltsin himself. The emergency semi-dictatorship was not going to last beyond the end of November. However, if you tried to explain this to people from Washington, they just didn't want to listen.

Q: Was this a problem that so often happens, that straight-line projection?

MERRY: Oh, yes, to some extent. The view was "We like Yeltsin. We think Yeltsin's a great guy. We support Yeltsin. So what's the problem?" The problem was that not everybody in Russia supported Yeltsin, not by a long shot. Yeltsin's popular support started going downhill from about October of 1991. Many people never forgave him for his role in bringing about the dissolution of the Soviet Union, and many others fundamentally disagreed with the character of the government he put together and the policies they promulgated throughout 1992. The opposition started with Yeltsin's own vice president, Rutskoy, and represented a majority of the Supreme Soviet. The pain associated with the economic reform policies was very great for normal people. Anybody who paid attention to the dynamics of Russian politics—but frankly, there were very few foreigners who did—understood there was a lot more than just Boris Yeltsin and his government. Washington wanted to believe that Yeltsin could do whatever he wanted because he had been popularly elected.

Q: When you say Washington, it's not George, it's Washington. It had me thinking of a few people. Was this the White House, or the secretary of state?

MERRY: Oh, no. I think it was almost everyone. It was the White House, it was members of Congress, it was the State Department, it was the Defense Department, the Treasury, particularly people on the economic side. There was a belief that, since Yeltsin has our support, he must be able to do whatever he wants – meaning, whatever we want. Yeltsin, like Gorbachev before him, had become much more popular in the West and among Western governments than he was at home, and the same forces which had ultimately disabled Gorbachev now had their sights on Yeltsin. This would happen more quickly with Yeltsin than it had with Gorbachev, because the new power structure lacked the legitimacy previously exercised by the Soviet system. These realities were just not understood on our side. Gorbachev as General Secretary of the Communist Party stood atop a mechanism of real control and of established legitimacy. Yeltsin had only his position as the elected president of Russia and the twelve-month emergency powers on the economy. The fact that Gaidar was never confirmed as prime minister showed the parliament was already pushing back.

In point of fact, the Russian Federation constitution gave much more power to the legislature, the Supreme Soviet, than it did to the president. The presidency was an ad hoc position created during the waning months of the Soviet Union, and was never fully fleshed out in law. Yeltsin exercised power because he exercised power, not because he had the juridical power of an American or French president. The legislators had bequeathed much of their power to him in the crisis conditions of late 1991, but come midnight at the end of November 1992 that would turn into a pumpkin, as his legal authority to do things on his own would disappear. That was a very hard message to get across because it was, to put it mildly, a very unpopular message. Finally, in November 1992, I sat down and wrote a blunt report, entitled The Underlying Russian Political Crisis. This explained in, I hope, clear terms that from early December the terms of reference of Yeltsin's authority in Russia would be fundamentally different. I predicted this situation would precipitate a broader political confrontation between Yeltsin and the legislature, which could well turn violent. I expected the crisis to come in the spring of 1993, although I do not recall whether I actually made that prediction in the message; I expect I did not as I tend to shy away from explicit predictions.

This message got a fair amount of attention back home, indeed, much too much. In fact, it was promptly leaked to CBS News and some of it was read by Dan Rather on the CBS Evening News. This upset a lot of people in Washington and, I was told bluntly from the Department, the Treasury wanted me fired. I hadn't leaked the message; I had written it and everything in it was valid, so far as I was concerned. It was a cleared embassy telegram. This was a case of the "shoot the messenger" psychosis that exists even in modern governments, that the Treasury blamed me because Dan Rather read extracts from this message on the CBS Evening News. As it happened, CBS used the message quite responsibly. The quotes they used were not taken out of context or irresponsible at all. It could have been much worse.

However, the consequences on the far side of the world were briefly serious, though preposterous as well. The Ops Center told me the Treasury was in a lather because the Japanese yen and the Tokyo stock market were in free fall, supposedly because of my message. This, as you might imagine, baffled me. It took a couple of days to figure out what had happened, with help from the CBS rep in Moscow and from our colleagues in Tokyo. The CBS Evening News was broadcast in Tokyo with a simultaneous voice-over translation, during the start of the business day in Japan. The translation in this case garbled things so badly as to imply a violent crisis was actually underway in Moscow, rather than in prospect as I had written. This provoked short-term panic selling of the yen and a downturn in the Nikkei, for which the Treasury people held me responsible. I learned from colleagues in Tokyo that no real harm was done as the markets recovered within hours. For a brief time, however, it really looked like my goose was about to be cooked just for doing my job.

This message did focus some attention in Washington to the fact that, with the December session of the Congress of Peoples' Deputies and the expiration of the emergency powers, Yeltsin would be forced to restructure his government and change some of his policies unless he wanted to go outside the constitution and the law. One of the remarkable things about this period in post-Soviet Russia was the extent to which people really did value legality and its appearance. Maintaining respect for legal structures, even those left over from Soviet law, was quite important, because Russians wanted to believe their country was now truly European and a country based on law. Russians watched what was happening in Georgia, where the civil war was destroying the center of Tbilisi, and at other conflict areas around the former Soviet Union, and thought of themselves as superior, as a European country where things were now done in legal, civilized ways. In the event, Yeltsin had to make considerable concessions which he was very loath to do, including the replacement of Gaidar by Viktor Chernomyrdin, and the modification of some policies, particularly ones favored and sponsored by the United States.

This political confrontation at the end of 1992 ended entirely peacefully, but it foreshadowed what would take place less than a year later, which would end violently. The political crisis of late 1992 established the terms of reference for the coming confrontation between Yeltsin and his supporters with the forces in opposition to him. This did not, by any means, divide good guys from bad guys, despite Washington's perceptions. Many people moved into opposition to Yeltsin, not because they favored Soviet policies, but because they were increasingly concerned about the directions of Russian legality. I knew a number of these people, including most prominently the Chairman of the Russian Constitutional Court, Valery Zorkin. These people had been Yeltsin's political allies in the late Soviet period, and certainly had joined enthusiastically with the effort to build a new, independent, non-communist Russia, but they were increasingly concerned about the basis of legitimacy of the government and its policies. Many of these policies seemed, to them, wrong for Russia. That these policies were all advocated—and often originated—in Washington meant Russian policy increasingly appeared to be made in the United States. We were seen as on Yeltsin's side, while Yeltsin was seen as our man. This was, indeed, the way many people in Washington viewed things. This perception became an important problem for Yeltsin and for American interests with Russia.

In November 1992 we also had an election in the United States, and that would be important for the embassy and for our Russia policy. I had seen a little of the run-up to the election when on home leave in the United States in the spring of 1992. The change of administration from Bush to Clinton meant a change of ambassador. I had been fairly close to Ambassador Robert Strauss, had worked as his speechwriter and had unusual access to him. I thought he was a first-class ambassador and a hell of a lot of fun. The embassy farewell party for Strauss was very genuine in its warmth, the most heartfelt outpouring of affection for an ambassador I have ever seen. But Strauss had taken the Moscow ambassadorship reluctantly, because of his age, because his family didn't want to live in Moscow, and because this was so far afield from what he really did, which was American politics. Even though he had been a Democrat working for a Republican administration, he made it clear to President-Elect Clinton that he wanted to go home.

Clinton correctly assessed that relations with Russia were going to be one of the most important foreign policy issues of his presidency and he wanted an ambassador who would have the kind of stature Strauss had. So he offered the job to former Vice President Fritz Mondale, who accepted. In Moscow, under instructions from Washington, we went to the Russian government to get what's called "agrément" (concurrence) for Mondale; this is standard international diplomatic practice. Not surprisingly, Yeltsin was delighted. Yeltsin had the highest regard for Strauss, but now was getting a former vice president, a former Senator, a former presidential candidate, someone of major political stature.

Then Mondale changed his mind; decided, on reflection, he didn't want to go to Moscow, but to be ambassador in Tokyo. Clinton agreed, and decided to send the senior-ranking U.S. professional diplomat, i.e., somebody who would go where he was told. That was Thomas Pickering, who had been in New Delhi for less than a year on his sixth ambassadorship, which had included the United Nations in New York. He had no experience in Russia or the region and, as far as I could tell, had never served in a country with real winter. Russia was one of the few parts of the world he did not know from direct experience. We informed the Russian government, including Yeltsin, that they were getting a career Foreign Service officer, albeit the most senior and experienced we had, but were not getting someone with political stature. Thus, the new U.S. Administration started things off with Russia a bit on the wrong foot.

Outgoing President Bush made a final overseas trip, mostly to the Persian Gulf but with a stop in Moscow on New Year's Day. You might notice that our holidays at Embassy Moscow tended to get scrambled by political events. This summit, with Yeltsin, was supposed to take place in Sochi, on the Black Sea coast, because someone in Washington saw Sochi as comparable to Yalta in geography. Unfortunately, the planners did not ask enough questions about the climate in Sochi, so they got a winter weather mess worse than Bush's December summit with Gorbachev in Malta in 1989. In this case, the White House advance team plus 95 embassy staff went to Sochi to conduct the event and then got stuck there by bad weather, when the summit was switched to Moscow. This meant the remaining embassy staff had to organize and carry out a summit meeting on 24-hours notice and do so on New Year's Day. Can you imagine what it is like to get Russian officials to do anything on New Year's Eve? It was a challenge but, fortunately, the visit was short. It was also damned cold, minus 28 Fahrenheit, for visitors with almost no winter clothing. For once, I volunteered my services, to look after the Eagleburgers, because Larry (then Secretary of State) and Marlene were on this trip. This allowed me to return a bit of the hospitality they had accorded me as a summer intern in Brussels back in 1971. Mostly, I took Marlene shopping on the Arbat Street, and later listened to Larry grumping about her purchases at the hotel. Just like old times. For me, that was more important than the presidential meetings.

During this transitional period in Washington, support for Russia and for Yeltsin was still bipartisan. Russia had not been an issue in the presidential campaign, and the new Clinton Administration was determined to continue most of the policies the Bush Administration had conducted. After an initially difficult start, Bush and Yeltsin had achieved a good personal rapport. Yeltsin was extremely grateful for the support Bush had expressed in critical moments, and for the support of a more tangible character during 1992. The United States had favored Russia as the sole successor state for the nuclear arsenal of the former Soviet Union, something they obviously appreciated. The relative centrality of Russia in our policy was also appreciated, despite concerns about how active American diplomacy was becoming with the other countries. At the same time, their own resources were so lacking that Russian influence in many of these areas was often either ineffective or not centrally directed from the Russian presidency.

With the change of American administrations, there was concern in Moscow that the priorities of the U.S. Administration would change. The new administration tried to project continuity, but the inability to send out Mondale as ambassador communicated a lessening of priority in Russian eyes. Only a handful of people knew about this episode, but that handful included Yeltsin and that's what really mattered.

Collins remained deputy chief of mission to Ambassador Pickering. I was never personally as close to Pickering as I had been to Strauss. I think that was just a matter of personality. Pickering was certainly one of the most skilled professional diplomats I have seen or anybody has ever seen. He was a very quick learner about Russia. He was very interested in anything we had to tell him about Russia, but his focus, I think, was more on the changing international environment involving Russia, for example in Yugoslavia. That would have been true with any ambassador.

I had noticed that Pickering's presentation of credentials ceremony was, by chance, on the same day as Andrei Sakharov's birthday. There was an annual memorial concert in the evening in the Great Hall of the Conservatory, in memory of Sakharov with many political and intellectual figures in attendance. I sent Pickering a memo proposing that, after his presentation of credentials and first meeting with Yeltsin in the afternoon, his first public act as ambassador be to attend this memorial concert for Andrei Sakharov. I thought that would be very well received and send exactly the right message. He agreed, and so the first thing I did with the new ambassador was to escort him to what is, perhaps, my favorite single public space in Russia, the Great Hall of the Moscow Conservatory, and to introduce him to some of the Russian intelligentsia. His attendance was front-page news the next day. So, it all went really quite well.

Q: Did you get any feel for Warren Christopher vis-à-vis Russia?

MERRY: I never did. Within the new State Department team, Russia was the purview of Strobe Talbott, who did not at the outset have a really top-level position, but he had access to the president, which is what Washington power is really about. The new State Department front office, Christopher and such, made almost no impression in Moscow at all. It was a complete change from James Baker, who had exercised a personal relationship with Eduard Shevardnadze in the Gorbachev period and had spearheaded many missions to Russia and other former Soviet countries. He had negotiated the terms of United States engagement with all the successor states, and spent considerable time directly with Yeltsin and foreign minister Kozyrev and others. That kind of personal engagement by the American secretary of state didn't exist under Christopher. He made some trips, but I doubt he made much more of an impression on the Russians than he made, obviously, on my memory.

Q: On us here in the States, he kind of came across as the president's lawyer on international affairs.

MERRY: As a personality, he could scarcely have been in greater contrast to Baker. Baker was certainly not my favorite human being. As an official visitor, he was a royal pain in the neck. Even Strauss got fed up with Baker's entourage. As I mentioned, the embassy leadership assigned me to other duties during those visits, because I could be kind of short-tempered with those folks. But you have to give the man credit as an activist foreign minister for our country, in dealing with the leaderships of Russia, Ukraine, Kazakhstan, dealing with people like Yeltsin, Nazarbayev and others in a very personal, engaging and sometimes downright physical embrace. For example, being in the banya (sauna) with those guys and conducting diplomacy in the flesh, quite literally. That was something James Baker could do very effectively. That wasn't Warren Christopher at all. That just wasn't his style, that wasn't his way.

Q: Did you get any feel for Strobe Talbott? Was he a positive influence, in your perspective, or not?

MERRY: Talbott was the president's man on Russia, and was for the duration of Clinton's presidency. I never had any kind of personal relationship with Talbott. I met him a number of times, briefed him, but there was never any real chemistry between us. I was never a Washington player during this period. I was in Moscow, and my job was to inform Washington through reporting and talking to visitors from Washington, whether they be official visitors or journalists or anything else. Increasingly, I was the bearer of bad tidings, the purveyor of the view that Russia was not going to be the miraculous reform success story that Washington wanted. If nothing else, my reputation for candor and skepticism about the applicability of the “Washington consensus” to Russia made me less than a welcome voice. I knew that was so, and embraced the role. I was certainly not a hapless victim, as I knew perfectly well how I came across. For me, the opportunity to be that voice during this period in Russian history was a great opportunity, but it carried with it the duty to pour cold water on many easy and false beliefs at the other end.

The new administration—Clinton and company—quickly adopted the same uncritical, wholesale support for Yeltsin that had been the case under their predecessors. Now, let me be clear: I was, and indeed remain, a fan of Boris Yeltsin. He later made some terrible, terrible mistakes, of which the worst was the war in Chechnya. But I had the highest admiration for Yeltsin as the Russian leader willing to jettison the entire Leninist project and the Soviet empire to seek a very different future for his country. Where Gorbachev was a failed reformer, despite his epic achievement in helping to bring an end to the Cold War, Yeltsin was a true revolutionary, a man willing to reject the entire political and ideological system of which he was a product. My problem as head of Political/Internal was to communicate that Yeltsin was only part of a broader political dynamic in Russia, which was, curiously enough, still a democratic political dynamic. The legislature may have been a holdover from Soviet times, but it was an elected legislature, just as Yeltsin himself had been democratically elected. This political dynamic reflected pluralism and the many conflicting interests within Russian society, often not committed to Yeltsin either as a leader or to his policies. The new Clinton Administration engaged in unthinking, uncritical support for “Boris”—not even Yeltsin, it just became “good old Boris.” Washington wanted Russia to be democratic but for its leader to rule by decree. This was not, I thought, a very sophisticated or nuanced approach to dealing with a Russia that was going to have very serious internal political difficulties.

One thing I found curious and off-putting about the Clinton approach was this use of first names, to refer to the president of Russia by his first name. In Russian terms you could refer to him as Boris Nikolayevich, which is perfectly respectable. You could refer to him as President Yeltsin or just as Yeltsin. But to refer to him just as “Boris,” and to do that quite openly and publicly, had a distinctly condescending quality. Clinton tended to condescend to Russia in ways Bush had not. The public speeches Clinton made in Moscow made me wince. He also conveyed that people in Washington didn’t understand that Yeltsin was not Russia. The United States needed to maintain relationships with a broader spectrum of Russian political figures than just those associated with Yeltsin. I became increasingly concerned about this. Keep in mind that the new U.S. administration had many other things to deal with, so they tended to be reactive to events in Russia. Ambassador Pickering, for example, was not in place until late May when the deterioration of the Russian domestic political situation was already fairly far advanced.

The political confrontation from the end of 1992 resumed early in the following year and resulted in the violent crisis of the fall of 1993. However, the entire year was one of political crisis, with only short lapses. At the start of the year, Yeltsin was in a depressive funk. Yeltsin as a personality was definitely manic-depressive and had occasional depressive periods, but he tended to come out of them with bouts of manic energy. This happened in the late winter when his opponents in the Supreme Soviet attempted to impeach him. This was an interesting concept. There isn’t even a word in Russian for impeachment. They used the English word and concept, impeachment, because such a thing had no precedent in Russian history. The notion that a chief of state could be removed from office through legal means obviously is not very Russian. This standoff between president and parliament progressed into March and could very easily have become violent – indeed, I expected it would – but did not for two reasons. First, the opposition retreated in real fear from an open and direct confrontation with Yeltsin, which they knew they would lose. A vote to impeach the president failed; though it is impossible to say what would have happened had it passed. Second, Yeltsin came up with an alternative. On television he proposed a national referendum on four questions. This referendum in April was about the direction of national policy and the authority of the president, and was pushed by the government under the slogan “Da, Da, Nyet, Da,” meaning they wanted people to vote “Yes, yes, no, yes” on the four questions.

The idea behind the four-part referendum was to create public pressure and momentum for a constitutional convention, to rewrite the Russian Federation constitution from the relic of the Soviet period which was still the legal framework of the country. This was, I thought, a brilliant stroke by Yeltsin. It avoided what might otherwise have been a very destructive confrontation; whether an effort at impeachment by the Supreme Soviet or direct rule by Yeltsin himself. It had the advantage of going back to the people, of transcending the existing constitutional structure through direct democracy in a national referendum. Initially, the scheme worked pretty well. The opposition was flustered and could not unite on a tactical response. The government won the vote with sufficient majorities to achieve credibility for a constitutional drafting convention, which began in the early summer. Then, characteristically with Yeltsin after a fight, the momentum slowed and his leadership lost dynamism. Whenever Yeltsin was in an overt confrontation, whether in late 1992 or earlier in '91, or later in '93, or in this particular confrontation in February and March of 1993, when Yeltsin was in a battle, he was in his element. But in the follow-through—the detailed political effort required for a constitutional convention to create a new basic law and get it put into place—his attention wandered and the whole thing lost momentum in the summer. Yeltsin was always a great fighter, but not a patient and detailed political in-fighter.

This concerned me because I had said to Washington, in my cable of November of the previous year, that the underlying Russian political crisis would have to be resolved, either with the reformulation of constitutional structures by peaceful means or by violent confrontation. The dilemma could not go on for an extended period. The dissipation of focus in the middle of '93 was worrisome. It was compounded, at the end of the summer, by a terribly ill-advised currency reform, when the Russian government withdrew a massive amount of currency from circulation. This created public panic during the height of the summer vacation season, when people didn't know if their money was going to be worth anything, if they could pay their holiday bills. It was done in a way that conveyed to the Russian people that the officials who made policy were indifferent to the impact of their actions on everyday life for the people, that this was still a top-down, authoritarian state. This action stood in terrible contrast with the national referenda in the spring, which had said, “The people rule here.” In the late summer, the utterly heavy-handed and unnecessary currency reform showed people how little they really mattered. This set the stage for the autumn crisis of 1993, as the finance minister, Boris Fyodorov, initiated a series of macroeconomic tightening measures during the autumn, which produced major economic pain throughout much of urban Russia.

This is a complex subject, and my views on whether or not these measures were good economics are not universally shared. However, whether they were good economics or not, they were certainly lousy politics. The Russian people had been through a couple of very, very difficult years, including the winter of '91-'92, and then through '92 into '93. People had survived those two very difficult years with massive inflation and huge disruptions. By the middle of 1993, Russians were beginning to feel they were over the worst, that they were over the hump, that things were beginning to improve, and people were beginning to see what you might call a light at the end of the tunnel. Then came these macroeconomic stabilization measures that just knocked the support out from under the basic livelihood of much of the urban, blue-collar labor force. In my view, this was unnecessary and certainly politically very foolish. Yeltsin was already looking toward another national referendum on a new constitution and to elections for a new legislature. To manufacture a major deterioration in working class living standards in preparation for such elections showed the arrogance and political blindness of many of the so-called Westernizers and economic reformers.

I dwell on this because many people think the confrontation between Yeltsin and his parliamentary opposition in late September and early October was about personalities and came out of nowhere. Washington saw the confrontation as a morality play, of good guys versus bad guys. This is false. The confrontation had a long and deep context. Yeltsin was always a controversial figure, even during his greatest days in 1991, but this confrontation involved a chain of events including the expiration of his emergency powers at the end of November '92; his capitulation on large elements of policy to the Supreme Soviet in December of '92; the replacement of much of his government; his decision, in February of '93, to challenge the legislature again; the failed effort at impeachment that followed; the spring confrontation that resulted in the four-part national referendum; the constitutional drafting process and its loss of momentum; the currency reform, and the fiscal tightening measures. These all created an environment in which the underlying dilemma of Russia's constitutional structure came to a head in the second half of September of 1993. The world remembers the images on CNN of the violent confrontation in Moscow in early October, but that was the culmination, if you will, of something that had been in process for over a year, and had been more or less unavoidable for months. I think violence could have been avoided, but the basic political confrontation could not. There was a lot of history—including personal history among the participants, of course—so that at the end of September, Yeltsin's own vice president, Alexander Rutskoy, was on the other side of the barricade. The parliamentary speaker, Ruslan Khasbulatov, was on the other side of the barricade. The head of the constitutional court, Zorkin, was on the other side of the barricade. People who had been working very diligently in the summer on constitutional revision, like Oleg Rummyantsev, ended up on the other side of the barricade. These had all been Yeltsin's allies earlier.

The step which provoked the ultimate confrontation was Yeltsin's. He became frustrated, impatient, fed-up with what he saw as the lack of progress on constitutional reform. After a series of political maneuvers, Yeltsin decided to prorogue the legislature. He lacked the legal authority to do so, but did it anyway. He went on television and dismissed the legislature with a call for new elections, plus the writing of a new constitution and a referendum on it, which in theory was what they were working toward anyway. But he decided, on September 21, to short-circuit a process he saw not going where he wanted or as quickly as he wanted.

To Yeltsin's surprise, I am sure, the opposition, if I can use that broad term, decided to take a leaf from Boris Yeltsin's own book from August 1991 by rallying their forces to the same place he had rallied his forces then, which was the Russian White House, the seat of the Russian Parliament. The Supreme Soviet voted to declare Yeltsin a traitor and Rutskoy as acting president. Rutskoy, Khasbulatov and others, under the banner of constitutional legitimacy and legality, summoned everyone who was in opposition to what Yeltsin was trying to do. This included a very wide spectrum of people who ranged from the most ultra-nationalist, anti-Semitic, vicious people you could imagine to many of the most, I would say, liberal, progressive, pro-Western, democratizing individuals in the country. For example, Oleg Rumyantsev, who had portrayed himself as the James Madison of Russia and was the leading intellectual light in the fashioning of a new constitution, could not swallow what Yeltsin was doing, the man for whom he had sought to fashion that constitution. One should not imagine this confrontation was progressives versus communists, or reformers versus reactionaries. Many of the best people in Russia simply could not abide Yeltsin's departure from legality. However, the other end of the opposition spectrum was in a swamp. I remember vividly a piece of graffiti inside a telephone booth near the Russian White House that said, "Death to the Jew Yeltsin!" The notion of Boris Yeltsin being Jewish was preposterous, but this graffiti associated Yeltsin in the minds of some of these people with the ancient "Jewish enemy" in Russia. This anti-Semitic spleen was directed at Yeltsin, as well as at Gaidar and others, some of whom actually were Jewish.

The ability of the opposition to rally large numbers of people to the Russian White House, with its important symbolism from August 1991, very much caught Yeltsin by surprise. The crowds around the White House in 1993 were not the youth of 1991, but they were more or less on the same scale. He held off using riot police or troops, hoping his opponents would lose heart or lose face or at least seek a compromise with him. None of those things happened. The anti-Yeltsin forces remained steadfast and even grew in numbers and determination. They saw this moment as their opportunity either to reject the Western-oriented policy of the government or to establish genuine constitutional legitimacy, depending on their point of view. Compromise was not in the air. There was plenty of political rhetoric, none of it very productive, which extended from September 21 into early October.

One of the things I had learned from August 1991 was to have changes of underwear and other spare clothing in the embassy, in case we had another extended crisis. It was just as well, because this time I did not leave the embassy compound for 10 days. This time we did not have day and night shifts. So, I was working about 18 hours a day in the embassy, and sleeping in the sub-basement of the DCM's residence. I needed someplace to sleep, so I used what had originally, I think, been intended as a maid's room. Each night I would wash out one set of shirt and underwear in rotation for the night ahead, and for dinner I had the leftovers from a large reception Collins had hosted a few days before. There were enough leftover canapés and partial bottles of wine to keep me, but they got to be pretty stale.

The DCM, Jim Collins, was in Washington at the time, and his advice and counsel were so valued they wouldn't let him come back to Moscow. Ambassador Pickering was in Moscow without his deputy, but he had been through a number of similar events in other countries in his time. I think Jim probably was more valuable staying in Washington. Keep in mind that this time the embassy was not showing solidarity with the people inside and around the White House. We did maintain contacts there for reporting purposes, but it was nothing like the interchange we had in August 1991. We were much less activist this time and certainly not seen as friends within the White House. Indeed, there came a point when even our normal contacts became difficult to maintain due to the general hostility we faced. The embassy was in a very insecure location because it faced directly toward the Russian White House with only the low compound wall for protection. In contrast to August 1991, there were a lot of people in the crowd with guns of various kinds.

Each evening before I went to sleep about midnight I had a phone conversation with Collins back at the Operations Center in the Department, to discuss where I thought things were that day. This was in addition to our classified reporting and analysis and was more in the nature of a personal exchange of views, me to him. I could say some things, even over an open phone link, that I might not in cleared embassy reporting. This routine went on for a week and a half. Candidly, I often did not have much of substance to say. Our access to knowledgeable contacts during this Russian crisis was a fraction of what we had had in 1991, on both sides. The Kremlin was not saying very much, in part because they really did not know how things might develop. We had people covering the crowd outside the White House and talking with contacts inside, but this got to be dicey. Talking to Americans was not popular in the White House, as it was clear the United States supported Yeltsin. The mood of the crowd sometimes was pretty ugly and potentially threatening toward embassy staff. At one point, I pulled some people back for their own safety. I often had little to report other than rumors, but that reflected the fact there was little real news from either side. The adversaries were talking past each other and both were trying to wait the other out. The Moscow public was sitting on the sidelines, just hoping for a peaceful outcome.

At the end of ten days, we were into the first weekend in October, and things at least appeared to be moving toward a resolution. Russian Patriarch Alexy had been on a trip to the United States when the crisis occurred and had cut it short to return to Moscow. He then started mediating high-level political talks at the Danilov Monastery. This mediation process was really the first ray of hope for a peaceful end of the crisis, as both sides were at least willing to take part given the prestige and stature of the patriarch. I had considerable respect for Alexy and knew that neither side would want to appear to rebuff his peacemaking efforts. So, it looked like things might yet sort out or at least remain calm during the mediation talks, but as there was little news emanating from the Danilov Monastery, there was little for the embassy or for me to do but wait.

October 3 was a Sunday morning and a beautiful autumn day. As it happens, it was also my birthday, and I decided I could go home for part of the day. I wanted to get some really clean clothing and do a few things. I thought I could leave the embassy for a Sunday. And, sure enough, that's when the whole thing just blew sky high.

Q: During this period before things blew sky high, how were you getting information?

MERRY: As in August of 1991, we had an expanded reporting team, though much more concentrated on the Political Section and not working around the clock. We had reasonable contacts with Yeltsin's people, and with some of the opposition. Things started off all right, as everybody initially wanted to tell their position to the Americans. That attitude deteriorated as the crisis became protracted. I was out a few times in the crowds around the Russian White House, and the type of people there changed for the worse as time past. To begin with, it was sort of a middle-class law-and-order crowd, but with the passing days the crowd got to be ugly, paranoid and antagonistic. We still had adequate access, but it was a very different mood than in 1991. In the previous crisis, we at the embassy felt empathy and support for the people across the street, but in 1993 it was quite the contrary. My job as coordinator and editor was similar, but the tone was strikingly different.

Q: Did we have any either overt or covert position? How did we want this thing to come out?

MERRY: Washington supported Yeltsin, but without much sense of nuance or what our support would mean in Russia. They tended to view things in black and white, that the people on the other side of the barricades must be the bad guys of Russia.

Q: One of the things that can poison any view, if someone has extreme anti-Semitic views, and the opposition, as you mentioned, there was this—

MERRY: It certainly contained that.

Q: What was the name of the group that was sort of a party or something?

MERRY: There were a number of people involved of a fascist character, some of whom we actually knew. But, the opposition was internally diffuse and inconsistent. It contained factions ranging from brown through red, plus people with no faction. There were fascists through communists, plus many people I would characterize as legalists. There were a few odd characters who wanted a military government, but agendas were all over the map. If the opposition had won the confrontation with Yeltsin, their own fragmentation would have been almost instantaneous. What united them for the moment was opposition to Yeltsin, rather than the leadership of Rutskoy or any other figure. What Washington thought was that opponents of “our guy Boris” are bad people.

Q: I thought we might stop at this point. It's a good place to pick up, where the fighting started.

MERRY: OK, October 3rd. My birthday.

Q: Actually, I was sitting in Bishkek at the time, watching it on TV. I was out there. I had been retired for some years. I retired in '85. But I was sent up by USIA as a consultant, to set up the Kyrgyz government, to set up a consular corps. So I was watching this damn thing on—anyway.

MERRY: Well, let me tell you, it got damn exciting.

Q: Today is the 10th of June 2010 with Wayne Merry. Just briefly, where did we go up to and where did we leave off?

MERRY: We had gotten to the 3rd of October 1993, a very dramatic day in modern Russia. In fact, this was the one of the few events in the post-Soviet period in Russia that I think can legitimately qualify for that much-overused term, historic. This was the date when the country really faced a crunch point.

For the preceding week and a half, there had been a largely peaceful but nonetheless very high-tension confrontation between Boris Yeltsin's government and his opposition, who were holed up in the Russian White House. This involved large scale demonstrations around the White House, which is right across the street from the American Embassy complex, and a very tense standoff over Yeltsin's effort to abrogate the then-existing Russian Supreme Soviet with an eye to new elections and a new constitution. A constitutional drafting process had been in progress for much of the previous six months, but had essentially bogged down. Yeltsin had always intended that the Russian Federation would get a new constitutional structure to replace that which it had inherited from the Soviet Union, and this would create a much more presidential-style system, patterned somewhat on De Gaulle's Fifth French Republic. In the late summer that effort ran out of steam, partly because of lack of focus by Yeltsin himself but for a variety of other reasons. In the early fall, the political process was in drift. Yeltsin, in mid-September, decided to cut the Gordian knot by dismissing the Supreme Soviet, which constitutionally he did not have the authority to do. He called for new elections, not just for a new legislature, but for a new constitution, which was at that point half written.

The opposition to Yeltsin was now led by Yeltsin's own vice president, the former air force general, Alexander Rutskoy, and the chairman of the Supreme Soviet, Ruslan Khasbulatov, both of whom had been close allies to Yeltsin in the crisis of 1991. They were now leading the opposition, which was an unstable amalgam of very conflicting Russian political forces, some of them neo-Soviet, members of the Russian Communist Party, but also members of groups that were semi-fascist, some of them entirely fascist, a few people who overtly advocated a military government—actually quite few in number but quite extreme in their politics—and many people who were simply opposed to Yeltsin, Yeltsin's reforms, Yeltsin's government. The opposition had attracted a motley but intense group of people distressed because of the breakup of the Soviet Union, the loss of the Soviet Russian empire, and of course, the extreme economic turmoil in the country during the late Gorbachev period and the first two years of Yeltsin's presidency.

Also in the opposition were what I would call progressive, pro-democracy, pro-market, pro-Western liberal reformers, who felt that Yeltsin's approach had itself become too authoritarian. Their commitment was to the existing legal constitutional norms, with a view to their replacement but through legal means. What united what I would call liberal reformers with what I would call reactionary neo-Soviets and semi-fascists was an opposition to Yeltsin's unequivocally illegal and unconstitutional methods to try to resolve the political crisis. He did not have the authority to abrogate the Supreme Soviet. He did not have authority on his own to drive a constitutional revision. I think it's fair to say he did not have broad popular legitimacy in doing so. This led to the confrontation on the streets of Moscow, centered around the Russian White House, which had gone on for a week and a half.

On Sunday, the 3rd of October, a process of mediation was taking place under the sponsorship of the Patriarch of the Russian Orthodox Church, Alexy, at the Danilov Monastery, the headquarters of the Russian Orthodox Patriarchate. Alexy had been on a tour of Russian Orthodox sites in North America and had cut that short to come back to Russia to try to help resolve the political crisis. His stature was such that pretty much everybody in leadership positions on both sides, both in the government and in the opposition, agreed to let Alexy try to work out some kind of a resolution to this crisis. That was ongoing that weekend. I believe that if this process had started earlier, maybe four or five days earlier, Alexy might have been able to pull it off. We'll never know. There were many people on both sides trying to find a way out of this confrontation that would not involve use of force by either side, and the one person who had a real chance to pull this off was Alexy. As it happened, he came too late.

As I mentioned before, I had been in the embassy for a week and a half without a break. This being a Sunday and a day when the confrontation was supposedly in abeyance because of the mediation effort, it looked to me to be a good day to go home and get some change of clothing and take care of a few personal things. It also happened to be my birthday. I thought, "I've been working 18 hours a day for the past 10 days; maybe I can take this Sunday off and go home." Well, it didn't work out that way.

My apartment was in a high-rise building which overlooked October Square, one of the main traffic interchanges in Moscow and also, at its center, site of the largest statue of Lenin in Moscow. Representatives of both sides were engaged in the mediation effort, while Yeltsin and other senior members of the government had decided to do what I did, which was to take this Sunday off, as they were mostly at their dachas. With nobody in charge locally on either side, people on the street took events into their own hands. There was a demonstration scheduled for October Square in front of the Lenin statue to rally people opposed to Yeltsin. In principle, this should have been a normal peaceful manifestation of political opposition to the government, and it could have been. The problem was two-fold: first, many of the people who showed up for this demonstration were in a very foul mood after 10 days of confrontation. Many of them had been camping out around the Russian White House for days, if not a week or more, and some were looking for a fight. Unfortunately, they got it because of the second factor. The Ministry of Interior behaved stupidly. Rather than let this demonstration take place and let people vent their anger, they decided to send in riot cops to break it up. What they sent were a bunch of young, inexperienced, semi-trained riot cops who really didn't know what they were doing. As it happens, my kitchen looked right down on the square and on the demonstration. I had a panoramic view of the collapse of peace.

The riot police, instead of standing to the side to let the demonstration take place or keeping it where it wouldn't interfere with traffic, closed in on it from all sides. They compressed the demonstrators, which was foolish beyond belief. They didn't try to push them off in one direction. They actually pushed in from various directions. A lot of the demonstrators were older people, and older Russians have fairly thin skins about being pushed by young people in the best of times. At some point, the compression caused a human explosion and the demonstrators surged out and just stormed right through the riot cops, who were mostly kids and didn't know what they were doing. There was no effective leadership and the demonstrators trampled these symbols of government authority pretty much underfoot. Then it was, "Katie, bar the door."

I had not the faintest notion that this relatively local event I had witnessed spelled the collapse of political peace in general. If I had, I would have returned to the embassy immediately, rather than just reporting what I had seen by phone. It did not occur to me that this event would spark others and lead to a loss of government control in much of the central part of the city, but that is just what happened. The demonstration – now a full-bore riot, in my view – started moving up the street, what's called the Garden Ring, in groups to the area in front of Gorky Park, across a bridge over the Moscow River, and then on toward where they had come from, which was the Russian White House. On the way they engaged in increasing levels of violence, particularly when they got to the square in front of the Foreign Ministry. By the time they got back to the Russian White House, and of course to the American Embassy, the police forces on the street had disintegrated, and, for the most part, simply fled for their own safety. There obviously was a lack of leadership and organization on the police side on this Sunday afternoon. Most of the senior people were at their dachas. Some of the Russian police who provided security at the entrances to our embassy actually had to take refuge inside to keep from getting beaten up by the crowds.

At this point much of central Moscow on this Sunday afternoon belonged to the opposition. It was really messy. It illustrated one of those things Russians are always telling you, that Russian society is either strictly controlled or it's anarchy. Russians, particularly elite Russians, often justify the authoritarian nature of Russian government on the argument that, without a strong hand, Russians will just descend into chaos. In this instance, the analysis was valid. I saw it happen, though I do not assert this was uniquely Russian behavior. During the course of the afternoon any kind of organized government control disappeared. The demonstrators took over the part of the city centered on the Russian White House. They had most of the major streets in that district in their hands. They decided to commandeer vehicles and go north to Ostankino, where the main television broadcast tower and production studios are located. There was a violent confrontation with police at Ostankino, but the government never lost control of the airwaves, which was very important. By that time, the government started to get its act together and sent forces to the television complex.

I reported to the embassy by phone what was happening – because my kitchen was a prime vantage point – and learned that things were much worse than I had thought. The embassy faced a real security problem, because the embassy complex, which included something like 155 residences of families with kids, was right in the middle of this urban battle zone. The exterior perimeter wall had been deliberately built not very high so as not to be intimidating. It was only about eight feet high, or nine feet high at the most, and energetic, athletic demonstrators could get over that wall. If, as seemed almost certain, a large-scale battle between government forces and opposition forces was impending, the embassy would be right smack in the middle of it, much more so than in August 1991. In 1991, nobody would target the Americans, whereas in 1993, most of the opposition forces regarded the United States as being deeply in bed with Yeltsin, as being Yeltsin's principal foreign support. The hostility towards the United States among some opposition figures was quite extreme. So there was a real chance the embassy could be in danger, or even physically overrun, which would not have been difficult.

Ambassador Pickering had previous experience with comparable situations—this was his seventh ambassadorship, and he had, in previous assignments, seen political violence on a large scale—and was in his element. He got everybody hunkered down. Everyone in the embassy not in essential duties was moved into the large underground gymnasium, which was the safest place in the compound. Nobody was allowed to be in their residences. Some people were working in their offices, which, for the most part, were also underground, and the Marines were providing our security. Those who lived off compound, the majority of embassy staff, were instructed to stay at home.

Ambassador Pickering understood the embassy might actually be cut off or overwhelmed, and decided to establish a backup embassy. He assigned me to that duty, as officer in charge. This was in part because I was not in the embassy at that time. I was still at home, reporting by telephone what was happening on the streets. I was assigned to gather together a small team of people not in the embassy compound—because the area around the embassy now was a battle zone—and to go to his residence, Spaso House, which is about a mile and a half away from the embassy, and establish a backup embassy in case of need. The team consisted of two of my own Political/Internal officers living in the same building I did, two military attachés, two people from the Station and a couple of communicators, and we all proceeded—mostly by Metro, because the streets were not very navigable due to the chaos, but the Metro was still functioning—to Spaso House, where late on a Sunday afternoon we set up an Inmarsat for communication and established ourselves as potentially the replacement U.S. Embassy in case the main embassy was overrun.

Q: Spaso House is the residence of the ambassador.

MERRY: It's the ambassador's residence, in a fine old neo-classical building. It was built shortly before the First World War. The problem was that Spaso House is also very centrally located. It's about a mile and a half or so, as the crow flies, from the embassy, which the next day proved to be not as far away as I would have liked. In any case, we camped out to wait and see what happened. We had a direct phone link with the embassy, so I could stay in touch with the Political/Internal team there. We watched Russian television during the evening and into the night. The two defense attachés, who had a vehicle, knew where to look for the units with heavy weapons the government would bring into the city. They found them on the outskirts of Moscow camping down for the evening, bivouacking for the night. It was quite clear the government was not going to confront the opposition in a major way until daylight. This was another proof of the essential role of our military colleagues in covering a wide-ranging event that transcended the political. None of us FSOs could have performed this task. We reported this vital information to the embassy. During the hours of darkness the opposition forces engaged in sporadic fighting with security forces on foot. With the exception of the television station and the Kremlin area, they were just rampaging with frequent gun fire. This included the area around the embassy, which received some hostile fire. The very worst moment of this period, for me, was when word came over our radio net that one of the Marines had been shot. We did not know how bad he was, but the fact one of our Marines was hurt sent a chill through me. I recall vividly the sick feeling I had at that moment. However, we had done our job, reporting that significant armed forces were on the outskirts of Moscow and would come in pretty much at first light.

Once we had properly communicated to Ambassador Pickering and Washington, it seemed to me the rational thing to do was get some sleep. I tried to encourage all the members of the team to do the same. I couldn't tell them to go to bed because they were just glued to the television in these events. For me, I decided it had been a long week and a half already and God knew what tomorrow would be like and the days after that. So, I went to one of the guest bedrooms and went to bed, went right to sleep. I suspect I may have been the only adult in the embassy who got a good sleep that night. What woke me was the reverberation from the first 120 millimeter tank cannon round being fired into the upper floors of the Russian White House.

Q: By the way, 120 millimeter—that's pretty big stuff.

MERRY: This is a big—

Q: During World War II they had what we called "long Tom," which is 155.

MERRY: This was a long-barreled tank gun. In any case, the reverberation from a 120 millimeter tank gun, fired from almost two miles away, shook the windows of Spaso House. That's what woke me up. I found out what was going on, had enough sense to take a shower before I got dressed, knowing this was going to be a long day, and then we had little else to do than watch on television what the world was watching on CNN. Remember, our job in Spaso was to be a reserve embassy, not to be out covering the events and reporting on them. Ambassador Pickering's instructions about our role kept us in Spaso House, even though our inclinations were to be out on the streets. CNN's cameras were on the other side of a major bridge on which the army's tanks were deployed as they were firing at the Russian White House from the south.

Q: Why was this the target? You have this mob going around, and so what was...

MERRY: The world saw only a very limited part of what was going on. While the visual imagery of that day is of tanks firing into the upper floors of the Russian parliament building, the real fighting was out of sight of the cameras. There was a large-scale battle underway on the streets between government forces and opposition. This battle zone was fairly extensive, about two and a half miles wide and maybe a mile and a half deep. The center of the battle was on the north side of the Russian White House, in an area partly between the Russian White House and the perimeter wall of the American Embassy compound. There's a large park and a soccer field north of the White House and across the main street from our compound. That's where the biggest battle was going on. The government forces used the soccer field as a staging area for an assault on the building. The tanks were firing from the south into the upper floors of the White House to suppress sniper and automatic weapons fire from windows on the north side. The tanks were maybe a quarter of a mile away on the other side, and were firing high-explosive rounds into the upper floors of the tower of the Russian White House to suppress that fire. The tower of the Russian White House is wide east-west but is quite shallow north-south. It's only maybe 80 or 100 feet deep. If they had used armor-piercing rounds, the shells would have gone all the way through the building and out the other side. The tanks fired into the building as their part of the larger battle on the other side that the world did not see because CNN's cameras couldn't show it. That battle was taking place literally right in front of the American embassy.

Q: Were any Russian TV stations involved in this?

MERRY: I cannot recall. We were watching both, but my memory may not distinguish correctly what I saw on Russian television and what on CNN.

Q: I was watching the thing, of all places, in Bishkek at the time.

MERRY: What you were watching was CNN, because they were the only media covering the events with a camera. The problem, and this is often the case, is that what television can photograph is what the world thinks is happening. In point of fact, the battle going on that Monday was quite extensive, involving thousands of people.

Q: Were there any disaffected troops involved?

MERRY: There are debates about that. Certainly not any units, but probably some individuals. The government forces were elite army units and forces of the Ministry of Interior, domestic security forces.

Q: You mean the old KGB types?

MERRY: The Ministry of the Interior. The army supplied the tanks, though the tanks were crewed only by officers, who were regarded as more politically reliable. We later learned there had been a very intense debate between Yeltsin and the leadership of the army, as to what should be the army's role—because the army was very reluctant to get involved in a domestic political dispute—and there was also the question who could be trusted. The tanks were manned exclusively by officers because they were somewhat reluctant to trust enlisted personnel in such a delicate operation.

Exchanges of automatic weapons fire went literally right over the walls of the American Embassy. There was a small hotel, the “Mir,” across from our main gate, where opposition forces holed up. Government forces fired at the “Mir” over the corner of the American Embassy; some of our walls and structures were heavily pockmarked with bullets. A lot of our windows were shot through. Most of the personnel were safely underground in the gym and offices, but this was a strenuous day, because we had several hundred Americans, basically families, in the center of this battle zone.

Then the battle came to us at Spaso House. As the government forces closed in on the Russian White House, various opposition elements moved off in other directions. By establishing the alternate embassy at the ambassador's residence, we had made ourselves, if anything, potentially more vulnerable than the people in the embassy compound, because the ambassador's residence was a wide-open piece of property with no security at all. We had no Marines. The gate was open. Soon, armed figures were moving around in the garden. It was hard to tell who was who, because when you see a guy dressed all in black with a ski mask and an automatic weapon you have no idea who the hell he is. The American flag was flying on the flagpole from the front of the building. I wished I'd had enough sense to take that down during the night but I hadn't thought to do so, and it made us rather conspicuous. There were also snipers operating from balconies on high-rise buildings in the area. At one point, we were gathered in refuge in a basement room when several guys in black ski masks started looking through the window into this basement room. We quickly shifted our refuge to the attic of this 1912-era building. I doubt more than a handful of people have ever been in the attic of the ambassador's residence in Moscow. But it seemed to be the safest place to go for a while.

Q: You have the street mobs and snipers. How were they getting guns? I would assume that guns were not easily obtained in Russia?

MERRY: By 1993 the opposition had plenty of weapons. There was no lack of small arms firepower on either side. At this point, we in the ambassador's residence were actually in greater physical peril than the people in the main embassy. This was a nasty irony. The lesson was that we should have established the alternate embassy at what's called the "near dacha," a little weekend place we have that's inside the city of Moscow but far enough away that we wouldn't have been at any risk.

Once the battle had moved away from the White House, the embassy had to evacuate us, as if they did not have more than enough to worry about. The ambassador's vehicle was an armored limousine, and our regional security officer came to rescue us. This was a superb guy who had come to Moscow from an assignment in Beirut and knew difficult security situations very well. The vehicle had to make three trips to get us all out. Pickering came over on the first run to get some things, but soon returned to the embassy. I forget exactly how many of us there were, but it took three trips to get us all out. After the first trip, the opposition forces in the area understood what was going on, that an evacuation was underway. For the second run, the one I was in with the ambassador, there was a lot of automatic weapons fire at the gate. Initially, we couldn't get out the gate to the street. After communications by walkie-talkie with the embassy and then with the authorities, the Russian security forces nearby used automatic weapons to suppress hostile fire at the gate. We went out the gate pedal to the metal, across the plaza, and down the street, and finally into the embassy, which was surrounded by what looked like a battle zone. There were burning buildings and burning automobiles and burning debris, the detritus of an urban battle.

We all got safely out of the ambassador's residence, which I'm happy to say was not damaged. I then learned the embassy the previous evening had started something which we had never really thought about for Moscow: emergency destruction of classified material. Most vulnerable embassies are supposed to maintain a relatively small amount of classified materials, so an emergency destruction can be done within a certain specified period of time. The embassy in Moscow, to put it mildly, had never been in compliance with those standards because during the Cold War the joke had always been that, if the American Embassy in Moscow had to destroy classified material, a U.S. thermonuclear warhead would do the job. We had years and years of back files. When they started the destruction process, it quickly became a shambles. The paper shredders jammed. Fortunately, they didn't get to shredding any of my files, which was nice. One of my colleagues steered them away from my safe. This demonstrated how completely unprepared, mentally, we Old Moscow Hands were, that this could take place in a city which we had all thought of as the paradigm of the police state, that the one thing we would never have to worry about was being overrun by domestic violence.

Something much more serious was the injury to one of our Marines by gunfire. Corporal Bell, a young Marine, was a very popular guy, much loved by embassy kids who regarded him as a collective big brother. He was in an observation post on top of the new office building, which was still unoccupied. He was shot through the neck, perhaps by one of the government forces who had no idea what they were shooting at. There was nothing on the compound to identify it as the American embassy. We didn't have the flag out. Most of the troops brought in by the government didn't know the city of Moscow. This was just another building, and they saw a guy in a helmet and uniform on top of a building and somebody shot at him. He was nearly killed. Our embassy doctor took care of him, and we received, I'm happy to say, good cooperation from the Russian authorities in evacuating him to a Russian hospital and saving his life. Despite the hugely important political events taking place around us, I suspect that for many of the Americans involved, the shooting of Corporal Bell is the most painful memory of those days.

The embassy didn't really do much in terms of reporting that day because Ambassador Pickering had given orders the previous day that everybody who was not in the embassy compound—and most embassy personnel lived somewhere else—were to stay at their residences. People were not to go out and observe what was going on. They were not to engage in reporting activity. People were to stay away from the battle zones. A number of the staff disobeyed that order, feeling this was a major political crisis and we were there as reporters and that was what we should be doing. I myself felt uncomfortable with the limitations on our reporting activities. In retrospect, I understand why Ambassador Pickering did what he did. He was a man who had seen this kind of violence before, several times in his career. He made the judgment that no reporting message is worth somebody getting killed. Ultimately, of course, it was his authority, it was his decision. Today, I agree with it. Then, I felt frustrated by it. Most of my staff felt very frustrated and complained. In retrospect, I think it was the correct thing to do.

During the remainder of that Monday, October 4th, and into the next day, the American Embassy remained hunkered down. That night was particularly eerie for me because I quite seriously believe I was the only person in the place who had been to bed the night before. Everybody else was utterly exhausted by Monday night. Other than a handful of Marines, who were on their shift providing security, I was the only person awake most of that night. I was the embassy duty officer that night because I was able to stay awake and functional. This was a strange night, with embassy staff sleeping on the floors under their desks. Ambassador Pickering was asleep on the floor of his office. The staff were asleep throughout the embassy offices, which were in semi-darkness. The one person awake, maintaining periodic contact over the phone with the Operations Center in Washington, was me. I rejected every effort by people in Washington to wake up Ambassador Pickering or wake up somebody else to ask a question. My feeling was that tomorrow would be a long day, too. These people all needed some sleep. From time to time, I watched the Russian White House burn across the street, as the tower was reduced to a gutted ruin. As the hours passed, I maintained communications to Washington, which mostly meant telling people things they should already have known, answering obvious questions repeatedly.

The one thing of value I contributed—other than that somebody had to be on duty that night—was my concern about Corporal Bell. After it was clear he was out of danger, I tried to get somebody in Washington at a senior level to call his widowed mother. This proved difficult because these events in Moscow were simultaneous with the so-called “Black Hawk Down” events in Mogadishu, when a number of U.S. Army Rangers were killed. Washington's immediate focus was not on Russia, it was on Somalia. The White House and the State Department and the Defense Department treated the crisis in Moscow as a second-tier issue that was overshadowed in American public interest by the fight in Mogadishu, the famous or infamous “Black Hawk Down” incident. The president, the vice president, the secretary of state and secretary of defense were making phone calls to the families of the troops who were killed or wounded in Mogadishu. I tried for, I forget how long, for several hours, to get somebody to call the mother of our casualty. Finally, Strobe Talbott as deputy secretary of state did, which I much appreciated. I was quite struck how the attention of senior figures in Washington was not on the crisis in Russia, which we naturally considered the most important event going on anywhere in the world, but on events which attracted more American domestic interest—and of course, American media attention—which was the fighting in Mogadishu. That place was nowhere near as important as Russia, but it involved American fatalities. So, we played second fiddle that night. It was a good lesson for me.

In the immediate aftermath of these events, most of the leaders of the opposition were arrested and taken to Lefortovo Prison. The Russian government began cleanup operations, including the rebuilding of the White House. The view in Washington was that Yeltsin had won and that’s good. This was a view with which I strongly disagreed. I acknowledged that, once it came down to a real shootout between Yeltsin and the opposition, it was necessary that Yeltsin win. However, the Clinton Administration saw a victory by Boris Yeltsin as a victory for reform in Russia, that the economic shock therapy we had been advocating would now be carried out and everything would be wonderful. I believed the confrontation had been a disaster for reform in Russia and for Yeltsin’s ability to maintain genuine political legitimacy. People in Russia had felt pride until then that there had been no political violence of the kind they saw in Tbilisi or in Tajikistan. Russia had not been like Romania, but now it was. Russians, regardless of which side they had been on or whether they were on a side at all, felt real shame and disappointment that their country had been reduced to kind of Third World status, with a shootout involving tanks and troops in the middle of the capital. I felt very strongly the episode represented a huge failure for Yeltsin’s leadership and was a huge setback for the development rule of law in Russia.

In contrast, Washington was almost ebullient that Yeltsin’s opponents were now in prison while people we liked were the winners; therefore the policies we favored would be carried out. I can tell you, my view that this victory was Pyrrhic was not welcome in Washington, nor really even within parts of the embassy. People visiting Moscow who heard this view from me were not pleased. They also did not like to hear that Yeltsin’s image among his fellow countrymen, among Russians, had been irredeemably tarnished by his choice of overt confrontation. There was no question the underlying problems of Russian constitutional government needed resolution, but it was Yeltsin’s choice in mid-September to violate the law, to use extraconstitutional means, which placed the burden of the crisis on him rather than on his opponents. Having chosen to abandon the slow process of political compromise, he bore the responsibility for what would come afterwards. That people in the opposition actually initiated the violence and the looting did not, in my view, obviate the fact that Yeltsin set the stage for it.

In addition, during the crisis, Yeltsin’s government had been pretty ineffectual in dealing with it. They just waited for the opposition to get tired and go home, to either give up or compromise. They were caught completely flatfooted on the Sunday and had no better response than battle tanks. That the confrontation could challenge the integrity of Yeltsin’s government was not, I think, well understood in the Kremlin. The ineffectualness of Yeltsin's approach was demonstrated by the fact it took an initiative by the Patriarch to even begin a process of discussion which could have led to a peaceful resolution. Whether or not Patriarch Alexy could have succeeded in that we'll never know, but he alone had the prestige and popular legitimacy even to try; Yeltsin did not.

I tried to put my views into a major analysis, but never finished the message. The pace of ensuing political events in Moscow took up all my time and energy, but I also had some difficulty in bringing my thoughts into coherent written form. With more time, or perhaps with more determination, I could have produced a significant message, but I did not. My views were certainly not a secret, but there was no point in having those views if they were not made available to Washington in writing. That was my job, even if it made enemies. Not completing and sending that message was a personal and professional failure, which I still regret.

Another policy issue from that period which merits comment, even though I was not directly involved, was U.S. policy on the future of NATO and the expansion of the Alliance to include former Warsaw Pact countries. This obviously was a sensitive topic for Russia, as Moscow believed it had made a deal with the previous Bush Administration that Soviet acquiescence with German unification was linked with a Western commitment not to push NATO eastwards. Obviously, events in the region quickly went far beyond Germany and the context looked very different in late 1993. Nonetheless, this was a delicate topic in our relations with Russia. That fall, Washington proposed and NATO adopted a new program called Partnership for Peace. In Moscow, we presented this program to the government, meaning to Yeltsin, as the substitute for NATO expansion. Not surprisingly, he was very pleased and very appreciative toward President Clinton. However, on the very same day, the program was presented in eastern European capitals as their accelerated path to NATO membership.

I recall the next morning holding in one hand our outgoing report on what we had told the Russians and in my other hand a report from Embassy Warsaw on what we had told the Poles. The contrast was quite stark, as was our duplicity. The Poles and others publicly trumpeted their achievement of quick entry into NATO, so the Russians knew we had more or less lied to them. I never understood why we did this. It would have been much better to tell Yeltsin the truth and work with Moscow on how to manage the issue to improve ties between NATO and Russia. I think it was a characteristic of the Clinton Administration, especially in its relations with Russia, to believe it could have its cake and eat it too, that we could blatantly deceive the Russians about a matter of great importance to them without some loss of credence on their part in our word and in our intentions. Good diplomacy is not lying for your country, as is often said. Good diplomacy is being known as true to your word. Our approach to Russia on issues like NATO expansion was, in my view, shortsighted and inconsistent with long-term American interests. Evidently, people in Washington did not perceive a problem which could not somehow be managed.

It was at this time that the embassy staff moved back into the old chancery building, which had been rebuilt after the fire of early 1991. It was a huge disappointment. Most of the place was pretty much what I remembered from the early 80s, with little more than cosmetic changes. In particular, the fire safety improvements were a disgrace, with the exit stairs still with broken steps and broken handrails from when the building was built under Stalin. The Political Section was on the top floor, so we had the furthest to go in case of a fire. I knew enough about the building – a fire trap for decades – to order all Political/Internal staff not to secure classified material in case of a fire alarm, just to get out as fast as they could. Someone reported this to someone, and the Admin counselor complained about it during a staff meeting. The result was that Ambassador Pickering applied that order to the entire embassy. More than two years were spent redoing that structure, and the result convinced me more than ever that we should have let the damn thing burn down when we had the chance. Today, we finally are in the new embassy, but the old building is still in use, at least till the next time it catches fire.

Well, back to the domestic political story. In the aftermath of the very dramatic events of early October, the Russian government scheduled national elections for mid-December to include a referendum on a new constitution, which would be written entirely by Yeltsin's people rather than reflecting a wide spectrum of viewpoints and political forces. What became known as the "Yeltsin Constitution" was an amalgam of Russian and Western models, but in its essence was patterned on the constitution of the Fifth French Republic written for De Gaulle. There would also be elections for the new parliament, both upper and lower chambers, to be created by the constitution. The lower chamber, the State Duma, was patterned on the German Bundestag, with half the seats elected in districts and half from national party lists. The elections presumed that the constitutional referendum would both pass and attain the 50 percent participation needed to be valid. So, Russians on one day were going to vote for two members of the upper chamber, two members of the lower chamber and the constitutional referendum. In some cases, there would be regional and local elections as well. This was going to be a very big election.

Washington assumed the election would be a great triumph for Yeltsin, reflecting his victory in early October, and would set the stage for a vast new wave of reforms favored by the United States. My job during November and early December was to try to convince Washington that such expectations were wrong. It became obvious to me rather early, both from anecdotal evidence and from polling data, that the party led by Gaidar, called "Russia's Choice" and essentially Yeltsin's party, was not going to have an easy walk to victory in the election. In part this reflected the popular revulsion against what had taken place in early October, but, even more so, it was due to public unhappiness with government economic policy. Simultaneous with the political confrontation, the finance minister, Boris Fyodorov, had instituted a very stringent program of macroeconomic stabilization, which had produced a severe tightening of the domestic Russian economy. While the outside world focused on the very visible political events, most Russians were more keenly aware of the sharp deterioration of their economic situation, and particularly that the macroeconomic stabilization program was leading to massive loss of livelihood for urban blue-collar workers.

This economic tightening was instituted just as Russians thought things were starting to improve a bit. Russian families had endured a series of economic traumas in the late Gorbachev era, during the breakup of the Soviet Union, and afterwards. By mid-1993, people had a sense the worst was over and now things would slowly get better. Indeed, they had been promised by the Yeltsin government that things were going to get better. Then with the autumn of 1993 government policies threw many people back into economic crisis again. This was particularly true for urban blue-collar males. The level of frustration Russians felt with their government over economic policy was largely invisible to the outside world. In conversations with visitors from Washington, I was struck that they didn't even make a connection with the political process. They assumed Russians would vote in favor of Yeltsin's constitution and Yeltsin's party, because Yeltsin had won the political confrontation on the streets of Moscow—had won it with firepower but had won it. They completely missed the fact that what most Russians, not just in Moscow but across the length and breadth of this vast country, were concerned about were their livelihoods, and the fear they were going into yet another period of economic stringency. As the weeks went by, the more palpable was this sense of fear, real fear. This was something I had not seen in 1991 or 1992, but did in late 1993.

It is curious in retrospect that three of the most important messages I wrote in Moscow were in the month of November. In 1991 it had been my "Goetterdaemmerung" message to get Washington to understand that the Soviet Union and Gorbachev were toast. In 1992 it had been my cable on the underlying constitutional crisis to explain that Yeltsin was heading for a serious confrontation. Now, in 1993 it was time to try to shake up Washington again, to tell Washington what it needed to know rather than what it wanted to hear. This time, the message would be really unpalatable.

Near the end of the month, I wrote a telegram predicting the election, which was now slightly over two weeks away, was going to be a disaster for the government. First, I was concerned that the referendum on the constitution would not achieve a 50 percent level of participation, required under the law to be valid. It wasn't so much that people would vote against the constitution, rather that not enough people would cast a ballot, that they would abstain as a means of opposing the new constitution. Second, I thought it very likely that Gaidar's party, "Russia's Choice," would do very poorly in the voting for the new parliament and would not be in a dominant position in the new State Duma.

Ambassador Pickering faced a difficult choice. Obviously, such a firebrand message required approval by the ambassador; I would never have considered sending it out without his clearance. He was presented with a message that said, from the subject line to the final line, things Washington did not want to hear, and said so in fairly bleak terms. Pickering showed his mettle as an ambassador because, even though he did not agree with me—he thought I was overstating the case, he thought I was excessively pessimistic—he sent out the telegram and only altered the subject line. He didn't change so much as a punctuation mark in the text. My subject line had been something like "Russian Election Countdown: A Grim Prognosis," and he changed it to "Russian Election Countdown: Watch for Surprises." He didn't alter any of the predictions in the telegram even though he didn't agree with me because he felt it was my job to analyze these things. I must say that most ambassadors, in my experience, wouldn't have had the integrity to send in a telegram that Washington would really hate on matters of such importance. Strauss, yes, but not many ambassadors from the career service.

Q: When you talk about Washington are you talking about ...

MERRY: Pretty much everybody.

Q: Strobe Talbott, basically?

MERRY: I'm talking about the State Department, the Treasury and the White House, including Talbott who, by that point, was deputy secretary of state and very much the president's leading man on Russia. I am by no means pointing a finger at Talbott. He was always, I thought, an informed and attentive senior reader of our product. If we had an open-minded reader at a policy level in Washington, he was it. Such was not the case in the Treasury. The Treasury Department hated the telegram. I got a lot of negative feedback, to put it mildly. By this point, I think it's fair to say I had been identified in the minds of people dealing with Russia policy as the naysayer in Moscow.

Q: Where was the CIA in this?

MERRY: Hard to say. Keep in mind that we did not see what they sent to the White House. I think George Kolt at the National Intelligence Council—he was the National Intelligence Officer for Russia—shared some of my concerns but he didn't go as far as I did in anticipating popular blowback against Yeltsin.

As the elections, which took place on the 10th of December, approached, my view that the government was going to be decisively defeated increased. The information we had about probable voting intentions got worse rather than better, especially after national television appearances by all the leading political candidates. An irony was that the 1993 elections were, without question, the most legitimate, free and fair elections that have ever taken place in Russia, before or since. The government was so completely confident it would win that it engaged in very little cheating. This was the first full national post-Soviet election. Two years later the elections would not be as legitimate. There were some exceptions, especially in a few places with regional elections where local authorities cooked the books for their own purposes, but these were the most legitimate reflection of popular sentiment at the ballot box that Russia has ever had.

Election day was a Sunday in Russia. Of course, we had a full-court press for reporting. I was in the embassy as sort of "election center" to collate reports from our various observers and to keep Washington informed on a continuing basis. As it happened, Vice President Gore, accompanied by Deputy Secretary Talbott and others, was in the region. They were in Central Asia on election day and would arrive in Moscow the following day. The idea was that the vice president and a big American delegation would arrive in Moscow just after election day to congratulate and celebrate the victory of Yeltsin, Gaidar and the pro-American forces. The vice president would bless this great democratic victory for the American program in Russia.

In the middle of the afternoon I got a phone call from Talbott's chief aide traveling with the vice president's party in Almaty. She had recently worked for me in Moscow and was calling to get my sense as to how things were going. I told her bluntly over an unclassified telephone line that the election would be a disaster, that Yeltsin's forces would be soundly defeated, and the big winners of the election were going to be the Russian Communist Party on the left and a right-wing neo-fascist character named Vladimir Zhirinovskiy. Whatever reporting we had sent in—and our reporting in the days immediately before the election reflected even more grim evidence than had been available when I wrote my long telegram in late November—Washington just didn't buy it. I later learned the vice president's party were expecting Yeltsin's people to win.

They expected a great victory at the polls in Russia, even though their own embassy had told them just the contrary for over two weeks.

As the election numbers came in during the course of the night, things turned out even worse than I had predicted. I had been optimistic, wouldn't you know? On the positive side, the first of my dire predictions was not borne out, in that the referendum on the new constitution did get over 50 percent participation and hence was valid. There was – and, indeed, still is – debate on that subject in Russia, whether some ballot boxes had been stuffed to push participation above the required level. My detailed analysis after the fact was that it did get over 50 percent but not by very much, certainly not by the official 54 percent. My concern that the referendum would fail because of inadequate participation proved wrong, but it was a near-run thing.

In contrast, the voting for the new State Duma, the main house of the new national legislature, turned out even worse than I had predicted, because Gaidar's party, "Russia's Choice," got only 15 percent of the vote, which for a ruling party in any democratic election is pretty bad. Due to the mixed party list/constituency system, "Russia's Choice" did somewhat better in parliamentary seats, but they still were badly outnumbered by opposition parties. The communists got slightly less, which was still impressive given that many of its leaders were in prison. The shocker was Zhirinovsky's party, the ill-named "Liberal Democratic Party," which got almost a quarter of the vote. I had predicted, in the days just before the election, that Zhirinovsky would get 17 to 18 percent, and some colleagues at the embassy told me I was hysterical, that it was impossible. In point of fact, he got between 23 and 24 percent of the vote. Zhirinovsky became almost overnight a worldwide celebrity—I think it's fair to say most people in the West had never even heard of Zhirinovsky before the election—but he became an instant symbol of what seemed the rise of fascism in post-Soviet Russia. In the Political/Internal Section, we knew Zhirinovsky quite well. Several people on my staff had even been to his home and had reported on him in some depth. We knew the guy.

With analysis after the fact, it became clear to me what had happened. Zhirinovsky had inspired the urban blue-collar male labor force to turn out overwhelmingly for him. He had used television very effectively; in the televised political debates before the election, he had performed well. He did not behave like a clown, which he sometimes could do. He talked directly into the camera and he addressed real peoples' real concerns, whereas most of the television appearances by candidates from across the political spectrum were just boring. They talked down to the people, which Zhirinovsky did not do.

Q: It was the old Soviet style, I assume, of using television to propagandize? Was that the...

MERRY: Just about everybody except Zhirinovsky was tedious on television. Zhirinovsky looked right into the camera, looked right at the people watching, and talked about tangible issues, about jobs, about prices, about availability of goods, about security of employment. He spoke directly to the concerns of those people who had been most damaged by the macroeconomic stabilization policy the government had been implementing for the preceding months. His high showing on election day reflected two factors: first, Zhirinovsky got two-thirds of the votes of the urban male blue-collar labor force, which is to say, in Marxist terms, the proletariat, but, second, they turned out to vote in unusually high numbers. The participation rate of his political demographic was higher than any other, by almost a dozen percentage points. As a result, he got almost a quarter of the vote in this one election. Two years later, his vote total fell in half, and in the election after that it had fallen in half again, back to what was basically its norm before 1993, which was six to eight percent. However, a key point is that the proletariat did not vote red, it voted brown, as has happened in France and some other places.

Therefore, the political forces Washington expected to roll easily to overwhelming victory got about one vote in six while a brownish demagogue got about one vote in four. Combined with the votes given to other parties, the anti-government tally was about three to one. If this didn't demonstrate a rejection of the government in power and of the policies it represented, I can't imagine what would.

We had an interesting situation. The vice president was showing up on Monday, the next day. What was he going to say? Our expectations—or Washington's expectations—had been somewhat shattered. I must say, I did personally feel a bit of schadenfreude (pleasure derived from the misfortune of others) because there would have been no surprise if Washington had paid attention to what we, and particularly I, had been saying. The major telegrams conveying bad news had been written by me, in part because I believed so strongly in the analysis and in part because this was how I interpreted the job, to be the bearer of bad tidings. Most of my experienced team in Political/Internal had rotated the previous summer, so my role as the most seasoned person increased my responsibility to take on the dirty work. It was an excellent group of new officers, but they understandably were still adjusting to the turmoil of Russian political events.

Q: For the vocabulary impaired, I might mention schadenfreude is a German word for joy in the shadow. In other words, if things are bad, at least I'm looking good.

MERRY: Well, I understood during those last weeks before the election—and this came up in conversations a number of times—that if I was proven wrong, my credibility as a political analyst would be gone and nobody would ever let me hear the end of it. If I proved right—which I did—nobody would ever forgive me for that. Washington never forgives the bearer of bad news who is proven right. Never.

Q: Oh, absolutely. Also, for anybody reading this transcript at a later date, then all of us, when there were elections, particularly if there's an unpredictability about them, political officers get a special place in heaven for their own satisfaction if they get it right. But as Wayne is saying the system itself just does not appreciate being proved wrong.

MERRY: In this case, we had an interesting situation, in that the U.S. Government was going to have to make up its mind what to say real quick because the vice president was arriving and a big reception was scheduled at the ambassador's residence, to which we had invited hundreds of Russian political figures and journalists. The plan was for it to be a victory celebration. Now it wasn't going to be.

After the vice president, Talbott and the rest of the delegation arrived, there were some fairly hurried and intense consultations in which I played no role whatsoever. Nobody from Washington wanted to talk to me. Nobody in this delegation wanted to consult the person who had been telling them for a month that this was going to happen. Nobody was interested in learning why Zhirinovsky had done so well and Gaidar so poorly. There were some high-level telephone conversations over the secure phone with the White House, and they had a choice. The United States could take the position that “the voice of the people is the voice of God,” that the Russian people had spoken, and the elections represented legitimate popular choice and democracy. However, that was not the decision the U.S. Government made. The decision was to say publicly that perhaps our policy of “shock therapy” had involved too much shock and not enough therapy. The solution was to modify the program slightly and proceed with it. We communicated to the Russian leadership, to Yeltsin, Gaidar and company, that we felt they should stay with the program and since, obviously, this program could not be conducted in conjunction with the newly elected parliament, that it should be pursued outside the brand-new constitution, in defiance of popular will expressed at the polls.

The Yeltsin constitution was something of a patchwork, and not all the pieces fit together very smoothly. The structure was patterned on the French Fifth Republic constitution of De Gaulle. But it had a lower-house electoral system based on the German Federal Republic and it had a few imports from the American system, while drawing a good deal on Russian traditions as well. It allowed the presidency and the government a great deal of leeway in many areas of policy. But in economic policy, the government shouldn't have been able to conduct policies without the agreement and the participation of the legislature. The new State Duma clearly had been elected by the people to change economic policy. However, the word Washington gave to the people we supported in Moscow, who had just been very decisively rejected by the Russian people in the most legitimate expression of popular will at the ballot box that Russia's ever had or is likely to have for a long time, was basically to ignore the will of the people and to give the people what we felt they should have rather than what they had publicly and openly said they wanted.

Q: I take it the establishment in Washington felt almost that we owned the Russian system, that we were in charge in a way.

MERRY: Well, to an extent your question leads me toward the next major event in my story. I am accelerating a bit, but in the aftermath of the December elections and the establishment of the new constitutional structure and the new parliament, which was completely dominated by people antithetical to what the United States had been advocating in economic policy, there developed in Russia essentially parallel governments. There was the legislature that had just been elected and there were the structures of the presidency and the executive conducting policies of dubious legitimacy within the new constitutional system. There was something similar to what in France is called “cohabitation.” In the French system, there was a period in which Francois Mitterrand was president and the opposition was in control of the legislature.

Q: Jacques Chirac, I think, did that. His crew.

MERRY: Yes. In a very real sense, what Russia had was cohabitation with one side of the political spectrum controlling the executive and very different forces controlling the legislature. There were two important distinctions. In the French case, the prime minister is answerable to the parliament while in Russia the government answers directly to the president, and in Russia this situation came into being from the very initiation of the constitutional system. Yeltsin's constitution, which was referred to fairly openly as the "Yeltsin Constitution," since it had been written for him and was pushed to a national referendum by him, was now violated by Yeltsin himself and his people in rejection of the obvious will of the Russian people as expressed in national elections.

There was some debate, within the Kremlin, whether Yeltsin should try again, should abrogate this legislature as he had done in September. That would have been particularly egregious because this legislature had just been elected and elected very legitimately, and because he would have abrogated a body created by his own will in the new constitution. The very fact they were even considering this alternative demonstrates how unhappy the Kremlin was with the verdict the Russian people had delivered as a judgment on its policies. The new State Duma showed its attitude toward the Kremlin early in 1994 by releasing from prison via amnesty all of those involved both in the 1993 confrontation and the coup plotters from 1991. Thus was set the stage for a period of competing parallel national authorities, but this time Yeltsin did not enjoy any advantage of electoral legitimacy. His strongest card, as was the case with Gorbachev toward the end of the Soviet Union, was support from the West and especially from Washington.

My own feeling, a strong feeling, was that the real villain of this story was the so-called "Washington consensus," the ideology of macroeconomic stabilization which the United States had favored, and which the finance minister, Boris Fyodorov, had instituted with such vigor in the early autumn. The Russian people were not rejecting democracy. Not at all. They were not rejecting a Western-oriented Russia or engagement with the outside world. What they were rejecting was a policy of economic stringency. Within the embassy we had intense, shall we say, discussions on the validity of these policies. One of my colleagues later said on an episode of "Frontline," the Public Television program, that there had been a "war" within the embassy between the Political and Economics Sections, between people who knew Russia and people who were advocates of the "Washington consensus." The new USAID mission actually discouraged the hiring of people with on-the-ground Russian experience as somehow tainted – with realism, in my view. I thought Fyodorov's policies were not appropriate for Russia, could not work successfully and were a mistake. However, even if they were valid, it was lunacy to carry out a stringent macroeconomic tightening in the run-up to a general election. In any rational democratic system, if you've got to engage in severe belt-tightening, you do it after the election. You don't do it before the election.

I think this period demonstrated the incredible arrogance of Russian elites, that they believed they could crush the living standards of blue-collar workers all over the country, but those workers would turn around and vote for the elites if given a legitimate election. The arrogance of this, to flog the workers and then expect the workers to kiss their hand in gratitude, demonstrated that many of the pro-market, pro-Western elites of Russia in the Yeltsin years were just as arrogant and just as contemptuous of the Russian people as were the Soviet elites before them and the Russian aristocratic elites before them. One very senior figure on Yeltsin's team privately referred to the Russian people as "the manure of history." It's one of the depressing recurrent characteristics of Russian political culture, that people in the ruling classes, whether Romanovs or Soviets or post-Soviets and whether Gorbachev, Yeltsin or Putin, display an arrogance toward the Russian people that just beggars belief. It's a medieval attitude and it tells you something about the integrity of a society in which elites are so detached from everyday life in their own country and where the people, the “narod,” are so alienated from their rulers. It’s one of the great shortcomings of Russian society.

The arrogance on their side was matched, in my view, by comparable arrogance on ours. This was reflected in the really shameless conflicts of interest of some of the Americans involved. One case eventually went to court in the United States, that of the link among several people in the Harvard Institute for International Development (HIID), USAID and various Russian counterparts. Of course, nobody went to jail, but at least there was some public embarrassment for Harvard, but not a jot in comparison with what was deserved. The “old boy” links between Russian and American elitists who treated the Russian people as little better than fuel for their theories and even their self-aggrandizement is well remembered in Russia today. Putin recently made a public comment about the HIID scandal, in which he simply took it for granted that these people had been part of a CIA plot to impoverish Russia. Sadly, understanding of the American-sourced scandals in Russia of this period is almost zero in our country. The one exception is a landmark book by Janine Wedel called Collision and Collusion which deservedly won a major journalism prize.

The conflict within the embassy, what one of my colleagues later characterized as a “war,” reflected a change in the top levels of the Economics Section in mid-1993. During the previous two years, there had been good working relations between Political/Internal and Econ. We did not always agree, but every discussion was professional and collegial. I liked Ken Yalowitz, the counselor, very much and always felt an ease in working with him. Things changed that summer when he departed. As disagreements over matters of policy increased, the level of professional courtesy and mutual respect declined very sharply. I cannot deny some culpability in this regard, as I am not the least opinionated person and, after two years of intense work in Moscow plus my previous experience in Russia, I felt I knew something about the place. The Economics Section, however, now was run on “Washington consensus” lines, with priority given to doctrine, while lack of prior experience in the country was viewed as an actual asset rather than as a liability. Relationships within the embassy deteriorated and never recovered. I can only say in my own defense that, so I have been told, things became even worse later, after my departure, so I was not entirely the cause of the problems.

By this time I had attained some notoriety within the halls of Washington. This is not to say I was in any way a famous person, but only that people who dealt with Russia policy at the NSC, State, Treasury, the Pentagon knew there was a political analyst out in Moscow who was not “with the program.” That was absolutely true. I was not alone. Much of the Political Section felt the policy of macro-economic stabilization was not going to work in Russia. There was a good deal of tension with some, but not all, people in the Economics Section, as well as the Treasury attaché’s office, whose whole function in Moscow was to carry out the “Washington consensus” in Russia. A bitter irony in my eyes was that the Russian people had rejected the Soviet Union in large measure as a revolt against ideologically-driven social and economic policies. The United States responded with a new ideologically-driven set of policies of our own. In the final days of the Soviet Union one of the most common slogans in demonstrations was, “No more experiments!” So, what did they get from us? They got a policy which viewed Russia as a vast economic and social laboratory and the Russian people as little better than laboratory rats. If you think I exaggerate, you do not know the champions of the “Washington consensus.” Whatever attitudes the neoconservatives later took to Iraq was matched in full by the neoliberals in Russia.

For me, there was never a question of being pro-Russian or anti-Russian, but of being realistic about what Russian society and Russian political culture could sustain in the early years of the post-Soviet era. I considered myself to be strongly anti-Soviet, but not anti-Russian – a distinction not always shared within our government. To me, the question was how to serve American interests by forging a working, cooperative relationship with the new Russian Republic. I had no fantasies of alliance or even of partnership, but only of generally cooperative relations developed slowly. To me, the worst approach was to seek to turn Russia into an economic dependency. The Russians remained intensely proud and deeply insular. Other than a few intellectuals, they would not accept tutelage from the United States, while they profoundly resented what they perceived as American condescension and arrogance. Their perception was, sadly, often justified.

The institutional focus for U.S. Policy was the so-called Gore-Chernomyrdin Commission, established by the Clinton White House in cooperation with the Kremlin to expedite bilateral initiatives. The idea was to engage the American vice president and Russian prime minister to cut through bureaucratic delays and opposition. I welcomed this approach and hoped it would really speed things up. Unfortunately, in the way of bureaucracy the world over, the Commission became a bureaucratic mechanism all its own. In some areas of cooperation where things were proceeding well, the Commission may actually have slowed things down. In other areas, the Commission was more a vehicle for periodic signing ceremonies and formulaic assertions of progress where little was actually occurring. The Commission came to resemble a Soviet planning mechanism, with its stress on meeting regular production targets, regardless of the quality or substance of the targets; it existed more to justify itself than anything else. This was sad, because the Commission might have been a real turning point in bilateral cooperation, if it had been tempered by an understanding of Russian realities. On the American side, people associated with the Commission did not want to hear bad news or questions about the program.

Within the Economics Section itself, there were a number of younger officers who had good Russian language skills and traveled extensively, and who became skeptical about how things were going. I know because their draft reports would come to me first for a political clearance before approval within the Economics Section. I cleared on almost twenty draft messages reporting bad news that never left the embassy. These reporting officers were reporting grim truths, or at least trying to, and their messages never got out. Some of them came to me, often rather anguished and in one case in tears, because they couldn’t get their messages approved. The Economics Section was no longer in the business of telling Washington the truth about our programs in Russia.

The disputes over policy became confrontational by the spring. At this point, I was approaching the end of my Moscow assignment with the knowledge that I didn’t have much in the way of onward prospects. Too many bridges had been burned as the bearer of bad tidings. So, I decided, yet again, to write a long telegram, and this really was a long telegram – as I recall it was 75 paragraphs. It argued basically three things. First, macroeconomic stabilization and the whole “Washington consensus” program wasn’t working in Russia and could not work. The legacy of seven decades of the Soviet Union had created conditions in which these policies were inappropriate and premature; it would take years or decades for Russia to transform before these economic mechanisms could work. Second, by trying to impose on Russia an American economic model—trying to force the Russian round peg into an American square hole—we were creating enormous antipathy toward the United States, both among Russian elites and also among the broad mass of the Russian people. The failures of these policies were attributed by Russians to their American authors; increasingly Russians blamed their daily pain of unemployment or inadequate wages on the United States. Third, rather than fostering a useful potential partner in an American-led global system, we were doing exactly the opposite. A humiliated Russia would become an adversary rather than a partner. Thus, our policies were compounding the legacy of the Soviet era and poisoning the environment in Russia toward the United States.

Finally, I argued Russian reform was fundamentally none of our business. Ultimately, Russia was going to have to find its own way to a post-Soviet identity and ways of doing things. The Russian historical legacy was an enormous burden, particularly from the Soviet era but even from before it. The Russian collective national experience was so completely different from our own that Americans had really very little that was applicable or appropriate by way of models or lessons. American policy would be much more self-serving if we would keep our hands off of Russian internal affairs and let the Russians figure things out as best they could. This would take a long time. To involve the United States directly in Russian affairs and to sponsor political allies and economic policies, as we were very much doing, would generate hostility toward our country which would last much longer than the policies. In most of these arguments I was, of course, following in the footsteps of George Kennan, so I can hardly claim originality.

This telegram was very long, perhaps too long, but it certainly was from the heart. My title was pretty blunt: “Whose Russia is It, Anyway? Toward a Policy of Benign Neglect.” The title had two literary references. One was to a stage play I had seen in London called Whose Life is It, Anyway?, about the right to die. The other was to Daniel Patrick Moynihan’s famous policy proposal advocating benign neglect toward African American society in the United States, arguing government policies made things worse rather than better. What I intended the title to communicate was that Russia is beyond American capacity to transform and we serve our own interests better by keeping our hands off. Although I could not know it at the time, I was making essentially the same argument against the neoliberal agenda in Russia as I would later against the neoconservative agenda in Iraq. I see strong parallels, especially in terms of the pernicious combination of institutional ignorance and arrogance in both instances.

This message was going to be a very hard sell in Washington, and I never expected it to receive embassy clearance. Ambassador Pickering chaired a small meeting about the draft, in which he again showed his consummate professionalism by saying he was willing to send the message out front channel, but clearly labeled as an expression of my personal views. I thought that was very generous of him, since the message said the entirety of American policy towards Russia was wrong. He was prepared to let that message go to Washington so long as it was clearly labeled as just one person’s viewpoint, which was fine by me. That provoked very strong opposition from the economics counselor and from the Treasury attaché, who said that if the message went in it would give Larry Summers a heart attack.

Q: He was secretary of the treasury at the time.

MERRY: Actually, he was undersecretary at the time but he was the leading American architect of the macroeconomic stabilization program in Russia. In any case, I felt that, while Ambassador Pickering was very generous in offering to send the message in front channel, given how controversial the text was and how completely outside the frame of U.S. policy, it would be more appropriate to take upon myself to send it in via what's called Dissent Channel. The disadvantage of using the Dissent Channel is that the distribution of messages is very narrow. It's only within the State Department. If the message had gone in as Ambassador Pickering offered, it would have been distributed broadly throughout the U.S. government. As Dissent Channel, it went to only a handful of people and only within the Department of State, though I learned later it was leaked around town. A friend in CIA said it was widely read there. So, Xerox machines in Washington did manage to get the thing around.

The message went in Dissent Channel, thought it was quite long even by the standards of Dissent Channel. The procedure is that somebody on the Policy Planning Staff has to write a response to a Dissent Channel message. As it turned out, the response was written by Thomas Graham, my successor in Moscow a few months later. He kept the response polite. More interestingly, the new deputy chief of mission, Richard Miles, showed me a classified letter he received from Deputy Secretary Strobe Talbott which was a thoughtful reflection on the message, which he obviously had read with some care. It was a serious, respectful but unpersuaded response, but at least it reflected that Talbott had treated my dissent with intellectual respect. That's about as much as you can expect. Beyond that, the exercise didn't accomplish very much. Of course, the use of Dissent Channel in the Foreign Service is kind of notorious as career suicide, but by this point, I was long past worrying. I at least got my despair with American policy off my chest in this message. It was about this time that I began to think of my role as comparable to that of the Holy Fool in Boris Godunov, who is allowed to speak truth to power, but without any impact.

Some years later, after my retirement, I tried to get a copy of my Dissent Channel message under Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) and was refused. An appeal was also refused, with a rationale which shows the hypocrisy of the State Department on the whole subject of dissent. The appeals board said, in writing, that to furnish a Dissent message even to the person who had written it years earlier might discourage other people from making use of Dissent Channel in future! Obviously, the exact opposite is the case, because if FSOs knew they would be able to declassify their Dissents at some point, they would be more likely to write them. This exchange confirms the widespread skepticism within the Service about Department policy both on dissent and on responding to FOIA requests. Indeed, I have heard from good sources that use of Dissent Channel has more or less disappeared during recent administrations. Hardly surprising, when the policy is to punish the messenger and bury the message.

The spring of 1994 continued to be a full and demanding period for political reporting. There was a lot of work, other than pursuing my personal Quixotic crusade. Political/Internal remained a top-flight group of reporting officers, though it lacked some of the "band of brothers" quality of previous years. One very positive experience for me was having a Fascell Fellow in Political/Internal. This is a terrific program, and I can only regret it was not created much earlier.

We were back in the old embassy building by now, on the top floor of one of the worst conceived chanceries ever. We should have let that building burn down when we had the chance.

These months of 1994 are something of the tail end of these three years in Moscow. To be a close eyewitness to so much historical change was exciting but exhausting. By the late spring, I was pretty burned out—physically, psychologically—even though this was still a superlatively high-quality post in which to work: Ambassador Pickering, his deputy, Richard Miles, my own staff in Political/Internal. For a few months I worked for Bill Burns, the new minister counselor for the Political Section, who was delightful. I had nothing but the most professional and personal treatment by Ambassador Pickering and Ambassador Miles. In retrospect, I realize how unique were the conditions I enjoyed as head of Political/Internal during those three years. Obviously, it was the most important and interesting time to hold the job. In addition, I worked for two ambassadors who were both entirely supportive but not themselves Russia hands. I suspect that an ambassador who had a background in Soviet and Russian affairs would have taken a more direct role in the analysis the post sent to Washington on domestic political developments. That would have been entirely appropriate, as an ambassador who really knows the country should be the top embassy analyst. In my case, Strauss and Pickering came to Moscow without Russian experience, so tended to let their subordinates take the lead on interpreting what was happening. This gave me a special freedom which I suspect few FSOs in such a critical place and time have ever enjoyed, but it also entailed special responsibilities as I saw them. I suspect that ambassadors of lesser stature – less confident of themselves – would not have been so supportive or tolerant.

However, the disputes over policy within post had deteriorated to the point of being unprofessional. I include myself in that regard. They had become personalized and antagonistic. The atmosphere had become fairly poisonous, to which I was clearly a contributor. One of my predecessors as head of Pol/Int had warned me before I got to Moscow not to serve a fourth year in the job, that the burnout factor would be too much. He was right. It was clear that it was about time to go. The question: go where? At this point, I was largely persona non grata in the Department of State. I did get a Superior Honor Award out of all this. Not that it ever makes much difference.

In terms of an onward assignment, pickings were a little thin. One possibility was Lahore, in Pakistan, as principal officer. I was fascinated by the idea of the Punjab as a completely new intellectual and personal experience. I think it would have been a good change of pace for me. As it happens, they assigned another officer who was better-qualified. Another option was Algiers as the deputy chief of mission, which obviously was about as far from dealing with Russian policy as I could get. I almost did that, but declined because both my parents were very elderly. I had had three assignments abroad and very little leave time at home. I felt an obligation to return to the United States for family reasons. Otherwise, I would have been just as happy to stay abroad.

A third option was really out of the blue, and that was to go to Nagorno-Karabakh, the disputed territory over which the newly independent Armenia and Azerbaijan had fought a bitter and bloody war during previous years. An OSCE-sponsored mediation effort was underway, with the U.S. one of the leaders, seeking a peace agreement. In April I was in Prague on vacation, for the music festival and to see the Czech capital really in its glory, when I received a phone call from the Department wanting me to deploy within weeks to Karabakh as the senior American in a multi-national peacekeeping mission. I was astonished, as I had no notion the negotiations were that close to an agreement, but the offer was intriguing. The concept was for a peacekeeping force commanded by a Finnish two-star general with a Russian one-star deputy and an American political deputy. I told them I was interested, but could not commit to anything without clearing it with Ambassador Pickering as it would leave a short-term gap in his staffing. As it happens, expectations of a deal on Karabakh were premature. There was no peace agreement nor peacekeeping mission nor job for me. It would have been arduous, that is for sure, but also interesting.

Then came another offer, from the Pentagon. The Office of the Secretary of Defense (OSD) had military personnel, particularly Army officers, who spoke Russian and had Russian experience, but was weak in civilians with a comparable background. There were lots of people who dealt with Russia on a variety of issues—arms control, nuclear cooperation and so forth—but OSD did not have a civilian who was, you could say, a Russia hand. Military officers, yes; civilians, no. Secretary William Perry gave very high priority to improving defense and military contacts between the United States and the Russian Federation, and with other countries of the former Soviet Union. The senior uniformed Russia hand was General John Reppert, with whom I had served twice in Moscow when he had been an Army attaché. Evidently, John fingered me. I don't know to what extent Reppert understood that I needed a job, but the offer was made to me, to go back to Washington, not to the State Department but to the Pentagon.

Q: OK, well, I'm just looking at the time, Wayne, and this would be a good place to stop.

MERRY: Let me spend two minutes on this and then we'll wrap it up.

Q: OK, well.

MERRY: I thought about this. I understood perfectly well that if I went outside of the Department that was also career non-enhancing, because I had done that before. My only real reservation was this would be my third assignment with the Department of Defense. I had served at Marine Corps Headquarters and at the Army Russian Institute. This would be three detached assignments to the Department of Defense. I'm not sure that's a record in the Foreign Service, but it's certainly a lot.

The offer was a generous one, and would give me a new start in a part of the U.S. Government that was trying to do positive things with Russia. The fact they wanted me when, in my own department not many people did, seemed rather gracious. I accepted the offer, and then the State Department fought it for petty and bureaucratic reasons of turf. The State Department didn't want me, but objected to a Pentagon initiative, that the Office of the Secretary of Defense had undertaken a job search and identified the State person they wanted by themselves. Eventually, it was resolved, but after a ridiculous waste of effort which went all the way to the deputy secretaries.

I left Moscow in midsummer, with some sense of relief but also with a good deal of regret, as the place meant a lot to me. I had not only intellectual and professional involvement with Russia but also a lot of emotional attachment. The two places I have served which engaged my emotions in the long term were East Germany and Russia; in both cases, the political system was adversarial, but the societies and the people were warm and engaging. I have retained a sentimental attachment to both places entirely separate from my political views; perhaps in part because both societies have been so wounded over the past century. I tried to distill some of what I had learned about Russia into a final message, my last telegram from Moscow of hundreds. This was a very personal statement, and was labeled up front as my views rather than the embassy's. It was an individual view sent in by courtesy of the Ambassador. Allowing individual expression of views was something of a tradition at Embassy Moscow, though I doubt anyone took advantage of it as often as I did. Still, I think it is a very fine tradition which should become the norm within the Foreign Service. The Department of State would be well served, if routinely annoyed, by that kind of message coming in from many posts.

My conclusions after these event-filled years in Russia were that we, the U.S. government, gave far too much attention to high-level political events, to the political facade of the post-Soviet transformation of Russia. Obviously, a government and an embassy must devote considerable time and attention to the kind of political issues which had dominated my work for the previous three years, but I argued we were losing sight of the broader and more important changes in Russian society from which future political developments would emerge. I identified two topics in need of greater U.S. attention. First and most important was the condition of the Russian nation – the people, not the state – and the demographic and health crises left behind by the Soviet era as manifested in social problems like alcoholism. Second, I recommended we watch the Russian Orthodox Church as a bellwether for where Russian society was going, for good and for ill. I said the church contained reactionary and nationalist forces as well as progressive and outward-looking forces. Which way the church would go could tell us a lot about where Russia as a society and political culture would go, because the church is the deepest-rooted and longest-lasting institution of the Russian nation. While governments and parties and even ideologies come and go, the Orthodox identity of Russians is permanent, even for those without religious belief. I kept this message fairly short and non-controversial, but I felt good about finishing my tour with something of this kind. A Russia specialist at DIA later told me he had a copy of it framed on the wall of his office.

Q: OK, so we'll pick this up. This is 1994?

MERRY: 1994.

HAROLD W. GEISEL
Counselor for Administration
Moscow (1992-1993)

Ambassador Harold W. Geisel was born in Illinois in 1947. He received his BA from Johns Hopkins and his MBA from the University of Virginia. After entering the Foreign Service in 1971, he was posted in Brussels, Oslo, Bern, Bamako,

Durban, Rome, Bonn and Moscow and served as Ambassador to Mauritius. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on June 30, 2006

GEISEL: This was Moscow in the summer of 1992.

Q: Okay, so we'll pick this up in Moscow of 1992.

GEISEL: Great.

Q: Good.

Now, today is the 28th of July, 2006. Harry, Moscow, 1992. In the first place, did you speak Russian or did you have any Russian?

GEISEL: None. But before we do that I want to go back to Germany for just one little bit because I told you how the last year there I was working very hard with George Ward on Berlin 2000 but I never really bothered to speak much about Bob Kimmitt, who was my last ambassador, for less than a year but he had a big influence on me. I'm not speaking of Germany and my life in Germany per se because I think I covered that pretty well but as a Foreign Service officer I had never really worked for such a high powered, in the sense of both intellect and drive, political appointee before. Dick Walters was certainly high powered but Dick Walters was coming to the end of his career after being ambassador to the United Nations and I loved Dick Walters and I learned a lot from him. Most people who got pretty high in the Foreign Service had worked for a Bob Kimmitt before but I had not. And he taught me a lot of things that I wish I had learned earlier on. It was as little as we were not allowed to write any papers for him that were longer than a page-and-a-half and better still, if they were a page-and-a-quarter and they could have attachments but you had to tell him everything in a page-and-a-half. And of course anyone who's worked for seventh floor principals knows that's the way the seventh floor works, by and large. I didn't know that. Bob was a stickler for grammar; he was fanatic and that was very, very good for me. For example, you were never allowed to use the word "this" as a noun; it could only be used as an adjective. A very good lesson. But I also learned a lot from Bob watching his ability to work so very, very hard. I used to joke and say that Bob Kimmitt had a fantastic sense of priorities; the really important stuff had to be done right away and so did everything else. And it taught me a lot about how people at the high level political life actually think and work. I just wanted to mention that for anyone who happens to listen to what I'm saying. I have to doubt that Bob will go still higher. I mean, he's now deputy secretary of the treasury and I wouldn't be surprised if he ended up director of central intelligence one day or in the Negroponte job or something like that.

Q: I don't think I asked this question, but when you were looking at Berlin 2000 was there a thought of saying okay, our special relationship in Berlin is over, you know, things are changing, were we thinking of saying let's get this establishment down a bit?

GEISEL: Oh, there certainly were and what we did in Berlin 2000 and it's worked to some extent albeit not as well as the State Department people would have liked it to work, we asked right away what really has to be in Berlin and if it doesn't have to be in Berlin because it's not key to the bilateral relationship, where should it be? And most of the time we ended up with Frankfurt because we had quite a bit of property there and it turned out we got some more property and the name of the game in Europe is owning, and Western Europe certainly, well in most of Europe, is owning your own property because otherwise we just can't afford to be there. So the answer is yes and I think the result is that our footprint is a little smaller in Berlin than it would have been otherwise albeit not at all as small as I would have liked to have seen it. I don't know that we ever said hey, the special relationship is over; we're no longer going to be an occupying power. I mean, I'm sure we said it but I don't know that we pounded it hard enough. It's so hard to say because so much of our presence at U.S. embassies, as you know, is not Department of State.

Q: I know it.

Okay. Well, you're off to Moscow in '92.

GEISEL: Right.

Q: How did you prepare it and- well in the first place, you were there from when to when?

GEISEL: Well, I was actually only there, not counting visits and TDYs (Tour of Dutys), from I think it turned out to be August of 1992 to, would you believe, June of '93?

Q: Good heavens. Alright, well tell me, when you went there, what was sort of the administrative problem, I mean, issue?

GEISEL: Well let's say issue, that's a good word, and it's the "s" word, of course, security.

Q: Yes.

GEISEL: Remember that less than a year, I don't think it was more than a year, year before we'd had that terrible fire at the chancery which made it uninhabitable and Russians had, the Russian KGB had penetrated everywhere. We used to joke about the silver suits because of the firemen who came pouring into the place. Now, the fire was not set by the Russians, it was an accident from our own people who I believe were working on some equipment in the elevator shaft but we have the Russian firemen and the ordinary firemen were wearing stuff that looked pretty unsophisticated and beaten down. Then there were, I forgot now whether we called them silver suits or shiny suits but that was magnificent equipment, newest of the new and it was obvious that they were the guys who were waiting for a fire, you know, literally must have been intelligence guys who one of their collateral duties was wait for the fire at the American Embassy. So where did we go for the classified work? Congress gave us a lot of money and we went into what was called the "submarine" which was half of the underground parking that we had had for both official vehicles and personally owned vehicles of people who lived on the compound. And of course what that meant is personal vehicles had to somehow find parking on the street, which was not always easy. Those secure facilities were probably about the most soulless facilities I've ever seen outside of a prison, as I'm sure you can imagine, but they were safe.

Now, the compound at Moscow, of course, the NEC, as they called it, the new embassy compound, was supposed to be our housing, and these were townhouses for the big shots and apartments for everyone else, was supposed to be dominated by the chancery and of course it was. This was the chancery that we found was riddled with bugs. So here we were desperate for space. All of our unclassified activities, with the exception of consular work and USIA, were in townhouses on the compound. It was an awful mess; morale was crummy. Well, I shouldn't say that. Morale was crummy in terms of the way that people perceived support from the embassy. It was such an exciting time substantively, if you could imagine, in 1992; Yeltsin had just taken over as president of Russia on December 31, 1991, after the previous summer when we saw the tanks and all the rest and Gorbachev unable to do anything. Very, very exciting and of course we had just finished feeding an awful lot of hungry Russians for I guess it was two winters straight. So Russia was a broken place and they were really looking up to the Americans in those days so it was a heck of a time to be there.

But as you said, what were my problems? My problems all were with the "s" word, security. We had virtually no Foreign Service nationals at the time; they had all been fired because they were spies some years earlier or accused of being spies and I suspect most of them were, certainly under the Soviet Union as opposed to Russia.

Q: We all assumed, I mean, I served in Yugoslavia, I mean, we assumed that everybody was at least reporting.

GEISEL: Reporting, yes. Maybe not even highly motivated.

Q: But reporting.

GEISEL: Yes. Well, here is another thing that I saw that just really frosted me. It was the painted lines. On all of the admin type buildings there were red lines, yellow lines and green lines. And Russian employees, and we had a handful then, Russian employees who were all in green jumpsuits by the way; I mean, the indignity of it all, it was madness, could go freely where there were green lines, they had to be escorted where there were yellow lines and they couldn't go where there were red lines. I don't know who put up those lines but they were a bit bizarre. Now, I thought this was all a bunch of crap, pardon me, because who was doing the work? Two groups of people were doing the work. I'm talking about the unclassified work, the support work, the people who worked for me, by and large, except for, of course, the security officers. We had either what were contractors who were mostly young college graduates who were drivers and cleaners in sensitive areas and translators and all sorts of things who worked for a contractor, Pacific Architects and Engineers, at great expense. But then the people doing the real scut work in the kitchens were Filipinos, they were mostly Filipinos who lived in Russia; there were a lot of medical students who apparently weren't very good medical students and I don't know what else. I used to get very indignant and I would always be telling off security and intelligence people and I would say, what makes you think that these Filipinos are any less likely to be coerced by the KGB than the Russians? I said if anything, they have more to lose because they have their money, they have their apartments, they have everything and many of them don't speak Russian, they're fish out of water, this was nonsense.

Now, one of my goals, which I succeeded in, was to get us many, many more Russian employees. And I felt that the Filipinos, nice as so many of them were and some of them are still there, were giving us a false sense of security because you know, you would see these guys and even though you weren't ever supposed to discuss classified things in unclassified areas everyone does it, or may even discuss things is not classified that is still- you put the various pieces together and you get something. So, I pushed hard and quickly to get rid of the uniforms, I pushed to get rid of the painted lines because this was all stuff that was giving us a false security and costing us a heck of a lot of money and I considered that to be money wasted.

Q: Well did you find, I mean, one of the things that's always concerned me is when you have something like a PA and E hiring people, I went through this in Vietnam, I saw the same group. You know, you, you hire people, especially college kids and all doing stuff, these are far more likely to get themselves into compromising positions. I mean, they don't take it seriously. It's better, and you don't get as much work out of them as you would a Russian citizen.

GEISEL: Well, the KGB was kind enough to have lots and lots of prostitutes at the Ukrania Hotel, which was the nearest hotel to us, and of course we had Bechtel working on fixing up the old, burned up chancery. The kids and the construction workers, yes, you know, it was a lot of money and I don't know that we got for our money what we should have.

Q: Well, showing how it is, it's déjà vu all over again. I interviewed somebody who was vice consul at our embassy in, first in Moscow and then, this is during World War II when they evacuated to Kuybyshev or something?

GEISEL: Yes.

Q: But they moved and went to Belonevostok. But he said it was very obvious, he was single at the time, he said we were essentially assigned young ladies. And if you were high ranking you got a ballerina. I said at his level, a vice consul, you got a circus acrobat, which sounded like a pretty good deal.

GEISEL: Yes, that's what I was thinking.

Q: But anyway, you know, this was like-

GEISEL: In the Soviet Union. It was Russia by the time I got there by a few months but it was still in many ways the Soviet Union.

So anyway, we spoke that security pervaded everything and my life was really, the way I looked at it, to get things done and highly respect security but not get stupid. I'll give you another example. Bob Strauss was our ambassador and I can go on and on and talk about him, I have all the time in the world for him. And he called me into his office one day and he said Harry, in this Texas twang, is your mama still alive? I said, why yes. And he said well, you know, I had this terrible thought. You know, your mama's going to visit you one day, isn't she? And I said oh, absolutely. And he said well, it's going to be on a Saturday afternoon and she's going to be walking out on the Arbot or something like that and she's going to fall and hurt herself and she's going to call the embassy. Or you know, maybe that Russian hospital's going to call the embassy and that Marine guard is going to pick up and he's not going to speak any Russian or maybe there's going to be a PA and E operator there and he's going to be overwhelmed by all the calls we get on the weekend and your poor mama's going to be in the hospital and you're not going to know where she is and don't you think we ought to do something about not having good telephone operator service? Well, that was typical Strauss and of course typical Strauss was absolutely right.

Q: Yes.

GEISEL: And I thought and I thought and I thought what are the issues? And they were both security related. So the first issue is dialing in. And I knew that we could get what they called DID, which we have everywhere here and we take it for granted, Direct Inward Dialing, where you dial the exchange and then the last four digits are the extension. And that was an easy sale to the intelligence and security folks; they were delighted. Of course what it meant is that they didn't have to worry about, even though the operators, if you will, were cleared, people could still dial right in. They dialed in faster. Now then, the other thing of course Strauss wanted me to do was to get Russian-English speaking operators. I knew that I was going to have some trouble with the community but fortunately- when I say community of course I mean the intelligence community- fortunately we had some pretty smart people. And I went to the station chief and I said look, as part of the briefing we were told that all calls are listened to from I forgot where the building was, just outside. He said yes, that's right. And I said you feel very comfortable that that's so. He said absolutely, there's no question. And I said well then why do we have to have cleared telephone operators since the Russians are listening anyway? He agreed and we hired lots of English speaking Russian operators. Bless you, Bob Strauss, you got the telephones answered.

I found the money and I found the legality and we put in cable television into the compound so that everyone on the compound and embassy offices not in restricted areas could have CNN, which was very important. CNN, BBC, I forgot what else we got but it made a heck of a difference. I mean, half the time we were seeing our own city on it and that's why we really had to have it and that's why Uncle Sam needed to pay for it.

I'll now digress and tell a story because it really isn't digressing but I mentioned CNN and here again this had a big influence on my future career in the Foreign Service. One night I was walking in to the DCM's office, actually it was charge at the time, Jim Collins, who later became our ambassador. And there again, a wonderful, wonderful person who was as knowledgeable as you could hope to have and with good sense, better than anyone. Jim was having a tremendous argument with a person at the NSC who later on went to State and because I like this person I'm not going to say who it was because she was being so stupid. But anyway, here is what was happening. On CNN you could see, was a new Moscow correspondent named Siobhan Darrow, who as far as I know is still on CNN but she was very, very new in Moscow in 1992. Now, the reason that she was on and no one else was is the bureau chief was a fellow named Steve Hurst, who I think may also still be on CNN, and the number two, who was another very knowledgeable person was a woman and I can't think of her name right now. The long and the short of it, which I didn't know then, I just knew they weren't there, was that the two of them were rumored to be having an affair and were out of Moscow. So Siobhan was on the scene with the camera and the mike and what was happening is that she was reporting that there was a virtual coup d'état going on; troops were in the street, no one knew what was going on and it was all very scary. This lady at the National Security Council was badgering Jim, you know, what's going on? And Jim kept on saying nothing is going on, trust me, we know it, we know it. We sent a flash message this afternoon because all of the Western embassies were briefed together that tonight Yeltsin was going to crack down on, I don't know if it was the legislature or particular people or whatever, this was all absolutely in the cards, there was no danger, we were told all about it. We sent, I repeat, a flash telegram, you know, that's supposed to be war and peace. It didn't matter because this lady said but I see this, I'm watching it on CNN. And finally Jim got fed up and he said look. You're going to have to decide. Are you going to believe me or are you going to believe what you're seeing on CNN? Fortunately but just barely they accepted what our charge d'affaires, a tremendously knowledgeable and experienced and reasonable person said and this taught me a big lesson, you know. Boy, that image on TV, that picture conquers a State Department telegram hands down. The telegram was marked "secret" and probably "NODIS" and "flash" and all the rest and it didn't matter; nobody had read the damn telegram.

Q: You said you could go on and on about Ambassador Strauss. Go on and on about Ambassador Strauss.

GEISEL: Okay, okay. Here's a good one. I was distressed by how barren the submarine looked, or the near submarine, because the submarine itself where it was shielded enclosures, you couldn't put anything in but the ambassador and political section, other people had offices just outside of the submarine where, you know, you could sort of do business but you weren't supposed to talk about anything too classified but you could work on your classified documents, for example, you could type- no, you couldn't type your telegrams, that would be inside an enclosure. But you could read your traffic, for example. And all the corridors there were just painted white and that was the end of it. As I said, they were not electronically sensitive areas because we assumed they were compromised. So I came up with the bright idea that in the interest of morale, at the end of the fiscal year, we ended up with money we didn't know what to do with except I knew what to do with it. I appointed a committee under the chairmanship of the cultural affairs officer to go out and buy art for the embassy. Because you had brilliant stuff; this was 1992, you had wonderful, wonderful stuff that you could get for 100 bucks, maybe at most 200 bucks a painting. Now, that changed fast, just in the time that I was there. But I forgot how many paintings we bought but we bought a lot of paintings and put them up, where we could, and everyone was in love with them and it made things so much better, as you can imagine.

Now, when Strauss got ready to leave, I'm skipping ahead but just because it's one of the better Strauss stories, he didn't even say he was leaving, but he called for me and he said I want to walk around the embassy with you, Harry. I knew he was up to something. And he said now, I'm so happy you bought this wonderful art and you know, let's walk and take a look at it. We walked around, he comes to one painting and he says you know, that's my favorite painting, Harry, I'd like to buy that from the embassy. I mean, this is typical admin officer problem. He said I'll pay you; I'll pay the embassy what the embassy paid. I said I can't do that, Mr. Ambassador. He said what do you mean? You're not losing anything. I said suppose that that painting for which we paid, I believe, $200, is worth $20,000? How can I sell it to you for $200? And he said have you got regulations? I said I sure as hell do. And if you want to buy it you'll have to buy it at an auction. He said okay, okay, I'll buy it at an auction. I said no, but I'm not putting it up at an auction, the only things we put on auction are the stuff that we don't need anymore. So he left it. I mean, he's the kind of guy who would. Except he didn't quite leave it. He said well, take me around and show me your favorite painting. So I took him around to show him a big, big, big painting that was, what do you call the style where it's all in dots?

Q: Pointillism.

GEISEL: Exactly.

Q: Seurat.

GEISEL: Yes. A huge one of a birch forest done actually as you could imagine by a guy who is not so much an artist as he was a set designer. And here's where the story gets good. He says that's the ugliest f'ing painting I've ever seen. Which he didn't really mean but, you know. Well, a few weeks later I walked into his office, I said, you know that ugly painting that you didn't like that I liked so much? He said yes. I said I bought it. He said you WHAT? I hadn't really planned to buy it. I said well here is the story and you can check it out. That was the only painting that we had that we hadn't bought. It was on consignment. The NBC reporter at the time was a guy named Bob Abernathy and his wife was a White Russian duchess or something like that or descended from them. Oh, Sheremetyevo, same name as the airport. She was sort of sponsoring artists and she had asked if we could put up some art on consignment as well. Now, it wasn't actually where the owned stuff was, I think it was over by the cafeteria or something. And I liked it but I just did this to get at Strauss. So I bought it, I think for $150. The thing is huge. I had it framed for $13; you could do that in those days.

Another Strauss story is I came late one day into the enclosure; we were having a country team meeting. He looked up and he said, Harry, that is the ugliest f'ing suit I have ever seen anyone wear. So I said yes, I know, I bought it from your tailor and I paid half of what you paid. Because he had the identical suit and had worn it the day before. He was the kind of guy that you could do it with. I think he was a masterful ambassador; he was exactly what we needed at the time.

Q: Well, you know, I've interviewed him and I was very impressed also. How would you describe your relations and impressions of the Russian authorities you were dealing with in Moscow?

GEISEL: Excellent question. All admin people had the misfortune of having to deal what was called the UPRK, which in Russian stood for Office of Services to the Diplomatic Corps. And they had been around forever and at the time they were run by an Armenian crook.

Q: That's crook not cook.

GEISEL: It sure was crook, I should say. And these guys had been used to getting their way all the time, especially on property. I wined and dined them and chatted them up and tried to BS them as much as I could and a couple of guys I got vaguely friendly with but a) I didn't trust them, b) I assumed they all were or had been KGB types and they were, on a personal sense reasonably pleasant but in terms of my being able to do my job they made my job infinitely harder, especially when we had no choice and we had to use them for something.

Q: Well were things approaching the point where, you know, you're moving out of the Soviet era, I can go out on the open market and hire people or not?

GEISEL: Yes, yes. After we fired all the UPDK people, I guess it was in the earlier '90s, we got our own people. No doubt some of them were spies but I had that great blessing which my predecessors a couple times removed hadn't had. We could make our own mistakes.

Q: Did you find that given the atmosphere and the KGB influence and all, at the same time you were dealing with more Russians than probably anybody else in the embassy, that you were getting pretty good information of how to work the system from your people?

GEISEL: Yes. Well, it depended, because remember, almost by definition if we cleared these people, I mean cleared in the security sense such as it was, they probably didn't know how to work the system that well themselves. You know, many of them had been teachers who weren't being paid. I would say we had a handful of people who were awfully good and did understand the system but it wasn't like a typical embassy where the admin people- admin Americans can sit back and to have these wonderful, wonderful FSNs who have been at the embassy forever-

Q: As in Bonn or something.

GEISEL: As in Bonn, exactly. I wonder now, you know, this is how many years later? Let's see, that was '93, let's say, and this is 2006? Thirteen years later? I wonder what's happening. One of the problems we had, which Jim Collins told me just the other day is not such a problem anymore, is American businesses were stealing our people as fast as we could bring them on because a) they were reasonably security cleared and b) they were trained in English and-

Q: And you could pay more and they-

GEISEL: They could pay far more, that's where- On average they used to steal our people and pay triple what we paid. Russians have gotten more expensive now and also a lot more are available and hopefully we still have some of the good people.

I heard a little while ago that one of the guys I liked the best was a guy who we hired as chief telephone operator and I heard he was still there and he was a wonderful, wonderful witty, very, very bright guy and we had the good sense to pay him well so he hadn't left.

Q: Did you have any problem with the Marine security guard?

GEISEL: Wasn't I lucky? I didn't. You know, I wasn't there long enough. But no, no Lonetree or anything even close to that. Remember that by then Russia was so swinging, there were so many foreigners there that they could find all the girlfriends they wanted who weren't Russians, even though I must say, you know, the first time I visited Russia was 1973, it was on a tourism thing when I was assigned to Norway. And when I came back in 1992, 19 years later, I said where did all these good looking Russian girls come from? Of course they were always there but all of a sudden there were clothes to buy, there was makeup, there were Western magazines and I guess, you know, these were the daughters of the mothers that I wouldn't even waste my time looking at.

Q: I can recall the wives of Soviet diplomats up to a certain point all looked like Nina Khrushchev, you know, nice little babushkas but plump and with a wart on their-

GEISEL: Nose or anywhere.

Q: Yes. And then oh my God, all of a sudden the Russian diplomats started coming up with these svelte young ladies.

GEISEL: Yes.

Q: I mean, you know, it was as though somebody pushed a button and they changed their production line.

GEISEL: It was remarkable. And of course this gets back to what I was saying before; that it was so exciting to be in Russia then. Look, it was hard, it was drab. I don't know that I ever worked as hard in my life, not even in Rome, not even in Africa as I did in Moscow; it was just one problem after another. Look, the admin minister counselor, whatever I was, had to invest not hours but days figuring out how to get gas for the vehicles because you'd either have feast or famine, you never knew what the price was. The whole place was wild.

Q: This was in a state that had one of the largest reserves in the world.

GEISEL: Absolutely. Now, what we ultimately did, and of course, the Russians were playing us and everyone off; all of a sudden there'd be these artificial scarcities, no stations would have gas. We would have drivers, when I got there, we had PA&E drivers who were always out looking for gas. Well, I said, this is crap. Why don't we have tanks on the compound? And they said FBO forbids it because of the fire and everything else. I said well, we've got to have them and I called up FBO and I said we're going to have tanks. Oh no, no, no, you can't. I said I'm not asking you, I'm telling you, we're going to have tanks. Now, if you want you can have someone come out and help us build them safely or you cannot. And you know, I said to you, on a telegram from Strauss, how shall we work this? So they helped us construct safe tanks and we had very strict procedures on filling up. We used to get our gas from ESSO in Finland and of course it cost a fortune but we had it. And hey, guess what? Within, I'd say, about three or four months the Russians stopped jerking us around on the gas because they knew we were going to get it under a diplomatic shipment from Finland

Q: Did you run across or get out or have any intimation, I mean, you had Moscow and St. Petersburg there, you know, these were cities and they were really going, and then going out into the countryside I'm told, you know, by people it's like going back into the 14th century. I ran across this in Yugoslavia-

GEISEL: Oh sure.

Q: -a couple decades before, you know.

GEISEL: There was the element of the Potemkin village, not so much in Moscow itself because Moscow was just becoming a real European city at breathtaking speed But no, absolutely. We'd take rides out in the country, then all of a sudden the roads would disintegrate before your eyes and you'd see these miserable little shops with nothing in them and the awful housing and all the rest and people dressed in one step from rags. Sure. But then all of a sudden you never knew what you were going to run into. You could run into a terrific dacha or whatever. The place was changing so fast.

Q: Did you have any problems with what people call the Russian mafia? I mean, there were the old guard sort of buying up all the stuff, I mean, they were getting Soviet apparatchiks who got in-

GEISEL: Well, look at Yukos or Khodorkovsky who bought Yukos for what Philip Hoffman who was the Washington Post bureau chief there said was probably about one cent on the dollar. He rigged the auction and for quite awhile there were all these foundations that were well paid by Khodorkovsky, bleeding and crying about how he was, victimized. I actually wrote a little story for an investment publication I write for and my title, which was changed by the editor, was "He Stole it, They Stole it Back". We didn't have many problems with the oligarchs and I take my hat off to the economic section because I think their reporting was very good, I think they got it right. Ken Yalowitz was the head in my day. Have you interviewed him yet?

Q: Who?

GEISEL: Ken, Kenneth Yalowitz. He ended up being ambassador in Belarus and Georgia.

Q: And where is he now?

GEISEL: I think he's retired, I'm pretty sure he's retired and he is a wonderful person and he had some great people working for him. We would have problems and occasionally we'd be warned off and told, you know, don't buy stuff there, the mafia runs it or watch out, you don't want to hire that firm, it's mafia. Or we had one case which happened after I left but I knew the chap. We had had a young man working in our economic section. He was originally PA&E, but he was a college grad who spoke great Russian and had his feet on the ground, really, for economics and we used him a lot and he ultimately left the embassy to go into business and he was murdered.

Q: What about crime?

GEISEL: We didn't experience much of it. You know, the bad guys were warned off, you know, stay away from the embassy, stay away from diplomats and they were smart enough to do it. The cops were pretty corrupt, especially the road traffic police but again, they would leave us alone if they would see it was diplomatic. So no, I certainly felt as safe in Moscow as I felt anywhere.

The gypsies had come. The same gypsies, I mean not literally the same. Well, who knows? Maybe they were. I remembered them with less than fondness from my Rome days when they would be up and down the Via Veneto with the little kids and their signs and ripping off tourists and occasionally ripping off embassy staff members.

Q: Pick pocketing.

GEISEL: Pickpockets were there and we were warned, especially around tourist sites like the circus, to be very, very careful. But certainly organized crime or real criminals, violent criminals especially no, I felt safer there than just about anywhere.

Q: How did you find the embassy community? I'm talking about all the embassies. During Soviet times, you know, this was, particularly embassies from the West-

GEISEL: All stuck together.

Q: -all stuck together.

GEISEL: That's right. And the Marine house was the hangout in those days. I remember going there in those days, you know.

Q: How was it at this point?

GEISEL: I would say we still had very good relations. Remember, schooling was an issue and the school, THE school in Moscow was the Anglo-American School, which was jointly run by the American embassy and the British embassy and we broke a lot of rules in those days that I hope we're still breaking today. The Russians didn't care. We accredited all the teachers as attaches and gave them some privileges and of course we had to find them housing.

***

GEISEL: We used to get some terrific teachers at that school. We could get anything we wanted from our business communities because of course there was far more demand for places in that school than we had room after we took care of diplomats. We had a real pecking order but my counterpart, Jim Daly, the British admin minister counselor and I worked hand in glove to see that the embassies were recognized for their kindness by the business communities and they paid well. They were happy to pay. I mean, I had calls from very high level corporate officials saying you've got to get so-and-so's daughter a place, he won't stay in Moscow otherwise. This is vital to our business. I loved it.

Now, just as a funny aside, I ended up being ambassador in Mauritius a few years later and one day, of course I'd been tipped off, I was driving to a cocktail party, no, I dinner party that a friend was giving for us, and we watched for another car and we made sure we were behind that car and that car's passengers got out and it was the new British high commissioner and his wife.

I'd been there about a year and of course that British high commissioner was Jim Daly, who was my friend in Moscow some years before.

GEISEL: I left in, well, I was recruited, and my God, in April I was a bit shocked. It was a two year tour because it was considered a real hardship in those days. They weren't sure, you know, the Democrats had come in, not that that had anything to do with me but it was a new administration and various people knew me and I didn't even know that they knew me. I was told that I was wanted to be chief financial officer and I was told to come back to be interviewed by Brian Atwood who was supposed to be undersecretary for management. You know, he was for I believe it was 11 days before he went to AID. And Brian interviewed me and he said no, I've got to have a diversity candidate in that job but I'd love you to be my executive assistant. Well, after my time with John Rogers I was not about to, I'd learned not to say no to the undersecretary of state for management. So I said sure and I went back to Moscow and I told my wife that this would be happening and she had the same mixed emotions that I had. We were terribly excited by Moscow but it was a drab place and it was a tough life and I was working dreadfully hard and I said it would be in my career interest to do this and we decided to take it. We then took a holiday down in South Africa and I got all these crazy calls from various people back at State while I was in South Africa and the long and the short of it, which they wouldn't say over the phone but it was that Atwood was not going to be M, it was going to be Dick Moose and somehow, when I finally found that out I said, well for God's sake, Moose was assistant secretary for Africa when I was in Bamako and when I had the AF roving administrative team. I know him, he knows me. Ah, he knows you, well please come. Then all of a sudden someone said well we've checked around and yes, you're still wanted to come back. So of course I came back to be executive assistant in M.

RICHARD L. STOCKMAN
Consultant (Retired Foreign Service Officer)
Tashkent, Tbilisi, and Bishkek (1992-1993)

Richard L. Stockman was born in 1940 and raised in Kansas. He attended the Vincentian Fathers seminar in Perryville, Missouri for nine years until 1962. In 1963, he entered the U.S. Army. Mr. Stockman's Foreign Service career included positions in Brazil, Honduras, Singapore, Togo, Switzerland, the United Kingdom, (Ireland), Saudi Arabia, Canada, Kyrgyzstan, and Georgia. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on October 12, 1993.

STOCKMAN: ...I went to Tashkent in the summer of 1992, June, July and part of August; followed by Tbilisi in October, November and part of December. In between those two assignments I was asked to go to New York for a brief period, which turned out to be a month. So I had a pretty active year the second half of 1992. And then this year when 1993 rolled around there was kind of a down period until about the end of March when they asked me to go to Caracas for about a month. I had never been there before and I enjoyed that. But it was still not the kind of assignment that these are out here in the former Soviet Union. This makes my second trip to Bishkek.

Q: Well, as long as I have you here, tell me a little about Tashkent. What was your impression?. The Soviet Union has basically collapsed and some of its component parts have become independent states. What was your impression of Tashkent which was the capital of Uzbekistan and what you saw there and also how our very new embassy was operating there?

STOCKMAN: Well, as you can appreciate, for someone who had never worked or traveled behind the Iron Curtain, almost anything you do or see is an adventure. You arrive knowing very little about the assignment other than a few simple briefings that advanced teams can give you. You might pick up an atlas or some other type of informational guide to give you a clue before you pack or do anything else. But at any rate the initial reactions for me were very, very profound and unforgettable experiences. Tashkent was supposed to have been the fourth largest city in the Soviet Union. I really have my doubts after seeing Tashkent for ten weeks...June, July and August of 1992...I seriously have my doubts about its superpower status...the Soviet Union and Tashkent's role in it...judging by what I saw.

You arrive there after a very long trip, having overnights in Moscow. In those days all of us entered through Moscow and fanned out to the various independent states by way of Aeroflot. Well, of course, it is quite a shock to fly on Aeroflot. I don't care how experienced you are traveling, that is a unique experience.

Q: What's it like?

STOCKMAN: Oh, it is like no other airline in the world. I really think the kindest description you can give of Aeroflot is simply a wide bodied cattle car. They are not designed with comfort in mind or any of the amenities of life that we are accustomed to, as Westerners, as Americans. They are simply devices for getting huge numbers of people point to point at the cheapest possible cost. Some of the impressions I you got will last with me forever. It is a very impersonal experience. You find a seat and somehow as Westerners you seem to get the last remaining seats on this huge plane. They are not very clean, to put it mildly. They are not very comfortable. And I wonder how well they are maintained as far as safety goes. The tires, for example, looked very bald. The ride is okay. You are not about to be entertained on these flights in any form and you are not going to receive any kind of food or drink that you might expect on a normal airline. Consequently you are quite happy when you get there.

Eventually you get there. The only arrangement for housing was the Intourist Hotel where we stayed for ten solid weeks. Again the same type of experience that the former Soviet Union offered foreigners. The all over city of Tashkent, itself, is kind of unique. They had a major earthquake there in the late '60s. Apparently the entire city had to be completely rebuilt. It took the Soviets, they say, ten years to do that. Judging from the looks of things today, I don't think that they ever went back and remodeled anything. Soviet construction is quite a joke. A US seismologist passed through and took a few days look of the overall city and quickly reached the conclusion that if they were to have another major earthquake of the same proportions, 6 or 7 on the Richter scale, the same thing would happen all over again. In other words they didn't learn much from the previous experience.

Soviet construction per se is crude, it functions, it is not particularly esthetically pleasing and I really don't have much to say for it. An Intourist hotel might be a classic example of how not to do it. It works, more or less, but certainly is not comfortable. It is monotonous. It is just not a very pleasant experience. Food, drink, culture, customs...Tashkent is described as a moderate Moslem city. People are very sober. They dress very modestly. Nothing is flashy or stylish in their clothing. The food that is available is again pretty much the same type, very basic. You don't see very many over weight people there, which I think speaks for itself. I would expect that the diet is not exceptionally nutritious based upon what we were served in the Intourist hotel day after day. It is not very plentiful either. Meats and dairy products are almost nonexistent.

The city, itself, is kind of nondescript in the sense that it is not alive. You see huge, huge avenues laid out in typical Soviet style that would dwarf any US city. We would not be able to afford the luxury of taking such huge spaces for large avenues and underpasses for pedestrians. Many and most of these things were designed for two reasons. I think one to psychologically give the people a sense of openness because they were living in such congested, disagreeable apartments and when they got out into the open people had a sense of freedom. They typically have theaters, a building dedicated to annual circus visits, things of this nature that were all very socialist in design and intent.

You didn't really see what you see so commonly in America. For example, obviously you didn't see churches, because of the prohibition on religion. You didn't see buildings easily identified as schools. You didn't see hospitals as such. Yes you would see ambulances from time to time. You saw police and civil guards. Tashkent had more than its share of those. They were more readily visible in the government building area grounds for obvious reasons. But likewise they were very apt to stop motorists frequently and randomly one suspects more for bribes than anything else. Or maybe it was their only source of income. Who knows.

Tashkent, not unlike some other cities I have seen, are very dark at night. They are poorly lighted. It is very dangerous from a physical point of view to walk on their sidewalks at night because they have so many open holes and dangerous debris lying around. There is not the cleanliness and the upkeep of the buildings. There would be debris everywhere. Tashkent in its own right was far better and cleaner than other places that I have seen for whatever reason I don't understand. Maybe because there were the vehicles and crews to do these kinds of chores of maintaining some standard of living and hygiene.

You would go to open markets where the farming community would sell the products to the local community which was quite an interesting sight. The conclusion that I reached very quickly was that what was produced today is consumed today. Not much technology in terms of preservation which must obviously create great problems in the winter time. How do you survive in the winter? Some very basic questions from which you can draw obvious conclusions just by observing and watching and seeing what goes on. Everywhere you go in this part of the world, also there must be concern about the availability of fuel, whether it is for the few cars that are around or the planes in which you can get in and out of these places. It's becoming a real serious problem for all purposes...government, transportation, industrial production...the lack of vehicles, the maintenance of roads, the availability of fuel. The railroads that you do see, and I have noticed this now in two of the three countries I have been in, look poorly maintained. The equipment is old, it is rusty, it is dilapidated. I don't think you could find anything similar to this anywhere in the US today, other than in a museum, perhaps. It is incredible.

Q: What was your impression of our embassy in Tashkent?

STOCKMAN: Well, this was my first experience in this program, working out here in these new CIS countries.

Q: CIS stands for?

STOCKMAN: At this point of time we used Commonwealth of Independent States.

Q: These are sort of the central Asian states including up through Georgia, too.

STOCKMAN: Yes, I think there is a total of 15.

Q: Really former Soviet states not including Latvia, Estonia and Lithuania.

STOCKMAN: Right. In all probability we will only serve on this program for maybe three or four years total, five perhaps. Maybe they will eventually designate a permanent party. But, anyway, getting back to your point. This particular embassy superficially appeared to be a beautiful building, an ideal selected spot. It was obviously going to be an area in which the Uzbek government wanted the diplomatic missions who were coming to stay in. We were given a building which was originally supposed to be used for say a chamber of commerce or exhibition hall. As it turned out it was anything but functional. It actually had a fully furnished discotheque with refrigerators and everything in the basement of it. We had no real protective security means to cordon off that area. For security reasons in the beginning it was a nightmare. We didn't know who was down there, who would use it. We couldn't use it freely even for a luncheon facility. That is just one of the anomalies of this whole thing.

As you went into the building there was an atrium running up through 60 percent of the building from the main floor up to the ceiling with non-usable space. We were left with 40 percent of the building to use as an embassy which was just unworkable. No matter what operation you are talking about. Whether it was consular operations or GSO or communications, or USIS, or administration, it really didn't matter. The offices were tiny. In addition, from a physical standpoint of view, the building used the typical aluminum wiring, nothing worked. It was dangerous and easily set on fire. The engineering of it was very poor. The Brazilians have an expression that pretty well sizes it up. They say bonito mas ordinario, "cute but ordinary," and that was really it in a nutshell.

Q: What was the spirit of the embassy? Here was a brand new state and we were setting up things. Could you describe the feeling?

STOCKMAN: That is a very interesting question because you could ask the same question, of course, in each and every embassy in the 15 newly established places. I actually arrived there after it had been opened for about two and a half months. I was starting from scratch building communications. Even the equipment had not arrived when I was first there. What did come in came in on support flights. But getting to your point and question, initially, of course, there was a tremendous problem in staffing these embassies. You can imagine being tasked with opening 15 embassies at one time. How do you start? Who do you choose? Language skills. Who is available? So somehow you get a team together, brief them and assure them that you will hold their hand and support them. So spirits are high. Volunteers are in some cases ambitious, some are just simply romantic, some are well prepared, and some are not prepared to even do the task that has to be accomplished.

I would say initially the personal relationships are really key to getting something going effectively. In this particular case, Tashkent, had such a high number in turnover, rotation of TDYers, that it was really painful to those few who were permanent party. They were tired of this constant turnover. They had no assurances that others would volunteer and become permanent party and quite honestly I don't think their expectations were very high. What they did see or were able to predict was not something that you really wanted to think about too long. In other words, we raised the flag, we opened the doors, a few of us knew what we were supposed to do and how to get it started. We have a cadre of FSNs who didn't even understand what an FSN was.

Q: FSN being Foreign Service National, local employees.

STOCKMAN: How these people were selected, cleared and hired god only knows. Obviously mistakes were made. Some of the wrong people may have been hired, some overqualified and unhappy in their jobs as well. They are looking to us for guidance and instruction as to what they are supposed to do not having the faintest idea what GSO stands for...

Q: General Services Officer.

STOCKMAN: You can appreciate this situation. In the case of Tashkent there were a few extra demands made upon us there, which eventually started to tax everyone's perseverance and patience. That was security requirements. The building was not in any shape or form whereby we could walk off in the evening and leave it unattended. We literally had to become Marine Security Guards there after hours. So we set up rosters. Everyone took their fair share. In other words from six in the evening until six in the morning we had American presence on the property. You did your fair share and there were only seven or eight of us there so your duty came up pretty regularly.

There was another problem, the roof was leaking on this new building and it had to be repaired. Well, from a security point of view you can not let a lot of foreign workers on the top of the embassy unattended or unaccompanied. So we had to climb up the side of the building in the hot sun, sit up there and roast with them and do duty on the roof. But not everybody could do this. Some had fear of heights and were afraid to go on the roof. So it seemed like you could not find enough time to do your real job, the job you were sent out there for.

And then too, I think, older, more experienced people realized that they would have to do a little bit more than they were sent out there to do. They have to be leaders. They have to show a little bit of initiative, motivation and all of those things you would expect of older people. Younger people, if they were not well prepared before coming out there, had to be baby sat. Then there was the language problem. Not everybody could speak Russian. So that became a problem. There were just many logistical problems. You would run out of this or that. Something as simple as a stapler, or paper for a laser jet printer. Something you would take for granted anywhere else. Or the fuses or lights would go and you couldn't find any replacements. This or that wouldn't work. Or the drivers would go off and disappear and leave you stranded at night. What do you do? Hitchhike, take the subway, or what? It was always something new. Or you would go to the airport to pick up some diplomatic pouches. No one had ever done this, so how do we do this? Or how do we pay for these pouches? No one knew how to do it. There was no form. They didn't know how much to charge you for excess baggage. Every time you turned there was a new problem or new question that nobody could answer and therefore nothing happened. And on and on it went.

I would say that most could enjoy the challenge for about six weeks and then a combination of things would start to set in and you would say, "Well, how many more days do I have to go?" And maybe the next person who came in would have a few more answers. But you kept looking for continuity, but you wouldn't always find it. I think it was painful in the administrative cone. The other officers...there was usually only one officer for each responsibility and some officers had to double up doing political/econ reporting. Those who were qualified in languages had extra duties because they had to help be interpreters all the time and their patience would get thin some times.

But I think overall most people seriously enjoyed the challenge, but they knew that the only way to get this off the ground eventually was to get a permanent party cadre established there, and that was not easy to do.

Q: Well then you went to Georgia, to Tbilisi. Now I assume a great deal that you said about Tashkent applied to Tbilisi. Could you talk about what was different...How are we doing on time?

STOCKMAN: I think just about everything was different in Tbilisi in a sense that Tashkent seemed to be a template of Moscow in many respects, whereas Georgia was very much Georgian, not only in the topography, the weather, but I think more importantly in the people, their independent nature. As we know right now the armed conflict has really not settled down. No thanks to the Russians taking sides surprisingly in a kind of unappreciative way towards Shevardnadze, but I guess maybe that is predictable too. It was basically from the very start a much different trip. The simple logistics of getting into Tbilisi, which is a very poverty stricken country today, with, I think, very limited resources. Almost the entire infrastructure of the country seems to be coming to a grinding halt.

Transportation, for example. We had to wait in Vienna, Austria because the plane was delayed twelve hours. It is a very unique arrangement that the Austrians have with the government of Georgia to ferry people back and forth. Due to the severe lack of fuel of all kinds for both heating and transportation, but particularly transportation, flights in and out of Tbilisi are limited to once a week, on Saturdays, or at least they were at that time. I doubt that things have improved a year later. At any rate the Austrians had built two marvelous four star hotels, one in Tbilisi, Georgia and the other one up in the Caucasus Mountains. They seem to have a monopoly on the tourist industry there, what little there is. Basically they would be catering to rich Europeans and other Westerners who ski and want to get away to a unique romantic type of place. At any rate they also have locked into this hotel arrangement, one charter flight a week, which is a small Aeroflot type plane which carries both cargo and people once a week on Saturdays. That is how we managed to get in there in October.

In the course of that two and a half months of TDY there it was very interesting. By the contrast the Georgian people are very lively. They are well known for their dancing, their culture, their songs, their history and likewise their food, at least in the times when it was plentiful. They are marvelous entertainers. They will offer 50 toasts a night at any Georgian table to which one would be invited. And yet, it is very sad to be there because you can see the strong, horrible evidence of a civil war that took place right in the heart of Tbilisi where very selectively key government buildings were literally destroyed in the civil war which took place I believe December, January, February of say late 1991, early 1992. Consequently it is almost a miracle that anything of any real importance was left in tact and that Shevardnadze could still run a government. But apparently they did have new parliamentary elections some time in early or mid 1992. His fledgling government was trying to hang on when I arrived there in October, November and December. Consequently what one was able to do in terms of getting a real look at the country was somewhat limited and by that I mean primarily because of very high risk security factors. Travel was or should have been restricted to daylight hours only. At night it was not uncommon to hear gun fire randomly all night long on and off throughout the city and therefore unnecessary travel was completely discouraged. All of us were housed in the four star hotel there at the time for lack of housing, with, I think, two exceptions. Two of the single female officers had found accommodations that were, I guess, adequate. But at any rate the city at night was extremely dark and dangerous and we were pretty much confined to the hotel. We did have a satellite dish on the balcony of my room which we used for emergency communications after hours. There were numerous military flights, humanitarian assistance in a project called Project Hope, and the third or fourth flight was taking place during the time I was there.

But to answer your question, this would be somewhat of an explanation of the contrast between the two places.

Q: Could you explain the state of relations between Georgia and the United States? What were you doing and how were things working out?

STOCKMAN: Well, I think the relationship between the two governments, in light of recent past history with Shevardnadze, were probably as excellent as one could expect. Certainly I would imagine that we were doing everything possible to support him and to try and convince the people that this was a beginning, one in which we were quite interested and of course we were doing everything that could be done, piecemeal fashion, to begin to put things together. One thing I noticed taking place there that I suppose has also happened in other countries out here, is that there was a team of international jurists there at the time. Apparently they were working together with the new government trying to give them some idea of how to start writing a new constitution. That would really be the first real fundamental legal step in establishing, I suppose, a new democracy that they were not accustomed to.

Q: For the historian later, what was the civil war about?

STOCKMAN: What little that I could piece together, apparently there were many, not unlike other CIS countries, many ethnic groups who, over perhaps decades and decades had their axes to grind. Perhaps family feuds, turf battles, political battles of whatever sort. I suppose if one uses a little imagination, and perhaps even reads Fitzroy McLean, a British diplomat's book, "Eastern Approaches" you could get a real feel for what Joseph Stalin did and the repercussions many years later. His mass deportation of ethnic groups to opposite ends of the Soviet Union obviously had its accumulative effect, in my opinion. I believe we are starting to see reaction to this purging, or ethnic cleansing or whatever you might call it.

Then the fact that he who was in power in the old system had all the perks. And those who were in power didn't want to leave it because it would probably mean a lost of an apartment, a car and all the things that went along with it. So there is a classless society in today's new democracy starting to show what power struggles really mean.

Q: Dick, how were we setting up our embassy at that time?

STOCKMAN: Well the embassy there in Tbilisi was certainly a very unique setup. The government had apparently pointed out one building in the early days and designated it as the most suitable for the US embassy. Apparently that was it, there were not many alternative choices. It was a very old, classical building. The very architecture of the building, quite honestly, did not make it very functional for diplomatic purposes. The ceilings were perhaps 20 feet high and it would be very difficult functionally to use all that space effectively, let alone to heat it in the winter time, which we found out very quickly. The electrical wiring in the building was dilapidated. And yet you could see obvious signs that this was the equivalent of some ministry building with very ornate woodwork and doors, the high ceilings, the tapestry, expensive and old oil paintings in various places throughout the building. In some locations there were fireplaces. So with a little imagination you could just about picture the old establishment, perhaps even the last days of the Tsar, living the life of Riley. And, of course, that came to a quick end.

Q: Who was our Ambassador while you were there?

STOCKMAN: Kent Brown.

Q: Was he an experienced Soviet hand?

STOCKMAN: Well, I understand that most all of these Ambassadors at one time or another were very experienced Soviet hands. I did not know any of them personally not having served in the Soviet Union or behind the Iron Curtain. But I would certainly say he and his wife were probably two of the most charming people and in my opinion expertly chosen to be ambassador and leaders for a new embassy. They were really, really appreciated by all the embassy staff. And the team loyalty that they had generated was showing obvious results there. Because it is a difficult post in many respects to work in and yet the morale seemed very, very high for obvious reasons, they had very strong leadership.

Q: How was it communications-wise?

STOCKMAN: The commo set up was pretty much the same as it is in all of these embassies. It was effective. The Achilles heel to all of it, of course, is the city power that we rely upon...most of these embassies that don't have real true generators that we need for emergencies, during power failures in the city... for all practical purposes the telephone installation there and the communications gear was very effective. Thank god.

Q: Well, you were there for how long?

STOCKMAN: Two and a half months.

Q: Was there any consideration because of the fighting that they might close it down again?

STOCKMAN: At that point in time I don't think there was any such consideration. There was not actually out right civil war in the city during the time I was there. There were factions, of course, that were doing their thing at night time, primarily gun running and smuggling I suppose of all kinds. Of course the lack of fuel kept that to a minimum too. The real true fighting was up in the one corner of the country where they are having the secessionist effort, I believe the Russians are backing to some extent. It did make you feel nervous because after all you came out of the hotel in the morning and you would see the ground covered with shell casings on the street and you could hear it at night. Sometimes umpteen animals would come strolling into the hotel, the lobby, with their automatic weapons, somewhat drunk. So anything could have happened without any advanced notice. So you had to keep your wits about you and look and observe and literally stay out of trouble or avoid it.

Q: Well then lets move to the Kyrgyz Republic where you are now on a temporary assignment. Were you here when we first set this place up?

STOCKMAN: No. My first visit here was this year in July and August.

Q: When was it set up?

STOCKMAN: Well, I believe it was one of the very first. I recall seeing it on the front of State Magazine and would guess that was probably in early 1992. There was a large group of us who were recruited in the spring of that year, retired annuitants, to help alleviate the personnel shortages. We eventually got out into the field...most of us went into Moscow and then fanned out over the various CIS countries. This was in May and June, 1992. So I think the few embassies which were able to get open and staffed quickly probably did so in early 1992.

Q: How did you find Kyrgyzstan different from the other places?

STOCKMAN: Well, in this situation here...I am particularly fond of Kyrgyzstan. The people are marvelous. I have learned an awful lot in being able to talk with the people about their culture. One can visit a museum that is full of antiquities and historical artifacts. It is very accessible. It shows you a very, very sharp contrast with their historical past up to and including 70 years of communism, all within the same museum. So if that is your thing, it is available here. But I would say equally importantly is that fact that one can freely talk to the Kyrgyz people here and get a perspective...this is all in English, of course...of their country and traditions and still get a balanced feel for their patience and tolerance of other ethnic groups, particularly the Russians. I think that really shows a great deal of maturity on their part which may not be the case in many of the other republics. I believe that is really going to be their strongest trump that will really attract US support. And they may make progress far faster than the others. But there are numerous reasons why Bishkek is very enjoyable.

ROBERT E. MCCARTHY
Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Moscow (1992-1995)

Mr. McCarthy was born in Canada and raised in New York City. He was educated at Fordham University, City College of New York and American University. After service in the US Army and studies in Paris, he joined the Foreign Service in 1973. His assignment in the Bureau of Education and Cultural Affairs was the beginning of a career dealing primarily with Public and Cultural Affairs with USIA. His overseas assignments as Public Affairs and/or Cultural Affairs Officer were in Belgrade, Moscow (twice), Montenegro, Leningrad and Budapest. His Washington assignments also concerned USIA programs. Mr. McCarthy served as Diplomat in Residence at Georgetown University 1995-1996. Mr. McCarthy was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2003.

Q: So, what happened to you? In '92?

McCARTHY: Then I went to Russia, from '92 to '95, as Public Affairs Officer.

Q: Now, this must have been quite a tremendous change, wasn't it?

McCARTHY: Yes.

Q: In a way, you had some of the same things happening, but a huge country and all. When you went out there, what were you told would be some of your challenges?

McCARTHY: The challenge was partly just what you said. It's a huge country. You are going from a country of one time zone and ten million people, ethnically homogeneous, who have the luxury of putting all the blame on the Soviet Union, to a country that goes across eleven time zones, has 150 million people, lots of different ethnic groups, and in which reform is by no means guaranteed. There was an attempted coup the year before I got there, the attempted coup against Gorbachev, that was still fresh in people's minds, and all the arrangements were being worked out. The Soviet Union had collapsed just seven, eight months before I got there. So things were very much in flux, and you had reform from the top, but not really control over the situation. You had a lot of movement from the bottom, but not with the same track record that you had in Hungary and not with the same support. The big challenge was, how do you make an impact with your small staff in this immense country? At that time we were still suffering the effects of no Foreign Service national employees. The Foreign Service national employees for USIA were essential. They were real [a real asset].

Q: Absolutely. For everywhere.

McCARTHY: Yes. But there is a difference, when, because of classified working space, the FSN works in one place, and you are up behind a classified area. That's a little different from really working cheek by jowl and you pop into each other's offices all the time, you share work, you talk about things. There aren't many things off limits really that I can't talk to my FSNs about, you know. So, just to get back to my point, there were no FSNs. We had a contract with Pacific Architects and Engineers (PA&E), and their staff members were called PA&Eers. We had, I think, three of those in Moscow, and I must say they were superb, but there were only three. That was the year the Freedom of Support Act passed. So we had, about six months after I got there, something like $100 million worth of exchanges money coming our way. So, the challenge for me as a manager was to conceptualize what it was we had to do, realizing that you couldn't retail things the same way as you could in Hungary. You had to look for big multipliers. Who could multiply things for you? Who could you work with who could then have an impact on others?

Q: Who was the ambassador when you went out there?

McCARTHY: The ambassador, when I first got there, was Ambassador Strauss, who was burning up the lines to Congress about things like aid to Russia and everything, as you know, very, very well connected.

Q: I just finished up another session with him yesterday.

McCARTHY: Oh, did you? That must be the most engaging...

Q: Oh, it is.

McCARTHY: Oh. [laughter]

Q: [laughter] Wonderful, wonderful man.

McCARTHY: Oh, God. He would have these meetings with American correspondents, these sessions over in Spaso House. They'd be sitting in concentric rings, and he'd be a master. He'd keep them entertained and informed for 45 minutes to an hour of informal questions and discussions. It was great.

Q: You got to manage this. How did you approach your job? What do feel you were managing?

McCARTHY: A very large exchange program and extensive information outreach. And in connection with both I was managing relationships with a variety of intermediary organizations. This gets back to how USIA works, and again the tremendous support from Washington. The big USIA programs - International Visitors, Fulbright, special Freedom Support Act initiatives - are all carried out in partnership with non-governmental organizations. For example, for the Fulbright exchange, it's the Council on International Exchange of Scholars that does most of the implementation work on the exchange of scholars. The Institute of International Education that does most of the implementation on the exchange of Fulbright students. We worked through those organizations to implement exchanges on our behalf. Those NGOs were multipliers, bringing great expertise and commitment.

In Russia, prior to the fall of Communism, under the old Soviet Union, as I mentioned, we used to have a bilateral agreement on educational and cultural exchanges. There was a protocol that would go over two years, which would specify exactly what would happen. USIA had been working with some of those NGOs for years during the communist period. Now the numbers were vastly larger and the focus was on reform. But the USIA-NGO relationships were there and the expertise and hands-on experience were there on both sides. Other NGOs came on board as opportunities expanded.

So, what my colleagues and I did work with organizations that were managing exchanges in Russia, to increase their capacity by increasing their grants and by letting them take on additional staff to do work in Russia. And we were very fortunate, because the American alumni of the various exchange programs loved living in Russia. Anybody who studied Russia and Russian history in the Soviet era had this love-hate relationship with that country. There's just no way around it. They're drawn back to it like moths to the flame. And so someone who had spent a year there on an academic exchange leapt at the chance to go out there and work in an office of IREX (the International Research and Exchanges Board) or of ACTR, (the American Council of Teachers of Russian), or the ACC (the American Collegiate Consortium), and run exchange programs. Advertise them, get the applications, have national panels. So, our job was to keep in touch with those on the educational exchange side, keep in touch with those organizations, direct them, set the policy guidelines, and intervene as necessary. Some of their offices were outside of Moscow and that was all to the good. On the press side, it was a very, very big press operation. All the networks had bureaus in Moscow, as did the wire services and the major newspapers. You could have a camera crew on anything, not that they'd come just because you wanted them to, but they were there to cover real news. So, the ambassador's schedule, schedules of visiting delegations (we had congressional delegations all the time) presented opportunities. We had a Presidential visit the first January I was there, and another one later. We had the Gore-Chernomyrdin Commission, which meant at least one vice presidential visit every year. Lots of Cabinet secretaries all the time. In short, there were non-stop opportunities to engage the press, using the various VIP visits.

The ambassadors also generated press coverage. Ambassador Collins succeeded Ambassador Strauss... He was the DCM and became the Charge after Ambassador Strauss left. He was terrific also. He was a former exchange student there, in the late '50s, in fact I think he had roomed with the foreign minister. He was very attuned to Russian culture, Russian language, Russian history, was able to articulate our position very sensitively.

And then Ambassador Pickering came, another tremendous ambassador. So the leadership at the top was always excellent, which really helped, and the staffs there were very good throughout in all the sections. So, when managing the public diplomacy portfolio, you tried to work with your colleagues too - more multipliers. You tried to get out of the embassy and leave an institutional presence. One way we did that, and this was because of the Freedom of Support Act, was to establish information centers in some of the regional cities. These, again, were partnerships and were presented as partnerships. What we proposed was, "We will give you a small reference library, we will provide texts of recent journal articles on CD-ROM. We will provide Internet connectivity and student advising materials. You have to provide space, staff and staff salaries, and utilities. We will train the staff. And this will be a partnership. We tried this idea out in several places, picking regional centers, like Yekaterinburg, Nizhniy Novgorod, and Rostov. We succeeded in establishing these centers over the course of several years. It was complicated to do, and they illustrated our approach: "You can't get there yourself, so you have to work with others who can get there for you or with you." Erik Johnson, an Information Resources Officer who came to Russia later, expanded the number of centers greatly. They became known as "American Corners" and ultimately served as a model for a new worldwide program."

Q: Did you find the entrenched bureaucracy more of a problem there than you did in Hungary?

McCARTHY: Yes. Well, yes and no. I think it was a little harder "sell" to talk about openly-advertised merit-based competition where you identify the best and the brightest based on applications submitted from you know not whom and you knew not whence, and only when you see them do you realize that there are these diamonds out there. The going-in Russian position, because this was a system they knew, was that they should select candidates themselves. They wanted to avoid embarrassments. They said that we needed to get the best people, and the only way to do that was to use their knowledge and contacts That would be the best "take" on their position. The worst "take" on it would be, "This is an old boy network, this is a good thing. People want to go to the United States; I want to be associated with it. This will be patronage for me, and I would prefer to remain in control of it, thank you." So that was a long haul, really, getting past that initial position.

But people whose hearts were in the right place saw that these competitions yielded fabulous candidates in a way that would have been possible in no other way, and the impact on the individuals and the individuals' locations and families was dramatic. You have a high school kid, in third year, out someplace behind God's back in Siberia. (Future Leader Exchange Program), backed by Senator Bradley, funded by the Freedom of Support Act.. The student would go to the United States, go to an American high school, live with an American family, and go back. And, people would say, "How did you do that? You don't know anybody. Your family isn't connected. You're like us." And that message, sent through those exchange programs was as important, I think, as anything we put out in written form, outlining American values and beliefs. The proof of the pudding was in the eating. We didn't just talk the talk. We walked the walk. Exchanges reached out into all 89 subjects of the federation, as they call them, all 89 constituent parts of Russia.

In sum, bureaucracy was frustrating in some ways, but the chaotic state of so many things – including bureaucracy, opened up opportunities too.

Q: Did the collapsing nature of the Soviet Union affect you?

McCARTHY: Yes, I think it did. I think it influenced our approach. The big bucks were in the exchanges, and the philosophy was “You really don’t know which one of these horses is going to be out in front at any given time, and you really don’t know which is going to win the race. But you know that if this country is ever going to succeed, and if they are going to become some version of a market economy and some version of a democracy, they’re going to need people who have a democratic point of view and are educated in key fields like business management, economics, public administration law, journalism, etc.” Our theory was, “Select the right field, have an open competition, really get the word out, have an unbiased selection mechanism, select the best people to go into those fields, and ensure they have a worthwhile experience in the United States. They come back into important institutions, they hold democratic views, they rise up in those institutions; gradually, those institutions change. Those institutions are ultimately what the society needs, and the society changes with them. Again, it’s only a part, a small part of what had to happen in Russia, or the other countries in transition, but it was an important part. We thought that our comparative advantage lay in that area rather than trying to retail a lot of individualized rifle shot programs, although, we did some of that, too. As I mentioned with regard to Hungary, exchange programs also let us engage the leadership of the future on issues of central importance to the United States and to Russia.

Q: How about the intelligence services? This thing had been honed to control Russian activities since the czars’ time.

McCARTHY: Yes.

Q: Forever. So, here’s an old dog learning new tricks. You were messing around right where they didn’t want any. Basically, the philosophy had been to keep foreigners from messing around.

McCARTHY: Except that the avowed policy of the Russian government was reform. Regional leaders, legislators would look upon this as a good thing when people came from their districts, had this exchange opportunity, and came back. I think the FSB, or whatever the intelligence service happened to be called at any given time, had bigger fish to fry than this. Remember, you had people coming in who were treasury advisors going into the Finance Ministry; they were building housing for military officers who came back from east central Europe. We were working jointly on a space program; we had Nunn-Lugar money to dispose of nuclear weapons. These programs had greater security implications. I think that would be more where the intelligence service would direct its attention. However, we encountered intelligence service interest occasionally, when the Office of Research did opinion polling outside of Moscow, for example. You’d get blowback on that.

Q: When you got there, it was all Russian, it was no longer Soviet.

McCARTHY: Right.

Q: How about the Russian media? How did you find dealing with that?

McCARTHY: The Russian media were mixed. There was just a tremendous variety in the Russian media. From the crusading, to the “let’s try to get it right,” to the “this is my little niche” to “I’m going to become completely irresponsible and just say whatever I want, in order to sell papers.” Our approach to the situation was this.. We supported an organization called the Russian-American Press Institute. It wasn’t called that in the beginning, though. It was located in the Institute for the Study of the USA and Canada. My predecessor, John Katzka, had given them about $5,000 bucks or so to set up a library. Then we gave them a small grant to build on that.. Then we got funding to bring in a professional-in-residence, as we called it, someone who is a professional media person, journalist, to work there in that American Press Institute and organize activities. Among the activities were cataloguing cases where journalists were interfered with, arrested, or anything like that; following press legislation - so sort of a watchdog function would be part of it. And they did seminars for the press. For example, we went to Nizhniy Novgorod, a very reform-minded city in the early days, for a 2-day seminar. The editor of the Moscow News went up. A correspondent for the New York Times, Serge Schmemmann, a great correspondent, Russian-speaking, went up. I went up, the professional-in-residence, Lisa Schellinberger from the Russian-American Press Institute went up. We addressed a number of issues relating to freedom of the press and financial independence. Then later, the Press Institute established affiliates in other cities and organized these same types of activities in other parts of Russia.

Something I forgot to mention in Hungary, which also applies to Russia, is the IMF, not the International Monetary Fund, but the International Media Fund, which was funded out of the Freedom of Support Act and SEED. In Budapest, they established a journalism center and donated a journalism library. That was very important. In Russia, the IMF would bring in highly qualified experts to conduct seminars. Rather than our having to do it from our end in USIS, again because our hands were so few, the Russian-American Press Institute would make the arrangements. We would work with the Institute on the concept. The IMF would get this great group of people. They’d come in, join up with some Russian experts, and do the seminar for Russian invitees. They did some of that also in Hungary, and they were great, very responsive. Marvin Stone was the director of that operation.

On one occasion, in Hungary... if I can just skip back to show how responsive the IMF was. ... We’d had the first VOA, Voice of America, affiliate in East Central Europe. At one point this radio station wanted to break the agreement with us, claiming there was no way it could be profitable. Gene Mader, the VP or Deputy Director of the IMF, flew to Budapest on a couple days’ notice. He brought a superstar on management of radios. With him. We sat down with them, worked out a programming schedule on what would make sense economically, etc., etc., and it all worked out. But that’s the type of responsiveness we could count on. Again multipliers. That’s one of the ways we dealt with the press.

We also gave small grants to media, to buy a modem, upgrade a computer, pay Internet service charges. There were internships for journalists in American media outlets (Jim Denton at Freedom Forum did an excellent job on that), and a lot of International Visitor programs. For example we'd take editors of several papers and they'd go to the United States as IVs. Not only would they have conversations with their professional counterparts, see how the press was run in the United States, but they'd establish links among themselves, even though they were in different regions of Russia and links with Americans. Again, sort of a small part of...

Q: What about, particularly Western Europe, how did you cooperate and work with them?

McCARTHY: There was a separate office in the Embassy to do that. and AID was in there, of course, after a while in a big way. There was a need to do just that. To keep track of what was going on Ambassador Pickering established an assistance unit in the embassy with four people in it. There was a computer program to collect and aggregate by category and region, and other dimensions, all the assistance being given by the G7 countries. On a day-to-day level, frankly, we cooperated in an ad hoc way, with others. For example, if the regional Regional English Language Officer was going to do a three-seminar for teachers of English in the Volga region, he would work with the British Council to do that, rather than compete with the British Council. They shared the load. But the idea of going out and trying to coordinate activities in advance, when there are different funding lines, and when resources come online at different times... different imperatives from host governments was more than we could even consider. So we didn't really do it, frankly.

Q: So, what about... thinking in particular the French and the Germans... The Germans had always had sort of a entree there despite the unpleasantness of two world wars, but Germany is part of that area in a way. What were they doing?

McCARTHY: They had Volga there, they had Volga Germans there too. Gosh, what were the Germans doing?... I know they were all doing things, but for the life of me when you ask me that question now and I try to remember back...

Q: Well, how about the French?

McCARTHY: [laughter] Same thing. I can barely remember what we did.

Q: I'm just thinking that both the Germans and the French... in a way, so much of this, I imagine, was done in either Russian or in English, and that would put them somewhat outside this...

McCARTHY: They had the TACIS program (Technical Assistance to the Commonwealth of Independent States, I believe), which the EU did in addition to what the individual member states did. They were doing things in business development and they were doing things in public administration. They certainly had exchange programs. They certainly brought people to Europe on visits, and we cooperated later on NATO, but by then I wasn't there. You would discover the impact of other countries programs in your travels. We set up reading rooms, and sometimes you'd go around and you'd find out that there was a German room, for example in the Linguistics University in Nizhniy Novgorod, and they'd show it to you. At the Library of Foreign Literature, in Moscow, run by a very dynamic, firm believer in democracy, Yekaterina Genieva, my predecessor had worked with the library to set up an American reading room. Later that was expanded to be an American Center... a really nice place with American books, several reference librarians, electronic access, meeting rooms. Then, using that pattern, Mrs. Genieva also developed a French center, a German center, a Japanese center, and an Italian center. So those things were going on, and we did influence one another. Resources were available to do things like that. The French tended to do more cultural activities than we did. Their cultural budget was larger than ours. But to give you a comprehensive overview of what the strategy of other countries was, I really don't have a clue at this point.

Q: What was the attitude within Russia at this time? Were you finding a whole younger class or older groups of people who were all of a sudden able to blossom forth? Were you impressed by this, or notice...?

McCARTHY: I was very impressed by this. When you entered a room full of alumni of this FLEX high-school exchange program, who had spent a year in the United States - and you know, I'd do that when I'd travel around... It was like plugging into this gigantic battery. You just got this inflow of juice and energy from them, and it was clear that these kids were terrific and that something good was going to happen to them. In the area of entrepreneurship, we had a program called "Business for Russia," later called "Community Connections." The idea was you'd identify small business people. Here the philosophy again was "Let's stay clear of the big policy decisions." We know that entrepreneurship is permitted; we know that in the United States small business provides most of the jobs. We know it's going to be important in Russia, too. God knows there are niches in the service industry all over Russia. That was one of the big problems. So we know there are going to be small businesses. Let's try to have a program where you identify good people in small business. They go to the United States; they work in a business analogous to their own, they live in an American community with an American family. Then after 5 or 6 weeks, they go back to Russia and they take what they want, discard what they want. They may see bad lessons, they may see good lessons. They'll learn something about it and they'll be practical. We started this off on an experimental basis, adjusted it, etc., and basically it came down to not advertising nationally all at once because it was too complicated. And we wanted to establish ties between a city in Russia and a city in the United States, so that over a 3-year period, you might have several delegations going back and forth. Ultimately, Americans would then travel to follow up. These visits by Americans were unanticipated, but they happened. So we'd take, say, ten oblasts, ten regions at a time. We'd advertise; we'd get applications. We'd screen them and then we'd have interview panels that would talk to them. Select them...And they'd go to the United States. These entrepreneurs were not young but, to return to your question, they also blossomed forth.

Q: These would be mixed panels, Americans and Russians?

McCARTHY: Yes. Mixed panels, Americans and Russians. And this was a surprise. We were told, and I sort of thought this might be true too, all of us were surprised. The conventional wisdom was, "Yes, when you're in Moscow, St. Petersburg, the European part of Russia, maybe the Pacific coast, you will find small business people who also speak English - because you had to speak English for this program in order to imbibe by osmosis what was around you - but one you get out past the Urals, you're not going to find people..." But it turned out that there were people everywhere, and they had the most innovative ideas. Somebody marketing scalpels by mail... they'd target people. They'd send them one example of their product by mail, for free. And they'd say, "If you like this, get back to us." Marketing steel doors, because crime was a big, big problem. All kinds of people came out of the woodwork, so there was ample work for the binational panels.

So, yes, I was very heartened and surprised, by how widespread interest and ability were in Russia. The program for young professionals, called The Muskie Program, identified young people in law, young lawyers, people starting out in business after having a degree, journalists for graduate study at American universities. They were super and the American universities gave us great reports on them. So people were able to "blossom forth" in different ways. If you think about alumni of USIA exchange programs in Russia, it's like a pyramid, and it's all geared toward finding those people that we just mentioned, the people who are going to come out of the woodwork and be the new generation in Russia. At the bottom of the pyramid you'd have the high school kids, then you'd have high school teachers, then you'd have college students, then you'd have graduate students, then you'd have young professionals, then you'd have professors, and then at the apex of the pyramid if you like you'd have senior scholars and regional leaders and directors in different sectors of Russian society. The layers of the pyramid were interlocking.

Q: Were you having the problem that I was told existed in some places, it certainly did in Africa and all, that colleges and universities in the United States were sort of professional grant type things that took... whatever you want. This how they supported their grad students, not necessarily to the welfare of the country to which they were sent... these were often sent to African countries and mostly aid things. But I was wondering whether this crept in, of people coming, and they knew how to write grant proposals, but essentially the contribution was to do surveys or something that would serve the universities and not the people to whom they were serving.

McCARTHY: Right. There were a couple of problems that these countries faced when they were democratizing rapidly. They'd get all kinds of people coming in, not just universities... think tanks, private organizations... they would portray themselves as having resources, and just wanting to consult on how to use those resources best. In fact, what they were doing was getting material for grant applications which they were going to launch from a zero base of experience, and try to get money and go where the action was. The organizations in Hungary or Russia would spend a lot of time with these people because they'd think they were funded, but they were really just there on spec.

As far as the other points you mentioned - just coming and not wanting to do too much - we didn't have... Our programs weren't really set up so much that way. We had speakers who would come in, but they would be identified by USIA. We would have groups from NGOs that would come in and be linked with local NGOs, but they tended to be okay because the grant proposals would be run by the post first. So you would screen a pile of proposals. You'd see an organization listed and you'd think, "Boy, I'm surprised if anybody's contacted them." And you'd ask, and you'd find, "Oh, yes, somebody said... somebody signed the letter, but we don't know what it's all about." Or the message from the American partner might be: "Don't you worry your head about this. Just sign here and we'll take care of the rest." There were quite a few pro forma agreements, so you really wanted to see some sign of prior contact between these two organizations that were going to have a partnership before you really gave it your blessing. I think, relatively speaking, we didn't suffer too much from that, mainly because most of it was competitive and individually based, and most grant money for institutional work went to the American partners, which were used to auditing requirements.

Q: And were you sort of keyed to watch for this, too?

McCARTHY: Yes. Several things in the Hungarian experience I took with me to Russia and that was one of them, for sure.

Q: This was a time, talking to Robert Strauss yesterday, a time sort of analogous to a time when our robber barons were out there...

McCARTHY: Yes. [laughter]

Q: In the United States, the railroads, it was all out there for the taking, and in the long run, it worked out, but [laughter] it took quite a while. You know, the Vanderbilts, the Morgans. This is certainly going on in Russia. How did this affect your work and your impressions of it?

McCARTHY: You are absolutely right. You had a vacuum where once there was centralized power. Nothing is there, and you have democratic forces rushing in. You have crime rushing in too. Extortion, shakedowns, carving up cities into regions, payoffs, kickbacks. We would have experienced way more of that in our programs if we had been giving grants directly to Russian institutions. But mainly, we either had most of our money within these individualized grants or working with these partnership organizations where our contribution was in kind, like books or computers or Internet access. Or, it was a grant given to the American partner, like an American university to work with a Russian university. So the temptations that direct grant money might have been posed to the Russian side weren't usually there just because of the types of programs we had. But the potential was everywhere. It influenced what we did. For example, when we sent our computer equipment to Yekaterinburg to set up the information resource center, it was on a truck together with other computer equipment, and there were armed guards on the truck. This was a shipment that somebody else was sending, one of the businesses, for their purposes. We piggybacked on and helped defray the cost, but it was an armed guard on a truck full of computers because it was valuable property and could be ripped off. And that was something you'd never think of in many locations.

Q: No. What was your impression of how things were developing there? Were you aware of how the United States developed? Was this part of your training, your experience of American history...was it sort of a replay or not?

McCARTHY: I didn't think of it as a complete replay, just because of the intellectual sign posts that guided leadership in the United States - the basic readings they'd done, the models they were selecting, they were steeped in that - Montesquieu, Locke, etc. Whereas, Russia hadn't participated in some of the same historical movements, e.g. the Renaissance, the Enlightenment... well the Enlightenment they did to some extent, the Protestant Reformation, developments like that. In the Soviet period the society was intentionally sealed off, so a lot of information didn't get out to a lot of people. Certainly, in some areas I did see parallels - the wide-open western frontier. People would ask expatriates, "Why did you come here?" "Oh, man, everything's open here. If you've got a good idea and you can figure out how to get there before other people, this is a great opportunity." And the robber baron analogy that you mentioned earlier also applies. But I looked at Russian developments more as groping toward a new system that you can't really see, with resistance at the top all the way as you're trying to go forward, and a population that wants to get there, but there are some hard, big, bitter pills they have to swallow at the same time. Inflation was something like 2,500% when I first arrived. People's savings were wiped out. They'd played by the rules, and suddenly one day everybody... all the rules are changed. People on pension were really hurting. So my image of it was of fits and starts, going forward as worth it in the end, but a lot of pain along the way because you're changing everything and you're not ready for it.

Q: Obviously, you weren't working the political circuit, but what were you getting from your Russian counterparts about first Gorbachev and then Yeltsin? And I want to stop here and move- (end of tape)

McCARTHY: Though I didn't have the political beat, I had contacts with the political class. We would send them on International Visitor programs. I would have governors, mayors, and people like that over to my house before they went to the United States. We would have seminars on federalism and similar topics, where we would meet with regional governors and the local leadership, though not with the main purpose of reporting. Gorbachev, he had no support. The people who wanted reform thought he didn't go fast enough, far enough, that he held too long to the idea of reforming Communism. The Communists thought that he sold the system down the river. He changed the economic system, he changed the control by the party. He gave away Eastern Europe, and he destroyed the Soviet Union. So, he was without support... no, no support. That's what happens to leaders.

Yeltsin, I think, opinions of... some people despised Yeltsin and some supported him. Generally, the people that I had most contact with, I think, either looked at him as some sort of great democratic force, saved Russia, saved reform during the coup, courageous. Then, as he began to be more quixotic, I think a lot of people sort of had this sense that, "We don't want the Communists to come back. Yes, there are a lot of decrees, there are a lot of arbitrary decision, and we're not talking about Thomas Jefferson. But he's dealing in a system where this has to be done. He's our best realistic hope for the time being." Something like that, I would say would be pretty common.

Q: Were you running across a problem, in all that things you were doing, that there wasn't a strong judicial legal framework?

McCARTHY: Yes. That was terrible for business people. You're in a joint venture, the joint venture would be going well, and then you would be displaced... There was at least one high-profile murder. This affected human rights also. The judiciary was poorly paid. No real tradition of an independent judiciary. Everything stacked toward the prosecution. But how did it affect what we were doing? We did support law as one of the fields in our exchange program. We did bring in people to lecture on that. There were experimental jury trials in several of the regions, but that was something that we didn't take on with a major commitment of resources. I believe there was a pretty big USAID project in that area.

Q: Did you find yourself acting as mother hen or something? You had what were these ten other former Soviet states, the 'Stans' and other places. And they were being put together kind of on the cheap. Which struck me always as a very poor decision. But anyway, how did you...

McCARTHY: Very true. And the same thing was happening in USIA. Our offices in the USSR successor states were put together kind of out of our hide, so to speak, without new money. I tended to know most of the people who were out there in the 'Stans,' and sometimes the expectations of what we could do for them from Moscow were beyond what we really could do, e.g. translate books for them and ship them out. We would try to do things for them. If we had a seminar, for example, on running an information resource center, we would want their people to participate. If we had seminars for staff in student advising centers, we would want their people to come in. Of course, there was also some sensitivity about coming back to Moscow, and you had to factor that in. You know, "I thought we were independent states. Why should we always come back to Moscow for training?" Gradually, they sort of weaned themselves away. But initially I think there were unmet expectations. They thought that we were much better supplied. Here's somebody who's chopping wood to get heat down there in Armenia. How can that person not think that I, with central heating, etc. could do so much, if I just got off my duff and did it? Not that he said that, but it's just [laughter]

Q: [laughter] Yes. What about the officers you were getting out, people on your staff? How did you find them?

McCARTHY: Great. In general, in the Moscow mission, people either really wanted to be there or really didn't. For the USIA people, again, the rewards are tremendous. You run this exchange program. You see these people before they go. You see them when they come back. You have an enrichment program for alumni. You arrange a seminar and you go out and you participate in it. Everybody was getting feedback and reinforcement all the time. Without good junior officers, we could not have done half what we did. David Kennedy, for example, really made those information resource centers happen. On the information side, you dealt with dozens of radio and TV stations spread across 11 time zones. They would send somebody through Moscow to make a couple of calls. We were on the circuit and loaded them up with videotapes. They'd go back to their stations, and those videotapes would go on the air. Audiences all around Russia would be exposed to information about the United States, about democracy, about market economics. Carol Lynn McCurdy did a great job on that. We provided dishes for major stations to bring down WordNet programming. So, in general, I can't think of anybody on our staff who wasn't really positive about being there. That didn't mean there weren't frustrations sometimes. It didn't mean that they weren't under a lot of pressure. They were. And the workload for some was crushing. However, we had the great luxury of being able to hire all our FSNs from scratch. Just go out and hire them. And they were fabulous.

Q: You didn't have to go through that government agency.

McCARTHY: No. That was the old system, exactly. No, this was the new Russia. That was one of the great advantages. We got wonderful people. People with highly advanced degrees, intelligent people who spoke English.

Q: Well, in many ways, you were duplicating what had happened that I am familiar with that happened in Western Europe, right after the war. Working for the Americans was a big deal. We were getting nieces of prime ministers, and we lived off the fat, that luxury, for three or four decades. It went finally. We were no longer the employer of choice. But at one point we just got wonderful people. I guess you were beginning to...

McCARTHY: Yes, not so much that high connection, but more here's someone who's been an English language teacher but always wanted to do something for building up her country. Some people had minor connections, but I'd say it was more quality...

Q: Then you left there when?

McCARTHY: 1995.

Q: What did you think? Whither Russia when you left?

McCARTHY: I was pretty positive. It all depends on what your frame of reference. If you look at Russia and you think about what the United States is, you think, gosh, there are so many things that are not right. But if you think about Russia, as I remember it in the Brezhnev era, when I left, where everything was just stultified, there was no hope of progress. That was just a dead end. That was just flat-lined. They might continue to have military power, but they weren't going to create wealth. You know, that's one of the big problems with Communism. Once you go through the redistribution of the wealth that has accumulated pre-communism, then what? There is a one-time mobilization when everybody's on board, the new "in" group is suddenly upwardly mobile. After they're there, nothing's going on in those societies. So compared to that, to say nothing of compared to Stalinism with the gulags, millions of people in the gulags, forced collectivization, etc., the change is significant. Where they are now compared to their past is remarkable. The Russian people have a great capacity to surprise. It is remarkable that people in St. Petersburg went in and defeated a handpicked candidate under late communism... There was only one candidate on the ballot, and all you needed was 50% to win, and enough people crossed out the name that the person didn't win. It's so heartening to see that. And seeing these young people, the raw mental and spiritual talent that's in this society, gave me hope. Still does. Still does give me hope.

Q: Well, Bob, why don't we stop at this point, and we'll pick this up at 1995. Where'd you go?

McCARTHY: I went to direct USIA programs for Eastern Europe and the NIS.

DALE V. SLAGHT
Minister Counselor
Moscow (1992-1995)

Mr. Slaght was born in Oregon in 1943. After serving in various capacities on Capitol Hill and in the Department of Commerce, he joined the State Department under the Commerce-State Exchange Program. As expert in commercial and trade policy, Mr. Slaght had assignments as Commercial Attaché and Minister Counselor at US Embassies and Consulates in Uruguay, Panama, Germany, Canada, Soviet Union and Mexico. He also served as Mexico Desk Officer at the Department of Commerce. Mr. Slaght attained the rank of Career Minister. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005.

Q: You were in Moscow in what, '92? And until when?

SLAGHT: Till the summer of '95. I arrived the summer of '92, and I left the summer of '95.

Q: What was the state of relations between the United States and...we're talking about Soviet Russia, weren't we?

SLAGHT: Yes. That was a big disappointment to me, because when I was assigned the position, of course, I was assigned to the USSR which included Russia and all the other republics, and when I got there, I was in Russia alone, so I missed having responsibility for very interesting places I would have liked to have visited. Ukraine I did go to, but I never got to Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan in particular.

Relations were pretty good. Yeltsin was in charge of the government. There was a pretty good understanding between our two governments. The Vice-President met every six months with the Russian Prime Minister.

Q: Al Gore.

SLAGHT: That's right, Al Gore. He met with Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin every six months either in Moscow or in Washington. We had the leadership of the House, both sides of the House, come every Easter, and the commercial side was very busy. U.S. firms, maybe not unreasonably after the wall came down in the early '90s, believed there were billions to be made in Russia, either through the use of Russian human or natural resources in the country. Russia is a highly educated society: Metallurgists and scientists and mathematicians and computer programmers and, of course, they have oil and gas and diamonds and uranium and titanium out the kazoo. So many U.S. firms saw this as an opportunity to get in early and get in big and make mega bucks. Well, I think only the firms with the deepest pockets made it, and I don't think they made the mega bucks over there. Maybe in the long term they will, but they found working in Russia very, very difficult. The rules, this is a state that had not had any capitalist experience, and the rules of operating were constantly changing, the personalities changed, and, of course, these guys looked to the U.S. Embassy for guidance on what to do and whom to see and what to say, and we were almost as much in the dark as they were. They called on us. They called the ambassador if the U.S. rep was a CEO, and we did our best to guide them. They'd tell us they'd go into meetings with the minister of this or the vice-minister of that and halfway through the conversation, the Russian official would take off his official government hat and put on his private sector hat, and he says my brother-in-law or my brother is in business out there or up there in Siberia, and he can take care of this problem if you'd work a deal with him. And we had the issue with foreign corruption. We had to deal with the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act that prohibits U.S. firms from doing things that other nations can do in terms of greasing the skids with government officials on contracts or things to be done. The relations between the two countries were pretty good at the time, but the pressure on us and the demands on us were considerable. I worked regularly six days a week and sometimes I was in on Sunday afternoons. Very stressful. Then we lost holidays because we'd have Presidents visit us, or Congressional delegations or my own secretary. Very stressful time.

Ambassador Strauss, Robert Strauss, was ambassador when I first arrived. He's a wonderful man. Very interesting, full of anecdotes which he shares with staff. We had a very good relationship. He regaled us once when he made his first call on the KGB. The new head of the intelligence service renamed brought to the meeting a little bag. In the bag, which he gave to Ambassador Strauss, were all the kinds of listening devices that had been implanted in the concrete walls of the embassy building that had been constructed in the end of the '80s and now stood as a vacant, unused facility on the embassy compound because we found out subsequently that it was bugged. Strauss was very supportive of the commercial operation. Anything he could do to help, he would do. Then we had a little bit of time with chargé Collins -- Jim Collins was the chargé before Tom Pickering came. Collins was an excellent chargé, and he was the ambassador after Pickering left. A good man, years in that part of the world, knew the Russian language well. A good man, we got along very well. We lived just two doors down from each other on the compound. A good man.

And then Tom Pickering came. Tom, of course, has a great reputation in the Service. We did some things with him that were useful. The business community was new, of course, not very large, but very interested in having contact with the embassy, so I organized regular once a month breakfast briefing, in my house that Ambassador Pickering would come to and brief the key business leaders about what was going on. I helped establish an American Chamber of Commerce in Russia while I was there and got a real nice award on my departure for that activity. Pickering reminds me of an anecdote that's worth telling. Toward the eighteenth month of my tour there, I hadn't been out of Moscow, I hadn't been out of Russia. Traveled all over Russia, but never out of Russia, and I really needed to get out with my family. So we decided we would go on a cruise over Christmas, we would go home to the States, go over to Miami, get on a boat, and just be served. Out of the winters in Moscow and the lousy service in the system there. So I made these arrangements in the summer and then hoped circumstances would allow me to leave. Well, the closer we got to December, the more talk there was about Secretary Brown bringing a mission over here to Moscow. I knew his staff well. He had been there once before.

Q: He was the Secretary of Commerce.

SLAGHT: Secretary of Commerce Ron Brown. I knew his staff well from other trips, so I was in regular contact with these guys. Is he coming? Is he not coming? What's the story? They didn't know. It was going to be a last minute call. Go ahead, I was told, and make your plans, Dale. You have staff to cover if the Secretary does decide to come. So, I said okay. I went off, had my home leave, came back, only to find out that Brown had come, and Pickering never forgave me for that. The next time Secretary Brown came to Moscow, he and I met Secretary Brown and the airport, and the first thing out of Tom Pickering's mouth was, "at least Dale is here this time to meet you, Mr. Secretary". My wife, who worked in the personnel office, had regular dealings with Alice Pickering on staff assignments there, and she would razz my wife about, you guys left at the wrong time, didn't you. Anyway, I think Tom Pickering never forgave me for that. He would organize groups of senior officers to go off on driving trips for a week or longer out in the hinterlands. They'd take these vehicles with cans of gasoline strapped to the top, and they'd go off. The stories we'd heard they'd drive way faster than should be driven on those roads. One time one of the cars turned over, and no one was injured or gasoline didn't explode. He always tried to corral me to go on one of those, but I just couldn't see risking my life going on one of those things, so I didn't. He was a good man, but I was glad in July of '95 to be on Delta out of there. It was a very difficult assignment.

Q: Did a businessman, let's say a representative of a major business, would come to you... We really are interested in the Russian market. What do you recommend? What were you seeing as the challenges and the ability of American business?

SLAGHT: The large companies with senior executives knew precisely what they wanted to do when then they got there. They didn't necessarily know how to do it, but they knew what they wanted to do. I remember some Microsystems people coming over from California once, and they had brought a software problem that their software people in Silicon Valley had been unable to solve. They gave it to a group of Russian programmers, and overnight they solved this problem, and the Sun-Microsystems people were blown away. They hired 150 of them to do programming over there for them. Smaller companies were more interested in establishing a relationship with a local firm who would help sell their product. We established a weekly briefing for newcomers, new business-comers to the Russian market to Moscow. Our briefing was carried on CNN. We opened offices in St. Petersburg, in Vladivostok, and in Yekaterinburg, Siberia. A whole series of American Business Centers, ABC, financed by AID, were set up all around Russia and into the former Soviet Union staffed initially by American contractors and later taken over by our local nationals to provide on-the-spot way out in the hinterland counsel, advice and contacts.

Q: This a period when ??? the whole Russian array of businesses and firms and natural resources were being taken over by what was called the Mafia, the Russian people were very good contacts in the government but also were pretty rough in dealing quickly with their own people. Was this so?

SLAGHT: A fellow named Anatoly Chubais, a very capable man, was set up in an office of privatization, and government owned facilities were sold, were auctioned off, to private bidders. This caused undue concern particularly by the Communist Party and former Communist Party members who thought that this was giving up the jewels of the economy to the private sector which in their understanding of the way things work would be difficult for labor and contrary to the interests of the state. He still is, the poor man, he's in the government now. I think he heads their utility sector there. He still has to fight off charges of corruption, charges of favoritism, even though that whole privatization effort took place ten years ago, over ten years ago. I would say, by and large, had it not been for those privatization efforts, a lot of these firms would have just collapsed. We were told that managers of firms producing thread were told at the beginning of each year in the old regime how much thread and what color they were to produce with no sense of what the demand for that thread was or would be. This went on through all sectors of the economy where someone in Moscow determined how many pairs of pants, how many shoes. Can't work very well.

Q: Were you at all involved in the teaching or training of the capitalistic distribution system at all?

SLAGHT: Insofar as we would deal with Russian small business people and put them in contact with Americans wanting distributors or agents in Russians, I guess we played some minor role. But we didn't offer classes in entrepreneurship. AID was doing a lot of that in the health sector, in the business sector, etc.

Q: What about American firms? As a commercial officer in Saudi Arabia, and we were up against Sharia Laws back in the '50's, but dealing with a country that had it's own legal system which was not compatible with competing with capitalistic problems. How does this work?

SLAGHT: Texaco wanted to do a joint venture arrangement with a Russian petroleum firm, and they felt the only secure way they would have to satisfy their board that the deal struck would be a firm one and satisfy the long-term interest of the Board of Directors of Texaco would be to enter into a production sharing agreement that had been approved by the Duma. Something that had the formal backing of the Russian government on it so no one could say you did this somewhere up in the North Sea or whatever, and this is null and void. Texaco was working on this before we got there in '92, and they were working on it after I left in '95, and to my knowledge, Texaco never got what it wanted out of the Russian government. As far as I know, no deal was ever done. I went up with their staff to the site, up there near the Bering Sea and met with local officials. We went out to the place where the drilling would take place, and some drilling was already going on by the Russian company. I didn't attend this meeting, but they said on an earlier trip up there they had a town meeting with people in the village, and they were explaining to the villagers what benefits, what additional benefits they would have with an American firm up their working. The U.S. firm was saying we're going to paint your school, we're going to do this that and the other thing, and a guy stood up in the back and said why do we need you to paint our buildings? If we need paint we'll just steal it from the company. That was interesting about Russia. There was a sense in Russia that everything belongs to everyone, so you'd go in apartment buildings, and you wouldn't see lights in the hallways. Why wouldn't you see lights in the hallways? Because people would steal the light bulbs and take them to their apartments. It belongs to us. Nice plants put outside in the summertime wouldn't last a day or two. Someone would expropriate them and bring them into their own house or take them out to their dachas in the country. Very interesting place. Culturally, we had a fascinating time, but it was a difficult place to work.

Q: How did you find, and did you ever make contact with the Russian people, social contact?

SLAGHT: Not too much. With my staff yes. We had Russian staff. Luckily, just before we got there, my predecessor hired four or five people. We were one of the first sections in the embassy allowed to have local staff because our offices were not in the chancellery itself. Remember the case when we had to fire all local staff because we figured most, at least a good percentage, were spies for the KGB. There were about four or five when I got there and left with 20, 25 or so, a very large operation. One incident that maybe history will find interesting. As I said, the senior leadership of the house would come every year, and this one occasion we were asked to provide the person we would control with an evening in a typical Russian house for a meal. I went to my staff and I said look, we have to do this. Any suggestions? I contact him and he was yes, more than delighted to do this. It was for Henry Hyde of Illinois. I went out to his apartment building just to check it out, know where to go. A modest place. I know these poor people worked days getting it cleaned and figuring out what to serve Representative Hyde for a meal, and the day of the event, Hyde cancelled. The day of the event. I was so humiliated to have to call this Russian man and say look, he can't come for whatever reason I made up, I don't know.

Q: This creates a problem.

SLAGHT: I never thought much of Henry Hyde since.

Q: Did you get involved with sort of protecting American business people from getting pressure or look-alike business or hoods or...

SLAGHT: We would give them advice. There was an Amcit who was a joint partner in a Radisson Hotel in Moscow. Several other partners were involved, including the City of Moscow was a partner. They tried to push him out, the American, and he refused. He lived in the hotel. He would come to receptions in a bullet-proof vest, and they eventually killed him. This was after we left. They killed him in stairs going down to the subway outside the hotel. The Canadians owned a hotel, the Aerostar, with a Russian group. The practice seems to have been once the Russians figured out how to run the business, they tried to muscle the Americans or the westerners out. Force them out, buy them out at a low price and use violence if they had to to get rid of them. Canadians wanted adequate compensation if they were going to sell. Russians eventually took over the property, and I would guess two years later because I was in Ottawa at the time, the Russians flew a plane into Canada for some reason, and the Canadian government seized it and got their money out of that hostage, if you will, hostage with that plane for the Canadian investors. I thought it was great. Good for the Canadians, I said. You know, lots of violence, lots of unfair practices, but again, there was this drive by the west to get in there and get boots on the ground and get established because there were billions of dollars to be made.

Q: What about on the Russian side? Were they competent people or were almost competence type people trying to take over?

SLAGHT: I guess the majority of people we dealt with, certainly the majority of those whom we recommended to the Americans were honest businessmen looking for new ways to earn livings representing American firms, or the products and services of the American firms, but I'm sure there was an equal number of firms that were crooked.

The legislative branch was located in a tall, multi-story white building right across from the U.S.

Embassy compound. In fact, we could walk out on our balcony, off of our living room, and throw a stone and hit the grounds, maybe two stone throws, at the White House, so we had a bird's eye view, if you will, of the developments in 1993. Anyway, a group that included the vice president of Russia, Rutskoy, decided they didn't like Yeltsin's policies and they were going to put a stop to them and turn the country back into more communist-like. They holed up there and others entered, and they demanded this and that from the government which Yeltsin refused, and finally Yeltsin brought tanks in and lobbed from the bridge that's 100 yards from the building, lobbed missiles in the building, which caught fire. People that could get out got out and they surrendered. They were tried and convicted. The firing sent us into the underground there at the embassy. Underneath the playing field is a gymnasium in Moscow. We all had to go inside the gym. We slept there I think for two nights, maybe three. We had TV access, and CNN was on, and you could see the tanks shoot and then a bit later feel the thud of the tank shell exploding. Toward the end they all tried to get out. The whole White House area including the American compound was surrounded by Russian army troops. To get in to see us, you needed to be escorted. One of us had to go and tell the troops yes, this guy can come in. We had a visit from our pastor of our church and a group from our church in Virginia who was trying to establish a relationship with the Central Baptist Church in Moscow, and they came over during this thing. The pastor, now retired, I see him now and then since he's still active in the church, still talks about that event as if it were one of the highlights of his life. There were snipers. There are tall buildings around the compound, and there were snipers who shot at Americans going between buildings. One Marine was shot in the neck. We had a good friend who was our younger son's soccer coach who got caught in the waiting area where there had been Marines but had been withdrawn, and she had to scurry in under cover. There was more excitement than anybody wanted.

Q: I watched it from an odd position. I watched it on Russian TV...

SLAGHT: Where were you?

Q: In Bishkek in Turkestan. Everybody was shaking their heads. I was there on a USIA contract. During the time you were there when you left if '96

SLAGHT: '95

Q: In '95. What did you think of Russia from the commercial side?

SLAGHT: When we arrived, there was very little gasoline to be found. A guy on the back of this truck on the road would be selling it. That's the only way you could get it. Finally, the embassy would have a big truck come in, and the call would be made in the morning, gasoline's going to be here, bring your cars in. So, you'd have to go out and bring in your Jerry cans to be filled with gasoline. There was one what we would call a supermarket run by the Finnish. Many people would buy their produce and their meats from Stockman's Department Store in Helsinki and have their purchases shipped to them. My wife would pay the bill every month, and pretty soon, at some point they sent her a letter and said look, you have excess amount in the account. What do you want to do with this account? She said, well, just send me cheese. We got cheese. She had no idea -- this was going on without my knowledge, I confess -- we got a shipment of cheese that was close to 50 pounds, 50 pounds of cheese, and we had to give the stuff away. We froze what we could and we put it in our freezer, and we'd have to give it away. She was buying more and paying beyond what the bill was. So we'd get eggs and milk and cheese and other things from Finland because it wasn't available locally. Toward when we left, there were department stores open and a few good restaurants. McDonald's was there, but there were no other western style restaurants in town when we arrived. When we left, there were several, and now I understand you don't lack for anything in Moscow for food or anything. It's come a long way. I have a lot of hope for Russia. Russian people are wonderful, wonderful people. I have a lot of respect for the suffering that they have done over the years and the ability to muddle through, to hang on desperately.

Q: They say Moscow's one thing, but you go 20 miles out and you're back in the 16th century.

SLAGHT: You're absolutely right. My wife's an artist, and we have a picture on our living room wall that she painted from a photo that I took an hour from Moscow. I'm not going to remember the village we passed through where, one hour from Moscow, where a woman in a town of, I would guess 50,000, she was drawing water from a well. Downtown. They had no indoor plumbing. Drawing water from a well. We know for a fact telephones in these towns were not very common. You get a call a guy that runs a little store, and the owner sends someone down to your house to tell you you got a call. Yet we visited military facilities, a military museum in one case, where they had the Sputniks and military technology of this kind and the other that was every bit as good as ours, on the military side. The people may not have had shoes, but they had a first class military establishment. First class. And a first class space program.

WILLIAM PRIMOSCH

Assistant to Coordinator for Assistance Programs for the Former Soviet Union States (NIS)
Washington, DC (1993-1994)

Will Primosch was born and raised in Ohio and attended the University of Notre Dame and George Washington University. He served in the US Army and entered the Foreign Service in 1975. His assignments abroad included Belgrade, Bangkok and London. In 2001 Charles Stuart Kennedy interviewed Mr. Primosch.

PRIMOSCH: Yes, I looked around a little bit. I ended up working for Tom Simons, who was a former ambassador to Poland and then was a coordinator for our assistance programs for the former Soviet Union, that is, Russia, the Ukraine, and the other New Independent States (NIS). That proved to be interesting. I took several trips to Moscow and to other countries in the region. We had at that time a huge aid program for Russia and the NIS. I think that when the program started, $800-900 million a year was going to Russia and all told almost $2 billion a year for all the NIS, mainly for technical assistance, although there was some commodity assistance that we gave to certain countries. For example, Armenia and Georgia right after they became independent had no access to energy. The Russians had given them subsidized oil and gas as long as they were part of the Soviet Union. They couldn't pay for Russian energy at market prices. They had no hard currency exports. The Russians cut them off. People there, particularly in Armenia, would have froze to death had the U.S. not provided everyone in Yerevan, the capital, with a space heater and kerosene oil to get through the winters. The people in Georgia received a lot of fuel assistance too as well as food assistance.

It was a real challenge to try to provide political direction to these programs, which were carried out mainly through the AID. I think the programs all had good intentions. But a lot of the assistance was, looking back, not very effective. Either the governments weren't ready for it or it was delivered in a way that didn't take into account the political realities.

Q: There was such turmoil there that it would have been almost impossible to have a well reasoned, rational program. There wasn't anything well reasoned or rational on the other side to absorb it.

PRIMOSCH: I think the aid programs generally had a sound rationale. There were some elements and some individuals who were capable of using the assistance. For those there was a lot of good that came out of it. One of the things that AID did very quickly, within two to three years after the Soviet Union fell apart and a new more private market-oriented government came in, was to privatize Russian state enterprises. AID moved very quickly and spent a few hundred million dollars within a year's time to provide technical assistance on privatization. They did it through a voucher system. Millions of vouchers were printed. The idea was to give all Russian citizens and workers a voucher that they could feel that when the enterprise was sold they would have a stake in it as a shareholder. As it turns out, the big Party bosses took over many of these companies and still run them. So while the privatization occurred quickly, you never really had a stockholder-based private enterprise develop. You certainly didn't have the free-market culture develop. Nonetheless, it helped to get Russia get over that hump quickly. So while not perfect, at least it laid the groundwork for the future. It was very effective in that sense.

Another notable example I remember was, in Moscow we visited a group of teachers who were going to the United States to participate in a curriculum development program at an American college. They had been recruited from all over Russia. They were going to a college someplace in New England for the summer to try to develop a civics curriculum for Russian schools, one based on more democratic principles and a more objective look at Russian history. That was a very good use of money. We talked with the teachers who were participating and they were all delighted to be part of the program. They seemed so sincere and had such a strong feeling and desire that they wanted to help Russia make that transition and they wanted to be a part of that. So, those were a couple of examples where I believe the aid programs made a difference.

Q: How did you find working with this dealing with the Bureau of European Affairs and the old Soviet structure within the State Department, the SOV group? They were having to reinvent their own representation.

PRIMOSCH: I didn't find that to be an issue. I knew some of them from my earlier assignments. I had worked in the European Bureau for many years. At that time, the new Russia team was part of what was called the Office of the Coordinator for Former Soviet Union. Jim Collins was the director. Later he went out to Moscow as the Ambassador. Tom Pickering was the ambassador to Moscow at the time I was working in the aid coordination office.. I don't think that coordination with the Russian affairs office was a problem. The bigger issue had to do with trying to get a handle on AID. The AID and State Department people are very similar going into the system, but they have a very different culture at AID. I found AID to be very bureaucratic even by State Department standards. We had a lot of bureaucratic friction between our office in the State Department and AID trying to give the assistance programs overall political direction. It's such a cumbersome process to start a new AID program. To develop a technical assistance team, they have to put out bids. It's a very cumbersome paperwork process to get proposals. They have to be evaluated as well as the credentials of the experts. Then the contractor would send "experts" to the field, and some of them weren't all that qualified. A lot of the people assigned had no foreign experience at all. They were only experts in a particular area. So, I think to the extent that there was a friction and a clash, it was more with the State and the AID culture and their sense of not wanting to accept any kind of political direction or guidance. They really needed it because they didn't in many cases understand what they were getting into.

Q: Were there the equivalent of bull sessions or staff meetings? Here is a system we've been opposing for more than 30 years and it falls apart and instead of trying to stick it to them, we're trying to help. There must have been an awful lot of discussion among our own people, including you, as to what the hell was happening and what could be done.

PRIMOSCH: At the time, there was great expectation that both the Russian government and the Russian people and even Russian businesses really wanted to change and that they would readily receive our assistance and follow what we thought was a very practical and logical course for transforming and transitioning their government and economy. We underestimated the challenge at all levels even within the State Department and certainly within AID, which had overblown expectations of what they could achieve, how difficult it would be and how entrenched certain interests in the old economic systems were. The corruption element became very quickly embedded in the new system and prevented change.

Q: There were all sorts of missions and various universities and think tanks going out there as so-called experts. They talked a great game, but when coming up against it, it really wasn't very helpful, was it?

PRIMOSCH: The bottom line is, no, it wasn't. The changes didn't occur that we had proposed and that we were paying people to try to achieve. This is probably not unique to Russia. There are probably a lot of AID people who went to Africa 25-30 years ago who thought Africa would look a lot different today than it does now. There was a real lack of appreciation of the difficulties in promoting change in the former communist states. There was also a lack of expertise. Certainly AID didn't have any expertise in the former Soviet Union. Our State Department did, but technical assistance is not the kind of thing even we were doing years ago. Perhaps these programs had to be tried. But they should have been reassessed more quickly as to their effectiveness and readjusted.

Q: You were with Tom Simons from '93 to when?

PRIMOSCH: '93 to '94.

RICHARD M. MILES
Deputy Chief of Mission
Moscow (1993-1996)

Ambassador Miles was born in Arkansas in 1937. He earned an associate degree from Bakersfield College, Bachelor's degree from University of California, Berkeley and a master's degree from Indiana University. He joined the Foreign service in 1966. His overseas posts include Oslo, Belgrade, Moscow, Leningrad, Berlin, Azerbaijan, Bulgaria and Georgia. Ambassador Miles was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

Q: Well then, you left there when? In 1990-what?

MILES: December of 1993. I planned to stay for the whole three years of a normal diplomatic tour, which would have put me out of there in 1995 but I was called in the fall of '93 by Deputy Secretary Talbott, who I have known forever. He was a young Time magazine correspondent in Belgrade when I was on my second assignment in the Foreign Service, so we have been friends for a very long time, and he said, "We're sending Tom Pickering, one of our super star ambassadors, to Moscow but Pickering has never even visited Russia before, let alone served there, and we need someone who has Russian and some experience with the Soviet system to go and be his deputy, because we're calling the present deputy, Jim Collins, back to Washington. We're setting up a new shop in the Department to deal with the former Soviet Union and it will be under the Secretary's office and I want Jim to run that, so we're a little desperate. We want you to go to Moscow."

Well, of course I didn't want to go to Moscow. It's a lot of fun being ambassador, even in a benighted place like Azerbaijan. In fact, I was having a hell of a time in Azerbaijan; I thoroughly enjoyed it and had a really good team, and I told Strobe I didn't really want to go and I then reeled off the names of four or five people that I thought would be Jim Dandy as deputy up there. Now Strobe is a very straight shooter; he isn't a manipulator. He's a very honest person, and by golly, he said okay, let me contact these people. And he did. He contacted every one of them, and either they were going to retire or they were ill or their wife was ill or they didn't want to go back to Moscow because of the kids, or, you know, there was always some reason why they couldn't do it. And so he leaned on me again and I gave him some more names; I really didn't want to go. And he tried those names, which was a shorter list, about three people I think, and none of them wanted to do it either. So he came back to me and I said, "Okay, let me go up and talk to Pickering and then I'll give you a definitive answer after that." I could have been ordered up there but I could also have resigned and actually I think he would have let me stay in Azerbaijan if that's what I really wanted to do, so the choice was mine.

I went up to see Pickering and we got along alright. We have absolute totally different personalities. Being around him is like being around a 2000 watt light bulb and being around me is probably like being around a 75 watt light bulb. I mean, there is just a big difference in our energy levels and our intellect and our creative imagination and our contacts in Washington and so on. I mean, he is in a different league. He is in the Dick Holbrooke, Stu Eizenstat, Frank Wisner league and I am not. I mean, that's just the way it is.

Well anyhow, we got along alright and I said, "Okay, I'll do it, but I want to send you—that is Pickering—a written message in which I lay out some things that I want to be perfectly clear with you about and I'd rather do it in writing so we know what we're talking about." So I went back and I wrote what became known around the Embassy in Moscow, although it was a private communication between him and me, and it's worth recounting, I think. I sent him a written message saying, I will agree to come but I want you to understand that you and I have quite different personalities. And I have a couple of conditions. I want to be able to bring my secretary. At that point my secretary, Linda Price, had been with me for several years and DCMs don't get to bring their secretaries, as you know, only ambassadors do—but I want to bring my secretary. Second, I want to be able to live off compound. I hate the idea of these embassy compounds and the deputy's house was on the embassy compound. The security people kept a careful eye on the Russian guests, well, on all non-Embassy guests, actually. They almost inspected the contents of their pockets and everything before they could enter the compound. A guard had to escort each visitor from the compound gate to my townhouse and back out again. It was really awful, and I said I want to be able to live off the compound—we will have to find a decent apartment somewhere out in town. And third, I am not a workaholic. I don't intend to work Saturdays and Sundays unless there is a real crisis or a VIP visitor, and every once in a while I am going to disappear early because my wife and I like to do the opera and the ballet and these things start at 7:00 sharp in Moscow and you can't get in after the curtain goes up; they are really strict about that. So I'll be leaving at 6:15 every once in a while. And he wrote back saying that all this was acceptable and he understood perfectly. I mean, most people would not be as mature as Pickering and as wise as Pickering and would have said to Deputy Secretary Talbott, "Tell this arrogant little shit to go take a walk. I'll find my own deputy."

Well, I did all those things that I said I was going to do with the exception of finding a place off campus, and the reason for that was this. Sharon and I spent a lot of time looking. The General Services Office was totally hopeless in finding us an adequate place. They didn't have a clue what a deputy's place should look like so we did it ourselves. And we found a number of places that could have worked. There were some that were actually too luxurious and, you know, you would have been laughed out of the Foreign Service by taking it. But what would have been practical would have been to knock two or three nice apartments together, tear down some walls and so on. This can all be done rather rapidly actually, it's no big deal, but it would cost a tidy bit of money. And then you'd have that place for eternity; I mean, you could have that a hundred years or so, whatever. So it wasn't an impractical idea at all but the catch is that the rents in Moscow had begun to skyrocket. And just as we were about to decide on a place, the USAID Mission Chief in Moscow, a very decent fellow, had come under fire for having spent several tens of thousands of dollars on remodeling a place for himself and for paying a fairly large rent on it. Well, he had done exactly what I was getting ready to do and anyone who knows Moscow at that time would have felt that it was all perfectly justified. But to read about it in The Washington Post, and especially if you are a congressman reading about it in The Washington Post, the only word that would come to mind would be outrage and abuse of authority, waste of Government money, and so on, blah, blah, blah. And so the timing was just unfortunate and so we never did move off the compound. We did a hell of a lot of entertaining in Moscow but we did it in the tiny deputy's house. I don't know if you've been in there or not.

Q: No, I haven't.

MILES: I mean, it's very small. And we did it but we could never have more than about 50 people for a cocktail party and you could never have more than 10 or so for a sit-down dinner. And sometimes in the summer we could expand out a little bit because it did have a tiny bit of ground to the side of it which at least enabled you to have an outdoor barbecue or whatever. Or if we were really desperate we could do a split-level cocktail party or a buffet dinner where you would have people on two different levels of the house. It had a finished basement and so you could use the first floor for a musical evening or drinks and use the floor below for dinner. Well, you can see this required a lot of juggling things about on the part of Sharon and the household staff, not to mention on the part of the guests. And so it just was a constant bother the whole time we were there. We just kept seeing opportunities that were wasted because we didn't have space enough to do it. Now Pickering and his wife had Spaso House, which is perfectly big enough for anything that an ambassador would want to do, and they did a lot of entertaining and they were good enough to pick up some of our suggestions for things that they might do. But it was always a disappointment to me that I wasn't able to do what I wanted to do and move into a decent sized place in Moscow and really cut a swath in that town the way Sharon and I had done in Leningrad.

I'd like to mention just one of the representational opportunities that we did seize to everyone's advantage. It shows what one can do in a place like Moscow. I had read Marie "Missie" Vassiltchikov's book, "Berlin Diaries: 1940-1945" and had enjoyed the book very much. Then I read in a Moscow newspaper that Missie's brother, Prince George Vassiltchikov, was in Moscow to promote the book's newly published Russian translation. Missie had lived and died in England so I phoned the British Embassy to ask whether or not they were doing anything in connection with this. "No," they said. Ditto from the publisher. So I told the publisher that I would like to have a small reception for George Vassiltchikov and I asked the publisher to come up with a guest list. Well, the result was a very nice event, virtually none of the guests had ever been at an American or any other foreign embassy event, and all this was received very nicely in Moscow cultural circles. And, as a bonus, George Vassiltchikov and I became good friends. I believe that he is the most witty and entertaining correspondent I have ever had. He and Ambassador Pickering even carried on a long correspondence. My daughter and I even visited him in London. A wonderful man.

Q: You were there from when to when?

MILES: Well, it was almost three years. Went in December of '93, right after the events at the Russian White House, you remember, with the tanks firing on the beleaguered parliamentary deputies in there and Yeltsin's rise to power and so on. So we arrived in December of '93 and there was still some evidence of the crisis which had occurred so recently. We could look out of our townhouse windows and see the smoke blackened floors of the parliament where fires had been started by the shelling and all. So, it was palpable; I mean, you could almost smell the gun smoke and smoke of burning papers in the air. And then we stayed until summer of 1996. So it was almost a full three years.

Q: How would you describe the staff of the Embassy and how it operated?

MILES: Well, it was huge, of course. If you include the Consulates General in Vladivostok, Yekaterinburg and St. Petersburg, and you included the Foreign Service Nationals and the third country nationals and the American officers, you're talking about a thousand people. And so, for the State Department, that puts it into the realm of one of our larger embassies. Mexico City, Tokyo, Paris, London maybe; Cairo certainly. Before Iraq, Moscow would have been one of our five largest embassies. So managing it took some time and effort and that is largely what DCMs do, as you know—you are sort of a mayor or a city manager of a small town which is represented by all these people. And so you get into everything from labor disputes to, quite literally, dog poop on the sidewalks. It was just an incredible range of things. And, of course, there are foreign policy aspects to the job also.

Pickering liked to travel and so he was away a lot, in Russia, all over Russia, and he would travel abroad on occasion and he was back in America on occasion. I counted it up once and I was actually Chargé for about six months total and so that was a lot of fun. I have only two regrets about my foreign service career. One is that I didn't curtail a couple of people back to Washington—but only a couple. You know, you can always see that in hindsight. And the other regret, frankly, was that I was never able to be Ambassador to Russia. I would have loved to have been Ambassador to Russia. But being Chargé is certainly the next best thing and for a diplomat, especially for an American diplomat, there literally is no greater thrill than driving up to the Kremlin in the official car with the flag flying from the fender, and I was able to do that on occasion as Chargé and it was always very emotional for me. It's like when you are overseas and you hear the Star Spangled Banner play; it sends a special thrill down your spine, just something about the time and the place which is unique and very exciting. So, to be able to do that, to not only help Pickering run what I thought was a very good Mission at that time, but also to be Chargé for extended periods of time was a great thrill and one of the high points of my career.

Q: How did you deal with the Foreign Service Nationals? Because we've gone through the time when we have replaced almost all of them with Americans and all. What was the situation when you were there?

MILES: Well, when you say we replaced the Foreign Service Nationals, it was not voluntary. We had to replace them. As you remember in, I think it was October of '87, six months or so before I first went to Leningrad as consul general, we had thrown out a number of what we believed to be KGB and GRU spies from the United States and in retaliation, the Soviets—it was the Soviet government at that time—took away all our FSNs. These were the personnel who were supplied through UPDK [Upravleniye po Obsluzhivaniyu Diplomaticheskogo Korpusa], the official agency of the Foreign Ministry for dealing with diplomatic establishments, which provided all the local Embassy employees and also the maids and the private drivers and the nannies that many people hired. And so literally overnight, all of those FSNs were withdrawn. In some cases, of course, good riddance, but in most cases, not. On balance, these were very intelligent and capable employees.

All the FSNs had to report to their handlers in those days and we all understood that; our FSNs understood it and many of them just did it in a perfunctory way. Others were career officers of the KGB or the GRU, and they would try to learn what they could from your actions and behavior. Sometimes they would try to get to know you to discover your weaknesses or somebody else's weaknesses; in other words, they were regular espionage agents. Others just wanted to do their job and get their salary and develop their family life and so it was really, it was very sad for many of these people that they were forced to leave our service. I think it's almost always the case that our Foreign Service Nationals in the Soviet Union developed divided loyalties. In my experience, many of those that had worked for us for a while came to like the United States and its people and its ways as best as they understood them. Many of them had been able to go to America for training programs, they had gotten to know Americans on a more personal basis than almost any other Soviet citizen was allowed to.

Anyhow, all of a sudden we had to drive ourselves around, we had to go pick up our mail at the train station or the airport and then take our mail out, including diplomatic bags and things; we had to sweep up the floors and empty the trash and we had to feed ourselves in the cafeteria. And at home, we often had to find a new nanny or a new maid or whatever on a personal basis. I mean, it was pretty disruptive. And so everyone made do. Everyone basically pitched in on a schedule basis: you had a schedule worked out where this afternoon would be your time to go down and sweep the cafeteria floor or mop it or this would be your time to go out to the train station and pick up regular mail or non-classified mail and haul it back. And even the Ambassador, the DCM and the Consul General would pitch in from time to time to show that they were good guys. They really couldn't be bound to a schedule because of the kind of work they did but we would do it from time to time. And in Leningrad Sharon decided she would sign up for the regular schedule as a worker, She was a part-time employee of the Consular Section. So she also agreed that she would do her regular stint and so here she is, five feet tall, weighing about 100 pounds, and she would go out to the train station, including in the dead of winter, and haul in these enormous mail bags. I mean, you talk about mail you think well okay, big deal, you go out to the post office box and you pick up eight ounces of mail and haul it back; I am talking about hundreds of pounds of mail. I mean, it's not just mail that comes in, it's packages from J. C. Penny or Sears or whatever. It's heavy as hell and you have to haul it out of that mail car. It was incredible. Haul it out of the mail car; haul it down to the customs guys. Hopefully in the winter you could slide it along the snow and ice and then the customs officer would say, okay, along with it, and then you had to haul it down to the van, driven by another embassy officer who would help you schlep it into the van and take it back to the Embassy or the Consulate General. And in the Consulate General we knew when the mail was coming in and so everyone—

Q: This is tape seven, side one, with Dick Miles. You were saying when you knew that the mail was coming in?

MILES: Right. It came in once a week on a scheduled basis and so the word would be spread around by phone when the mail was actually ready to be distributed and everyone would then go down to the basement of the Consulate General and we would just take big bunches of mail out of these bags and there were pigeon holes, slots like an old fashioned post office box with a section name. You knew which section a person worked in and so you would put the mail in that section. There was a nice atmosphere there, lots of joking about it, and if some guy, especially a bachelor, would get a bunch of Victoria's Secret catalogs, you can imagine the joking about that and so on. I think while the adversity was something of a burden—we could probably have better done without it, but it did bring people together.

Well anyhow, a few years later we were able to work it out with the Soviet or the Russian government—I forget the time, exactly—so that the FSNs were able to come back. And so when I mentioned earlier the 1000 employees of the U.S. foreign establishments in Russia in 1993, of that 1000, probably a good 800 or more were in fact Foreign Service Nationals. There were a few third-country nationals—for example, a British citizen or an Australian citizen married to someone else or whatever—and so they would work for us as well. But basically the local employees were the Russians who worked there and they performed quite competent work and they got a decent salary for it. There were always difficulties which we then had to deal with and we had, of course, our administrative section and the personnel people, but often it would percolate to the DCM level and occasionally to the level of the Ambassador and so this did take a good deal of time. Some problems were small but some were big and intractable. For example, the money situation in Russia was very volatile at that time. There was inflation, hyper-inflation even; there were still shortages and so people needed every little bit of cash which they could get. There was constant difficulty over whether the local employees got rubles or if dollars translated into rubles; what would be the formula. There was difficulty over off-shore savings accounts for retirement purposes; there were difficulties over whether they paid their taxes. In the new Russia, the old UPDK monopoly on personnel and services was quickly breaking down so what role did the embassy have in declaring who we did hire to the Russian authorities and reporting their earnings to the authorities. There was just one difficulty after another.

I remember one distinct problem that came up. There was a problem with the food in the cafeteria and we had to charge a little bit more than what it actually cost because we had to pay the cooks and the clean up people out of the “profits” of the cafeteria operation. Well, that meant that prices were actually probably a little bit higher than they would be in a cafeteria in the United States because we were buying a lot of our stuff from the military commissaries which charged a markup, and also you had to pay shipment costs from Germany to Moscow and so it meant that if the Moscow Embassy Commissary would buy, let's say, a pound of hamburger in the commissary in Frankfurt, Germany, for two dollars a pound, in Moscow the same exact pound of hamburger would cost you three dollars. And so we had to charge more for hamburgers and the other food in the cafeteria and this proved to be a burden for the FSNs and so we came up with a system of subsidies through chits. We would give the FSNs a chit which they could use in lieu of cash to help subsidize the cost of the meal.

Well, this all took working out and more time than any human being would care to spend on it unless you were an expert at these things. Anyhow, I knew it was part of the job, I didn't resent doing it, but it was certainly not something which I would have volunteered for particularly.

Q: How would you describe, during this '93 to '96 period, sort of the political atmosphere in Russia at the time?

MILES: It was a time of transition, of course, from the Gorbachev period to the Yeltsin period.

Gorbachev always had tried to conduct his reforms in the context of the Communist Party and Yeltsin basically spat on the Communist Party and wanted nothing more than to do away with it. Since every single person in the former Soviet Union had some form of an intimate experience with the communist system, that was one hell of a transition. People fought in the communist bureaucratic way. I say communist; I mean, I'm not trying to define classical communism or anything, I'm just trying to describe the way life was in the Soviet Union in, let's say, the period following the XX Party Congress to the '60s and '70s and '80s and on into the '90s, the early '90s. For many people, certainly for people in authority, your direction and your discipline was through the Party. You could be transferred, promoted or disciplined through the Party. You might ignore it and many people did ignore it, but it was part of everyone's life. People had to go to Party meetings; they had to accept Party discipline. You had to put in your time on certain projects—for example, special Saturdays called "Leninsky subbotniks", where you would go out on a certain Saturday and you would clean up the grounds around your building, plant trees or whatever, and so on. You had to participate in the various parades—May Day, November 7, etc. I mean, the communist system was certainly pervasive and if you lived in the Soviet Union in 1993, it had touched your life and that was true for every single man, woman, child and dog in Russia from the age of let us say six or seven up.

When you were a young person you became a member of the Pioneers; when you were a little older you became a member of the Komsomol [Kommunisticheskiy soyuz molodezhi], the Communist youth organization. Every child was in the Pioneers pretty much, not quite everybody was in the Komsomol, and then anyone who wanted any kind of a professional life or wanted to get ahead in some way would join the Communist Party. And for the military and the police, the KGB, the GRU and so on it was virtually 100 percent; for other professions it would depend on what you were doing and how ambitious you were in doing it, whether you joined the Party. But the Party and Party life pervaded everything. Now, of course, people knew that a transition was in progress. I met various people who had held the highest positions in the communist system, Politburo members, some of them. Yet I have never met a single person during that period—1993-1996—who really defended the communist system with the exception of some of the older people whose lives had been absolutely and totally disrupted by the collapse of the Soviet Union, people who had had a decent pension under the old system or who had had a place in society, a recognized place in society. The Soviet system, like all systems had its share of nepotism and favoritism, but in a certain sense it was a meritocracy. All of a sudden that was destroyed, absolutely and totally destroyed. And so I met any number of older people who were indeed nostalgic for the old days and, in fact, who could blame them? They had lost their place in life, they lost the respect which the society gave to them and which they basked in, of course, and they lost their savings and their modest pensions.

It's kind of an odd thing about the former Soviet Union but actually the percentage of homeowners or apartment owners in the former Soviet Union was probably higher than it was in the United States. An apartment or a small house was one of the very few substantive things that you could actually buy in the old Soviet system. Now in many cases you didn't buy it, because it belonged to your trade union or to your company and it was provided to you for life. You might pay fifteen or twenty dollars a month maintenance fee or something but hardly more than that and for that you would get a very small apartment but decent enough and one that you could live in. Well, all of a sudden that system was gone too and so in the case where people had actually bought their apartment they were generally alright, but in cases where they didn't, their situation would depend on whether their trade union or their factory management, which was itself struggling with the transitional period, was astute enough or cared enough to take legal ownership of the building and sell the apartments back to the people that lived in them. Sometimes the organization that had nominally "owned" the building would have to perform a bureaucratic shell game and acquire some kind of legal title to that apartment or building. And in many, many cases speculators swarmed in who believed they had enough connections or a little bit of cash or out and out muscle, bribery and corruption, and they would buy the building out from under the people who lived in it. And so people who had lived in an apartment all their lives who were now retired maybe, unable to get a job now, found themselves basically out on the street. And this kind of thing still goes on, to tell you the truth, but at that time this was rampant and so you can imagine the effect on society. People's morale was—well, some people were excited by the new prospects, some people became extraordinarily wealthy during that period of time, other people though were devastated, absolutely devastated; it was an extremely mixed picture.

Of course, diplomats tend to deal with the more successful members of society, the people that are in power or who are running successful businesses. In the cultural sphere life was more difficult because the cultural managers and the artists and performers had a very hard time making the adjustment from a system of state subsidies to a system in which they had to somehow make their way on their own. Some of the Russians in the cultural sphere actually caught on to the new ways quite rapidly, much more so than I would have thought possible. Even in the last days of the Soviet Union, commercial sponsors would be accepted for musical performances or plays or whatever. At the beginning of a performance the announcer would come out and say we appreciate very much the sponsorship of the Lukoil Company or whatever and people would applaud that as a desirable and valued thing. But many, many times in those days in the early '90s, Sharon and I met with performing artists or cultural workers of one sort or the other who basically said they had no income and they were sort of squatting in their apartment hoping that the roof would not be sold out from over their heads. And they were doing their jobs or performing music or painting just because of their love for it and because they didn't have anything else to do, and hoping for some miracle that would occur and save them and their company, their stock company or their repertory company, and enable everything to go on in some semblance of the way it had gone on before. That is all changed now and many of the state subsidies have been reinstated. The business of corporate sponsorship has caught on big time and people understand now, where they didn't always understand in '92-'93, that in essence everything has to be paid for. And so people now expect to pay a higher price when they go to the Bolshoi or when they go to an ordinary musical concert. They expect to pay something for the ticket where before the ticket either cost virtually nothing, like a dollar or a dollar-and-a-half, or you were given your ticket by your trade union or whatever and so you didn't pay for culture in a sense. But now people understand that you have to do that.

And so in all these various ways people are making the adjustment, but it's still difficult in the year 2007 for a lot of people in the former Soviet Union. And in 1992 to 1993 it was damned difficult. And I'm quite sure that there were people who starved to death, whose children starved to death or who died prematurely because they couldn't get adequate medical care, they couldn't come up with the bribes to pay the doctors to look at them, or because the equipment at the hospital was broken or the pharmaceutical delivery system had broken down. There were no pharmaceuticals to be had within the old system—there was no penicillin or no pain killers or whatever—only under the counter. And if you can just imagine a society that was basically turned pretty much inside out, almost like Germany or Japan after World War II, then that is what happened to the former Soviet Union. To paraphrase Dickens, it was not the best of times, but it was an exciting time for some and it really was the worst of times for ordinary Soviet citizens, for Russian citizens.

But it was exciting to be a diplomat there and to try to do that good which you could and to try to befriend people and encourage them, the good people, in these various spheres of life—everything from private enterprise people who were trying to make do in a market system which they didn't entirely understand to people who were still in state institutions, like the theater, who had lost their means of support and who had no idea how they were going to keep their institutions intact.

I'll give you one good example of the way in which the old and new systems sometimes clashed. It's a good example because it demonstrates both the good and the bad sides of the problem. In the late '80s and early '90s, the U.S. government had sold a considerable quantity of surplus grain to the Soviet Union and to Russia. And the way the Soviet and then the Russian governments had paid for it was to set up a trust fund into which the money would be paid by the Russian side, and the trust fund would then be drawn down by a Joint Commission chaired by the DCM of the American Embassy—that would be me—and by a high-ranking official of the Russian Ministry of Agriculture, and both sides would have representatives from the governmental institutions, in my case the Embassy Agricultural Attaché and in their case another official from the Ministry of Agriculture. There were also representatives of non-governmental organizations like Land of Lakes or the Winrock Foundation on our side; on their side, the Orthodox Church and there was another NGO on their side, I forget what it was exactly. And this commission then rented a small space for a secretariat staff, hired a few Russians to man it, and went into business. The staff would accept applications from entrepreneurs in the agricultural sector, and that could be anybody from a small farmer who just wanted to be able to plant seed potatoes to a businessman who wanted to start a brewery.

The Secretariat would do its examination of the proposed projects and would recommend action to the Commission. We would make loans of up to $500,000—I don't know if I mentioned the amount of money we had at our disposal. It was $40 million that we had accumulated in this fund—we would make loans of up to $500,000 to an individual entrepreneur and the money would be paid back over a period of 10 years at a very low rate of interest. It would be paid back not to the trust fund, which was designed to go out of business, but rather it would go back to the local political authorities; this was to get their interest and keep them supportive. The repayment money could be used for yet another project like paving a road or digging a well or improving the conditions in a local orphanage or whatever. And the Commission approved that repayment project as well.

Well, I thought it was a wonderful program and it worked beautifully for about the first year that I was there and then there was a kind of a palace revolution on the Russian side. The former Russian co-chairman, a very decent fellow who had been a high-ranking official in the Ministry of Agriculture, was ousted and a Stalinist type of individual was put in his place and it became quite clear that he wanted control over all the projects. He wanted all the projects to go first through the Ministry of Agriculture for its vetting and its approval and then for the documents to be brought to the Commission for rubber stamping. And he wanted to replace all of the Russian employees in the little secretariat that we had with his own protégés.

Well, that was unacceptable to me and to the American side and so many a battle was fought over these issues, I can assure you of that. And I once told Ambassador Pickering, I said, “You know, Ambassadors often wonder what their DCMs actually do. Let me tell you what I do in this case. I keep you away from all these difficulties on the Agricultural Commission.”

I fought that fight almost the entire time I was there. I felt the best thing to do with that dreadful fellow across the table from me was to get rid of this money as fast as possible and under the best conditions we could arrange, and so we began approving larger loans and more loans, even some marginal ones that we might not have done if we had had the old group in power. And when I left I think the trust fund was down to about $800 or $900 thousand and I told my successor when I briefed him, I said, “Look, let me just warn you about these guys on the other side of the table there when it comes to this bi-national agricultural commission. I mean, they will slash your throat in a minute and you won’t even know it until you shake your head. So my advice to you is to continue doing what I have been doing and just get rid of this money as fast as possible, declare victory and close the Commission down.” And that is what he did.

Q: I’m trying to think now, when you got there in ’93, where stood Yeltsin and where stood Gorbachev?

MILES: Gorbachev was out already and Yeltsin was in, although political events were still happening at about that time. It may have been necessary because the system needed some shock treatment and Yeltsin delivered that shock treatment. Earlier, Yeltsin had certainly dealt with Gorbachev in a brusque manner. I remember watching a political meeting on the TV down in Baku. Yeltsin had the floor and Gorbachev had yielded the floor, as I recall, to him and was still trying to make some point and Yeltsin was quite rude in dismissing him, almost like an errant pupil, something like that. I don’t recall exactly the timing of these things but it was quite clear that Yeltsin felt that he needed to humiliate Gorbachev publicly and to show that Gorbachev’s way was the old way and it was now over, and his leadership, and Yeltsin’s style of leadership was the new way. And that message got through, no question about it.

Q: How did we view Yeltsin? Because during the early Gorbachev period—we had shunned Yeltsin and, you know, played him up as a drunk and sort of a buffoon and all. When you got there, how were we—in the first place, how had he been viewed from Baku while you were there? You know, what were you getting on the feeling about Yeltsin, and then when you got there, how was he treated?

MILES: People in Azerbaijan were very much interested, of course, in the power struggle in Russia and in the future development of Russian society. But, unlike the situation in Nagorno-Karabakh or the situation with regard to Abkhazia and South Ossetia, the Russians had not played a significant role in Azerbaijani politics or developments. Maybe they were too distracted and they had too much else on their plate. In the very early days, back in '89, '90, when the Soviet Union was beginning its decline, its collapse, some Russian military forces engaged in and around Nagorno Karabakh—sometimes on the part of the Armenian side, sometimes on the part of the Azeri side, and Russian troops and even commanders were in fact selling their vehicles, their weapons, their ammunition, their hand grenades to anybody who would buy them. I mean, they didn't care who it was, they weren't ideological about it. But other than that the Russians never really intervened in the Nagorno-Karabakh affair the way they did intervene in Abkhazia and South Ossetia. And they never demonstrated any significant military interest in Nagorno Karabakh after that. There were difficulties over the Gabala radar—the over-the-horizon radar station—up in the northern part of Azerbaijan. The Azeris wanted to exert their authority. They raised environmental issues. But the Russians just said, “This is important to us, we are going to keep it here, and we have soldiers to guard it. We are happy to talk to you about it but don't try to push us out. We're not going to be pushed out.” And both the nationalist government which fretted a lot about it and the Aliyev government understood that this was a sticking point for the Russians and so the Azeris never tried any military attack or anything like that on it. And later the Aliyev government was able to sign a 10 year lease for the station to legitimize the continued Russian use of the radar station. Russia just was not part of anybody's thinking in Azerbaijan at that time. Events in Moscow were interesting, of course, and the Azeris watched them on television and I watched them too. Russian television was shown in Azerbaijan and it was fascinating to watch.

Q: Alright. But you're now up in Moscow and you're sitting at the center of the American view of Russia. How would you describe how—from Pickering through the political section and yourself and all—how did we view Yeltsin?

MILES: I don't want to speak for Ambassador Pickering, but we did worry a bit about Yeltsin's drinking and perhaps sometimes erratic behavior. But we also saw him as a person with some democratic instincts, someone who wanted to cast out the past in a dramatic way, and someone who was not adverse to taking serious steps toward necessary reform of the society in the sense of shaking up the ministries, privatizing state properties, trying to deal with these problems of social disruption that I mentioned to you earlier. And Yeltsin was willing not just to talk to the United States but to work with the United States on matters of mutual interest. After all, we have so many common areas of interest—everything from arms control and reduction to environmental and health issues. You recall the Gore-Chernomyrdin Commission, when our Vice President and the Russian Prime Minister would meet twice a year, once in America and once in Russia, and would agree on work programs for their governments, including the various ministries and departments that were involved over the next six month period, and would review what had taken place in the previous six month period. They would hold joint meetings; the Vice President and the Prime Minister would sit at a podium and then the Russian ministers and the American secretaries would appear and explain what they have done, and what they have not done to carry out the work program which had been previously agreed. The Commission has been criticized and I know the Republicans didn't care much for it. I don't recall the history exactly but they probably wasted no time in dismantling it when they came into power, but I thought it was a very useful thing. It involved one hell of a lot of work on the part of the American cabinet secretaries and their departments that were involved, the Russian ministries, the embassies and the ambassadors themselves and people on their staff, but it sure produced a lot of interaction on the part of the staffs of the Vice President and the Prime Minister, on the part of the ministers and the cabinet secretaries and their staffs and on down to reasonably low working levels because these programs spanned the whole range of our interaction with the Russians. The projects became quite involved and detailed and they were these six months meetings coming on like clockwork so the bureaucrats actually had to work to be able to show some success when questioned by their political leaders. OK, some of this was pure PR, but there was also a substantial work program, and I for one was sorry to see it end.

Q: Were we keeping an eye on two elements of the society: one, of sort of a Russian military and, two, the security apparatus?

MILES: Oh, yes. First of all we were getting to know these people in a way which had not really been possible earlier and, in addition, Pickering would entertain the highest levels of the two military establishments. We had cabinet secretaries—imagine the Secretary of Defense coming over meeting with his counterpart. On my own, at the DCM residence, I entertained the Director of the Central Intelligence Agency and his counterpart. I have personally entertained the head of the Russian rocket forces, the guy who had his finger right next to the red launch button. And the other members of the country team were doing the same thing at their levels. The level of exchange in all sectors of our societies was just incredible. I believe the Ambassador and I entertained just about everyone in Russia who should have been entertained. We drew the line at Zhirinovsky, but, even there, we assigned an Embassy officer to stay in touch with him and his subordinates.

Now I'm not saying that everything was sweetness and light—I'm not saying that we always agreed with the Russians on everything. Not long after I arrived, one of our key people was declared persona non grata by the Russian government. Actually, I don't think he was formally declared PNG; I think they told us that they were going to do that unless he was voluntarily withdrawn, and we did voluntarily withdraw him. We had the so-called "chicken wars" while I was there; we had serious difficulties getting the Russian government to enforce their laws on intellectual property rights; we had problems over landing fees for U.S. Government aircraft; problems of religious freedom and so on and so on. All these things took time and energy to work out, but the important thing is that we had a dialog with the Russian government which enabled us to resolve these issues one by one.

Q: What caused that near PNG incident?

MILES: You know, I can't recall the incident. It may have been nothing more than our throwing out some Russian official from the United States; as I recall I think it was probably that, just the usual reciprocal action on the part of the Russians..

Not to change the subject, but while I was there we opened the FBI legal attaché office in the Embassy. The office is still a very going concern and deals with many issues, not least with the problem of organized crime. I was quite interested in that myself; my son Richard is a policeman and he had always spent a lot of time visiting with police establishments in the various countries where I have been. He had done that in Leningrad, he did it again in Moscow, and so I already knew some of the police officials and I think I was able to help with the introduction of these FBI guys to their counterparts in the Ministry of Internal Affairs and the various law enforcement organizations in Russian society. The Russian law enforcement structure was a little bit like ours: you had a lot of different organizations and a lot of people with various levels of responsibility, many of them overlapping. So it was something of a challenge to make sense of the Russian structure which had been virtually closed to us before, say, 1992. So we all spent a lot of time doing that and arranging visits back and forth, having seminars and workshops. We would have workshops on tax collection for their tax people and experts would come in from the Internal Revenue Service and conduct a workshop on that. I mean, we were involved in just about every form of human activity there is. But there were always diehards on the Russian side and there was some reserve on the part of U.S. intelligence and military people. There was some reserve, a lot of reserve I would say, on the part of the Russian military and intelligence people and, of course, there were some secrets that were not shared and there were some people that carried grudges from the past and never quite got over them. Every once in a while you would run into some pocket of resistance or whatever and you had to try to figure out whether this was a serious obstacle or not. Was this an obstacle you could simply go around? Is it something that you need to put aside for a while and try later. Never a dull moment.

Q: I was going to ask about this. One has heard about the, well, the expression was the Russian Mafia in New York and other places. From your perspective what was going on there?

MILES: Well, there was a lot of Russian organized crime activity conducted by Russian émigrés in the United States but with ties back to the motherland and so the FBI, working mostly with the New York City Police Department, set up a special task force on this and, if you can believe this, a Russian Ministry of Internal Affairs officer was seconded to the New York Police Department to work with them on these issues. That would make a good movie, wouldn't it? Again, the level of cooperation was incredible and so the two sides were able to wrap up some cases of financial skullduggery involving money laundering and whatnot; millions of dollars were involved. They were able to stop one scheme in which gas would be either purchased without paying taxes or stolen and then sold at a discount to taxi drivers and then the station would close and go out of business before they paid any taxes and before anyone could catch them. Then they would open another station somewhere and repeat the exercise. There were some cases of extortion, robbery, violence, even murder that were involved. We found the Russians quite interested in cooperating with us on these things.

I am trying to think of examples of cooperation from other spheres. On the nuclear safeguarding area, now remember this was '93, '94 by now and it probably has gone on beyond what I will describe, but in those days, when was that? Fourteen years ago already. I remember taking a congressional delegation for the first time to the formerly closed city of Arzamas-16, which is where Sakharov had lived before he was put in prison and where he had helped to develop the hydrogen bomb—a sort of a Soviet Oak Ridge or Los Alamos, if you will. And so we went out, there was no commercial airport there, there was only the government airport, so we, this delegation of about six or eight congressmen was to go. I went with them to the special military landing field near Moscow. We all had to show picture IDs to the KGB guard to get on the airplane, first to get on the base, then to get on the airplane. And then it was kind of funny, we flew to Arzamas-16, a non-stop flight, and as we landed another KGB guard checked our picture IDs as we got off the plane. I thought, well, it would have been a damn good trick to transfer somebody while we were in the air. Anyhow, that was the security rule.

And then we went up to the facility itself, a bunch of rather nondescript brick buildings, low brick buildings with ivy growing on them, wood frame windows—all rather homey. It didn't look like the kind of a place where the Soviet nuclear weapons had been developed. We were shown their little museum where they had examples of the early Soviet regular nuclear and then hydrogen weapons. And then we were taken into various laboratories where they were dealing with nuclear grade weapons material. Then we were taken into the storage area where this nuclear grade material was stored when it was not being used or experimented with and we were shown moveable cameras at the door of the vault in which the material was being stored and also inside the vault, and were told that scientists in Oak Ridge, Tennessee, could, with their joy sticks, move those cameras around—they were running 24 hours a day—and would be able to determine who was going in and coming out and whether nuclear weapons material was replaced after having been taken out, whether it was at the same level in the container as when it had been taken out, and the Russian scientists had the same capability in Oak Ridge. This is not a secret but it's not known by most Americans, I think, and they would have been astounded in 1993, 1994 to hear about it and it has probably gone on further since then.

I'd like to recount a funny anecdote about that airplane by the way. We were just taxiing out to take off when the cabin began to fill with a kind of a white vapor, like fog, and you know, in that part of the world often the air conditioning in the airplanes doesn't work very well and you will get, especially on landing and take-off, you will get what looks like fog coming out of the openings. And so I blithely told the congressmen not to worry, that this often happened and so on and this was just normal. Of course, they were getting a little antsy. And the mist got thicker and thicker and then I was beginning to get a little antsy myself and I asked the Russian who was with us as the leader of the group, "What's going on? Is this a normal thing here?" And he said in good Russian style, "Oh yes, everything's fine. No problem." We continued to taxi out and then the plane stopped, the pilot turned the engines off and we were told, "Well we're going to have to get another airplane." So God knows what was happening with the heating and cooling system. I remember it was summer so it must have been the cooling system, but I'm glad we didn't go up in the air regardless of what the problem was.

Q: Did you ever run across Vladimir Putin in your time there?

MILES: Well, I first met him shortly after he came back from his KGB assignment in Germany. I enrolled my daughter Elizabeth at Leningrad University and he was the Deputy Director of the Internal Relations Section of the University. Then, a little later, I ran across him frequently in then-Leningrad as foreign economic adviser to the Mayor. I think I talked about that earlier. But in Moscow at that time, no, I didn't. I think he was brought to Moscow later. In the 1993-1996 period, he was still in Leningrad as I recall, in St. Petersburg, working in the city apparatus. Of course, in retrospect, I'm very sorry I didn't stay in touch with him but I don't think anyone in the world thought that he would become President of Russia. And he, as a former KGB-type, was not very forthcoming. He kept back a bit with the foreigners, you know, he was not a gregarious type. So no, we had very little to do with Mr. Putin at that time and I regret that because I had that nice entree from before and it probably would have been possible to have cultivated a relationship with him. But it was just one of those situations where you don't even dream that something is going to happen and then it does.

Q: Did we see, in the time you were there, did we see the growth of a variety of parties in that type of democracy or not?

MILES: We saw it maybe more than was real. The democratic opposition, if you will, was riding reasonably high and people in the various parties, Gaydar and others—I forget the names of them all—Boris Nemtsov, a very appealing young politician from over in Nizhniy Novgorod, a big city, and others. Lebedyev, a former general, was very active politically and we certainly tried to stay in touch with all these people and either Pickering or I would see them or entertain them as often as we could. We also stayed in touch with the Communist Party people. I have a mental block here, I can't remember the name of the Communist Party leader—it was Zyuganov. I have entertained Zyuganov in my home and Pickering saw him even more often than I did.

Q: Wasn't he considered to be pretty radical?

MILES: No, no. He was relatively moderate, frankly. Probably you're thinking of Zhirinovsky.

Q: Zhirinovsky is the man I'm thinking of.

MILES: Zhirinovsky was a rather radical and populist leader, demagogic, actually. I talked to Pickering about this and we agreed that it would probably be best to stay clear of Zhirinovsky personally but that we would encourage—we would name an embassy officer who would be the liaison with Zhirinovsky. We didn't forbid the embassy officers from including him in things from time to time. But we would maintain a little space between ourselves and Zhirinovsky personally. And Zhirinovsky understood that and we were able to pass messages from time to time through our liaison officer and receive messages back and that worked pretty well.

President Clinton came several times while I was there and on one occasion when he came we organized an event at Spaso House to which we invited all the major political opposition figures in to provide some serious face time with President Clinton. And I remember, before the President arrived, trying to carry on a conversation with General Lebedyev. I believe Lebedyev was the most taciturn individual I have ever met in my life. I'd say something in Russian, like, "Well, it's a nice day outside, isn't it, General?" His response to that would be—he would sort of pause and then he'd say, "Yes." Then I'd say, "Well, I heard you had some difficulties in one of your recent public appearances"—you know, wherever it was—and he would say, "Not really." End of sentence. Well, he was old school, career general and all, and probably didn't feel very comfortable talking to any American official and certainly not any American official who was not actually the Ambassador.

And I remember going over to Nizhniy Novgorod once. We had a problem with a slight misuse of U.S. government funds. We had provided some assistance to the Russian Government to build some small but nice houses for demobilized Russian military officers and we had heard that in the Nizhniy Novgorod area some of these houses were being given out to civilians by the city administration. Boris Nemtsov was then the governor of the Nizhniy Novgorod Oblast so I went over to talk him and I explained the problem. He had his subordinates and his accountants there and they all denied that there was any problem with what they were doing. Sharon had accompanied me on that trip and I did a trick which I had learned from Larry Eagleburger when he was Ambassador to Yugoslavia. After listening to some of this bullshit for about 20 minutes, I said, “You know, Boris Efimovich, I wonder if I could speak to you alone. We don’t need interpreters, my Russian is pretty good—we don’t need interpreters. Let me just have a private conversation with you.” And he agreed. And so out went Sharon, out went the note takers, out went the chief accountant for the city, out went the guy in charge of the housing program, and I said to Nemtsov, “Look, let me be blunt. We know exactly what’s going on here. I don’t believe a word of what your people have just told you and you shouldn’t believe it either. And we’re not going to do anything about what you have already done but if it’s not stopped, that is the last house you will see us build in this oblast. We have a limited amount of money for this program. We’ll just build them somewhere else. And so I really urge you to stop it but I’m not going to make any public fuss about it, this is a private conversation that you and I are having right now.” And he said he understood and there would not be a problem in the future. And there wasn’t a problem in the future.

Q: How about, well, Chechnya and maybe anywhere else? The centrifugal forces within what was left of Russia. But let’s talk about Chechnya first and then—

MILES: Well, now that was a big problem and we were quite disconcerted by it and concerned about it. Washington wanted a lot of information; it wanted to know what was going on. And the Ambassador agreed that we would allow Embassy officers to go down to the region near Chechnya—they could go to Ingushetia, for example, because the leaders there were keeping a very close eye on what was going on and our officers could talk to the leaders who were there in Ingushetia, and they could go to Dagestan and do the same thing in Dagestan; these are neighboring provinces to Chechnya. And of course we had our reporting on Chechnya out of independent Georgia and independent Azerbaijan, but that didn’t amount to a whole lot at that time. But we didn’t allow the Embassy officers to go into Chechnya proper and we cautioned American would-be visitors, reporters and whatever, from going down into Chechnya because it was just a damned dangerous place. We were able to keep up to some degree by having a periodic debrief from an outstanding Foreign Service Officer named Philip Remler. Philip is actually in Moscow right now. He was the political officer in Baku when I was there. Anyhow, he had been seconded to the OSCE mission in Chechnya. And he would come up to Moscow periodically and would give me and the other officers that were interested in this a debrief on what he saw from the standpoint of the OSCE mission down there. Philip was a very good observer and a very brave officer, I must say, and he proved it on those occasions and on others as well. So that also enabled us to keep our hand in. The Department, I think, would have liked a little more but I felt, and the Ambassador agreed that it was just too damned dangerous to send people down there; the information was not worth a diplomat’s life.

I’ll give you a couple of examples to prove that point. We had a young fellow come through who didn’t speak Russian—

Q: This is a civilian?

MILES: Yes. Who had some press credentials from an obscure, I don’t know, Ladies’ Garment Workers' Daily or something like that—just some press credentials that he had gotten somewhere. And he was going to go down to Chechnya, and of course he didn't speak Russian or Chechen. He was going to go first to Ingushetia, which was usually the jumping off place to go into Chechnya, and then he planned to go on in and talk to people and then come out.

Well, we said to him, you shouldn't go. I didn't talk to him personally—the consular people did and the public affairs people did, and they said, “You shouldn't go. We don't allow Embassy officers to go down there. They speak Russian and they often have had experience. We don't even allow defense attachés to go. It's dangerous and really we can't protect you if you get into trouble.” Well, he went down. He apparently was picked up a morning or two after he arrived in the capital of Ingushetia, at his hotel, was driven off by someone into Chechnya and disappeared. We never heard from him, you know—not a rag or a piece of bone left.

Then there was another journalist, who at least was a legitimate journalist and who spoke Russian. We gave her the same advice. She came through, I think she came through St. Petersburg, and the consulate people warned her, the same warning exactly. She went on down, went on into Chechnya and had her head blown off by a stray piece of shrapnel. In this case it was just a thing that happens in a wartime situation; I mean, it wasn't as though she was kidnapped or whatever, which is what we usually feared would happen, or taken away by a Russian patrol and shot because they didn't know what else to do with her. In this case she was just in the wrong place at the wrong time. Blew her head off. Had to notify her family and all and tried to retrieve the body. Very tragic business.

And then, the last one was the famous case of Fred Cuny. He was an American with a considerable reputation in international humanitarian operations. He had been in some very dangerous situations in the past, exploring difficult situations and trying to figure out what kind of humanitarian assistance might be applied to that situation. And again, he was advised not to go but, in this case, he had resources behind him. There was not one, but several important American NGOs that he represented; he had consulted with some members of Congress before he went; I think he spoke Russian. And he went off, and all we know is that a couple of days into his trip into Chechnya he disappeared and was not found again alive. We realized after his western organizational contacts had lost touch with him, because, again, he was experienced, and he was going to be phoning back in and so forth with a satellite phone. I was Chargé then, the Ambassador was away, and I remember the staff meeting distinctly. The consular people thought, well, it's just the difficult conditions in the field, these satellite phones don't always work. He's so experienced, let's not worry about it too much. And I said, “Let's do worry about it too much. This area is so dicey and this man has some connections, people are going to be really interested in this. Let's treat this as though something has happened to him right now and let's begin making whatever inquiries we can, as though something has happened.”

And so we did that; from the first report of the lack of contact. And this inquiry quickly escalated because people began coming out to Russia from his organizations in America; there were editorials in the Western media about his disappearance; there were letters from members of Congress. In the end he was not found alive and months later, I think it was maybe even after I left, they did find remains. He had had, I forget, a hip replacement or a knee replacement or something of a unique nature and they found remains in which they were able to identify those metal parts as having been part of his body. And so it's clear that he died as well.

So in other words, all three of these cases turned out very, very bad indeed.

Q: Were we concerned, you mentioned the two other places—

MILES: Ingushetia and Dagestan?

Q: Yes. Now there and elsewhere, in what was still Russia, were we sort of monitoring the, well, the centrifugal forces? What was happening?

MILES: Well, yes. We in Embassy Moscow were interested in what was happening and what the Russians at that time called the near abroad. They don't use that term so much anymore but at that time it meant basically all the states of the former Soviet Union. I'm not sure whether the Baltic States were included in that or not but we did monitor pretty closely the various things that were going on in the former republics and autonomous provinces of the former Soviet Union. And the situation was rather different in almost every one of them. In the Baltic States you had some difficulty with the treatment of the Russian minority and other things. And there were serious environmental problems left by the withdrawn Russian military forces and so forth.

In Central Asia there were problems of unstable governments. It was not the energy issue so much in those days, although there was a little bit of that; some of the American companies were interested in the energy resources in Kazakhstan for example, and of course they were always interested early on in the oil resources in Azerbaijan. To a degree Turkmenistan too but a little less; Kazakhstan was the big interest for them.

So yes, we did spend a bit of time reading carefully the cables from our embassies in those places and also talking to Russians in the government, in business, who themselves were interested in those areas, either just for commercial reasons or political reasons or even security reasons. There was a new commonwealth armed forces organization and the fellow who was in charge of it was General Samsonov, who had been the commander of the Leningrad Military District when I was Consul General there and so I went around to see him. I was the first diplomat, I think, to call on him. And it was very interesting because we didn't know what to make of this commonwealth armed forces thing: was it five feet tall, was it 10 feet tall? We just didn't know. And the defense attachés had never really been able to learn much about the organization. But because I knew him, I guess, I was able to get an appointment with him and so we went out into this, it was like a park-like area where they had taken over some buildings as their headquarters and I'll never forget it. First of all there was virtually no activity going on as far as the eye could see in this rather large space not too far from downtown Moscow; there were no military vehicles running back and forth; there were no troops moving around. And when we went into the building and walked down these hallways, it was quite clear that the place was dark and almost deserted and the officer would flick the corridor lights on as we went down the hallway. And so the General and I had a nice chat and he explained basically that he was in charge of a paper organization; that he himself did not know exactly what was going to become of it but he was going to do the best he could to try to coordinate things and see what could be done. And so we parted on good terms and I went back and the Defense Attaché also wrote his report and we were able to say this is not something that the United States needs to worry about for the foreseeable future.

Q: What about—I've just started reading this book called Second Chance by Zbigniew Brzezinski and he talks about Americans and others, Western Europeans, coming in after the Soviet Union broke up and all, coming in and making deals. I mean, these were sort of—they were people out for a quick buck, making deals with their Russian counterparts, and really it ended up with a bunch of Russians getting quite wealthy and a bunch of Westerners getting quite wealthy. Was this going on while you were there?

MILES: Oh yes, very much. There hasn't been any research on this at all, but it could be that some of these Americans became quite wealthy or made some money at any rate; I wouldn't be at all surprised. But more often I'd say it was a case of the Russians taking advantage of naïve American lawyers and investors. I witnessed in some cases out-and-out charlatans and conmen—like carpetbaggers in the old South after the Civil War. People out for a quick buck, and there were quick bucks to be made, certainly. But also they were sometimes inveigled into investing money in factories which then turned out to have been emptied of their internal machinery and equipment, sold off for scrap or carried off to some other factory leaving the American investor with an empty shell of a building and so on. Environmental problems which were impossible to rectify but the person was already hooked in and now had legal liability for, you know, oil seepage or whatever, toxic waste and so on, and he had no idea it existed before he signed the papers.

On the other hand there were some legitimate businesses there. The American Chamber of Commerce got going at about that time and is now one of the largest in the world. American Express was very big then; credit cards were beginning to be developed and to spread and American Express did quite well, I think. Citibank was active in Russia. McDonalds, Coca Cola and Pepsi Cola—there were others as well. I knew many if not most of these people; I tried to entertain them when the Ambassador couldn't always do it and stay in touch with them. Many of them were interested in cultural and philanthropic activities, partly to help legitimize their efforts in Russia, at that time still in a transition from the communist period. Pure capitalism was frowned on and both the Russians and these American entrepreneurs felt the political and psychological need to justify their activities by saying that they were going to do something nice for society with the profits—I never saw a business proposal, for example, that didn't have something in there about “with the profits we are going to start an old people's home” or “we are going to dig some wells in this village” or some damned thing.

In fact, I used to counsel people about this. I said look, why don't you forget about this philanthropy right now and worry about making a profit and putting your business on a decent basis and worry a lot less about maternity hospitals and that kind of a thing. I understand it's a problem and I understand why you are doing this but don't distract yourself too much with this feel-good stuff. Of course, some of this social support was very valuable at that time. Some of these business people—both American and Russian—were helping to support the symphony orchestras, things of that sort, and Sharon and I were involved in some of those things too. We were able to help do some fundraisers. Junior Achievement got started about that time in Russia. Sharon was particularly active in helping get that program off the ground, especially later when we went to Bulgaria. We got to know the fellow who was president of the Academy of Sciences, Evgeny Velikhov, who is a nuclear physicist, and his wife, quite active. We met them in Leningrad when I was Consul General there and we kept up the relationship when we went to Moscow and Yevgeny was one of the founders of the Junior Achievement program in Russia. He still is involved in Junior Achievement and it's actually now, I think, the largest one in the world. So that kind of thing was going on and it was all very worthwhile.

At that time we had three Consulates General: one in St. Petersburg, one in Yekaterinburg and one in Vladivostok. I tried to visit each one at least twice a year and sometimes more than that. It's a hell of a long way out to Vladivostok, by the way. It's a nine hour nonstop flight from Moscow, and when I first started doing it you had to stop and refuel and it was an 11 hour flight. But I had to see how they were doing out there and make sure they didn't feel neglected. And I always made the point to meet with the American business people in these cities and see how they were doing. In general, they were having a very hard time. In the business world in Russia at that time there was a lot of criminal and sometimes governmental thuggery going on. In European Russia we could usually work with the government officials to straighten things out. Not in the Russian Far East, however. It was just too far away and the local mafia was just incredibly brazen in their collusion with the authorities. I mean, basically the authorities would entice the American entrepreneurs in, let them bring in equipment, air conditioning, chillers, freezers, vehicles, computers—goods of all sorts; let them take over a warehouse, put on a new roof, plaster, paint; and then they would block the American investors from ownership of their property. It was notorious; it was really pretty outrageous. The Consul General in Vladivostok tried to help but had great difficulty getting any traction on these difficulties.

And I had some knock down drag out fights with some of these thugs in power out there myself but I lost more battles than I won. This was their turf. They were in charge and given the somewhat anarchic conditions in Russia at that time, there really wasn't very much anyone could do about it.

Q: What was the feeling while you were there about the Chinese?

MILES: No particular fear of the Chinese. In fact, there was some trade back and forth across the border; there was also some trade with Japan and there were lots and lots of cars with right-hand drives out there because the Japanese were exporting their used cars to the Russian Far East.

They were also doing business with South Korea and I never was able to find out much about their relationship with the North Koreans, and my guess is that any trade which existed at that time didn't amount to much.

Q: Well, there wasn't much to do.

MILES: Well, they could easily have sold their goods in Korea. At that time the North Koreans were suffering, as they are today, and that's a big market, but they would have had to settle accounts in barter in some way. Ginseng is grown out in that part of the world and that's a big export item from the Russian Far East, a very lucrative thing. It's mostly grown wild and I know that there is ginseng in North Korea, so you could have helped pay in that way but there was very little of that. There was some Korean trading which took place in China itself but, at that time, I don't think the Russians were doing much in North Korea.

And in the rest of Russia you had the beginning of what they call the shuttle business. The traders were called "chelnochniki" [shuttle trader] from the word "chelnok", the shuttle that goes back and forth in a loom. Shuttle diplomacy in Russian is "chelnochnaya diplomatiya", for example, but the word was also applied to these mostly Chinese traders who would come up with big bags and backpacks and bundles on the train or the plane to the Russian cities and would sell cheap Chinese goods, anything from a thermos to pots and pans and then they would take back whatever they could take back from Russia, caviar or whatever, and sell it in China, and you also had Russian traders who were beginning to do that too.

Now, in terms of a larger business interest I know that there was some trade that was being conducted. I had a good friend who had become the Chinese Ambassador in Moscow. He and I had been young officers together in Moscow in 1976-1977 and we had, I would say, a good relationship at that time. We used to love to tease the KGB and the foreign ministry watchers because at diplomatic parties and other events we would go off into a corner and just talk to each other very rapidly back and forth. We spoke then in Russian; his English was not very good at that time and we exchanged information on what was going on, how we saw things, what might be happening in the immediate future. And it would just drive our Soviet watchers wild. He was the Chinese Ambassador during my second tour in Moscow and I used to see him fairly frequently. He was quite informative on trade patterns and current statistics.

Q: I'm just looking at the time. It's probably a good place to stop. Now, is there anything else we should talk about in Russia before we move on?

MILES: Well, there probably is. Let me think about that; I'll make a note of that.

Q: Okay.

MILES: When we come back next time I think one thing would be the military visits that we had because they were quite interesting and I have some good anecdotes. So at a minimum let me talk about some of those military-to-military visits and exchanges and then I'll scratch my head a little and think of others. There were some congressional visits that might be worthwhile and, yes, I think there probably is a little more.

Q: Good. When you talk about the military visits, if you would talk about what happened to the Far East Fleet. I've seen pictures of them, all those ships rusting there.

MILES: A pretty sad state of affairs.

Q: Okay. Today is the 21st of May, 2007. Dick, do you want to talk a bit—you were in Russia when to when now?

MILES: It was '93 to '96.

Q: And so you want to talk a bit about military-to-military.

MILES: Well, we had a really good military-to-military relationship going on. Some Russian military officers were being trained in American military schools and I don't recall if we had American military officers who were in Russian military schools but we did have some declared American officers who were studying in Russia full-time, living on the economy pretty much, to improve their Russian.

And then we had these visits, both ship visits and other visits, some of them rather spectacular. At one point, Ambassador Pickering, I think, was probably out of the country so I was Chargé and I attended the 50th anniversary of the ending of the war in the Pacific out at Vladivostok; you had mentioned the fleet out in the Russian Far East. And I had been to Vladivostok many times because of the Consulate General out there. I tried to get out there two to three times a year and, of course, I always tried to call on the fleet officers. And we did have some good programs involving the military out there.

For example our military was closing down a hospital somewhere in the Pacific Theater and they donated all the equipment, all the beds, all the medical machinery, bedpans, some surplus bandages and whatnot to the Russian military hospital in Vladivostok, which needed it desperately; got a lot of good publicity out of that, Russian television was there, the Oblast Governor was there and so on.

And then we did have this 50th anniversary of the ending of World War II in the Pacific event and they had invited representatives from the Chinese Navy and other navies to be present. I don't recall any Japanese being present; I don't know if they were invited or not. And in our case the U.S. Navy sent a destroyer, I believe, but they also found a one-star admiral who was stationed in Guam, I don't recall his name, who was right out of central casting. He was a big African-American fellow, must have been six feet five or whatever, and it was late summer so he was wearing his Navy whites and, my goodness, he really made an impact on the local population; they had never seen anything quite like that. I mean, he was spectacular.

I remember distinctly my wife Sharon and me waiting on the dock while the ship pulled in and the Russian Navy band was playing "Get Me to the Church on Time," which, after the sailors hit the beach, probably was an appropriate song. And so that was a lot of fun, a lot of coming and going and visiting back and forth. And the Chinese admiral gave the American admiral a magnificent, huge watch; it looked like one of these 18th-century pocket watches, big massive thing. I was drooling, I would love to have had it as a souvenir but the Admiral got it and he deserved it. He was about a hundred times more charismatic than I was.

And then of course there were the calls on the Russian commanders and then we were given a lunch, I believe it was, on board one of the big Russian ships that was there for the occasion. And I remember touring around, and I had spent two years at sea in the Marine Corps so I knew something about ships and what they should look like, and the Russian flagship was certainly ready for action, the sailors looked pretty good, the officers looked fine, but the ship itself was pretty dirty by our standards. It just had not been kept very clean. You would see rust marks and corrosion where on an American military ship you would simply never see that, it wouldn't happen.

But I do remember going up on the bridge and I guess they just hadn't thought about it but they had still scotch-taped up on the bulkhead of the bridge silhouettes of the NATO warships for identification purposes—hopefully friendly identification in this case.

There was another memorable ship visit, this time in Murmansk, above the Arctic Circle. I went up to Murmansk several times. On this occasion, I went up for the 50th anniversary of the ending of World War II. It was to celebrate the allied convoys that had delivered supplies to the Soviet Union during the War. The Russians celebrate the end of the War in Europe on May 9, and it was an absolutely and totally miserable day up there; it's way above the Arctic Circle. And so Sharon and I were there and we knew how to dress for the weather, and all the diplomats had been told that there would be a place for them to stand during some patriotic speeches that were being held, and then the diplomats would be bussed up to a site on the cliff overlooking the bay in Murmansk, and the fleet was assembled there, and there would be more speeches and more wreath laying. And it was snowing pretty hard and the streets were slushy and all.

Well anyhow, to make a long story short, when we got to the first site I found that it would be politically awkward not to walk up with everybody else and I hadn't put my galoshes on or anything so I was in ordinary dress shoes. I did have a hat, thank God, and so I walked. I think it was about three miles; it was a very long walk pretty much uphill through the slush, through the snow coming down and, boy, I was a wreck when I got there. Cold wet and tired. And I had told Sharon, who was willing to walk and wanted to walk, that that would be absolutely insane, that she and the ladies should take the van and drive on up and we would see them there. But I walked, and so up we went and we did the honors up there on the top of the cliff. It was very moving actually, despite the weather. Everyone was there, the band played, the Soviet Northern Fleet was arrayed out on the water. Warm words were said about the American sailors both military and merchant seamen, who had given their lives bringing the cargoes through the German attacks. It was a memorable event.

I remember another occasion when a small Navy ship—I think it was a frigate but it might have been a destroyer, I frankly don't remember—was coming into, now this was a different occasion and they were coming into Murmansk to make a port call, a routine ship visit, and I was up there to greet them, along with a Russian Admiral who was on the dock with me. This was at the naval base in Severomorsk which we didn't usually get to visit. The ship was going to come to a full stop and then back into the berth and we could see that there was some confusion out on the water there. The Captain stopped the ship alright and nothing happened for a little while and then he came cautiously in, and it turns out that he had hit a large rock submerged out in the harbor and had thrown one of the propellers—happily it was a twin propeller ship so he was still able to maneuver. The Russian pilot, who was taken on board to bring the ship in, didn't have any harbor maps and had simply drawn the outline of the harbor and the port on the palm of his hand with a ballpoint pen and that was how the Captain was supposed to navigate in. Well, somehow on that very careful map on the palm of this pilot's hand, he had not put the submerged rock and so the Captain pranged his propeller on it. Now, this was not a funny matter. And it was especially awkward for the Captain of the American ship. In fact, the Russian Admiral standing next to me on the dock was so agitated while he watched what was happening, that he actually said, “I can’t stand this anymore. I’m going to go wait in the car.” And he went back and sat in the car while the ship came on in. And then the Russians were pretty good about it; they sent divers down to inspect the propeller and eventually, I think, the captain asked them to take off what remained of it. There was a lot of talk about what to do and so on, and in the end, because it was a twin screw ship, they were able to limp out on just one screw. But it was very awkward and the poor Captain—I don’t remember his name and I’m glad I can’t remember it, he suffered enough. The Captain was a mustang—that is, he had come up through the ranks—and of course he was extremely proud to be an officer and to be the Captain who was bringing this ship in, the only ship on this visit into Severomorsk, a formerly prohibited harbor. Then to have that happen was pretty ignominious and it also, I imagine, put a damper on his career. I don’t know what happened to him afterward.

The Navy is rather 18th century about these things. There would be a board of inquiry and, of course, the primary fault lay with the pilot, but the sad fact of Navy life is that the Captain is responsible, almost no matter what. I felt very sorry for that man.

Q: That is one of those things that if you are the Captain you are responsible even though, obviously, if a pilot is doing it—

MILES: You have the con [command of the ship], so to speak, and there you are.

I remember, now, this has nothing to do with the Foreign Service, but I remember, I was up on the bridge of the aircraft carrier that I was on in the Marine Corps, the Captain had gone below and the Gunnery Officer was up there, having taken temporary command, and they were refueling at sea, which is a tricky maneuver. And somehow the Gunnery Officer misjudged the wave action or the speed of the ships or whatever and the refueling ship went down at the same time that the aircraft carrier went up. Now, that aircraft carrier weighed 40,000 tons so we are talking about a hell of a lot of mass, and as it went up the refueling ship washed in underneath the, as I recall, the overhanging port side elevator, and then came up under it and you can imagine what a mess that made of things. So we went into Yokosuka, Japan, for repairs which was nice for the crew because we got a lot of shore leave, but that definitely was the end of the Gunnery Officer’s career. And he was a very nice fellow, too; it was a pity, really. But if you are in charge, you know, there you are.

Q: Were you by any chance in Russia when they had the submarine Kursk accident?

MILES: No. No, that came after my time. I did see—you mentioned earlier the poor condition of the ships in the Far East Fleet, and, you know, they really were in pretty bad shape. Some were not capable of going to sea for any extended period of time but frankly they weren’t as bad as the Northern Fleet up in Severomorsk and Murmansk. That fleet was in very, very bad condition. First of all, weather conditions are much, much more severe in the far North. But second, they were making no effort whatsoever to control environmental damage, and so you had nuclear powered submarines that were just sunk in the water, beached on the—you know, halfway up on the beach and the rear half of the submarine sunk in the water, and God knows what the environmental impact was of that and the other abandoned ships that were there. The place was an enormous junkyard, in some cases involving nuclear materials, so really pretty awful. I’m sure, at least I fervently hope, that the radioactive material had been removed from those ships, but I can't believe that these wrecks were environmentally safe. And, too, that place is bleak enough to begin with. It's so far north that trees don't grow; there are only shrubs and bushes up there so the place is pretty gray and grim generally, and to have these ships sunk in the harbor there, well, it's just pretty awful really.

Q: You left Russia when?

MILES: Summer of '96.

SHIRLEY E. RUEDY
Science and Technology Officer
Moscow (1995-1996)

Political Officer, External Affairs
Moscow (1996-1997)

Shirley Ruedy was born in Virginia and raised in Ohio. She was educated Ohio Wesleyan and Duke Universities and at several universities abroad. Before becoming a Foreign Service Officer in 1987, Mrs. Ruedy accompanied her USIA husband on assignments in Iran and Germany. As an FSO, she served as Political Officer in Bonn and Moscow as well as in the State Department in Washington, where she dealt primarily with Soviet Union and Regional European matters. Mrs. Ruedy was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005.

Q: What was in the offing?

RUEDY: I was going to Moscow to work in the EST (Science and Technology) office. It was not my first choice; I wanted to go work in the political section, but again the tandem couple issue was determinate since my husband was named DPAO (Deputy Public Affairs Officer) for Moscow. He was responsible for the various USIA facilities throughout Russia, so he did a lot of traveling. He had to check on these places. I'm an English major, but I said oh, OK, I'm up for anything; I'll go work in the Science and Technology office and they gave me trade craft training. The political parts of it really did interest me and that's what I did when I got in the job. My boss recognized that's where my strengths lie. I didn't know that much about physics as he did; he was a physicist. We had some very interesting, funny experiences working with the Russian scientists. We would go and visit some of the labs that had been used for pretty nefarious things. I remember one time, in particular, we were meeting with some graduate students and we had gone through a swinging door with a red skull and crossbones on it. We walked through there and I thought, hmmm, this is interesting. We were talking to these graduate students and they had this vial, a chemical, and they were passing it around and my boss said, don't touch that. He said I'll explain later. I was struck by the carelessness. These were just students, but I saw it in established scientists as well. To me it looked like carelessness, but to them I think it was a lot of disregard for individual human life. Science is the God and they were willing to sacrifice in anything to this God. This was the impression I got after several experiences like this.

Q: Did you have any particular part of the action?

RUEDY: I was responsible for liaison with the International Technology and Science Center. This was an attempt to attract Russian scientists to peaceful projects, to turn their attention from making weapons and other things, to try to get them involved in peaceful applications for the kind of research they had been doing. I don't know how successful that really was. I know that there were lots of conferences and the people at ISTC would put out a call for projects. Scientists would send in various projects and some of them would get funded. It was not just a U.S. thing; it was also paid for by the EU. You met very interesting people through this work, but it was tough going because the mind set was going to be very difficult to change.

Q: Whose mindset?

RUEDY: The Russian scientists' mindset.

Q: Was it that they were not used to being in an international group or were they too very good at creating better armor or...?

RUEDY: That's what they'd been trained to do, that's what their work had been, that's what they were rewarded for, and there was a kind of rigidity. It was a difficulty in thinking outside the box. OK, so I'm an expert on this, what can I do to develop this in a different direction? Can I go into pharmaceuticals? There were some of them that were very sharp and caught on, but there were a lot of others. I think it was a generational thing; the younger scientists coming up are much more entrepreneurial.

Q: By the way, you were there from 1995 until?

RUEDY: 1995 to 1997.

Q: Were you to seeing a change in the impact of computers, the Internet, the whole thing which must've been relatively new. The Soviets had their specialized computers, but this openness of sharing must have been a new game for them.

RUEDY: It was. I remember being invited to MGU (the state university there in Moscow) to meet with some students in physics. I thought I was going to be shown around with lots of test tubes and machines and vials that I probably shouldn't be touching, but instead what I found was that this very entrepreneurial teacher had set up a whole roomful of computers. His students were not working on physics; they were working on setting up this computer lab. They had gotten onto the Internet, and they were fervent, they were working around the clock to suddenly tap into all these new sources of information. He, I believe, had the idea that he was going to make money off of this somehow. I think this was the whole idea. Some of them were very entrepreneurial and were trying to find ways to augment their meager incomes using their labs or whatever, for example, the setting up of this computer lab. I think it is pretty much complete now, an attempt to link all of the universities by computer. I've been away from it for while, but it must be complete by now.

Q: Were you feeling the basic collapse of the economy at that time? The whole Soviet controlled system had broken down, everything was up for grabs, but there was really nothing to replace it.

RUEDY: There were so many people, especially the elderly. There were two groups I really felt for: the elderly whose pensions had simply disappeared with the new economy and the children whose parents couldn't support them and they just started living on the streets. There was an incredible number of children about nine, ten, eleven years old who lived on the streets simply because their parents couldn't take care of them. I have the privilege to be a member of the Protestant Chaplaincy and one of its major projects was a series of soup kitchens. The number of meals our church provided was staggering. We had some of those people come in and talk to us, people who used our soup kitchens. It was heartbreaking. There were, for example, older women who had been school teachers, and they were very, very correct and proper and educated and well spoken, but they didn't have enough to eat. They were surviving by coming to this soup kitchen. It was very tragic, and there didn't seem to be a whole lot of concern on the part of the Russian government about this. I also have to say the Russian Orthodox Church didn't seem to be stepping up to the plate either. By the time I left we were trying to engage some particular individual neighborhood Orthodox churches and trying to work with them to see what we can do together so that the soup kitchens wouldn't be just some American thing. I think slowly they were starting to come around, but that was not in their book, not something they automatically thought they were responsible for.

Q: How about other countries, particularly France and Germany? Were they getting into the science field and that sort of thing?

RUEDY: There was great concern about the Russian scientists. I think Germany, in particular, was using their very well thought out, very effective apprentice training program. They had for years offered people from all over the world the opportunity to come to Germany, learn German, and work to learn trades. I think we saw that quite a few of the 9/11 hijackers had ended up in Germany doing this very thing. They have attracted people from all over the world and what happens is eventually these people become the business leaders, scientific leaders, and speak German and they have connections with Germany in that way. I think that Germany was quite active. The European Union also had various programs for scientists; there was a lot of attention being paid. We did a lot of work with the Russian Academy of Sciences. I would say that the major European countries were very involved just like we were. They were very involved with the ISTC. People just realized that a) we had all of these scientists running around who needed money, and b) there were bodies in the world willing to pay them for their expertise in North Korea or Iran or Iraq and c) the Russian economy desperately needed new products, all of these things to improve the economy, and the research component was not there, we needed to get them oriented in a new direction.

Q: How did you find the non-governmental organizations' response to this particular issue?

RUEDY: The human rights organizations were very active, including the Helsinki Commission, though, of course, that's not exactly an NGO. I worked for one year in the Science and Technology Office, and then I was offered a position in the political section in external affairs. My colleagues in internal affairs would have had more to do with the NGO's; that's an area where I don't have a lot of background.

Q: You did external affairs from '96 to '97?

RUEDY: Yes.

Q: What did that involve?

RUEDY: Again, I was the junior person so I got the Iraq account; I got basically the rogue country accounts, and the UN, Afghanistan. It was wonderful; I had just such an amazingly rich experience. It was just one year but it seems like a lot longer. One of my very first assignments was to accompany the Assistant Secretary for NEA (Near East Bureau) to a meeting with Foreign Minister Primakov. The occasion was we had just bombed Iraq; this was a discrete surgical bombing under President Clinton. It turns out the Russian equivalent of our Assistant Secretary had been in Baghdad at the time of the bombing and had not been officially told, according to him by our government, that they were going to do this. It was a bit frosty at that meeting. I could see that I was going to have a tough time; this was not going to be easy.

I found that once I started working with people at my level, the Russian diplomats were extremely well informed, fair minded, even idealistic about that part of the world. I had so many really good conversations with them. They were off in an annex, all of the offices that were dealing with countries I was dealing with were in an annex across the street from the main MFA (Ministry of Foreign Affairs) building. I got so I knew the guards; I knew everybody there because I was there daily delivering one demarche or another. They teased me that they were going to give me an office because I spent so much time there. I found them really good colleagues. That was not what I expected at all. Even on Afghanistan where we didn't see eye-to-eye, I thought it was really, really important that we share some information. I got permission from Washington to start sharing information with them about what we thought, not our political analysis, but just basic information about where help was needed, with statistics, to demonstrate to them that we were concerned about the people of Afghanistan. We did not have these big geopolitical plans, but we were like the Russians in that we were concerned about stability, about what was going to happen to the people.

Q: The Taliban had not taken over the country completely?

RUEDY: They were in the process. I did a lot of reporting on what the Russians shared with me; I shared with them, they shared with me. These were younger diplomats; I always appreciated dealing with the younger diplomats. They really did have a different attitude and mind set; and they really did want to work with us. They did see that together we could solve some problems in Afghanistan. I look back on that with some professional satisfaction.

Q: Was there concern on their part about the Taliban?

RUEDY: Yes, there was. Some of the hardliners in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, of course, blamed us for the Taliban too. That could be argued either way, I guess. I learned a lot about the history of Afghanistan in talking to the Russians. The Russians usually know their areas very well; they don't move their diplomats around as much as we do. These young diplomats spoke the languages, they'd been in country, they stuck with those countries and became real experts. I learned a lot from them. About that time Ambassador Pickering gave me some material about Afghanistan that had just been recently declassified. I learned a lot by reading this big thick notebook. I began to see the complexity and began to understand some of what the Russians were saying and accusing us of. The Russians, of course, had very dirty hands in Afghanistan and these younger diplomats recognized that.

Q: Were they concerned about this spread of Islamic fundamentalism, the underbelly of what we call the "stans"?

RUEDY: Yes, most definitely. It was interesting because some of the diplomats I worked with were from the more Muslim parts of the Soviet Union and may have been Muslims themselves. They had been educated in Soviet schools and so on; I think that's a very interesting thing to remember in considering the whole problem of Islam in the former Soviet Union is that at least for certain generations that share that Soviet education for good or for bad, but it is a kind of a glue that holds the thing together. The concern was there definitely, and I think we saw it with Putin, his concern about Chechnya and Dagestan. They really do believe there are certain Islamic groups that want to break off portions of Russia, and they're just not going to allow that to happen. This is a major issue. The Russian diplomats that I talked to very early on, even before it got in the press, were convinced that the trouble in Chechnya was stirred up by outsiders, by people from the Middle East. There was very quick identification with the United States after 9/11 that we both have people from the Middle East trying to destroy us. Of course, a lot of our human rights organizations were saying no, this Chechnya thing is definitely a legitimate desire for self-government, self-determination and the Russians are just grinding them down. The Russian government just doesn't see it that way.

Q: How about North Korea?

RUEDY: I didn't have North Korea, thank goodness. I've never dealt much with North Korea.

Q: You say you had U.N. affairs?

RUEDY: Yes, I had U.N. affairs.

Q: How were we viewing the role of Russia in the U.N. at that time?

RUEDY: Obviously, the Russians continue to be major players in the Security Council. I think both countries were trying to figure out ways to reform the UN so as to better reflect the new world situation we find ourselves in. There was a lot of consultation between the United States and Russia about the future of the UN. Obviously, when Israel is involved, or certain other hot button issues, we don't see eye-to-eye. It is my understanding that in our views of how to proceed with reforming the U.N., the United States and Russia often were closer than we were with say France because we both had similar goals. That was very interesting to watch. The Russians were quite upset about what they perceived as the United States getting rid of Boutros-Gali and putting in someone the United States approved of in his place; they see Kofi Annan as an American plant; they blamed Madeleine Albright for that. That didn't go over very well; there was a lot of tension around that.

Q: Was terrorism a major concern of ours by this time?

RUEDY: The embassy was shot at. Someone – and I don't remember if they ever caught anyone – set up one of these RPG's in an alleyway right across from the embassy, shot across the street and hit two floors below where I was standing; the whole building shook. This was not too long after the Oklahoma City bombing so we didn't know if the building was going to collapse or what was going to happen. That shook everybody up. I don't know that we were that concerned about terrorism in Moscow or Russia itself because things were still pretty tightly controlled. At that time we had people from the embassy going down to Chechnya – there came a time when nobody was allowed to go there. When I was there people were still going there and reporting on the situation. So I guess it was just a little bit early; we were all shocked back here in Washington when we read about the bombings in the Metros and the schools and that sort of thing. That's not something we would have contemplated when I was there.

Q: How was morale at the embassy at this point?

RUEDY: Moscow's a tough place. We knew that before we went out. There was the compound which I think gave everybody a sense of security in a way, but it also felt very claustrophobic; actually, for people with families I think it was really tough. My husband and I took two teenagers over there and that was amazingly difficult.

Q: Where did they go to school?

RUEDY: They went to school right on the compound. It was an excellent school. Both my children did very well, they profited thereby. My daughter learned Russian and now she's a professional dealing with Russian affairs. I think it was just a matter of people being squeezed into a very small space, and seeing the boss or seeing the secretary that you had words with that day and then seeing them that night at the gym. It was very difficult to get away from work; of course, you were right there on call too so it was not unusual for people to go home for dinner and then back to do work at the embassy.

Q: Was the KGB security apparatus pretty well gone?

RUEDY: No, absolutely not. There was still a lot of that. My boss, for example, in the EST unit was followed for a few days when he first arrived. There was still a lot of that going on. When I got back to Washington, I got stung because there was this young officer from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs from the Russian Embassy who wanted to talk to me about CSCE/OSCE and so we had a couple of meetings. Eventually, I found out he was KGB; I had no idea and that was really a blow to my pride because I thought I could tell. This young man just seemed, we talked about preparing a Thanksgiving turkey and it seemed very innocuous, but I got called in.

Q: Where was this going? Was this leading to recruiting you or?

RUEDY: I have no idea. I think he was probably young and enthusiastic and didn't know where he was going with it either. He was just doing something he could report.

Q: It sounds as though the KGB hadn't gotten the word.

RUEDY: Well, you know they installed that listening device in one of our conference rooms not that long ago, after Powell was Secretary. They were still very much looking out after us.

Q: I can't think of anything worse than having to listen to what went on in that room.

RUEDY: Well, people were saying this particular room was being used for bridal shower, baby showers, etc.

Q: I remember when we were in Belgrade where the phones were all bugged, my wife spent an inordinately long time on the telephone organizing an international Girl Scout meeting. I'm sure there were people from the secret police who knew all the ins and outs of organizing a Girl Scouts meeting.

RUEDY: They were still very much looking out after us.

Q: But you didn't feel that they were provocateurs at that time?

RUEDY: I didn't experience anything like that. There is a church that sits at one end of the compound and that has traditionally been considered a KGB listening post. It's a beautiful church with a lovely spire. My daughters, who were very adventurous, decided they were going to go visit this church; I didn't know anything about this, I was at work. The two of them, they both speak some Russian, went over and asked if they might see the inside of the church. They were met by a priest from the Orthodox Church, who seemed delighted to see them. He took them around, showed them around, let them ring the bells. So if that was still a KGB listening post, it was very well disguised. I was beside myself when I heard what they had done, but they said that the man had invited them back, had given them books, and had been a very good host.

Q: What about the openness of society, getting out and around?

RUEDY: That did not seem to be a big problem. People didn't hesitate to talk to us, especially if they found out we could speak a little Russian, and they seem to very eager to talk to us including people out in the countryside. We did a lot of weekend trips; I didn't sense that there was any concern. It was so different from when we were in East Germany where if we went to visit someone we would have to hide our car. I didn't sense any of that. People seemed to speak quite freely. Even the diplomats seemed to speak quite freely. I don't know what it's like now; I understand things are changing. My daughter leaves on Tuesday for a three-week trip so I'll be anxious to hear her impressions because she is in the human rights area.

RALPH H. RUEDY
Deputy Public Affairs Officer
Moscow (1995-1997)

Ralph Ruedy was born and raised in Iowa. Between receiving his bachelor's degree from Iowa State University and his master's from Duke University, he spent five years serving in the U.S. Navy in Vietnam. Mr. Ruedy joined USIA in 1974. His overseas posts include East Berlin, Dusseldorf, Bonn, and Moscow. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005.

Q: Well this is probably a good place to stop. You left there in '95 or when was it?

RUEDY: I left there in '94 and went into a year of Russian language training and then went to the American embassy in Moscow from '95-'97.

Q: OK we will pick that up then.

Today is the 10th of May 2005. Ralph how did you find Russian?

RUEDY: I found Russian difficult and I knew it would be. I'm not a particularly gifted linguist. I learned German the easy way from my grandfather and my parents growing up but Russian was something else again. I knew that I wasn't the gifted language student because I had struggled with Vietnamese before going to Vietnam in the Navy and then later had some training in Persian and Farsi as well before going to Iran, just a basic courtesy level but those experiences let me know that language came more easily to other people sometimes than it did to me.

Q: How old were you when you were taking this?

RUEDY: Oh my, I was in my fifties. I was in my mid-fifties.

Q: You are a little bit late, as you are supposed to learn it before you hit twenty.

RUEDY: That's absolutely right. But I came to the assignment in Russia more or less as serendipity because my wife is a Foreign Service officer as well and we were looking around for tandem assignments to go overseas. Tandem assignments are very difficult to find and they are generally available at larger embassies and of course Rome and Paris and London are a little bit more difficult to get. There was nothing available at any of those places but the personnel list in Moscow indicated two appropriate openings. We bid on them and off we went. I must admit I had no particular interest in studying Russian or in Russian history or things Russian. I had never served in that part of the world so I didn't really know what to expect. My wife had had some background. She had had some Russian language in college and also studied Russian literature and Russian history and found that all very interesting so I thought well I'll do my best and off we will go to Moscow and do Russian language. I found Russian language tough but you take the Woody Hayes approach to language learning. You hit it each morning and a cloud of dust and three yards and you hope you get a first down and make it to the next step and that's what happened. I did my year of Russian language and it was tough but I came out of it with a 3-3 and I suppose there are 3-3s and there are 3-3s. In some cases one clears the high bar elegantly and in other cases one makes it to the top and the bar is jiggling and you wind up in the dust taking a deep breath and maybe I fell into the latter category.

Q: Well Ralph you went to Moscow, you were there again from when to when?

RUEDY: I was there from '95-'97. I got there in July approximately of '95 and left there in July of '97.

Q: What was your position?

RUEDY: I was deputy public affairs officer and we had a very large USIS operation, certainly the largest in the world. We had quite large programs thanks to the Freedom Support Act. By this time USIA funding and USIA leadership and USIA everything was pretty much in tatters. But, in that part of the world, thanks to the Freedom Support Act, we had very, very large programs, which relied on sort of clones of programs that USIA had been doing successfully for years. We had a very large program for example to bring graduate students to the United States to study law, business administration, economics and government.

Q: This is brand new because prior to that they had all gone over to study science.

RUEDY: That is correct, they had wanted to study science and selected only people that were absolutely reliable and all the rest of it. Here we basically did our own selection, we ran our own selection process working with a couple of really good NGOs (non-governmental organizations) Acter and IREX who had lots of experience in that part of the world. Anyway, we conducted these programs and they were frankly clones of the Fulbright graduate program, the same basic mechanisms, the same basic approach, the same basic selection criteria. We got some really, really good people, bright young people that would come to the States for a year and in many cases in that year earn a masters degree. They just did really well, spoke good English and all the rest of it.

Q: It must have been an exciting time, you had not been an old Soviet hand but I mean things had really just had been uncorked there. Could you describe kind of the working atmosphere?

RUEDY: It is absolutely true, uncorked is a good description because suddenly all kinds of things were possible. The Russians were friendly and interested though some of the Russian officials were a little bit standoffish and some of them tended to be kind of stuck in the bureaucratic mechanism of the past. I remember one go-around that we had with the ministry of culture. They had perceived that the cultural agreement that we had signed way back in Soviet days had expired and the cultural agreements were very, very detailed lists of what they would do and what we would do. The cultural agreements tended actually to circumscribe reciprocal cultural activities, so we didn't really want a cultural agreement but they insisted on it. It expired and they needed a new one, it was just the way it was done. So we worked out not a cultural agreement but a statement of principles or something like that I think we called it. It basically called for just lots and lots of contact and the governments not getting in the way of that but encouraging it and working to facilitate it whenever possible, that is what we were trying to do.

Q: How about the people who were working for the embassy, the Russians, for your thing, how did you find that?

RUEDY: We had terrific Russian employees and I think that was the mainstay of our capacity in Russia. We had a good group of Foreign Service officers. It was still USIS at that point, a large USIS operation and I think we had 14, 15 officers, 15 Americans all together and probably 40 or 50 Russian employees. The Russian employees were outstanding; some of them had master's degrees and some had experience in the United States but not in all the cases. But, I think they also shared a commitment really to engagement with the West and engagement with the United States. They were interested in the U.S. and they felt as good Russians it was important for them to do this. So, they were outstanding, very energetic, great cooperation and that went from everybody from the senior cultural people to the drivers some of whom spoke a little bit of English, many of whom didn't but they were just all a joy to work with, they were just great folks to work with.

Q: You were working on the cultural side is that right?

RUEDY: I was working on both the press and the cultural side. The PAO who was Paul Smith my first year and Bob Gosende the second year. I was chief operating officer or something like that. So, I was the person that was making the trains run on time or trying to within that big organization. I perhaps put it into too glossy terms but I tried to get out as much as possible as well and participate in programs and have lots and lots of contact with Russians. Basically my job was to keep the operation running and to worry about things like budgets and country plans which we were still doing and mission program plans and pulling all that kind of stuff together and making sure that the mail from Washington got answered. I made sure that the reporting that we were supposed to be doing on our exchange programs and all that stuff was getting done so it was a good job, I enjoyed it.

Q: What about did you have much contact one way or the other with the Russian universities?

RUEDY: Yes, yes we did. That was a big area that we were interested in and concerned about and most of that went to the cultural attaché. Rosemary DiCarlo was cultural attaché and she is an old Soviet hand, really outstanding, excellent Russian, had a PhD. in Russian literature or Russian art, really a strong background. Some of the people in the section in USIS did. Paul Smith who was my boss as PAO had excellent Russian, which he learned in the army and later on, had served in exhibits in the old Soviet Union, traveling exhibits and all that stuff so he really knew the territory. As I say, great people to work with and learn from. I felt a little bit of an outsider to that Soviet club but I found the assignment tremendously, tremendously rewarding. I had talked about how I looked at going to Russia and Russian language with a little bit of trepidation, who needs this at this point in my career but just getting over there the culture was so immensely rich and Russian art and Russian literature and Russian history and religion and everything else.

Q: In going to the universities, did you get the feeling that they were sort of restructuring themselves? I mean it had been the Soviet system and then all of a sudden things were opening up and things were based on a Marxist course. I can't think off anybody who would be less desired than a professor of Marxist theory or something like that.

RUEDY: I think some of the professors of Marxist theory were left out in the cold. Others in economics or people in other fields were looking around and seeing new possibilities and new opportunities. The younger ones I think shared in that excitement and the dynamism. There was a massive restructuring. I think the Russians, were just really excellent at muddling through. They would improvise, they would kind of figure out a way and they would make it work. I grew tremendously admiring of the way the Russians were able to cope, were able to do things and that certainly was called upon in the situation that existed in '95-'97. Universities had been teaching organizations with a heavily Marxist/Leninist outlook. Obviously they were teaching students to be good Marxist/Leninists. Serious research was conducted not by university professors but by people in the academy of sciences or the academy of arts, that is where the art or where the science or where the research got done. These organizations were massively funded by the old Soviet government as well. That funding was drying up so you had these old institutes and these wonderful 19th century buildings in Moscow, which were desperately improvising to keep body and soul together. A couple of the institutes I remember had rented space to American companies that were coming over. IBM (International Business Machines) and others would need space so they would rent office space in these prestigious old institute buildings and I had the impression of sort of the southern plantation or whatever now no longer prospering, renting out rooms in order to produce some cash flow to keep the place going.

Q: Tara has gone bed and breakfast.

RUEDY: Yes that's right, exactly. That applied especially in the arts. My daughter took trumpet lessons there from a guy that we got to know pretty well who was a world-class trumpet teacher. He was basically trying to keep his faculty and keep his organization going and the way he did that was to teach students who could pay him in marks or in dollars and then he also had pretty good German. He spoke no English but he had pretty good German so we communicated mostly in German. He then had all kinds of connections in Germany and basically would spend maybe half the year in Germany performing or doing stuff and I think earning enough money to keep the institute at the organization that he was attached to, going. He had a couple of really good students and the good students would find jobs in Germany or even in the United States, in one case, and you know one thing or another. But people were tremendously resourceful about doing stuff.

Q: Was it apparent that there were people who were being left out, one thinks of the pensioners, army personnel and all of that?

RUEDY: Very much so. We saw the pensioners, these little old ladies who would knit stuff and sell it in the subway or out on the streets when the temperature was ten or fifteen below zero. I remember one memorable sight. People were always selling stuff. I remember walking past one guy who was selling, what, three frozen fish and four beets he had laid out in front of him and that's what he was trying to sell. You had the feeling of tremendous want and need and real struggle on the part of a lot of people as well and your heart would go out to those people.

I worked with the Protestant Chaplaincy, my whole family did. The Protestant Chaplaincy had a wonderful program, soup kitchens basically, of providing a hot meal every day I think at a number of locations around Moscow. The people that came in were usually older people, pensioners who just didn't have any money and we would dish out a nice bowl of soup to them. It was a clean well lighted place where they could come and eat and they came by the hundreds. Some of these were old army veterans that were wearing their medals and stuff and you thought, man, these people have been there and done that and you had tremendous admiration for them but here they were kind of left high and dry when the world had changed, everything had changed. I had that strong feeling a lot. You would hear stories from people. I remember a college professor that I got to know. She told me that she had warned her elderly mother that the ruble is collapsing, take your money out of the bank account and buy stuff, buy stuff because it's not going to be worth anything. She had a pretty good savings, I don't recall the amount, but she said my mother this is just the way she was, she had the money in the account and that it earned three and four percent and that's the way it had always been and she couldn't get her mind wrapped around the idea that it wouldn't always be that way. So basically the money that she had sold in her old age within a period of weeks, months, went to where it wouldn't pay for a hamburger at the new McDonalds.

Q: Was there an effort on our part as we were doing this, this is a very difficult time obviously for the Russians to both be helpful and not to in a way rub their nose in their problems and this. Sort of avoid triumphalism?

RUEDY: Absolutely, and from the public affairs standpoint, from the public diplomacy standpoint we were acutely aware of that. We were acutely aware that this was not the time for crowing or it wasn't a time for humiliation or whatever. It was a time for a new start and I don't know, there are different theories on who won the Cold War and why. But it also, I think, represents a huge victory on the part of a new generation of Russian people and I think lots of younger knew that the old system was not working. The old system was not working and they probably did as much to get rid of it as anybody. I don't know, you can give lots of credit to Reaganomics and missile business and so on but I think lots of young Russians just realized that it had to change.

Q: Well basically the system itself collapsed so it was in a way, it wasn't the outside pressures as much as just the system ran out of steam.

RUEDY: I agree with you. A good friend of mine, an American who has done a lot of Russian watching said that he felt that basically the old system had continued to gain legitimacy for much longer than it could have or should have or earned that legitimacy by claiming the legacy of the victory of World War II. The Great Patriotic War had been such an absolutely draining and emotionally overwhelming experience for Russia. With 27 million dead all the rest...you would see that in the last few days with Putin still reviewing the troops on Red Square.

Q: The 60th anniversary.

RUEDY: The 60th anniversary victory...

Q: It's been all over our TV with President Bush and all the world leaders at Red Square.

RUEDY: Yeah, but this guy felt that the old Soviet system had gained legitimacy or continued to have a hold on the Russian people because of the searing experience of World War II which they had won. Then when that World War II generation, the people who had been through that and had been branded with this patriotism of the great patriotic war, when that generation was replaced by a new generation who had that from the history books but not from personal experience, this generation was willing to look at the Soviet system and say the hell with it, this system is not working, this system is not doing anything. It's not producing for me and my family and it's not producing anything for my country.

Q: Did you get any...sort of the public affairs side, there must have been quite a revolution going on there especially about the media, the international, I mean all of that?

RUEDY: Oh yeah. That was going great guns and new newspapers were being founded and all kinds of stuff was going on. It was a period when things were pretty, well really open. It was the period too when this was sort of below my radar screen one had a sense that it was going on but this was a time when resources were being sold off, privatization, it was a period when fortunes were being made overnight.

Q: The robber barons and the Russian mafia as it was called.

RUEDY: The robber barons. When a guy who was really, really fast on his feet and really in touch with things could wind up controlling half the world's tin supply if you knew what you were doing and if you were willing to do whatever you needed to do to get there. It was an amazing period, an amazing era and I think I don't know, freedom of the press, freedom of speech all that stuff, I mean in the abstract, yeah, absolutely important I have no doubt about that.

A lot of media stuff was being done also to provide mouthpieces. I think there was also a kind of overhang of Marxist era, how you did things under the Marxist system because agitprop and making people aware. I mean this is a big thing for a doctrinaire Marxist and control of the media and shaping public opinion this is important. I think some of the people who made fortunes very quickly also realized that in order to hold onto those fortunes they had to make their voices heard. They had to, not propaganda in a negative sense, but they couldn't just stand by and sit on their money. They had to be engaged, they had to be involved and they had to help create political conditions that would nurture the kinds of things that they were involved in, put it that way. So people that were organizing free media, I mean well it's never quite as idealistic I suppose as one projects. These weren't John Peter Zenger types who were interested in free speech in the abstract. These were people with very definite political opinions that they wanted to put out there. I don't know, maybe part of the read on Putin is an attempt to roll back some of that and overreacting to it. I don't approve of a lot of what Putin's been doing in the last year or two years, but I think when Putin came to power he maybe had a sense of rolling back some of what he saw as the power that had accumulated in private hands rather than in the government hands.

I was there for the big election, in '96 I think it was, when there was much concern about the communists coming back and Yeltsin being tossed out or support for him being much reduced because of the economic conditions we've talked about. There was general disgust and distrust of the privatization process and a feeling among many people that things had gone fundamentally off the rails so there was real concern that the communists would come back. I think in the mythology that Putin and others maybe bought into it was the media and the media portrayal of Yeltsin during that very pivotal election campaign that really produced their mindset that the media won it for Yeltsin. The media are the folks that kept the communists from coming back and out of that grew maybe an exaggerated sense of the role that the media played in shaping public opinion and voter opinion in the new Russia. There did, I think, emerge this myth that it was the way the media strongly backed the Yeltsin camp and the "liberals" or "reformers" or "free market economic types" that kept the communists from making a comeback in that crucial election.

Q: Did you sense that the new cliquey informed people were getting their news from CNN (Cable News Network) and from BBC (British Broadcasting Corporation) and just other news sources and the Internet? Was the new generation coming in that was well plugged into the world net as they call it?

RUEDY: Yes, yeah, Russians are very smart and you had one hundred percent literacy. One of the things that the communists obviously did was to have this excellent educational system that reached down to everybody. Young people were very literate and very plugged in and very internationally minded. I'm a real novice coming into this but the old westernizer versus the Russophile thing that the Russian history 101 sort of starts with I think you felt that yeah this was very true. On the one hand the great sense of reaching out and being international and reaching out to the international community and being Europeans and being part of the world. On the other hand a sense of Russia's special place and Russia as a special mission, Russia with a special soul, Russia with a special mentality, something that made Russians special. I think there was that kind of thing going on even among young people who were defining the new Russianness, what it meant to be Russian in the post-Soviet period. They were plugged in internationally and at the same time I think they saw themselves as wanting to find, wanting to forge a separate, unique Russian way and again I think that's what is going on now with Russia today.

Q: With Putin.

RUEDY: With Putin and with what is happening in Russia today.

Q: Well, you know one of the things about the Soviet Union and some of the other eastern European countries, particularly the Soviet Union is that all the news is about Moscow or St. Petersburg or all of that but you go 20 miles out of the Moscow limits and you are back in the 14th century where women are wearing yolks to carry their water. Did you get out, I mean, I'm not talking about the other cities but out in the countryside? What was happening there?

RUEDY: I didn't get out as much as I wanted to. One of the big emphases we made in public diplomacy in USIS was to expand from Moscow and St. Petersburg. We made particular efforts to do stuff outside of the two major cities where there had been some western contact. We established American corners, little mini-libraries. This was not a kind of thing that Washington in those days at USIA was in favor of. We had given up the outreach libraries, but in Russia, that is what you really needed. So we established these little American corners where there was a computer connection and that was major and also a small collection of books and things like that. Every once in a while we would try to get out and do a little program there, do a little speaker or a film or something like that. I forget how many American corners we established but we tried to, I think we had about a dozen or so. We had put a branch public affairs officer out in Vladivostok before I got there. I made it out to Vladivostok a couple of times, up to Khabarovsk and places out there a little bit in the Russian far east. One thing that the PAO and I felt strongly about was the importance of putting a branch public affairs officer in Ekaterinburg as well. We had had a small consulate there but no public affairs...

Q: Sverdlovsk.

RUEDY: Sverdlovsk, in the Urals. So anyway, we wanted to put a branch public affairs officer at the very small consulate in Ekaterinburg. Washington fought us tooth and nail on that because this is a period of downsizing and USIA is getting more budget cuts and so on. But we finally got a BPAO out there. I think we had to give up a position in Moscow and give up two positions in St. Petersburg but we did get a BPAO out in Ekaterinburg. The people that we had as BPAOs in all of the cities were excellent, fluent Russian speakers and they got out and about a lot. So we were doing the kind of outreach to the Russian hinterland that we needed to do. I got out there as much as I could but in general we encouraged the staff to travel. We even set more or less arbitrarily limits that of the people that go on Muskie grants this year only x-percentage can be from Moscow and St. Petersburg. You got to get people from the provincial universities and you've got to get people from here, there and everywhere. We were as I say pretty successful doing that.

Q: What was your impression of places like Khaba...I just can't pronounce it.

RUEDY: Khabarovsk.

Q: Khabarovsk and of Vladivostok when you went out there?

RUEDY: Conditions out there were a lot worse than in Moscow. A lot was going on in Moscow and St. Petersburg but those other places were struggling. We were working pretty closely with AID and AID had a pretty good program where they would identify areas where the local administration was particularly amenable to change and reform and doing things. Instead of putting a little bit here and a little bit there across this vast Russian region you would pick out particular cities or particular regions that showed promise. The idea was that you would get something going there and that would create a spark and that worked I think in places like Saratov and Nizhny Novgorod and Novgorod near St. Petersburg was another site that was picked out for that. Those things worked and you know you sensed that stuff was happening.

Other places where the provincial authority, the local authority was backward leaning or corrupt or just not with it very much things just weren't happening. That applied certainly in Vladivostok. There was always talk about Vladivostok becoming this great place on the Pacific, and you got out there and you thought this is not doing too well. Khabarovsk on the other hand seemed to be doing better, interesting. Some of those places had been closed cities and no westerner had gotten into places like Nizhny Novgorod because you were right on the Volga. I think they were building submarines in Nizhny Novgorod somebody told me and certainly Vladivostok, the big Pacific port, was another place that was closed to westerners.

Q: I've seen pictures showing the fleet just rusting away. In a way it was very sad, I've always admired Russian naval architecture.

RUEDY: For me it was interesting because in Vladivostok out there just on the hill below the consulate were a couple of Russian cruisers, Russian destroyers that were just sitting there. They hadn't gotten underway in years and they probably couldn't get them underway now. These were the kinds of ships when I was an Ensign in the United States Navy serving on board my destroyer in the Mediterranean guarding...on the screen around the carrier we would be looking through our binoculars at those guys looking with their binoculars at us. They were at that time making a big effort to mount a naval presence in the Mediterranean and the Pacific and everywhere. They were there and now they were tied up along the rusty pier in Vladivostok and like I say I don't think you could get up steam in those ships any more.

Q: What about Americans in Russia, exchange professors, not tourists but others who were coming with NGOs and all that. What was your impression of their impact?

RUEDY: Generally speaking very, very positive. We had a number of people who were working with NGOs that were helping to administer our exchange programs. They call it American Councils because they continue to be active in other countries of the former Soviet Union. Of course if you are a teacher of Russian in Ukraine or a teacher of Russian in Kazakhstan that doesn't win you many points so they had kind of reinvented themselves and done that very successfully. But Actor had a lot of young people in different locations across Russia. They were helping us open our American corners and recruiting for our Muskie program and youth exchange programs. IREX had people out in the field. The American Peace Corps was active. We had a number of Peace Corps volunteers and others, academic types. There were a couple of universities that were trying to launch university partnerships with different Russian universities. I was in general impressed with the effort that they were making and also the success that they were having and the reception that they got among the Russians. I was surprised there wasn't more of a residue of suspicion among the Russians but the Russians were pretty open to it.

Q: I've always felt that the Russians and the Americans really have quite dissimilar but at the same time kind of similar histories. As types they seem to get along pretty well wouldn't you say?

RUEDY: I've often thought of that: that maybe both the Russians and the Americans define ourselves in terms of the great centers of European culture, but not really. We feel that we have a separate, unique identity and a unique dynamism and an energy and a soul or whatever that these Europeans don't have any more.

Q: Europe is all cramped together you know.

RUEDY: That is right.

Q: We've got this big open space to keep moving.

RUEDY: Exactly and the Russians have the same mentality. I think at the same time the Russians, who were they, the Narodniki or whatever were talking about our unique separate...

Q: These were the people during the beginning of the 20th century who went out to the people.

RUEDY: At the same time they were making a plea for own separate Russian identity and literature and culture. You had guys like Ralph Waldo Emerson saying that here in the United States we have to create an American literature, which is separate from European literature. We are a worthy culture on our own and we have an American music to find our way to and an American way of doing things. So there is that identity and the Russians would often cite that.

Q: Did you see much impact with George Soros and his organization?

RUEDY: I did yes. Soros was doing good things and we would work with them. I don't have enough knowledge to really speak to that with authority but the Open Society Institute was doing some good things and we were certainly trying to accomplish the same things. I did have the impression sometimes and I can't really cite any specifics here that the attention span was a little shorter than what needed to be done. The Open Society Institute would get very interested in this that or the other and pump money into it for a year or two but then pull back from it a little bit and I think that it required a commitment for the long haul, let's put it that way. But no they were doing good things, as were other organizations that were there. Even now through the Moscow Protestant Chaplaincy, these were the people who sponsored the soup kitchens, I got to know a number of Canadian Mennonites who were working with the Mennonite communities in Siberia and they were doing good work too. It was not proselytizing or whatever but it was economic development. It was establishing agriculture, new basis for agriculture, agriculture prosperity and stuff like that. So there were lots of people doing good things.

Q: Well, one of its difficult nuts to crack in Russia would be the agriculture side. They destroyed the peasantry, had these collective farms which we sort of collectivized our agriculture all over the world too but these ones were not efficient producers and the transportation system stinks and you know the delivery system...did you get involved in this at all?

RUEDY: No, not really. I was interested in it because I grew up in Iowa in a little agricultural town. I remember talking to a bunch of people, economists and others that were involved in agriculture or people who are now English teachers or English professors who had grown up on a collective farm or their dad was the chief of the collective farm. But no, I agree with you that agriculture was an area that was pretty much of a disaster and required major restructuring. I don't really have much of a sense of how successful they were at going about that. We did bring some people over in agricultural economics but I can't really speak with very much knowledge about that.

Q: You mentioned it was a Protestant Chaplaincy and all. I was wondering whether there was a...problem is maybe not the right word but we have all these Christian groups and often very naïve and to my mind rather primitive types of not quite snake handlers but, I mean whatever you want to call to the far right or the far left of the Protestant religious spectrum, very fundamentalists and all that. Did you see any impact?

RUEDY: I didn't see much impact. I didn't have any contact with any of them. There were a few that passed through the Protestant Chaplaincy and you would get to meet them and chat. The Protestant Chaplaincy was interesting because it was non-denominational. The people running it were Presbyterians basically but they were retired and doing this for a couple of years. A lot of the people who came were Africans, African students actually who had come to Russia on scholarship back in the old Soviet days and they were going to study Marxism and go back to Ethiopia or wherever but were then kind of left high and dry. So there were some interesting cases along that line. Lots of third world types in general that would come to worship so their services were interesting, you got to meet some interesting people.

Q: Did you ever find yourself who were doing commands against the Russian Orthodox Church, which tends to be pretty conservative?

RUEDY: I didn't come up against it. I knew that the Russian Orthodox Church was not happy with proselytizing by American groups. Not many people who were involved with the Chaplaincy were Russians. Only a very few that were Russians. We had some interesting contacts actually with some people from the Russian Orthodox Church both informal and formal.

I remember once before Easter my daughter who speaks pretty good Russian and her sister were over at the Russian Orthodox Church that was directly across from the embassy compound in Moscow. During the whole Soviet period it was affectionately referred to as our Radiant Lady of Perpetual Watchfulness or something like that because it had been taken over by the KGB (State Security Committee). With the steeple there was an excellent capacity for listening in on what was going on at the embassy. The radiation stuff wasn't going on anymore but there was some speculation that that is where it was coming from or at least where some of it came from. But anyway, my daughter and her sister were over there before Easter and got into a conversation with a couple of the young priests and they gave them a guided tour of the church and said, "Here we are rebuilding, this all used to be electronics and stuff like that." They were very friendly and very forthcoming and in a number of other cases I would just wander into a church and get into a conversation with a Russian Orthodox clergy and they would be very friendly, approachable and have questions and I would have questions and we would have a good exchange to the extent that my language permitted.

Q: How about while you were there the security situation, one the old KGB residue, were they messing around and then just plain the security with criminality, was that a problem?

RUEDY: Embassy visitors were warned about it and one group that we were warned about particularly were what we called "street urchins," These were gypsy kids and groups of ten or fifteen or twenty of them would hit sometimes a westerner and it would all happen very quickly. The people would be stripped of purse and billfold and everything. One place where one felt particularly vulnerable were these long “perihouts”, I think they were called, long passageways under these big wide Moscow streets because when you got into those there was no way out. You had the exit behind you and the exit way, way in front of you and in between you were in the middle of this long tunnel so there you were kind of vulnerable. I know some people who got hit by the street urchins and got roughed up a little bit and had their valuables stolen. There were a couple of occasions when I thought they were kind of looking to me and I would walk next to a wall. I had one of these umbrellas where you pushed the button and the umbrella thing comes out and I remember a couple of occasions when I thought they were kind of scouting me up and I pushed the button and my umbrella would come out and it would look a lot like a club. So yeah there were these instances with petty crime.

Also not only the purse snatching but the mafia types were around. Once there was an explosion at a little kiosk not far from the embassy. The word was that they had not paid protection money and had been taken care of. While I was there we did have an attack on the embassy. The RPG (rocket propelled grenade) was fired against the side of the embassy and made a hole about a foot and a half across, something like that in the facade of the embassy building. The round went through and hit a Xerox copying machine on the other side or a safe. Anyway that kind of absorbed the shock so people in the room were not injured. I was talking on the phone at the time and I remember hearing this ‘whomp’ and I thought this is not ordinary. I quickly wrapped up the phone conversation and then did exactly the wrong thing, went to the window to look out.

Q: Oh yeah. But were you harassed at all by the security people or that...?

RUEDY: No, no I don’t recall a single instance where I was harassed by the security people. The omnipresence of security and guards and police and the feeling of being watched that I experienced in East Berlin all over the place I did not have in Russia at the time. Some of the old Soviet types remembered that that was the case always in the old Soviet Union, that you were always watched, that you were always followed, there was always someone there. I just didn’t have that feeling.

Q: Did Strobe Talbott play any role in what you were up to?

RUEDY: He did on the very high upper level; he was not somebody who was aware of me or what I was doing or anything like that. But they had established here in Washington a separate, I forget the exact timing of all of that, but the separate office that was responsible directly to the Secretary of State for Russia and the Newly Independent States (NIS) and that functioned de facto as a geographic bureau. I think they were involved early on in the Freedom Support Act in getting money for the kinds of things that we were doing in Russia. So, on the macro level, yeah, we did have one or was it two presidential visits while I was there as well. So it was a good deal of excitement in that regard also. But no I got involved more in that later on, by that time Talbott was deputy secretary. When I came back to Washington after my Moscow assignment, first of all I did a year at the senior seminar at FSI (Foreign Service Institute) which was tremendous and then I went into the rapidly imploding USIA and was involved there in East European and NIS affairs. Then we reorganized the office and split it up getting ready to merge into the State Department. In their structure they had a de facto bureau for NIS affairs which was headed by Steve Sestanovich. This had been opened I think by Strobe Talbott and then Sestanovich inherited it when Talbott went to be deputy secretary.

But in Moscow our programs certainly benefited tremendously from the interest and the funding support that we were getting from the Washington side. That was really emphasizing engagement with Russia and the countries of the former Soviet Union at a time when, as I say, USIA was basically imploding. People were doing the best they could and these were sharp, smart, very professional people but they just didn't have the funding to do things with the Fulbright program for example, the international visitors program like we should have been doing in Russia or the American corner or anything else. Basically we were scratching wherever we could and most of that seemed to be from the Freedom Support Act funding which at the time initially came through AID. We had a good relationship there with AID people. I think the relationship that we had with AID and USIS in Moscow was closer, better than the relationship that exists I think in other countries where AID is active and just from anecdotal stories that I've heard from USIS colleagues.

Q: Did you find that your office was playing any sort of a consulting or supporting role for the Ukraine and Kyrgyzstan and Kazakhstan and the various Stans and the Baltic states?

RUEDY: Not really, no. I think these were separate countries, separate independent countries and I think we honored that in the abstract and in the concrete. They had separate embassies and separate PAOs and separate operations that were being supported by the same NGOs and things like that that were supporting us. Ours was a country program and we knew of colleagues working in Ukraine and working in Kazakhstan and the Baltics and the other places but our program was for Russia. We really didn't get into acting as a central control or something like that for programs that were going on in other NIS countries. They reported separately to Washington.

Q: Well, did the fighting in Chechnya play any role in or was it a problem, what was going on?

RUEDY: It was certainly there and festering and we didn't do anything. In fact, we were wanting to do more in the Caucasus but it was too dangerous, too tough. We did have a few exchange participants elsewhere in the region but yeah the fighting was going on. The first Chechnyan war, there was still a OSCU representation in Chechnya that was trying to do some stuff but no that was a difficult period that was just beginning. We didn't in Moscow feel a threat of Chechnyan terrorism or anything like that. It hadn't started, but certainly we were aware of the war and the difficulties that the Russian government was having in Chechnya. At the time I think there was also a feeling that if Chechnya gained autonomy, too much autonomy then there might be other regions of Russia that would be interested in breaking away as well or looking for more autonomy. There was I think concern about whether the center will hold or whether the Russian Federation was subject to further breakup. There was a tentativeness about the Russian Federation generally and the component parts.

Q: Was there anything in the USIA point of view over disputed territories for the Ukraine particularly around Sebastopol and that area?

RUEDY: No, not really. I think there the party line, the official government line was that the two parties just didn't work, didn't agree, but it didn't as I recall produce any tension or impact on politics, flurries of back papers and official texts and stuff like that for information section, press section, it just didn't.

Q: You didn't find yourself with any program that sort of inadvertently finds itself in the middle of any dispute or anything?

RUEDY: No, I don't recall that, I don't recall any problem like that.

Q: Well then after, gee whiz I think it was a very interesting time for you.

RUEDY: It was and in retrospect I'm almost sorry that we didn't try to stay for a third year. One had to declare pretty early on in the two years to extend for a third year. It seemed to fit with our children's school schedule as well because our daughter graduated from high school at the Anglo-American school in Moscow and she was off to college when we came back to the States. Our son who is three years younger we felt he would be able to do three years in an American high school in Fairfax County so it would be logical for their schooling to break in two years rather than for a third year.

MICHAEL A. BOORSTEIN
Deputy Director, Moscow Embassy Building Control Office
Washington, DC (1996-1998)

Mr. Boorstein was born in Washington, DC and was raised in that area. He was educated at Beloit College, the University of Colorado, Harvard University and the University of Turku in Finland. Entering the Foreign Service in 1970, Mr. Boorstein specialized in administration and personnel, serving in Palermo, Rome, Ottawa, Warsaw Curacao, Moscow and Beijing. In addition, Mr. Boorstein played a major role in the planning and construction of US embassies in Moscow and Beijing and in the renovation of consulates and embassies throughout the globe. He spoke six foreign languages. Mr. Boorstein was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005.

Q: Why don't we pick this up the next time in '96?

Q: Where did you go?

BOORSTEIN: I was assigned as the deputy director of the Moscow Embassy Building Control Office (MEBCO), which was managing the reconstruction of the embassy in Moscow.

Q: OK, today is the 12th of June 2006. Mike, I want to talk about...give us the background of this Moscow building project and then where you came in and what you were doing.

BOORSTEIN: OK, this is something that I've often felt the Office of the Historian should take it upon themselves to do a special history of how we came to have a secure embassy in Moscow because so much is a reflection of the history of U.S.-Soviet relations. It also is a bit of a microcosm of internal American politics and the interplay among the intelligence community, the Congress and the State Department, but that's another broader topic.

But almost as soon as the U.S. established diplomatic relations with the Soviet regime in the 1930s, there was a sense that we did not have proper facilities to conduct our business. There was an expectation, of course, that everything, every conversation was monitored, there was just no place to have a secure conversation and as the technology developed and we were able to have secure conversations there was still a feeling that even having a secure room within an insecure building was a point of vulnerability. Efforts started, as best as I can recall, in it in some earlier investigations I did into this, in the 1950s, to find a better place.

Now the location of the embassy at the time the construction started of the first phase of the project in 1979 was a building that I believe we occupied in the early 1950s. This was an office building that was built, I believe, in large measure by German prisoners of war that were kept on after 1945. This was a very fine location right along the ring road not too far from the Kremlin and it was a whole complex that had probably at the time it was build all of the American diplomats and staff support people lived on the compound because you had two housing wings, which were known as the south and the north wing, and in the middle, the central wing, was where the office building was but it also had when I arrive in 1978 on assignment, it had the Marine House, it had the defense attaché, the DCM's residence was probably I think that was more in the north wing but a good percentage of the housing even through the '70s and the early '80s was housed on that compound. Of course, you had the office buildings. The ambassadors office was on the tenth floor, the defense attaches office was above it, the communications unit was also on the same floor as the ambassador and then you had the 9th, the eighth and the seventh floor all had the political, economic and science sections and then the sections that dealt with the public and the administrative sections were all on the ground floor. The foreign commercial service was right around the corner but general services had its own compound, the doctor was there, the commissary was there, it was all a self-contained little city. I venture to say that in the '70s when the project was being designed there were maybe 150 Americans, now there are probably 600 Americans in Moscow.

Efforts were made, like I said, into the '50s and the '60s to identify new land. At the same time, the Soviet Union recognized that their embassy on 16th Street was inadequate so things developed where there was a reciprocal requirement for each country to have a new embassy. Well that really was a huge advantage and the two sides started to have talks in the '60s. I can't pinpoint the year but I believe the initial agreement that identified each property that was going to be provided by each country to the other was signed in 1969 and that gave the Soviet Union the Mt. Alto site, which had a lot of criticism because it was very high up, I believe it was a former veterans hospital that was surplus by the government and the land we got was behind the existing embassy to the West and it was a low area but it was a fairly good sized lot and we wanted to build not only a new chancery office building but we wanted to have housing, mainly garden apartments, representational townhouses, we wanted to have a marine house and we wanted to build the American school. The Anglo-American School at the time was located elsewhere in the city and it was a very small school maybe it had 100-120 kids. So it was deemed adequate enough to build and plan for a school that might have 300 kids to allow for growth, so all on that same compound, the housing of about 125 families, which would have housed the bulk of the people that was anticipated.

Well, from 1969 to 1972, I believe it was there were negotiations on an agreement on conditions of construction, which was a document that would set in place the reciprocal regime for giving each country what it needed to build its embassy. So, if we were going to bring in materials and consider containers or big crates to be diplomatic pouches then the Soviets wanted the same privilege for anything that they would bring in. There were certain things that were spelled out in terms of the status of the workers, the inviolability of the sites and the records, the whole regime for who was going to inspect it and to what degree were they going to inspect or was there going to be no inspection of all of certain parts. It was all very detailed. It was hammered out for three years and there was a bit of an impasse and I believe it got to the point that when Kissinger was the national security advisor there was to be a summit with Nixon and Brezhnev and Kissinger let the word be know that to the State Department find a way to get this agreement done. Kissinger didn't want this to be an irritant in the relationship against the backdrop of Nixon's summit, I forget whether it was in Moscow or in Washington or wherever. So as a result, the agreement was signed.

In retrospect, when the first project failed because of a security compromise, it was felt that the haste in which it was finalized played into the Soviets hands because the deal was that a Soviet construction company was to do the site preparation, the excavation and the building of the frame of the office building. We didn't really care about the housing, but the frame of the building, even though we were allowed to have inspectors at the cement plant that made these molds for the framework for the beams, the cement pillars and whatever that went into the structure of the building.

So, it took a while between 1972 and when money was appropriated and the design was done. The U.S. chose Skidmore, Owens and Merrill to be the design firm and groundbreaking was held in October of 1979. The senior U.S. government representative at the groundbreaking was Daniel Boorstin, the Librarian of Congress at the time. (Throughout my adult life, I have been asked innumerable times if I am related to him, given the close spelling of our names. The truth of the matter is that we are not.) There was a big ceremony, the ambassador was Malcolm Toon, it was right before he left and Thomas J. Watson arrived a few weeks later. I remember the big tent, I was there as I was on assignment in Moscow so it was like I came back.

So construction progressed and it wasn't until 1985 when, in a routine test of one of the pillars by a super x-ray machine, that it was discovered that there were devices that had been implanted, and then a further inspection revealed that there were devices implanted in virtually every pillar, and it created a grid like an electrical grid, a passive electrical grid that would allow them to listen in. It was so unsophisticated that it caught everybody by surprise and, in effect, they did it to us even though we had inspectors. So the project was shut down and in the meantime, they had proceeded to build their embassy on Mt. Alto. Evidence came out years later that our own intelligence services, the FBI, I believe, did some things in terms of tunneling and whatever so we weren't exactly pure as the driven snow either. But that was the Cold War.

After 1985, the project stopped in terms of building the chancery. The housing, the school, the marine house were all completed, I would like to say maybe about 1989-1990 and people moved into it but the nine story office building sat there like an abandoned hulk. It had been bricked in and the cement work was there and there were arguments what to do, what to do and finger pointing all over the place. The State Department you know, the CIA was accused of having demonstrated a great deal of hubris that they said, "Oh we don't care what they do to us, we can always overcome it." Well they were wrong. Congress wanted to know how much was it going to cost to fix it, how was it going to be fixed. So all of these different studies and commissions were done.

In 1989, the Department decided that the office of foreign buildings operations, which had managed the first Moscow project, had essentially failed and that they could not be trusted to manage any effort to create secure space in Moscow. So they created, this is when Ivan Selin was the under secretary for management and what was created was a special office that reported directly to the undersecretary for management and that was the Moscow embassy buildings control office or MEBCO. To head MEBCO the Department brought in a retired Navy captain named Carl Cristenson who had a career in the facility service of the Navy, in other words supervising Seabees, building hospitals, renovating bases, and he was an old salt in every sense of the word. He didn't care about the politics of the State Department; he was just there to build a building. So from 1989 to about 1992, he was part of the wrangling and the studies of what do we do with it? Do we tear the building down to the ground? Do we leave it there and make it unclassified and build a classified annex behind it? There was one proposal to move the building, to sell it to Archer, Daniels, Midland, you know the big grain commodities company, to use as a business center, and they were going to jack it up, put it on rollers and transport it to some other part of the city. Well that was kind of absurd, so that never happened. At the end of the day, there was a compromise not to tear down the entire building but to rebuild it, renovate it, deconstruct it down to a certain point so that the point that you built it up from was new construction and would be totally under our control.

Well, in the meantime, the Soviet embassy in Washington was done and then the Soviet Union fell, the Russian Federal was formed, and so we negotiated, after a decision was made, which was called Operation Top Hat, was made to do this, that money was appropriated, I think $240 million was the budgeted amount and we then negotiated a new Conditions of Construction Agreement with the Russian Federation. The only lever we had was that in order for us to get what we wanted, we had to allow the Russians to move in to their chancery because it was all done. Their housing was done and operated, their school was up and running but they were not occupying their chancery.

So we let go of our last piece of leverage in order for them to agree to give us what we wanted and our security regime was based on the following pillars. That we were only going to use top-secret cleared American workers to rebuild that office building. We were going to import via secure means every nut and bolt and brick with the exception of maybe premixed cement below a certain floor, sand, gravel and water. Everything else was sent over in sealed and trapped containers in a highly classified technical regime to be able to know if they had been tampered with. As a result of all of this and that the containers were to be considered by the Russian authorities as diplomatic pouches, so we didn't have to tell them what was in them, we didn't have to open them up in their presence and we still had them cleared through customs, but it was a pro forma thing where we had our diplomatic couriers present when these things were trucked in under escort from Finland, but they were never out of our control. After they were cleared by customs, they were delivered to our secure warehouse, which was totally under U.S. control and then broken into and basically decertified by people who were technically competent and high enough security clearance that nothing was tampered with. To the best of my knowledge, none of the roughly 1,500 containers that were shipped over during the life of the project were ever tampered with.

So on the basis of that the Russians agreed to all those conditions and we signed the Conditions of Construction Agreement in 1992, I believe. Then the project was let out to bid and a joint venture company, Zachary, Parsons and Sundt (ZPS) were the three companies. The H.B. Zachary Company out of San Antonio was the prime contractor. They had done a lot of work overseas with DOD. They had built the landing strip at Diego Garcia; they had done a lot of work in Iran during the years of the Shah. They were very, very well equipped to do that kind of work. So a whole mechanism was set up in Washington. The office where I was the deputy director had about 35 people in it and these were construction people, architects, engineers and an ever increasing number of security people because not only did we have to have, we had to have a counter intelligence program in place in Moscow to brief the workers about what they could and couldn't do in terms of...they were allowed to date Russian women because the whole non-frat policy had been lifted by 1995-'96 in China as well as in Russian and a lot of the rest of Eastern Europe with the exception of, I think, Cuba was the only place left where we still had a non-frat policy. But still if they had a Russian girlfriend they...

Q: Non-frat meaning?

BOORSTEIN: Non-fraternization that it was against government policy for diplomats, support staff or whatever to have basically dating, social and sexual relations with Soviet or Russian citizens. Well that changed but if you were going to have that kind of relationship you had to report it, you couldn't just do it and that applied to the embassy staff as well so there was an equal kind of treatment. You had to have in place very, very strong, physical and technical security regime. You had to have a state of the art fence, you had to have alarms and so we had people back here who helping to develop that and making sure that it was implemented and tested while the project was underway. We also had what are called industrial security officers who were responsible for the integrity of our record keeping, making sure that if we received and sent out drawings that they were done securely, even domestically they would inspect the facilities where materials were being made, assembled and trucked to the warehouse in Texas, where they were put into the containers, that those offices were run properly and that there were no Chinese nationals working in the factory or things of this nature. So the oversight was just enormous. It was, in effect, a zero tolerance for security failure, given what had happened before.

So the approach that Congress finally agreed to was the right approach, it was cost effective and secure, was to take the existing, I believe it was an eight-story building, and deconstruct it down to the sixth floor slab. In other words, destroy the top three floors. On top of that put a separate four story, a separate I mean in that it was resting on the sixth floor but in a way that there was a separation between the top floors and the bottom floors structurally. Again, there was a security classification involved in just how that was done. But in effect, a steel superstructure four-story building that was isolated from the rest of the building was the premise under which the building was built. That portion of the building was to contain the secure operations even though the bottom six floors, five floors and the fifth floor was a transition floor, even though those would be occupied by Russian nationals from the day it opened, the whole building was rebuilt as if it were all going to be secure so that we didn't allow any potential compromise on the lower floors to somehow have the potential to compromise the upper floors. It was a double, triple, quadruple level of security and it was done that way because the whole building had to be built in a classified manner.

No Russian nationals were allowed on to the site except for debris removal. Trucks were allowed to come on to a certain point on the compound when there was debris to be, you know, from deconstructing the top floors and from other things that they had to do to prepare the bottom floors, there was all kinds of debris. So the debris was removed, but with careful escorting that went on. There were guards twenty-four hours a day; there was a whole regime. The first time I went to Moscow they had the beginning of palm print recognition so you put in your palm and your palm was there and then you put in a pin number. A palm and pin number got you into the compound.

BOORSTEIN: Personal identification. Right. So that eventually gave way to a more of a standard sliding kind of an ID card and the personal identification number.

So that was the regime that the office where I was the deputy was managing from Washington. In twenty-four months where I was the deputy director I made nine trips to Moscow and about half of them included a stop at our logistics base in Helsinki. We had a resident, actually a retired Foreign Service officer named Carl Clement, was the resident MEBCO officer. He was attached to the embassy in Helsinki and his job was to be the liaison with the port of Helsinki with the trucking firm, with the Finnish customs people and any logistical issues, which arose. Carl was a unique individual in that he was born in Finland and at a young age after the Second World War immigrated to the States with his family and became an American citizen, was educated in the U.S. and joined the Foreign Service. He was bilingual, so that was just a very unique ability that we were able to tap into. He was there for four or five years.

We also had a staff in Moscow that was the project director, the deputy, security director, probably about 15 people and most of these people came from diplomatic security, they came from the foreign buildings office even though they weren't managing the project they still were the source of the experts of the architects and the engineers. So the project director, a gentleman named John Sligh, was a career foreign buildings officer, he is an architect by training. His deputy, P.K. Bagchi, was an engineer by training and security director, well there were several security directors, Bernie Indal was the one there for the longest period of time, then he left the Foreign Service, retired and Tim Dixon replaced him. So there was the technical security officer, there was a specialist in counter-intelligence; all kinds of disciplines had their own specialists there.

It was really quite a finally well-oiled machine and it worked well. There were some glitches that it required some investigation to make sure that indeed things were shipped in a secure matter. There was a question about the origin of some materials that caused a major, major headache in one point in the project. I think that those topics remain classified in nature but at the end of the day the Department of State was confident enough and the intelligence community was confident enough to certify to the Congress, well it was up to the director of central intelligence at the end of the project to certify to Congress that the facility was secure.

So, basically it was my job to advise the director of MEBCO on the internal workings of the State Department bureaucracy on how you handle issues, how you handle crises, how you got things done and whether he liked it or not, it was a reality he had to accept. I also was given responsibility for handling a specially put-together office of the inspector general's security team, an oversight team that had people from the intelligence community, diplomatic security and the inspection corps who would travel to Moscow on a quarterly basis and spend a week or two there. So every time they went to Moscow I went with them. They when they made one particular trip to the main contractors headquarters in San Antonio, Texas, and to the consolidated receiving point in Houston by the port, I went with them. It was an idea that I could help minimize any perceived or real crisis that they identified and helped to manage it. Really there was nothing that arose that reached a crisis proportion but I was there as insurance.

Occasionally there were meetings with the senior management of the joint venture and senior State Department officials in the field and I would go on those trips. The times I went to Helsinki, the first time I traveled to Helsinki was with the director we took a week's trip and we flew together to Moscow and then we went to Helsinki to look at the situation there. He basically wanted to introduce me to the project because at that point he had already been running it for seven years. I was the second deputy and it was a two-year assignment. I was replaced by a third deputy who held it for two years until the project was finished. So I was right there in the middle, I was there at the start up so it was perhaps the most critical period of time and certainly the most active.

The second trip that I took to Helsinki in November of 1996 was to be part of the first official convoy of containers that were being taken overland from Helsinki to Moscow and that was a big deal because we had made one or two test runs with one or two containers but this was the first ten-container convoy. So the ten containers arrived by ship, they were shipped out of the port of Houston and they were shipped to Rotterdam without any physical escort, but again they were protected technically and Rotterdam is considered one of the largest ports in the world. Their whole system of transferring containers from one vessel to another is all automated. There are no human beings involved in these riderless tractors that take containers from one point to another in the yard, so it was felt that our containers, ten at a time, would be totally lost among the thousands that would be in the yard. So we were comfortable enough that we didn't need any presence there.

So then they were transferred to a Baltic feeder, I believe it was the Maersk Line. The Maersk Line then took these containers; the first port of call was Helsinki so again with no escorts. They were off loaded in Helsinki in a special part of the port, which we had negotiated with the Finnish authorities with lighting and alarms and whatever and then within a certain number of days the contractor would agree to then transport them via one container per tractor-trailer in a ten-container convoy to Moscow. At that point we had escorts from the U.S. diplomatic courier service.

For a ten-container convoy there were probably four to six couriers. They had their own little Winnebago because it was a two-day trip and they would have to sleep in it overnight. The drivers would sleep, these were Finnish drivers, they were a sub-contractor to the joint venture and they would, of course, sleep in their cabs. So I with our security officer from Washington went with the convoy to the Finnish border and because it was the first time we had done this our representative had set up this whole regime of meetings and protocol and the deputy project director flew up from Moscow and met us on the Russian side, the nearest city was Vyborg which used to be part of Finland until the Second World War. In the winter war with Finland they lost that whole area north of Leningrad.

So we had a woman who was a trilingual interpreter, Russian, Finnish and English and she presided over our meetings first with the Finnish customs authorities and then with the Russian custom authorities and it involved tea, cookies and vodka at 11 o'clock in the morning. It was a dull, dismal, dreary, rainy, drizzly kind of a day in the middle of November and very little daylight already in that part of Finland. But you know we did it and the security officer actually rode in the convoy all the way to Moscow. I went back to Helsinki and the next day I flew home.

Q: I would think that the Finns must have watched this with a great deal of amusement, the ones who were doing this.

BOORSTEIN: Well, you know I don't know if it was so much amusement. The Finns are incredibly pragmatic people; they are probably one of the...if not the only country that borders the Soviet Union that did not become a satellite of the Soviet Union after the Second World War. So they recognized that they had to maintain their neutrality but they are also very entrepreneurial people and they just made it work. They were very interested in earning money and being efficient and effective. Whether they were amused or not frankly they never shared that. They are rather taciturn individuals and don't show too much of their emotions unlike the Italians, for example, but I enjoyed working with them immensely. I enjoyed it in particular because in my university years I spent a semester of studying in Finland so it was nice to spend some more time there later on in my life. I made a number of friends and people that I am still in touch with to this day but it all worked quite well and we really never had any issues with the Finns and they were cooperative.

Q: The Russians how did you find them?

BOORSTEIN: Well, again you found all kinds of different officials. This was a little bit of the boondocks even though it was their busiest customs border crossing by land, I believe, anywhere. You found that they wanted to make sure the paper work was just so and the stamp was just where it belonged, whatever. The fax machine was a great boom and they were all into the fax era, in 1996, this was before email, of course, at least in that part of the world. But I don't recall that there was ever an incident where they held up a shipment at all but they demanded the paperwork.

Q: In your career you've worn two major hats, one's the Russian one and other is the Chinese one. Were we looking while you were doing this at the future for China for our embassy there, I mean was this considered a unique experience or was this the wave of the future in difficult places?

BOORSTEIN: Well it certainly was the wave of the future. We were not at a point in the early to mid-1990s where we were starting to plan for the embassy in Beijing. I will come to that later because that was something that I was also in charge of, I was the logical choice to do it. It was certainly felt that certainly once the project was finished successfully that this was a good model, in terms of lessons learned, in terms of the key provisions of secure shipment of your materials, top secret cleared American workers, take advantage of reciprocity as the keystone, the pillars if you will, of successful projects. But there was no specific discussion at the time, we were focused on the Moscow project and it just came along about three years later when that project was winding down and we felt increasing pressure to improve our situation for our people in Beijing that some of the transferability occurred and I was part of that effort.

Q: Well tell me, my experience having dealt with contract employees in various parts of the world including Saigon, I mean the guys who pour cement and put up things are pretty rough guys and they like their women and they like their liquor. I would think this, did you put saltpeter in their vodka or what did you do to keep these guys from compromise?

BOORSTEIN: Well, like I said we did not have a non-fraternization policy, we allowed these people to have social, sexual relations with Russian women or with Bulgarian women or with whatever women they happened to find in Moscow. Believe you me, they did, all over the place and we built a camp on embassy property where these workers were housed and that camp was off limits to women. So whatever liaisons they had were done elsewhere whether they took these women to hotels or they took them back to their apartments, I mean to the women's apartment, whatever. I'm sure both things occurred but again there was a requirement that they needed to report that they were having a relationship with Tatiana, Galena or whomever. If the relationship got to the point that they wanted to marry, they were not allowed to marry the women while they were on the project and if they couldn't wait they had to resign.

There were cases where, isolated cases, where people went out and they weren't staying in the camp, they were cohabitating with the Russian women, not reporting it at night and those people were disciplined and perhaps they were warned once but if they continued to do it they were shipped home. Of course you realize that if these people got into problems, got into trouble, they were there less than a year it had enormous tax consequences for them. They had to be on the job for over a year in order to get the tax-free benefit, so that was an enormous incentive for them to behave in a way.

Yes, there were problems with gambling; there were problems with getting drunk and breaking stuff up in bars so yeah even though these people did have top secret clearances with even an added almost a notch above almost like what we call as SCI clearance level.. So there you explore the individual's financial background to make sure there are no outstanding gambling debts, unpaid alimony or this that and the other thing.

But it took a lot of in-briefing before they even left the United States and there were counter intelligence briefings when they got to the post, basically there was an effort to scare the bejesus out of these people about what would happen to them if they didn't report anything where they should of and it wasn't only having relationships. If all of a sudden they found they were in a bar one night and some guy would come and strike up a conversation who spoke fluent English, who would steer the conversation around "what are you doing here, where are you working, what are..." "Oh you're a welder? Well really what floor are you working on in the embassy?" Then all of a sudden the red light goes on and basically the worker had to be counseled to say, "I'm working on the project, that's really all I need to tell you" and that's it and then to try and get information on the person who was asking them to feed that information back into the database.

The Russian services were trying like crazy to compromise the project, that's just what they are there to do. To the best of our knowledge they did not succeed. So it required enormous resources on the part of the government and the contractor working together to control this in a manner that allowed these guys to have social outlets, girlfriends, etc. and yet maintain the integrity of the project.

Q: When you did this from '90...

BOORSTEIN: '96 to '98, two years.

JANE MILLER FLOYD
Consul General (1996-1998)
Vladivostok, Russia

Jane Miller Floyd was born in Washington in 1954. She received a bachelor's degree from the University of Washington. She joined the Foreign Service in 1980. Her career included positions in the Former Soviet Union and Moscow. Mrs. Floyd was interviewed on December 6, 2004 by Charles S. Kennedy

Q: Where did you go?

FLOYD: Vladivostok.

Q: Oh my God. You went to Vladivostok and you were there from what, 96 to when?

FLOYD: 98. It was a direct transfer.

Q: What do we have in Vladivostok?

FLOYD: A consulate general.

Q: You know, I talked to somebody at an oral history I did who was in Vladivostok during World War II.

FLOYD: Lend lease? Big lend lease port.

Q: It was very difficult. We were sending all that stuff in and his whole group, they were followed everywhere and kept under very tight wrap. How did you find things when you went there?

FLOYD: The American presence was the least of their concerns. They were in the midst, and remain embroiled in, silly, silly political infighting between the mayor and the governor in that area. Every single element within our consular district, which was two-thirds the size of the United States, was desperately trying to get Moscow's assistance economically because they were such artificial entities economically.

The consulate was pretty much the end of the earth, but we managed to bring in people who enjoy that and we had, I think, a really good group of folks. It meant that we reached out for a lot of support from distant or perhaps non-traditional partners. We were very close with our NGOs. Many of them were operating on USAID contracts but we brought them into the country team essentially. Excellent relations with the U.S. 7th fleet. [the U.S. Pacific Fleet] was a huge supporter for us. It created delightful bureaucratic disconnects within the U.S. government because, of course, the consulate reported to the embassy in Moscow which was part of the European Bureau, yet our primary partner was out of the Pacific, so that we got to straddle those two worlds.

Q: Now what was your job?

FLOYD: I was the consul general?

Q: What did you have under you?

FLOYD: A political officer, admin officer, GSO, consular setup. We activated a Marine detachment because we had some cousins. But we were technically an unclassified post. Had a Department of Agriculture FSN and a very busy USIA press and culture section.

Q: What was the political situation? Essentially you were dealing with Siberia, weren't you?

FLOYD: No. Siberia was not in our consular district. Siberia ends at Chita and Chita was part of Moscow's consular district. We had the Russian Far East. Yakutsk you can debate, but that would be closest thing to Siberia. We were in Siberia when we were in Ulan Ude, but the Pacific coast of Russia is not Siberia.

Q: Well then what was the political situation there?

FLOYD: Somewhere between desperate and on the verge of collapse.

Q: Was Vladivostok the center?

FLOYD: Oh no. Khabarovsk, which was about 500 miles north, was another major center. In fact, the U.S. went through lots of discussion as to where the consulate should be. In fact, your interviewees' previous existence in Vladivostok was one of the elements that pushed the consulate to Vladivostok. Khabarovsk had been an open city during the Soviet era and so there was more familiarity with an international operation. There were better airline connections. There were other consulates. The Chinese Consulate had been there throughout that time. There were some valid reasons for looking at Khabarovsk and it was where I made a trip to probably once a month. We had established a Russian-American business center in Khabarovsk, which did an awful lot of representational work for us and served as sort of a focal point for a lot of our issues. The other major city that we dealt a lot with was Yuzhno-Sakhalinsk on the island of Sakhalin and that was because of the involvement of American gas and oil companies with the development of energy resources.

Q: On the political side, were we following this closely?

FLOYD: We were following it as an interesting information point in Russia's overall development. How were they developing local government? Exceedingly poorly. How was the rule of law? Tax systems? Human rights? Labor situation? Investment environment for American companies? You could use your local vignettes to constantly hammer home the point that Moscow was a totally unique and inconsistent example of what was happening in Russia. The absence of functioning governance meant that the mafia rules.

Q: I would think that this would be an extremely unfertile ground for American investment.

FLOYD: It was very interesting to see who did invest. And that was primarily folks in export industries and folks whose investment was mobile. Meaning that they would provide fishing trawlers with the provision that those trawlers never entered a Russian port. Because on those occasions when Americans invested in capital goods in the Russian Far East, all too often within about six months their Russian partners had figured out a way to write them out of the business and confiscate, essentially, that capital investment. The tax structure was insane and because foreign companies were used to, or excepted that paying taxes was part of being a corporate citizen, they were extorted for absolutely insane amounts.

Q: What would you tell, I mean, I come in as a business person. Normally you try to have a certain amount of loyalty to where you are, but . . .

FLOYD: We told businessmen to be very, very careful. To go in with their eyes wide open. To go in with either a very short term or a very long term perspective. It was not a normal investment environment. But many people were driven by adventure, by ethnic ties, by huge dollar signs in their eyes.

What business development did take place was primarily under the auspices of something called the Gore-Chernomyrdin Commission, which was an informal set-up chaired by Vice President Gore and Mr. Chernomyrdin to encourage economic activities. It had a subsection which was called – huge long name – U.S. West Coast-Russian Far East Working Group, that brought together the governors of Alaska, Washington, Oregon and California with their counterparts along the Russian Far East to talk about customs regulations, to talk about port fees, to talk about business exchanges. It was another one of those gab fests, but having seen the success of things like OSCE, I thought it was a marvelous idea.

And because the governors on a reciprocal basis hosted these biannual meetings, it meant that the governor of Alaska got to Yakutsk, and the governor of Magadan got to Portland. I'm a big fan of cultural exchange and information exchange. I think over the long run that will help.

Q: You mentioned NGOs. What were the NGOs doing?

FLOYD: The vast majority of them were either into business education or a lot of them were dealing with nascent Russian NGOs, we called it civil society. Women's groups, students' groups, labor groups. Tried to help them get set up and function as a vital voice in any civil society.

Q: Was anything happening?

FLOYD: A huge amount in my opinion. It is amazing what one ten-thousand dollar computer desktop publishing grant can do to spread information.

Q: Were you seeing in the time you were there the development of a skeleton civil society?

FLOYD: Yes. They had elections. They had campaigns. There was some sense that you had to respond to a domestic constituency. But it was still at a very low level. There was still no overarching structure that supported governance. It was unclear what the relationship was with Moscow. It was unclear what the cities' relationships were with the governors. It was unclear what the university's relationship was with the mayor. It was all old boys. It was all behind the scenes networks. And that affected tax collection and road repairs. We told everybody who asked that the greatest security concern in Vladivostok is driving. The mayor and the governor control different switches on the electrical grid and at different times they would turn them off and you would have no power, including power to the street and traffic lights.

Q: With all this, were the NGOs going out and essentially saying "We got to do it better." Was there a new generation coming up and saying "Screw all this nonsense."

FLOYD: "Show us how to do better." We also had fifty Peace Corps members out there.

Q: Were you seeing any inroads into the old boys system.

FLOYD: Inching. The trouble was if you got large enough, the tax collector came out after you. Or the mafia came after you and wanted their cut in protection.

Q: You mentioned fleet visits. Were there quite a few fleet visits?

FLOYD: We were exceedingly fortunate in that we arrived in the summer of the 300th anniversary of the Russian Pacific Fleet. So we were visited by the USS Blue Ridge, which is the flag ship of the U.S. Seventh Fleet, as well as by Admiral Clemens, who was the commander of the seventh fleet, and Admiral Prueher, who was CINCPAC, all within the first three months of my time in country. We subsequently had ship visits by the USS Bellau Wood and the USS Blue Ridge came back a second time, which was very fortunate for me. We got them to time their visit to the Fourth of July because my entire staff lived in hotel rooms and we did not really have any appropriate representational space. So both years that I was there, we held our Fourth of July reception on board the USS Blue Ridge.

Q: I've seen pictures – as a kid I lived in Annapolis and so I know naval ships – and seen pictures of that rusting fleet. Magnificent ships and just rusting away.

FLOYD: I looked out on them every day. The Consulate was on the hills of Vladivostok just above Pacific Fleet headquarters. The first year we were there we had the last of what was called “Cooperation from the Sea” joint exercises. We simulated a natural disaster that would require assistance from the sea. And U.S. and Russian marines and sailors participated in the exercises. After that, it should have been that the Russian Pacific Fleet went to someplace in the United States for a reciprocal exercise. They couldn't afford the fuel to get there. So the only other exercise we did was with the U.S. Coast Guard and the Japanese Self Defense Force with the Russian Pacific Fleet and the Ministry of Extreme Circumstances.

Q: Was the Russian navy essentially non-existent at that point? Did they put ships out?

FLOYD: After fish and timber, the largest export from the Russian Far East was scrap metal, primarily military equipment. But that said, the Russian Pacific ballistic missile fleet was as valid a threat as ever. Not as potent, but as valid.

Q: What were they doing?

FLOYD: The submarines? Patrolling.

Q: It was the submarines?

FLOYD: Surface ships were in port. The only active Russian government fleet was that run by the KGB in their new responsibilities for border security, both poachers and general coast guard type functions. Much smaller ships.

Q: Did you have in your consular district the Amur River?

FLOYD: Between China and Russia?

Q: Yeah. What was happening? It was about twenty or thirty years before that they had a battle going on?

FLOYD: Yes. And most Russians, particularly in the Russian Far East, will tell you that their greatest threat is economic intrusion from China. Huge numbers. Estimated five to ten million Chinese guest workers run what limited agriculture there is in the Russian Far East. They even call their food market the Chinese market. The difference between economic development on the south side of the Amur as opposed to the north side is excruciating for the Russians.

Every Russian political figure I ever talked to would talk about their nightmare scenario that some morning every Chinese in the three provinces that border the Russian Far East would simply wake up and decide to walk north. There are approximately 110 million Chinese in those three provinces. The Russian Far East total – a land mass about two-thirds the size of the United States – is about 2.5 million. If those Chinese just walked – I mean no weapons, no military – just walked, they would take over. Which is one of the reasons that the Russians in the Russian Far East are so loyal, dependent, subservient to Moscow because they cannot provide for their international relations. They need the Russian connection.

Q: Is there any residue of people from the Gulags and all that? Are a lot of the population descended from it?

FLOYD: Enough. Fascinating ethnic setup. It is one of those places where the Slavic elements, the Russians and the Ukraines, get along well because they were thrust into difficult circumstances together. It was one of the most successful areas of Stalin's ethnic cleansing. Total deportation of all of the local Koreans and Chinese in the late 20s. The prison population or the exile population is apparent, but people don't talk about it.

Q: Are any gulags still in existence?

FLOYD: No. To my knowledge Camps 35 and 36 are the only remaining prisons that we consider political and they are in European Russia. Now you can go up to Madagan and go to the gulag museum. They are slowly coming to grips with what that means. You get a lot more people who are descendents of the gulag administration than of the actual prisoners, who died. So the questioning of is there any valid reason for most of Madagan and Kamchatka to exist except as a prison.

Q: What about Sakhalin? How important was this?

FLOYD: Hugely important. It is a multi-million dollar U.S. investment for a potentially multi-billion dollar profit.

Q: In what?

FLOYD: Oil and gas.

Q: How are we working with the Russians on this?

FLOYD: It is a fascinating set up and illustrative of the challenges of the various levels of government in Russia. Primarily the development is taking place on separate, unique, distinct agreements between the United States Government and the Russian Government in terms of the conditions under which these companies will operate. Their liability to taxes. Their coverage by local laws.

Q: So they just sort of set them aside.

FLOYD: Absolutely. And obviously that irritates the local governor and folks. The local populations want folks to bring this oil and gas onto Sakhalin island for processing and/or shipment to current processing capabilities on the mainland, or what they call the mainland in Khabarovsk. But the American companies don't want to do that because they don't want it to ever get into Russia proper. They are planning to pump it directly into ships. Because if it comes onto Russia, they don't know if they will ever recoup that. The largest impact to date has simply been the presence of Americans. They built an entirely new, really cool, Western class hotel on the island to accommodate their employees. Exxon/Mobile is building a village, they estimate for between four and six hundred employees, with schools, housing, dining facilities, medical setup. And I can guarantee you that some of those oil workers will marry Russians and we will get to deal with a lot of citizenship questions. And they will get in fights and they will – yeah, it will be a major American presence.

Q: Did the question of what they call the Northern Islands come up?

FLOYD: The Northern Territories.

Q: This is Japan. To me, it was the greatest boon that we were handed by the Soviets and Russians, by so irritating the Japanese on this that there was no possibility of the Japanese making nice to the Soviets.

FLOYD: They are little rocks. It is a larger bone of contention with the Japanese-Russian relationship. The American position on it is so clear, so consistent and so out of our hands that it comes up, but it is not seen as ours to resolve. It does present an advantage for American businessmen in that the Russians are irritated to heck by the Japanese and the feeling is mutual. So the preference is to deal with American business folk. And mind you, we discussed this earlier in regards to the Stans. Russians are among the most prejudiced people I have ever met and the disdain with which they look upon Asian ethnicity is appalling. It is just unbelievable.

Q: What about the North Koreans?

FLOYD: Very interesting. We estimate they've probably got a couple thousand guest workers, primarily in the timber industry. There is a large and active South Korean consulate who keeps an eye on them. While we were there, one of our South Korean colleagues was murdered, presumably by the North Koreans for being too interested in what they were doing.

Q: But there wasn't any flow over the boarder of refugees and that sort of thing?

FLOYD: The Russians will send back, period.

Q: How about missionaries?

FLOYD: One of the banes of my existence.

Q: I go back to 1910 where at American consulate Seoul – this was 1910 – where a zealous missionary had a tree which had been declared a national treasury – it was an animate society and they used to hang prayers from the tree. And he thought this was anathema and he had it chopped down. And of course there was terrible outrage and our consulate at the time said “You know, I have much more sympathy for Pontius Pilot now that I had before.”

FLOYD: None of the missionaries in the Russian Far East were quite that stupid or aggressive. But the Russian Orthodox Church is so disappointing in having suffered for decades under Soviet oppression, their response to democracy was “Okay, now we are the only religion.” The Russian law on religions identifies five – I can’t remember what they call them – “native” religions: Orthodoxy, Catholicism, Judaism, Islam and Buddhism. And nothing else. Everything else is considered a sect. And the Russian Orthodox Church hates them. Goes after them in cahoots with tax collectors. We had one pastor who kept getting blocked just in terms of getting registered as a foreigner legally residing in Russia. And it was all instigated by the Russian Orthodox Church.

Q: It really doesn’t fit the mold of what we think of churches being.

FLOYD: We talked about the challenge of democracy and having to give before you get. But the Russian Orthodox Church was faced with the obtuseness. For them, religious freedom meant freedom for them and them only.

Q: Well the Greek constitution declares that the Greek Orthodox religion is the only religion there and that proselytizing is forbidden. It’s in the constitution. So, how did you deal with local authorities? Did they give you a rough time?

FLOYD: No. They generally speaking loved us. We were symbols of Russia’s greatness in the sense that Russia liked dealing with the superpower. And by our presence, it meant that the United States (end tape, change tape).

Q: This is tape four, side one, with Jane Floyd. Yes.

FLOYD: The Russians very much liked having an American presence because it meant that they were valid partners for America.

Q: Normally the Foreign Service is probably not the greatest example of American religious representation. I mean, as a group we . . .

FLOYD: There were no Muslims. There were no Buddhists.

Q: But also we tend to be a little uncomfortable dealing with people who are devoted to religion and all, as a group.

FLOYD: Yes. We have a great deal of respect for religion and that means all religion. We probably distance ourselves a little from those we consider fanatics. In Vladivostok we had a Christian service on Sunday mornings. There weren't enough of us to have any one faith. And if we had a visiting preacher from any known faith we would invite them to lead the service. Both the Protestant and the Catholic folks from Moscow would come out from Moscow occasionally and visit us. But otherwise it was a very eclectic mix of folks who got together in the antechamber – actually it used to be a chapel – of the old Catholic church that the Soviet Government had turned into a book depository. But there were a very few, a handful, three, four, five, Russians who spoke English well enough to appreciate, I wouldn't call it a service – a prayer meeting? – that we had on Sunday mornings. But in terms of the Orthodox Church or our missionaries, you are correct that the Foreign Service attracts proselytizers, but not to a given religious faith.

Q: How did you find the hand of our embassy in Moscow rested on you?

FLOYD: Not bad at all. Only two or three major visits. The major connection was by either me going to Moscow or by this time we had limited e-mail capability. And because all of our operations were unclassified we could deal a lot with faxes, with telephone calls. The curious factor was that because the consulate had to deal with all of the various sections of Moscow, we probably knew more people in Moscow than the people in Moscow knew. When I would go back for consultations, I would of course take my stack of, here's the travel vouchers for travel and here's the personnel actions for personnel and here's some hand written reports that we couldn't send out because we thought some of the material might be classified for the political section and here's this . . . And as you would go around or as you would sit in the cafeteria at lunch, you would be saying hi to people from all different sections and yet the Moscow embassy people you were sitting with had no idea who those guys were. They would say "Are they from Vladivostok too?" Uh, no, they're from your GSO section. So it was funny to see how incredibly huge and impersonal the embassy in Moscow had become.

Q: In 98 you left?

FLOYD: I did.

Q: This must have been a very satisfying time, wasn't it?

FLOYD: It was a very good tour. We enjoyed it. Can complain immensely about the living conditions but overall it was enjoyable, productive.

Q: Living conditions, were you in a hotel too?

FLOYD: Oh yeah.

Q: Everyone was in a hotel. Was there any effort to build housing for us?

FLOYD: There was, but the legal situation in Vladivostok does not make land acquisition or contract finalization very easy. We could never satisfy FBO that someone could sell us some property with appropriate legal guarantees as to their right to sell us that property. We never could get an American contractor to fulfill the obligations that they took on by bidding on a contract to build. So the corollary to that was that the utility situation in Vladivostok itself meant that living on the economy was not viable. My administrative officer disparaged the long commute from the hotel where we lived and decided he would put up with a city apartment. Well, the second month that he went without water, not just hot water, but water – no flush, no brush – we went through the hassle of getting Moscow to authorize the installation of a 500 gallon tank in his second bedroom.

LOUISE TAYLOR
Policy Officer for Eastern Europe and Newly Independent States
Washington, DC (1996-1998)

Ms. Taylor was born and raised in Illinois and educated at Wellesley College, George Washington University and Boston University. After joining the Foreign Service of USIA, Ms. Taylor served in Washington and abroad in the field of Cultural and Information. Her foreign posts include Moscow, Kabul, Tel Aviv and Rabat. She also served in Washington as USIA Desk Officer for Afghanistan/Pakistan and for South Asia and as Policy Officer for Eastern Europe and Newly Independent States. Ms. Taylor was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

TAYLOR: I wasn't prepared to go overseas again at that point. There wasn't really very much available. That was how I ended up as a policy officer for Eastern Europe and the NIS (New Independent States) in '96, which was not a job I ever would have applied for. It was the first job I had ever been directed to without my saying I had an interest in it. But there was nothing else that could be done at that point. Duffy had eliminated it supposedly on financial grounds... "We need to cut the director's office by X amount."

Q: If you're trying to destroy things, you get rid of the professionals. Otherwise, they get in your way.

TAYLOR: There was an unfortunate incident that happened during this period of time. I think he would have eliminated my position anyway because they didn't want me around. What tipped it over the edge was when Princeton Lyman was out in South Africa as ambassador. Al Gore had four different bilateral relationships going. One was with the Soviet Union and with Russia. One was with South Africa. And he had two other countries. He would go off with a whole bunch of advisors. These were bilateral talks. They would be held here and then the next year they would be held in another country. Well, South Africa was one. Mbeki, who is now the president of South Africa, was at the time Minister of Education. Joe Duffy was to have been his counterpart on the Al Gore trip out there. You may or may not have heard from others that Duffy never went anywhere in the eight years as our director. He never visited a USIA post anywhere unless he happened to be in that country for other reasons. Even then, it was like he was dragged kicking and screaming to go to visit a post. I think he went to Mexico City and he may have gone to Canberra – in eight years. He didn't like to travel. Well, then you think about that before you take a job like that.

Q: Was there any concern that some of these things, particularly those that had to do with AID, were the playthings of universities where they would have their graduate students go out to X country and do whatever they're supposed to do. It's problematic about how much the country...

TAYLOR: I think it's one area of concern, especially with AID's money. They've got so much and they don't have enough people to monitor what's going on on the ground. They've got so much, but I think they need more. In terms of the FSA and the SEED grants, we had pretty good staff work on the ground at our embassies. By this I also include the Balkans. I'd like to insert here that when I took this job reluctantly, the one bright shining light on the horizon was that I could once again get back to working on things pertaining to Russia because I had had such a wonderful experience there in Moscow years earlier in my career. But in actuality, from '96-98, I spent 60-70% of my time on the Balkans. That was the big buildup at that time. Every morning, I would get up and say, "Today I am going to work on our Russian programs." I would get to the office at 7:30 with the international conference call headed up by the White House and with our people out in the Balkans and would just be sucked into that Balkan quagmire for the entire day. Then the next day, I'd come in and say the same thing, "I'm going to do something different today." But I inserted that but don't want to lose sight of your very good point about the NGOs going out to various countries where they have varying degrees of expertise and experience and how well do they do and how well do we do in monitoring them, keeping them on track, making sure they're doing what we originally had proposed for them to do, making sure that they're effective. I think the record is mixed on that. There are some places where the NGOs have succeeded really well. Helping small businesses become more effective, helping women's groups become a voice for change or a voice for political action, helping even universities become more modernized and streamlined. But this all happened so fast in the '90s that what we did to assist the former Soviet Union countries to remain on a path toward eventual democratization and opening up and liberalization of their systems was a new ballgame for everybody. It's almost like the new ballgame we're in now. In a sense, it was the blind leading the blind. What I think Bob McCarthy did so well as my boss was, he restrained us from rushing into projects with lots of money that he felt either we or the NGOs involved were not quite ready for or had not thought out seriously enough. He did a remarkable job while he was in that position.

There were people at the State Department with ambassadorial rank who were charged with administering the SEED and FSA funds. There were lots and lots of layers of responsibility and accountability. The Department was kind of floundering because they had extremely limited staff to deal with this. The Department doesn't do programs. It doesn't do action oriented things. So, the partnership with USIA and EEN (my office symbol) in particular worked very well. It meant that very few people were working extraordinarily hard to keep track of all of this. I suppose along the way if someone were to write an analysis and a history of it, there probably were some bloopers and we probably picked out some Russian partnership entities which weren't the best. Our embassy was doing a very good job of trying to identify in the brave new world of the post-Soviet era with whom is it we should be working, whom can we trust, who is in this for the long-run, who are the good guys, who are the bad guys, who are the con artists, who is connected with the underworld? To a certain extent, it was a whole new horizon for all of us. Everybody did the best they could. A lot of good things came out of it. There were tremendous things done in the field of rule of law. There were some very good things done in privatization. But it's a massive country.

Q: When you think about it, the country had never had a democracy until about 10 years before.

TAYLOR: And it is very chaotic and very confused and very colorful and always interesting and absorbing. But the political game of the day was the Balkans.

Q: Before we move to the Balkans, did you play any role in coordinating what we were doing to bring about a changed Russia, particularly with the Western European countries? Was there any coordination there?

TAYLOR: I think there was far less than there should have been. In the early '90s, I was overseas. I didn't have a real sense of how the rest of the world was reacting to the fall of the Soviet Union and what new opportunities were presented. I think that we were pretty much in competition with all our western allies in Europe. I have no proof that supports my argument, but I would say that I don't think we were as well coordinated as we should have been.

Q: Just the fact that you're unable to say, "Oh, yes, we have a coordinating board for this or that" means that there wasn't much of a structure for coordinating.

TAYLOR: When you moved to the Balkans, there was. Of course, there were so many different national militaries represented there. There were coordinating boards. But those broke down almost more frequently than if you had had no coordinating board. But it's a very good point that you raise. It's one that if I had more time I'd like to look into, what were the other western allies and maybe some of the Pacific countries doing in Russia at the time? I have a feeling we were pretty much doing our own thing and letting others do their own thing. Whether we collided or tripped over each other's feet or whether we were duplicative or redundant, I really can't say. That would be a good thing to bring up with people who were actually serving in Moscow or Petersburg at the time. Paul Smith, for example, would have a good sense of that.

***

Q: Did you get any feeling about what the assistance that was coming in from us and others and also the major effort on the part of the Russian people themselves... What was your feeling towards the end? How were things going?

TAYLOR: Well, I'm one of the optimists about Russia. I think that the Russian people have such genius and creativity and such a zest for life that despite all they have endured and undergone. They are resilient to say the least. I felt early in the '90s that once the exhilaration of having shaken off the Soviet system wore off, clearly, reality was going to land with a thud, and it did. That was when in the mid-‘90s, a lot of pundits and people who wrote about these things said, “Well, there is a huge threat that the Russian people will realize that without communism there is only chaos.” It’s sort of like after De Gaulle, “le deluge” he used to say. Well, I never felt that way. I felt that with the exception of some of the really elderly pensioners and some people living in some godforsaken places in Russia there was a real chance for the age group of 50 and under to have an improved life even in their own lifetime and certainly for the future. My feeling was that once the genie was out of the bottle, you couldn’t put it back in. Once people had had a glimpse of what life could be like despite the underworld, despite the Russian mafia, despite the enormous corruption, despite the lumbering systems they still have not yet completely dismantled, there is no turning back. Their bureaucracy is still just as ponderous as it was then. But there are ways around it and there always have been. The fact is they’re beginning to develop the unfortunate trappings of a capitalist society in western civilization where you have an economy with few people at the top and many people at the bottom who are larger in number. But I guess I have to take a very callous point of view and say that under the communist system, although they didn’t have a pyramid structure, everybody was at the lowest common denominator and there were very few who lived well at all or what we would even describe as approaching western terms. Now there have been people bubbling up from within this morass of a dismal economic structure. Although they might not be the ones who are the most admirable or the most deserving, slowly there is being created a system and a way for others to find a way toward a more prosperous and a more healthful life. The health statistics in Russia are appalling. Although that’s not really the State Department’s job nor is it USIA’s, I wish that something could be done to help them improve their health statistics. The rate of death has reduced in age in the last 30 years by something like 10-15 years for Russian men. The average lifespan for Russian men now is somewhere in the 50s. When we were in Moscow, it wasn’t great, but it was at least in the high 60s. They’ve had a cataclysmic disaster as far as health statistics are concerned and something really has to be done there. But they are people of great creativity, great energy, great genius. This is not the worst that they’ve gone through in the last 70 years of their history. A lot of people were very pessimistic about Putin. I’m one of the great Gorbachev fans. I’m one of the people who feels that Gorbachev has gotten short shrift from everybody. There are those who say, “Well, he wasn’t enough of a modernizer,” but I think they knew exactly how far he could go. He was almost like Khrushchev in a way, who saw something of what needed to be done, took some risks, and realized that he would only managed to get himself and his reformers toppled if he went further. So, there are a lot of people in the State Department who badmouth Gorbachev, but I just think he’s far more than Yeltsin key to the success of what has happened there. I don’t think Putin has turned out to be such a bad guy after all.

Q: What you gather is that a skeleton of a modern state is getting erected – laws and all. It’s slow, but...

TAYLOR: But it’s the optimism, the spirit of optimism, that is key here. Even if they bumble along through chaos and even corruption, as long as the people remain optimistic – and you frequently read articles that there is doom and gloom and a spirit of great pessimism spreading over Russia. That’s just periodic. It comes and goes.

Q: What were you getting out of the State Department as you were going through this? All this pressure to do something about the Balkans... But were you getting anything from the office of Strobe Talbott, who was the Under Secretary at the time who was essentially a Russian expert? Was he playing any role that you knew of?

TAYLOR: Strobe Talbott remains a mystery for a lot of people. He is such a Russian expert. By the end of the administration my sense of Strobe Talbott was that he had pretty much disappeared. He didn't seem to be focusing broadly on Russia or on what was happening in the whole system. He never seemed to gather a group of people around the table to say, "Where can we go next?" It seemed there was a lot of introspection going on. But I don't think that a lot of creative ideas were coming out of his circle. I don't think that his level at the Department asked us to do as much as we could have been asked to do. Where we really had good working relationships were desk officer to desk officer, office director to office director, and our liaison out with the field. Strobe would go out to Moscow and he would talk to Yeltsin's chief guys, but it never really trickled down into action. I think it might have trickled down to marching orders for Jim Collins in his discussions with the MFA and his discussions with other relevant personnel. But in terms of actual program and action and what can we do to further assist, Strobe was really much more in a more ethereal and philosophical mode. The embassy and the Department regional bureau and AID were much more interested in seeing how we could get these various projects going and what would be the outcome of them. They were all experiments in a way. Some worked and some didn't. There was a little petite scandal with a Harvard University group over there. We had given them money and there were accounting and regulatory problems. The Harvard group had gotten in with the wrong folks in Russia. So, these things were all happening at a lower level than Strobe Talbott. I almost think that he was much more of a thinker and philosopher than someone who could translate this into action.

Q: The structure was falling apart and needed an engineer, not a deep thinker.

TAYLOR: Yes. We didn't need to analyze it anymore. Something had fallen in our laps. It was a great opportunity to do things. I certainly wouldn't say that he was a negative force here. I just don't think he played a really active influence. I remember people saying, "Well, where is Strobe Talbott in all of this?" He did travel out to Russia frequently.

Q: Did you get out there at all?

TAYLOR: No, I didn't. But I was on the phone with them every day all day long.

Q: What about all these projects... Who were you dealing with at our embassy in Moscow or at other embassies around this area? Was it the public affairs officer? This sounds like it's much more across the board.

TAYLOR: It was across the board. The coordination out there was very good. Embassy Moscow has always been staffed with great people. I was fortunate enough to have my first tour in Moscow. My view from Washington of the coordination within the embassy was that it was extremely good to excellent. There were a few personality clashes. Some of those personality clashes transcended sections, including some in our section, which was public... We were still called USIA at that time. Although in Moscow, we always had to be called "Press and Culture" because the Russians didn't like USIA. There were a few little dueling matches between some people in the political section and some people in the USIS office out there. There is bound to be disagreement when you have something as big as this. But basically it was pretty well coordinated. We had a very wonderful, active, kind of impatient guy, Bob Gosende, whose name is familiar from Somalia. He played a role there. He is retired now and has a fabulous job at the State University of New York in the president's office running the State University's $100 million a year program with Russia. Bob is a USIA officer originally, but he had a very strong background in Africa. During the time of "Blackhawk Down," Bob was the State Department representative in Somalia. There is a very interesting story there. I don't want to say anything more about it. But he was our PAO in Moscow at this time. He is a very strong, opinionated person and has all the right motivations and all the right reasons for being the bull in the China shop and he would not object to me saying that. But what he did object to was that very often other people in the embassy didn't see how right he was. So, I took it upon myself to fight Bob's battles back in Washington. That meant fighting some of them at the Department. We won some and we lost some. Overall, we were all pretty professional about it. We got into some snarl, wrangling things. Our agency decided we should do a brochure about NATO structures so as to convince the Russians that the expansion of NATO into Eastern Europe to include three new countries – the Czech Republic, Poland, and Hungary – would not be a threat to them. The people in USIA who did these types of brochures worked very hard to come up with something. We worked with the Pentagon and everybody all over town. In the end, no one would clear it. Everybody was shouting at everybody. We felt that it would be useful as a tool in Russia to have something like this. I don't want to go into all the details of what was and was not in the pamphlet. But it was an example of something where when you're trying to clear a public document, it's almost impossible to get everybody on board when there is any kind of a serious policy issue involved. Of course, the enlargement of NATO was a serious policy issue. It was looked at different from East to Western Europe. I spent an awful lot of time on this thing before it finally bit the dust and we buried it forever and it will never see the light of day. But probably we should have known from the beginning that we couldn't get the clearances necessary.

Q: One of the concerns that I've heard people have about the former structure of USIA was that here in Washington, USIA might have desk officers and all, but they're not in on policy development with a country – yet when you get to the field, the public affairs officer and the USIS contingent is as integrated as you can think as far as the country team. They're all together and all consulting along with the ambassador and all very much on the policy implementation. Yet you're talking here about things you're doing which would seem to be probably more than anything very strongly in terms of policy: whither Russia and its former empire?

TAYLOR: You're right. Presumably, consolidation should have helped solve some of that. But don't forget, I must have talked with my State Department counterparts on Russia or the Balkans more than once or twice a day. Plus, my boss, Bob McCarthy, spent more time at the State Department than he did in our office. I spent a lot of time physically at the Department during this period of time, especially with the Balkan task forces, which were always headed by a State Department person. We would do a lot of reporting explaining, justifying, what we were doing, as well as taking orders and taking ideas back to our own working groups. Similarly, we invited our State Department colleagues always to come to our planning sessions. We never ever would have done a major project or taken up a major initiative without having discussed it thoroughly at several levels – desk officer to desk officer, office director to deputy assistant secretary and above depending on the sensitivity of the project. I don't think the cohesion in Washington has ever been as great as it is in the country team process overseas. Indeed, there have been some times where the State Department or USIA has proposed a plan, an idea, a project, where the ambassador will hit the ceiling and say, "You're not doing this in my backyard." So, those things would happen also. Then of course you put the poor PAO in a terrible position when Washington wants to do something and the ambassador doesn't. This particularly happened in my experience when the White House instructs the political appointees in an agency like USIA. The White House will tell Joe Duffy or Charlie Wick, "We want this to happen out in Moscow." Then they will come back and tell our agency, "The President said do this whether the State Department likes it or not." That has been an historical source of friction between USIA and the State Department. Mostly, USIA and State Department people would be singing off the same sheet of music were it not for the sometimes conflicting directives that we have gotten from the White House over the years. We have always been more public. The State Department has always been more inward looking and just generally by the nature of the beast tends not to like public events or much publication or publicizing of what the policy is, what the plans are, what the goals are. So, there is that friction and that clash of culture, too. But I think the major issues have come about when the most egregious things that USIA may have done in the eyes of the State Department anywhere in the world have usually come about as a result of some insane thing that the White House told us to do. The blacklist period during the Charlie Wick period... Then ambassadors would hear about this and hit the ceiling. Or some of the more propagandistic, anti-Soviet stuff that we were doing during the Reagan period would make career ambassadors cringe. We came out with Charlie Wick's "Let Poland Be Poland." It was actually so boring I don't know why anybody felt threatened by it. But just the whole idea of it was counter to what some of the career State people and the career USIA people were trying to do out in Poland at the time. So, there have been those things. That's always been fun.

NAOMI F. COLLINS
Wife of Ambassador
Russia (1997-2001)

Mrs. Collins was born and raised in New York City and educated at Queen College, City University of New York; Indiana University; Harvard University; and Moscow State University. Married to American Foreign Service Officer, James Collins, she accompanied him on a number of his assignments in the United States and abroad, including Izmir and Moscow, where her husband served as United States Ambassador from 1997 to 2001. Throughout this time Mrs. Collins continued her separate career, primarily in the fields of International Education, Humanities, and Political Development, notably Russian, authoring numerous publications on these and other subjects. She is currently an Independent Education Consultant in Bethesda, Maryland. Mrs. Collins was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2012

Q: So the Association works.

COLLINS: It works and it has been around for over 60 years, growing steadily. It still uses the acronym NAFSA but that no longer stands for what it originally did in the late 40's and 50's, which was the National Association of Foreign Student Advisors. But along the way – recognizing that there were five distinct groups within the Association – they realized they had to broaden the name to include “Association of International Educators.” And they kept the old acronym, as the NAACP did, even when it didn't stand for anything anymore.

This probably gets us up to 1997 when I left NAFSA. And when Jim became Ambassador to Russia. I was not yet sure what my next gig would be and was looking at possibilities as Executive Director of another national organization... but realized I probably did not want a third such position. And since I was freer than ever, I went out with Jim right at the beginning of his tenure as Ambassador. This was after waiting nine months through the nomination process.

I had left NAFSA because the Executive Committee had changed in those five years and we were not in the same place any more. The Board that had voted unanimously to hire me had turned over in that time. And the new Chair and Past Chair had different ways from mine at looking at things. So I left knowing I had done what I could in those years, grown membership and conference attendance, funds, and programs. Time to move on. So off I went with Jim to Russia, spending enough time to get a feel for Spaso House and what the job of “wife of...” might entail.

Q: We will just write you off after that.

COLLINS: It wasn't over yet... Lots ahead, including writing my book on observing Russia over four decades. And several projects in international higher education and in the humanities, plus a number of boards. Most happily, we have in the last eight years, gotten four wonderful grandchildren – from 2004 though just now in 2012. Tristan, Parker, Eden, and Anabel Collins. But that's more recent.

Q: Today is 23 April 2012 with Naomi Collins and Charles Stuart Kennedy. We left off in 1997. You were talking about what you might do next. You were considering other professional positions in the States – but meanwhile thought you would spend some time in Russia, seeing if you could get into something there.

COLLINS: Yes. Jim was appointed ambassador in 1997. I was completing my work at NAFSA and interviewing for my next professional position. By that time, I knew what questions to ask – and what spelled “trouble” - in interviewing for Executive Director positions. So that ended my interest in heading up a couple of national organizations that invited me.

Meanwhile, I got asked to do several projects. I did research and writing for publications in higher education for the American Council on Education, researched and wrote the entry for the “The Humanities” for the Charles Scribner's Encyclopedia of American Cultural and Intellectual History [reference at end of document], reviewed proposals for the U.S. Department of Education, and worked with several other endeavors – including serving on nonprofit boards. When Jim first got the appointment, I was open-minded about considering what I might be able to do as “wife of...” the Ambassador. I don’t mean things to amuse myself or keep busy, but rather something useful I could do, something that might make a difference, be of use to Jim or the field.

The obvious thought was that I was expert in nonprofit management, with about two decades’ work heading up these organizations (call them NGOs, nonprofits, nongovernmental organizations, the third sector, or whatever). I knew they made a real difference in delivering services, helping create what they call a civic society. So I thought I might do something useful there, or teach at the university level, as I had done. There was certainly no shortage of issues surrounding historical humanities questions. So I spoke with Jim and others, but it became clear to me that it would be hard to be taken seriously as an independent professional while being wife of the Ambassador. And I knew I could not do it as a volunteer and be taken seriously. So I was not able to find a position at that time. I know opportunity has increased since then. Perhaps another person would have been much better than I at figuring this out, perhaps be more imaginative in finding options. But it seemed difficult to be viewed in any way other than as “wife of...”

We know that the Russians then as now hold ambivalent and suspicious feelings about NGOs... so I didn’t want to be in the position of creating perceptions that could cause Jim trouble. When I realized that I wasn’t going to be able to do anything productive or contribute in any way, I decided that I would not stay full-time in Russia, but continue to go back and forth while doing the kinds of projects and boards I mentioned.

Q: And you mentioned your inability to find professional work in Moscow, being able to contribute in some way at the professional level?

Yes, as I look back, I’ve always wondered whether I could have had a productive career that was more compatible with Jim’s. The most obvious of course would have been to become a Foreign Service Officer. But that didn’t interest me. However, I had an interest and credentials in the kinds of educational and cultural endeavors then undertaken by U.S.I.A., the United States Information Agency. Somewhere in the middle or late 1970s or early 1980s, I took the exam for USIA.

I passed the written exams. But I had a peculiar experience at the orals. By that time, I could conduct myself well in interviews, public speaking: had even passed hours of oral exams for my Ph.D. And I had been told that the questions would be hypothetical and general, to test my judgment, problem solving, dealing with crises, analytic thinking. So I went into the exams confident. I was up to date with current events from reading the New York Times, Washington Post, and Newsweek. What a shock it was when the examiners turned on me asking for the actual provisions in the GATT, for example, and other very precise data. Their tone felt intimidating and even harassing. When I asked whether they might suggest at least one point, they refused to discuss anything. And they forged on asking other very specific legalistic points. I was quite upset of course and knew that they were hoping to prevent my serving – which they did. I have been cross-examined many times before and since: by members of the State Legislature, by Boards of Directors, and of course oral exams - and have never been treated that badly before or since. So I went home upset. By chance, Jim had a few young officers over at our apartment, three or four young men. They had taken the oral exams not too long before. I told them what I had been asked. Their mouths fell opened. They said they could not have answered those questions themselves, but they were given only hypothetical situation questions, not such particular points questions at all. It was consoling, I guess – if frustrating. I later learned that none of the women I knew who were also wives of officers (as opposed to women who were not wives) were passed on the orals (although they had passed the writtens).

Q: I would like to say back in the 70's I used to be on one of those panels. This wasn't the attitude.

COLLINS: It shouldn't have been, of course. And "real gentlemen" did not behave this way. There was as you know a huge class-action lawsuit after this that became high profile. The women – and wives – did win it many years later. But the remedy was the opportunity – get this – to take the exams again. I did not think I wanted to work with people who treated people this way. But it also obviated the opportunity to have a professional career parallel to Jim's, which could have made family life easier. (I should be clear that I'm not arguing that wives of officers should get preferential treatment either.) But if Jim was not going to consider other career choices, I felt I should continue to try to find a compatible professional life. I regret I was unable to do so.

Q: When did you take this?

COLLINS: I think it was in the middle to later 1970s, perhaps early 80s. I've tried to forget it!

Q: At middle or end of the 1970s, I spent a year giving the exam. Certainly the individuals I knew weren't interested in "let's get them" or something like that. And we did try always to have at least one woman on the panel when interviewing a woman.

COLLINS: I think there was one woman on the panel with perhaps three or four men. She didn't say much, but had a severe officious manner that did not feel welcoming. When I've conducted professional interviews, I've always made sure the tone in the room was pleasant and respectful in manner and approach. One owes that to candidates... to people.

Q: The women who made it were rough. By god, I had a rough time and so will you...

COLLINS : Yes, and wanted to show their ... "macho". Not all of them of course. But acting tough or intimidating never impresses me: confident and competent people don't have to "act tough." In any case, one man did almost all the questioning, a former Ambassador (I believe to Asian countries). The others deferred to him.

But I do know that when I wrote their questions down immediately after the test, even before driving home, and tried them out on Jim's male colleagues, they were astonished. These were not even in the same ballpark. They told me the kinds of questions they had been asked, all of which I would have found easy to address. That doesn't mean I am confident I would have passed – only that I would have been able to feel it was fair. And if they had disclosed in advance that the nature of the exam included very specific points and "right and wrong" particulars – rather than a test of judgment, analysis, reasoning, and hypotheticals—or even about American culture or education--I would have felt differently about any outcome.

Q. Returning to what Russia was like when you returned in 1997....

COLLINS: Huge changes had already started in the early 1990s. At that point, I've mentioned, we saw stores closing down and deserted, and goods appearing in impromptu kiosks germinating on sidewalks. Government owned businesses dissolved. By the time I returned in 1997, the first thing I noted was the change in the visual imagery, of the signage. The iconography had changed. Russia has always been about iconography: the iconography of onion shaped domes, the icons themselves of course, and even the visuals on the lovely painted enamel Palekh boxes. During the Soviet period, of course, we had Socialist Realism, a style akin to "Uncle Sam Needs You" posters. A government iconography, iconography of an authoritarian State, and very retro.

Q: When you say that I am reminded of a painting I saw when I was in Yugoslavia. "Vote for the Best" in very big letters. Of course you know who the best was.

COLLINS : That's right. Mao in China did the same. In Russia it was these smiling blond boys and girls happy on the farm. Wholesome and unquestioning.

Q: Looking lustfully at a tractor.

COLLINS : Yes, exactly. And next to the tractor, acres – or hectares - of tall golden grain growing. Ideal grain of the type I never saw there. Another thing I noticed immediately on my return – beside the change in visual images – was the traffic. Progress of course for those who coveted cars and now had them; hell for anyone trying to get anywhere. And it has only become worse since. Cars at a standstill. Unbreathable air. Sitting in such a traffic jam,

I was intrigued by the signs. In the Socialist Realist – pre-capitalist – days, the signs extolled work. The Russian leaders were for decades striving – as Jim puts it – to turn Russians into Germans, to motivate them to be very disciplined and to work very hard. They seemed to think if you had enough exhortatory posters around, people would just start working harder. Propaganda. Making large political points. And never subtle – in words or images; more comic book. Now it's 1997, inching out of the airport, all those graphics have been replaced with crude looking advertisements for modern products: detergent, toothpaste, automobiles. Stuff. Advertising had not yet gone slick. It was not Times Square. Not at that point, anyway. So I was amused by how radically the visuals had changed. And I thought suddenly about the underlying themes. In the past, they were trying to get you to buy Communism. Buy hard work. Buy Lenin and his ideology and his successors, and the concept of a New Soviet State with New Soviet People.... Men and women marching toward the future with hammer and sickle in the air. But now – in 1997 – they were trying to get you buy "stuff" – cars, toothpaste, detergent... in huge letters and not subtle visuals. Not sophisticated graphics. That said a lot.

And of course this was the first time I was going to Spaso House as a "home." It was – is – huge... probably some 35,000 square feet. My image was of Marjorie Meriwether Post. I had read of her tenure as wife of a much earlier American Ambassador, and the tons of frozen food (Bird's Eye of course) that she had had shipped for her entertaining in Russia. Talk about a contrast of people filling this role: an heir to a fortune, raised with servants and privilege, and average people like me, raised in modest circumstances, in an apartment of perhaps a 1,000 square feet for a family of four. She and her husband hosted magnificent parties for which they imported fresh flowers and rented live animals. I wrote about these lavish affairs in my book because I was so intrigued with the excesses – and how one could not get away with this today, even using your own personal wealth if you happened to have it. So I pictured their life in Spaso House, and then the gap between that and everyday life even for an average person at the Embassy, let alone for an average American at home, or an average Russian.

Spaso House is regal. It is splendid. It may lose some of the glamour when you imagine the house's history: that the merchant who built it was murdered in it by his own son. The house dates to the turn of the century, 19th into 20th. He spared nothing. The stunning Czech crystal chandelier, they say, is the largest in any private home in Russia. And the furnishings, museum quality. I thought about that, and about how you would work at having a comfortable everyday life in so public and so large an edifice. And I thought of the practical side behind the glamour, the day to day running of an institution, like a hotel and restaurant. The 10,000 guests entertained each year. The staff of thirteen. Fortunately, they knew what they were doing and didn't need direction.

Q: Who paid for these official visitors, for their meals?

COLLINS : If they were not Americans, it came out of the set allowance an Ambassador was allotted for representation. If they were Americans, I don't believe you had funds for that. But most events were designed to bring Russians and other nationalities together in honor of visiting Americans. Support was quite limited, though, so it required a staff that could stretch the budget as far as they could, including by recycling leftovers. We were not in the position to provide out-of-pocket money for public representation, for doing Jim's job. But there were out-of-pocket costs to us of his career that we had to absorb, that we would not have had in a "normal" government job in D.C. The State Department also expected – at least when Jim was DCM (Deputy)-- that I would do the accounting and keep the books and do the entertaining, order the food, etc. That is, provide staff services without pay. When I said I was not going to be able to do the books, the accounting, the ordering, the managing a household, the inventories (that they should pretend that Jim was a bachelor or widower), the State Department then hired an American from the States to do the job, and paid him at that time about $ 60,00 per year (today's equivalent perhaps $70,000-$80,000?). That is, a professional salary. They never offered me that option, which I might have considered, even taking a salary cut from where I was, but in order to be with Jim. I had lots of administrative experience by then. For the Ambassador, the paid staff does these jobs.

Living in Spaso House – seeking privacy in a house that was used not only for the Ambassador's events, but for other events all day and evening long, meetings, groups, meals – like a conference hotel--meant retreating to the second floor suite of rooms, bedrooms and sitting room. Unfortunately, connecting the rooms was a wide-open "mezzanine," a balcony opened to the first floor, a public hall ... so being dressed was required all the time! During the day, not a problem, but for breakfast... well... it's nice to have a private cup of coffee or juice without being ready to greet the world.

In Spaso House, the other major activity was (and is) the annual Fourth of July reception for 2,000 – 2,500 guests. Shaking each hand on the way in and out. It was an interesting group, including Russians in all fields, people in the arts, education, music, and of course people in government. With time, people were more open and there were fewer government hacks and flacks. Then you had the people from all of the other Embassies. So you had people from European, African, Asian and South American countries. And you had the Americans from the Embassy.

Planning took months. In January, the staff ordered from the States the red, white, and blue crepe paper and banners and flags and balloons... They decorated for days so that the room was absolutely filled. I have photographs to prove this. What I recall most, though, was one of the Fourths – can't remember what year – in which the outdoor temperature was well into the 90s, the humidity high (you're in the middle of a big landlocked mass, perhaps like Kansas) – and these two thousand plus people all fully dressed in suits and dresses, sweat pouring down, shaking hands. There was no air conditioning – and no fans! The food was curling and wilting on the tables. I was appalled that no one ever managed to procure a single fan for those hot summer days of crowded rooms. That said – of course – I felt very proud to represent America.

One adventure as wife of the Ambassador I particularly enjoyed also helps illustrate life in Russia around 1997. One day I said to Jim, "Why don't we do something a little different. It is hot. I have been in Moscow a lot. Let's go out to the countryside. Let's go see a farm." Jim of course grew up on a farm, and also has a background in agriculture. So I thought this would be an interesting thing for him too and a nice excuse to get away. Agriculture is always such a big issue for the Russians. They have tried to return to the production levels they had prior to the 1917 Revolution. Meanwhile, population increased but grain production was stagnant or in reverse. We all know they didn't do impressive agriculture, despite the posters, movies, and exhortations. Wasn't happening on the ground. Some people said – well, it's too cold there – but have a look at Minnesota, North Dakota, and Canada. Hardly tropical lands. Canada is feeding the world grain.

So, Jim said, "Fine. This Friday we will go out to a farm." I was all ready to go at the stated time. But what Jim hadn't told me is that we were hardly going to be alone (or with only the driver.) So here was a van filled with men. "Who are these people?" I asked. Well two or three of them were Americans from the Embassy who were in the agriculture field. One from the States, there by chance. Also by chance, he was someone I knew professionally in Maryland. Then another van of men pulled up. These were Russian officials in agricultural fields. So, two vans, no springs, lots of men. And we're headed out to the countryside. We shortly discovered we had picked up a police escort with wailing sirens. And then more of them. They accumulated like flies all around us.

I was in the front seat with the driver, trying to avoid carsickness. As always, I was taking notes (which is what allowed me later to write my book). Turns out this activity had not gone unnoticed. At lunch, one of the Russian officials toasting Jim, commented to all assembled how wonderful a wife Jim has, taking all these notes for Jim so he'd have them later. I just laughed to myself knowing the notes were for me.

And finally we arrived at the farm. We were greeted and hosted by the large, self-important farm director (where is Gogol when we need him?). He is the new entrepreneur, the man who will turn the Soviet farm to modern agriculture. He led us to the second floor to provide us background and tea. If it was in the 90s outdoors, it must have been 100 degrees in this room, sun beating down, windows closed, no fans. Drinking hot tea. All of us dripping and becoming very ruddy. And it didn't smell all that good, either. But being good sports – we smiled through the hot floodlights, the video cameras and the photographers. And I graciously accepted the bouquet of flowers. (These came in handy later when we unexpectedly stopped to visit a grave and I plucked a few to hand Jim discretely so he could place them on the grave.) I greeted everyone in usual Russian greetings. Jim participated in Russian at the meeting, impressing them, and commenting that “even the wife of... could speak Russian.”

They took us on a tour of the farm – lots of acres – or hectares – it was. For the tour, the translator they provided was the farm's “manager” or “administrator” or “economist” – they called her. She was perhaps 15 years younger than I, and dressed as if for a wedding, spiked heels, crinolines, taffeta dress. As we got talking she told me that she was Jewish and soon migrating to Brooklyn where her mother and young son were already living. In Brighton Beach. She had spent her career managing this business doing the numbers I think... probably ordering products, keeping inventory, and serving as interpreter and tour guide. (And I thought of my great-grandfather, manager of a large estate in the Pale.)

We saw the cattle, about which Jim could ask the right sort of questions about their feed, production levels (not a fraction of ours), and so forth. Driving around it struck me – even as a NYC girl – that there wasn't much hope for the grain or any crops. Looked like empty ground. And lots of men just sitting around. There had been a drought, but still. But the director was proud as a peacock. I was feeling less like Rebecca at Sunnybrook Farm as the day wore on. But I did enjoy seeing the fine day care center and the little garden cultivated with little tools by little people. The kids themselves were then napping on little cots, oblivious to our group passing through – and impressive for kids of some five years old and below. The women who ran the center had to bake and sell goods to help raise the money needed to keep the center running. But if there was one thing in Russia that always impressed me – that I loved to see – it was their day care and nursery centers. And the great women who staffed them, doing their jobs with all their heart.

Q: Girls with the big bows?

COLLINS: Oh, yes, the girls wore their big white organdy bows that no one in America has worn since 1923. Our own day care centers do not always have great napping equipment, often little floor mats, but these had not only little cots but also pillows and blankets. By that time I had given up on the quiet day at the farm with a picnic for two on the banks of the river. It was about 1:30. Even in that heat, I was thinking about lunch. We were then led into a building that served as their community or social hall. On the table, which had been laid some hours earlier, were platters and platters of smoked fishes, appetizers, and pickled things. Unfortunately, not only had they been left sitting in the heat and wilting, but they were uncovered, and the resting places for hungry flies. Dozens or hundreds of them. Indoors, it felt like over 100 degrees (no open windows or fans), everything was drooping and dripping and curling up at the ends.

And everyone was waiting for me to start. So I was thinking Public Health 101 and reached for pickles and bread. Then came hot soup – which tasted fine even if we didn’t need more heat then... but I ate around the fish’s head floating in it. I was doing my best to be a good guest and receive the generous hospitality, which it certainly was. After the soup came – as I recall – fish, meat, potatoes, and then dessert... although sadly the chocolates were slowly sinking into their serving plate. I knew that good chocolates were dear. And of course there were bottles and bottles of vodka, wine, and sodas. Very generous feast and lovely set up. And the men (they were almost all men) were drinking and sweating and eating and sweating, very red in the face. Then I realized that I, too, was sweating, bright red, and smelled like a fish. I probably should have been drinking!

For the trip back we accumulated even more police escorts. So it was a totally memorable day. But what I was left with was the image of this “model farm,” the dry empty fields, the lack of working labor, the hopelessness of producing an adequate crop – and what a long way it would be to improve productivity in Russian agriculture. I don’t know – because I haven’t read up on it – whether they have progressed since 1997 in their agricultural output, but I hope so.

Q: I read a book that was personally influential. I think it was called “Farm,” by Tracey Kidder. Kidder talks about a farm in the Missouri lowlands and the apparatus that goes into making it function. You have a combine and somebody has to be with the combine all day during the combining season, ready to rush out and get a new part if it’s needed. There are so many elements that go into feeding the agricultural process. You need a whole apparatus, a support system. It is incredible.

COLLINS: Yes. And today it is particularly huge business in the U.S. and Canada. It is industrial size. I’ve seen that it is computerized today, too, from testing levels of water needed for crops to other ways to test for the progress of the crops.

Q: Yes, tractors have computers too.

COLLINS: The tractors do and there is a central control room with computers that measure all kinds of things. Jim knows a lot more about farming because he grew up on a farm and has also kept up with Russian agriculture.

Q: He tells about being a pre teen driving a tractor.

COLLINS: Yes, a kid, actually. He was something like eight years old. And not just tractors but combines. He knows about hand milking and milking machines. He also knows what equipment and approaches were introduced into American agriculture at various times – and the time these things were or were not introduced into Russian agriculture. Sort of the history of agriculture. It was very intensive farming they did in Illinois. They had beautiful soil there and they were very systematic about such things as what you did in different fields at different times. Even a family farm required “systems” and discipline. Which takes us to a larger question that extends beyond farms, and that is management. A farm has to be managed. It’s a business, too. Jim’s grandfather also had a cattle business.

Q: They just don’t do it casually and they do something else at the same time.

COLLINS: Right. You have to be serious about water, for example – and about irrigation systems that don’t waste half their water shooting it out like a fountain into the air. The Israelis and others came up with the drip system, just drops of water going into the roots of each plant right at the ground. But it takes leadership and management – and investment and incentives to make it work. In general in the changing Russia what is needed is people who can conceptualize what needs to be done and make things happen, and the wherewithal to effect these things through leadership and management skills, systems and approaches. I assume these abilities have been increasing with time as new generations rise. There are also issues surrounding capital – and capital flight – and of course diversifying industry to enterprises beyond extraction industries.

Q: Obviously Russia has a big problem, although not as big a problem as China has. The demographics of Russia are bad as far as the number of people being born and the number getting old. Did you find people talking about these issues? And also how this compares to the U.S. and Europe and the way their societies function?

COLLINS: I believe that educated, well-traveled, and open-minded Russians are concerned that their society isn’t functioning as well as others, is not as productive and not as good as some in re-populating itself. But I wonder how many countries do think a lot about their demographics and how to “control” these. We know what China has done about over-population. And Russian leaders have at various times offered incentives to induce people to have more children. But incentives alone probably won’t do: people need the optimism about the future and the material conditions of daily life that encourages them to have children – or more than one child, anyway. I believe they still have a high rate of abortion – and always did. That doesn’t help fertility even for the same person in the future. And the high level of abortion – or at least the low level of successful pregnancies – means that there are a lot of potential babies that people are choosing not to bring into the world for what they perceive to be good reasons. Demographers say that population growth is tied to people’s vision of the future and how hopeful they are about improving times. I don’t know if it is true or not, but it’s clear that Russians are not having a lot of kids. They are not replacing themselves. For the Slavic Russians, I should say. Muslim Russians do have more children.

Q: Were you getting any feel for the role of women in Russia today? For example one of the statistics that gets quoted was that the Soviet Union had so many women doctors. But doctors were fairly low down on the totem pole.

COLLINS: It was certainly true that the Soviets would advertise to the world how liberated their women were and used the example of doctors to support that. But it was also true that the average doctor had far less education than our doctors did and do – more like a graduate nurse or physician’s assistant – and that she did not garner major respect. The top doctors tended to be the researchers and surgeons and specialists at top hospitals – and I understood that most of them were men. There was not a lot a doctor could do in the delivery of everyday services in the absence or shortage of medicines and equipment (including antibiotics)– and sometimes even running water or sanitary conditions. Public health was also an issue. I should add that for all this advertising of how liberated women were, they did not emphasize how that also meant they were free to do “men’s work” – physical labor on construction sites, laying train tracks, digging ditches. They were the low paid unskilled physical labor. They also worked in the fields. They did the heavy lifting.

The funny thing about the position of Russian women was that they sometimes would have preferred – as feminists opposed – being “placed on a pedestal.” They didn’t have that luxury, one that many American women were beginning to question as they sought full equality, not being condescended to, treated differently. Men opening doors for you, holding your coat. Chivalry. But – it seems to me – it’s a hell of a lot better than being treated badly or without respect. Overall, I think many women believed that the men did not treat them very well, did not help in the home. But some of these generalizations may also be about “class” as well as other things: there were and are women and men academics, PhDs, other “white collar” professionals in whose lives things played out differently. Yet the Academies, at least in the past, had only a small percentage of women in top places, and not for lack of women PhDs. But much is shifting daily with the new economy and decline in or lack of “entitled” positions.

Q: You are speaking of the latest revolution?

COLLINS: Yes, since this recent revolution women have been able to move into leading organizations, not just serving as deputies – at a time of course that remuneration has gone down. With less ingrained institutional controls, there may be other opportunities. Different skills – like ingenuity and initiative are now finding homes. Jim became involved with a group of successful female entrepreneurs in the “new Russia.” His commercial attaché, a woman, did a tremendous job helping these women create professional networks, something we’ve had going for several decades in this country. Some of these women were not young, but were experienced professionals in math, science, and other fields, and had the skills to conceptualize, lead and manage. As soon as they could they went for it. The majority of women most likely had routine jobs, physical or office, and did the housework, shopping, and childrearing. Not much help from men in that – not culturally the norm for men to do “women’s work.”

Q: Good God.

COLLINS: And of course the women do both men’s and women’s work.

Q: Let’s turn to the Embassy. As the Ambassador’s wife did you find yourself filling the traditional role or doing it part time or what?

COLLINS: I found that it was a “damned if you do and damned if you don’t” dilemma. The view seemed to be that an Ambassador’s wife could be too interfering, too controlling, too bossy, too demanding, too intrusive, too participatory in her husband’s work, too into derived “power” and wanting to “run things.” I also heard that wives who pursued their own professional interests or detached from this role were too disinterested and selfish, too uninvolved, aloof, and uncaring, not community-spirited. Those are the extremes of course.

So I tried to imagine the ideal in being there: what could I do to contribute or make a difference ? If I were there full time, what would I add to the community? What, if anything, could I contribute to Russia – or U.S.- Russia relations – at a time like this? I reluctantly concluded that I could spend periods of time at the Embassy, participate while I was there, and of course provide Jim company, but that staying full time -- after all the years I had already spent in Russia – would not be a good choice.

Q: Well I would think at an Embassy such as Moscow's where to get outside the Embassy group you had to speak Russian, and a lot of the wives, I assume, did not... I would think that particularly junior level wives might feel left out, isolated. This is where somebody like the Ambassador's or DCM's wife can pick these people up and try to do something about that.

COLLINS: I think you're right about that need. I'm not sure I would have been the best person to do it. But I do agree that the Ambassador and his or her wife or husband ought to support the people in the community and especially the most vulnerable among them. I don't know if male spouses – husbands of female Ambassadors -- have been expected to play that role: much less seems to be expected of them.

Now I think they've professionalized some of the family issues in the Family Liaison Offices at the Embassies – one of the great reforms of this period. That office can also be a way to tap the talents of spouses who are good at family and community support, including those trained in social work and related fields. Of course whenever I have been living or staying at a consulate or embassy I did always come to know the people there and go to family events, picnics, holiday parties, and such. I found in Jordan, in a small post, that many of the wives were very unhappy indeed, and wished I would stay longer – but I knew that joining the unhappy group and trying to improve the morale was beyond my own abilities. It was a place with very limited outlets for creative energy. That said, you're right that many people – especially wives of male employees in early posts-- were unhappy, bored, isolated, lonely, and/or homesick. They don't always have the language; the Embassy employee works 24/7, and “dependent/spouses” are not in an environment in which a person can necessarily feel in control of her life. I have listened, but I have always felt helpless in being able to solve anything. Very little opportunity to have a voice as an Embassy spouse.

That said – we should not underestimate the number of spouses who have done a terrific job overseas and enjoyed living their lives abroad. Many have found interesting things to do; some worked with the FLO office in organizing outings, exploring new places as a group. And I hope by now they are not wasting the talents of qualified spouses to use as professionals at the Embassy to deal with marriage, alcohol, teenage, and other issues American families have abroad so that these families have access to equivalent services they would if they were at home. Because a lonely, left-alone wife in Amman or Moscow could hardly say – OK, I'll just go out to Tyson's Corner for a few hours...shop, get some pizza, go to a movie.

Q: That is where my wife is right now.

COLLINS: Very timely! And yesterday I had the urge for art, drove down to the National Gallery West building, and saw not only a current exhibit, but also the 17th century galleries, Dutch and Flemish paintings. Ten rooms. I loved it. This would have been impossible in Amman or Izmir, and harder to do in Moscow than here. Of course there is amazing fine art in Moscow, but access can be daunting. The queues, systems of acquiring tickets, taking the Metro or being stuck in traffic, make a spontaneous visit either difficult or less pleasurable. And for many wives overseas, such an excursion alone downtown can be a challenge. Especially – in the old days – as some babushka would likely be screaming at you about something you have or have not done but you're not sure exactly what she's saying which makes her even more angry and red in the face and screaming even more. Even with language ability, you come home drained.

Q: During the period you were there as the Ambassador's wife, was the equivalent of the KGB or the security service causing problems for the families there, the wives or children?

COLLINS : During the earlier period, of course, we were all so vulnerable to be set up. Entrapped. Especially when we were there as students. And certainly surveillance was rampant. And anything the KGB could collect for blackmail they sought. We were so young when we were tripped up in 1966, as described earlier. But we had been smart enough, young as we were at 23 and 26, to have agreed that nothing the Soviets could try to use against us was worse than being blackmailed itself; so no matter how bad a thing they might claim to either of us about the other, we would not allow it to be used against us with the other one. Of course for all the years we lived there , the KGB was on our tail. When they wanted to do surveillance they could choose whether to be conspicuous or not. I understand that surveillance and information gathering has not ended, but do not know whether they still employ entrapment. They probably kept an eye on Jim when he was Ambassador in part to see that he was not the victim of some ordinary street crime – which would be an embarrassment. So although he had no assigned security, and ran around alone in the Metro and on streets and at markets, he may have been shadowed.

Q: This is not a discrete question, but were there a lot of marital problems during the time you were there, with either husbands or wives going off on their own, finding other people – at a level it caused problems.

COLLINS : I wasn't close enough to the gossip when I was there as Ambassador's wife (who wants to talk to her?), but knew that Jim did have to deal with family issues when they became problematic– or when he learned about them. He was responsible by law for dealing even with most personal issues such as spousal or child abuse, alcohol or drug addiction, or other harmful behaviors. Some of those people were sent home. But for other transgressions, I expect that people everywhere when they are bored, unhappy, and lonely, and there's not a lot of joy, fun, or romance in the air, find other outlets.

Overall, the Moscow Embassy was not great for marriages, as we've discussed. While many survived, and some may have strengthened, many didn't make it. In fact even in our student years there, married graduate students often ended up unmarried ones.

Q: When you were there was there terrorism directed either at Americans or at the Russians?

COLLINS : I didn't much think about terrorism while we were there in the later 90's into 2000 because the timing was fortuitous for us, anyway. That is, by 9/11 we were no longer there. Jim had retired just weeks earlier. And the Chechen and other incidents, I believe, came later. I can't say what the Russians themselves focused on or feared during that period, but Jim probably knows what their concerns were. I know one of their long-term worries had been (and likely still is) their growing Muslim populations within Russia and on its borders. They may also be concerned with the pressure of Chinese population on their long border with China. And of course the Chechens with their willingness to commit violent acts.

Q: The theater.

COLLINS : The theater and also a school filled with children. The Russians have so many things to think about today. Some of the large issues from their perspective – beside security threats - are demographic questions, demography as tied to economic development. Declining population; low birthrate; low life expectancy; little to no immigration. How do you sustain an economy? Add to that other economic woes surrounding industry: how do you develop businesses beyond extraction industries? And the development of an economic infrastructure, legal and economic systems, contract enforcement, integrity of the legal process, to create a framework to provide confidence for investors. And we have discussed the challenges of inadequate agricultural output.

Q: Well, when I think about it, I can't think of a single thing outside of those nested dolls that I would want to buy from Russia. I realize there are things like fighter aircraft.

COLLINS : Yes, they are successful in producing heavy metal objects. I'm not sure whether they do more finished products than parts, but we know they can compete in the field of heavy metal. The other area in which they can be competitive is "human capital," as they say: real talent in mathematics, computer sciences, engineering and other fields. They have brainpower for today's knowledge-based world.. This is where the U.S. is falling behind, landing something like 23rd among the world's nations in math related fields. Whether they are making the best use of the talent they have – and taking advantage of a highly literate population and workforce overall-- is another question.

Q: You mention computer programmers. You hire them and they are an asset to whoever hires them. And a net loss to the place they come from.

COLLINS : "Brain drain" is always an issue in a country that cannot absorb its own educated and professional labor. With our more global "marketplace" today, brainpower becomes a more fluid commodity, crossing borders. But in this global market they also have to compete with others, such as India.

Q: Did you learn from the American community that is trying to do business there?

COLLINS : There is a lot of such business going on there. Thousands of American companies are doing business there. There is an American Chamber of Commerce whose annual Fourth of July parties had expanded to fill an entire park. And beyond the American companies are – of course – huge multinational corporations, like GE. We were there when the first American companies were just starting up. One of the first, McDonalds. Now I understand that Moscow contains a number of McDonald's most profitable restaurants in the world (outside the U.S.). And similarly for Pepsi Cola, for whom Russia is its biggest market (also outside the U.S.). These are nontrivial.

Q: McDonalds buys all of its stuff mostly from where?

COLLINS : They had to develop their own vertical industries there, their own farms (yes, Old McDonald's farms). They needed the right types of lettuce, the right size potatoes for long fries, the beef cattle for hamburgers, the right wheat for buns. For new industries starting up there, though, it's not so easy. Jim was involved with a couple of large efforts to grow chickens and to develop modern dairy farming. Venture capital was hard to obtain for all kinds of reasons. So, foreign investment, Russian investment, entrepreneurship, manufacturing, business-based agriculture, all are significant needs. And legal and financial infrastructure.

Jim continues to travel to Russia every couple of months to keep up with these developments. He also co-chairs the U.S.-Russia Foundation that supports entrepreneurship in Russia. He tends to be more of an optimist about the place than I am. He sees hope particularly in the young generations of people arising since 1991. I feel less optimistic because of my sense of their history, governance, demographics, and economics. I should add that the latent and blatant anti-Semitism in Russia – sometimes disguised as scapegoating and jailing oligarchs – is unlikely to improve the future of the country. Most countries have not made great strides after Jews were expelled or choose to migrate. And only time will tell what kind of governance is ahead there, with increasing authoritarian control. Cracking down on free thinking and views different from your own, your opposition, will never improve an economy or the quality of life, never help a country innovate or advance.

DAVID J. KRAMER
Senior Advisor to the Under Secretary for Global Affairs
Washington, DC (2001-2003)

Mr. Kramer was born and raised in Massachusetts and educated at Tufts and Harvard Universities. After serving with several government and private organizations in Washington, DC, he joined the Department of State, working with the Under Secretary of State for Global Affairs. He later was a member of the Policy Planning staff before joining the Bureau of Human Rights, Democracy and Labor, where he served as Assistant Secretary from 2008 to 2009. In 2009 Mr. Kramer joined the German Marshall Fund, and in 2010 became Executive Director of Freedom House in Washington, DC. Mr. Kramer was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2011.

KRAMER: I started June, 2001 and then I was at the State Department. Paula was in a meeting with a Mexican delegation at the time of the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

Q: Under Secretary of Global Affairs?

KRAMER: Yes.

Q: What did this entail?

KRAMER: I was her senior adviser. I focused on several different things. I focused on any issues dealing with the former Soviet Union because that was my background. I also focused on the issue of HIV/AIDS which was gaining more attention in the Bush administration and involved working closely with colleagues in the OES Bureau as well as in the White House's Office of AIDS Policy and was involved, I certainly won't say played a major role but played a minor role in helping to put together the PEPFAR Initiative, the president's major HIV/AIDS initiative for countries around the world.

I also helped the undersecretary with personnel issues and got somewhat involved, although I wasn't front and center on the issue of trafficking of persons which was an issue that was getting more attention. A new office had been created at the State Department dealing with the GTIP as it is called; G standing for global affairs. That's where I reported, straight to the undersecretary and provided general advice to help Paula with writing articles and speeches and so on.

Q: Your boss was Paula Dobriansky?

KRAMER: Exactly.

Q: What was her background?

KRAMER: I believe she started as an intern at the NSC under Brzezinski and then worked in the Reagan administration and the Bush Senior administration and I believe her last job at that point was as a DAS in what was I guess called the HR Bureau, the Human Rights Bureau at that time. She then left and wound up at the Council on Foreign Relations directing their Washington office. CFR rented space from the Carnegie Endowment and so I would see Paula occasionally. She also had a background in Russian and Eurasian affairs and so we would often see each other at meetings so we got to know each other in the '90s, became friends and then when I told her I had left Carnegie, she very nicely put me in touch with the chairman of the U.S. Advisory Commission. Then when she joined the Bush administration in May of 2001, she then asked me to join her in her office as her senior adviser.

Q: You were there for how long?

KRAMER: I was in the G office, as it is called, the Global Affairs Office, from June, 2001 until October, 2003.

Q: As a Russian expert did you sense that we were probably, when push comes to shove, were paying more attention to Russia because of what it had been than what it was? It was no longer the great menace. The great menace in a way has been described as Ivory Coast with missiles. It is living off a reputation if you are looking at it globally, it is not that big a deal or not? Correct me if I am wrong.

KRAMER: I agree in part with what you are saying. In 2001 George Bush came into office intent on trying to establish a good relationship with his counterpart in Moscow, Vladimir Putin. In the famous Ljubljana meeting he had with him he made the comment of how he looked into Putin's soul or looked into his eyes and could see his soul, a line that he never really lived down. He was interested in improving bilateral relations.

I think that paid off when he wanted to abrogate from the ABM treaty. He got Putin's support when U.S. forces went into Afghanistan through Central Asia and even in the initial round of or the next round of NATO enlargement, Russian objections weren't that serious.

It then started to deteriorate I think both because of the deteriorating situation inside of Russia on human rights exemplified most notably by the arrest of Khodorkovsky in 2003 but also with Russian opposition to the war in Iraq. Of course, Russia wasn't the only country to be opposed to it.

Russia did start to rebound under Putin, largely thanks to the increase in the price of oil which meant that Russia's importance in the world did increase in the past decade.

I think your point is a valid one which is that even in the '90s but including the early Bush period the focus was as much on what Russia had been as much as it was or is or would be.

Q: Talk a bit about the HIV program. I think one of the things that Bush II is not given much credit for is the fact that he really pushed this.

KRAMER: Yes, absolutely. It is an issue that he cared deeply about. There were two aspects to it; one was an international organization set up called the Global Fund to Combat HIV/AIDS/TB and Malaria. The U.S. played a critical role in founding that and providing seed money for it.

At the same time the president also launched his own U.S. initiative called the PEPFAR program for AIDS relief as part of his presidential initiative for prevention and AIDS relief. It was a real breakthrough in terms of focusing U.S. attention on trying to staunch the spread of HIV/AIDS, particularly in Africa but not just in Africa; in Southeast Asia and other places. It focused on, I think, a dozen countries, initially to provide significant assistance in getting preventive measures in place, for treatment and also for dealing with issues like condoms and others. The condom issue was a very controversial one in the Bush administration.

I agree. I think that this was an initiative that the president deserves great credit for and I think also President Obama does as well because he has continued it in this administration. It is one of those issues that had bipartisan support.

Q: Why would the condom issue be a, this is for historical purposes. A condom is a condom. What's the big deal about it?

KRAMER: Some people didn't like the idea that you would be distributing condoms, that they encourage sexual activity outside of marriage so there were those concerns about it.

Q: Was this mainly the Catholic Church?

KRAMER: It wasn't only. I think that the church had some issues with it. There were certain conservative factions, I think it is fair to say, that also had issues with it. At the same time part of the program was distributing condoms so not withstanding concerns or objections, it still happened.

Q: I interviewed Prudence Jones and she was in Africa Bureau and they were, one of the brands they were circulating says, 'Use prudence', you know.

KRAMER: Exactly.

Q: How did you see your bureau interacting with the rest of the Department? I have talked to people who worked for the Human Rights Bureau early on under Patt Derian and she sort of inserted herself rather strongly but became quite effective. How did it work with you?

KRAMER: In the case say of HIV/AIDS the OES Bureau, the Oceans, Environment and Science Bureau played the key, the lead role so my role was more as advisory and helping out, providing the support at the undersecretary level. The OES front office including; Bud Rock who was a P/DAS at that time and Ken Brill who had been involved and then later John Turner, working very closely with Jack Chow who was a DAS responsible for international health. He and his team including Judith Kaufman who was terrific and a number of other people were involved; Bill Dilday who is still working at the office dealing with international AIDS. They were the ones leading the charge. I was simply helping them out in a supporting and advisory role. Sometimes they would need the help from the undersecretary's office so I was able to provide that but Jack and his team were really the ones who were intimately involved in all this, including dealing with the setup of the global fund to combat HIV/AIDS/TB and malaria. OES was very important.

Then when the White House created this new office to deal with the PEPFAR Program it kind of took the issue of HIV/AIDS out of OES and so OES kind of lost one of its key functions in launching all this work on HIV/AIDS. It was set up in an office that was essentially autonomous and run by somebody who reported directly to the secretary.

Q: How did you find in dealing in the bureaucracy of the State Department? The secretary and Paula, how did they get along?

KRAMER: Secretary Powell and Paula? They seemed to get along fine. They got along very well I think and then Paula had, Paula was there for all eight years. Paula had a reputation of getting along with everybody. Everyone liked Paula. She is a very decent person, smart person, very active, very energetic and so I think she and the secretary had a good relationship.

Q: I guess the African Bureau would be where the center of HIV business was although Asia was beginning to show up but there were some trouble spots in Africa, weren't there?

KRAMER: There were. It is working with the Africa Bureau most closely but most of that work done with the regional bureaus was done by OES so I wasn't directly involved in that kind of activity unless there were problems between OES and the regional bureaus and then I would try to weigh in in any way to be helpful but AF was certainly a major focus of it.

Q: Where did your bureau look in congress? Did you have sort of a constituency or connections to congress?

KRAMER: When I was working for Paula at that point the main interaction would be between Paula and members of congress or even staff so she would be the one front and center. I would be involved in it. I would meet with staff on the Hill but she would, I would go with her. I would help her with this. She would meet with members on trafficking in persons and other kinds of things.

That was a controversial issue at the time. There were some concerns about where that office was going so it wasn't just about the HIV/AIDS initiative. Jack Chow also played an important role on the Hill in interacting with them, explaining to them the administration's thinking and plans for dealing with the HIV/AIDS issue.

Q: Well, as you were looking at Russia, had been looking at it for a long time, what was your impression during the time you were in Global Affairs of where things were going in Russia?

KRAMER: I was concerned even before I joined Paula's office when Putin became president. He's a guy who came up through the KGB ranks and usually if you get somebody with a KGB background that he had you are not going to get someone who is enamored with democracy and human rights. I was concerned early on.

That concern was reinforced in the time I was working in the Global Affairs office as Putin began to take over the TV stations, nationwide TV stations which in retrospect was a brilliant move on his part because TV is the main means by which Russians get their news and information. That meant that the state controlled what Russians were seeing and hearing.

I was concerned early on about where Russia was going. You have to keep in mind too in 1999, again before I started in the government Russia had reinvaded Chechnya in the north Caucasuses and terrible abuses were taking place in that war. That was under Yeltsin. It started under Yeltsin before Putin became president. I was very worried about where that was going, about the situation inside the country, about Putin's efforts to concentrate and centralize power and I would say those concerns would turn out to be very warranted in light of where he went.

Q: Looking at it in the long run, Russia has never really had a democratic government. In mega terms did you see this as a perhaps a necessary step towards getting somewhere or maybe a complete reverse?

KRAMER: In the '90s when I was at Carnegie I was not one who thought that Russia under Yeltsin was becoming a wonderful democracy. I thought Russia in the '90s was a bit of a mess. I think most Russians would agree with that assessment. It was a time of chaos, weakness. The Soviet Union collapsed. They were left with half the population. They were going through economic turmoil and financial dislocation, the ruble plummeted, the financial crisis of '98 and on and on and on. Russia in the '90s was not a thriving democracy. I think those who at that time were describing Russia as a democracy were actually discrediting the concept and notion of democracy. Most Russians, if that was democracy to them, they didn't like it.

I think if you start from that basis, then I think what we have seen under Putin has not been a step in the right direction. Putin owes a lot to Russia's revival, to an outside force to which he had no influence; the price of oil, exactly right.

If the price of oil had shot up as high as it did under Yeltsin, Yeltsin would have been a very popular president, I dare say. Putin benefited from that tremendously and as a result, his numbers went up. Meanwhile, he made sure he kept the opposition down and dealt with any potential threats. So you had people who were getting killed who posed any serious challenge, including journalists and opposition figures. It wasn't just inside Russia's borders as we saw with Mr. Litvinenko in 2006 or 2007. He was killed in the UK, poisoned with polonium. You have the leader of Chechnya, Mr. Kadyrov who kills opponents, wherever they may be. This is a problem not just within Russia's borders. It is a problem beyond as well.

Q: You left Global Affairs in?

KRAMER: October, 2003 so right before I started in Policy Planning, right before the arrest of Khodorkovsky in October of 2003.

Q: Then where did you go?

KRAMER: I was in Policy Planning for a little less than two years and I focused largely on Russia Eurasia issues at that time. Barry Lowenkron was the acting director. Richard Haas had been the first director in the Bush administration. He left in 2002. Barry hired me. Mitchell Reiss came on as the director and Barry returned as deputy director and my focus was on Russia and Eurasian issues.

Q: Policy Planning has gone through a whole series of things. George Kennan thought, he established it. It is basically going to be whither the next ten years or something of the State Department and then at a certain time, it turned into speech writing.

KRAMER: Speech writing. Sometimes it ran the building. With Dennis Ross, I would say, it was possibly at its most influential.

Q: How stood it when you were there?

KRAMER: It was more of a think-tank, I think for the secretary but at the same time I think Policy Planning staffs have this challenge all the time; you risk getting sucked into the day to day stuff which means you have less time to do the sort of stepping back and thinking long-term. I think that was true when I was there. We would often get sucked into the day to day.

You have to keep in mind when I started there the Iraq war was very much front and center and so there was a lot of focus on that. In my part of the world there was this concern that was growing about the human rights abuses in Russia, the centralization of power and the problem of corruption in Russia too.

Policy Planning, I enjoyed it. It was kind of like a think-tank job inside the government where you would write policy memos. Your audience instead of the public at large was the secretary of state. Unlike in a think-tank, you could deal with classified information.

So I enjoyed it. How much influence we had, I am not sure to be perfectly honest.

Q: Did you find yourself in competition with INR or not?

KRAMER: No. I worked closely with INR. The people who do Russia in INR are terrific and so I found INR actually to be a valuable resource and I let them do the intel and the analysis and I tried to focus more on what it all meant for policy. I worked closely and well with the folks in INR. That, by the way, continued when I moved on to my other jobs. I think INR is a really great bureau.

MELISSA SANDERSON
Deputy Minister Counselor for Science
Moscow (2001-2003)

Ms. Sanderson was born and raised in Ohio and educated at Xavier University. Entering the Foreign Service in 1985, she had several tours of duty at the State Department in Washington, DC and served abroad in Guadalajara, Ottawa, Madrid, Warsaw, San Salvador, Moscow and Kinshasa. She was a Polish speaking officer and a specialist in Technology and Arms Control matters. Ms. Sanderson was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

Q: Where were you located? You know, there's been this back and forth about an embassy there for a long time. How did things stand at the time?

SANDERSON: Oh yeah, we were in the so-called "new embassy" in the compound. It was an interesting structure because the first several floors of that building could only be used by unclassified groups. So you know, we had USAID in there. We had a couple of other agencies in there that only dealt with unclassified matters. And then the remaining floors above were all secure areas. So you had coded badges and elevator codes and so forth. And you didn't have any Russian nationals working on the secure floors. So for instance, the Political Section Russian FSNs (Foreign Service National) were all on the lower levels, the unclassified Econ FSNs, et cetera. Everybody was down on those levels. And then it was Americans only in the skiff areas.

Q: This of course is the aftermath of the extensive placements by the KGB (Komitet Gosudarstvennoy Bezopasnosti (Committee for State Security)) of listening devices in the building of the new embassy.

SANDERSON: Oh absolutely. I mean there was debate, if I recall at one point, about whether to just tear down the structure and start over again. And then the decision was made that no, you know, that was extremely costly and there was a way to work around it by making it unclassified only and then having absolutely no one but the Army Corps of Engineers work on the remaining part of the building. And that was how we were able to ensure that that would be a secure zone.

Q: What was your section like. I mean how big was it?

SANDERSON: Well, let me think now. Debbie was in charge. That was my girlfriend, Debbie Linde. She was the Minister Counselor. Then there was me, then there was Penny Sachez who was attached to our staff from DOD (Department of Defense). Then we had Ellen Germain and two other people. So we had six officers and we had a couple of rotational experts in from Washington. So it was -- the staff was eight total, but six on permanent assignment and two rotational.

Q: What were your major concerns, you yourself?

SANDERSON: Me, I was dealing with two parts of our efforts over there. And the first was our program for providing alternative economic employment to Russian scientists who previously had been doing weapons of mass destruction research. And secondly, the environmental programs. I also did some site inspection visits because the office also was part of that effort of making sure that all treaty matters were being fully complied with. But I did a lot with environmental stuff, taking a look at whether the pipelines that were being built were going to cut off the reindeer migration paths, for instance. And I got to visit Chukotka at the extreme tip of Russia right across from Alaska to take a look at conflicts between fishing fleets. Because ordinarily that might have been strictly in Econ, but it was also an issue for us because sometimes Russian fishing fleets have more than one mission at a time. And while I was up there I also got to meet with Russian scientists to talk about the health of the Russian Tundra and I met with aboriginal leaders and talked about reindeer herds and livelihoods and traditional lifestyles and I met with the governor and talked about the provincial economy and why governors should have more power and the Kremlin should have less. Does that sound like a famous debate? (laughs)

Q: Well, you know, I kind of wonder, I mean this is interesting, but I mean was this just to get information or were we trying to get the Russians to do more and these various things?

SANDERSON: It was largely trying to get the Russians to do more because you know, when you have large polluted areas of Russia inevitably you have problems in the atmosphere, you have problems in the water, you have problems in soil that transfers to other countries through agricultural products or through prevailing winds or through fish. So we were actually trying to get the Russians to pay more attention to environmental issues in order to improve global welfare.

Q: Well, how are the Russians responding to -

SANDERSON: (laughs) Oh, you know them. They don't like anybody implying that anything is less than perfect -

Q: Yes.

SANDERSON: -- in their great mother country. So it was actually an interesting time to be in Russia because we had just finished one of our little tit for tat exercises where they threw out some of our diplomats and we threw out some of theirs. And as a matter fact that was how I got my position. It opened up very unexpectedly because my predecessor was PNGed (Persona Non Grata) from Russia. So it was a really interesting time to be there. I mean of course I was followed everywhere by the KGB. And they made no bones about it. They were very obvious. It's part of their psychological tactics. And part of your briefing before you go to Embassy Moscow is you're briefed that this kind of thing is going to happen and you're told if you don't think that you can deal with being under constant surveillance we'll give you another assignment, you just shouldn't go there. And a lot of people did leave the embassy each year, because once they got there they found that they really couldn't take that. But it didn't bother me. I would just -- I would be like oh yeah, there they are (laughs). They're not going to find anything interesting from me, I'm going to buy some souvenirs (laughs).

Q: Well, I've talked to people who've been in that and they say actually it wasn't bad because they knew if they had a blow-out of a tire or something like that they could -- usually help would be on its way.

SANDERSON: Well, sometimes. That actually is a false perception because that's only true sometimes. I actually was on the Metro in Moscow one time and just by coincidence a colleague got on the same car on the train, a colleague from the embassy. And this was an African American colleague and there were some skinhead types in that car. And they started hassling our guy. And you could tell who his two shadowers were, but they didn't do a thing to step in and help him out. Fortunately, when we got off -- he was getting off at the next station -- there was a cop right there on the platform, so the skinheads didn't follow him off. But yeah, most of the time they wouldn't help you because even though they were supposed to be obvious they weren't supposed to interact with you. They were just supposed to be there to try to, you know, make you nervous.

Q: How would you say relations were between the United States and Russia at the time?

SANDERSON: Kind of tense. We were going through one of those periods where Putin was trying to put his hand on a lot of things and very much a Russian patriot, very much determined that, you know, the great Mother Russia will rise from the ashes. And therefore, making a lot of difficulties in relations across the spectrum. We were trying to deal with Russia-Iran, Russia-Pakistan, Russia-Kyoto Accords, which of course is a very timely topic today, Russian trade barriers, corruption in Russia that was affecting U.S. businesses. And basically, you know, Russia didn't want to hear about any of those things. It was kind of like they wanted to go their own way. But I'll tell you something very important about Russia. 9/11 happened very shortly after I got there. The fact is I was actually in Tver because when I first was transferred to Russia I did a direct transfer from El Salvador to Russia, and the Department decided that that would be fine because I already spoke Polish and so they felt if they put me a intensive Russian class in a domestic environment that I could, you know, pick up the Russian based on my Polish language. So when I first got to Russia I was sent to the town of Tver, which at one point in Russia's history had actually been the capital of Russia. It's not very far from Moscow, maybe it was -- I think it was like an hour and fifteen minute drive. And I was staying with a family there in their apartment and going to language classes at the institute during the day and then coming home to speak Russian with my family at night. And that's where I was on 9/11. I was in Tver. And I had just walked in the door of our family apartment and the mother of the family, Nadia, she met me at the door and she, she just started hugging me. And she was like, you know, "Oh my God, oh my God."

I said, "What happened?"

And she replied, "Come and see."

And it was on the TV in their living room and it was the first plane strike. And while I was watching that the actual, the second plane strike happened. And I just remember sitting on the couch with tears streaming down my face and her sitting beside me holding me and rocking me. And her husband Vitali came home and sat down with me and their daughter came in and Nadia went and fixed food and drink and we all sat in front of the TV and basically cried together and just couldn't believe it. And the real point that I wanted to make in this story is that Russia was the first country in the world to try to send help to the United States. They had their planes full of food and firefighters and rescue workers in the air less than an hour and a half after the attack, and they were already on the way when Washington made its decision that we just weren't going to let anybody, no matter who, not the British, not anybody, that we didn't want -- that we weren't in a position to accept help at that particular time. But it's important for everybody to know that Russia was the first. And Russians piled the embassy walls with flowers and prayers and they stood outside the embassy with their candles lit, singing and crying and praying for America. And that's something that most Americans don't know.

Q: Yes, that's very moving. It is an aspect that sort of has been neglected.

SANDERSON: Well, of course Russia has suffered its own terrible terrorist attack, some of which took place when I was in Moscow. Among the ones that stick in my mind was the bombing of one theater and the hostage taking at another theater and the bombing of a school. All of those things took place while I was there because of the Chechnyan conflict. And so Russians understand what it is to suffer the death of innocent people in terrorist attacks. And that's why they just reached out so instantly and so wholeheartedly, because they really could understand, maybe more than a lot of other nations in the world, what it was that we were going through that terrible day. And I always tell everybody that because, you know, political relations ebb and flow, but that was absolutely a great day in Russian-American relations when they reacted the way that they did when they, they came out for us and stood by us. And it had a long-term impact as well. It really improved our dialogue on issues like anti-terrorism. It really got the Russians looking at believing in what we had told them about interconnectivity. And the Russians turned out to be very helpful to us in identifying al-Qaeda, because there were connections that they knew about into Chechnya. So that was, it was really something. And of course for me on the personal level, I mean I couldn't get a phone call out, you know, to my family because all the phone lines were just jammed. And I did finally get a phone call through to the embassy to ask what should I do, do you want me to stand pat, do you want me to come to the embassy, what do you want me to do? And of course, you know, literally nobody knew. So you I was told just stand pat. And so, you know, I froze in place and stayed with my family in Tver.

Q: Well, as you traveled about off to the provinces what was -- you know, Moscow's Moscow, I mean it's a major center. But the provinces in Russia, there's a tremendous divide, isn't there?

SANDERSON: Oh, Russia is absolutely two countries. And those two countries are the urban zones of Moscow and St. Petersburg, versus the rest of the country. The former is the modern, beautiful Russia, the Russia that Putin and others want us to see. And then there's the real Russia, the rural reality. I mean, you take my family in Tver, it's a great example. Vitali was an ex-military officer; he'd been in the Air Force. And so they had by Russian standards a large apartment on an upper floor in a building, and probably at one point it was really, really luxurious. But when I was there the electricity was off more often than it was on, and often there was no hot water as a result, and that meant no heat either. The cities, including Moscow, are heated by hot water pumped through these massive pipes above the ground. And by the way, every year throughout the country thousands of Russians die because they get intoxicated and they fall against these pipes and they're scalded to death. I mean that's how hot they are. But in Tver a lot of times the pumps were broken, so the hot water could not be circulated. I remember sleeping under, you know, six blankets that my family basically piled on top of me. And believe me, once you went to bed you didn't get up. You were just like, "Hey bladder, you have to hold it!" because you're not getting out, it's too cold! Because there was no hot water, every morning Nadia had to get up and boil water on a little brazier in the kitchen because the electricity only works certain hours. And so she had to get up and boil water on a little brazier in the kitchen in this apartment that was on the twelfth floor of a fourteen-story building. So think of all the little coal braziers in that building. So when Vitali got up, he got the first bath, he would have hot water. And then I got second bath and so I would have some hot water. And then after she would cook the breakfast she would heat more water so she could have her bath. And I saw even, you know, even more primitive than that in some places up in the Urals. It was really remarkable. People were living in places that had plywood on the roofs and the windows because they hadn't received any building materials in, you know, 40 years. So the buildings were falling down. The roads were abysmal. There's definitely the first world Russia of Moscow and St. Petersburg, and then there's the third world Russia where most Russians live. And the further away you get from the capital the worse off you are. You get to Yekaterinburg, which is a big city, and you're -- it's like being in -- well, it's like being in San Salvador before the earthquake. You've got places where the sewage pipes are broken and you've got sewage running down roads. It's remarkable. It's the Russia that the authorities don't want anybody to see.

Q: Were you getting from your conversations or anything a feeling that there was I mean a sense of loss because of all the Stans and all, which had belonged to the Soviet Empire and now they were gone? Or was there a feeling of almost relief that we're rid of these people? Give me a feel for the situation.

SANDERSON: You know, it's an interesting question because Russians are, even in little villages, intensely political creatures. And also intensely patriotic, which is something that they have in common with Americans. And again, it's something that we don't necessarily think of. Most of my Russian friends, you know, I had friends that I went to their dachas on the weekend, the country places when the weather was good. This is a Russian phenomenon. Everybody flees the city for the countryside. Russians themselves joke that all Russians are peasants at heart. They're not really comfortable living in the cities. And once the snow gets low enough to make it possible to get to the countryside people start going every weekend to their country place. And their country place could be a two-room shack, but the point is it's out in the countryside and they're breathing the clean air and they grow their own vegetables and they fish in the streams and they walk for hours through the woods collecting mushrooms and stuff. And that's where you have your most interesting conversations with people is in these little villages and in the dachas. And in those conversations the Russians I've met, the ordinary Russians, were kind of like, you know, "We never wanted all of that anyway. That's not what Russia is. Russia's our mother and Russia is our place, and we are so proud to have been born here in Russia. But we don't understand why our leaders wanted to run out and grab all these other places. They're not Russia and we don't need them! They're not Russia!" And so it's good that they are their own free people again, because they are who they are and we are Russians. So there was a very sharp division between the, the -- what the political class would say, you know, about oh well, political evolution and, you know, radical liberalism and stuff, and what between average Russians who would say "That never did make any sense anyway. Those people aren't us. Those Uzbeks, they're not Russians. These Kazaks, they're not Russians. So why should they have to be inside of our country? They should go live in their own country, we are Russians." So it was always a very interesting topic of conversation.

Q: Yes. Did you get into conversations about the political structure of -- concern about -- well, this is during the period of Yeltsin, isn't it?

SANDERSON: No, actually it's just at the end of Yeltsin and then Putin came in in his first presidency right toward the end of my tour there.

Q: How were they viewing him?

SANDERSON: Putin was very, very much admired. He was regarded as a brilliant, young, forceful leader dedicated to restoring Mother Russia to the prestige and respect that she deserved. Very much viewed as a religious man, at least at that time, his principle advisor was actually an orthodox priest. They had grown up together and that particular orthodox priest could change Putin's mind overnight. If he really said no to something Putin would change course. So he was regarded as a man who listens to the voice of God, a real patriot, a man who would fight for Mother Russia, a Russian who was proud to be Russian. There was of course some tension from the fact that he's a St. Petersburg, and of course there's that long standing traditional rivalry between Moscow and St. Petersburg. But by and large, at that time everyone was very pro-Putin.

Q: All of you at the embassy, you personally, but wither? Was there an effort on the part of the Americans at the embassy not to sort of boast about American or, you know, as a matter of triumphalism or anything? I mean was this of concern to us?

SANDERSON: Oh yeah, absolutely. You know, it was never considered to be in the best interest of the United States or in the best interest of world peace for that matter to gloat over the downfall of Russia or to make Russia feel small or poor. As a matter of fact, there was a concerted effort to do otherwise, to, show Russia that it still mattered, to treat it respectfully, to try to engage with Russia as a partner and try to draw them into a whole host of global issues so that we could get past the old Cold War animosities without making Russia feel that it was being imposed upon. Because certainly the Russians had made it clear already that they weren't going to be imposed upon by anybody. They had those sensitivities and they were wearing them on their sleeves effectively speaking. And our policy was to do everything that we could to not make Russia feel small or poor or anything else.

Q: In your conversations and all did China come up as a factor?

SANDERSON: Oh, absolutely. The Russians are very aware every minute of every day that they have a very complicated neighborhood. They worry about the Chinese, they worry about Poland, they worried about Iran, they worried about their incredibly large Muslim population and feeling that they didn't really have a good handle on that. They worried about NATO (North American Treaty Organization) Forces stationed in Poland. They worried about being overrun by China. Russians are a very historically minded people, and they will tell you that, you know, Russia has at moments in its history been overcome by some of its neighbors, but Russia has always remained Russia. And they're very, very proud of that. That sooner or later Russia always emerges stronger than before and Russia always remains Russia. But yeah, they for sure are constantly looking over each shoulder and overhead waiting for the next enemy to encroach.

Q: Well, why would Poland be much of a factor?

SANDERSON: Well, you know, at that time NATO expansion was still relatively new and it was an ongoing process. And you know, during the first round of NATO expansion, which included Poland, Czech Republic, and Hungary, NATO decided to base some aircrafts and so forth in Poland. And at that time when I was in Russia, Poland was also gaining entry to the European Union. And so increasingly Russians were seeing historical Western European enemies sitting right on the doorstep inside the Polish borders. And it was making them very wary of Poland emerging as an Eastern European power. And of course there was a point in Russian history, you know, when the Polish empire was stronger than the Russians and Poland overran Russia, and the Poles subjugated Russia for something like 25, 35 years. So again, Russians are highly historical creatures. And what they're seeing -- what they were seeing at that time at least is that with the help of Western Europe Poland was being put into a position where once again it could potentially threaten to dominate Russia. So they were keeping a close eye on all of those linkages.

Q: Was there any concern about a new Germany being a threat?

SANDERSON: No, the Russians weren't particularly worried about Germany. They watched with great interest the dynamics inside of the EU (European Union). And at least some of my friends seemed to find it kind of amusing that everybody within the EU was so hyper about Germany and intent on keeping Germany down.

Q: What about the Near East and all? I mean all the problems there.

SANDERSON: Well, of course that was a time when Russia was still very heavily engaged with Pakistan and also with Iran. And it was one of the sort of neuralgic points in Russian-U.S. relations that despite, despite Russias assistance to us at 9/11 we felt that Russia was also maintaining ties to state-sponsored terrorism. And particularly in the area of weapons of mass destruction we were deeply concerned that Russia was helping Iran to develop its nuclear program. And Pakistan as well, but of course particularly Iran. So that was definitely an issue in our relationship.

Q: Well, did you find that the people you talked to were siding with sort of the Palestinian side, although many of the Israelis now are of Russian origin?

SANDERSON: Yeah. I mean there's quite a few Russian Jews in Israel. And probably in large part because of that, Russian people didn't talk a lot about the Israel-Palestine thing. They didn't seem to see the analogy, either on one side or the other, of a people sort of fighting to be free that would have possibly raised some sentiments within Russian hearts. Because they view themselves as a people fighting to be free. Folks that I talked to in terms of Middle East, their interests were Afghanistan of course, because Russians still rankle at that whole Afghanistan debacle. Iran, Iraq, because the Russians were watching very closely the sort of rubbing against each other of Iran and Iraq. Russians were successfully playing with Syria to try to drive that Iran-Iraq problem in a direction they wanted it to go. So I mean their principle zones of engagement were those areas much more so than directly the Israeli-Palestine thing.

Q: Well, turning to your, your job focus, what were we doing to keep Soviet scientists from mucking around with the Near East in chemical and nuclear weapons?

SANDERSON: The U.S. had a really interesting program where we would actually provide funding for alternative research. So let's as a concrete example say that some scientists who used to be at weapons centers would then be working at the University of Moscow and maybe doing research on genetic mutations to make food supplies more sustainable in a drought instead of working on genetic mutations that would be related to biological weapons. Or conversely, you know, for scientists that might have been working on chemical weapons, we would be working cooperatively with U.S. and Russian companies in providing funding to give those scientists jobs working to improve, for example, the nature of gasoline in order to make it more fuel efficient in cars and reduce emissions. A lot of research that goes on in Russia under this kind of program winds up in the private sector around the world, improving life for people. And of course it's not well advertised, but it's actually a very successful program.

Q: Well, were we seeing a significant siphoning off of some of the talent toward Iran or Pakistan or elsewhere?

SANDERSON: Several Russian scientists had already made a decision to go in that direction before the official end of the Cold War, so certainly we were aware that there was a body of scientific expertise in those sort of countries that essentially had fled the Soviet Union before the collapse of the union. And of course, being that our relationships are what they are with those countries in question we didn't have very good means to access those scientists.

Q: Well, what about on the environmental side? Were we able to do anything -- I don't have my maps with me, but is it the Caspian Sea. What was happening there?

SANDERSON: You know, the Russian Caspian Sea Fleet from the old Soviet Union days had essentially just been sailed into harbor and abandoned. So what we had was a lot of former military ships that were not only leaking fuel into the Caspian, but also in some cases from the submarine fleet radioactive materials. And so we had a very extensive effort underway to decommission properly the naval fleet of the Caspian Sea and then also a massive clean-up effort, a multinational clean-up effort to try to deal with the elements that had already deposited. And we cooperated with the Russian Fisheries Ministry to set limits in those areas and put in place monitors right on the fishing vessels by which the catch could be monitored for radiation. On shore we were doing something very similar. We had radiation monitors in a lot of the markets. Even in Moscow we had things where they were right at the entrance to the market and as the trucks loaded with produce would come in they would drive through these scanners. And if, you know, anything redlined that truck would be pulled aside and its load examined case-by-case to detect where the contamination was and those supplies would be destroyed. We had, for instance, in the city of Moscow a really successful environmental intervention. One of Russia's largest nuclear facilities is right in the heart of Moscow and it's an older facility and there were quite a few concerns that it was beginning to leak into the ground water of the city. Contamination had been detected in about a 20-mile radius around, and of course these are all apartment buildings. They were talking about tens of thousands of city inhabitants. And we were able to do a very good remediation project to clean up that water and to seal the leakage. So all of those sorts of efforts fell under the environmental rubric. And we had a very active program with Russia, a very cooperative program in that regard.

Q: You know, back in the days of the Cold War we had an exchange program with the Soviet Union in which we sent people to the Soviet Union who specialized in Slavic literature and church art and that sort of thing, and the Soviets were sending their people to our science labs, which made us very nervous. Had there been a -- was there an exchange program going on and was it changing at all?

SANDERSON: We did have an exchange program, it ran in two forms. We had an exchange program for scientists; for instance, Russian scientists might go to a Monsanto laboratory to study what we're doing with plastics to make them more environmentally friendly. And at the same time, an American scientist would be invited to a Russian company or to a Russian university. So we had exchanges of that sort between the private sector and also between university sectors. We were trying on a very, very limited scale some scientific cooperation government-to-government, again working largely on environmental issues. That one was in its infancy when I was there, so I don't know how it's gone. But yeah, we were still having those kinds of exchanges, and of course cultural exchanges. We were doing a lot of cultural exchanges, bringing, you know, Russian ballet groups to the U.S., bringing American musical groups to Russia, et cetera, for the cultural bridge building. It's a very active program.

Q: The Soviets, I'm using the term at the time, had these sort of science cities out way beyond the Urals and all, doing all sorts of stuff. And they were off limits to a lot of citizens in the country and all. I mean were these opening up, and did you get out to these places?

SANDERSON: Yes, the vast majority of them were opening up at least a little bit to outsiders. The Urals are a very funny part of Russia, because they're the borderlands. They're literally standing between the heart of Mother Russia and these outlying countries whose populations aren't even considered by most Russians to be Russian. So between that and a not very attractive climate we don't have a lot of Russians who naturally would want to gravitate toward the Urals anyway. But importantly, the Russian government had stopped the travel restrictions, so if ordinary Russians wanted to go and look for a job in one of the planned cities in the Urals, they could do so. And foreigners increasingly were able to go there. I mean obviously those were highly programmed. You know, you had to apply months in advance, the dates were set, when you arrived you were met by the officials, they still took your passport away from you so you couldn't go wandering around wherever you wanted, you had to stay with your guide. But yes, you could actually go there. And we were doing inspection visits there. Also in Siberia, same thing; we were able to go to these places. So it was, it was a big step forward. It really was. Because until just a few years before that there was no possibility for any of us to go there, and certainly not for any, you know, Russians to voluntarily go there. If you happened to have studied a necessary skill you might find yourself plunked down there, but yeah, that had pretty much changed.

Q: Well, I would think it would be a tremendous leakage of these cities, these sort of science cities stuck in the middle of nowhere. People want to get back to the cool spots of St. Petersburg and Moscow.

SANDERSON: Not -- actually, you'd be surprised because by and large the housing in the science cities is superior to that which the average person would find in St. Petersburg or Moscow. And by average person I'm including scientists. So they provided better housing, they made sure that, you know, the schools were among the very best. Because of course they were educating the children of the scientists. And you got frequent trips to St. Petersburg or Moscow. So you know, you weren't just stuck out in the hinterlands. You had these deluxe accommodations and high quality schools and frequent trips to the big city where you could shop and spend your money, because of course the salaries were substantially higher. I mean the new Russian policy was to incentivize scientists to stay in these areas because they'd already made such a capital investment building the planned cities. So it was actually kind of interesting. You didn't see people sort of fleeing en masse. Of course the other reality is there's not a lot of alternative demand for scientists because the Russians have concentrated too heavily on building a huge scientific class, you know, that were dedicated to certain kinds of research. It's very hard in any economy, even in the United States economy, to find alternative viable employment for people in this very high category. So it was also a disincentive to leave, because it was like hey, if I leave I really won't be doing anything, so I better stay where at least I can still do some research.

Q: What fields outside of -- what fields did you find that Russian science was particularly adept at?

SANDERSON: They're extremely good at both biological and chemical elements. They've done a lot more in many ways with genetics than Western countries have. And part of that goes back of course to history and wanting to understand the origins of where Russians come from and so forth. But they've done a lot more with genetics, they've done a lot more with biomedical research, and with combining those two things. The Russian Institute of Longevity is a really interesting place to visit because they're working on cracking the aging code. They want to find a way to stop us from aging. Very interesting research going on there. Same kind of thing with chemical research. Very interested, you know, in changing the way in which chemicals are or are not absorbed, which of course is also related to nutrition. So we used to fund a lot of research for these kinds of chemists working on bio-nutrition issues. But yeah, they have particularly strong skills in those two areas.

Q: Well, I understand -- it may be changing -- but that the Russians have a medical problem in that their death rate is particularly worse than Western Europe, and that their population is not replacing itself. Would you seem concerned there?

SANDERSON: Oh, absolutely. It's the hidden tragedy of Russia. When I was there the average male lifespan was 52 years. And the average female, 55. And essentially the leading causes of death were all alcohol related: depression, shot in the head, frozen to death, drunk driving, liver failure, brain failure -- that's what got Yeltsin, all those years of drinking vodka. As the Russians themselves said, "He pickled his brain." And a lot of that goes to the nature of life in Russia. It's a pretty grim life. Short and grim. You know, most Russians are going to work in jobs that they are not going to like, they are going to live in small, antiquated apartments where the services don't function, where they don't have electricity all the time, where they don't have water all the time, where they don't have heat all the time. Forget about air conditioning. They're going to travel on mass transit with people coughing and hacking all over them. Most Russians don't see doctors regularly, they see herbalists because doctors are extremely expensive and usually not all that good. Everyone dreams of a holiday on the Caspian Sea. About 40% of Russians will actually manage to have their holiday on the Caspian Sea. And there's not a sense that things are likely to get better anytime soon. So there's not a lot of hope either. And then they watch things like, you know, the rise of the criminal class and the brutality of the criminal class and innocent people getting shot and so forth, and it's no better than the place under Stalin. So there's a lot of fatalism, there's a lot of despair, the climate sucks most of the time, the winters are long and dark and brutal. On average, a couple hundred people every year get killed in Moscow just by falling icicles because, you know, heating issues mean that icicles can grow extremely long and then the train passes underneath, the building vibrates, and one of these things falls on you like a sword and it cuts you in half.

Q: Eh!

SANDERSON: Oh yeah. Yeah. It's a real issue when you're taking the Metro like I used to do. You always walk toward the outer edge of the sidewalk. It's better to be splashed by the cars with dirty snow than it is to be impaled by a falling icicle (laughs). So yeah, that's definitely an issue. For whatever reason, fertility is declining among Russian women. There is very high use of birth control. Lots of Russian women simply feel that they don't want to bring children into their world. Women are also marrying substantially older. So yeah, it's definitely an issue. And because Russians are extremely proud of their Russian character, immigrants are not usually welcome. So it's not as if you're going to refresh your blood through immigration. It's definitely a political, economic issue that the Russian government's starting to pay a lot of attention to, because it threatens to be a real downfall for Russia as a proud, independent place.

Q: I would think that many of the factors that you mentioned are, you know, able to be repaired, I mean better apartments, more electricity, more amenities, that sort of thing. I mean it's not as though this is really a third world. I mean here are people who have sophisticated use of machinery and invention and all. You'd think that they could get a handle on this.

SANDERSON: No, it goes to the stratification of Russian society, very much a have and have-not, very much a small, highly wealthy, highly corrupt, highly centralized oligarchy, and very much a large disenfranchised mass. Statistically speaking, there's plenty of beautiful modern apartments and palatial private homes in both Moscow and St. Petersburg. Basically, they all belong to government officials and/or the heads of quasi-government companies, like the oil company and so forth, or mafia bosses. There are beautiful private schools for their children. There are trips abroad and foreign education for their children. There's second and third homes all over Spain and Italy and Greece where Russians vacation. And I remember in Spain, even when I served there, they used to talk about the Russian invasion. All these Russians would come stampeding over to plop down on the beach and buy up all the best real estate. That's part of Russian realty too. But it's not the realty of the average Russian. And the problem is that because the oligarchs are doing so very, very well, they don't feel any need to worry about the rest of the unwashed masses. It's a real issue. Because you can walk through almost any Moscow neighborhood and see a brand new apartment building and see pictures on TV of how these folks live and they're stepping out of their limousines with the women wearing fur coats and diamonds and rubies and, you know, the men smoothing their lapels with their pinky rings flashing. Because that's not what most Russians get.

Q: Was it a feeling there that you were dealing with a, I won't say a lawless society, but one that could be determined by who knew whom or that sort of thing?

SANDERSON: Oh, absolutely. Even average ordinary Muscovites, for instance, would recognize certain license plates because the powerful in the government and/or their very rich friends all had license plates with special codes on them. And you knew better than to touch that car or if you were a cop you knew better than to try and stop that car. And you know, there were, for instance, horrible crashes all the time in Moscow because these guys would jump into their big fancy limousines and they didn't want to deal with the traffic jams. So they would just pull out headfirst into oncoming traffic and expect every car to just weave out of their way because hey, we're special, we've got a plate, we've got this, we've got that. And sometimes they would crash into each other because, you know, neither side would give way, but lots of times, they'd crash into buses or innocent people because they'd just decide to get out and charge along and the police weren't going to stop them. It's worth your job, your family's future to mess with these guys. So yeah, there was definitely a sense of a sort of lawlessness, a sense that these people don't have to follow the same rules that I do. But in a sense it was also accepted. Like oh yeah, right, it's the big cheeses, they don't have to follow the rules that I have to follow.

Q: Well, I'm not sure if this is easy to say or you could say it, but what was sort of the attitude among our officers at the embassy towards wither Russia? I mean where is it going?

SANDERSON: You know, there was a lot of discussion about that. Because of the increasing prominence of the mafia, because of the increasing power of the oligarchs and the clear cut tendency of Putin to support both of those structures as at least in his mind a way of revitalizing Russia. And there actually was a lot of talk about that. Was there a risk that Russia would become the lawless Wild East of Europe? You know, what could we do to help stabilize Russia, to encourage our Western European partners to bring Russia closer? You know, what's the long term plan? Can we get Russia into the EU? You know, why not? Can we someday get Russia into NATO, you know? There was a lot of talk about how can we help Russia stabilize itself? Because a lot of the phenomenon that we've been discussing here were also viewed as the byproducts of the breakup of the Soviet Union, because with that absolute control removed relatively suddenly it left the whole society sort of going well, where do we go now? What do we do? What kind of country are we supposed to be? What will we become? And there was a lot of debate about the risks of Russia becoming a rogue state, because a lot of the factors that make rogue states were and are present in Russia. And so there was definitely a lot of conversation of how can we best help Russia to stabilize itself. How can we draw Russia into the international community? How can we make Russia part of organizations that will help it grow in the right, productive way? Yeah, there was definitely a lot of that conversation.

Q: Did you have this type of conversation or was there much cooperation with say, our British-French-Canadian-German colleagues? Or others?

SANDERSON: I didn't have those conversations, no. I didn't actually know a lot of the other diplomats. I knew a lot of Russians and of course I knew our folks.

Q: Was there concern about the departure of many a young Russian girl who was sort of entrapped into this trafficking of women and all that? Was that considered a problem much or not?

SANDERSON: At that time it certainly wasn't. I mean as a matter of fact my language school was in the exact same building as one of those so-called matchmaking institutes.

Q: Ah.

SANDERSON: And the thing that was a lot more worrisome from an official U.S. government perspective at the time was trafficking of girls from the Urals into Russia as prostitutes. I mean it was really scandalous. You would even see like a semi-truck pulled up on the side of a highway and you might think to yourself, "Oh, that truck's broken down." It wasn't broken down. Inside of it there would be rows of cots with young girls from various Stans and the Urals who were there to service guys who would stop their cars and jump into the truck for, you know, a quick break.

Q: Oh my God.

SANDERSON: Yeah. And that was of much greater policy concern to us than the so-called matchmaking agencies. Because at least those were mostly young women who went voluntarily, who paid a fee, who registered. And yes, they were selling themselves, but by and large, you know, it wasn't that this agency went out and grabbed all the girls, that started a little bit later. I had already left Russia when these agencies started going to parents saying, "Sell us your daughter." When I was there it was still very much a case of these young, well-educated women who could clearly see that they weren't going to go anywhere in Russia. You know, it was hard enough for men to get high profile jobs. It was much rarer for a woman. So if you were an educated young woman you didn't have that much to look forward to in Russia and it was worth your while to scrape together the registration fee and get your professional photographs taken and get into one of these matchmaking things. I actually ran into quite a few American men who were in that building specifically to check out potential future wives.

Q: Well, you mentioned the people you were working with in your particular department. And as I recall, some of them were women. How were American women officials treated in Russia at that time?

SANDERSON: Yeah, absolutely no problem whatsoever. Russians, particularly the government and the kind of Russians that we were interacting with, the educated upper class government, scientists, et cetera, had absolutely no issues whatsoever with women in authority, and took it for granted almost that of course there would be American women in these kinds of positions, because hey, it's America.

Q: You know, back in around '94 or so I spent about three weeks in Kyrgyzstan. And talking to the woman officers there, saying that, you know, social relations with the Kyrgys or the Russians who were Kyrgys was not much fun because it consisted of going to a restaurant with a bottle of vodka and sitting there. I mean did you find -- could you have a more relaxed, enjoyable relationship there?

SANDERSON: Oh, absolutely. I think the difference absolutely was living in Moscow. One of the really great urban centers of the world. I mean I remember my first Christmas in Moscow. I went to the Bolshoi Theater and saw "The Nutcracker." And it was snowing lightly. It was just one of those moments that sticks in your mind as being like a dream come true kind of thing. Like wow, is this me actually sitting in the Bolshoi Ballet watching them do "The Nutcracker"? Like oh my God (laughs). And there were so many art galleries and so many small theater groups. I used to go with Russian friends to -- I'm trying to think what would be an analogy in English. It would be like political satire theater.

Q: Ah yes.

SANDERSON: And, you know, we would go there and take in one of these plays and then go to dinner afterwards and sure, yeah, we would have some vodka too, but we would talk about the play and were they on target, were they off target, were they exaggerated, were they real, you know. Oh, my God, and outdoor art markets. You know, we would go and go just strolling, admiring the beautiful art and then stop for lunch and, you know, then go to the movies afterward. And walking for miles in beautiful old Moscow and just admiring the architecture and then, again, stopping for coffee and sitting and talking. Oh, life in Moscow in many respects, aside from the crappy weather, life in Moscow was great.

Q: OK, by the way, for the transcriber, this is with Mel Sanderson and today is the 20th of December, 2011. So what was your job in Kinshasa?

SANDERSON: I did just want to tell you about Ambassador David Johnson in Moscow before we start with Congo.

Q: Ah-ha. How did you find him?

SANDERSON: Oh, he was awesome. In my opinion he was the perfect man in the perfect place at the perfect time. He had a real understanding of the Russian mentality, and his personal openness and his warm nature were absolutely perfect, both for bringing together all the diverse elements of the embassy and for making headway with the Russians. He was really liked and he had great access.

Q: What was his background?

SANDERSON: He's a professional Foreign Service officer. He had done a couple of tours in Western Europe, and if I remember correctly, also the Far East.
