FRY: By 1968 the greening of America was well under way. The Tet offensive had passed in Vietnam and things were very difficult on the campuses of the United States. What we had to tell people was that Soviet law applied to them while they were in the Soviet Union, and in the Soviet Union you do not get on a street corner and start preaching about democracy. We used to use the old joke -- to soften the pill about behavior patterns there -- of the Soviet who was arguing with an American and the American said, "Anytime I want I can get on a street corner and denounce Lyndon Johnson as a fool." The Russian said, "We have the same freedoms here; anytime I want I can get on a street corner and denounce Lyndon Johnson and call him a fool." They got the point very quickly about what that meant. There were Americans who came through Russia who had deserted from I think either the Wasp or the Enterprise from Sasebo or Yokohama, Japan. There were five sailors -- a famous case -- who deserted and went on Soviet television and were later popping around Sweden and over the years have gone home. We did have a lot of deserters who tried to convince the Soviets that they wanted to live in the Soviet Union and didn't want to serve in the American army. Curiously enough, in many cases, the Soviets just put them across the border into Finland. They didn't want any part of this unless they were going to be really valuable. Although once they put the Americans on television, I don't recall that they ever did that again. These were just young sailors and I have forgotten all the circumstances of why they had gotten in trouble on the ship and finally deserted.

We had an Embassy program where every night one language officer would follow television from when it went on to when it went off. Since there was only one channel it wasn't hard. You monitored everything and had it written up in the morning, dictated it to your secretary, or whatever, and that was on the Ambassador's, DCM's, and others', desks by nine or ten in the morning. We often picked up things on the Soviet news about Americans who had come to the Soviet Union that we didn't know anything about. We would go to the Foreign Ministry and ask to talk to the person to be sure he was there under his own free will.

Sometimes the Americans were willing to meet with us and sometimes they were not. There were a number of cases like that. I don't know what the disposition of the cases were, I can tell you that most Americans who had lived in the Soviet Union for very long, who had gone there with the idea that they would be some kind of hero for denouncing the war in Vietnam, very soon found out what the reality of life was like there. Once the show was over and the television lights were off it wasn't very pleasant. Most of them were not allowed to stay in Moscow, they went off to smaller towns. I think all of them left at some point and the Russians let them go; once their propaganda value was used they were simply a drain on the Soviet economy.

I would like to mention one other incident in Moscow that moved me a great deal. It was the kind of thing that happens that for just a fleeting moment took the hard mask off the Cold War and gave a glimmer of hope that underneath the Soviet tyranny was the Russia that we are perhaps seeing a bit more of today. There was first the Soviet shock after the assassination of Martin Luther King. Since this followed President Kennedy's assassination by a very few years there was the feeling that the United States was in serious trouble. Not just trouble because we were bogged down in Vietnam, but, just as we later saw in the Soviet Union, they began to say that American society was beginning to disintegrate. They were looking at the worst that you could.

I had television duty in Moscow the night after Martin Luther King was assassinated. I will tell you what the Soviets had on their television. They took all the television coverage of the riots in Washington, DC, and they shortened them so what you got was a tape running all the worst case scenes in about a three minute clip. So what I saw when the television came on was, with the announcer saying almost nothing. There was the Memorial Bridge with the cars backed up and a car burning so that there was smoke there, a machine gun emplacement on the steps of the Capitol with sandbags, tremendous smoke pouring out on H Street, solid smoke and fire, pillaging, National Guard at camps in Stanton Park and Lincoln Park on Capitol Hill, and the Mall with armored cars and men armed with automatic weapons who were marching towards and ringing Union Station. All of this was shown on Russian television. I was stunned. I stopped writing. At that time we did not have a taping facility in our homes -- I don't know whether the surveillance people in our Embassy were taping this. I wrote it all up and we sent in a telegram immediately. I was not only stunned by what was happening in the United States but by the Martin Luther King assassination itself. That was the Martin Luther King assassination. Subsequently Robert Kennedy was assassinated.

Q: This was in June of 1968 wasn't it?

FRY: Yes, near the end of my time. When he was assassinated that was it. John F. Kennedy was, for all kinds of weird, psychological reasons, revered in the Soviet Union for his American University speech in 1962 or 1963. It was the first presidential speech which sought to reverse the tide of Cold War polemics and attempted to stake out new ground.

Q: I think it was early 1963. It was the summer before he was assassinated.

FRY: That's right, it was after the Cuban missile crisis. In any case, there was a sense of good feeling, that things could change. The Bay of Pigs was over with the attempted invasion of Cuba by dissidents. The one gift that Soviets prized more than anything and that I gave, rarely, to Russians who had been helpful on my consular trips, was a Kennedy half dollar. I cannot tell you the effect that this had on people.

Q: I was in Yugoslavia and this was a very important gift there too.

FRY: Yes, it was really a very moving thing to see their response. I gave it once to a doctor who had treated an American in a car accident way out in the Ukraine. It was a closed area and I was allowed to go there. He died and his wife was injured and we brought her back to Moscow. I went there with the Embassy doctor; it was near Poltava. I gave the doctor a Kennedy half dollar and he was really moved; I won't say teary, but he couldn't thank me enough.

When Robert Kennedy was assassinated it was more than anyone could think about. We thought we should do something here, the flag went to half mast, of course. The Ambassador, then Llewellyn Thompson, said it would be appropriate to have a sign-in book, or else we got something from the State Department that said if you wanted to do it it would be appropriate. So we got a big book for people to sign and in the lobby of Spaso House, the Ambassador's Residence, we set up a table and got a black cloth for it. I found in the library a Look magazine which had a picture of Bobby on the cover. We cut it out and framed it and put that over the book for it. I think we had some Bach or dirge or quiet-type music, which is very typically Soviet. Whenever a prominent Soviet citizen dies the radios immediately go onto dirges. I was given the first assignment to stand by the book and greet people as they came in. The idea was to put out someone who was on the country team, as I was as a section chief, but not someone really high ranking like the head of the political section. Everybody thought that nobody would come at the beginning and then the Foreign Ministry would say who was coming over from the Foreign Ministry, if anyone, and then the Ambassador might be there. I think we opened the book somewhere around ten in the morning a. We had sent around a diplomatic note the day before saying that the book would be open for signatures.

The doors had not opened before the cars started pulling up. In the first car was an official whose name I do not recall but he would be the equivalent of the Deputy Director of the Office of Soviet Union Affairs in our State Department. That was starting up pretty high; the next one was a Soviet military official, then the Ambassador of Peru, or wherever. Suddenly Ambassadors' cars with the flags flying appeared, another high ranking military officer, and so on. They were coming through and there was no one in the House to speak of except myself and a Chinese servant who had worked there since the forties and was a fixture around Spaso House.

I felt I couldn't leave him there and run to the phone, but then Georgi Korniyenko, the head of American Affairs at the Foreign Ministry came in, and by this time we were already on the third or fourth page of the book. Every visitor was so deeply solemn, so apparently shocked, and with the dirge music, I was close to tears myself. I just had to run to a phone. I told them what was happening and all hell broke loose. The political counselor came right down and I guess I was relieved of command. But the thing that struck me was that with the Russian political hierarchy there was no sense of "you see that your country is falling apart," "you see what happens when you get into Vietnam." Nothing like that, I can only describe it as profound shock. Now they were really getting worried that something was deeply amiss and deeply afoot in the United States that might ultimately affect how the United States was looking at the Cold War. In particular, they held to the conspiracy theory of President Kennedy's death. The assassination of his brother, who was then running for President of the United States, more or less confirmed their view of something of much greater import. In their own country that would be the way it was since there was no way for orderly change to take place. So they just saw this as some massive kind of plot. I think they were so concerned about this that it actually showed and was why they wanted to appear on the scene immediately. It was their message that this had graver implications in their mind than just the death of the man who was running for president.

Q: I think we had reached a modus vivendi and it looked like there were hidden forces. Actually this one was probably an off-shoot of the Palestinian problem, but to somebody outside of the system...Even in the United States it was...

FRY: Certainly, and until very recently we tended to filter many world events through the prism of US-USSR relations. Whether they were appropriately placed or not that was where they got imprisoned.

Q: What was your impression, at this particular period of time, of the morale, the caliber, the outlook of the Embassy staff and the leadership of Llewellyn Thompson?

FRY: I think over all the morale was very high in the officer corps. There were spouses whose morale was low because they had not had an opportunity to really learn Russian, or in some cases even to study Russian. They seldom left the compound, they did not share in the excitement of the work in the same way that someone who was at a desk everyday did, they were not reading the classified messages to know what was really going on behind the scenes, and they were under surveillance and their homes were being bugged by electronic devices. But over all, I would say, morale was the kind of morale you get among professionals who consider themselves sort of an elite. We were the shock troops on the farthest reaches of the ramparts of the Cold War. You couldn't get any more into the heartland than being in Moscow since at that time there were no other posts open in the Soviet Union. When we walked into the Soviet stores, when we walked down the streets, we were both in a fascinating country with a long history and in the camp of the enemy. And the enemy was never far away. The surveillance was heavy; the electronic surveillance was just assumed, in your automobile if not always in your home, and in restaurants where you went and hotels where you stayed when you were traveling. There was that constant sense of -- we didn't really use the term 'big brother' so much, although the term was used in the public a lot from the Orwell novel -- "big brother is watching you."

I think my own personal morale, and my wife's as well, was very high. For one thing, we took vacations in the Soviet Union. We also spent three days in Odessa touring and meeting the first US passenger ship, and three days in Vladimir simply touring. We went through the Intourist program, though we could do some things on our own. My Russian was getting good at this point on getting around and I felt pretty comfortable talking to people on a one-time conversation basis. I used to pick up some interesting, not earth shaking, information on how life was going there. I think all of us who could travel, as part of our jobs, loved it. That was a real sense of being on the front lines, you might say, and of gleaning whatever information you could.

I remember going into a courtroom in Tashkent about a half-hour earlier than I was supposed to -- by this time they were so used to seeing me that they didn't pay any attention to me anymore -- and I sat in on a trial that was absolutely fascinating and which they probably wouldn't have let me hear if they had thought about it. There was a dentist in Tashkent who was shaving gold that he was supposed to put into fillings. He had stolen gold -- it was some kind of gold scam -- and there were people who had been arrested who had been helping him. One guy who was helping him in this gold scam had already been drafted, his head had been shaved and he was already doing time in the military system. Now he was getting slammed by the civilian court. I wrote all this up. It was the first time I had been to a real criminal trial with real political overtones.

The interesting part was that they were all Russians but they were scamming the Uzbeks, they were shaving the gold out of the Uzbek mouths not the Russian mouths. There was a lot of hard feelings against the Russians that I picked up by talking with the Uzbeks while walking around the street. This was because there was an earthquake in Tashkent a few years previously and the Russians had rebuilt their part of the city but the Uzbek part still looked like hell, and you could see the fault line through the city.

The Uzbeks were very bitter about this. I remember one guy, I was buying papers from him in the underground that went under the main street, and he said to me, "I am really curious about you." Now he is speaking his second or third-hand Russian, he probably had a dialect before Uzbek, and I was speaking my Russian which he could tell was foreign. "I think I finally know who you are." I was absolutely amazed. "I talked about it with my friends," and he looked around at some people there, "you are very tall [because I am over 6'5"] so you can't be one of them [meaning Russians] but you are very dark, so now we know. You are Lithuanian, aren't you?" I said, and I was always very honest with people because I never knew when I was looking at a setup or a provocation, "No, I am an American, a United States citizen." And I always told people I lived in New York City because that is the one city in America that they know; I told him I was born in New York. I want to tell you, they never stopped talking about that and from then on every time I would come around their shops in the underground they would salute me and say, "American." They would stand up. They thought it was great that an American was down there. I'll never forget that statement, "You're tall and dark so you're not one of them."

Q: What about Llewellyn Thompson and how he ran the Embassy and how he dealt with things from your perspective?

FRY: When I first was on the Soviet desk and studying Russian, Foy Kohler was the Ambassador. Ambassador Thompson had been brought back to the United States in 1962 and was President Kennedy's advisor. He gave him that wonderful advice in the Cuban missile crisis when the President had received two letters from Khrushchev. He said, "What you do is don't pay any attention to the second one. Just pretend like you didn't get it." That seems to have been one of the factors in breaking the problem down to a manageable solution. He was considered a very good advisor and his office was in the State Department. I used to take Memoranda of Conversations for him and had gotten to know him a bit. He knew that I was going to go out there. He was a great gentleman, soft spoken, kind. I was very concerned about his chain smoking. He was one of the few people I have known who simply never had a cigarette out of his mouth or his hand. I mention that because as you know he died of lung and throat cancer.

Q: 1964 was the year when the famous Surgeon General's report came out.

FRY: That's right. The Ambassador then in Moscow was Foy Kohler; he had been there since late 1962. I had also met him in Washington. All those Ambassadors took a great interest in the junior officers coming out because they knew that the junior officers were the real backbone of a lot of the work, particularly in the consular office where we were all basically junior officers, FSO-fives or lower. I was a six by that time and then I was promoted to five while I was there to be consul. They paid attention to what you said and gave you advice. Ambassador Thompson, for example, was interested in the fact -- more than just saying, "Oh," -- that my first post had been Trieste. I said, "Of course, your name is so well known there." I didn't say revered, but the Italians were damn glad that he pulled their chestnuts out of the fire in the Trieste agreement. Thompson was very pleased at that.

When I went to Moscow, Foy Kohler was there. The very first week Foy Kohler and Phyllis Kohler had my wife and me and all the new officers who had just arrived, over to the residence. Now sure, Ambassadors do this all the time. We had a very nice long chat. Then three weeks or so after I had started working in the consular section, I looked out into the waiting room and there was Foy Kohler talking to my wife. She took him into the library and showed him some things they were doing and then he walked across to the consular section. The Russian employees practically fainted; they said, "He rarely comes down here; this is just amazing." He came in and we showed him a few things in the consular section. He joked that the consul's office was actually bigger in square footage than the cramped Ambassador's office up on the seventh floor where it was all under surveillance with Marine Guards. We didn't have Marines downstairs since we had Russians working with us and a lot of Russians in the waiting room. He did make the effort to come down and see you in your job. It did wonders for your morale, and at staff meetings he always went around and listened equally to each officer and gave you the impression that he was interested. If you wrote a telegram or an airgram that he thought was good he might even mention it. He would see you upstairs and say, "That was a nice piece on the (such and such)," or, "Your trip report on Kishinev to see that dying American was quite nice; that will save the State Department from any questions from the family as to what actually happened."

As it turned out, Foy Kohler went back to be, I believe, Assistant Secretary for European Affairs, and Llewellyn Thompson came back out as Ambassador. He was there at the time that I left and gave me a signed photograph. We got to know him; my wife was a very lovely and charming person, good natured and a good morale builder, and he appreciated that in the Embassy. So I think in that sense he was a very good morale builder. I also think that some of the senior officers were pretty hard task masters because they didn't want you to start feeling sorry for yourself because you got harassed by somebody in the street or were the subject of a provocation or your wife was unhappy. But at the same time you learned so much about speed drafting and speed reading, particularly the guys in the political section, for example. The pressure was always on, and it was a very high pressure Embassy.

But I learned something then that I found discussed in the management courses that I took later on in my Foreign Service career: there is no such thing as a stressful job. There are only people who are stressed. (This doesn't really help you much if you are stressed.) But what I found was that if you break your job down into what is precisely the most important thing that has to move at that moment -- that was my Foreign Service lesson there -- that is when a lot of the stress goes away. Although you might have to come in on a weekend or a night, the principal fact or information that Washington needed to know had gone, and in a high stress for information flow post that is what you did. It sharpened my priorities which kept me in good stead for the rest of my career because I knew the tendency was to do the easy part first and then ponder how to do the hard part. That was doing it exactly the wrong way when we were on the ramparts out there. Washington wanted it, wanted it fast, and didn't want any excuses when that Assistant Secretary sat down at his desk -- and we had that eight-hour turnaround so sometimes it was a little hard; they were going home to sleep when our day was starting. That is why people stayed after hours and just got those telegrams out. There were superb language officers like William Brown, who was Ambassador to Thailand and Israel, and many other language officers who become Chiefs of Mission; Allen Davis, Bill Price, Norm Anderson, Bill Dyess, Bob Barry, Bill Farrand, Tom Niles. There was a very solid corps of officers; not a turkey among them as we used to say.

FREDERICK Z. BROWN
Russian Language Training, Foreign Service Institute
Washington, DC (1964)

Assistant Administrative Officer
Moscow (1965-1967)

Frederick Z. Brown was born in Bryn Mawr, Pennsylvania in 1928. He received a bachelor's degree from Yale University and a master's from the University of Colorado. He served in the U.S. Air Force from 1950-1956. His career in the Foreign Service included positions in France, Thailand, the Soviet Union, Vietnam, and Cyprus. Mr. Brown was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on February 2, 1990.

BROWN: ... My assignment ended early. I left after eighteen months in Thailand. I left in June of 1964 to go to Russian language training. Because in the back of my mind I always had this desire to be a Soviet specialist.

Q: The real stars of the foreign service in the post-war years, even the pre-war years, were the Russian specialists. Was this still the impression you had?

BROWN: Yes, that's where the action was.

Q: Not only the action, but this was the absolute top grade people.

BROWN: Yes, and this is why I went for it. I had been given to believe just exactly what you said. I had come to observe that. The elite were Eastern Europe and Soviet specialists. I wanted to be part of that elite, and I was told that the chances of getting in were relatively small. First of all because I was unmarried. They had this ridiculous notion that single officers should not serve in Moscow because they would be subject to compromise. Well later on I was to find that in Moscow, I was freer to do what I wanted than anybody else. And the people who were compromised to my knowledge were all married officers. I happen to know three married men in Moscow who were caught in flagrant delicto with infrared cameras. And the only reason they could be compromised was because they were married. Whereas I, who had an active social life, the KGB had complete recordings of all the Mozart and Mahler symphonies from my bedroom, which were used as cover music. And I would announce it, with the name of the conductor and orchestra so that the KGB would be able to file their recording in a way that others could enjoy later on. But I was never compromised in Moscow, because what I did was in the realm of normal activity.

But in any event it was considered a bit of a coup for an unmarried officer to go to Moscow. I was one of two people in that category who were sent to Moscow in 1965. But I did look upon Russian language training and Soviet specialty. I made a conscious decision to leave the Far East as it was then called and to go on to Soviet specialization.

In retrospect I see this as rather bizarre. Because I later made the decision to leave Soviet affairs and go to Vietnam to save the world, in 1966. I went into Vietnamese language training in 1967 and I never had much desire to go back to Soviet affairs after that.

Q: You were behind the curve.

BROWN: Either ahead of it or behind it. But there again, I had the opportunity in 1963 to volunteer for Thai language training which would have been over in 1964 and then come back to the embassy. I turned that down and instead entered Russian language training in August of 1964. Spent a year in Washington and then went from there to Moscow for a two year tour.

Q: From 1965 to 1967 you were there. Could you explain what the embassy was like and such?

BROWN: The practice in the foreign service for a relatively junior officer, and at that time, when I went to Moscow, it seems to me, I was an FSO 6 at that time, I had not been promoted to FSO 5. I forget when I was promoted to FSO 5. But I was fairly junior, although not by any means a young man, by current standards of that time, but the practice at that time, for someone who is not absolutely fluent in Russian, and when I left the foreign service all I had was an S 3 R 3, was enough to do business but not much more than that. But unless one were a member of what you might call the in group, in Soviet Affairs, had been to Garmisch for the finishing school there. Those of us who were not in that category, and I certainly was not, were assigned to non-political officer jobs or non-economic officer jobs. My first assignment was as assistant administrative officer, which actually turned out to be one of the most useful assignments in the embassy in terms of using Russian language. I was the personnel officer for a staff of a hundred Soviet employees. I dealt with the UPDK, the organization for the servicing of the diplomatic corps. In that capacity I was down every day to the UPDK complaining about the elevator that wasn't being built, trying to get Ambassador Kohler's shower repaired, and so I had a lot to do with the Soviets. My Russian actually improved quite a bit in Moscow, but you improve only in the area where you work unless you make an effort to go outside your vocabulary opportunity, so to speak.

So my first year was as assistant admin officer, and I worked for a gentleman, the admin counselor, Sanford Menter. I was his deputy, I also did a bit of budget and fiscal work although not a great deal. I supervised the Russian language training for the embassy. But my real job was to relate to UPDK and the housekeeping function of the embassy, including personnel. There was a personnel officer for American personnel. So nominally I was her boss and when Menter would leave the post, I would be acting admin officer. So that was my first year.

Then the second year was sort of graduate school for people like myself. I went out to bargain for positions on the fifth or seventh floor in the embassy, which ever was the political section. I ended up not getting one of those jobs but I went instead to the publications procurement officer, PPO, which was a euphemistic term for collection of intelligence. The PPO, actually there were three Americans assigned to the PPO job. I was the senior officer and I had a deputy and I had a staff officer working for me and he did the accounting basically. The job of the PPO was to buy books, maps, postcards, anything in writing about the Soviet Union, and to send this back to Washington in the diplomatic pouch. It was a full time job for basically three people. Because we went around to every bookstore in Moscow, and scarfed up everything we could. Sometimes in two copies, sometimes in fifty copies, depending upon what the material was. It was quite an art to go into the political bookstore or the economic bookstore, and look at a book and determine how valuable it was to the consumers in Washington. The consumers in Washington were the obvious ones, CIA, Library of Congress, Rand Corporation, and then DIA and a whole galaxy of lesser agencies who relied on the embassy to collect Russian language materials including maps. So we not only did this all over Moscow, and there were hundreds of bookstores in Moscow to cover, some more valuable than others. A lot of repetition. You see the same material in every store. A very carefully controlled press industry as you can imagine. But we also took trips out into the countryside and in that capacity I traveled all over the Soviet Union. I went to Leningrad several time, Kiev, Riga, Baku, Tbilisi, Yerevan, Novosibirsk, I was the first American official to visit there at the Academgorodok, to establish liaison on behalf of the Library of Congress, with the Library of Academgorodok, Alma Ata, Tashkent, Fruensi, Yakutsk, Irkutsk.

So I traveled all over the country, not only bought books and maps, talked to people, but did as much as one could in the way of photography and other informal activity. All of this was written up in airgrams. Heaven knows, no telegrams. That was a waste of time. You did airgrams and it would go back to the consumers in Washington. The PPO was considered to be one of the more important ways of learning what was going on in the Soviet Union.

Q: In terms of the political section, you were going out more.

BROWN: In many respects it was more interesting that the political section. I sometimes traveled with people from the political section. I often traveled, as it turned out, with a very fine gentleman by the name of Christopher Squire, who was the science attaché there. He accompanied me on three or four trips. We accompanied each other. Chris eventually went to Vietnam as a province senior advisor, and then came back and was consul general in Leningrad for several years and then headed up the Soviet service of the Voice of America before he retired. Chris died not a year ago. Did you know Chris?

Q: Yes, I called him to interview him and he said he had to go into the hospital.

BROWN: Yes, he had a brain tumor. Very tragic. Chris and I traveled all over the Soviet Union.

Q: How did the Soviet security apparatus operate?

BROWN: They were all over us. They would frequently close every bookstore in a given town. Of course we had to clear all of our travel and get it approved by the Soviets. The Soviets bought us the tickets. The women that ran what you might call the special services unit of the embassy, bought you tickets to the Bolshoi Ballet or whatever and did all of the travel arrangements for you, internal travel was a lieutenant colonel in the KGB, Elena. Everything was done with the complete knowledge and planning of the KGB. Frequently when we would go to a town, we would find that virtually every store was closed for "sanitary day" (cleaning day). The word would go out that the PPO was coming and close up. Often, it appeared to us, that this was left in many cases to local discretion. In some cases the store would be open and the director of the store would say, "Well, screw Moscow. Come on in and buy. I need to get my quota out." And they let us. Because we would come with several thousand rubles and we would make their week. To go in and buy fifty copies of the Economic Gazette of a local republic. They liked that. And oddly enough, the thing that astounded the Soviets the most, was the technology of our packaging.

In the Soviet Union, a paper bag is a precious thing. At least it was in those days. Usually you had to bring your own. But we would come into a bookstore with collapsed corrugated boxes under our arms and several rolls of that plastic tape in which nylon was imbedded with one of those fancy machines to cut it with. We would come in and buy a thousand rubles worth of stuff, maybe several hundred books and the salesman would say, "Now how are you going to carry these. Take these, we don't have any boxes." We would say, "Well we have boxes." "Nah, you don't have any boxes." So we would get out these boxes and throw them together and with the tape, seal them up. We would collect a crowd of a hundred people as we did this. They couldn't believe it. They said, "That tape won't hold it." So what we would do was take a yard of nylon scotch tape and squeeze it together and make a rope and say well you pull this. We would have six Russians on either side pulling, trying to break this rope. They were astounded. That was really the big attention getter, when we would go in and buy books.

Not surprisingly, in many of the ethnic areas such as Tbilisi, Yerevan or Tashkent, you would find people who were very friendly. Whereas in the Russian areas, or in Moscow, not so much. Leningrad in particular, they were very tough. In the ethnic areas, the areas that are now in such discontent and uproar, you would find a more tolerant attitude. But the KGB was always there, they went with us everywhere. We often had to hire a car, which would be a KGB car basically. So they knew where we went and what we got. I am absolutely certain that the stores that were open the day before had been told to put any book of a sensitive nature and put it under the counter. So our job was to run around and try and find these things. They knew exactly what we wanted because we had two Soviet employees full time working in the embassy, putting the books together. Every week we would send out half a ton of books. So the Soviets knew exactly what we were sending out. It was a quid pro quo. A very ineffectual quid pro quo in my view.

The Soviets had at that time as many as fifty people doing the PPO function in Washington. They still do. They carry it to exotic lengths in terms of subscribing to publications, and scarfing up an immense amount of material on the United States. In order to protect themselves against interference in that activity, by the FBI or whatever, I think the Soviets had come to the conclusion that they had to allow PPO to operate in Moscow. So they let us operate on a short leash, and do that activity.

One of the prize things that you always tried to get was a telephone book. They were hard to get. I remember one of my predecessors had managed to (I won't say steal) to appropriate a telephone book from the office of one of the local officials that he called on in one of the provincial towns. He thought he got away with it and the day that he was about to leave that town, I forget where it was, there was a knock on the door, and the KGB were there and said, very politely, "Mr. So and so, we would appreciate it very much if you would give us back the telephone book."

"Oh, gee, did I have a telephone book? I must have picked that up by mistake." So they kept an eye on things very closely and were very carefully about monitoring the people that we talked to.

Q: Let me ask you a question about Soviet personnel at our embassy. What about Soviet personnel. Is it better to make all the employees American?

BROWN: From my experience I got to close to zero in terms of feedback with the Soviets that worked at the embassy. The personnel system in the American Embassy in Moscow was a battleground. You looked upon it as a daily engagement. The chauffeurs were all very well turned out. Well groomed. Obviously high-ranking officers in the KGB. There was no doubt about it. They feigned an ignorance of English but we all assumed that they were fluent English speakers. For our purposes, we chose to speak to all the Russian employees in Russian, to improve our language capability. But there was no sense that I ever got from a Russian employee, that I dealt with, that somehow I was picking up local color or helping my understanding of the Soviet Union or life in Russia. None. Zero. Life was very closely controlled then. During my time in Moscow, I was under oppressive KGB surveillance only once. It was towards the end of my tour, and because of a personal situation that I was involved in, I think this KGB sensed that and felt that now was the time to put pressure on me. All of a sudden they slapped 24 hour surveillance, close surveillance on me. That meant a KGB car behind me and my own personal car, which I used a lot. I went out a lot at night. Bumper to bumper tail. Following me into restaurants. Standing beside me at the urinal. Sitting at the same table with me at a restaurant. Really full court press. That was the only time that happened to me.

Q: What were they trying to do?

BROWN: My recollection is that this took place towards the end of my tour and there were things going on. I was involved with some people. Not Soviets, but on a personal basis. I had a fairly steady girl friend, a German girl. I think they felt that there was some gain to be made by making me feel nervous. It only lasted a short time. But I could tell you that other officers in the embassy were under this kind of pressure frequently. But except for that one time, I do not recall feeling the KGB presence oppressive. I must say that I spent, of my two year tour there, I must have spent four or five months living at Spaso House. Particularly at times when Ambassador Kohler was away, they wanted an officer there to sort of keep an eye on the silver. The Soviet staff was not above appropriating some of the furnishings or the food. Particularly the food in Spaso House's freezer. I spent a good bit of time there.

As a general observation, my time in Moscow was a very rewarding tour and I felt very little of the oppressiveness and pressure and boredom that many people felt in Moscow. But those were largely wives, families. Moscow was a terrible place for families at that time. The apartments were very bad, very cramped. There was not much to do for the wives. Most of wives didn't speak very good Russian. A couple of them spoke excellent Russian and used that opportunity to move around and learn about Soviet life and Russian life in a very rich and cultural environment there. But by and large it was tough duty for the wives. I was unattached. I could go out by myself and I didn't have to worry about babysitters and things like that. And there were many companions in the Western, European diplomatic corps. So I had a ball. An absolutely wonderful time. Socially, I went to the Bolshoi as often as I wanted to. I got to be quite a ballet fan, opera, plays. There were constraints on my social life with Soviet citizens. I did not get very far in that. I must say.

The one time I developed a social relationship with a Soviet girl, immediately the KGB did move in on that and began to control her and I immediately broke. You had to report every contact you had of a social nature with a Soviet citizen at that time to the office of the special assistant. But that said, I felt very free. I had a great time.

Q: How did Ambassador Kohler operate? Both in Russia and in the embassy.

BROWN: Thompson replaced Kohler. I was there mainly in the Kohler era. Then there was a gap and then Thompson came in. The DCM at that time, and I saw much more of the DCM than anybody else, was John Guthrie who subsequently went on to be DCM and charge for much of the time, in Stockholm during the heavy Vietnam War era. Then I guess he went down to South Africa.

Kohler, to be honest with you, did not make a very strong impression on me as an ambassador. The relationship with the Soviet Union at that time was not very good. Vietnam of course had heated up by the time I got there. In 1965 the American forces had moved into Vietnam. The Marines landed in Danang several months before I got to Moscow. So the American buildup was going on. The American ground war was in full swing. 1966-67-68-69 was the peak of the American involvement. So it was not a warm relationship.

We were quite compartmentalized, I can tell you that. My job as admin officer, I had no need to know what was going on and as PPO I had no need to know. I guess I had one regret. One should not have regrets, but in retrospect, I did not do as much on the political side as I might have. I am not sure how much there was to do. The people who were too active were immediately PNGed, were compromised, like Don Lesh, like Bill Shinn, two of the great Moscow University graduates came into the foreign service, were fluent speakers, and the Soviets were ruthless with them. They would figure out who the best people were, compromise them and get rid of them.

By contrast the Soviets pop out so many American specialists that you can't PNG them all. I suspect that we still suffer from the same short sighted training of our foreign service officers. I am a good example of it. As a four or six year tour and then you let them go, and go off and do something else. And so the government spent a lot of money on me, and I didn't make good on it. Maybe they got their money back in terms of Vietnamese language but this is a terrible problem in the foreign service and we ought to come back to this later on. Because I got into that angle of it when I got back to personnel later on with regard to East Asia assignments. It comes back to the concept of service, of dedication of one's life in a sustained way to a given area, or given specialization. So much in our culture argues against that kind of dedication.

BROWN: Let me add a note that is not strictly professional, but I think it should be recorded.

The phenomenon, tragic phenomenon, of service in Moscow in that era, was the high incidence of divorce. I must say that among my colleagues and dear friends, of the American Embassy in Moscow, a number of them were subsequently divorced. Either as a result of Moscow, or soon thereafter. I suspect if you did a statistical analysis of Foreign Service families, you would find that the incidence of divorce is higher among those who have served in Moscow. It's just an aside observation. I am not sure why, whether it is the isolation, the difficulty of the wives, the obsessive quality of Soviet affairs. I don't know. I know it to be a fact, thinking back to the people I was close to there, many of them are now divorced or separated. I just put that down as an item.

DAVID M. SCHOONOVER
Agriculture Analyst
Moscow (1964-1967)

David M. Schoonover was born and raised in Illinois. He received a bachelor's and master's degree in Agriculture Economics at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign. He joined the Foreign Service in 1984. He served in Beijing, Moscow and Seoul. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2004.

Q: When someone's working in foreign agricultural work, what does this mean?

SCHOONOVER: Well, in the earlier years, I was not in the Foreign Service. A lot of the foreign agricultural work was as an analyst in Washington. I spent a long time in Washington analyzing crops and trade and related information; making estimates of grain crops and what the likely trade implications were going to be; and analyzing agricultural developments in foreign countries. As it happened, I became involved early on in analyzing developments primarily in the Soviet Union, but generally in the Soviet Union, Eastern Europe, and China. So most of my analytical work was concentrated on what was going on in the Communist countries at that time.

Q: We're talking about the Cold War, very much so. As you were doing this, were you looking at what aspects of the Soviet Union, looking at its agricultural system as a weakness or a trade opportunity?

SCHOONOVER: In the beginning, most of the analytical work was not so much looking at the trade opportunity, it was more just keeping track of what was going on there. That changed fairly soon, though, because even going back as far as 1963, the Soviet Union suddenly bought some grain from the United States. This stimulated more interest in what was going on in their agriculture, and also in the likely trade and economic implications of their agricultural shortfalls. My first overseas experience was not in the Foreign Service as such. The Foreign Agricultural Service of USDA joined the Foreign Service under the 1980 Foreign Service Act. However, the Foreign Agricultural Service assigned people overseas prior to that as agricultural attaches. Employees sometimes would go on details or temporary assignments, and then back to regular Washington jobs. Some people already in the early days would stay out for years and years, but other people would just be picked up to do an assignment--a tour-- and then back to Washington again. That's what happened to me after the '63 grain purchase that I mentioned. In 1964, I went on a detail with Foreign Agricultural Service to Moscow. So my first overseas tour back in the mid '60's for about three and a half years was in Moscow on detail with the Foreign Agricultural Service.

Q: This was Khrushchev's period, wasn't it?

SCHOONOVER: It is interesting to recall. On the way to the airport, leaving for Moscow, news came on the car radio that Khrushchev had been kicked out. On arriving in Moscow, they were just taking his pictures down. The very first Pravda I read had the pictures of Brezhnev and Kosygin on the front page. So, it was a time of change. It was an interesting time to first experience the situation there.

Q: Prior to going to Moscow, what was your impression of Soviet agriculture that you were getting from reports?

SCHOONOVER: Well, my impression was that the state of collective farm system was a pretty inefficient system that lacked incentives for the farmers. At the same time it seemed to be something that had found a way to provide a low level equilibrium, you might say, for everyone. In other words, it was feeding the people. They had not, in those first couple of years, been buying grain on the world markets. So, It seemed to be managing, but at kind of a low, inefficient level. Then this first grain purchase in '63 started raising questions about what's going on, how do we explain this?

Q: Were you looking at the Soviet Union when Khrushchev came up with his Virgin Lands Program?

SCHOONOVER: He had carried that out before I went to Washington. It was still a topic of interest, yes. That program was carried out in the '50's, and we were still analyzing what was going on. I think somewhere buried in my collection of little pins that I picked up during my first tour in the Soviet Union is one that says I'm one of the helpers of the tenth anniversary harvest in the new lands. I seem to remember making one trip there, right after my assignment to Moscow, and somebody stuck one of those little pins in my lapel. But the beginning of it was 10 years earlier. So, they were just beginning to really analyze what the implications of the new lands were going to be.

Q: When you got there, were you the agricultural attaché?

SCHOONOVER: No, I was an assistant in the office at that time. It wasn't a big office, just my boss and me, and a secretary. The Agricultural Attache, my first overseas boss, was Brice Meeker. Both then and later, I tried to emulate the example he showed me.

Q: You were there from about '60...

SCHOONOVER: I went in the fall of '64 and stayed until the end of '67.

Q: Who was the Ambassador when you got there?

SCHOONOVER: When I arrived the Ambassador was Foy Kohler, and during my assignment there, the Ambassador there became Llewellyn Thompson. From an historic perspective, I personally find it very interesting to have had the opportunity to serve with those two Ambassadors.

Q: They were really top grade authorities on the Soviet Union. How did you find the Embassy when you got there? First place, were you married at the time?

SCHOONOVER: Yes, I was. And how did I find the Embassy? Well, interestingly, the Embassy that I served in at that time was the same Embassy that I served in again when I went back about twenty-five years later, and I found the building very much the same. It was located on the Sadovoye, or Garden Ring Road. I suppose it was compartmentalized a bit. As a young and inexperienced person at the time and working in the agricultural office, I probably wasn't very aware of what some of the other people were doing at the Embassy at the time. I think we socialized with a lot of the other young people in the Embassy, so we kind of stayed on the grapevine on some things, but in terms of the broader thinking in the Embassy about what was going on, I probably wasn't tuned in that well. I know I didn't read all of the traffic out of the Embassy at that point. The agricultural section and the economic section worked pretty closely together, and we shared information, but that's probably as far as my sharing went. At that time they did not have the residential compound that was built later in Moscow, so we all lived in different diplomatic compounds around the city, which had been assigned by the Soviet authorities. The one where my wife and I lived was on Donskaya Street, and I think it was given up later on. I think six American families or individuals resided in the apartments in our building. It was a diplomatic compound with Soviet militia guards at the gates--or gate, I should say, as only one was open. We had a number of people from Eastern Europe, I recall, in the compound.

Q: Did you study any Russian before going out?

SCHOONOVER: Yes, I think I studied Russian for about a half year, so I had enough to be able to communicate OK. I wouldn't say I was really fluent, but it was certainly enough to be able to carry on a conversation whenever there was an opportunity to speak with a Russian.

Q: How did your wife like living in Moscow?

SCHOONOVER: I think interesting, but a little bit difficult, too. Carolyn was 21 when we went to Moscow. She did not work at the Embassy. At that time, very few jobs were available for women at the Embassy. Anyway, she was shut up in a compound away from the Embassy, with not many Americans or English-speaking people around. One could get together with people who lived in other compounds, but still I think it was probably a difficult experience.

Q: In the Embassy was there an opportunity to work with your colleagues mainly in the economic section or...

SCHOONOVER: Mainly. As far as joint work, yes. We mainly worked with colleagues in the economic section. We would compare notes now and then with some of the other people. We were probably the main travelers in the embassy. We in the agricultural office tried to travel as much we could, particularly during the crop growing seasons. We obtained almost no information about grain and other crop conditions from the Soviet authorities. And those were the days before satellite coverage. There was almost no way to assess agricultural conditions, except to travel and try to make those determinations from first-hand observations. Sometimes, we were able to observe things also of interest to others in the Embassy, so we would give debriefings on our trips. Much of the country was closed to foreign travel, but enough was open to enable us to learn a lot about the agricultural situation. We traveled by car periodically in the Central Chernozem and North Caucasus regions of Russia, and in Ukraine and Moldavia, now Moldova. Also, we were able to travel by car to several cities closer to Moscow or Leningrad, now St. Petersburg, and in Byelorussia, now Belarus. We flew to Central Asia, and could hire a car for travel in the Fergana Valley of Uzbekistan and Kyrgyzstan. Occasionally, we traveled eastward from Moscow by train to places on the Volga or in Siberia, but our planned trips to these areas often were denied.

Q: Were you were harassed? Were they just watching you, or were they trying to run you off the road or other things?

SCHOONOVER: Generally, in the agricultural office, we weren't harassed other than just having people following us around all the time. Sometimes two or three cars of security people would follow us on trips. If we stopped to eat lunch along the road, Soviet security people literally would walk up and down the road by us while we ate; once they even climbed trees to observe us. Sometimes, though, we were stopped by the militia and had documents checked, or were re-routed. Generally, it wasn't a severe harassment. I think on one or two occasions we were hauled into the militia office to shake us up a bit. They would try to get us to fill out a report that we had been doing something wrong, and we would always say no, we're not going to fill out the report, and they'd send us on our way, usually. There was just enough of this kind of harassment to keep us on our toes. The other people who traveled from the Embassy were usually out of the defense office, and they often were harassed, and more seriously. The Soviets just wanted us in the agricultural office to know that they were watching us. There were a few incidents, not to me, but to one or two of my successors, when there was perhaps more serious harassment. I'm a little fuzzy on the details now, but they were not only hauled in by the local militia, but also accused of something in the press.

Q: How about where you'd stay overnight. Wouldn't this be a problem?

SCHOONOVER: There were hotels in those days. If your travel was approved, you usually didn't have a problem getting a hotel room. If they didn't want you to go, well, sometimes the hotels were all booked up. They were satisfactory, but Soviet style hotels usually.

Q: Huge hotels and small rooms?

SCHOONOVER: Yes, but sometimes big rooms. In some of the provincial towns where we would stay, for example, Kursk and Oryol, I think these hotels had been built for Soviet officials, and sometimes accommodations were pretty nice by Soviet standards. They didn't look like the kind we tend to stay in nowadays, but they were pretty nice.

Q: Did you find yourselves alone at meals, could you meet other people or were you pretty well isolated?

SCHOONOVER: In general, they would try to have us sit by ourselves, but they generally didn't try to put us in separate rooms. So, typically, we would go into a restaurant, find a table, and sit down. Since the restaurants were very crowded, this often led to our best opportunities to speak with other people. Often there weren't any free tables, and, in those days, Soviets didn't have private tables. If there was an empty seat at your table, someone joined you. So, people either joined us or we would join them, and that often was our main way of getting to talk with people when we were traveling. I guess more nights than not we would spend an evening chatting with people.

Q: In the first place, what was your impression of the agricultural methods that you were seeing?

SCHOONOVER: We mainly were observing the grain fields, of course, on this travel and not the livestock. We might see some livestock at a distance, but we weren't seeing it up close. I make this distinction because the grain fields often appeared quite good. We did see some problems. Sometimes we'd see where they put fertilizer on and clearly hadn't set the spreader uniformly, so we'd see strips of green and strips of yellow throughout the field. We would see some instances of machinery sitting around not being cared for. We'd see some problems, but in general, the grain was pretty good. I think if one went to their livestock facilities, things looked pretty primitive in general in those days. But just driving through the pretty Ukrainian or North Caucasus countryside looking at grain fields, agriculture looked rather pretty.

Q: They have one of the best soils in the world.

SCHOONOVER: Very rich soil, yes. Both places. The Kuban region in the North Caucasus has just wonderful black soil, rather flat but very suited to agriculture, to grain farming.

Q: I'm told that one of the major problems with Soviet agriculture in that period was its distribution system, that they lost up to a third of the grain because of storage, mice, rottage, that sort of thing. Were we watching this?

SCHOONOVER: I'm sure that's true, that they lost a lot, and not only grain. One would see a lot of almost anything that they were hauling along the roads, scattered along the roadside where it had fallen out of truck beds. That is just one part of the distribution system. I'm sure there was a lot of loss that way. You raised a good point. When one is talking about some of the other types of agriculture, particularly more perishable products, such as fruits and vegetables, there was a tremendous amount of loss. That's one thing that really struck me. The handling of perishable products was atrocious, and we would see people just throwing tomatoes or something soft and perishable. We would also see fruits and vegetables just sitting and rotting. Once they reached the market, they looked terrible in most cases, even when they left the farm in good condition. If one went to the free market and bought from private individuals, one could get good produce, but if one went into any of the state operated stores, it looked terrible. This is a good example of the lack of responsibility and incentives in the collectivized or State-run system, compared with the private system. I think they had some of the same problems with grain. Grain's not as perishable, though, as these sorts of products. I'm sure they had problems with mice and rats in the grain bin, and they had problems with people not paying careful attention and losing it from the trucks while hauling it. Still, I think that grain probably went to use closer to the original amounts and condition than these more perishable products, where the losses must have been—we're not even talking 50%, I think it must have been--more than 50% loss from the time they came from the fields to when they actually ended up with the consumer.

Q: Back in the Embassy when we were putting this together, by this time we were looking upon the Soviet Union as being a market for our goods. Were you finding that we were just maybe just....

SCHOONOVER: Maybe just in an early stage of trying to assess that. After the grain purchase in '63, they didn't buy any more grain from us for nearly another 10 years. It wasn't until '72 maybe, but anyway in the early '70's that they bought again. So, we were still mainly just trying to keep track of what was going on, and just beginning to wonder are they going to come back into the market again? We weren't really promoting grain sales during that period. We were just monitoring the situation at that point. In terms of agricultural trade promotions, which were a very big part of my Foreign Service career later on, there was very little of that in that early assignment in Moscow. I think we assisted with two or three agricultural exhibitions during the three-plus years that I was there. They were fairly small efforts. I recall taking part in a poultry show in Kiev and an agricultural machinery and inputs show in Moscow. Some agricultural commodity people, just a very few, came to those events, but these were pretty small efforts compared to the sort of agricultural trade promotion that we got involved in later on.

Q: Did you have an opportunity to take a look at the irrigation systems and the environmental effects on the Aral and Caspian Seas? I understand that it was an absolute disaster. Was that something you were looking at?

SCHOONOVER: We were trying to assess what their production and trade was going to be for all of the major traded commodities, so while I put the primary emphasis on grain, it's true we were also looking at cotton, and we were looking at sunflower seeds, and any other commodities that might conceivably enter into trade or might run into a shortage and, therefore, lead to some trade. Yes, we visited Central Asia maybe twice a year to try to learn about what was going on in cotton production. With regard to the major environmental disasters around the Aral Sea, I don't think that we got very deeply into any assessment of that nor did we even get to travel close to the Sea. Even though we often were in the cotton areas, I was never anywhere near the Aral Sea. In fact, I never did see the Aral Sea, even in my later tour. But we did visit the cotton regions trying to make some assessment of what their cotton production was going to be. In contrast to grain, it's a little harder to make such an assessment for cotton or, at least, I didn't have the experience, and I think it's a little harder anyway. I couldn't just drive through cotton fields and come up with a very good forecast of the cotton crop. But we tried, and we also tried to meet with local officials in the cotton regions to patch together some kind of forecast of what was going to happen.

Q: Were you allowed to go and visit Collective Farm Number 382 or something like that?

SCHOONOVER: Yes. We did that. I don't know what is quite the right word to put on that because it could be quite an ordeal sometimes. Those were the days when you were greeted with excessive hospitality and so, a visit to a collective farm usually turned into quite an ordeal. I developed, or tried to develop, an ability to deal with far too many toasts and far too much hospitality.

Q: It is a Slavic tradition, too. It's not just too much liquor and also too much food, too.

SCHOONOVER: Oh, huge table, yes. I can think of some other experiences, if you would let me just jump around.

Q: Yes, sure. Yes, do it.

SCHOONOVER: ...too much food when handling some official delegations later on where they would be entertained at one place for maybe an early lunch and by mid-afternoon stop at another place for another meal, and then by evening at another place for another meal, and so you're right, not only too much drink but too much food to a point where no one wanted to see any more food!

Q: At the same time you were doing this, I was in Yugoslavia, and I can remember being taken with great pride through a slaughterhouse, which I'd never been to before, and I had no desire to go again. At the very end, all the products were laid out there cooked. My appetite was not very strong at that point, but I had to partake.

SCHOONOVER: I've been through quite a few of those slaughterhouse tours, and eating the sausage at the end. You really don't want to watch the sausage being made.

Q: Where Khrushchev had been to the Garth farm and other places during his time, was there any effort during this initial tour when you were in Moscow, the Soviets farmers coming over and taking a look at what we were doing and looking at our methods?

SCHOONOVER: In terms of farmer to farmer, people to people exchanges, there really wasn't much of that going on. I think Khrushchev's visits to Iowa maybe added a thawing effect for a few years, but remember, Khrushchev was kicked out in '64, and relations took a chill again. In terms of overall relationships, that's when we became involved in Vietnam, and the chill grew deeper and deeper. So, during most of the period when I was there, we went from chill to deep chill. However, we managed to carry on a few scientific exchanges in agriculture during that period because, I presume, the Soviets deemed that on the whole it was in their interest at least as much or more than ours. So we managed to keep a few things going. We probably exchanged four or five delegations from each country each year, they sending maybe four or five to the United States, and we having four or five scientists or delegations in the Soviet Union. I'm sure it varied. Some of this is a little fuzzy now in terms of what we had, but I think I can still recall that delegations like plant seed collectors were always deemed to be a fairly valuable undertaking from our perspective, because we were always interested in adding to our plant germ plasm collections, our pool of plant resources. There were some other areas, too, but I recall that one in particular.

Q: While you were there, were you running agricultural fairs at all?

SCHOONOVER: As I mentioned earlier, there were a couple of exhibitions, two or three, that we participated in during my time, but that was it. We participated in at least one in Moscow and one in Kiev when I was there.

Q: Did you deal with the Ministry of Agriculture, for example?

SCHOONOVER: Let me back up concerning your previous question. I remember there were fairs or exhibitions that were put on in those days by USIS, and there was a major agricultural fair, which I think took place after I left. When I was there it was really a time of chill in our relationship. Now, dealing with the Ministry of Agriculture. We were very restricted in those days. We were definitely assigned the Foreign Affairs unit in the Ministry of Agriculture, and we knew three or four people in that unit, and the head of the unit, his deputy and one or two other people. If we really had an urgent issue of some type or, I guess, on occasion just as matter of trying to stay in touch with them, we would pay a call at the Ministry of Agriculture, but they never brought in any of the other departments as I recall during my three plus years there. I don't think I ever had the opportunity to meet with any of the other departments in the Ministry of Agriculture. I was present at meetings with the Minister of Agriculture on a couple of occasions. Perhaps the most memorable was when Ambassador Averell Harriman visited Moscow, and I was assigned to be the note taker at his meeting with the Minister. Those were still heady experiences when I was a young officer at the Embassy.

Q: Did you have the feeling that the people you were meeting in the Ministry of Agriculture there were apparatchik as opposed to farmers who'd come up with specific knowledge?

SCHOONOVER: Oh, very much so. These were bureaucrats of the highest order.

Q: Probably had never gotten their hands dirty. At our embassy, on the academic side, did you have any contact with our station there, the CIA? Somebody there must have been looking at crops, too, or not. Did you get any feel for this?

SCHOONOVER: I think that actually we were the primary unit that was doing that and serving all parties. I'm not sure that in my early days there I had even identified very well who was who. Maybe on a few occasions, yes, but I think we were the main office, and we were serving all parties. We would debrief, if anybody wanted to know about our crop travels and estimates. Sometimes I would travel with people from other sections, from the political section and perhaps sometimes I was traveling with someone from the Agency. I won't speculate about any other methods they may have used to obtain information about the agricultural situation.

Q: I'm just thinking that the agricultural... When you're looking at the Soviet Union, probably almost next to the production of tanks and missiles, in other words military stuff, the other really big item was agriculture. Could the Soviets feed themselves? Could they use grain as an export item far more than automobiles? Consumer items really were pretty far down the line, so it was at least my impression that heavy equipment for turning out things, but military equipment and agriculture were really a major, major elements of interest to our side. Did you find that this was something that the Russian Embassy took very seriously about what you were finding out and looking at?

SCHOONOVER: Yes, I'd say so. I'd say people were quite interested in what we were finding out, and I think we would generally do a debriefing with some people in the Embassy and share our reports with other sections in the Embassy. I know that at least Ambassador Thompson read our reports because I remember when I was working there alone one day he sent one back and said you've got a typo on page two if you want to correct that before you send it out. So, I know he was reading our reports. I should add that we also did regular surveys of the food stores and farm markets, and I know that these reports were used by other agencies to gauge inflationary tendencies in the economy.

Q: During this period of time '64 to '67, what about demonstrations against the Embassy? You must have been doing something that got them mad or something like that.

SCHOONOVER: Yes. As I recall, in '67 those were the principal demonstrations. That was a period of Arab-Israeli conflict.

Q: Yes, in June, the June war.

SCHOONOVER: I'm trying to recall. I think we had two demonstrations. I can't recall the number for sure. I do remember there would be some of the Arab students. Usually they would mobilize students at Patrice Lumumba University or at one of the universities, but I think that one in particular had a lot of foreign students in it. Who else was in the demonstrations I don't know, but reportedly they were student demonstration, and they would march on the Embassy. There may have been two or three that year. I don't remember demonstrations in any of the other years, but definitely in '67. At least one of them got rather violent. Some cars in front of the embassy were burned, and there were some rocks thrown at the embassy. I think there were one or two of the Soviet police who were injured in the demonstrations.

Q: What did you all do, just sort of stay inside?

SCHOONOVER: If it took place during working hours yes, we just hunkered down and stayed away from the windows, the standard guidance, then went about our business. I think I probably was busy writing my next report while the demonstration went on outside. Probably, not concentrating on it very well!

Q: How did you find the Soviet press as far as information? Was it only Pravda and Izvestia, and the farmers' journal of the Ukraine. I don't know what they had, but did you find that this was a significant source of information or not?

SCHOONOVER: It was. I don't think it was intended to be, but it was. You had to piece it together. One very seldom found nice overviews or analytical reports, so basically we set up a system to sort of sieve and gather little tidbits of information out of it, see which ones had more significance, and put them all in a system somehow. It wasn't computerized in those days, but we had filing systems and we tried to pull it all together. If you read that oblast X had met its grain procurement plan, then it went into your system. That would be a fairly significant bit of information. Often the information was even less significant than that, but we tried to keep it all together, and for a series of years, and examined how many oblasts had recorded meeting their plan this year, compared with other years.

Q: The Oblast was the equivalent of...

SCHOONOVER: A province. Yes. So, there were what—I've forgotten the number now—but there were something like 70 oblasts or similar units in the Russian republic, so that would give you some idea. There might have been around 25 or so in Ukraine in those days. So, to give a rough idea, we were keeping track of maybe a hundred little reporting units as well as the minor republics. Most of the minor republics did not contribute a great deal to the grain crop. It was mostly Russia and Ukraine—and also Kazakhstan. So, with a system we compared one year to the next, which ones were meeting their targets or which ones were X percent toward meeting their target by such and such a date, and we could begin to get some kind of a picture of what was happening that year. It provided some confirmation of the field observations that we had made earlier on. It was all part of the picture.

Q: How many other embassies? I think Canadian, Australian, Argentinean, other ones. Did your colleagues have the same interests or not?

SCHOONOVER: We did. We consulted with colleagues to a certain extent. Some were more interested than others. The Canadians, I think, for obvious reasons were much more interested in what was going on than most of the others because they had also sold some grain and, in fact, they made a grain sale or two after the one we had done in '63. So, they were still quite interested in what was going on. Some of the others were interested, but probably not as directly as the Canadians. I'm sure we consulted with our colleagues from the British embassy, and the German embassy, and the Japanese embassy and several others.

Q: Were we working the other way? Did you get any feel, did the Soviets ever consult you about what was happened with American agriculture, or was that not of interest?

SCHOONOVER: It was of some interest. There were a couple of people in their system, whose assignment it was to keep track of American agriculture. Maybe there were more than that with this assignment, but there were a couple who publicly were assigned to keep track of American agriculture and would generally be working on a book or monograph about American agriculture and who would call on us some of the time. Generally, they were in a couple of institutes affiliated with the Ministry of Agriculture. The number may have expanded later on, but that was it in terms of who would call on us, and even they wouldn't call on us very much. They would try to participate in one of the exchanges each year, so they would have one of their American experts coming to the United States and I think they had subscriptions to many of our publications. They didn't consult a lot in those days. I think there was danger to them of being seen as hobnobbing too much with Americans even though they were assigned to keep track of America. It was so great that most good bureaucrats in those days didn't want to take the risk of somehow inviting suspicion about what they were doing.

Q: I take it that during that time there were more contacts in the ballet, music, painting and all that.

SCHOONOVER: I think that's right. There were a lot of cultural exchanges going on at that time. We had limited scientific exchanges in agriculture as I mentioned, but I seem to remember there were quite a few activities going on in cultural exchanges.

Q: Did you get any feel for agricultural schools, training in the Soviet Union

SCHOONOVER: What kind of feel might I have had? It tended to be geared toward applied technical training. The quality I don't know. At a very technical level some of it was good. If it involved getting beyond that, sometimes they were still locked into some ideological positions that didn't allow them to really expand their research. They were supposed to believe such and such was so, and one didn't really want to push the envelope or discover that that wasn't really the way things worked. I suspect there were scientists, involved with more of the premier institutions, who were attempting to do some good research, but probably had to keep a low profile, went about their business, and really didn't bring it much to light.

Q: It reminds me that I think it was during the Stalin period particularly back in the '30's when you had Lysenko, I think, who was basically was a biologist or agronomist or something that was saying you could train anybody to be anything, environment was everything. Did that Lysenkoism come into your orbit at all?

SCHOONOVER: Our impression, yes, was that the political or ideological influence of Lysenko was still having an effect in the mid-'60's when we were there, and it was still stifling a lot of genuine creative research.

Q: It was supposedly, as I recall, a scientific thing, but it was very political. It meant that you could change just about anything if you had the right teaching and the right environment.

SCHOONOVER: Yes. I'm beginning to forget the details of this, but I do recall that some of their beliefs about change had more to do with environmental influences, as opposed to genes and the transmission of characteristics through genetic heritage.

Q: That raises holy hell with real research. If you only think right, the genes will change into a proper socialized form.

SCHOONOVER: I think the genuine scientists really had to keep a low profile, and probably a lot of research simply wasn't done that might have been done otherwise during that period. From our little spot in the agricultural office in the Embassy, other than reading things in the newspapers, we weren't able to monitor that very well. We'd do our courtesy call on Timiryazev Agricultural Academy, but we'd get a real programmed visit, and one isn't going to learn much of anything.

Q: What was happening in the field of American agriculture, because today we're modifying everything, but I think of Henry Wallace and his families. There was a lot of work on hybrid corn and developing strains of grain that were resistant or good for this or good for that. This was a well-developed industry in the United States at this point, wasn't it?

SCHOONOVER: Yes. Hybrid corn had come in quite a few years earlier in the United States.

Good crop breeding work was going on in the United States. I think there was some crop breeding work going on in the Soviet Union, too. Sometimes you'd find a way of doing something and you figure out how you're going to package it so that it meets all of the ideological requirements. Some crop breeding work was pretty good.

Q: Were you at all concerned, in your perspective, about picking up modified hybrid corn from the United States, sort of taking our research and putting it into the Soviet stock or not?

SCHOONOVER: That was a concern particularly, I know, of the American equipment manufacturers, and concerning their participation in trade shows and exhibitions. They were quite concerned about exhibiting their equipment. Generally what happened is that the equipment remained behind, or at least one sample, until it was copied while it was there. Next thing you knew, the Soviets were trying to manufacture something that was almost identical, but they never did any business with the American firm. In terms of crops, I suppose there was a bit of concern, but I don't think at that time it was considered such a major issue. I think simply their ability to take these breeding materials and copy them successfully and make them work in their environment, and generate additional production through their system was not great. I think the feeling was that the odds that the Soviets could pull it off were so slim that it wasn't a major worry.

Q: Did you get any feel for some of the political strains that were going on there, particularly the various ethnic groups in that culture? Were these apparent, the differences between the Great Russians, and the Ukrainians, and the Turkic 'stans, and the Azerbaijanis?

SCHOONOVER: Back in the mid-'60's it wasn't really apparent to me. It was such a police state, with such suppression, such controls. One wasn't going to observe the tensions, even though they may have existed, but people weren't going to show it because if they stood out, their head was lopped off. It wasn't going to happen. So, I don't think we were so aware at the time. The Soviet Union was portrayed as one big happy family, and we might not have believed it, but we couldn't see many of the indications to the contrary.

Q: How about cultural life? Were you able to get out and do things in Moscow?

SCHOONOVER: Yes. It was a good experience that way. In those days you could get tickets to the Bolshoi Ballet and the theater and various other events. So yes, we tried to take advantage of those and go to the ballet and to the theater. The theater was more of a challenge if your Russian wasn't really top notch. The problem is, everyone else laughs, and you wonder what it is they're laughing at! Maybe after going enough, I managed pretty well to get the gist of things. I tried to go to quite a few cultural events, and that was really nice.

Q: How did you find the core, sort of the FSO group there because at that time in the midst of the Cold War, and Moscow was kind of the Mecca of up and coming bright, young Foreign Service Officers. Did you find this?

SCHOONOVER: I don't know what yardstick I had at the time. I think there were some bright, young Foreign Service Officers at that point, but I've met a lot of bright, young people ever since. In fact, I see no end to meeting bright, young people, so yes. In general I was impressed with the quality of people with whom I was working. I don't recall forming really negative opinions about anyone. Some probably were brighter than others, but I'd say in general I was impressed with the professionalism and dedication of the people with whom I was working.

Q: I think this is probably a good place to stop. I'll pick this up next time. In '67 where did you go?

SCHOONOVER: In 1967 at the end of the year, I came back to the United States and went into the Economic Research Service of the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) and spent the next 10 years or more working there in the United States.

Q: OK, we'll pick it up then and we'll talk about '67 to about '77, and we'll talk about what you were doing in economic research.

SCHOONOVER: From Moscow, I returned to work in the Economic Research Service of USDA. I worked in the one of the foreign divisions, again analyzing agricultural developments in foreign countries. My particular area again was the Soviet Union and East European region. I worked first as an analyst on Eastern Europe, and had an opportunity in the fall of 1968 to travel for nearly a month in Hungary, Romania, Yugoslavia, and Bulgaria to make contacts and become more familiar with their situation. I also had planned a trip to Czechoslovakia, but on the day in August when I booked my tickets for travel, the Prague airport was closed, except to Soviet military aircraft. Bad timing—I never did make it to Prague. Eventually, I moved into a job in charge of the research for those areas, and also added China and other Communist countries at some point along the way, so we were covering all the communist or centrally planned countries.

Q: What were your interests? From your work perspective, what were your interests?

SCHOONOVER: I think probably the biggest interest was what was going to happen with grain imports to that part of the world. I remember analyzing developments that suggested potential grain imports, but if you think back to that period, there was still surprise at the Soviet grain purchases from the U.S. in '72. It happened to take place the year that I was away in full time training at school, so I missed out on that event. But anyway, their purchases rocked the boat in our grain markets, and together with other developments, there resulted a period of shortage in some of our agricultural commodities in the early '70's. Consequently, there was rather a keen interest in what the Soviet Union was going to do with regard to future grain imports from the United States. They had not been importing from us, generally speaking, up to that point. There were some grain purchases back in the '60's, but it was essentially a one-time thing. There was this long 10-year period where there hadn't been any grain imports, and then all of a sudden they came back into the U.S. market, and we had some shortages, prices went up, and a lot of people were in an uproar. Some people called the sales to the Soviet Union "The Great Grain Robbery". I think it was simply because of the surprise and the apparent effects that occurred in the U.S. economy. After that, there was keen interest in what was going to happen the next year—and in the future. And so, my first project after coming back from school was to try to do some projections of Soviet grain imports in the years ahead.

Q: Where were you going to school, by the way? What were you doing?

SCHOONOVER: I had a year off. It was one of those nice things that sometimes occur in the course of a long career. I attended Michigan State, doing a PhD program in effect, one that I really never finished up. In that one year, however, I managed successfully to get through the course work and prelims. I was working on agricultural policy, international agricultural development and trade, and international trade policy. I should note also that during the years in Washington with USDA, and particularly with the Economic Research Service, I had the opportunity to contribute a number of articles on Soviet agriculture and trade for books and Congressional reports. I was especially pleased with an article on Soviet agricultural policies that was published in a Joint Economic Committee report in the late '70's, and I believe the article still provides one of the best concise accounts of those policies.

Q: When you started in '67, where were you getting your information on their agriculture? How good were the sources?

SCHOONOVER: At that point most of the countries we were researching, both the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, had been publishing statistical books for a few years. So we did have statistics in terms of basic data for some previous years. It was more a matter of interpreting what they were publishing. Now, with regard to current developments we generally didn't have statistics. We had to work with whatever sources were available. We had agricultural attaches in Moscow still and in some parts of Eastern Europe. We were getting some reports from them. We actually were reading newspapers from most of the countries. We received the papers in our office in Washington. We also had press translations from the Foreign Broadcast Information Service. All in all, we worked with a variety of sources. With the weather information that was collected and made available to us so we could analyze weather effects on the crops. Sometimes we would try to do travel into the region ourselves, in addition to having the attache reports. This helped our attaches cover their territory, and it was good for Washington researchers to get into the region and get a little on the ground feel for what was going on.

Q: I can't remember if we discussed it last time, but during the '60's when Khrushchev was going at his great virgin lands opening which, I guess, turned out to be a real fiasco, but how did Russia look by '67, were you seeing there were signs that they might have been having problems?

SCHOONOVER: OK, back to '67. The signs about what came along later before the collapse of the USSR were not so clear. The main thing that you would have observed then was simply the inefficiencies of their system, but on a gross level they were taking care of themselves back in '67. It wasn't until in the '70's that they seemed to be unable to provide enough grain for themselves, and went into the world grain market to supplement their supplies. Their standard of living back in the '60's was low. They did not have a plentiful variety of food commodities. They did have people lining up whenever there was a supply of something that wasn't usually available. They were getting by, though, at a certain accustomed level in the '60's. In the '70's they couldn't sustain the kind of growth and consumption that they were having, and they had to turn elsewhere to supplement that. Later, of course, the strains on their system became even greater.

I want to comment about the virgin lands. Were they a failure? Were they not a failure? It will probably be debated a long time. It all depends on how you look at it, I guess. I think they did a lot of damage there in terms of erosion and ecological effects, but they did produce a lot of grain there, and with the right practices, a lot of the area probably could be sustainable. Some of it probably isn't, but with the right moisture conservation practices, much of it is. Actually they are still producing grain there today. I think it's like a lot of things they did at that period, they rushed into it with no concern about the environmental consequences, and it really wasn't the right way to go about it, and yet there is continued production out in the region.

Q: Were you seeing any improvement or response on the part of the Soviets particularly getting the grain to the market? I've heard figures up to a third of the grain just didn't get there because of poor storage, poor transport, whatever.

SCHOONOVER: Their system was notorious for losses. Some things were much worse than grain. There were problems with grain too, but if you looked at fresh fruits and vegetables, you'd be absolutely appalled. You'd see the way they handled things. They would just pick up something perishable and fragile and throw it or stack it somewhere and pay no attention to it and things would be crushed or would rot. I can easily think of 50% losses of a product that was good when it was harvested on the farm, and by the time it got to consumers it would be rotten. Tomatoes or something that was really perishable, just wouldn't survive the handling. Grain was something else. There were losses in grain, I'm sure, in storage and transport, and there was probably some grain diverted off, you might say. They may not have been genuine losses. It's just that it may not have been used on the State's account. The product probably ended up slipping through the system. But that isn't a genuine loss. That helped them survive.

Q: It gets to the consumer one way or the other way.

SCHOONOVER: We spent a long time trying to sort out their grain statistics. For many years, the U.S. Government, generally carried a separate set of grain statistics from the official one published by the Soviets simply because they didn't believe the Soviet statistics and knew there were problems accounting for what happened to all that grain in the official statistics. Part of the research that I was doing back in the early to mid '70's was sorting out the grain statistics. We came up with a series where we could start from the Soviet statistics and work backwards through a grain balance to determine how much they actually used. We figured that there was a little above average genuine loss, but the bulk of the difference was in the way they measured grain. They used a so-called bunker weight of grain, which did not really consider grain dried to a uniform standard before they measured it, so this led to a considerable overstatement of production. How much, we'll probably never know exactly. I'm sure every place had its own style of doing this somehow, so that no one will ever know precisely a true standardized measure of Soviet grain production. But we tried to figure out production by doing grain balances and then compared production and use every year and the typical difference. Then we would take weather conditions in individual years through the regions and try to estimate how much moisture there likely would be in that grain so that we could make an adjustment between the Soviet statistic and what our statistics were. In the end we came up with a set of statistics that was based on the official Soviet statistics, not just a subjective estimate. In the early years in the U.S. Government, there were some totally independent estimates. Such independent estimates made me a little nervous, because they can be subjective and get totally out of line after a while. Too many things get factored into the process. But we went back and we worked from the official Soviet data, and we had something like a 10 to 15% difference, on the average, between their production data and ours because of weather conditions plus we allowed for some additional substantial losses between harvest and usage. I can't remember the precise percentages now, but anyway, the difference was quite substantial.

Q: Up to '72 approximately, all of a sudden they came on the market. Our interest was really on Soviet strength and as a potential enemy. It was not a force within the world market or anything else.

SCHOONOVER: We had been following changes in Soviet grain production primarily to determine just the effect on the Soviet economy and internal developments. Then all of a sudden when they came into the grain market, and it had an effect on the American economy, it became important to try to follow what was happening and project what was going to happen to see how we were going to relate to each other in the grain trade business and what kind of effects there were going to be.

Q: We had Australia, Argentina and Canada who were the other big producers. Were you working on them, too?

SCHOONOVER: There were people in the research area who were working on those countries, so we had a pretty good fix on what the prospects of production were going to be in those countries. Statistics were much better, much more available on those countries generally than they were on the Soviet Union.

Q: What about Eastern Europe per se, not the Soviet Union, but the rest of Europe. Was there much grain production in those areas?

SCHOONOVER: We had the same sort of interest in what was going on in Eastern Europe at that time. Both the Soviet Union and the countries of Eastern Europe in the '70's were developing their livestock economies. So we had research projects going on the grain-livestock economy or the feed-livestock economy for several of the countries in Eastern Europe as well as on the Soviet Union. Eastern European countries also expanded their imports of grain at that time. The size and the variability of imports were not as great as for the Soviet Union, but developments in Eastern Europe were of interest. Certainly our greatest interest was the Soviet Union, which had such great variability and uncertainty. There was growth and some variability in Eastern European countries, too, so we were looking at them, also.

Q: Was anybody up to the time when the Soviets entered into the market, was anyone that you were dealing with saying hey, you know these guys may run out of...not run out of...grain but might have a real shortfall. This could really have an impact. Was there anybody seeing that, or was this kind of disguised.

SCHOONOVER: Like a lot of things, you can see something coming down the road, but you don't know when it's going to happen. It's like the collapse of the Soviet Union, jumping ahead, you don't know when it will happen. I think one's kidding oneself if you say we knew precisely when these things were going to happen. We had launched some studies to project what was going to happen in the grain trade, because we understood the potential of significant developments. I mentioned I took off for one year in the early '70's, and the Soviet imports happened the year I was away. I don't think I could have known it would happen that year.

Q: Not on your watch!

SCHOONOVER: That's right! One of those fortuitous things depending on how you want to look at it. Anyway, it had happened. When I got back to work there had been the purchase, but we generally still didn't know what was going to happen after that. The Soviets came in and they made a purchase. It had an effect. So everyone's sitting there the next year saying what is going to happen in the future? Are they going to come back in again? Is it going to be big? Is it going to be minor? So that's when we really got serious. I think the research project of my own that I'm the most proud of is the one that I did then on the Soviet feed-livestock economy. It projected large and growing grain imports by the Soviet Union over the years ahead, and that's certainly what happened. That was the project where we worked-out the way to measure their grain starting from Soviet statistics and coming up with an adjusted statistic for our use. Previous efforts like ours had been hampered by the sentiment that we really don't know their actual production, so how can we do a serious research study? We overcame this situation with our work on the grain estimates and tried to put it all together in grain balances. We came up with estimates of how much grain they were using and how much was going into livestock feed, and how the projections of consumption in their plans was going to effect their grain import needs. We looked at what they were going to need and what they were likely to produce themselves and what it meant in terms of grain imports. One couldn't predict an individual year in advance because of the weather factor, which caused their grain production to go up and down, but one could predict generally this growing gap that they were going to have in grain supplies and the implications for trade.

Q: You must have found, having served in the Soviet Union, and seen the beast up close coming back, this must have been very helpful for you to work on this thing because if you economists who...it's all academic. They haven't been there, and there's a tendency to get overly academic and not understand the problems of an economy such as the Soviets and how it operates.

SCHOONOVER: I certainly think so. It might be hard for me to put into precise words how that affected my analysis, but living in a country and seeing how it really works, especially an economy so different from our own, can make a big difference in one's analysis. It helped to better understand how they were trying to operate and to have an understanding of the inefficiencies in their system, and also to understand a bit about the thinking that went into their plans and what these plans meant in terms of how they likely would act. I think it all played an important part in my analysis and certainly stimulated my interest as well in the project that I was doing. It was something I could relate to. Yes, it made a big difference. That early tour in the Soviet Union made a big difference in the work that I did during the later research part of my career.

Q: What was the relation of your research economic unit and the CIA. The CIA has always been the big analyzer of the Soviet Union. How much were they into the agricultural field?

SCHOONOVER: After the Soviet Union went into the grain import world, and after we had done what I thought was a pretty good assessment of the Soviet situation and pretty good projections about the future, we did work together quite a bit. We kept up good conversations. Sometimes we differed. We got into arguments sometimes about who was right over the analysis and projections, but we had a dialogue, a regular conversation about what was going on there and I think it helped produce better results in both offices. I would say that in earlier years there wasn't such a close relationship, but when the Soviet Union went into the grain market, and after we did our studies and our projections, we had a pretty good dialogue.

Q: Was there a unit to your knowledge within the CIA looking at Soviet agriculture?

SCHOONOVER: Certainly. It had to be part of their overall analysis of the Soviet economy, and certainly agriculture was one important element.

Q: Prior to their entering the market, there wasn't much exchange between...there were two people doing essentially the same thing but not much communication?

SCHOONOVER: I don't know now whether I would have said it that way or not. I just think that when not much exciting is going on, there's not much to talk about, so one doesn't really spend a lot of time communicating. All of a sudden there's an issue that's in the public's eye, and really becomes important, and the policy makers' focus is on it, and all of a sudden you spend a lot more time communicating with each other.

Q: In '72 until you left, from your perspective, the potential Soviet demand for grain became a particularly hot item, didn't it?

SCHOONOVER: Right. It turned out just the way that we were projecting it. Their imports increased and there was uncertainty every year about what their crop was going to be and just how much the grain imports were going to be, so we spent quite a lot of time on that. At that point I was managing research on all of the communist countries, but personally I was still spending quite a bit of time on just the Soviet grain production and trade forecast.

Q: If I recall, weren't the Soviets trying to play this thing as any good merchant would, as close to the chest as they could so they could get the best price before announcing how much they wanted, in other words pretending they probably wouldn't need as much so they wouldn't have to pay as much, and they weren't as hungry for the stuff or not?

SCHOONOVER: Any grain trader, I guess, doesn't want to play his hand till after he's done his activity in the market, so we had to work out a compromise on some of that. The department had...I should say the U.S. government had...concluded a grain agreement with the Soviet Union, and we had an understanding on consultations on grain and certain specified levels that they could take up to certain amounts and if was going to be more than that, we needed to consult. So, basically we had consultations on a regular basis on how much their needs were likely to be and how much our supplies were likely to be, and if we got outside of those parameters, why we needed to consult again. It gave them a certain amount of freedom in terms of individual purchases in the market, but it also put certain parameters on the amounts, and we made the amounts public. If it were going to be different from that, then we needed to consult again. I think that was a good arrangement.

Actually, quite a few things happened during that period in the Department to make more information available. The U.S. concluded an Agricultural Cooperation Agreement with the Soviet Union, really an expansion of our earlier program of agricultural scientific exchanges, which included provisions for an exchange of statistical and economic information. This agreement never really gave us Soviet grain forecasts, but it provided a lot of data on a more-timely basis than was available before, which helped us in our forecasts. About this time, certain units in the government also began to develop the use of remote sensing to help monitor crop conditions, which was particularly helpful when travel opportunities were denied to our staff. Also, the Department of Agriculture set up public reporting on grain trade and if there were any purchases bigger than certain specified amounts, press releases went out. Now this is for the whole world, not only the Soviet Union, but obviously, it was designed to catch the big uncertain buyers like the Soviet Union. There were weekly reports summarizing everything as well. That was one thing that worked. Regular reporting about grain trade simply hadn't been there before. There were statistics before, but they were well after the fact, and one didn't have nearly as much detail coming out promptly on the grain trade. Then we had the grain understanding with the Soviet Union and, I might add, one came along with China, too. We had a grain understanding there, too. A lot of things happened to try to get information out so that all the players in the market and all the policy makers and all the people in the economy would know what was going on with grain trade, and there wouldn't be a big surprise.

Mrs. Collins was born and raised in New York City and educated at Queen College, City University of New York; Indiana University; Harvard University; and Moscow State University. Married to American Foreign Service Officer, James Collins, she accompanied him on a number of his assignments in the United States and abroad, including Izmir and Moscow, where her husband served as United States Ambassador from 1997 to 2001. Throughout this time Mrs. Collins continued her separate career, primarily in the fields of International Education, Humanities, and Political Development, notably Russian, authoring numerous publications on these and other subjects. She is currently an Independent Education Consultant in Bethesda, Maryland. Mrs. Collins was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2012

Q: When were you in Moscow?

COLLINS: The year before we were in England. We were in Moscow the academic year of 1965-1966 and in London, 1966 – 1967.

Q: What were you doing in Russia?

COLLINS: Following Jim. Accompanying him as his wife.

Q: Jim was not in the Foreign Service then, was he?

COLLINS: No, this was a graduate student exchange program that still exists today. Today it is run by IREX (International Research and Exchanges Board), but in those days it was run by the Inter-University Committee on Travel Grants, supported by the State Department and Ford Foundation, and run out of Indiana University, by chance. While we were living in Cambridge, Massachusetts, Jim had fulfilled the paperwork requirements, but interviews were still required. On a blizzard day, two professors interviewed each of us in succession in their hotel rooms in Cambridge. They declared we passed the first test just by showing up. We had to do it on foot, with knee high boots. I still picture the unhinged galoshes on one of them, which probably means I was looking down too much.

Q: What was their concern?

COLLINS: Well, psychologically it was a very trying, vexing environment to live in during the Cold War, in the dormitories. I think they were assessing our stability, our ability to survive the tedium and pressures of a year at Moscow State University (M.G.U. in Russian.). They already had experienced graduate students and/or spouses who didn't make it through.

To describe the spooky but tedious environment there would take a long time. To try to capture it, I wrote a book on what it felt like to live in Russia as a foreigner through four decades. In it, I tried to recreate the environment of the 1960s in Russia. The book, which came out in 2008 is called Through Dark Days and White Nights: Four Decades Observing A Changing Russia. I've given about 40 book talks since, and have made it available now in all electronic formats: Kindle, iPad, Nook, and such, as well as in "hard copy" via Amazon.

Of course I was ready for winter, coming from New York and Bloomington, Indiana, and had the right gear, although I learned that 40 degrees BELOW zero, where Fahrenheit and Centigrade meet, made other "cold" feel just "cool." I should have been alerted when they commented during the interview, "Hopefully you have some sort of hobby or something that will keep you busy like Arthur's knots where you can master all the knots in the book over the year..." because, as it turned out, one of the biggest problems there was plain old boredom. People could hardly survive the monotony of the place, without color or life. I asked whether I could use the libraries there, and they said I could.

So in August of 1965 we took a small student ship, the "Aurelia," out of New York's west side docks, and a train for three days across Europe into Moscow. My grandparents, who had come with my parents to bid us goodbye at the dock, were in tears. They pictured Cossacks, poverty, ignorance, cold, and hunger. They could not imagine why we would choose to live in the place from which they worked so hard to escape.

We actually had luxury living for Moscow then: our own small suite with a bathroom. There's much more about how we lived and what we did in the book: I had taken notes at the time as well as written letters to our parents. I should add that I was sick a lot: caught lots of bugs. Suffered months of strep throat, for example. Not to mention intestinal parasites.

Q: Had you picked up Russian?

COLLINS: That was required. When Jim was accepted for the program, along with about 15 others, everyone had to study Russian at their own level. Jim's, advanced; mine, beginner. A very intense summer it was, from about 6:00 AM to bedtime, daily. We were housed in a Russian-language-only dormitory. No English was to be spoken. Of the graduate students going then, two were women, the other 14 or so, men. The best known today among them is Bill Taubman who wrote the award-winning biography of Khrushchev.

Q: Did you see yourself as the wife of a diplomat?

COLLINS: No, I had no idea. I still thought I was a graduate student. We might be graduate students forever the rate we were going. I was picturing an academic future. Turns out that the seven years it took to complete my degree is and was less than average. But the Foreign Service life had not even entered my mind.

Q: Were you picking up any feel for the Soviet System, the Russians and the Soviets?

COLLINS: Not while we were in Bloomington that summer doing intensive Russian. Between talking with tape recorders and teachers and one another, it was all we could do to get through each long, hot day. The teachers were primarily White Russians who escaped the Russian Revolution, or their parents had. They were very old, or seemed so to us at the time. In retrospect, I'd guess they were in their 70s. This gave us no inkling about the KGB, security, and being foreign.

Q: When you got to Moscow what were your impressions?

COLLINS: My first impression was that I had entered a time warp. I was back in the Brooklyn of my early childhood—or actually, of my parents' youth. I pictured the 1930s. The graphics of the city were so retro; the buildings so shoddy, worse than those in Brooklyn. Luxury housing for their top party officials was more like Brooklyn apartments. It was far poorer and more backward than what I could have imagined. We all had this built-up image of Russia, how strong and powerful our enemy was. And there it was, all chipped and broken and cracked and malfunctioning, dreary, gray, and monotonous, lacking spirit or hope. While they were technically proficient in the arts, with beautiful renditions of "Swan Lake," let's say, they lacked the freshness, creativity, and originality of inspiring arts. No new writing of interest then, no visual arts. Stagnant. Television news and movies were stylized, predictable: men with tractors, fields of grain. Aspirational. "Boring" understates it.

Q: Sometimes you could see them building a dam, too.

COLLINS: Sometimes there was a dam. They did love WWII also as the subject of film. And this lasted right through from the 1960s (and before) at least until the end of the Soviet Union.

Q: How about the students there?

COLLINS: The students were bright and interesting. The ones we lived with were in graduate philology. Languages. I realized before too long – and wrote about it at that time –how little interest they had in ideology, theory, Marxism and communist theory.

They found these tedious and boring requirements. They were already quite cynical then, even in the 1960s. At the time we thought that the regime could not last forever with this lack of interest; that at some point, it would crumble. There was also a lack of interest in the parades and forced holiday hoopla, not to mention TV and radio. What we did not realize then was how quickly, suddenly, unexpectedly, and soon the Soviet regime would collapse. We did not then guess that it would be in our lifetimes.

Q: I have talked to people who have served in Warsaw in the 60's and 70's. One thing they were convinced was that there were only about five really convinced Marxists.

COLLINS: That's right. In Moscow at that time, the only convinced Marxists we met were those who were hired by the KGB to work with us, follow us, travel with us, keep an eye on us. They were allegedly with the foreign student office.

Q: How did you know who the KGB types were?

COLLINS: Oh, it was easy. As soon as we arrived, they greeted us at the station. All smiles and good cheer and positive thinking. I was suspicious. One good thing about coming from New York, I was cynical enough not to trust these professionally cheery people.

When we first met our "keepers," we had been on the train for three days after a ten-day boat trip on a small ship. I was a bit spaced. A young man and young woman greeted us all chipper and bright – and spoke perfect English. I thought, well this is convenient, anyway. They had some sort of vehicle into which they piled our footlockers and us to drive us to the dorm. By then we had met up on the train with many of the other American graduate students who had somehow been assigned to the same train and same cars. These two young Russians wanted to be our friends – in a big way. They wanted us to come to tea. They wanted to come to our rooms for tea. They showed great interest in our lives. So I saw as little of them as I could manage to do.

The people who were actually interesting to talk to were not those two, but the people in the dorm around us. The dorm was totally mixed. Foreign students were right next to the Russian students in a way that seems surprising in retrospect. One would have guessed they'd have isolated them from us, but they didn't. Although foreign students were scattered throughout the huge dormitory, the Americans, British, and Canadian students were assigned the same rooms year after year. On our floor there was one other American and three British students. The other foreign students and Russians we spoke with, we met in the hallways and kitchen, a shared, common kitchen. And sometimes we sat in their rooms drinking tea and having cookies and jams; or invited them to our room for those. The Russian students were careful but incredibly curious. They asked questions constantly.

They would look at America magazine, the glossy publication of USIA (the U.S. Information Agency). These were hot items, this U.S. propaganda. We could also acquire books by American authors and share them with Russian friends. I remember, as they were reading, wide-eyed, a piece about Harlem. A friend asked, "These pictures of Harlem, are they real? Are those houses the ones they really live in?" I looked at the brownstones and said, "Yes." I told them that many people shared these: they were not for one family alone. But then they looked at the streets parked up with cars and asked, "But they have those cars?" I said that some of them do. They so distrusted their own government to tell the truth, that they assumed any government publication was all lies.

While that magazine tended to look on the bright side, it was broadly speaking accurate. Then they wanted to know whether an entire family lived in one room. And whether they had coats and hats, because they had read that Negroes in America were very poor. Did they really have a TV set? And for washers and dryers, I said they likely shared them. But they couldn't believe that these "poor people" treated so badly as "Negroes" could have had access to a automatic washers and driers. (I described Laundromats.) "So it is not so bad they are living, no?" And I wanted to say they are living far better than most people across Russia, as possessors of indoor plumbing, hot water, cars, and Laundromats. (This doesn't get into rural black poverty of course.)

But the point I'm making – if longer than it should be – is that they were trying very hard to check the verisimilitude, the authenticity, of these random bits and pieces of information that came their way. Could they trust these sources? It wasn't long before they came to trust and believe what we said, because we were always candid and did not sugarcoat America.

I should add that we also got trips into the countryside; to historic towns like Suzdal, Vladimir, and what are now tourist sights but were not yet developed at that time. Old monasteries. Of course our assigned "friends" always accompanied us.

Q: Were you taking courses?

COLLINS: No, I had finished my Ph.D. coursework and exams in my fields. I had decided to read while there. Since I didn't have original sources or manuscripts in Moscow, I read secondary sources, which they had in the Lenin Library [now called Russian State Library]. I also read a lot of American literature from the Embassy library.

It was also hard to believe how much energy and time were expended in the efforts of daily living: procuring food, taking crowded transport, lugging gear, walking a mile in the cold to get to the Metro train. Exhaustion stalked me--and Russians. So did illnesses.

Q: I was going to ask where you got your food...

COLLINS: It took forever. You'd go into a store and stand in one line, for cheese, let's say. Then you'd order your half-kilo of so-called "Dutch" cheese. Then into another line for rice to be measured out or set aside in a bag. Then to the cashier to pay for and get chits for each item at each station, and return to pick up items you had ordered at each. We had no refrigerator, of course. Very few people did. So we had to do much of this almost daily. We left things on the windowsill to keep them cool. But in the winter they'd actually freeze on the inside sill. And the products you bought had not been refrigerated, so one wanted to be careful, especially about eggs, milk, or poultry. But by Russian standards we were well off. Our stipend provided a significant number of rubles per month [200 @ $1.20 each equivalency]. So we got our yoghurt, cheese, bread. And the meat they sold called "Bifstek," I'd cook it up on an electric frying pan we had brought with us. Sauté a few onions, add some potatoes, and we had a little stew. Our staple. The British students dubbed it "Beef Magoo" for beef M.G. U. (Em Ge Oooh)

Q: Did you pay on the bus?

COLLINS: Yes we did. It wasn't very much. It was an honor system, but we certainly didn't want to appear dishonorable for what were a few pennies.

Q: I was in Bishkek sometime later, and found the bus was so crowded you couldn't really pay. It didn't cost much and I wanted to pay but I couldn't figure out how.

COLLINS: Yes, they had a complicated system. I would get on and I couldn't get anywhere near the cash box, so I'd pass my money along through others. There was a specific expression you would use that meant something like, please pass this along. And I would give, let's say, five kopeks to the next person to pass along. But – along the way – other people, who needed change and didn't have five, would take the five and add their ten kopeks to the bucket brigade. This could get more and more complex, and sometimes led to arguments if the math didn't seem to be coming out right. There could be multiple steps of making change, returning change to people, and such. And people would scream at those who had only larger coins, say 20 kopeks, because you can imagine the number of people then involved in getting and making change. And eventually some coins would make it into the box. Of course you would never know, never able to see the box, but would end up getting your ticket. All this negotiation required a set terminology and specific phrases. Fortunately, we were taught this stylized language.

Q: I can remember getting on a bus in Bishkek and discovering all of a sudden something licking my hand. I thought what the heck is that? I turned around and looked and there was a big St. Bernard on this crowded bus. They had the biggest damn dogs.

COLLINS: Yes, and to add to that – in the countryside – on buses and trains, some pigs, goats, chickens, roosters, hens. Real animals. Not a petting zoo. That was culture shock (even though we didn't call it that then). As we awaited a train once, watching these animals in the station ready to board with us, I commented to Jim, "What are they doing here?" To which Jim calmly replied, "But how else can they get there?" Almost no cars or trucks at that time. So weird to experience Russia then, so strangely static and so strangely old fashioned.

Q: I heard of a Soviet specialist, who ended up in a little village, and he had the radio on, and they were talking about a space flight and here was a woman in the middle of the square pumping water into buckets to hang on the yoke on her shoulder. Draw a contrast from that.

COLLINS: Exactly. I wrote a poem on that theme a few years later. I was struck by the contrast between Soviet rockets and satellites heading for the moon with young girls in Moscow walking home from school in their heavy khaki cotton stockings and stiff white organdy hair bows, the way my mother looked in pictures when she was a child in the 1920's or so. It was so anachronistic. And those village pumps.

The disconnect between rocket science and shared village pumps for water, outhouses instead of indoor plumbing, was so stark. In those villages – beginning just outside the windows of our high-rise building -- the roads were unpaved, impassible mud in spring when the snows melted. The gaps were so enormous, with the 18th and 20th centuries coexisting in one place. There were also the stories of highly trained brain surgeons performing surgery in hospitals without hot running water. And the drugs they lacked would fill a book: aspirin, penicillin, as well as birth control devices and condoms. For so many years, the only way to limit family size was through abortions. Estimates suggest some five to eight per woman, which is a lot. Especially when anesthesia was not available. I try not to imagine how that would feel.

Q: This is your first time there. What did you think when you left? How did you feel about going back?

COLLINS: I returned from our student year there thinking that it was a long way from home, and that its economy and basic life were so primitive compared to ours that they had an incredibly long way to go. Such a conspicuous absence of consumer goods, of detergent, plastics, implements, and of course large goods, washers, driers, refrigerators, and cars. And I was thinking, “My God, if this is our superpower enemy, and they are so fragile at home, and so far from being “advanced”-- well that was unexpected and a shock. The second thing I thought was that I didn't want to go back there again. It was really good to be home. It was not just about the material side which was not so important to me, but about the psychological side both for the Russians and for us. The surveillance. The worry about being framed for something, particularly when we were students. And we were, it seems—or perhaps it was by chance. How Russians had to live daily with fear and intimidation: there's no good way to think about this.

People lived with a lot of bad options: were you going to be true to yourself or were you going to do what was expected of you and be rewarded for it, get better housing and special coupons to buy nice winter boots and nice toys for your children and maybe a washing machine or a refrigerator. We all have that to some extent, knowing our “price,” but not with such dramatic consequences. And those were the lucky people. Many had fewer choices because they had been blackmailed into making a deal between living a life as a coal miner in a remote part of Siberia or going to the top university and spying on other students. They wouldn't otherwise get to the university because their father or mother or both had somehow crossed the regime and found themselves in a Gulag. The “sins of the father” could be used against the sons and daughters, limiting their options. If they were lucky. Some of them actually told their American, Canadian or British “friend” this story. We had already suspected some of this, especially from the more reluctant, less gung-ho, “friends” assigned to other American, British, and Canadian students.

Maybe this is a good place to retell how our student year ended. Sometime during the winter or spring, a stranger knocked on our door. He said he was a student and wanted to talk to Jim. He suggested taking a walk because he knew our room was bugged. We all knew this. So Jim went off with this young man, then returned, then went off for another walk with me to explain what happened. (I don’t have to tell you how cold it was outdoors.) Jim told me that the young man told him that he planned to defect from Russia. This put us in a difficult position, of course. Jim discouraged him. But some months later we got a call from the cultural officer at the Embassy who was in charge of students. He (I think his name was Christiansen) told Jim to come down to the Embassy right at that moment. And Jim did. The officer told Jim that they have to get Jim and me out of the country very quickly because a young Russian man had jumped ship in the Philippines and claimed to be a friend of Jim’s. Jim and I spent our final night there totally awake, for fear the KGB might get to us before we got out in the morning. We had our door wedged with a chair under the doorknob.

We weren’t being paranoid. This was a realistic possibility. We knew that an American Professor, Frederick Barghoorn, had in fact been arrested and jailed on trumped up charges just a year or two before. The image of being in a Russian jail was not something I could sleep with. We never knew and never learned what the truth was: whether the man had simply defected and wanted a cover story, or whether he was a plant who made up the whole story to frame Jim. But we did know that we were going to leave immediately. The officer had told us that he and a car would be waiting for us outside the gates of the Embassy at 8:00 A.M. (I believe it was). And we were to leave as if it were just a normal day for us, going to the bus or Metro to go downtown. That is, we were not to carry anything with us. Take your passport and we’ll put you on an early Air France flight out of Russia, he had said. We did as he said. We left everything in our room. (They found another American student later to pack up our things for shipment to London.)

ALLEN C. DAVIS
Russian Language Training, Foreign Service Institute
Washington, DC (1965-1966)

Political Officer
Moscow (1966-1968)

Ambassador Allen C. Davis was born in Tennessee in 1927. He served in the US Navy from 1945-1953 before receiving his BSFS from Georgetown University in 1956. His career has included positions in Monrovia, Moscow, Algiers, Ouagadougou, Dakar, Kinshasa, and ambassadorships in Guinea and Uganda. Ambassador Davis was interviewed by Peter Moffat on June 26, 1998.

DAVIS: I asked if I might be able to study Russian and go to Moscow and do the so-called Africa job in the political section. When that was approved, I studied Russian for ten months at the Foreign Service Institute and went in the early fall of 1966 to Moscow.

Q: As one who studied Russian for 11 months, I'd be interested in your reaction whether this is a sufficient amount of language training to enable you to operate effectively in Russia.

DAVIS: This kind of thing is quite imperative. In other words, it's relative. There were five of us in the class. There were some very gifted people. I was more in the middle or lower range of the group of five in that I don't have a particular gift for studying languages. Bill Brown did and Bill Diaz, who is a fairly accomplished language student. I'm trying to remember who else was studying with us, but...after the ten months, I was acutely aware that I would not be able to read rapidly and with full comprehension in Russian, and that turned out to be the case. I was at a disadvantage in that not only was I weaker in the language, but virtually all other people assigned to Moscow having anything to do with political or economic work were Sovietologists. They had studied for years in university and done graduate work and who knows what, so that they really knew the Soviet Union and its culture and its language extremely well. So it was a little bit of a complex thing. Having said that, with really hard work and a lot of anguish and struggle, I made it through the two years. In practical terms, how did I function with the language? I functioned reasonably well when I was away from Moscow. During a two year assignment - this is almost unbelievable - I think there are 15 republics and I went to 14 of them. The only one I didn't visit was what we then called Turkmani.

Q: Afghanistan?

DAVIS: And I even scheduled a visit to go there. So during that kind of traveling, I could function reasonably well. Really, sometimes perfectly okay. In hotels, in restaurants, in casual conversations with people I'd meet in the airports and train stations and elsewhere, but reading - I was always at a disadvantage. Consequently, I had to rely rather largely on English-language translations of the materials dealing with Soviet-African affairs.

Q: But were you essentially dealing with the large African student population or were you following the Soviet policy vis-a-vis Africa. What exactly were you up to?

DAVIS: There wasn't enough dealing with the student population to take up a majority of the time. I lived in a neighborhood not far from the university and I did see a lot of students. But the students had more contact with the cultural division than they did with me. And if they turned out to have some kind of commentary or point of view or conflict or what have you that got into the political area, yes, they came by to see me. And I saw a lot of them. But by no means the number that came in and did research in the cultural and public affairs section. I traveled a lot with the people who did the publications procurement and that's how I got to go to so many of the capitals and out into the provinces. I never got to see that part of the Russian Republic that forms the part from Moscow Eastward. So I never got out into Siberia or that region, but otherwise I got a pretty good feel for the whole country. We had a very enlightened political counselor who thought people like myself - not Sovietologists - really would profit a lot from going out and accompanying the publications procurement officer. A lot of my time there was spent working to get better acquainted with what was happening with the arts. A lot of this was personal. It had nothing to do with assignments from the office, from the political section of the embassy, but it was very useful to those people who were working on theater, visual arts, on the Samistat, the publications, to have a window through other people. So consequently I spent a lot of evenings and weekends and holidays - my family with families of artists. We went to art exhibits, we went to homes to look at the work they were doing, we heard their comments on the kinds of pressures being applied to them by the Soviet authorities. These for the most part were non-members of the Academy of Artists, so they were outlaw or people on the fringes. Intimidated and harassed by the KGB and the authorities.

Q: So this was a two-year tour?

DAVIS: From '66 through '68. A two year tour. 24 months.

ROBERT L. BARRY
EUR, Soviet Union Affairs
Washington, DC (1965-1967)

Consular/Political Officer
Moscow (1968-1971)

Consular Officer
Leningrad (1971-1973)

USIA, Voice of America, USSR Division
Washington, DC (1973-1974)

Deputy Director, EUR, Soviet Affairs
Washington, DC (1974-1977)

Deputy Assistant Secretary for USSR and Europe
Washington, DC (1979-1981)

Ambassador Barry was born and raised in Pennsylvania. He attended Dartmouth College, Oxford University, St. Anthony's College, and Columbia. He served in the US Navy and entered the Foreign Service in 1962. He served in Yugoslavia, the USSR, Sweden, and Indonesia. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1996.

Q: You're going to leave Croatia and whither?

BARRY: To the office of Soviet Union Affairs in the State Department in 1965.

Q: Today is the 23rd of December 1996. Bob, okay, we're off to 1965 is it?

BARRY: '65 and in those days getting into the cadre of Soviet specialists was kind of difficult and I guess the reason that I ended up there was because our consul general, our second consul general in Zagreb was Karl Sommerlatte. Carl had been in Moscow and guess he and Mac Toon had served together at one time or another. As I was beginning to think about my next assignment, Karl wrote to Mac, who was Director of EUR/SOV, on my behalf. In fact I guess the same thing happened to Tom Niles who was in Belgrade because we were both junior officers in the same class and we both got sent back to work in Soviet affairs. I worked in the bilateral section and Tom worked in the economic section.

Q: You were there from '65 to when?

Q: '67 okay.

BARRY: The key there was to grab the brass ring that would have provided you with the softest and nicest assignment in the Foreign Service which was to go on from Soviet affairs to take advanced language training at the U.S. Army Field Detachment R in Garmisch, Germany. When we both arrived there we both asked well, how do we get on this particular bus? The answer was well you take early morning lessons every in season for two years and get your Russian up to a three and you can go do Garmisch. We religiously did that in addition to working on the desk. We went off every morning and did our early morning Russian across the river in the old Foreign Service Institute.

Q: So, you were doing bilateral affairs?

BARRY: I was the junior person on the bilateral section. The office director was Mac Toon and I started out sort of doing pick up, answering congressional letters. The person I worked most closely with was Virginia James who was a tradition in the Foreign Service herself. I think she had joined the State Department in about 1924. She'd come to Washington and had worked in the government during the First World War and then she was one of the early people, I guess she was originally a secretary, but she developed a strong interest in the Soviet Union and this was the old office of East European Affairs before it was divided up into East Europe and the Soviet Union and of course, before we had relations with the USSR. She had kept a long record of dealings on behalf of political prisoners, dissidents, American citizens who had gotten in trouble one way or another in the Soviet Union and had no relations. She had been present in 1934 when the relationship was finally opened as the result of the Roosevelt-Litvinov agreements. In fact I think she had something to do with having typed up one of the agreements or something like that, but she had been involved with in particular religious dissidents. People like Alexander Dolgun who was an American Jesuit who had been in prison for many years and she had carried all his correspondence forward. She drafted all the notes and so that was my sort of initial job, working with her on trying to get people out of the USSR.

Q: Could you just explain to somebody who is not maybe familiar the language? When you say bilateral relations? What is that as compared to what is not bilateral?

BARRY: The Office of Soviet Affairs was divided in that time to four different sections. There was one office director. Then there were bilateral relations which had to do essentially with the strictly relationships between the U.S. and the USSR. It dealt with consular matters; it dealt with things like property. It dealt with things like bilateral negotiations on a consular convention which is one of the things that I worked on later on. In essence, anything that only had two parties involved, the U.S. and the USSR. There was a multilateral section, which dealt with things like arms control and the international conferences which the USSR, and the U.S. were concerned. The multilateral section worked on UN issues, so that section was actually involved in the broad range of political issues. There was an economic section which dealt with trade and trade relationships and the various kinds of restrictions on U.S. trade with the USSR and there was a cultural affairs or exchanges section which was what handled the things like people to people exchanges, the international research exchanges for Fulbrights and helped to regulate the two way flow of scientific and technical change and all that.

Q: How would you describe during this '65 to '67 period our relations with the Soviet Union?

BARRY: They were, I would say, not at rock bottom, but they were far from prospering. There were a lot of espionage cases at that time on both sides. That was something that our section handled. The relationship was getting ready to expand in the sense that we had an interest in reopening the consulate, which we used to have in Leningrad or St. Petersburg. The Russians were interested in opening a consulate in San Francisco. That was an issue on which I worked. We were negotiating a U.S./USSR consular convention which provided for rules for dealing with American citizens or Soviet citizens for that matter who were in trouble in one another's country provided rights of access to arrested citizens and the rights of consular officers in each other's country to certain kinds of immunities and so forth. That was quite controversial because there were many in the congress who felt that opening a new consulate would simply be a new outlet for Soviet espionage in the U.S. We argued that we needed a new window on the USSR more than the Russians needed a new window since they already had the large relationship in New York. This was something in which Mac Toon was very interested because he felt that it was important to get more posts in the USSR. We were dealing with property issues also. This was the time when we began to negotiate for new embassy sites in both countries. This was a very long lasting negotiation I guess still continues to this day in terms of the new facilities that we had built or are still building in Moscow. This was something that I was responsible for later on in my time on the desk. This was where I got introduced to the fact that the compartmentalization of our security business is sometimes self-defeating. I did not have the kinds of clearances that would have been required in order to be fully apprized of what some of the concerns on the parts of the other agencies may have been. For example, one of the things that we agreed to and I was responsible for agreeing to was allowing the Russians to take a lease on a summer place that was around Berryville, Virginia. I had checked this out with the FBI and others at the time and it came back okay, so we told the Russians to go ahead. Only after that did I find that this particular site was located on top of a sensitive relocation site for the U.S. government which none of the people I was dealing with in the U.S. government knew about. But it turned out that the Russians were moving there for their summer holidays. It came out in all the press that here is this thing that is built over one of the air exhausts or near one of the air exhausts to one of these big old government relocation sites. We went through a long discussion with people about the location of what is the current Russian embassy in Mt. Alto. It wasn't the first place we ended up. We looked around at several places including some of the old estates in and around downtown D.C. All of which were objected to for some reason or other by local neighborhood groups. We couldn't get the zoning change to do this. We ended up for a while there it was going to be at the old National Bureau of Standards where so many embassies are now located. That turned out not to be feasible because of the fact that they wanted to divide it into smaller plots to provide more sites for other embassies. Mt. Alto was a government property and again we went through the process of checking it out with people. I think all of us who were dealing with this weren't fully clued in as to what the problems may have been. I think in fact this was not finally concluded during the time I was there, but some time afterwards. That whole issue and the conditions of construction and who would do what in terms of embassy construction on both sides is an issue that was important and frustrating because every time you thought that a solution was in your grasp it sort of disappeared again which it still does to this day I guess.

Q: I might point out for the record the problem with the Mt. Alto site became very clear from the papers and all was that it dominates the skyline of Washington where with line of sight one can eavesdrop on the Pentagon and everybody else. That wouldn't be the type of knowledge or abilities that would get to a desk officer. It was the sort of thing that would be kept from you. Only our people and the KGB knew what they could do I guess.

BARRY: Well, there was an interagency committee on internal security which was one of the committees left over from the Eisenhower period and that contained representatives of all the different intelligence agencies and these decisions, in fact, were cleared with this committee, but evidently the people who were looking at it were not the people who were defending against electronic intelligence, but the people who just wanted to keep an eye on the Russians themselves and this was a pretty good site to do it from. There was specialization even in the internal security agency about who does what to whom.

Q: What did you find dealing with say prisoners and consular cases of people and all during this '65 to '67 period? What was the Soviet attitude? Were you able to say come on why don't we settle these things and just get these people out of your hair or was it difficult?

BARRY: Of course this had been going on for years ever since 1934 when the relations were first established and some of the things in the Roosevelt-Litvinov agreement provided for various kinds of things like freedom of religion for people living in each other's country and things like that. The Soviets were never very well disposed to all of this, but they were quite accustomed to getting notes from us especially on the occasion of any kind of high level meeting where our officials would normally have sort of tucked away in their pocket a list of people that the Congress was concerned with or a list of diplomatic notes that had been sent in the past. We made quite a regular practice of sending notes to the Soviet foreign ministry on behalf of prisoners of one kind or another or American citizens or people who we claimed were American citizens and they claimed were not dual citizens and questions of access to arrested Americans and things like that. We dealt essentially with the consular division of the Soviet embassy here on occasion it came to the attention of Ambassador Dobrynin when he would be called in by somebody or the DCM who was at that time Yuli Vorontsov, who is now their ambassador to the UN.

You know, every once in a while you would get satisfaction on a case or two, but it was not what you would call a wholesale kind of operation, it was a retail operation. Some cases and they took a very strict view of what was espionage and what was subversion and things like that and could not easily be talked out of some of that. Of course, there were a lot of people who were dual citizens. A lot of people who had gone back to Russia during the 1930s, who had come here in the '20s and '30s and then had gone back during the Depression and were legitimately dual citizens. The purges had then picked up and they had been sent off to one camp or another. A lot of them were in Mordovia, which is where a big chain of camps were where foreigners were dealt with. There were some very interesting books written during that period. For example, I mentioned Alexander Dolgun, who finally got out, who was a Jesuit priest and a book was written about him which had a lot to say about life in the camps in the '30s and '40s. Virginia James, as I say, had an absolutely remarkable memory and had a file cabinet full of all these cases going back to the beginning of time. She was the one I think who told me about the time that they moved from the Old Executive Office Building to the then new State Department, that is the old section of the State Department was our new home after that. I guess it was Walter Stoessel who had been the desk officer or the office director as it was and in the middle of the afternoon there was a truck that pulled up and they took all the safes and got them into the back of the truck. They issued Walter a shotgun and rode over to the new State Department and unloaded everything there. So, she had an absolutely wonderful memory of all these things. She died rather recently about four or five years ago at the age of 95 or 98 or something like that. She was living out in Fredericksburg, Virginia. In fact I wrote something about her in the Foreign Service Journal in the '80s, something about her activities and her wonderful concern for all these people.

Q: Did you find that there was always a quid pro quo with the Soviets. I mean if they let somebody go they always had something or not?

BARRY: Well, if you're talking about espionage, yes. If you're talking about things where there were direct concerns of the KGB and we had one of their people or any time we arrested one of their people you could pretty well expect them to find somebody on our side to arrest. Frederick Barghorn is an ideal example of this perfectly innocent example. Barghorn was a Yale professor and I guess this was in the early part of the Kennedy administration. It was before I got into this. He was there on one of the early academic exchanges and we had picked up a real honest to God Soviet spy, somebody then came up to Barghorn on the street with a rolled up newspaper and handed it to him. He was pounced on by the KGB. The rolled up newspaper contained military secrets and so Barghorn was put in jail. Kennedy raised a hell of a squawk about it because this was clearly a case of purely doing this for purposes of developing an exchange. In the event they backed down and let Barghorn go. I forget the exact outcome as far as the Russians. It may be that the Russian was not prosecuted because the U.S. Attorney didn't feel there was enough evidence, but it was not, we were told at the time, a deal. Usually when it came down to espionage cases there was some kind of an exchange. Then later on when it got to dissidents there such as Sakharhov and others.

Q: Was this during the time, the '65 to '67 time?

BARRY: No, later.

Q: Why don't we pick it up?

BARRY: Well, in the future it came to the point where they were asking for exchanges in order to release dissidents. A different story.

Q: Were there any particular sticking points in the time you were dealing with the consular treaty?

BARRY: Oh, yes, it was a very sticky issue altogether. In fact, I think it was ratified during my time on the desk. The sticking points had to do with rights of access and notification. We insisted on a time certain, three to five days, for notification.

Q: We're talking about arrest cases?

BARRY: We're talking about American citizens. What we wanted to be sure of is that we had the right to go into a jail and see the person and talk to them. In the Barghorn case for example, which was the immediate precedent to that which caused some of the concern led to the consular treaty Barghorn was held for weeks without any American having access to him. That was the case under Soviet law in general. You could be held without access to a lawyer, relatives, or anything like that as long as the case was still in the hands of the procurator general, that is, the person doing the investigation. It was only when the decision was made about whether to bring the person to trial or not that he was allowed access to a lawyer. So, we were very anxious to have this pinned down in terms of I think it was one to three days for notification and three to five days for access. The Russians wanted a much more flexible kind of terminology like within a reasonable period of time and the shortest possible time. We negotiated about that for a very long time. The Russians wanted to have in the convention provisos for opening posts and we did not want that because we realized that it would make it difficult to get through the congress. We wanted to have it strictly on the basis that this is something that enhances our ability to protect American citizens in the USSR and represents a real step forward in terms of how the Russians can treat our people. I guess it was Bill Shinn, who was then head of the consular section in Moscow. He was then engaged with a case of another American, Newcomb Mott, who was kind of an innocent abroad who had gone up to Kirkenes in the very northern part of where Norway and the USSR meet in the Arctic and for some strange reason and crossed the border. Well, I guess it reminds me of this young American who just swam naked across the Yalu River from China into North Korea and had to be released and then committed suicide later. Actually the cases are rather parallel. This young man simply walked across the border up around Kirkenes and ended up in a border town which at that time Soviets had opened to Norwegians to come in and go shopping at certain fixed times. They bought them in in busses and things like that. This kid just wandered into the town and he was picked up and charged with espionage. We were not allowed access to him. They tried to trade him for a Soviet spy - I think, a UN person we had picked up. We wouldn't have anything to do with it. He was being transported from, I guess Murmansk, to Moscow where he was going to be interrogated further and tried, and he died under somewhat mysterious conditions on the train. I think it's pretty clear what had happened was he had cut his own wrists and committed suicide, but there were also claims at the time that he was murdered by the Soviets, but we had not access to him and that was another issue that was very prominent then. I remember Bill Shinn at that time made several trips to Murmansk, which is where he was being held and had a lot to do with the case. A book was written about that, too, charging as usual that the embassy and the State Department didn't do enough for this young man and claiming that he was murdered. That was another reason that caused us to want to have specific guarantees about what we needed to do in terms of U.S. citizens. The FBI didn't like the consular convention because they didn't want Soviet consulates here in this country. I can't remember what position the CIA took. I think they were probably in favor of it because it allows them to have more posts in the USSR. But, it was fought hard over in the congress and it did win the necessary two-thirds majority and I think was ratified in '67, '66.

Q: Was there any property say confiscated during the Czar at the Revolution or something that we're still trying to get out?

BARRY: Actually that's sort of another story because I ended up being the first person who was opening up the first consulate in the USSR. One of the first places we looked at was our old embassy in St. Petersburg, which is now a marriage palace. It's probably a brothel by now or something that makes money. As it turns out, it was too small for us and it was in a poor location in terms of our desire to have a free standing building. It's still there. It's quite elegant. Angus Ward, who was in Moscow in '34, went up to reopen the building and found all the old files still there and transferred them back to Washington. Of course, at one time we had a whole bunch of consulates. We had consulates in Vladivostok and along the Trans-Siberian Railway and things like that all to which came to an end after the Revolution or some of them were reopened during World War II for Lend-Lease and then closed down again. But we were eager in particular to get into Leningrad.

Q: Well, while you were on the desk, obviously you were sort of the new boy on the block with your ears wide open and listening, what was your impression of the Soviet hands at that time? This was sort of the elite.

BARRY: Mac Toon was the dean of the Soviet hands at that time and he later went on to be ambassador in Moscow. He had a long experience and I would say a justifiably low opinion of Soviet politics. He was very I would say rough edged in his feelings with the Soviets and he'd made no secret of it to them. When he finally was nominated as ambassador the Soviets took an awfully long time giving him agreement, but they finally did after they were told that this was whom they better take. There were a lot of other people on the desk some of whom like Vlad Toumanoff had come from Russian background, others like Paul Cook having been an academic expert and worked on this for a long time. The deputy director was Jim Pratt, who later went on to be political counselor in Moscow at the time that I was there. I guess the multilateral section had many of the stars of the then Soviet field. Kempton Jenkins and Bill Luers were there. Generally there what they had was people who were experts in some other part of the world and the Soviet Union at the same time so they had China hands and Middle East people and things like that who were also doing an apprenticeship in Soviet affairs. Always a good group of people, actually not so many of them continued on the Soviet business for one reason or another. Carroll Woods was the head of the bilateral section. I don't think he ever went back to Moscow. The exchanges section had been before a part of the bureau of cultural affairs and then the bureau of cultural affairs had split up and it was divided up into an office of East European exchanges which dealt with Eastern Europe. The Soviet part of it got attached to the political desk.

Q: What was the impression when you were on the desk of the Khrushchev leadership and I think probably while you were there he was deposed, wasn't he? How did that sort of hit what people were talking about?

BARRY: I'm trying to remember. If such a major event happened it's strange that I wouldn't have been involved in it somehow at the time or made a bigger impression on me.

Q: Somehow I have the feeling that it happened... I was in Belgrade and left there in June of '67. I'm quite sure I remember Khrushchev being on the outs. Did you get any feel for Khrushchev?

BARRY: This was the time when this was the post missile crisis detente period when there were a lot of things going on in terms of new directions in arms control beginnings and things like that. I'm going to have to refresh my memory about all this because it doesn't I guess my nose was too close to the grindstone to have.

Q: So, this would have been '67 and '68 you were at Garmisch? Then where did you go in '68?

BARRY: I went to Moscow. Everybody went to Moscow, that is Tom and I and George Humphrey who was the third person of our class all went to Moscow together. I was lucky or perhaps it was before I had worked on the consular convention for Toon in Washington. I became head of the consular section when I arrived there. Usually the routine was that you would spend the first year as a junior officer in the consular section or in the administrative section or someplace else and then go on to a second year in which you'd do something else. I got the head of the consular section job. In fact I relieved classmate of mine at Dartmouth who had introduced me to my wife, Sam Fry, who had been in Trieste when we were in Zagreb. So, I had an interesting year in the consular section. This was not a time when the consular section was terribly busy. We did have a few arrested Americans as a result of the closing of the borders in Iran. Anyhow it had diverted the drug smuggling trade which normally went through Kabul to Europe from Afghanistan without ever going through the USSR. But, when that got shut off because of Iran, these people started to fly from Kabul to Tashkent to Moscow and then out to the West. The chief of police in Kabul ran the drug sales business and what he would do was he would sell a consignment of drugs to somebody who was going through Tashkent and would tell the people in Tashkent that these people were coming and they were arrested. The drugs would come back and get recycled. So, there were a lot of hapless people who were caught up in this and who were in jail variously in Tashkent and then in Moscow. I went to their trials in Tashkent, which led me to spend at least five or six different trips down to, Tashkent using the new consular convention I got to have access to them in the prisons.

I got to visit the Butyrskaya prison in Moscow. These were prisons that were left over from the time of Catherine the Great and had been very little improved since and they're described in all of the various literature by people like Solzhenitsyn, but it was fascinating to be able to go into these places and meet the Americans and to sit through these trials. By that time I had sort of developed an interest in Soviet law because that was part of what we were doing with the consular convention and so forth. We had a lawyer that we picked up in Tashkent who represented all these Americans going to the trials. He was Jewish and got a chance to see some of the tension that existed in Central Asia between the Russians and the Uzbeks or the Kazakhs or whatever of course they told you it didn't exist, but of course you get down there and talk to people and they would. One Uzbek told me that his son was chasing a Russian who had stolen his bicycle and chased him into a Russian apartment building where he was stoned to death in the courtyard of the apartment building. They never could get any of the local people to develop an interest in taking this to court or anything like that. We learned about how to make a sensational appeal and got all the relatives and so forth to write character witnesses. Eventually I think most of these people got released before their terms were out. There were some efforts to trade them for espionage, people in the U.S., but of course, we weren't at all interested in doing that.

Q: Who were these Americans?

BARRY: These were people who were in the early days of sort of wandering around the world. Usually they were coming back from the Far East. They'd been in Thailand or some place like that. They were not professional couriers, they were just young people in their twenties who had gotten into the drug culture and were told that this was an easy way to make enough money to keep yourself traveling around the world and just to carry this stuff along.

Q: How did they exist in the prison systems?

BARRY: Well, I'm sure it wasn't easy. They were allowed to receive packages from outside. They, I don't think any of them were physically seriously mistreated. These were people, who were used to sort of living on the thin edge anyhow. They were glad to get out.

Q: It sounds sort of like the way it was in Greece. I was there '70 to '74 and we had a lot of them and they were put in a Greek jail, it wasn't great, but they really didn't have to do anything, they just sat in the jail and contemplated their naval until eventually they were let out.

BARRY: No, these guys had to work. I think they were first imprisoned and tried in Tashkent, then they were brought to Moscow and then they were transferred to camps in Mordovia again where they did things like making brooms and things like that. They complained that the quota was set too high. They could never get enough to earn any money and that kind of thing.

Q: How about life in, you were in Moscow from when to when now?

BARRY: Well, I was there from '68 to '70. Then we were supposed to go and open the consulate in Leningrad, but that was delayed for a year so I came back and went back in '71 and I was there from '71 to '73, but this time in Leningrad.

Q: Speaking about the Moscow time, how was life there then?

BARRY: It was very insular because there was a lot of fear of fraternization and restrictions on fraternization on both sides. Of course the Russians were not very easy to get to know either. The diplomatic community did a lot of entertaining of each other. Insofar as one got to know Russians, these were the dissidents; these were the artists mostly. This was where many people who were there at that time still have paintings by Kropovniksky or Kukhin or people like that because these were the only Russians you really could meet on a regular basis. You could in fact deal with some of the correspondent. Later on the second year there when I was dealing with substantive things I was talking to people like Evgeny Primakov, now the foreign minister, and people like that and you had more to do with the foreign ministry. In that first year there were lots of wonderful cultural things to do. The Taganka Theater was in its heyday and we used to catch as much of the theater as we could because this was where if you were watching a play about 17th century France, you were sure it was really about the current Soviet Union and things like Bulgakov and Master and Margarita and things like that. We could travel of course with the restriction that you had to let people know in advance where you were going and they sometimes would not let you go or tell you at the last minute that the place was closed. The embassy had an active travel program and so we went out in addition to these consular visits and got around a fair amount. Of course, there was the theater and opera and music which was all very good. The apartment living was not bad I would say. There were various apartments scattered around town most of which we still have today. Superior I would say to the compound style of living that existed in Belgrade and later to our regret we put into effect in the new building that we have in Moscow.

There was there of course, a good deal of obvious harassment. I think it was my first year there that there was a Pravda correspondent in New York who'd had his car stolen by a genuine auto thief. The car was found several days later in a junkyard or some place with all of the seats taken out and the battery and everything like that. I was going to an art exhibit in the Menage, which is right in front of the National Hotel right across from the Kremlin, and I took my big ugly Ford station wagon. At that time we were only allowed to have American cars and so I had this station wagon which I absolutely hated. It was sort of a bilious green and it was full of stuff from the commissary. I got out of my car and a militiaman was standing right there. I went into the Menage, saw the exhibit, came back and the car was gone. I said to the militiaman, "Where's my car?" He says, "What car?" So, I figured out that this was no doubt retaliation and indeed it was so precise retaliation that in the same number of days after they, the police called the embassy and said, "We found your car unfortunately it doesn't have any tires, it doesn't have any engine, it doesn't have any of this stuff, but please send the embassy tow truck down to pick it up." I said, "Well, I don't really think I'll do that. I fortunately have my car insured by the Soviet government insurance agency. Ingostrakh. You tell me the car is a total wreck, I'll have the insurance company come and take a look at it." That infuriated them of course because the last thing that the KGB expected to do was to have the Soviet insurance company pay me for the car. Apparently some of this fury was picked up later in terms of what we heard from the telephone conversations that were going on at the time. But the insurance company paid, I took the money, I went to Finland and I got myself a new Volvo station wagon for the same amount of money. Jake Beam, who was then the ambassador, managed to assign me to go up to be present at the beginning of the SALT Talks in Helsinki as a means of being able to let Peggy and me go up to pick up the car. So, that turned out all right.

Q: Were there any problems during this first time you were there in '68 to '70 as far as provocations for you or your family or anything like that?

BARRY: I mean there were the kinds of things where we would say we were going out and we would forget something and come back to the apartment and find that the wires were all hanging out of the walls because they had started to improve the listening devices and that kind of thing. Actually one of the, I guess we took a nanny with us who was not a very bright woman, but she fell in with a Russian who lived somewhere in that same complex and it turned out the Russian's uncle was one of the people that monitored our tapes and she got taken into the room or found the room where they had all these tapes running, but provocations in the sense of the kind of thing one usually thinks of, entrapment, no. But it happened to other people and we were actually probably excessively warned to keep our heads down. We arrived there on the day before the Soviets invaded Czechoslovakia. All social contacts were forbidden, deep freeze in relations so that first year was conditioned very much by all that. Yes, I remember one of the first things I don't know how we fell into this group, but there was a group of Russians who were clearly very much disenchanted by all this. We were doing something with them, which involved watching the hockey game between Czechoslovakia, and the Soviet Union in which the Czechs unexpectedly beat the pants off the Russians. This was a case of great celebration by the Russians who were there who were feeling pretty bad about what had happened.

Q: Obviously you were focused on consular affairs. This was early Brezhnev, wasn't it?

BARRY: Early Brezhnev.

Q: What were you getting sort of from your colleagues who were dealing more with the government than?

BARRY: Because of the Czech thing we had not very much to do with the government at that time. This was the time when we had hoped, when Johnson had hoped to have the beginning of the SALT negotiations at the end of his term. This was the time when Vietnam was escalating and there was lots of propaganda about Vietnam. Actually we in the consular section were not all that busy and so we did have time and inclination to do a fair amount of reporting as well. I took my particular specialty, Soviet law, especially Soviet criminal law, and followed a lot of the cultural things going on. I think George Humphrey did some of the same things. We were both scheduled to go on to the political section for our second year there. I remember that I sent a memo to Coby Swank, the DCM at that time, a copy of which I still have someplace saying, here we are sitting down here with not enough to do for three of us in the consular section. We'd really like to supplement what the embassy is doing and other things and so please give us assignments and things to do. I think really during that period we spent as much time doing reporting as we did doing consular work.

The consular cases, well there were some interesting protection cases. I remember one automobile accident out and around Smolensk where Americans had been in a crash. It was still possible to drive your car although it was kind of hard to do in those days. So, we went out to visit these people who were in a regular old hospital in the back woods. The regular old hospitals in Moscow weren't so hot, but out there in the countryside they had nothing. They were sort of in these gurneys along the wall of the corridor of the hospital. Because they had been so smashed up in their faces the treatment that they had used to reduce the suffusion of blood was leeches. The daughter was a registered nurse and was initially kind of horrified by it, but as she saw how this all worked, she thought well this isn't such a bad idea after all.

Q: What was your impression of Soviet law? Did you get a feel for it beyond what happened with Americans, which would be almost atypical? With others I mean was it a solid working system did you feel?

BARRY: Well, it was very much slanted in favor of the State. By the time a case had proceeded through a preliminary investigation a decision had been made as to whether the person was guilty or not. The only question was what the degree of severity of the sentence should be. In a way this is true of any Napoleonic code country because the procurator or the investigator has the task of both prosecution and defense as it were. We did go to a fair number of trials, just to Russian trials where you can walk into courtrooms and sit down just to be able to observe the nature of the proceedings. They had a judge and they had two so-called peoples' assessors who were sort of the functional equivalent of a jury-people who were not trained in the law, but sat in with the judge to help make up their minds on things like this. The legal community was very much under the gun under the communist party and we were in a case for example of some of the people who we got to know because they were defending Americans were occasionally people who were before people who had defended dissidents. They were certainly not good for your legal practice to do that kind of thing and you could get yourself removed from the Lawyers Collegium, which was the group of lawyers who dealt with these thing, if you were too assiduous of your defense of somebody.

The other thing we did a lot of in those days was to go to lectures, the so-called knowledge society ran lectures on international affairs, on domestic affairs and people who held the title of lecturers of the communist party would go around and appear in so-called red corners of the housing units and in other public venues to sort of give people the low down of what was going on in the world or at home. Then the various deputies at election time would go out and lecture and sort of present themselves to their constituents as then would-be representative in the parliament. These were generally much more revealing than the newspapers, they weren't supposed to be for foreigners. If they knew you were a foreigner they wouldn't let you in, but we would sort of dress up looking our most Russian and we would buy subscriptions to the lectures and we'd go to the door and pay our two rubles and walk in and sit down. I think in many ways that was the most productive reporting we had on domestic political issues and some foreign policy issues. I mean I recall going to these appearances of deputies and being convinced at the very depth of cynicism about the political system because the people in general were complaining and dismissing whatever promises they heard. I mean, there was this one woman who stood up in one of these lectures and said that, "I've been coming to these lectures for 20 years ever since the end of the war. You're the fifth deputy that's come up here. Every time one of you comes I say in 1944 an artillery shell came through the wall of my apartment and the next day somebody put up some boards to keep the cold out, but nobody has ever come to repair it since." She said, "I'll bet you will say that you will see to it that somebody comes and repairs my apartment, but I'll bet you that ten years from now that wall will still be unrepaired." Indeed, when I was back in Moscow a few weeks ago as an election observer I ran into the same kind of complaints by people about their elected representatives. People would ask questions about Vietnam and doesn't the war in Vietnam mean that there's no way in which we and the Americans would get along. The lecturers would essentially say, "No, no, I mean the Vietnamese have got their own problems. It's very important for us to get along with the Americans" and that kind of thing. At the same time you'd hear some of the most scandalous stories about the kinds of subversion that the American Embassy was up to and things like that, but these lectures were I think a very valuable insight into the society.

Q: You were in the political section from what?

BARRY: This was '69 to '70 and to my surprise I was double hatted. The person who had been the Middle East person, was Norman Anderson, was somebody who genuinely knew something about the Middle East, but for some reason or other they were short on people that year, maybe somebody had been expelled, but I was partly the multilateral section and partly the internal section. The multilateral portfolio I had was the Middle East which was interesting because that was the time in which we were carrying out first quadripartite and then bilateral negotiations with the Soviets about the Middle East in the wake of the '67 war. The idea was to develop a framework for peace talks and of course the Soviets wanted to be co-chairman and wanted to establish their own droit de regard over events in the Middle East. We were eager to keep them out, but on the other hand, their relationships with the Egyptians and the Syrians and such was such that we couldn't entirely exclude them. This was the time that Joe Sisco was assistant secretary. Roy Atherton was the office director in charge of the bilateral negotiations so they were coming back and forth and Joe and Roy would come and we would have discussions with the Soviets in hopes of developing this bilateral track into something that would allow more progress to take place in the four power forum which is what we preferred, but which the Soviets didn't really want to play ball and they didn't want to emphasize the bilateral part of it. So, it was there that I got to know Primakov who was the Middle East correspondent of Izvestiya who is now the foreign minister and a lot of people in the foreign ministry in the Middle East division and in the Americas division. While on the internal side I followed things like some of the dissident trials and I guess developments in, the Sinyausky-Daniel case and all that kind of thing. That was a quite interesting combination of things to do.

Q: Our ambassador was Malcolm Toon the whole time you were there?

BARRY: No. Toon was office director in Washington and later deputy assistant secretary. He didn't come to Moscow until the '80s. My first ambassador was Tommy Thompson and the second year it was Jake Beam.

Q: Could you tell a little about how first Thompson and then Beam ran, I mean your impression of how they both ran the embassy and how they, what you were getting from them about?

BARRY: Well, Thompson was very distant. It was his second time there. He'd had a marvelous first tour during the Khrushchev period where things were quite open and he was able to go to receptions and talk to Khrushchev and talk to all the key people. The second time the relationship was not doing well to say the least. This was in the early Brezhnev years and so it didn't have the sort of spontaneity it had before. I think he was not in the best of health at that time and I think he really didn't feel he needed an embassy. He was the person who knew everything there was to know about the place and so he was a rather distant figure I say after being there for a year and then going to his staff meetings every week. I know he didn't know who I was.

Q: I had the same feeling in Belgrade with George Kennan. He would go around and say, "What do we hear from the political section, Alex? and from the consular section?" You know, I mean and all this I realized he never really focused on who I was. Let me, wait a second, this just went off.

BARRY: Jack Beam was a different sort of a person and his wife Peggy was a very engaging person who wanted to involve everybody, very warm. I guess Beam was in Prague at the time of the invasion, so had been there before of course but it had been right after the war. He didn't have the long background in Soviet affairs that Thompson did so he was sort of feeling his way and of course he's a very laconic sort of personality, but somebody who was always interested in what people had to say. So, I think he and the embassy felt more engaged than before. The two DCMs who were there were first Coby Swank and then Boris Klosson. They were both very good. Basically it was a very good embassy both of those years. Stape Roy was there in the multilateral section with me at the time and Tom Niles and many others who'd gone on to very distinguished careers.

Q: Did you notice any difference (I mean obviously you were not at the level where you would feel it unless it came sort of ajar,) but the arrival of the Nixon administration in '69 on relations with the Soviet Union and Henry Kissinger was the national security advisor?

BARRY: Well, I had a lot to do with that later on, but I think the first awareness that I had of it was a trip by Kissinger to Moscow which they had not advised me that he was coming. I guess the only way that Jake found out about it was when the foreign ministry called him and invited him to go say goodbye to Henry as he left which I can say was not taken very well, not only by the ambassador, but by the other officers. I think in that period these Middle East negotiations were going on in the Nixon administration. There was the bilateral thing that Joe Sisco was doing, so in that sense, in some ways things had thawed out since the invasion of Czechoslovakia. At that stage the Russians all assumed that Nixon was going to be a extreme anti-communist and were the propaganda was very anti-Nixon and there were not great expectations.

Q: Then you went to Leningrad. What was the background of opening up Leningrad?

BARRY: We had had consulates in the USSR before the war. We had a consulate in Leningrad, which had been in the location of our previous embassy in St. Petersburg. We had, during the war, a consulate in Vladivostok. These were shut down after the war and during the period of concern about internal security and the McCarthy period and so forth. The USSR kept travel restrictions on Americans in the Soviet Union and we had reciprocated by putting restrictions on their travel in the U.S. Mac Toon in particular, who was the director of Soviet affairs in the late '60s, believed that it was important for us to open more windows on the USSR because he felt that we were more restricted in the information that we could gather than they were in what they could get through open sources in the U.S. He worked on the issue of a consular convention with the USSR which could give us greater rights in terms of access to arrested citizens and regulate citizenship cases and things like that. This had slow going in the congress because they were very suspicious of anything like that. They thought that it was going to lead to the opening of many Soviet consulates in the U.S., which the FBI was against. We made the argument that the two things were divisible, that we could have a consular convention without having consulates. Then the consular convention did go through the congress. It was ratified. We then used it to good effect in being able to insist upon access to arrested Americans in three to five days and all those regulations that went along with it. Then the discussion began of reciprocal consulates in San Francisco and in Leningrad. By 1970 that had been agreed in principle, but of course the great problem was premises. They didn't want to give us anything that would be either too centrally located or would enable us to carry out intelligence operations that they didn't want us to do and of course our people had the same problem in San Francisco. They got themselves a quite desirable space in a high location in San Francisco and they offered us quite unsatisfactory office premises that had common walls with a building on both sides, which was bad from a security point of view.

The consul general at the time, Culver Gleysteen, was quite happy with the consul general's residence, which was a small palace, which had been occupied at one point by one of the Czar's mistresses. He was in favor of moving in, but the question of office space had not been satisfactorily resolved. So when I went there in the summer of '71, our office and our living space was in the Hotel Astoria. It was at least a step up from where they wanted to put us, which was the Hotel Baltiskaya, fit only for spies and dogs. We worked out of a suite in the Astoria and lived there with our three children, dog, and a teacher we had to bring along for our children. There were at that point two other families there, and the consul general and his wife. That circumstance, well it was quite interesting.

Q: You were there from 1971?

BARRY: Until '73. Because this was a place where there had been no NATO diplomats before, the local KGB had not yet quite caught up with the surveillance issue. So, in that sense it was more open than Moscow, although at times I think that I was used as the training vehicle for the KGB because I would always have three or four cars following me at the same time.

There were lots of things that went on there that you could gain access to you which you wouldn't have had access to in Moscow. Public lectures or quasi-public lectures or closed party meetings were some of the more interesting events. By sort of looking as much like a grungy Russian as possible you could walk into these meetings because they often put posters on the wall advertising that there was going to be a discussion by a party instructor at a closed meeting. You could go in there and listen to all this stuff and later report on it. Of course we didn't have any classified communications facilities so the way we'd do that is we would write it out in longhand, take it down to the train from Helsinki to Moscow because there would be an American on that train as a courier. You'd run down to the train station about midnight and stick your envelope through the window to the courier who would carry it down to the embassy.

We sometimes got very interesting information that ended up on the president's desk. One of them this was at the time that I think Kosygin was in Vietnam we were bombing Haiphong. We did this when Kosygin was there, and we did not know if this meant that the Nixon summit would be called off. I was in this closed party meeting at the time when somebody raised this question and the answer from the party instructor was, "No, we discussed that in the party and we have decided that this meeting must go ahead, that it is possible to have reductions of tensions despite U.S. actions in Vietnam." That was the first time we'd heard anything about that through all of our various sophisticated intelligence gathering. That bit of information sort of floated to the top. In Moscow I would run around from one of these things to another and listening to what they said about both economic and political issues and international relations in general and in Leningrad I did the same.

Q: Well, I've heard from others, too, saying that during these discussions, the public would come in and ask quite frank questions and they'd get quite frank answers, completely different from the gobbledygook that came out of Pravda or something like that?

BARRY: Exactly. That was I think probably our most valuable political reporting source.

Q: Did you have much contact with the Soviets?

BARRY: Much more than we did in Moscow. Eventually I think after about six months of living in the Hotel Astoria we got into our apartment. We got a quite nice apartment. It actually was a six-room apartment that had seven families in it before we moved in. It had been built of course as a one family apartment and then we went through it once and a local diplomatic service corps was showing us this possibility. In each of the six rooms there were families, and one room was divided in half, so there were two families in there. The people who lived there were not unhappy to be moved out because it meant that they went back to the top of the list for a separate apartment as opposed to a communal apartment. So, we moved in there and we were the only foreign family in the building. In Moscow of course we lived in a completely segregated facility with guards outside who kept the Russians out. We had some fairly substantial personal contacts with the neighbors in the building including a navy lieutenant commander who invited us to dinner at his house. The people upstairs from us were I think there because of the listening devices that were directed at us, but their kids came and played with ours. So, we had Soviet children in the apartment playing and our children went out and played hockey with them. We knew the sort of dissident crowd; artists and one person that we knew quite well. He used to come by; he began to ask us about Nixon's plans for when he came to Leningrad. I could tell this wasn't a smart thing to talk about in front of the microphones. He didn't reappear in our lives again until three or four years later when he turned up on our doorstep in Washington. What had happened to him was that he had been arrested and taken to an insane asylum and had been committed. His mother was a doctor of some kind, so she got him out, but only to get an exit visa and he was required to go immediately to Israel. He didn't like Israel much either so he got out of there. I think he ended up at the Thunderbird School of Business in Arizona. Then he came back to Washington. Anyhow, that was the kind of experience that we also knew quite well. We knew the painter Rukhin and his family, he eventually died in a fire in his studio, which some people accused the KGB of setting.

Well, we spent a lot of time preparing for the Nixon summit because one of the features of that was a side trip to Leningrad where there was a very detailed program of things for him to do. Our job was to ensure that the palace at Pavlovsk, which was one of the gems of the Czarist era, was properly prepared for the Nixon visit. That included replacing the Turkish bomb sights with real toilets in case the president or his wife needed to use them. Everything went smoothly, but within six hours after the Nixons left the toilets were removed again and reassembled at some party chieftain's place. The head of the local party organization at that time was Romanov as in the Czars and one of his notable adventures was that when his daughter got married he got all of the Romanov porcelain table settings out of the Hermitage and set the table for the wedding. I remember things were broken presumably as a result of throwing them around during the party. But Romanov was quite a hardliner and he was a full member of the politburo at that time.

Q: He was considered one of the heirs presumptive, too, wasn't he?

BARRY: For a while.

Q: For a while.

BARRY: There was a longstanding rivalry between Leningrad and Moscow and the other thing that Romanov got himself into was the support for the idea of making Leningrad the capital of the Russian Federation. They would keep Moscow as the capital of the USSR, but all of this, I mean that was how Kirov got himself in trouble back in 1934. So, I think Romanov overstepped himself. There was a lot of sentiment for Leningrad as being a more European city.

Q: Did you notice a difference between the thrust of what you call political and cultural life between Leningrad and Moscow?

BARRY: Well, certainly the theater in Leningrad was very active. As today there are dozens of beautiful theaters. The Kirov Ballet and the opera was eclipsed by the Bolshoi, but of course it had a proud tradition of its own. All the people of Leningrad thought they were more cultured than the people were in Moscow.

Q: Unlike those "nekultarni" in Moscow?

BARRY: Right. We did run into a lot of the former aristocracy one way or the other, walking the dog. Peggy ran into an elderly woman who was left over from the old days and still had the part of her old apartment, but then people were, once you announced who you were and why you were there, then obviously they knew that you were a dangerous person to be around. We had a dacha on the Baltic Sea north of Leningrad which was a very nice place to spend weekends and go skiing on the ice in the Baltic and drive to Finland and so forth. The diplomatic community was much smaller than in Moscow. Our closest friends were the Finns. Of course, their main task aside from maintaining friendly relationships with the bear at their doorstep, was to pick up the odd Finn who had forgotten to get back on the boat after coming over on the weekend to get cheap Vodka. The Finns knew the country quite well. We were standing on the review stand for the parade for the great October socialist revolution and a Cuban colleague gave us all Cuban cigars and our Finnish colleague gave us all Finnish Vodka to keep us warm. There were no other NATO countries that were represented at the time.

Q: How about American tourism or West European tourism, I mean, the great cultural center. Was there much going on?

BARRY: There wasn't very much going on then. I mean we had occasional American cultural groups coming through, but it was I think still pretty much off the beaten track.

Q: How about the Nixon visit, how did that go?

BARRY: It went smoothly, but there were certainly some rough parts leading up to it. I remember Peggy Beam being absolutely enraged by this marine major who was part of the advance. He was running around the house checking it over for the Nixons and Mrs. Beam was talking about how we were going to do the dinner here and his response to her was lady get out of here. We're doing this and we don't want you to be hanging over our shoulder all the time. So, I don't think from that point of view it went well. All advance parties can be very difficult to deal with. This was probably the most difficult one I can remember.

Q: Did you have much contact with the embassy I mean were there courier trips back and forth?

BARRY: Yes, we went down once a week or every couple of weeks. People from the embassy came up to visit us, particularly the attaches.

Q: Was there a feeling that having Leningrad, I mean you were there obviously in the early days, was it a good thing, was everybody pretty pleased?

BARRY: There was certainly no feeling that what we were reporting was in any sense undermining the embassy reporting or anything of that sort.

Q: What about the Baltic States? Could you talk about the special treatment relationship we had with them and your role in that?

BARRY: That was part of our consular district. While the ambassador and senior people in the embassy were not allowed to be in the Baltic States because of our non-recognition policy, because we had the consular mandate could and did travel extensively in Estonia, Lithuania, and Latvia. It did give us an insight into the depth of feeling there about Russian domination, the depth of the feelings against the Russians. Also, of course it was on a much higher economic level than most of provincial Russia. So, going to Tallinn, for example was a treat in more ways than one. They of course, did have a lot of contact across the Finnish gulf, across the Baltic Sea with Finns, Scandinavians. The KGB was pretty active there, they looked for any signs of nationalism getting out of control.

Q: Did you when you were looking at Leningrad at sort of the closer you get to the West, the more things sort of seem to be a little closer to less more barbaric or civilized, it's long term, but did you get a feel for sort of how the Russian economy and the Russian, I mean the Soviet system was working there that was any different than what was seen in the Moscow optic?

BARRY: They did have a lot of heavy industry in Leningrad. I guess I would say that it was probably some of the best heavy industry they had. Defense industry and as we later found out when we entered some of these factories that had been off limits before, they were really state of the art. They tried to explain why they were so far advanced in one segment of the economy and so backward in others. The kinds of metal presses they had to use for example to make containment vessels for nuclear submarines were fantastic things. Later when I went to visit one of these factories after 1991 they had turned it into a consumer goods production claiming they were making beer-brewing machines using the same presses. I don't think it was ever economical. Also, by the way when we were there one of our interests was Murmansk, which was so important during World War II. A couple of times we went up to visit there because many of those people who died in World War II convoys are still buried in the graveyards of Murmansk; these were monuments to the sacrifices made by the Americans to keep Russia in the war something that was not a very popular theme at that time. Some of the more crude anti-American propaganda again goes back to the '60s was the story of the Colorado Beetle. I don't know if you remember that story, but the American potato beetle began to move across Europe in the 1930s. It got to Czechoslovakia about 1948 or '49 and moved from there across gradually to infest larger and larger areas of the Warsaw Pact. There was a famous poster that was up all over the place that showed millions of these little beetles with CIA written on their sides being dropped out of airplanes by parachutes. The story was that this was an effort to sabotage the economy of the former Soviet Union or of the Warsaw Pact. There's a famous incident that Ellis Briggs talks about in his book, Farewell to Foggy Bottom. Anyhow Ellis Briggs talks about receiving a diplomatic note from the foreign ministry talking about the depredations of the potato beetle and citing its Latin name and insisting that the U.S. stop this aggression against the Czech people. He wrote a marvelous note in response. The conclusion was that the potato beetle and he gave its Latin name should never be able to gnaw away at the ties of friendship that join the Czech and American peoples.

Q: What about, were you having any problems with people seeking asylum, that sort of thing?

BARRY: Well, from time to time we would get feelers from some people who either wanted to be recruited or who wanted to entrap us into a recruitment situation and you never could be sure how to respond to those things. I turned them over to the person on the staff who was responsible for that kind of thing. One day on a park bench I sat down next to an old man who really looked as if he had lived through hell. He said that he had been in the Polish army in 1939 and after the collapse of Poland he had been taken with many others to labor camps in the USSR and in this case he had been in a uranium mine in Central Asia. Of course the conditions there were appalling. He said that at one point after Stalin died, he was still restricted to living in that area although the labor camp was closed down. But he had managed to conceal himself on the roof of a freight train that made its way across the steppes and had ended up in Belorussia and had sought out Polish consul and the Polish consul had said, "Oh, yes we'll be glad to help you, but you just have to go across the street here to get your papers regularized." Of course, across the street was the KGB and they immediately sent him back to Central Asia. I guess he had suffered terribly from this train ride because he'd frozen large parts of his body. He went back to the camp and by this time it was 1973 and he had been allowed to leave the area and come back to Leningrad or Moscow, but not ever back to Poland. That was the kind of tale you'd heard from people in those days.

Q: Was there any problem with harassment or enticement or that sort of thing?

BARRY: I was certainly regarded as and publicly identified as being with the CIA, so yes, close surveillance, but I didn't suffer any active harassment, nor did my family. I think as long as you didn't try to trick these people by trying to get out from under the surveillance it would be okay. Now there one of my colleagues did suffer some active harassment and dangerous situations including some kind of confrontation on a bridge.

Q: The initial staff of our consulate general, how many Americans were there?

BARRY: Four.

Q: The consul general was.

BARRY: Culver Gleysteen.

Q: He's part of the three brothers, Dirk and Bill. Bill Gleysteen was my ambassador in Korea at one point, but the three brothers sort of went separate ways in the Foreign Service. How did he operate?

BARRY: He and I did not get along particularly well. His wife, Flicka, was an extremely difficult person I would say. He was very interested in the care and maintenance of his palace. He was not much into the reporting side of things and I think while I was stirring up the pot by doing all this stuff he wrote me an efficiency report which downgraded my reporting while at the same time the DCM put me in for the reporting award. So, it was kind of an uncomfortable relationship. He was I would say the least successful of the Gleysteen brothers. I think it bothered him. He was the son of missionaries in China and he used to talk about the hardships of his life in Beijing.

Q: What was again I mean, you know, we keep looking at the Soviet Union and the whole Soviet economy was to collapse in less than 20 years from the time you were there. I mean both the political and the economic system really went down. Was that at all, from your observation or others, was this at all a thought in our minds that this is a limited system or how did we feel? I'm trying to capture the time.

BARRY: I don't think any of us thought that, least of all Dick Nixon. It's interesting what Putin said in his speech to the Bundestag the other day, that we listened a lot more to the Soviet Union when they were adversaries than we do today to Russia when it wants to be a partner. We were still living under the impression that Khrushchev tried to create with Sputnik and we were going to be overtaken by Russia. Zbig Brzezinski perpetuated the idea of the arc of crisis, an aggressive growing system that presents a threat to us that will only become more serious over the years. Of course that was also fostered by those intelligence analysts who thought that there was an advantage in making the adversaries seem more capable than it really was because it would be helpful in terms of getting more money for our own.

Q: There is sort of a thesis that Kissinger and his twin almost, Richard Nixon, felt that the Soviet system... We were playing almost a defensive game at that time that the Soviet system looked so powerful it was hard for democracies to stand up to them?

BARRY: Well, certainly if you, found Dobrynin's memoirs particularly interesting in that regard because I think Dobrynin recognized more of the weaknesses of his own system than Kissinger did and of course this whole idea of carrying this all out in great secrecy made it even more difficult to manage.

Q: When the news of the Kissinger secret visits and all, did this permeate sort of a real unhappiness or dislike or something of Kissinger that would sort of permeate our American diplomat group?

BARRY: Oh, sure. Of course, Dobrynin had full access to Kissinger and the discussion that went on between them were not made available either to the embassy in Moscow or to the Secretary of State or anything of that kind. Ambassador Beam wanted to establish equal access himself in which he was not particularly successful and of course Gromyko much preferred to have this handled in Washington because Dobrynin was able to free wheel in ways that Gromyko himself was not. The system in Moscow was very rigid and in every discussion about the Americans and American policy had to be approved by the Politburo. But Dobrynin was free to talk on a what if basis, so I think during that period there were one or two discussions between Beam and Gromyko, but because Beam was not aware of any of the things that were discussed in the Dobrynin channel it didn't work very well.

Q: How about the Vietnam War? We were beginning to disengage, but how did that play in Leningrad?

BARRY: There was a rather vociferous propaganda about the incursion into Cambodia, the bombings of Hanoi and Haiphong and all that. It certainly didn't lead to any personal hostility. I do remember when Jane Fonda ended up in Moscow and came down to demonstrate against American policy in front of the American embassy and was whisked away by the KGB because this had not been a planned demonstration. She was heard to exclaim when she was bundled into the car, "Heavy man, heavy."

Q: Oh, lord. Then in '73 wither?

BARRY: Back to Washington. I looked around for something to do to remain involved in Soviet affairs, but there wasn't anything open at the moment. My old friend and colleague Kempton Jenkins got in touch with me and said how would I like to run the USSR division of the Voice of America. It sounded interesting to me because instead of getting to manage one-third of a secretary, there were 140 people there, and three or four divisions. The Russia division, Ukrainian, Uzbek, a couple of others, Georgian, Azeri. So, I took that and came back and found it quite interesting. It was at the time of the beginning of the unraveling of detente. It was the time of the growth of dissent and the impact of Sakharhov, Solzhenitsyn and all that. The people working there, most of them of course were emigrants. Different waves of immigrants, some were from before the war, some of them were, one of the leading people there was a Chechan who had been a member of the institute of red professors and he had defected and I guess probably made his way to VOA. Anyhow, there were some who were Jewish and there were some that were anti-Semitic and they spent a lot of time fighting with each other. The Ukrainians would fight with the Russians and all that sort of thing so it required a firm hand often. Also there was the usual stress and strain of the State Department telling us what to report, what not to report. We've seen it again recently about reporting the comments of Osama Bin Laden and of course the idea of many of the people there is that we are journalists just like any other and we report all the news whenever we see it. Kissinger was particularly upset about the amount of attention paid to Solzhenitsyn and Sakharhov and we would regularly hear from our colleagues at the State Department or from the USIA regional office that we had to tone this down. At some point I did because it was getting to the point where every other sentence was about this and nothing else was being reported. Then of course the people who I told not to do it so often went to the press and complained there. But it was an interesting experience. There were some wonderful young people there who had learned Russian as exhibit guides. Jill Dougherty from CNN was one of them and she was able to broadcast in fluent Russian and on the air all the time.

Q: But, you were there from '73 until?

BARRY: Until mid-'74 I guess. In mid-'74 the job of deputy director at EUR/SOV came up much to my surprise because I was then a fairly junior FSO-3. I was asked to take this job. There were three, four deputies I guess, but this was the senior deputy and so the other people were senior to me. I guess I took it over from Stape Roy who went on to the China desk. I moved over then and shortened my tour with VOA.

Q: With the VOA at that time when you would get complaints from the State Department or elsewhere, you know, that you're overdoing this, let's not exacerbate our relations too much. How were these treated?

BARRY: I basically used my own judgment. I mean, I realized that we had to report all these things with credibility. I did also realize that there was a point beyond which we were doing what Radio Liberty and Radio Free Europe were supposed to do.

The other thing that was going on at that time was Watergate. I heard lots of complaints including from the Russians about why you're reporting all this stuff about Watergate. As Dobrynin's memoirs indicate the Russians never could believe that somebody as skillful as Nixon would have gotten himself into this kind of situation and that it couldn't be fixed overnight. A lot of our people in the staff didn't like reporting this stuff either, they thought it was not in our national interest to be airing our dirty linen, but that had to be reported for credibility. There were two lines of news reporting, one was the English reporting which was translated into Russian and carried and that I didn't have anything to do with because it was just a matter of automatically translating it. But then there was an awful lot of stuff that was original, it was either features or filler or news items from within the USSR that would be of particular interest. At one point I was warned about what we were saying in Uzbek. Now nobody in the management staff spoke any Uzbek. The guy who was the head of the Uzbek service was probably somebody who had been involved in the para military actions against the Soviet Union during or after the war. I did finally hire somebody who did know Uzbek an academic from the outside who could come and tell me what was going on and it turned out that what was going on was pan-turanian propaganda. We had to get rid of him.

Q: Where were you getting your material?

BARRY: We had correspondents in the USSR. We had stringers. We had both English speaking correspondents and Russian speaking correspondents. A lot of people in the periphery who would pick things up that were in the Russian language journals.

Q: Were you considered, or were you looking over your shoulder at the BBC Russian service?

BARRY: Oh, yes. Well, we were complementary in many ways. We exchanged visits, the head of the division in the BBC and I listened to them to see if they had things we didn't and so forth. It was difficult to adjust to because when you went to work you stayed until everybody has gone home. Of course, VOA was on 18 hours a day so I had to get used to the idea that you don't stay in the office all the time you're on the air. This led to a more relaxed existence than might have otherwise been the case.

Q: Were you getting much feedback from the Soviet Union on what you were doing?

BARRY: You'd get regular complaints from the Soviet press about what was going on. One of the big issues was did we read some dissident documents. RFE and RL did that. I drew the line at reading large, long texts out loud on the air and wanted them simply to make excerpts. We'd certainly hear from groups in this country when they didn't like something that was going on. Usually, because some of the individuals within the Service would go and complain to them.

Q: You must have been carrying on a sort of a little war with all these various groups all of whom who had probably fought each other or something at one time or another?

BARRY: Yes, but I mean in general I would say that a lot of them, most of them were people who were generally interested in even handed journalism. They realized that this was lacking there and we should not imitate them, so I had particular respect for the person who was the head of the Russian service Victor Frantsuzov who was a very respected person within among the listeners. He was a sort of Walter Cronkite of the Russian service.

***

Q: In '74 you went to back to SOV and you were there until when?

BARRY: I'm trying to remember, let's see, when did Carter come in?

Q: Carter came in in '77, January of '77.

BARRY: Okay, when Carter came in I went over from SOV to be the director of UN political affairs. I was in EUR/SOV from '74 to '77.

Q: What was sort of the structure of SOV and where did you fit in?

BARRY: The director was Mark Garrison, deputy director was me. There was a director of bilateral affairs or the head of the office of bilateral affairs I think was Jack Scanlan. There was the director of the multilateral affairs office who I think was Sherrod McCall. There was the director of economic affairs. There was a director of exchanges. That was Sol Polanski, so there were four heads of offices.

Q: It must have been difficult because this was again during the Kissinger era, I mean he was very much.

BARRY: The era was extremely frustrating.

Q: Because the things that you knew nothing about was stirring around all the time, weren't they?

BARRY: And yet we were being asked to write papers for senior people to go do things and we knew that for everyone of these things there were two briefing books. There was a real briefing book that had been put together by people who were in the know and there was the briefing book that we struggled to put together and had to sort of guess at what was going on.

Q: Was there any effort made to say, "Come on fellows let's straighten this out?"

BARRY: This was a job that had to be done above our pay grade. This was Bill Rogers' problem and Art Hartman was Assistant Secretary. They left some things to us, bilateral issues, and we tried to get involved in the arms control business and we wrote papers on that, but I doubt that any of them had much resonance. Hal Sonnenfeldt when Kissinger came over to be Secretary of State, Sonnenfeldt and his crowd sort of ran Soviet affairs directorate of their own.

Q: He was counselor of the department?

BARRY: Let's see, he was at INR at first. Then I guess he went over to be a staff member at Kissinger's NSC and then he came back as counselor and he had a bunch of aides working for him.

Q: Should I mention that? I'm just coming to that part. I'm interviewing Hal now and I'll be doing it next week or something. I mean was it a heavy-handed operation?

BARRY: Oh, yes. Of the one bridge between us all I guess Bill Suhinn had been in SOV I guess and then he went over to work on Hal's staff. He was somebody who would share things with us. The rest of them would not. I think if Sonnenfeldt or Kissinger ever found out that he was sharing anything with us it would have been too bad for them.

Q: During '74 to '76 how did you see, you say detente was becoming falling apart?

BARRY: It was falling apart in part because of Soviet activities in the third world and I guess this was the time of Angola and of Cuba getting involved. It was falling apart because of domestic criticism of and it was falling apart in part because Brezhnev himself was in decline and was unable to delink the solution of the SALT agreement with another summit. They had summits in '72, '73 and I guess '74 was the last summit and by that time U.S. critics were already accusing Nixon of using the Soviet card to hold onto power. They had a number of agreements on the prevention of nuclear war and all this stuff, which were under attack by the right wing, including right wing democrats. This was the period of Jackson-Vanik and the insistence on agreement to a quota of immigration before SALT I could be ratified.

Q: Were we seeing Brezhnev as somebody whose sort of hold on power was getting weaker maybe because of age?

BARRY: No, I don't think we did at all. In fact it was at that point that we saw Nixon's hold on power reducing. I think we underestimated the degree to which Brezhnev's hardening of the arteries had affected him. Of course if you read Dobrynin he never had much of a free hand in many of these things because of the need for consensus among the Politburo, on all the various initiatives that would be taken. The area where Brezhnev was most confident because of his position before of being in charge of the military industrial complex was essentially SALT, but he had opposition from both Grechko and Ustinov about a lot of these issues. Marshall Grechko, the Defense Minister, and Ustinov, the member of the Politburo responsible for military production.

Q: Were you seeing any affects with the so-called China cards at that time?

BARRY: This was the time of the Usuri River clashes between Russian and Chinese troops. There was widespread rumor at the time that Brezhnev had sought U.S. acquiescence in a Soviet nuclear attack on China, something I don't think was ever put that boldly but I suspect there were fairly strong hints of it. Of course, Kissinger definitely had a strategy in mind of linkage. China played a large part in this linkage. There was more stress and strain about the third world I think about Cuban activity, it got worse as the situation deteriorated until finally in 1979 with Afghanistan that it went all away. It was a steadily building cycle of things.

Q: Were we looking at, you know the Soviets were making a significant investment in Africa, were you sort of talking to our people in the African bureau and trying to figure out what the hell, what does this really mean, or was it just in general, I mean, they're spreading their influence and this is a bad thing?

BARRY: Well, I think what we figured it meant was that they had an ideological commitment to this and they believed in that part of the idea of peaceful coexistence which sort of amounts to what's mine is mine and what's yours is negotiable. In Dobrynin's explanation of it, the issues having to do with the third world were not in the hands of the foreign ministry at all, they were in the hands of the international department of the CPSU headed by Boris Ponomarev who really believed in the ideological commitment. Dobrynin wonders out loud, what kind of a dog did we have in this fight? Why were we interested in it? He says, look at the situation now, did we make any lasting gains in the area? Of course, then there was the whole Egypt-Israel issue, the six day war, the resupply, Soviet resupply of the Egyptian armed forces in was it '72?

Q: '67 was it '67? Then there was the October war, which I think was '72.

BARRY: That's right. Well, that put a major strain on the whole relationship, too because at that point they had alerted some paratroop units and they began to resupply things. We both did in fact at the time.

Q: Did you have a feeling, you know I sometimes try to get the attitude, that Kissinger because of his great diplomatic triumph if you want to call it that was the opening to China, was a little too much on the Chinese side than on the Soviet side or not?

BARRY: I thought so at the time and I still do. Although he was frequently denying that he was doing any of this because of a desire to get at the Soviets I concluded that was very much what he was doing. He made little effort to disguise it.

***

Q: So, then you moved over to the Soviet desk? So, your job was?

BARRY: Deputy Assistant Secretary for the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe.

Q: And you did this from early '79?

BARRY: To '81.

Q: What was the state of relations in '79 to '81, well the first things really went through a change, but when you arrived there in '79, the Carter administration had put a lot of emphasis on trying to change things around.

BARRY: Well, of course, the previous period had been the decline and fall of detente. The Carter administration came in with a high emphasis on human rights and they desired to make a change in the way, which we carried out our strategic arms program so that we could get things through the congress. So, this was a period of considerable distrust on the part of the Soviet leadership. Brezhnev was still alive, but he was weakened at that point. He had had a number of small strokes and was certainly not able to think on his feet. The period started out with insistence on the immigration issue, Sakharov, Solzhenitsyn and so forth. I think one of the early steps was Carter's letter to Sakharov, which caused a great stir in the Soviet Union. Now, Marshall Shulman was then the Special Advisor to the Secretary for Soviet Affairs. As it turned out, I learned later why he wanted me in this job. Because I had at some point when I was in the office of Soviet affairs filled in for Hal Sonnenfeldt at the UN association which was about to take a trip to Moscow. Cy Vance was on that delegation and Marshall Shulman was putting it together. Apparently the briefing I gave was something that had favorably impressed Marshall and so that's why I got this job. I was closely involved with Marshall and of course he was close to Vance. But Brzezinski and the people at NSC took a different line. So, that was a constant struggle throughout that period having to deal with that. The Soviet invasion of Afghanistan was in 1979, and preparations for martial law were underway in Poland. So, it was a period of considerable turmoil. In arms control we sought deep cuts in land based nuclear missiles going beyond those that had been agreed in SALT. It was clear to me, and I think to Marshall, that it was never going to happen, it was too radical a departure. You couldn't pass over ratification of SALT to revise the agreement before it was ratified was definitely not going to work. Although I don't think people either didn't care or didn't realize it. It was ominous that we were going to do this. We went to Moscow as part of the delegation led by Vance and Harold Brown to present this to the Soviet leadership and I recall telling his people at that point, Les Gelb in particular that I could predict with considerable certainty that they were just going to reject this out of hand which they did. There was considerable disappointment and bitterness at the delegation that there had been so little progress.

Q: This was the Vance trip where he went to there and was shot down?

BARRY: Yes, in a press conference before we even got out of town, by Gromyko.

Q: Were people still moaning over why the Soviets didn't play along or something. I mean to have a new administration, a new Secretary of State that rebuffed sort of publicly right at the beginning, a damn fool way to start off an administration in terms of sort of a certain amount of good will?

BARRY: This was a year into the administration and the initial steps had not been very promising. The Soviets have always been more comfortable with republicans than with democrats. The emphasis during the campaign and the emphasis during the early days of the administration and the persona of Brzezinski I don't think promised very much to the Soviets. It's also clear from reading Dobrynin's memoirs that at that stage in particular the machinery of the Soviet Union was pretty much on automatic pilot. Nothing happened without the politburo endorsing it whereas Brezhnev was in a state of physical decline, the people who had a lot to say were people like Gromyko and Ustinov and they were not very they were disappointed in the failure of detente as they saw it and the state of the U.S. Soviet relations had been going down in the Nixon period. The Soviets still did think that Watergate was basically the accomplishment of the enemies of detente and they couldn't understand how a thing as trivial could have caused the downfall of the Nixon presidency.

Q: It wasn't on your watch, but obviously you were sitting there I mean meeting with them. What was the feeling in '79 when you came in, why did the promising period of detente under Kissinger and all had fallen this way?

BARRY: I think first and foremost the two sides have different expectations from the idea of detente. The Soviets felt that this was a commitment to geopolitical parity, that the Russians would be full partners. The two superpowers in the world, that there was a commitment to the whole arms control area to parity in all kinds of weapons, the Russians and their development of weapons systems and the deployment of the SS-20 missiles in Europe we saw as decoupling, as decoupling the U.S. from Europe. It was this whole thing combined with in '79 in Afghanistan, which was very much seen by Brzezinski as the crisis of the drive of the Soviet Union toward the Persian Gulf towards Pakistan in the south. We had at that point considerable debate about what to do about the invasion of Afghanistan. I remember one of the rather heated discussions on arming the mujahedeen and the release of Stinger missiles and the idea that once you have let these things out of the box you'd never get them back in again. Of course, I was just reading a commentary by Brzezinski again who was asked about the wisdom of this in light of such events and he still says that the result of the defeat of the Soviet Union in Afghanistan was actually the dissolution of the Soviet Union. From our point of view, we saw many people on our side saw the issue of peaceful coexistence as a method by which what's mine is mine and what's yours can be negotiated. So, that whole concept I think had been signed up by Kissinger on this agreement for the prevention of war was very much under attack by people who felt that signing up to this declaration was an unwise decision at best.

Q: When you got there in '79 was there a feeling we were going to try to repair relations or I mean on the State Department's side where the Brzezinski and the National Security Council the Brzezinski group was almost moving in a different direction?

BARRY: I don't think it was that stark. I think that on individual issues, particularly arms control issues because to a large degree the compass of the U.S. Soviet relations had increasingly been linked to the strategic arms limitations talks. I think our goal was to try to get the strategic arms agreement behind us, ratified, and then to move on in this and other arms control areas. I think that we realized the depth of irritation of the Soviet leadership didn't want public engagement of the president in some of these human rights issues. But, it wasn't that they wanted to destroy U.S. Soviet relations and we wanted to build them up. I think we placed more value on keeping a steady course in the relations and trying to proceed based upon what had been accomplished before. Of course a substantial amount of my time was spent on Eastern Europe. That was a little different in the sense that this was not Marshal Shulman's area. There was a lot going on around Eastern Europe at that time and I made a couple of trips out there. Yugoslavia was important post at that time. Larry Eagleburger was the ambassador. There were a number of bilateral issues. This was a time when the relationship with Czechoslovakia was very bad because they were still under the post Prague spring period. I'd say I spent half of my time on Eastern Europe things.

Q: Who were on the Soviet side of things how we and we obviously went to December of '79, but Marshal Shulmann what was his role and what was his background?

BARRY: He was a long time Soviet expert. He had been in the government back in the Truman administration. He was at Columbia. He was head of the Russian studies program at Columbia. He was a close friend of Cy Vance's and somebody who had a very good understanding of the Soviet Union. He was also a wonderful person. I was very close to him personally. He was not terribly well-equipped for the bureaucratic sword fights that go on in Washington. He was too nice a person. There were certainly lots of occasions in which Brzezinski took out after him publicly.

Q: You know, sometimes when you put two people from the same academic institution together I mean they spent all of their lives fighting each other at least I mean that's what academics do kind of.

BARRY: Well, I don't think Marshal was much of a bureaucrat. Brzezinski, actually I knew Brzezinski, I went to Columbia back after leaving the navy, Brzezinski had just come down from Harvard and I took a course from him. I don't think I took a course from Marshal. Brzezinski, I think, reflected the heritage of his Polish ancestors about Russia.

Q: How did you all evaluate the decision making process of the Kremlin? This was prior to the invasion of Afghanistan.

BARRY: It was pretty clear from Dobrynin's memoirs what it was like at that time. That is, although Brezhnev was a dynamic and innovative personality in the early stages of his career, by that time he was not at all. Everything passed through the Politburo and the conservatives on the Politburo had the upper hand. The people who had put a lot at stake for the improvement of the relations with the U.S. and the development of detente were by that time pretty well discredited because of the failure of the policy from the point of view of the Soviet Union. People like Ustinov, who was the head of the military industrial complex, people like the defense minister, Grechko, certainly had a much stronger position. The attitude was, we're going to hold to our course because this was something that we'd decided upon and it's right and we're not going to adjust.

Q: What was the role of Gromyko at that time?

BARRY: Well, he was a candidate member of the politburo. He was not an equal voice with the full members and he had always been a conservative in the sense of somebody who was inflexible particularly at that stage of the game when he realized that where the Politburo was going. He personally found Carter and Brzezinski irritating.

Q: With the Soviet Union we've come up to the events of a larger part of '79 when all hell broke loose and Iran and Pakistan. In the first place, did the takeover of our embassy in Iran have much of an effect on what we were doing?

BARRY: The U.S. government can at best deal with three crises at a time or two crises at a time and the whole Iran thing preoccupied the government throughout that period near the end of the Carter administration. Then of course as far as this arc of crisis here is concerned in the sort of idea the this was a dangerous aggressive move by the Soviet Union that certainly was the mood that Brzezinski set at the time.

Q: Had we been following Afghanistan and its relations with the Soviet Union very high in our lookout list?

BARRY: It depends on what time you're talking about. I think in the early '70s it was not, but towards the end of '79 certainly their activities in Afghanistan and the increasing involvement of the Soviet Union were in our favor, were periodically warning them don't do this, don't do that, especially in late '79 of course it didn't have much of an effect. If you look at it now from the point of view of the Soviets, they looked at it as a defensive move because they saw that the so-called progressive forces in Afghanistan were losing out. Dobrynin's memoirs say that after the decision was made in the politburo in late '79 to go into Afghanistan and the military came to Ustinov and Andropov and said we can't do this. You're asking us to carry out a task that we're not trained for, equipped for and they were told no, this is the decision of the politburo, you go back and do it.

Q: When the Soviets came in I guess it was just around Christmas time?

BARRY: Yes, it was Christmas time because I was on leave and I had to come back.

Q: Were you, was there, I won't say confusion, but I'm trying to figure out what the hell this was all about because it seemed to be one communist regime was replacing another communist regime and you know, the commitment of the armed forces into another country, is a very major thing.

BARRY: I don't think there was much debate about what it was about. The question was what kind of sanctions do we take as a result of this. So, I think I came back at Christmas and spent a lot of time drawing up the usual lists of well we ought to do this, we ought to do that. The issue of grain sales, the issue of Olympics I guess. Plus the usual small things and on the issue of support for mujahedeen covert action and all those kinds of things.

Q: One draws up these lists of sanctions, but is there a feeling of I mean you know this is a case of don't stand there, do something even though you know you're doing something that's not of any.

BARRY: Yes, I think there is a certain amount of truth to that. Although it was a clear idea that you couldn't just react by saying that we had given several public warnings about the consequences of going into Afghanistan - this is because we had pretty good intelligence of the preparations to go in before although not exact timing - you could tell what was going on and on the border then was a build up in that direction. Having given the public warnings we better do something, an action or a consequence. So, I don't think anybody who was doing this felt there doing this against their better judgment although some of things like grain sales were hotly debated at the time.

Q: Where you looking for any indicator that this might be unpopular within the Soviet Union or did it not really make any difference?

BARRY: I don't think public opinion in the Soviet Union was a factor at that point.

Q: What about within the Soviet Union were you seeing any you know doing this time were you seeing any changes in the Soviet Union as far as well, public opinion, but just the leadership or the way things were being dealt with?

BARRY: It was a period of stagnation and they themselves now call it in retrospect a period of stagnation and so there was not much going on either economic reform or political organization. It was a regime with hardening of the arteries.

Q: I imagine that the Kremlin watchers and trying to find out who was going to succeed, Brezhnev or did it make much difference?

BARRY: Yes, I think there was a lot of speculation, but after all Brezhnev hung on until when was it, '84? He held on for a long time. During that period of course we had the summit in Vienna for the signing of the START agreement and I recall we had tried to revise the agreement by putting a last minute proposal to Brezhnev to cut some more heavy missiles. But I recall coming into the Hofburg in Vienna and I was in the vicinity of Brezhnev as he was brought in and he could not even lift his legs to move up the steps. Two great burly security people had to lift him up the steps, kind of like a sack of potatoes and when I saw that I thought that anybody who thinks that Brezhnev is going to suddenly agree to a revision to this agreement that he's coming in to sign has got to be crazy.

Q: Well, did you get involved before we leave the Soviet Union, did you get involved with any of the debates over what sort of whether to arm the mujahedeen?

BARRY: Yes, there was a lot of discussion of that and there was a lot of realization, but once you put these weapons in their hands and began to encourage people from around the Muslim world to come in there you were breeding something that could not easily be controlled in the future. So, there were various kinds of arguments. For example, there was a requirement when the war was over you've got to turn back the stingers. That wasn't very realistic. There were a lot of people, myself among them, who argued that we were doing something that was irreversible, but the prevailing view in that case came from the military and the NSC. Not from the military maybe from the OSD, but not from the joint chiefs of staff.

Q: I would suspect that the military would be, it doesn't like other people to get a hold of their goodies.

BARRY: Yes, there was some talk about this falling into the hands of terrorists.

Q: Well then moving on sort of over to the Eastern European thing. What sort of thing, Poland, how did we see things in Poland in '78?

BARRY: Of course, this was a period of considerable tension inside Poland. This was the growth of Solidarity. We understood the Soviet concerns about the situation in Poland; as it is we had some pretty good intelligence sources inside the senior Polish military telling us about preparations for martial law or some kind of effort by the Soviets to put this under control. I forget when John Paul II became Pope, but that obviously had a tremendous effect on opinion within Poland.

Q: It was around '78 or something like that.

BARRY: I became a very close friend of the Polish ambassador here, Romuald Spasowski, and his wife. He later defected in 1981 and we had many long discussions. We were providing food aid to Poland and things like that. Spasowski would first of all tell what his instructions were and then tell me why he didn't agree with them. His wife was deeply religious and he was not. After the Polish Pope came in he began to rapidly move in her direction and became a devout Catholic. I think, in fact, his family was Protestant. Wanda herself was extremely outspoken. They would go to meetings of the Warsaw Pact, ambassadors and dinners and things like that and later come back and tell me about all the things that transpired during those events. In fact, finally as he was beginning to get closer and closer to a decision not defect we had several of their things in our safe deposit box because we knew when he left he would be unable to go back to the embassy and get these things. So, we understood that pressure by the Soviet Union on Poland was getting more and more serious as time went on.

Q: Well, the feeling was that if martial law was declared the Soviets might move in?

BARRY: Yes, and that debate clearly had gone on and did go on in Moscow at the time. Again it was the Soviet military, who said that this was not something we can do, but they did have some preparations for this and we were aware of those preparations. This was not so much '79; it was more '80 to '81. This was after Afghanistan by that time.

Q: Well, was there concern after Afghanistan that the Soviets were in a sort of defensive role in the offensive?

BARRY: Yes, that was certainly the view that most people had about Afghanistan. When it comes to the Warsaw Pact and Poland, I think that was clearly seen as a defensive move to avoid the crumbling of the Warsaw Pact and of course the East Germans were egging the Russians on saying that they can't tolerate this type of discipline in Poland without having to spill over the rest of it.

Q: Were we making noises to the Soviets first of all, don't do this.

BARRY: Yes, around '80 or '81 we were saying it publicly, we were saying it privately. There was not a discussion that took place that did not have that as an underlying theme and what the consequences would be and so forth.

Q: What were the consequences seeming at the time?

BARRY: I don't think anybody was thinking military, but more of the same, more sanction. I think that after the declaration of martial law in '81, we decided to cut off grain sales to Poland.

THOMAS M. T. NILES
Office of Soviet Union Affairs
Washington, DC (1965-1967)

Russian Institute
Garmisch, Germany (1967-1968)

Economic Officer

Moscow (1968-1971)

Commercial Officer
Moscow (1973-1976)

Ambassador Thomas M. T. Niles was born in Kentucky in 1939. He received his bachelor's degree from Harvard University and master's from the University of Kentucky. Upon entering the Foreign Service in 1962, he was positioned in Belgrade, Garmisch, Moscow and Brussels, and also served as the Ambassador to Canada and later to Greece. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on June 5, 1998.

Q: What were you going to?

NILES: I was going back to the Office of Soviet Union Affairs, to be the junior officer in a two-person section that dealt with economic issues.

Q: Tom, how were you received and can you give me some atmospherics of the Soviet Bureau? I would assume (I never served there.) that coming out of Yugoslavia, you would be a type of "country cousin." You weren't really one of the elite, but you had a little exposure.

NILES: I think I was received reasonably well. It was an extraordinary office when I was in Soviet Affairs. It was a large office, of course. When I got there, David Henry and Robert Owen were the Director and Deputy Director, but they were soon replaced by Mac Toon, who came out of Moscow, and by Jim Pratt. I can't remember where Mr. Pratt came from. Bob Barry went into the bilateral political section. We left Yugoslavia together and proceeded in parallel. Just about the time we got there, Stape Roy came into the multilateral political section, which was headed by Vlad Toumanoff. Sol Polansky was also in that section. It was a large office. Our little economic section was just two people, but the bilateral political and the multilateral political sections each had five or six officers. There was one officer, Virginia James, in the bilateral section who was a civil servant, not a Foreign Service officer. She had been there working on Soviet affairs since the time of Ambassador William Bullitt in the mid-1930s. By then, she was a lady in her late sixties. I think she retired while we were there. But she had been in Soviet Affairs for at least 35 years. She knew everyone and everything. She was really the institutional memory. She was a wonderful person as I remember. I didn't work directly with her because she was in the bilateral political section.

NILES: April 1965 until July 1967.

Q: What were the interests in your particular field?

NILES: Overall, it was a difficult time in US-Soviet relations. The Vietnam War was heating up. Soviet Union had a new leadership, Brezhnev, Kosygin and Podgorny, who had overthrown Khrushchev in October 1964. Ambassador Foy Kohler was in Moscow. He had replaced Ambassador Thompson in 1963. Ambassador Thompson was on the 7th floor as Ambassador-at-Large. But, in any event, we were trying to develop a better relationship with the Soviet Union, although we recognized that major progress was unlikely. We were interested in developing a dialogue with the Soviets to try to reduce bilateral tensions that as well as those that arose from our contacts with the Soviet Union in other parts of the world. We had basic stability in Europe. From the time of the Hungarian revolution onward, from say, November 1956, onward, the situation in Europe was relatively stable. Of course, we had the Czech events in 1968 to look forward to, and there were periodic Berlin crises. But, overall, at that time, Europe was fairly stable. The Middle East was an area of great US/Soviet tension, highlighted by the six-day war in June 1967. We had the problem of Cuba, and the southeast Asian problem was really moving seriously out of control. We wanted to try to minimize the possibilities of collisions with the Soviet Union, and we were looking at the possibilities of reducing and avoiding problems.

We had had one breakthrough in the summer of 1963. Ambassador Harriman negotiated the Limited Test Ban Treaty (LTBT) eliminating nuclear tests in the atmosphere and the seas. In 1964, we sold the Soviet Union a substantial amount of wheat for the first time since the end of Lend-Lease in 1945. People were beginning, for the first time since 1945, to think about trade with the Soviet Union. In the spring of 1965, a Commission was set up to study the possibilities of trade between the United States and the Soviet Union. It was headed by a guy named G. Erwin Miller, who was the CEO of the Cummins Engine Company in Columbus, Indiana. The Miller Commission studied the U.S./Soviet trade possibilities in all its aspects. They came to the unremarkable conclusion that within limits, trade in "peaceful non-strategic goods" would be beneficial to the United States. Our tiny office had responsibility in the State Department for efforts designed to encourage "peaceful, non-strategic trade" between United States and Soviet Union. There was no thought at that time of MFN.

Q: MFN meaning?

NILES: Most-Favored-Nation treatment. There was no thought of opening up export credits. There was no thought of trying to reach a settlement of the Lend-Lease, which we did in 1973. We were interested in expanding our relationship in a measured and careful way with the Soviet Union, including in the economic area. While I was on the Soviet desk, which was through June of 1967, we took a few, relatively minor steps ahead, one of which was the signature in the spring of 1967 of a bilateral civil aviation agreement. Marshall Loginov, who was head of Aeroflot and Minister of Civil Aviation, came to the United States and signed the Civil Aviation Agreement. He also signed, at the same time, the Agreement on new Chancery Sites in Moscow and Washington under which we leased the Mount Alto site to the Soviets. There are a lot of misunderstandings about that latter Agreement.

In the fall of 1972, we signed the so-called "Conditions of Construction" Agreement, negotiated by Boris Klosson. The negotiations of that Agreement were very difficult and the Agreement itself became very controversial when we got into the problems over Soviet bugging of our new chancery building. Essentially, we gave into the Soviet demand that they would do the basic work on our chancery, and we would do the so-called "finishing work." That is how the Soviets were able to wire the chancery for sound by building into the pre-stressed concrete beams a network of listening devices were connected like a Lego set. I can't otherwise describe it. Where they came together, the reinforcing bars were part of the system. The reinforcing bars all came together in some way, and made the frame of this building an enormous antenna. That was a key agreement. But the exchange of property agreement was signed in the spring of 1967. Loginov signed it only because he happened to be in Washington to sign the Civil Aviation Agreement.

Q: In the economic side, was there reporting on the state of the Soviet economy? Again, like this ethnic business, in Yugoslavia, one thing we all knew, but never seemed to put together, (like your comments for the 1965 to 1967 time), was a feeling that here was a system that was going to fall apart, economically.

NILES: I don't think we had the sense that the Soviet economy was going to fall apart. Embassy Moscow, I think, did excellent reporting, as did the CIA station, on economic developments in the Soviet Union. They pointed out the weaknesses of the Soviet economy and the enormous gap between the reality of the Soviet economy's performance and the image that the Soviets sought to portray of this enormously productive, highly developed, technologically advanced economy, which it wasn't. It was, in many respects, a pre-industrial economy, which you immediately saw if you were ever able to travel outside Moscow. Driving between Moscow and Leningrad, you would see five gasoline stations over a distance of 750 kilometers. You would go through the villages along the way, and you would see that there was no running water anywhere, and everybody was going out to a communal pump. People were carrying buckets of water on yokes over their shoulders. The main means of conveyance in the villages was horseback and horsecart. All of the media talk about a highly mechanized agricultural sector producing cornucopias of grain was a total fantasy. Embassy Moscow reported that distinction between the official version and Soviet reality. But we did not foresee the collapse of the Soviet economy. I am getting ahead of myself a little bit, to the time when I was in Moscow. But when I was in Moscow, we would brief visiting groups. Frequently, people would say, "Why are you people so negative? The Soviet Union has space achievements, it is a major military power, the other great power in the world. Here you guys are telling us that it is a primitive country with an economy that is a disaster area, that the system doesn't work. What is going on here?" So, we were criticized, at the time, for being too negative. Subsequently, when it turned out that things were worse than we thought, we were criticized for having been too positive. One of our problems, quite frankly, when I got there, was that the Soviets realized themselves, at least somebody realized, that things were not going in the right direction, and this was reflected in a decision to reduce the volume of statistics that they released. The Central Statistical Administration of the Soviet Union had as its slogan: "Statistical Science in the Interest of Building Socialism." In other words, if you have to cook the books for the good of socialism, do it, and they did.

Nevertheless, when I got to Moscow in 1968 (That was my next assignment after a year of language.), the annual statistical yearbook called "Narkhoz SSSR" was about four inches thick. By the time I left after my final year in the Soviet Union in 1976, "Narkhoz SSSR" was about half that size. They had cut out enormous areas of statistical information, including almost all of the population data. Murray Feshbach from the U.S. Bureau of Census, who was the world's greatest expert on Soviet demographics, discovered by nosing around and being a pain in the neck at the Central Statistical Administration that beginning around 1965, life expectancy in the Soviet Union was plummeting. It had peaked somewhere in the mid-1960s and was going down at unprecedented speed, except at war time. They stopped publishing that data. They also cut way back on any data that concerned investments. The problem was the Soviet Union was experiencing, by the time we got there, a significantly deteriorating capital/output ratio. This meant that they had to invest an ever larger amount each year to obtain a certain output increase on the GDP side, and the volume and value of unfinished capital construction projects was growing rapidly. By the time I left in 1976, they had stopped publishing large amounts of data on the investment program, including the amount of unfinished construction, sectoral breakdowns of the investment program, and regional breakdowns. So we were handicapped in our analytical efforts, and that was the Soviet objective. Anybody trying to work on the Soviet economy was handicapped by the fact that the Soviet Central Statistical Administration was fulfilling its mandate of “statistics in the interest of building socialism.” We knew that things were not going well, but the extent to which things were not going well was not totally clear to us.

Q: What about the government? Brezhnev was pretty much in command...

NILES: It was a triumvirate of Brezhnev, Kasegan, and Podgorny, but Brezhnev was first among equals, no question.

Q: What was our reading on the Soviet leadership? I realize you were working at the economic level...

NILES: The worker bee level.

Q: The worker bee level, but you were part of the apparatus there.

NILES: The apparatus, as you put it, was headed by Ambassador Walter Stoessel, who came back from Moscow, where he had been DCM, in 1965 to be a Deputy Assistant Secretary in EUR. The European bureau then had two Deputy Assistant Secretaries. The Assistant Secretary was Mr. John Leddy, who had been a long time Treasury employee. He came over to the State Department in the early 1960s, I believe. He was a wonderful man and very kind, as was Ambassador Stoessel. The other Deputy Assistant Secretary was an interesting fellow named George Springsteen, who was also a GS employee. He was a little rough around the edges, maybe, but a good guy basically. The EUR front office was also an interesting place because of the two secretaries: Eva Hallam, who was a little lady who worked as John Leddy's secretary and Anna May Reaker, who was a rather large and matronly lady who worked for Ambassador Stoessel. Eva Hallam was the sort of person who caused you to lose years off your age when you came into the office. She could absolutely destroy junior officers. Everybody was scared to death of Eva Hallam. Anna May Reaker was your image of everyone's favorite aunt. She was wonderful. She worked for Ambassador Stoessel. Our tactic, when we had to do something for Assistant Secretary Leddy, was not to do it with Eva Hallam, but with Anna May Reaker. We would go to Anna May to work out whatever it was, i.e., a meeting, or paper, or if we had to ask a question. You were afraid to ask Eva Hallam a question because she could be absolutely lacerating in response. It was an interesting situation.

In any case, we had the three experts in the Department who were recently back from Moscow, Walter Stoessel and Mac Toon in EUR, and Ambassador Thompson, who returned from Moscow in 1963, on the 7th floor.

Q: It had to be 1962 because he was in Washington during the missile crisis.

NILES: You are absolutely right. He came back from Moscow in 1961. I think he was in Moscow from 1957 to 1961. He was the seventh floor advisor on Soviet affairs from 1961 until 1967, when he went back to Moscow at President's Johnson's behest, very much against his better judgment, health and everything else. You also had Ambassador Harriman on the seventh floor, who was also quite well informed on the Soviet issues.

Q: He had been an Ambassador during the war.

NILES: He kept up his contacts and had spent time there. These were the experts: Ambassadors Thompson, Harriman, Stoessel and Toon. I don't recall at the time that there was any sense on our part of differences within the Soviet leadership on issues of concern to us. Kosygin was the "Premier," Chairman of the Council of Ministers, and was obviously more interested in the economy than in foreign relations. Brezhnev ran the Party, which obviously meant that he had a very important role in domestic policies - economic, social, political - as well as foreign affairs. There was a division of labor. Podgorny was the President, Chairman of the Supreme Soviet, titular head of state but clearly the least of the three triumvirs. Then, you had Shelepin, who was the former head of the KGB, who was obviously a very significant personality. Suslov, the Party Secretary in charge of ideology, Shelest, who was the Ukrainian Party boss. Romanov was the Leningrad Party boss was. We speculated endlessly about the divisions within the leadership, but I can't say that anybody knew anything for sure. While it was almost certain that on issues of concern to us, there might be differing approaches among the members of the Soviet leadership, we generally did not know what those differences were. We had very, very limited contact with the Soviet leaders. In 1966, Kosygin came to the U.N. This was at a time when U.S. involvement in Vietnam was increasing, and the possibility of an expanded war was always there. Tensions were rising in the Middle East, to culminate in the June 1967 Six-Day War in the Middle East War when Israel seized the West Bank, Gaza, Sinai, and the Golan Heights. The Soviet Union supported the Arab countries. We had a number of potential flash points. Kosygin came to the U.N., after which he met with President Johnson at Glassboro, New Jersey.

Q: Yes, which was exactly half way between Washington and the U.N., supposedly, in New Jersey.

NILES: It was somewhere in south Jersey. I didn't go, even though I was in the Soviet office. Obviously, I was far, far down the totem pole and did not go to the meeting, which was an effort to find some way to reduce the level of tension between the United States and the Soviet Union. It was without results. We didn't even coin the expression "The spirit of Glassboro." There was no spirit of Glassboro. They met, they disagreed, and they left. Kasegan went back to Moscow. President Johnson came back to Washington.

We also had ministerial level meeting each fall during the UNGA, and Gromyko would always come to Washington to see the President. I went up to the UN in September 1966 with Secretary Rusk. Bob Barry went in 1965, and I went in 1966. But I didn't sit in on the meeting with Gromyko. Ambassadors Thompson, Stoessel and Toon accompanied Secretary Rusk for those meetings. I was the notetaker for the meetings with the Hungarian (Janos Peter) and the Polish (Adam Rapacki) Foreign Ministers. We went up as staff aides to the ambassadors, in my case Ambassador Kohler, who came back from Moscow and Ambassador Thompson. They had all this Soviet expertise accumulated in New York at the time of the U.N. Ambassador Bohlen had been there in 1965 but for some reason did not return from Paris in 1966. The only reason I know that Ambassador Bohlen was there in 1965 is because Bob Barry tells a very funny story of going up there and being with these three ambassadors, two of whom he had never met before, Ambassador Bohlen and Ambassador Kohler. He kept getting them mixed up. He knew that there were three ambassadors, Thompson, Bohlen and Kohler, but he didn't know which was which. At one point, Ambassador Bohlen, who could be a bit a very starchy and severe, but a wonderful man, said, "Now, young man, there is something you have to learn if you are going to continue to work up here. I am Bohlen and he is Kohler." Bob Barry said, "Oops." I only had two of them. I had Ambassador Kohler and Ambassador Thompson when I went up there, so I didn't get them mixed up. Aside from the U.N. contact with Gromyko and Gromyko's trips to Washington to meet with the President, there was very little high-level contact with the Soviets.

Q: What was the feeling toward the "Soviet menace" at that time?

NILES: We regarded the Soviet Union as our principal adversary and enemy. We were profoundly opposed to the Soviet system. Those who had served in Moscow, such as Ambassador Toon and Ambassador Stoessel, who had both served there twice, were familiar with the dreadful nature of the Soviet system. When Soviets referred to us as hysterically anti-Soviet, they weren't far off. I wouldn't say we were "hysterical," but we were profoundly anti-Soviet. We really hated the Soviet system. By the time I got there, I hated the Soviet system. Not for what it did to us. We were the enemy. Why should it be nice to us? But, the way they treated their own people was despicable, and what a dreadful system it was. They treated the common person with contempt and cruelty. That is what I hated about it particularly. I didn't expect to be well treated. When they treated me like the enemy, which we were, that was the way it was supposed to be. We were the enemy. We hated them.

Q: Was the thought that there might be a sudden thrust against Europe or something like that? Was the feeling that this was pretty well settled, unless there was some peculiar crisis?

NILES: We did not consider the likelihood of war between the United States and the Soviet Union to be high. But, we did not exclude the possibility. We also considered that to be something which we should devote all of our efforts to avoid. So, when I worked on U.S./Soviet economic relations from 1965 to 1967 in EUR/SOV, one thing that I did have in mind was to try to find ways in which we could reduce in a small way the tension between the United States and the Soviet Union. We wanted to build, somehow, better relations between the United States and the Soviet Union, not because we had any illusions about the nature of the Soviet system, or Soviet intentions toward the United States, or anything like that. We had no illusions, but we felt, rightly or wrongly, that to the extent we could establish a slightly better relationship, build small bridges (this was the time of bridge building), foot bridges perhaps, it would reduce the possibility of a military conflict between the United States and the Soviet Union. We believed this would have, and I think we were right, catastrophic consequences for everybody. That was our credo, deterrence and defense, but do what we can to find small areas of accommodation between the two countries to try to build greater confidence and to reduce, even further, the likelihood of a conflict, which we already considered to be somewhere between improbable and unlikely. But it was not impossible. That was the problem. We worked with our allies. Not so much we in Soviet affairs, but the NATO guys, EUR/RPM, George Springsteen, Secretary Leddy, Ambassador Stoessel, worked closely with the NATO allies on these doctrinal issues. By and large, our NATO allies agreed with this. It led to the acceptance at the December 1967 NATO foreign ministers meeting of the Harmel Report, which formally codified, if you will, the two-pillar policy: Detente and Deterrence, or Detente and Defense. Maintain a strong defense, for deterrent purposes, vis-a-vis the Soviet Union, but seek detente. Up until December 1967, we had not used the word "detente" as much as the Europeans did.

Q: That was a Kissinger word.

NILES: It became a NATO word, an American word, in that the December 1967 NATO Ministerial, when we adopted in the Harmel Report, signed by Secretary Rusk, accepted the policy of "detente and defense." It lasted, of course, in that immediate context, only up to the Soviet/Warsaw Pact invasion of Czechoslovakia in August 1968. For a while after that, we talked less about detente. But then we picked it up again when we went to Helsinki in December 1972.

Q: During this period, did you have the feeling that the NSC was sort of a body onto itself, because later, the NSC played a major role?

NILES: Not on our issues. No. Mr. Bundy was the National Security Adviser with President Kennedy. I guess by the time I got back from Yugoslavia, Mr. Rostow had become the National Security Advisor for President Johnson. Now, remember that I was at the worker bee level.

Q: I understand that.

NILES: I don't recall from my time any conflict between the NSC and the Department of State on Soviet issues or on European issues in general, but particularly for me, on U.S./Soviet issues. Secretary Rusk was close to President Johnson. I think he and President Johnson had a mutually trusting relationship. As far as I can tell, he and Mr. Rostow worked harmoniously together. State/NSC relations at that time were not really a problem. I don't believe that the NSC was as active as it became under President Nixon or that it had been under President Eisenhower. The NSC during the Eisenhower Administration, in part, because of the President's own involvement in the National Security policy, was a pretty powerful organization. President Kennedy, perhaps unwisely in retrospect, cut the NSC back substantially from what he inherited from President Eisenhower.

Q: Tom, I think we should probably stop.

NILES: I'm taking my secretaries out to lunch today.

Q: We will pick this up next time when you leave the Soviet Bureau and off to...

NILES: Off to Garmisch.

Q: Today is the 24th of June 1998. Tom, in the first place, when did you go to Garmisch to the Russian Institute?

NILES: My wife and I were married on July 22, 1967, and we then took advantage of one of the great “perks” available then to Foreign Service personnel but now no longer part of the picture, namely a first-class passage to Le Havre on the SS United States. We traveled with Peggy Barry and her son, John. Her husband, Bob, had to join us in Paris because his father was seriously ill. We arrived in Garmisch around August 5, 1967, and the course began around August 10 with a 55-day trip through Eastern Europe and the former USSR. In all, we spent 11 months in Garmisch, before going to Moscow.

Q: Could you explain what this was?

NILES: It was it called the “U.S. Army Advanced Russian Institute.” For our Army colleagues, it was a two-year program. It was part of the FAST (Foreign Area Specialist Training) program in the Army. That was an extraordinary program. It was anything but fast. It was rather slow, in fact. It was a four-year specialization program in Soviet studies, which included a year of language training at Monterey, a year studying at a University in the United States such as the University of Indiana, which had an excellent Soviet studies program, and then two years in Garmisch. After this, they generally sent these officers to the Liaison Mission in Potsdam, the Liaison Mission to the Group of Soviet Forces in Germany. Some of them ended up at the Embassy in Moscow, but not immediately, as Army attachés such as Roland Lajoie, who ultimately became a general officer and was head of the on site inspection teams in the Soviet Union. He was also head of the Liaison Mission in Potsdam, just before the Mission was terminated at the time of German unification. So anyway, the Army guys spent two years there. The State Department people only spent one year there. There were three State Department places, at least the year I was there. Bob Barry, George Humphrey and I were the three lucky ones. We were told that there was a deal worked out under which three defense people, maybe Army officers, went to our Chinese language school in Taiwan. So, it was a cost free swap. We didn’t have to pay the Army for this extraordinary adventure that we had at Garmisch. It was a remarkable program. They originally established the school in the Nuremberg area in the late 1940s. It moved to Oberammergau in the 1950s, and to Garmisch sometime in the early 1960s. We occupied a little piece of what was called Sheridan Barracks, which was part of a former Wehrmacht Kasern, the headquarters of the First German Mountain Division. The First German Mountain Division used part of it. I think the whole thing has now been turned back to the First German Mountain Division. In any case, it was a remarkable program. It started with this extraordinary trip which lasted 55 days through Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. We visited literally...

Q: It wasn’t the former Soviet Union then.

NILES: What was then the Soviet Union, what is now the former Soviet Union. We visited almost every open major city. I found during my six years in Moscow, I was frequently traveling to places I had been with my Garmisch trip. It involved boat travel in the Soviet Union. It involved trains. We took a three-day train trip from Irkutsk to Khabarovsk on the Trans-Siberian Railroad. We did a lot of air travel by Aeroflot. We were all over Central Asia and the Caucasus. The only areas we didn't get to were the Baltic states. That was deliberate, because that would be seen as accepting the fact that they were part of the Soviet Union.

Q: That was deliberate on our part.

NILES: Deliberate on our part. We had an Intourist guide who traveled with us the entire trip. He obviously was an experienced intelligence officer and it was his job to watch after us. He did a good job. But we had a truly extraordinary trip.

Q: Were the Soviets doing anything comparable to this?

NILES: I do not think so. I don't know how they trained. Of course, the Soviets had Liaison Mission to the US, British and French forces in Germany, one of which was in Frankfurt, a Mission to the Seventh Army, which was the parallel mission to the one we had in Potsdam. But I don't know how they trained their people. They surely didn't send them to some place like Garmisch. Garmisch was also interesting in the sense that the faculty was all former Soviets. Most of them were veterans of the Vlasov Army, who had somehow managed to escape repatriation in the immediate aftermath of the Second World War.

Q: You might explain what the Vlasov Army was.

NILES: General Vlasov was a hero of the First Battle of Moscow in December 1941, who was captured by the Germans in 1942. He became a traitor, from the Soviet point of view. He went with the Germans and headed up a group of Soviet POWs who fought with the Germans on the Eastern Front. Vlasov was beheaded, I believe, on Red Square in 1945. He was captured. I think he was among those who were beheaded. There is a place on Red Square which is called the Execution Place (Lobnoye Mesto). It was right in front of St. Basil, the Cathedral of Vasiliy the Blessed. It was a round stone structure which stood about maybe two meters high. They would take people in there and chop their heads off. I believe General Vlasov was executed there sometime in 1945. They had this great parade after Victory Day, which was the 9th of May 1945. Maybe that was the day they did it. They brought loads of captured Nazi paraphernalia in there, the flags, and the standards and so forth, and burned them to demonstrate the victory over Hitler.

Anyway, the school was a remarkable experience. We studied Russian and Soviet History, Economics, Legal Structure, Culture, Literature, Music, Art, etc., but all in Russian. All the classes were in Russian. We had to write papers in Russian, which was somewhat laborious. Bob Barry and I had gone to early morning Russian classes at the FSI for two years in order to get there. You had to have a 3/3 in Russian in order to be assigned to Garmisch, which we were able to achieve in our two years of early morning Russian. It was worth getting up early. It was a wonderful experience.

Q: Well, we already talked about what you got from Nicky Popovic, who you studied Serbian with. What were you getting from your teachers about the Soviet Union?

NILES: I had two separate experiences learning Russian. One was with a marvelous lady, Nina de la Cruz at the Foreign Service Institute, who was an absolutely superb teacher. She was not Soviet, she was Russian, and there is a big difference. At Garmisch, you got an exposure to various versions of the “new Soviet person.” It was an eye opener. These were different people. Generally, these were ex-military officers, who had been through a pretty tough school, the Soviet Army, the Second World War, prison camps. They were tough guys. They were anything but smooth in their personal behavior and most hated each other. There were passionate hatreds within the school. Everybody was always claiming that the other was a KGB agent or a GRU agent. This kind of in-fighting within the faculty was a constant feature of the place. It was a good experience for those of us going to Moscow. It exposed us to the Soviet mentality as it was, even though they had not lived in the Soviet Union for many years. Remember, in 1967, it was 22 years after the end of the Second World War. But there were still some strong Soviet tendencies among those people. I think for the Army guys who were going off to work as liaison officers to the Group of Soviet Forces in Germany, this was good training, because they were dealing with former Soviet military officers. Again, they were 22 or so years removed from the Red Army, but still they were very Soviet in their mentality.

We also had a couple of recent defectors on the staff, one of whom - he used the name Yuriy Marin - turned out to be a phony defector who then redefected and had lots of interesting things to say about the school, particularly that it was a spy school. It really wasn't. There was no intelligence aspect at all, except we were going off to serve in various capacities in Moscow or in Potsdam, observing the Soviet Union. In that sense, we were intelligence officers. But, it wasn't an espionage school in the true sense of the word. Yuriy Marin, who “defected” by jumping overboard from a Soviet oceanographic research ship in the Sea of Japan subsequently redefected. He was a useful guy, because among other things, he was more modern. He was a real, new Soviet man. He defected in 1966. By 1967, he was in Garmisch teaching us. One thing he taught us was up-to-date Soviet swearing, which is an important part of being in a country. We learned a lot of picturesque language, most of which I can still remember. He had a special course for us on swearing.

Q: Were there any divergences between the outlook of what you all were doing, you and Barry and whoever else was with you, and the military?

NILES: Well, there was. Their basic focus was different because they were going to Potsdam and we were going to Moscow. We had different objectives in terms of what we were trying to accomplish. They were part of a different program in a way. So, there were some differences, but basically, over the year, we blended in rather well with the military officers. It was a good atmosphere there. One peculiarity in our year there, 1967 - 1968, is that most of the officers in our group who finished with us - I think there were six - five went to Vietnam. One went to Korea. Not a one of them went to Potsdam. Now, this was after four years of training. So, you figure, they had trained those guys to go to Potsdam at an enormous expense for the United States, and they didn't go, at least not immediately. They went first to a tour in Vietnam and I think in some cases, they never got to Potsdam. So, it was an enormous waste.

Q: What was the impression you were getting as a civilian and this military thing of what we thought about the Soviet military?

NILES: We were all very respectful of the capabilities of the Soviet military. We were taught that this was a formidable military force. In some ways, it was equal to the forces of the United States. In other ways, technologically, perhaps not. The weaknesses of the Soviet system and the Soviet military were not presented, in my view, very effectively, whereas the weaknesses on the civilian side: the economy, the political system, the social system, those were presented. For example, it was only after I had spent six years in the Soviet Union (I left in 1976), that I really fully grasped the extraordinary awful situation in which the bulk of the Red Army lived. You would see signs of it as you traveled around the country. The rank and file of the Soviet Army were in essentially ragged uniforms, and we know now that they lived in terrible conditions. I won't say that they looked emaciated, but when you saw them your first thought was not about stalwart warriors. These were not the troops you saw in the Red Square parades. Those were the pampered few. Of course, the Red Army officers whom we saw in Moscow looked much better. The great bulk of the Army, as we discovered subsequently, was paid practically nothing, treated terribly, and abused in the most awful ways.

Q: It's almost like a prison system.

NILES: Almost. Of course, we really only grasped this situation when we saw the Red Army in action in Afghanistan. During the Second World War, everybody on the east front suffered terribly, whether they were officers or enlisted people. It was hard to see those distinctions. They came out a little more clearly in Afghanistan. I think they came out even more clearly when the Russian, former Soviet Army, got involved in Chechnya. You realized this was a system that simply didn't work. If you look at the training we got in Garmisch, it exaggerated the capabilities of the military and presented a pretty balanced picture of the civilian side of the Soviet Union, its economy, social structure, and political structure.

Q: You had already come off the Soviet desk, but did Kremlinology come in there?

NILES: We spent a lot of time speculating with the professors and among ourselves about what was going on in the Soviet Union. Remember, that in July 1967 there had been a pretty significant upheaval in the Soviet Party structure as Shelepin and his supporters were thrown out. The full magnitude of that became clear only subsequently. At the time, we didn't know exactly what had happened at the July Central Committee plenum. Now we know that Shelepin and his people had tried to overthrow Brezhnev, using, as I recall, the pretext that the air defenses of Moscow had been shown to be deficient by the success of the Israelis against the Arabs, who were using, essentially, the same equipment.

Q: We are talking about the six-day war?

NILES: The six-day war, exactly.

NILES: June 1967. In July 1967, the dispute broke out within the Communist Party as Shelepin and his people tried to overthrow Brezhnev. He had support of the Moscow party boss, whose name was Yegorichev. As so often happened in the last 30 years or so of the Soviet Union, people who fell from power went off as ambassadors. V.M. Molotov was the first in that category, but no means the last. Many of the people who fell from power in 1967 went off as ambassadors. I remember Yegorichev went off as ambassador to Denmark. Romanovski went to Oslo. All these Shelepin proteges, KGB types, went off as heads of relatively small, but pleasant Soviet embassies. The last one I can think of, but I'm sure there were others after that, was Dimitriy Polyanskiy, who went to Tokyo in 1974. He knew absolutely nothing about Japan. It is the same sort of thing we do. It is interesting that these two countries, the Soviet Union and the United States were the only two "serious" countries which widely and extensively sent non-career people off as ambassadors. We did it as a reward. They did it as a punishment. The bottom line was the same: you ended up with people who weren't necessarily all that well qualified to be ambassador to wherever they were, whether it was Tokyo or Denmark. It is curious that these two countries treated their diplomatic service rather the same way, albeit for different reasons.

Q: Well, you, Barry, and Humphrey, did you know what you were going to do? By this time, you were well passed the junior officer stage. Did you know what you were going to do when you went to Moscow?

NILES: Yes. Bob was going to be the head of the Consular Section for one year and then go to the Political Section. George Humphrey was to be in the Consular Section for one year, followed also by a year in the Political Section. The Moscow Consular Section was quite different from most other consular sections around the world in that the work could be extraordinarily sensitive and had a high political content. I think it was a good system under which officers would spend one year in the Consular Section and then go upstairs to either the Political or Economic Section. I went to the Economic Section. I ended up working with Bill Maynes, who had been a Harvard classmate of mine. The Economic Counselor was Ralph Lindstrom; Chris Squire was in the Section as Science Officer.

Q: When you arrived there in July 1968, what was the situation both internally, in the Soviet Union and also American relations?

NILES: Well, first in the embassy, our ambassador was Ambassador Llewellyn Thompson, who had gone to Moscow at the beginning of January 1967, replacing Ambassador Kohler. He returned to Moscow reluctantly, without great enthusiasm. He had served in Moscow already as ambassador for four years in the Khrushchev era, from 1957 to 1961. He was not in the best of health but was subjected to President Johnson's persuasive powers. I took him, his wife Jane, their two daughters, and their boxer dog to Union Station and put them on the train to New York. It was around January 5, 1967. They got on the Pennsylvania Railroad parlor car to go to New York, where they picked up the SS United States for the trip to Europe. In any case, when I got to Moscow, Ambassador Thompson was the Ambassador and Colby Swank was the DCM. The Political Counselor was David Klein, who was on his way out to head the Mission in Berlin. The Economic Counselor for whom I worked was Ralph Lindstrom. It was a relatively small embassy at that time. Everybody there was, in a way, a Soviet specialist, even in the Administrative Section. This didn't include the administrative counselor, although you could make that point, even for him. For example, the number two man in the Administrative Section the first year was Mike Joyce, who ultimately came back to serve as DCM in Moscow in the late 1980s. He was replaced in 1969 by Stape Roy, who came from Garmisch. Thus the junior administrative officer in Moscow from 1969 to 1970 is now our only serving Career Ambassador, Stape Roy. I mention this just to point out that we had an exceptionally talented embassy staff in Moscow at that time, beginning with Ambassador Thompson and the DCM, Colby Swank, who subsequently served as Ambassador in Phnom Penh during the height of the war in Cambodia. There were some really top-flight people all the way through the Embassy. Everybody out there was really deeply committed to the Post and wanted to be there in the strongest way. It certainly was true in my case. I really wanted to be there.

Q: Here, you have people who really want to be there. They have learned the language and the culture. They are really committed. At the same time, this is not a friendly country, not a friendly system.

NILES: That was part of the attraction. We were at the heart of the enemy. We felt that. At least I felt that. I hated the Soviet system, but I had great affection for the people and the country, and a great interest in the culture and the history. Being in Moscow, for me at that time, was an extraordinary opportunity. You asked about U.S./Soviet relations. When I got out there, U.S./Soviet relations were obviously tense, but in certain areas, there were signs of progress. For example, shortly after I got there, we opened the direct air service: PanAm and Aeroflot, New York/Moscow. Juan Tripp and Herold Gray, who were the Chairman and President, respectively, of PanAm came out on the first flight. They brought this great entourage of luminaries with them, including Art Buchwald and his wife. He wrote some very funny articles from Moscow about his experiences on the PanAm plane and in Moscow. He was terribly funny at all these receptions. We had endless receptions for Harold Gray and Juan Tripp. We didn't realize it at the time, but we also had an agreement, secretly reached between the two governments to begin the SALT negotiations on the August 30, 1968 in Geneva. The negotiator was to have been, at least at the beginning, Ambassador Thompson. We knew Ambassador Thompson was going to Switzerland at the end of August because he was making his travel arrangements. He was taking his wife, and it was styled as a vacation. Then, of course, on August 20/21, 1968, came the Soviet Warsaw Pact invasion of Czechoslovakia, the end of the Prague Spring. There was naturally a very strong reaction in the West. Among the steps we took was to cancel the SALT negotiations, that were to begin at the end of August. So, Ambassador Thompson didn't take his trip. It was easy to explain. Almost no one on the Embassy staff knew the real reason for the Ambassador's plan to visit Switzerland, so it was easy to explain the cancellations. We were told that because of heightened tensions, the Ambassador could not take his vacation. That seemed logical to everybody. After August 21, we entered a deep freeze period, which lasted through the late spring of 1969, when things began to loosen up. Then, in November 1969, the SALT negotiations finally began in Geneva, but with Ambassador Gerard Smith, not Ambassador Thompson, as our negotiator.

Q: We are talking about a new administration.

NILES: Yes. The Nixon administration, of course, opened the negotiations. But at the end of the Johnson administration into the Nixon administration, we were in a deep freeze with the Soviets. We were instructed by Washington to have no official contacts with the Soviet government except those of a consular nature, involving visas, passports, citizenship issues, and so forth. So, those of us in the Embassy who might otherwise have been going out and promoting trade, for example, had a lot of time on our hands. We did a fair amount of analytical economic reporting, reading journals such as Voprosy Ekonomiki ("Questions of Economics") and doing airgrams on the articles for the Washington audience, and we traveled a lot. We were encouraged to travel and we did. We also got around Moscow. We reported on consumer goods availability and prices and so forth, something that was of interest to Washington. We spent a lot of time nosing around collective farm markets. We went to the theater, and musical presentations and so forth in Moscow. In terms of the normal work of an Embassy, interacting with the host government, we didn't do much of that during my first year in Moscow.

Q: What was the reading on Brezhnev from the Embassy at that time?

NILES: Brezhnev had been a little bit accessible in his earlier role, up to the overthrow of Khrushchev in October 1964, as Chairman of the Supreme Soviet. He was theoretically the President of the country, Chief of State. The head of the Party was the number one guy, First Secretary of the Central Committee. The title was changed to General Secretary, a throwback to Stalinist terminology around 1975, as I recall. Once he became First Secretary, Brezhnev was off limits to U.S. officials until Secretary Kissinger's visits began in 1971. The second-ranking job was that of Kosygin, the Chairman of the Council of Ministers. I believe that the only contact with him, again until the Kissinger process began, was when he met with President Johnson at Glassboro State College in the summer of 1966. The third member of the ruling triumvirate, Podgorny, replaced Brezhnev in 1964 as the President of the Supreme Soviets, or Chief of State. Until Kissinger opened up high-level contacts in 1971, all of the Soviet leaders were unknown quantities for us. Those who had met Brezhnev prior to 1964 had not taken him very seriously. There is a great picture of Nixon in Moscow in 1959 with Khrushchev during the so-called "Kitchen Debate," in a little prefabricated house that we built at Sokolniki Park exhibition area.

Q: Nixon was Vice President.

NILES: Nixon was Vice President. He and Khrushchev had a famous debate about the virtues of capitalism and communism, with Nixon saying, "Look at this house. This wonderful house is typical of what Americans can own." He was talking about a prefabricated house made by a company named "Gunnison." I don't know whether it is still standing now - probably not - but in 1976, when I left Moscow, it was still there. It was being used by the groundskeepers of the park as a place where they had their offices. In any case, there is a great picture from the "Kitchen Debate." Nixon and Khrushchev leaning over and looking at the home appliances. Nixon is explaining something to Khrushchev. Among the people there is William Safire, who was a speechwriter for Nixon at the time. Peering over from one side is Leonid Brezhnev, a younger version with very wavy dark hair. He was theoretically the President of the country. I guess he was there because Nixon was the Vice President of the United States. But, obviously, Khrushchev as First Secretary of the party, as well as Chairman of the Council of Ministers, was obviously the number one guy. Brezhnev was kind of a lackey, and in that photo was clearly trying to horn in on the meeting. It was a familiar role for Foreign Service officers. Maybe people met him at that time, but I don't think anybody from the United States had had any kind of contact with Brezhnev from October 1964 onward, when he seized power from Khrushchev, until Secretary Kissinger showed up in 1971. Until we got into this new phase during 1971, nobody met Brezhnev, although Gromyko continued to see the President of the United States when he attended the UNGA each September. This was one of the key problems in U.S.-Soviet relations. Even though relations were terrible, there was a real need for regular, and frequent, meetings at the highest level. So, at least you know who the guy is at the other end of the line there, the adversary. What is he like? Nobody knew Brezhnev on the American side. I don't think that Kasegan and Podgorny, or the other Soviet leaders, were better known at that time. Of course, things changed in 1971/72. In 1972, we got to know most of the members of the Politburo, at least in a very cursory way. Among other things, they came to Spaso House for lunch in 1972. It is a marvelous story. We can talk about it later. I am jumping ahead.

Q: In the first place, you were there from 1968 to when?

NILES: 1971. Sol Polansky and I were the first officers offered the possibility in 1969 of staying a third year. Before that, almost all tours were for two years. Ambassador Thompson was very strongly in favor of that. His take on it was you needed to have maximum turnover so that you would have the largest possible pool of people with Moscow experience and Russian language from which you could staff the embassy. They decided, in 1969, to see whether they could lengthen the tours out a little bit and go to three, or at least have a flexible two/three policy. They offered Sol Polansky and me, for some reason, the possibility of staying a third year. We said, "Okay, we'll do it."

Q: Were you married at the time?

NILES: Yes.

Q: Was marriage almost a prerequisite?

NILES: It was except one position, that of staff aide to the Ambassador. The requirement for that position was that he be unmarried because the guy had to live in Spaso House, where he had a bedroom on the first floor.

Q: How was family life in Moscow?

NILES: It was difficult. A few of the wives felt the same sense of commitment that we did, the sense of mission. But most did not, and they had to put up with a lot, particularly if you had children, as most families did. It was not an easy place to live. I know it was very difficult for my wife. Outside the Embassy community, Moscow could be an unfriendly place. There was a fair amount of harassment of one kind or another. All of the things that you take for granted in the West, the availability of foods, services, including medical care, were problematic in Moscow. We got our milk from Helsinki. Occasionally, the Soviets would decide to jerk us around and the milk wouldn't show up or it would show up having sat in the sun for a day and a half. It would be sour. That kind of thing happened. The basic services were unavailable. They had dry cleaning, but it was awful. You would never send a garment to it. I will tell you a great Moscow story. There was a guy in the Embassy who had a very heavy overcoat. It was old, but it was very heavy and warm. He wore it through a Moscow winter. When spring came, he decided to have it cleaned. He took it to the Khimchiska, the dry cleaning place. He said, "I want to have this coat cleaned." The lady who was in there had the typical Soviet attitude and treated him like dirt. She looked at him, and rather sneeringly said, "Well, we don't clean coats with buttons like that." Indeed, the coat had very large buttons on it. He said, "What am I to do?" She said, "Well, you can take them off." She gave him a pair of scissors and he cut all his buttons off and handed it to her. She said, "Well, we don't clean coats like that." There he was with the coat and a handful of buttons. That was service in the Soviet context. It was true of anything. Of course, medical services were rudimentary. We had an Embassy doctor who was a general practitioner from the CIA. He was fine, as far as he went. Anything more serious, we went out to Helsinki. Whenever ladies were having babies, they were whisked off to Helsinki, and if possible, a month in advance, so you wouldn't by some mischance have a baby in Moscow because that could be fairly risky. Women who went through it at Botkin Hospital had some pretty horrible stories to tell. My wife spent a month in Helsinki before our son was born, and while the medical care was outstanding and the Finns were great, the other conditions – notably the long separation – was far from ideal. But, on the other hand, we knew that foreigners died at Bodkin from relatively minor problems. This was supposedly the best hospital in Moscow, aside from the Kremlin Hospital, where we didn't go, except under very rare circumstances. When we had a very eminent visitor who needed special medical case, we could sometimes get access to the so-called "Kremlin Polyclinic," which was across the street from the Lenin Library. I remember that in the summer of 1975 I got Dr. Arthur Burns, the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, into the Kremlin Polyclinic when he had an eye infection. In any event, life was tough. The wives didn't have, in most cases, the passionate interest in the work that we had, which tended to make all this acceptable. You have to put up with it. I'm not sure, frankly, that the wives today, subjected to that kind of lifestyle that we had in Moscow in 1968-1971, would put up with that. I think they would say, "You go to Moscow if you want to. I'll stay in Bethesda." Of course, many more of the wives now have careers. We may have more tandem couples in the Embassy today, but that is a problem in itself, finding jobs for two officers instead of one. So, that doesn't always necessarily always work easily. Again, when we were there, it was a very small, cohesive embassy. We were a small group. The diplomatic corps in Moscow tended to be rather similar. Our counterparts from the other western embassies tended to be people who were committed and passionately interested in the Soviet Union, Russian speakers and experts on the USSR. They were outstanding people. For example, today, two of my ex-colleagues from that time in Moscow are ambassadors of their countries in Washington. Christopher Mayer at the British Embassy, was in the British Embassy in Moscow at the time. Riaz Kokar, who is the Pakistani ambassador here, was in the Pakistani embassy in Moscow at that time. Immo Stabreit, who was the FRG Ambassador here in the early 1990s, was a Moscow colleague. There are quite a few others. Jim Collins, who is our ambassador in Moscow now, was in the Embassy at that time, in the Political Section. Stape Roy was there. Bob Barry was another Moscow veteran (he served in Leningrad, too) who rose to the top of the Foreign Service. It was, as I say, close-knit, and I think, a high-quality Embassy.

Q: Well, you arrived there very close to the time that the Soviets moved into Czechoslovakia.

NILES: That changed the whole environment for us.

Q: Did this come as a surprise or had this been more or less expected by those people?

NILES: For us, in the Embassy, the timing and the way it was done, came as a surprise, but the idea that the Soviet Union was going to have to do something about Dubcek and Smrkowsky, did not come as a surprise. The idea that the "Prague Spring" was seen as a particular threat by Walter Ulbricht in East Germany didn't come as a surprise at all. But, the idea of a military operation... Well, we thought, and Ambassador Thompson thought, that the Soviet Union had within the Czech party people upon whom it could rely who would do the job for them. But, we did not think they were going to have to invade the country to allow those people to come to the fore. That is in fact what happened. It is possible that Brezhnev, Kosygin and the others made a mistake and they could have gotten rid of Dubcek, and installed Husak, Bilak, Indra and the others without invading the country. I have a feeling that they could have done so.

Q: Correct if I am wrong, but this was the beginning of what became known as the "Brezhnev Doctrine," which was, "We are not going to let any country... Once Communist, and that's it. The Soviet Army will move on you."

NILES: Exactly. A tragic doctrine for the Soviet Union, I must say, both in terms of what happened in Czechoslovakia, but more tragically than that, in Afghanistan. It was one of the nails in their coffin. It didn't bring about the collapse of the USSR in and of itself, but it was a tragic mistake for the Soviet Union, and brought on all kinds of difficulties. Of course, it essentially began the physical, social and economic destruction of Afghanistan, which goes on to this day. This is straying from the path, but the Soviet Union set that process in motion itself in 1974, when they engineered the overthrow of Zahir Shah, the king of Afghanistan, who was friendly enough to them, but they decided they wanted to have a Communist government in charge, under the King's relative, Mohammed Daoud.

Q: With the Brezhnev Doctrine, were we seeing a new attitude on the Soviet Union or was this just more of the bloody mindedness of the Soviets at that time?

NILES: The Brezhnev Doctrine was a rationalization after the fact. The basic Soviet position was what is ours, is ours, and we will talk about yours. They regarded Czechoslovakia as something that they had taken fair and square in 1948, with the overthrow of the Benes government, engineered by Andrei Vishinsky and Valery Zorin. They figured Czechoslovakia was theirs and we ought to keep our hands off, stop playing games in "their" territory. They could not accept the reality that the "Prague Spring" was essentially an indigenous development for which the United States and NATO, while supportive, were hardly responsible. Of course, the message of August 1968 was essentially the same as in 1956 in Budapest. Then, probably wisely under the circumstances, but tragically, the United States and our NATO Allies stood by. But, the Brezhnev Doctrine, as I say, was a rationalization after the fact. It was basically their way of saying what we have taken is ours and keep your mitts off it. The impact on U.S./Soviet relations was very negative at the time. The reaction lasted roughly into late spring, early summer of 1969 when we began the process of relaxing a little bit the sanctions and unilateral measures that we had adopted toward the Soviet Union, and loosened up a little bit. As I say, the SALT negotiations began in November 1969. In the State Department, the officer who was responsible for implementing that policy on behalf of the Nixon Administration was Ambassador Toon, who was serving at that time as a Deputy Assistant Secretary in the European Bureau under Assistant Secretary Martin Hillenbrand. Ambassador Toon had Ambassador Stoessel, who went out to Warsaw in 1969.

Q: In the Embassy, was there any attitude toward the departure of the Johnson administration and the arrival of the Nixon administration?

NILES: I don't think we regarded this as terribly important in terms of what we were doing. There were those who supported Nixon or Humphrey in the election certainly. But, in terms of what we were doing, or trying to do in Moscow, the election was not regarded as an enormous watershed, or an event which would usher in major change. In fact, Nixon had the reputation of being a hard liner on issues involving Communism, both domestically and internationally. He had spoken during the campaign rather negatively about relations between the Soviet Union and the United States. So, there was no reason to anticipate that President Nixon and his team would usher in a new policy toward the Soviet Union, nor did we anticipate it.

Q: Of course, I take it, at this point, there was no such thing as a dialogue of an American desk officer in the Soviet Foreign Ministry saying, "Hey, Tom what is this new President mean?" This type thing at any level, didn't happen, correct?

NILES: No. We were cut off from those kinds of contacts under the decisions taken in August 1968 by President Johnson. So, we had no contact at all. I'm sure Anatoly Dobrynin, the Soviet Ambassador in Washington, was sending back very cogent analyses of the President, Secretary of State and the new National Security Advisor, with whom he quickly established a contact. Dobrynin had been in Washington, by that time, for eight years. He was a superb diplomat in his way. He was devious, charming if he wanted to be, tough, with an unfailing line.

That line, which he successfully sold to a series of American presidents from 1961 to 1986, when he went back to Moscow, was, "Gentlemen, you have an extraordinary opportunity to deal with the current Soviet leadership if you are flexible and make it interesting for that leadership to deal with you. But, I am warning you. If you don't deal with this leadership, there is a new leadership, which will much more difficult for you, lurking behind it." He always referred to "new" people as "the dark forces." He warned us that the dark forces were going to eat our lunch if they took over. They are really, tough, mean guys. Of course, he used this line to refer to Khrushchev, Brezhnev, Andropov, Chernenko, and Gorbachev. It was always whatever leadership is in power, they are prepared to deal with you. But, the "dark forces" behind them are really going to kick your butts. By and large, people took this seriously. It is amazing. The advantage that Dobrynin had was that the people with whom he was dealing on our side always kept changing. They couldn't necessarily remember back and say to Dobrynin that he had told them that same thing about the previous leadership. The institutional memory was provided by the working stiffs, such as myself, who had heard Dobrynin deliver that message before and could alert our leaders to Dobrynin's approach. It was remarkably consistent.

Q: Of course, we have always used Congress, on our part. We always say...

NILES: Of course. "We would love to do this, but Congress won't let us."

Q: Did you have the feeling at the time that Dobrynin was a good conduit? In other words, was he reporting back accurately, and that sort of thing?

NILES: I think so. Well, I am not aware of cases in which he did not. There may be cases in which Dobrynin's analysis was wrong, but I doubt that he deliberately misled his bosses in Moscow. The penalty for that sort of behavior in the Soviet system could be pretty tough. Of course, it is always possible that Dobrynin got it wrong. We all make mistakes. I'm sure that even a brilliant analyst like Dobrynin, who spent considerably more than half his professional life in Washington and knew us well, could make mistakes. By and large, I think Dobrynin was a good interpreter of the United States for his masters in Moscow. He did a good job. He tended, in many ways, to overshadow his counterpart in the American Embassy in Moscow. This was never greater than during the times when Secretary Kissinger was in the National Security Council and the State Department. He preferred to do it himself. He preferred to deal, not through the Embassy but through Dobrynin, or to travel to Moscow and take it on himself. I believe he was motivated in part by the view that the Soviets were less likely to leak things to the press than was the State Department or Embassy Moscow. Dobrynin knew that, and took advantage of it.

Q: Did you all feel that during this? We are talking up to 1971, on this particular go around.

NILES: Let me say this. Ambassador Thompson left because he was not well. He had cancer and died in 1970 or 1971. But, he left at the beginning of 1969. He was tired, not feeling well, and somewhat disillusioned by the path that U.S./Soviet relations had taken. He may even have left in December 1968. I'm not quite sure about that. Anyway, we had a fairly lengthy interregnum. In the summer of 1969, Ambassador Jacob Beam arrived. He had been our ambassador in Prague. He had served in Moscow, I think as DCM, in the 1960s. He was a wonderful guy. He was a very warm and caring person. His wife, Peggy, was a great leader of the community. She was a terrific ambassador's wife and wonderful person. They were very much loved by our group in the embassy. But, Ambassador Beam was never part of the policy process, at least as it was conducted by National Security Advisor/Secretary Kissinger and President Nixon. There are a couple cases that made that clear.

Q: You say Secretary Kissinger, but was he at the time? He was National Security Advisor at the time, right?

NILES: Correct. He replaced Secretary Rogers in August 1973, as I recall. In the preparatory phase of the May 1972 Nixon visit to Moscow, then National Security Advisor Kissinger, came to Moscow several times. At least on the first of those occasions, in the summer of 1971, he came and Ambassador Beam got the word from the Soviet protocol section that National Security Advisor Kissinger was in Moscow at the government guest house and would like to see him. Kissinger had been in Moscow for two days at that time with his team from the NSC. He had been working on what became SALT I, which was signed during President Nixon's visit to Moscow in May 1972, and working, of course, on aspects of the Vietnam War, trying to persuade the Soviets to be helpful in getting us to a settlement, as well as on other sensitive issues that he worked on with the Soviets. The Embassy wasn't engaged in this at all. After August 1973, when he became Secretary of State, he could no longer make secret visits of that kind, and the Embassy was at least involved in terms of making these administrative arrangements. But, in 1971, his airplane flew into a military base, and that was it. Ambassador Beam was not in on the issues that were at the center of the U.S./Soviet relationship at that time, particularly the SALT negotiations and the negotiations on the Southeast Asia issues.

Q: During this period, you were in the Economic Section. In many ways, while we spent a great deal of effort, at least publicly, on figuring out who was standing next to whom, on the Lenin tomb and all that, the real story was the economy, in a way, as far as the liability of the Soviet Union.

NILES: Ultimately, I think that turned out to be the case. The Economic Section of Embassy Moscow was among those who consistently predicted some tough times ahead for the Soviet economy. We cited two very negative trends: One was the deterioration of the capital/output ratio, which made clear that the Soviet economy was becoming increasingly less efficient because they were having to invest an ever greater amount each year in order to get a given amount of increase in GDP.

NILES: Gross domestic product. Even Soviet statistics made that clear. During my first tour, we were able to calculate that and we did. We pointed that out to Washington, noting that the USSR had to invest more and more in order to achieve essentially the same increase in output. Even if you accepted their growth figures as being valid, which we did not, but even if you accepted the Soviet statistics, it was clear that the economy was becoming less efficient. The other key indicator was one that was spotted not by us in the Embassy, because we didn't have the expertise and access to the data, but by a remarkable guy who used to come out to Moscow each summer from the Bureau of the Census, Murray Feshbach. Murray Feshbach detected in the late 1960s, during my first tour, that the life expectancy of the Soviet population had peaked, and was declining, which was unheard of in a modern society.

Murray ultimately wrote a very good book on this with Alfred Friendly, Jr., called Ecocide, which describes how the accumulation of environmental problems contributed to this sharp decline in life expectancy of the Soviet people. Massive industrial pollution, heavy smoking, poor diet, and high alcohol consumption all contributed. Interestingly enough, by 1973 or 1974, the Soviets realized that those statistics revealed some embarrassing realities, and they stopped publishing them. In 1968, when I first arrived in Moscow, the Soviet annual economic statistical survey, Narkhoz SSSR, was about four inches thick. By the time I left in 1976, the 1975 or 1976-version was about half that size. They had stopped printing large quantities of statistics that showed how bad things were becoming. The investment statistics were no longer published in a form that permitted the calculation of the capital/output ratios, and the populations statistics were cut back so that you couldn't calculate life expectancy. Murray Feshbach's analysis had appeared in the West in public. Because Murray was an internationally-recognized expert, he was able to gain access to the Soviet Central Statistical Administration (TsSU), which we could never do, and he obtained data from the TsSU which was never published. He was good at that. He was a clever guy, and a good Soviet analyst.

Q: On your trips, were you able to get out and to see how the economy was going? I say economy, but I'm including agriculture.

NILES: Yes. There were two ways we did this. One, the Agricultural Attache took long field trips through the Russian Republic and the Ukraine in the spring, summer and fall. He would go the same route each year so you would have a standard of comparison. We traveled with him. The economic officers would travel with the agriculture attaches.

Q: It was a policy to always have two officers, right?

NILES: Or three. These trips were always by car because you had to drive along the fields to see what was going on. Of course, that was not easy, in part because of the Soviet travel controls. They could close one road "for reasons of a temporary nature," and you couldn't go to a third of the Ukraine, or something like that. Also, travel conditions were terrible. There were five gasoline stations at that time between Moscow and Leningrad, a distance of 750 kilometers. Half the time they would be out of gas or out of the kind you wanted. You carried gas coupons for 76, 84 and 88 octane gas so that you would be able to buy whatever the station had. The cars would sputter along. But, we took those trips, and they were interesting ones. We were always followed by the KGB, but so what. Then, the other trips we took, we would fly or take the train to a certain region and try to nose around. When we arrived in a city, we would give the local protocol people a list of things we wanted to do. If we achieved one out of ten, it was considered a success. If you went to Kharkov, for instance, you would ask to visit the Kharkov excavator plant. If you went to Lugansk, you would ask to visit the locomotive plant. Rarely did you get to see what you wanted, but sometimes the local officials would allow you to see something less sensitive, but that was still interesting. Sometimes they would say, "Well, you couldn't go to any factory," or they would give you some factory that was of less interest. But any direct insight into what was going on in the Soviet economy was, in some small way, of interest to us. It was important to get out and wander through a town and try to talk to people. It was also very important on our trips to just wander around town, checking out the prices and the availability of consumer goods. One interesting thing about the Soviet Union was that once you got out of Moscow, Kiev, and Leningrad, availability of manufactured consumer goods tailed off very radically. Services were practically nonexistent. They were bad even in the three big cities, but once you were out of those three favored places, forget it. Even in large, relatively cosmopolitan cities, a city like Odessa, you had trouble getting rudimentary services and manufactured consumer goods. Of course, Odessa had a well-deserved reputation as being the place where you could get anything you wanted if you knew where to look for it, and had the right kind of money. But, we would go around and check prices, and report all this information. People in Washington seemed to be interested in our reports. We felt as though this was of use to somebody. We found it constructive. The exception to the general rule on the availability of consumer goods was the situation in the Trans-Caucasian Republics. In Tbilisi, Yerevan, and to a degree in Baku as well, people lived pretty well. But, it was interesting to go down there and report on it to find out why it was better in Tbilisi, for example. In part, it was because the Georgians were more adept at obtaining merchandise. Things were better there.

Q: In a way, that area resembled the Levant. These are merchants, wheelers and dealers.

NILES: They certainly were that. They got things done that simply didn't happen in the Slavic parts of the country. But, these trips were a valuable means of giving Washington a picture of the whole country, as opposed to Moscow or Leningrad.

Q: During this time, basically, we were looking at a place that doesn't work, particularly when the west was moving ahead very rapidly.

NILES: Well, it clearly didn't. But, one interesting thing is that frequently with non-official visitors from the United States, we were often regarded as almost pathologically anti-Soviet, unable to see the positive side of things. We were criticized for being much too negative. I can remember briefing groups of visitors whose reaction was "This is the other super power. It can't be this bad." I would say, "Well, in some respects, it is probably worse than I am telling you." They would say, "Well, the military side, as far as we can tell, works great. Look at the space program." To which my response was, "But they can't produce an automobile or a decent meal." We had a funny experience in 1968. I will never forget this. We were in the Hotel Ukraina in Moscow, which was a dreadful hotel. This was across the Moscow River from our Chancery. I was with friends from the United States. This was a guy who had worked very closely with Senator Robert Kennedy. When Senator Kennedy was assassinated in May 1968, the Ford Foundation gave this guy, Tommy Johnston and his wife, a trip around the world to help them adjust to the fact that the Senator had been killed. Tommy's wife is French. They stayed in the Ukraina Hotel. There was a line in the lobby to get coffee. So, we were standing in line for coffee. Directly in front of us were some French Communists, who were also waiting for coffee. The line moved glacially. The French Communists were talking among themselves, in French of course, and saying things like, "Well, you would think after 50 years of building socialism in one country, you could get a coffee in this hotel." It was a good question. Why, 51 years after the Revolution, did it take an inordinate amount of time to get a coffee in this presumed high-class hotel, which was in fact a piece of junk. People from the West sometimes accused us of being too negative about the Soviet Union. Then, when the whole thing fell apart and people realized that the system had been rotten to the core, we were criticized as having not seen that rot, and having been too positive about the Soviets. So, you can't win. But, at the time I was there, we frequently had visitors who would come and say, "Well, gosh, this is a great accomplishment to this country." We would try to explain that while this was true, the overwhelming majority of the people are totally cut off from those accomplishments, and much of what goes on in this country has nothing to do with it.

Q: Were you seeing any reflection? You had been removed from the whole business of the anti-Vietnam thing, because you had been at Garmisch and then at Moscow, just when this whole thing was cranking. But, by the time you were in Moscow, the real Vietnam protest movement, particularly among the student bodies of the United States and much of the intelligencia, or whatever you want to call it, was really going at great guns. Did you get any reflection of that concern about your country and what was happening there or having these people coming and being true believers of what the Communists were about, or anything like that?

NILES: Well, we felt the problem, certainly, as Foreign Service officers in Moscow in 1968-1971. We were subjected in the Soviet press to an endless barrage of attacks on our policy, of course. They attacked us on Southeast Asian policy, but we were also attacked on policy in the Middle East, and compared to the Nazis on one thing or another. We were attacked on policy in Europe, so we were attacked across-the-board. Cuba was another subject they attacked us on. Being attacked by the Soviets certainly didn't cause us to think that our policy was wrong. It rather inclined us to think that if they are attacking us, we must be doing something right. It was a painful period for us, no question, the whole Southeast Asian experience, although as you say, we were cut off from it. At the time of the invasions of Cambodia and Laos, we were in Moscow. We really missed out on the domestic reaction to Kent State, for example. At the time of the assassination of Senator Kennedy and Dr. Martin Luther King, we were in Garmisch. We would get these reports after the assassination of Dr. King from friends who were in Washington. Of course, we were reading the Herald Tribune about the riots here, and you saw these pictures of the capital with smoke hanging over it. We got reports from friends that were really incredible. Sitting in the Bavarian Alps in May 1968, it was almost impossible to envision what was going on in Washington. I can remember all of us talking about this, wondering at what was happening.

Q: There was our incursion into Cambodia in May 1970 which caused the Kent State shootings and much protest. It also had members of the Foreign Service picking younger members signing letters of protest. Did that hit you at all?

NILES: No. I think it probably reflects the fact that (1) we were isolated; and (2) we were in Moscow. In its way, I think it made us more patriotic, if that is the word, and more red, white and blue all over, because we were under such attacks constantly from the Soviets. It wasn't to say that all of us in the Embassy thought that the incursion into Cambodia was a grand idea. We didn't. However, I think we were less inclined to... We weren't working directly on the problem the way people like Tony Lake, Dick Moose and others, on the NSC staff, were working on Southeast Asia.

Q: I was Counsel General in Saigon when that happened. I thought, "What the hell?" They were shooting at us from there and had a sanctuary. It depended where you were. But, I didn't feel any of this until I got home. I am still kind of learning about it, even today, because it depends where you were. This is a situational thing.

NILES: I agree. Also, we were not working on the problem so we tended to be less focused on it.

Q: Did your mother ever get out?

NILES: She did get out, but she came only after I left. In 1982, she made a trip back to the Soviet Union with a group from her college. She went to Wellesley College. It was interesting that when she went she told them who she was and that she was born in St. Petersburg, in 1913. The KGB was clearly interested in her. They singled her out for special treatment. She had some really bizarre experiences wherever she was, in Moscow, Leningrad, Samarkand, Bokaro, all around.

Q: Did you have any particular stories or problems about the KGB? We are talking about the 1968 to 1971 period?

NILES: Not really. I mean, we were all subjected to harassment, close tailing, when we walked around the street, particularly when we did our retail price surveys, which we spent much time doing. People would walk along behind us, bumping into us, and elbowing us, trying to knock us down. Even when we were out for non-work related purposes, we were followed from time to time. But it was usually very demonstrative. They wanted to demonstrate to us from time to time that they could follow us, and that they knew where we were, and so forth. That was relatively harmless. Every now and then, particularly as the Jewish Defense League became more active in New York, and harassed the Soviet UN Mission there, we would be harassed in return. Automobiles would be vandalized, and mirrors would be ripped off. Antennas would be ripped off. Tires would be punctured. This was all organized by the KGB because no ordinary Soviet citizen would dream of going up to a diplomatic vehicle and ripping a mirror off. People figured they would get in very deep trouble, as they might well have done, if the police weren't in favor of doing that. We had that to contend with. It was a nuisance, an annoyance, but not a fundamental problem.

Q: What about contact with the artistic community? Was that on a different level? Were you able to have other than just attending performances?

NILES: There were two artistic communities, particularly in the area of the visual arts. Less so, I think, in music and ballet. One community was the official community. If you wanted to deal with the official artists, official sculptors, official musicians, official dancers, you could do so through official channels. If you wanted to deal with people who were not state approved, you could go out and find dissident artists, painters who were not members of the League of Artists, which was another way of describing what a dissident artist was. We had contacts with the latter group, particularly during our second tour (1973-76) when they were much more open and active. They were interesting, entertaining people. We bought paintings from them, particularly during our second tour. But even during the first tour, we met a few of these people. We went to their parties. In some respects, they were crazy. One thing I came to understand in the Soviet Union is that when the Soviets said that a certain dissident was crazy and had been confined to a mental institution, you had to see a certain logic in that. If you were a Soviet citizen, and you chose, of your own free will, to say, "I don't like this system and I'm going to resist it in some way," you had to be a bit crazy. Those people went through so much and suffered so much for their art, it was truly amazing. Leave aside being incarcerated in a mental institution, which was the worst thing that could happen. You had to be slightly crazy to resist the system. So there was a type of crazy logic to the Soviet version of things. Who else but a nut case would say, "I am going to stand up and say to this overpowering system that I won't conform. I won't do this. I won't do that. I won't paint the way you want me to paint. I won't sculpt the way you want me to sculpt. I won't write the way you want me to write. The hell with you." You have to be slightly crazy to do that. Some of those people, as a result of official pressure, really had gone off the deep end, but overall they were wonderful, and courageous people.

Q: Then, you left there in 1971?

NILES: We left Moscow in July 1971. Let me just mention something before we leave Moscow. In the fall of 1970, we began to loosen up a little bit on the trade front. Trade and export licenses had been very tightly controlled in the wake of the invasion of Czechoslovakia. It was tight before that, but particularly tight afterwards. We began, gradually, to loosen. The American companies began to make some significant sales, which we helped them with, to the Soviet Union. This happened particularly in the automobile and truck business. There were a few companies, the Gleason Gear Company of Rochester, New York, the LaSalle Machine Tool Company, Kearney and Trecker of Milwaukee, Giddings and Lewis of Fond-du-Lac, and Cross Machine Tools, that made equipment of this kind and began to make some sales. Just before I left, in the spring of 1971, we began to have prominent business people coming over. That began to gain momentum during the rest of 1971 and into 1972. Of course, in May 1972, we had President Nixon's visit. When I left, in the summer of 1971, we had already begun the process that would lead to the "detente period" of the mid-1970s.

Q: Why did that happen?

NILES: The period of so-called detente between the US and the USSR led to a major increase in the size of Embassy Moscow, and they simply did not have enough people with Moscow experience and Russian language skills to staff it. They needed me, or so they said, to head the new Commercial Office, which was located outside the Embassy and was assigned the task of promoting US-Soviet trade.

The remainder of my time at USNATO coincided with Ambassador Rumsfeld's first months at USNATO. He left the sinking ship of the Nixon Administration in March of 1973 and came to USNATO as Ambassador. It was his first real exposure to national security policy, but he was a very quick study and did a very good job as Ambassador. He was particularly adept in my time with him during the Yom Kippur War of October 1973 when we went to DEFCON III and may well have been on the brink of a war with the USSR in the Middle East. That required a great deal of careful management at NATO, and I thought Ambassador Rumsfeld handled it very well. He was a tough boss, but it could be fun to work with him. I introduced him to squash while we were in Brussels. He was a fierce competitor.

Q: So when did you go back to Moscow?

NILES: We went back in November 1973.

Q: What changes did you notice?

NILES: Moscow was largely unchanged. It was still a dark and generally unfriendly place. The Embassy was the same but more crowded. Our office, the Commercial Office, was down the street from the Chancery and was bright and cheerful – with a blue and yellow color scheme and modern furniture and equipment.

Q: Was the work more or less the same?

NILES: Fortunately not. I had three other officers on my staff - one from Commerce and two from State – and we were really on our own. The Embassy largely left us to our own devices. Our nominal boss – Economic Counselor Noble Melancamp – one of the most bizarre people I ever met in the Foreign Service - was not too interested in what we were doing. The Charge when I arrived, Adolph (Spike) Dubs, who was murdered by the KGB in Kabul in February 1978, was a great guy. He was replaced in the summer of 1974 by Jack Matlock. And at the same time, Walter Stoessel, who had been Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs, came out to Moscow. It was a delight to work for him, and he was quite supportive of what we were trying to do in the Commercial Office.

The US Embassy Commercial Office at that time really was unique in Moscow. Since we were doing something totally new, there were no fixed rules – Soviet or American - for our activities. I was told to promote US/Soviet trade, and so we set out on an active trade promotion program which include lots of small exhibits and demonstrations in our fancy office space. The USSR Chamber of Commerce and Industry – largely a KGB-run institution - had a monopoly on such events and gave us a lot of grief at the beginning, but we cut a deal, on our own authority, under which if they allowed us to conduct our little shows, we would guarantee that the US Department of Commerce would participate in their large international exhibitions. By and large, it worked. The key was that the Chamber of Commerce passed the word to the KGB guards at the door of our office that Soviet citizens were allowed to come in for a specific event.

But to conduct this program, we had to be fairly casual with the rules – both Soviet and US Government. By the time I left in the summer of 1976, we had amassed a fleet of cars and delivery vehicles, all Soviet-made, and were conducting a thriving barter business in order to keep our facility maintained and our shows operating. For instance, we had a show in 1975 for the Coca-Cola Company, which was trying to dislodge Pepsi from its monopoly position in the USSR. The then-CEO of Coca-Cola, Paul Austin, came to Moscow and brought 250 cases of Coke, all done up in English and Cyrillic lettering. When he was finished, he had 200 cases left, which he gave to us. Those cases of coke were like a box of gold bars. We used them to bribe Soviet customs officials to get exhibit materials out of customs; we paid for support work by Embassy local employees with cokes. Early in the game, my colleagues and I decided that if we were going to do the job, we simply could not be worried about some of the rules. To reduce our costs, we bought our rubles in Brussels and Vienna for 20 cents from street traders instead of $1.11 from Gosbank. At one point we persuaded Sears, Roebuck to have a show in our office on merchandising technology, and the then-President of Sears, Dean Swift, came out to Moscow for the occasion. They had some display items, including a rack of suits what they left with us. We used those suits – Johnny Miller polyester leisure suits – to acquire all sorts of goods and services in Moscow.

I believe that we made a significant contribution to the development of business ties between the US and the USSR, although it turned out to be somewhat ephemeral when problems arose with the SALT II negotiations in March/April 1977, Sharansky was arrested in 1978 and even more so when the Soviets invaded Afghanistan in December 1979.

Q: Did you get involved in any of the other sides of the Embassy's work?

NILES: From time to time, yes. When Secretary Kissinger came, I was sufficient senior on the Embassy staff to be included in the luncheons and dinners, which was interesting. It was a chance to meet Gromyko and talk with him. He could actually be a pleasant, witty interlocutor, if he wished. At one of those events, I met Boris Ponomarev. He was a legend in international Communist Party activities, a Secretary of the Central Committee of the Party in charge of relations with “non-ruling Parties” and a candidate member of the Politburo of the Central Committee.

In the fall of 1975, the Department got the bright idea that we would cut a deal with the Soviets to swap grain for oil. So far so good. But the key objective for Washington was to persuade the Soviets to give us a price break on the oil while paying world-market prices for wheat, corn and soya. The goal, which was fairly transparent at the time, was to put a dent in OPEC's ability to set the world price for oil.

Charles Robinson, at that time Under Secretary for Economic Affairs, a businessman who was quite an expert on shipping and other aspects of international trade, was given the unenviable task of negotiating this deal. He was assisted by Dean Hinton; Ambassador Stoessel and I joined from the Embassy side. Our Soviet interlocutors were Foreign Trade Minister N.S. Patolichev, First Deputy Minister Kuzmin and Deputy Minister Komarov. There were four rounds of talks. The meetings went on for hours at a time, in part because Patolichev was a marvelous story teller. He was always being reminded of some story by something Robinson said. I can remember one of them today. In any event, we came up empty except for a one-page memorandum of understanding under which both sides undertook to promote trade in grain and oil, with no mention of prices.

One of the more painful sides of my second stay in Moscow was the microwave crisis which broke out in February 1976. I will never forget that, either, but it was no joke. Around February 15, Ambassador Stoessel called all the officers and employees with security clearances (which included my wife, then working as the Consular Section's Secretary ) into a meeting to inform us that since 1959, the Soviets had been shooting "non-ionizing microwave radiation" into the Chancery building. The power of the radiation had gradually been increasing, and in 1975 it reached the level of 15 microwatts per square centimeter, which exceeded the Soviet health norm. Surprisingly, our health norm for this sort of hazard was 100 times higher than the Soviet norm at that time, but we soon lowered it to the Soviet norm, and ultimately below. (This particularly affected operators of ATC systems.) In any case, there was quite an uproar in the embassy, and we began a long back and forth with the Department about the risks and what could be done to avoid them. On the first day, we were introduced to a team of Washington experts who were there to explain the issue to us. It included a gentleman named "Dr. Pollock" from George Washington University. He was described as "an expert in the field," but when my wife asked what his "field" was, they refused to tell us. That was not too encouraging. We subsequently learned that his "field" was oncology.

In any case, we felt very let down by the Department, and this bad feeling was accentuated by a series of warnings from Washington, said to have come from my old friend Larry Eagleburger, who was then Special Assistant to the Secretary and Deputy Under Secretary for Management, to the effect that Secretary Kissinger was becoming very cross with us because our questions and complaints, which had gotten into the press, were annoying the Soviets and having a negative affect on the SALT II negotiations. We were primarily concerned about whether we were candidates for cancer. The whole experience left a bad feeling about our second tour in Moscow and a bad feeling about the Department of State. I believe that the Department never came to grips with the health risks to which the Embassy Moscow staff were subjected due to the microwaves. There was an abnormally high number of deaths due to cancer of colleagues who had served there, including Ambassador Stoessel, who died from leukemia.

Another interesting part of the second Moscow tour was President Nixon's July 1974 visit. It was sad affair, put on as part of a bigger trip with stops in Cairo, Tel Aviv and Brussels, designed to save the Nixon Presidency, which was, of course, beyond salvation. It was interesting to watch the floundering Administration close in the Kremlin, where the President, Secretary Kissinger and General Haig stayed. It also gave us a chance to meet Brezhnev, Kosygin and the other members of the Politburo – a most unimpressive lot. I had the momentous responsibility of arranging Mrs. Nixon's program. But even that was interesting because it gave me a chance to observe the Potemkin village techniques followed by the Soviets, who did things such as repave the streets in front of the places she visited the night before the visit. In one case, the combination of shoddy work and hot weather caused the newly-laid asphalt to give way under the weight of the big cars we used.

In any event, we left Moscow in July 1976 for reassignment to Washington, after nine years in the field, and a year at the National War College.

WILLIAM ANDREAS BROWN
Moscow (1966-1968)

Ambassador William Andreas Brown was born in Winchester, Massachusetts in 1930. He joined the "Holloway Program" which was part of the Naval Reserve Officers Training Program and went to Harvard University, graduating with a Magna cum Laude degree. In 1950 he went to Marine Corps basic training in Virginia and later served in Korea. His Foreign Service career took him to a multitude of places including Honk Kong, Taiwan, Singapore, Malaysia, USSR, India, the UK, and Israel. His career includes an ambassadorship to Israel as well as several positions in the State Department, Environmental Protection Agency. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in November of 1998.

Q: Moving to Russian studies now, I would like to get a picture of the Foreign Service at this time and how it operated. It sounds as if your Career Counselor was yourself and your wife.

BROWN: That's right.

Q: Did anybody say, "Hey, Mr. Brown, why don't you become a Sino-Soviet specialist?"

BROWN: No. On the Sino-Soviet network, Marshall Brement was the then incumbent of the Sino-Soviet slot in the embassy in Moscow. I had known him at language school in Taichung. Obviously, this kind of specialization was a way into, if you will, the big time in terms of assignment to a major embassy, getting on the map, and so forth. I just thought that this was the thing to do, and it was an exciting course of action. It was apparent to me, beginning in 1961, that a split was opening up and widening between the Soviet Union and the People's Republic of China, and that this would bear very fundamentally on our national interest. That is, depending on how things developed.

So I put in for Russian study and got it. By this time I had pretty strong ideas about how language training should go. Once again, I was a little bit older than some of the other students, but I burned the candle at both ends under the great teacher, Nina De la Cruz. She was a magnificent instructor. I plowed ahead. I communicated with Marshall Brement, who was then on the job in Moscow. He was sending me clippings from Pravda and Izvestia. In other words I was determined that, just as I had graduated from Chinese language training, able really to read the newspapers, I wanted to be able to do this when I arrived in Moscow. I realized from correspondence with Marshall that this was crucial.

So I did extra work on the Russian language so that I would be able to read the Russian language press. Through Nina De la Cruz, I engaged an elderly Russian lady, who was not on the staff, and I really burnt the candle at both ends. This really paid off, I would say, by comparison with some other graduates from the same course. By the end of the Russian course, unfortunately, they were just barely at the threshold of being able to read the press in Russian. If they didn't get the right slot, if they got into consular, administrative, or other work which didn't require them to read the Russian newspapers, they could easily fall short, in this respect.

I arrived in Moscow in the summer of 1966, able to read Pravda and Izvestia. This ability was as important as I thought it would be, because Marshall Brement on my first day would say, "Mrs. Gandhi [Indian Prime Minister] is arriving in Moscow. Here is the Soviet press coverage of her remarks yesterday. It's all yours to prepare a report." The other thing that happened was that, either on my first or second day in Moscow, a defector got through the Soviet guards in front of the embassy and came into the embassy. He was a Chinese. I felt that I had to handle that case. It was highly potent stuff.

Q: You were in the embassy in Moscow from 1966 to when?

BROWN: From 1966 to 1968. When I arrived in Moscow, notwithstanding all of my reading and all of my preparations, it was a bit of a jolt. I was in a communist society. We were bugged, followed, and restricted, and made to feel it, even more to the point. The embassy was very hierarchical. The reports that it was putting out were top flight in terms of quality, and the editing and hierarchical process was very rigorous. It was quite a change for me, having come from my own post and suddenly being subordinated to being the low man in the Political Section.

Q: Who were the Ambassador, the DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission], and the Political Counselor?

BROWN: The Ambassador at the time was Foy Kohler, who was an old pro. The DCM at the time was John, well I forget his last name. Gene Boster was the Political Counselor. The Political Section, as usual, was divided into two units, covering Internal and External Affairs. I was in the External Unit, so I was reporting to Alex Akalovsky, who had been an official interpreter for appointments high level Americans had with Nikita Khrushchev. He had now come into the Foreign Service. This was his first assignment as Deputy Political Counselor. He was a real taskmaster.

Among my colleagues were the following: covering Africa was Allen Davis, later Ambassador; Middle East was Walter Smith; covering Latin America was Bill Price; and I had all of Asia, from Afghanistan to Japan. The biggest part of this job was following Sino-Soviet affairs.

At that time the Russians were preparing for their great, 50th anniversary celebration of the Communist Revolution in 1917. The split between the Chinese communists and the Russians was deepening dramatically. President Lyndon Johnson had moved to major escalation in Vietnam, which we were bombing heavily, occasionally striking Soviet shipping in Haiphong harbor. The Soviets would periodically call us in to protest against this or that strafing or bombing attack. I remember occasions when we queried Washington about these allegations, and the Department of State denied them. I remember one time when the Russians gave us photos of holes in ships. They said that one or two crew members had been killed. There was a great manufactured outcry in the Soviet press, demonstrations against us, and so on. So our relations with the Soviet Union at this time were about at their worst. They stayed that way during my time in Moscow.

Q: Who was the Soviet Foreign Minister at this time [1964]?

BROWN: Andrei Gromyko was the Foreign Minister. Leonid Brezhnev was the General Secretary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union [CPSU]. They were settling in and rewriting the history of the CPSU. They were writing out Khrushchev and writing themselves in. That took us into the fabulous period leading up to 1967 because they were now rewriting the whole history of the Communist Revolution and who did what and so forth. Of course, this rewriting included the Sino-Soviet aspect and the treatment of Mao Tse-tung. Mao had hitherto been written up as a great hero of the Proletarian Revolution. Now he had to be blackened, downgraded, and vilified, and I witnessed all of this process.

Meanwhile, the Chinese communists were doing their own rewriting of history. It was getting increasingly nasty during my time in Moscow. By 1968 a few bullets were flying here and there, there was some roughhousing and so forth.

Q: You're talking about incidents between the Chinese and the Russians.

BROWN: The Chinese and the Soviets, yes.

Q: Had they yet had that battle over the Ussuri River?

BROWN: No, that came a bit later. However, the Soviets were strengthening their positions along the Ussuri River. I managed to convince my subsequent Political Counselor, David Klein, who had previously been Economic Counselor, that he and his wife, and I, should travel out together to Khabarovsk. The Soviets declined to show us anything, and we couldn't arrange any appointments. David Klein was so angry that he decided that we would go back to Moscow. I said, "No, that's exactly what they want you to do. Let's continue on. We have permission to continue on to Nakhodka," (North of Vladivostok), where there was a newly-opened, one-man

Japanese Consulate. This Consulate was operating out of a hotel. I said, "Dave, that's exactly what they want. They want us to give up in frustration and go back to Moscow. Let's not do that."

The only way we could continue on to Nakhodka was to travel for a very long period down that railway line. We would only have a couple of hours there in Nakhodka and would have to get on another train back. I said, "Let's do it. They want to discourage us, but let's do it." This trip was great, because it enabled me to see the enormous flow of military hardware down that line, where the Soviets were building up their position along the Ussuri River.

We also had a very useful meeting with the Japanese Consul General in Nakhodka. It was amazing what a colleague could give us in a couple of hours. He was a senior, experienced diplomat who knew his business. Although he was very restricted in where he could travel geographically, he was able to give us a pretty good picture of Nakhodka in those days.

In the professional field back in Moscow the Soviets knew what I was after, and they were not about to make life easy for me. So I could not get appointments in the Foreign Ministry. I had to resort to other means. By special, diplomatic pouch, I subscribed to "People's Daily," which was published in Beijing. It was forbidden by the Soviets to be sold in Moscow. I would compare "People's Daily" as I got it, and FBIS [Foreign Broadcast Information Service, an official, U.S. publication] as I got it. The FBIS daily report contained a read out of Chinese, as well as Soviet broadcasts. I would read between the lines of the Byzantine Soviet press coverage.

I went to the lengths of attending the defenses of doctoral dissertations at the African-Asian Institute of Oriental Studies. Although their system was grossly distorted, the Soviets still went through the motions. The Ph.D. candidates still had to defend their theses in a public forum. One could read in the evening Moscow News as to when and where these theses would be defended along with mechanical, engineering, science, and other dissertations. The reason that I would go there would be to pick up whatever grains of information that I could.

I could see in operation the likes of Mikhail Kapitsa, who was a Professor of Chinese Affairs at Moscow University. He was also a former Ambassador and was on the Collegium of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. He was a big, tall, hearty man. I used to talk to him in the corridors. Kapitsa was aware of what I was up to. He had been a young interpreter between Stalin and, I guess, Zhou En-lai and some Chinese communist delegations. He would throw me the odd bone here and there. For example, an historical note. It was all slanted, of course. He would say that the Soviets knew all along what kind of fool Mao Tse-tung was, an agricultural bumpkin, an opportunist, and so forth. "Because of the exigencies of the period, we went along with it," he would say. He would say that Mao had engaged in all of these excesses and so forth. I was reading those kinds of tea leaves and engaging in extracurricular activities.

Q: Were you given any training in the fine art of Kremlinology? I spent five years in Yugoslavia, reading "Politka" and "Borba." This was not really my bag. I didn't have to do that, but when you're doing that, that is, trying to read this stuff, you really have to develop some expertise. Did you have any training in how to do this?

BROWN: We studied at the FSI [Foreign Service Institute] before we went to Moscow. There were reference books, the occasional lecture, and tapes of commentaries on Russian affairs. I did as much as I could to absorb this material. I was engaged very heavily in reading this kind of material before I got to Moscow. There was a lot of classified information on the Soviet system as well.

However, there's nothing like on the job training. We also had the benefit of a few other people there in other embassies. The British and the French were very interested in Sino-Soviet relations, and so were the Japanese. I used to meet in the various "tanks" [secure conference rooms] at the Japanese and American Embassies. On a confidential basis we would share information.

Mind you, you couldn't exist on this alone. We were expected to handle other affairs as well, on an ad hoc basis. I actually welcomed this. I traveled through the various republics of Soviet Central Asia. I traveled there with an Australian embassy officer. I also traveled to the Ukraine and the Caucasus with our Agricultural Attache. I volunteered to do that. That was a real eye-opener as far as Soviet agriculture was concerned.

Q: Can you talk about this, because this was just about the time that Khrushchev opened up the virgin lands of Soviet Central Asia. What was our impression of Soviet agriculture that we were picking up?

BROWN: Of course, agriculture was an enormous subject in Soviet propaganda and central planning. The Soviets knew that the U.S. Department of Agriculture, and the U.S. Government more generally, wanted to know everything that we could about their agriculture. They were not about to tell us. As a result we sent people to the Soviet Union like Bryce Meeker, a career agricultural expert who followed developments in the Soviet Union and China as a specialized, reporting officer.

He would dutifully go into the Soviet Ministry of Agriculture. Essentially, they wouldn't give him the time of day. They would say, "You know more than we do," and that kind of thing. By now we were beginning to get satellite coverage of the state of Soviet agriculture. By now Bryce Meeker and his predecessors over the years had developed a system for covering the country. They were severely limited in their travels and couldn't get to the virgin lands, at least not easily.

However, the bread basket of the Soviet Union remained the Ukraine and South into the Caucasus area. These guys developed a system of taking an embassy car and driving for enormous distances, always with a partner. They were always looking for someone to travel with, because of Soviet provocations and so forth. So I put myself on the list to accompany them.

There were plots of land which they and their predecessors had selected years ago. They had notebooks, and we would drive as fast as we could. Then we would slow down as we passed a designated 10 kilometer stretch on the right or left hand side of the road. Sometimes we would just cruise slowly past these Ukrainian or Caucasian fields and note the state of the crops. Occasionally, we would stop, get out of the car and take a little stroll in the fields, and so forth. We were under constant surveillance. The Soviet security people following us would get out and look at what we were doing. We would stay the night in hotels. The Soviet security people in essence selected the hotel and picked the room as well! They would run provocations if they could, involving some nice-looking young lady.

For me this was a real eye opener as far as the backward plight of Soviet agriculture was concerned. I think that that was very influential for my overall education on the Soviet Union. It came in as a kind of radar in other incarnations. I got to see parts of the Soviet Union that my job normally didn't call for me to visit, but that was useful, too.

In this way I got to visit the capitals of Kazakhstan, of the Kirghiz SSR [Soviet Socialist Republic]...

Q: Whose capital was Frunze.

BROWN: Yes. We were trying to get as close as we could to the Chinese border with the Soviet Union, and the security police were always closing us off from it. I think that they knew that I was a Sino-Soviet specialist. There were also other reasons. So much of their nuclear production, launch facilities, and nuclear pollution were taking place precisely in those areas.

Q: Also, there were aircraft facilities there.

BROWN: Oh, yes. I was a Sino-Soviet watcher, but I was also getting a first class, hands on education on the way things ran there.

Q: How did you feel about this? Later on, some 29 years later, the Soviet Union collapsed essentially because of its economic deterioration. Somehow, we had had the impression that the Soviets were 10 feet tall.

BROWN: I'll raise this point because in 1972 I was in the National War College. I got into a very interesting discussion with a very senior guy from DIA [Defense Intelligence Agency], who rose to a very high position in that agency. I was telling him how primitive Soviet agriculture, their cities, and city life were. From my viewpoint, and speaking as a non-economist, the whole Soviet economy was very limited. This man said, "Okay, Bill, but I'm telling you that they put up first-class missiles. That's why, in a sense, they can put up some first-class satellites with these missiles."

For me this represented the great dichotomy in the Soviet Union. They were sinking so much of their money into that. (End of tape)

Q: You were saying that they put so much of their resources...

BROWN: They were putting so much of their resources into a competitive arms race, satellites, and the whole range of military equipment. At the same time they were so pitifully backward in so many other areas. Even during the great, 50th anniversary celebration of the foundation of the Soviet Union [1967], when they boasted of producing so many tons of steel, so many tons of grain, and so forth, it was apparent that they remained significantly backward. I would say that the Soviet system was almost literally rusting away. If you saw one Soviet city, you'd seen them all. These cities were very drab and certainly not exciting.

There was a great deal of alcoholism and absenteeism from work. The shortages of food were really something to behold, apart from the staple foods. Bread was there in the stores. For the 50th anniversary celebration, in 1967, they tried to do some window dressing in the more fashionable stores, and so forth. However, Soviet food consumption was pathetic as far as meat was concerned.

So, as I said, I went to Moscow as a Sino-Soviet watcher, but I got a much broader education than that. It was a difficult situation. Work in the embassy was difficult. I was convinced that the Sino-Soviet split was far worse than had been depicted. I tended to describe it in more dramatic ways than some of my superiors were prepared to accept. However, of course, that's life.

Ambassador Foy Kohler was replaced by Ambassador Llewellyn Thompson.

Q: Ambassador Thompson was returning to the Soviet Union, wasn't he?

BROWN: He was returning to the Soviet Union. He had played a major role in previous administrations and in the negotiation of the neutralization of Austria.

By now the Vietnam War had deepened to the point where its impact on Soviet-American relations was worsening all the time. Ambassador Thompson was sent to Moscow in no small measure to wait to see whether the Soviets under Kosygin and Brezhnev would be willing to play a fruitful, productive role in ending the war. Alas, it was not to be.

We had many visitors in Moscow. This was a rather fascinating point. One visitor was a gentleman named Richard Nixon, the former Vice President of the U.S. and later the President. I believe that he came to Moscow in 1967 as a private person, having been defeated in his gubernatorial campaign in California [in 1962]. We tried to make appointments for him. He wanted to see Brezhnev, the Politburo, and so forth. Richard Nixon could not get a single appointment in the entire Soviet apparatus! Not even an appointment with a dog catcher. We were embarrassed and so forth, but that's the way it was.

We sent him out to Kazakhstan on a side trip. When Nixon returned from there, Ambassador Thompson, obviously in an effort to make Nixon feel better, held a session up in his office. Nixon held forth on NATO [North Atlantic Treaty Organization], the world, and so forth. I was a dyed in the wool closet Democrat, but I must say that I was impressed with Nixon's handling of that session. I was very impressed, indeed.

Let me say a word at this point about the man I called my KGB [Soviet Secret Police] handler whose name was "Nick." Most of us had a contact who was a KGB officer, whether we wanted one or not. Nick had served in the Soviet embassy in Washington and maybe in the Soviet UN Mission. He was always affable and an easy-going guy. He worked out of the "House of Friendship." Nick was the kind of guy who would say, "How's the work going? Are you getting appointments? Can I help out in any way? I know it's difficult," and so forth. Occasionally, we would get together. I dutifully and immediately reported contacts with Nick. Nick was a KGB Colonel, as it were, and co-author of a book on "How to Subvert American Officers." When you talked to him, you knew when you were hearing things. [Laughter]

I said, "You know, Nick, Nixon is in Moscow." He said, "Yes." I said, "Well, he's been unable to get a single appointment." He said, "Oh?" I said, "You're making a big mistake, Nick." He said, "Well, you know, his reputation as a hardliner," and so forth. I said, and remember this was 1967 when I said all of this: "Nick, obviously we're going to have Lyndon Johnson reelected President. A Democrat will be the next President, no question about it. Johnson has made a lot of progress with promoting the Great Society and so on. But you never know with this kind of individual. You people would be well-advised to take out a little insurance policy and be nice to Nixon." Or words to that effect. Well, it was not to be, and Nixon did not get a single appointment during this visit to Moscow. He got on the airplane and flew directly to Bucharest, [Romania].

In Bucharest President Ceausescu rolled out the red carpet, wined and dined Nixon, and he never forget that.

Q: This relationship with Ceausescu really made an impact on Nixon.

BROWN: Years later, when I was in New Delhi, President Nixon flew through with Secretary of State Kissinger. I was the motorcade officer. The next stop was to be Bucharest. There President Ceausescu did everything, with the red carpet, salutes, dancing, and everything. Nixon responded very well for Ceausescu's earlier graciousness.

Anyway, another visitor to Moscow was Henry Kissinger, that is, Professor Henry Kissinger. I had word that I should meet him and take care of him, because he was connected with David Rockefeller [President of the Chase Manhattan Bank]. I remember driving out to Sheremetyovo Airport, which is a good distance outside of Moscow. I was sort of muttering to myself: "I'm a Harvard man, and all of that, but what am I doing meeting a Harvard Professor, driving him in to Moscow, putting him in a hotel, and so forth."

I think that Kissinger was attending a Pugwash Conference, or a Pugwash-like Conference. In addition...

Q: You might explain what Pugwash was.

BROWN: "Pugwash" was the name of a place where a series of meetings of good thinking people on various sides got together informally. They included people in and out of government who discussed the possibilities of arms control and disarmament. A very prestigious crowd of people on all sides.

Kissinger had another agenda as well. That was with a Japanese outfit which had arranged with him that he would meet with and debate a Soviet figure named Zhukov. Zhukov was an old, ideological hack from "Pravda." The subject matter was scheduled to revolve around Asia and the world. I'll never forget Kissinger saying to me: "I'm making tapes of this and I want you to send these back to Washington for me through the diplomatic pouch. I want to make sure that I have, on the record, exactly what I said.”

I said to myself: “Who does this guy think he is? Using the diplomatic pouch? He's just a private citizen.” Well, the next time I saw him, I was holding the door open for him. [Laughter]

Another visitor to Moscow turned out to be Chester Bowles. Bowles was coming through Moscow as Ambassador to India, en route back to his post in New Delhi from consultations back in Washington. He and his wonderful wife, Steppy, routed themselves through Moscow on the way back to New Delhi. At that time we were between Ambassadors in Moscow. Toby Swank was the DCM and the Charge d'Affaires. He didn't like Bowles. Bowles had carried out a mission to Cambodia, while Swank was stationed there. Swank's nose was out of joint as a result. Swank called me in and told me: “Chester Bowles is coming to Moscow.” I said, “Yes.” Swank said, “You're the Asian affairs expert. You handle him.” I said, “Yes.” Swank said, “I'm just awfully busy, so I want you really to take care of Bowles.” In other words, I was to entertain and take care of him. So I did.

Bowles' departure from Moscow was delayed for an extra day, so we had him on our hands for something like three days in all. He and his wife were a charming couple. I had always idolized him as a great, American figure. As we sat in the VIP lounge in Sheremeteyevo Airport, prior to his leaving, Bowles said to me: “You know, you're just the kind of guy I need.” I thought: “Wouldn't it be great with Lindsey Grant covering communist China!” Bowles said that he would like to have me also replace Roger Kirk, (later Ambassador to Romania), as his Soviet specialist. He added that he would like to combine this because a personnel reduction in force was taking place at the time in the Foreign Service. So I would be both a Soviet and Chinese Communist specialist. Ambassador Bowles said, “Why don't you come to the embassy in New Delhi?” I said, “Mr. Ambassador, I'd be delighted, but I've never served substantively in Washington. Everybody tells me, including Foreign Service Inspectors, peers, and superiors, that I'm headed for Washington. I don't think that it's possible to do a tour in New Delhi at this time.” He said, “Well, let's see what I can do.”

A week later a cable came in to Moscow, ordering me transferred to New Delhi. So I left Moscow. I had witnessed the great, 50th anniversary celebration of the Communist Revolution and all of that hype. It was really something to see that the Soviets really wanted to celebrate this anniversary. I had also witnessed the deepening of the Sino-Soviet split to the point that I went down to the train station and saw Chinese students departing for Beijing. These students had deliberately fabricated scuffles with the Soviet police so that they could go back to Beijing, with apparently bloody bandages on them. They knew what they faced in the Cultural Revolution, which was then at its height. The Cultural Revolution was an ideological and almost religious phenomenon, something like the Salem Witch Trials in American history. It was amazing.

At the train station I saw the Chinese Charge d'Affaires and his senior staff, standing in a semi-circle, holding copies of Mao Tse-tung's “Little Red Book,” looking at a bunch of Chinese students who were extra bandaged, having manufactured the scuffles with the Soviet police. Some of the students were in stretchers and some of them were heavily bandaged. These two, semi-circles faced each other. It was like something right out of a religious service. Somebody would say, in a low voice: "Turn to page such and such." And someone else would read: "You cannot sail the seas without a helmsman." Then someone would say, "Chairman Mao is our great helmsman. See page such and such," and someone would say, "Our Great Leader, Mao Tse-tung, says," and so forth. It was like a church service. And off the students went on their way back to Beijing.

As the students' train pulled out of the station, some of them leaned out of the last car and shouted out in Russian: "Long live the friendship between the Great Soviet and the Great Chinese peoples!" And surrounding the train was a bunch of Soviet police goons yelling at the Chinese students: "Svoloch" ("Bastard!") [Laughter]

As I looked back on it, the assignment to Moscow was painful, and it was hard work. We suffered the rigors of family separation. Two of our daughters were in their early teens, and they had to be put in school in Vienna and later on in Copenhagen. That was a big wrench for us at the time. Obviously, I hated the Soviet system. I didn't like, and no one would like the office layout of the embassy, along with all of the restrictions and provocations. However, it was a great experience.

Q: Were you personally provoked at all? Did you get any attempts at personal attacks at all?

BROWN: When we were on the road, as I said, some nice-looking women would come up and try to interest us. My wife would get provocative behavior from Soviet women. They would ask her: "Is your husband unhappy?" There were times when one might pick up the phone and hear one's own voice. Or the phone was clicking in such a way that you knew you were being bugged. It was tough to serve at the embassy in Moscow.

Q: In the Political Section what was the prognosis for the Brezhnev and Kosygin regime at that time? They were fairly new on the scene.

BROWN: They were new on the scene. They were busily trying to strengthen the Soviet system. As I said, among other things, they had the benefit of the celebration of the 50th anniversary of the Communist Revolution. So, in a sense, they were in charge of the sacraments. They could pull off, and did so, a great, world communist gathering, to which even the Cubans and the North Koreans sent delegates. This effort was obviously structured at the expense of the Chinese communists.

However, the Soviets were experiencing increasing difficulties, of course, in dealing with the European situation. There was the Yugoslav phenomenon. By the way, some of the best diplomats I ever ran into in those days were specifically the Yugoslavs.

Q: I remember that both in China and in the Soviet Union the Yugoslav diplomats were often our best sources of information.

BROWN: They were first class. They spoke excellent Russian. They knew the system and they had a certain amount of entree by virtue of their communist credentials. After all, a Yugoslav Ambassador would feel that he was entitled to meet significant, Soviet Communist Party figures, and not with the shadows that we met with, such as government bureaucrats. They would meet with communist party officials. That's where the real power was. Of course, they were trying to work this status for their own benefit. So there were a lot of fascinating things about the Yugoslavs.

One thing I would like to mention before I leave this account of my time in Moscow, was the outbreak of the Arab-Israeli War in 1967.

Q: This was also called the Six-Day War.

BROWN: At the time there was a very small but active Israeli embassy in Moscow. By this time I was getting used to demonstrations. There were anti-American and anti-Chinese demonstrations. It was interesting to observe the way that the Soviets mounted them, these so-called spontaneous demonstrations. I remember getting a phone call from a journalist who said, "The Soviets are about to mount an anti-American, anti-Israeli demonstration. It's going to come right down Tchaikowskava Boulevard later this morning."

So I passed the word and, sure enough, all the traffic on the street was diverted. First of all many water trucks were deployed in semi-circles around the Israeli and American Embassies. Then hundreds of police goons appeared in trenchcoats around the Embassies. The traffic stopped. Then a long line of heavy military or police trucks appeared on Tchaikowskava Boulevard, a very wide thoroughfare, and parked opposite our embassy, bumper to bumper. These trucks were loaded with police. In the trucks and behind were police officers with radio equipment. At long last came the demonstrators, predominantly Arabs and with a sprinkling of Afro-Asian, Third World protestors, with their Soviet keepers along with them.

They were still very far away, but opposite our embassy they found that the scene was not quite what they expected. Between themselves and the embassy was an enormous amount of space, with all of these water trucks and hundreds of police goons protecting us. Then there was the long line of police cadets or troops, armed, and riding in these trucks which were parked, bumper to bumper. Their own people were locking arms and guiding them. In other words, they couldn't stop. So they went past us on a guided route, turned the corner, and headed for the Israeli embassy, where they did the same thing. I became well acquainted with spontaneous demonstrations during my time in Moscow.

Q: Didn't they have a demonstration where ink bottles were thrown against the front of our embassy? Some of the windows were broken, and the Soviet Government ended up paying for it. I'm sure that the Soviet feeling about African and Arab students must have been...

BROWN: I had a fascinating, introductory experience to this kind of feeling. My wife, Helen, and I, together with our family, chose to come into the Soviet Union by a route that was very rare for those days. I deliberately chose to come in on what I think was the "KRUPSKAYA," a Soviet vessel which went from London to Leningrad, via Copenhagen and perhaps Stockholm, although I'm not sure of that, and Helsinki. Then we took a train into Moscow. We debarked and spent several hours in Helsinki. At this time I assisted a dark-complexioned gentleman who was an Indian. He had a lot of baggage to take care of. He was so grateful for my help. He said, “How can I repay you?” I said, “Don't worry about it.” We struck up a conversation. It turned out that he was a graduate student at Lumumba University in Moscow.

Anyhow, he said that he wanted to invite us to visit Lumumba University. I said, “Look, you should know that I'm going to be a Political Officer in the American embassy in Moscow. You're an Indian student. I don't want you to feel uncomfortable about this.” He said, “No, no. I don't care. I'm independent and I'm in my last year at Lumumba University.” So I said, “Fine.” Well, by golly, some time later he got in touch with us. He came and had Thanksgiving dinner with us.

He also invited us to visit Lumumba University: Helen, myself, and our two older daughters, who were then in their early teens. He got us into the university, past the guard and so forth. We went up to his room, which he was sharing with a Latin American student and an African from Kenya or some place like that. At the sight of us the word went out, and suddenly, the room was filled with black students from different parts of Africa. They were pouring out their hearts on the terrible experience of being black students in Moscow. Their difficulty was, as they put it, the more Russian they learned, the more they could understand the insults which were thrown their way, and so forth. This was a real revelation.

Q: I interviewed a whole group of African students who had attended the University of Sofia, [Bulgaria]. They were tired of being called, “black monkeys.”

BROWN: On an agricultural trip in Orel, South of Moscow, between Moscow and Kiev, I was traveling with the American Agricultural Attaché and a Canadian. This Canadian was a French-Canadian who fancied himself as a liberal. After the first night in Orel he was becoming a very strong, conservative, anti-Soviet person.

Well, you know the Soviet system. There are very few bars outside of Moscow. In those days drinking alcoholic beverages was done in hotel restaurants, and heavy drinking it was. The whole system was set up. Your room had been set, and your table was already designated. As we came down, we found that the dining room was crowded to overflowing. Every seat was taken, and every table was occupied except one that was empty. On this table was the American flag! [Laughter] The three of us sat down at this table. Our colleague was a Canadian, and I felt that it was sort of insulting to him. So I took the American flag and put it aside on a radiator, or something like that. The maitre d. came over, picked up the American flag, and dramatically placed it in the center of our table. After a while, through the doorway appeared a black man. He made straight for our table. Efforts were made to intercept him, but we said, “No, no. Let him sit down.” Here we were in the provincial city of Orel which, by the way, had been overrun by the Germans during World War II.

We struck up a conversation with this black man, who turned out to be the brother of Tom M'Boya of Kenya.

Q: Tom M'Boya was a labor leader. He was a science major, wasn't he?

BROWN: I'm not sure. I'm not sure whether he became Prime Minister or not, but he was a very high-ranking person. I said to him: “What in the world are you doing here?” He said, “They stuck me here. You don't know what it's like. Children come up to me and say, 'Why don't you wash?' People call us 'monkeys.' Can you get me out of here?" This was the cry of many black students at the time. They asked us for help in getting out of the Soviet Union. We would say, "Look, you have to get a Soviet exit visa. We can't do that kind of thing for you."

It turned out that this man had had an argument with his brother, Tom M'Boya. Tom got so fed up with him that he said, "I'm going to send you to the United States," or some such place, "on a student program." He was so angry that he went across the street to Tom's bitter rival, Oginga Odinga. He said to him: "Send me to Russia," which was arranged. It was amazing! We had amazing experiences in the Soviet Union, especially on the road there.

Before we move on to another subject, this trip gave me a chance to visit Vilnius, Lithuania, and Riga, Latvia, with my wife and my boss, the Political Counselor. These places were under Soviet occupation, of course, but it was remarkable that the tone and atmosphere were so different from the rest of the Soviet Union. The Lithuanians and the Latvians were just dying to get out of the Soviet Union. I couldn't imagine at that time that they would finally make it, as they did. It was a remarkable and great learning experience.

I then went to India.

Q: Let's go into a couple of additional questions about the Soviet Union. We had seen the Sino-Soviet split, which was getting bigger and bigger. At the same time, by 1968, we were deeply involved in the Vietnam War. Both the Soviets and the Chinese communists were supporting North Vietnam. You must have been looking for splits there and trying to start something.

BROWN: Yes. Among other things the Soviets and the Chinese communists were each charging the other with selling out North Vietnam. The Soviets were saying: "We're sending goods to North Vietnam. They have to travel on Chinese railroads, but China is holding up these shipments." The Chinese would say, "That's rubbish. Besides, you're not sending the right materials. You're only paying lip service to proletarian internationalism," and on and on. This enmity between Soviets and Chinese reached the point, and this was a tell-tale sign, that the Soviets began to make public exposes on Chinese intelligence.

I remember reading an article in "Za Rubizhjon," a weekly Soviet publication. Its name means "Overseas." It was a relatively more sophisticated, journalistic vehicle for Soviet propaganda. This publication carried an expose of the Chinese communist intelligence apparatus in, let us say, Switzerland. I took this article to a colleague and said, "Wow! When they go so far as to start attacking each other's intelligence service, then you know that it is really bad news." Usually, that kind of material is kept...

BROWN: Service in the Soviet Union was a great experience, professionally. It was tough in many, many ways. However, it armed me for a whole series of upcoming tasks.

Q: What were you getting about the Cultural Revolution in China? You were there at the embassy in Moscow from 1966 to 1968. What information were you getting about Sino-Soviet relations at that time?

BROWN: What we were getting, of course, was what the world press and our own press were saying about this. We got U.S. commentaries on it. As a Sino-Soviet specialist, I was getting material hot off the press in "People's Daily," which was published in Beijing. I received copies of that, under a special subscription, one day after publication in Beijing. So I was not trailing very far behind events. There was remarkable stuff in it.

FBIS [Foreign Broadcast Information Service] was giving us their take as well. I was also reading "Pravda," "Izvestia," and special pieces that the Soviets were putting out on the horrors of the Cultural Revolution. The Soviets pictured the Cultural Revolution as destroying a communist society, as they had known it, and as we all had known it. I was getting an awful lot of information on it.

Of course, I couldn't be in touch with Chinese diplomats in Moscow. However, there were other sources of information as well. I would go past the Chinese embassy occasionally and would learn that there was to be a spontaneous anti-Chinese demonstration in front of the Chinese embassy. Following this advance warning, I would position myself outside the Chinese embassy and, sure enough, loads of trucks would appear on side streets filled with Soviet security police. First would be the plain clothes police, then uniformed police, and then factory workers. These people would be trucked into Moscow and provided with loudspeakers.

I remember one case when these workers were provided with a chainsaw. These workers sawed down the exhibit which the Chinese communists had just set up within the Chinese embassy grounds on the latest successes of the Cultural Revolution. The exhibit had some anti-Soviet propaganda in it, so the workers in this spontaneous demonstration came with a chain saw and just sawed the whole thing down! I'll never forget what a little old lady did. She was just passing by, but these little old ladies can be fearsome in such circumstances. Never underestimate the power of women, and particularly little, old ladies! I remember an old lady standing next to me and yelling: "Chornaya Neblagodorzhnost" ("Black ingratitude"). In other words, she was indignant that the Soviets had given the Chinese billions of rubles in aid when, after World War II, the Russians were so down and out, and "Look what the Chinese have done to us," and so forth. Feelings like this ran very deep.

Q: What were you getting in terms of what the Cultural Revolution was about, at that particular point?

BROWN: Of course, I was getting information on the Cultural Revolution from American and European sources. I got the Chinese version of what they were saying about themselves. I was getting a deliberately distorted Soviet version of events in China. I was in touch with the Japanese, French, and British Embassies.

Q: At that time the French had just recently opened relations with communist China. Of course, the British had always maintained their embassy in Beijing. The Yugoslavs also had their embassies in both Moscow and Beijing. Sometimes it was a little difficult to understand the reason for the Cultural Revolution. We now understand that it was Mao Tse-tung trying to tear everything down and start all over again.

BROWN: Yes. This reminds me of something else. It was in Moscow that I received a pitch, if you will, a real feeler from a Mongolian. This was interesting, very interesting. He was from "MONSANTE," which was their equivalent of "TASS," the official news agency. I don't recall exactly how it started, but somehow this guy accidentally bumped into me at a reception, or something like that. He said, "Look, I'd like to get together with you. I'd like to have you over to my apartment." His kids were wearing the kind of clothes that my daughters were wearing. You know, high collared boots and mini-mini skirts. [Laughter] They wanted hi-fi and so forth. He said to me quietly: "You know, don't you think that it's time to open up diplomatic relations between the U.S. and Mongolia? After all, look at the crazy things that are happening in China. You know how we feel."

I dutifully reported this conversation. Nothing came of it immediately, but something was to come of it later on. This was a feeler.

Q: I think that when President Kennedy first came into office...

BROWN: As I said before, J. Stapleton Roy and Curt Cameron, both distinguished American diplomats, were given Mongolian language training at the FSI [Foreign Service Institute], or through the FSI, in the United States. However, nothing happened. Now, I'm speaking of 1967 or 1968, I got this feeler from this Mongolian guy a couple of times. It was abundantly clear that this was a directed feeler for U.S. recognition of Mongolia. However, Washington had other things on its mind at this point. In any case, this stuck with me, and it had a direct relevance later on.

Q: How about Soviet relations with India at this particular time? We'll get to India later on, but...

BROWN: The Indians were warming up in their relationship with the Soviet Union at this time. You have to remember, and we'll talk about this later, India had suffered a horrible, humiliating defeat in the Himalayan War with China of 1962. The war was short and very sharp, and the Indians were thoroughly humiliated up in those high mountain engagements. The Indian Army was not a mountain Army. The units of the PLA [People's Liberation Army] which faced the Indians were a mountain Army.

Secondly, there was continuing tension between India and Pakistan. Pakistan was increasingly linked with China.

Thirdly, Mme. Indira Gandhi had come to the fore as Prime Minister. I think that she was a graduate of the London School of Economics [LSE]. Whatever else you want to call it, it tended to be a Fabian Socialist type of institution. Mme. Gandhi had a soft spot, to put it mildly, for the Soviet Union. This was infuriating to President Lyndon Johnson. On the one hand she was taking hundreds of millions of U.S. dollars in U.S. aid. At the same time she was transiting Moscow and making increasingly critical statements about U.S. involvement in the Vietnam War, and what she called colonialism, and so forth. She made these statements at a podium in Moscow, obviously aimed at us. The Johnson administration was understandably furious with Mme. Gandhi. This was another thing that made New Delhi sort of spicy as a place to serve.

Q: By the way, the French, had rather recently arrived on the China scene. I think that this was in the period of the mid-1960s. Did the French seem to be getting anything out of their contacts with China?

BROWN: A little bit, but remember that, like all Western Embassies, they were terribly restricted. Their embassy had been opened fairly recently. They really didn't pick up much from the Chinese. I can't remember specific details, but the French were appalled, as all of us were, at what was going on in China, in human terms. Yet France was conscious, like all of our NATO [North Atlantic Treaty Organization] partners, of the enormous Soviet threat and the fact that there was some utility in having a relationship with the People's Republic of China.

Q: By the way, speaking of the Soviet threat, when did you leave Moscow in 1968?

BROWN: I think that I left Moscow in the spring or early summer of 1968.

Q: Was Czechoslovakia playing any role by the time you left Moscow?

BROWN: That raises a fascinating question. The Prague Spring was in full spate as I was getting ready to leave Moscow. It was a remarkable thing, locally, to see the reactions among Czech diplomats.

My wife and I had an argument at the time. She said, "The Soviets are going to invade Czechoslovakia." I said, "Now, Helen, you have to realize that there are enormous stakes here." The Soviets had just celebrated the 50th anniversary of the communist revolution, and there was a great spell of brotherhood, and so forth. Obviously, the Soviets were very unhappy about what was going on in Czechoslovakia and how it could impact elsewhere in Eastern Europe, including Poland and elsewhere. I said to my wife: "Granted all of that, but I can't imagine that the Soviets would invade Czechoslovakia at this time." She said, "Well, you may be the expert, but I'm telling you that the Soviets are going to invade Czechoslovakia!"

I remember one foggy night in Moscow, coming home after midnight after a very late social function. Suddenly there appeared, overtaking my car, a very strange, military vehicle. It was one of these large armored cars. It was not a tank track vehicle. It had a great, white stripe painted down the back. It appeared and then it was quickly gone. I said to myself: "I just wonder whether there is some sort of maneuver going on that might have some relevance to Eastern Europe." Naturally, I reported this incident to our Defense Attaché. They grilled me and so forth, but I told the Defense Attaché that I did not think that the Soviets were going to invade Czechoslovakia.

WILLIAM J. DYESS

Assistant Administrative Officer
Moscow (1966-1968)

Ambassador William J. Dyess was born in Alabama in 1929. He received a bachelor's degree and a master's degree from the University of Alabama. He served in the U.S. Army from 1953-1956 and entered the Foreign Service in 1958. His career included positions in Belgrade, Copenhagen, Moscow, and Berlin, and an ambassadorship to The Netherlands. Ambassador Dyess was interviewed by Charles Taber on March 29, 1989.

Q: You went to Moscow and were there from 1966 to 1968.

DYESS: At the time, Copenhagen was a stopping-off place for the American ambassador, so Foy Kohler was by there a couple of times. I told him that I wanted to study Russian and I wanted to go there. I guess he asked around Copenhagen. Anyhow, the first thing I knew, I got Russian language training. I came back and I was back here for a year for Russian language training. Then I went to Moscow and Ford Cola was there. He was there for about a better part of a year and then Tommy Thompson came back for his second tour. I was there only two years. At that time, that was the standard tour. We have since lengthened it, but then it was a standard tour.

Q: Was that a tough job? Was it difficult doing business there?

DYESS: I found it difficult to live there because I found the place terribly oppressive. The first year was almost a repeat of my experience in Belgrade. I wanted to be in the political section, but I went there as the Assistant Administrative Officer.

The assistant administrative officer in Moscow at that time -- I don't know how it is now -- was a language officer. He was usually a political officer. He could be an economic officer, but usually he was a political officer who dealt with the Soviets to keep the embassy alive. You had to go to the Soviets for everything, for theater tickets, travel, just everything. It's not like any other place that I think you and I might ever live or hope to live. You had to go through the UPDK (uprovlennia po diplomaticheskoi korposum), as they call it, the Soviet administration.

So I dealt with the Soviets and I felt that I was wasting my time at first. My boss, Sandy Menter, who's a good friend -- we've been friends for many years -- belonged to the poker circle that Tommy Thompson had. For me to be down on the ground floor doing the administrative work when all the political types were well above us. Like I told Sandy one time, it's like being out in Las Vegas and being out front checking the bags, helping people get settled in the hotels, while you can hear the roulette wheels spinning inside, the cards being shuffled, and so on. You feel you're missing the action. I was missing the action.

I was wrong again. For my level, it was the best job that I could have had in Moscow because I got to see inside the Soviet bureaucracy. I was the only one who did at this time because relations were not particularly tight. We were not in the thaw. I was looking inside. I could see how the Soviet bureaucracy operated. For instance, we needed a new elevator in the embassy and there was a Soviet official who ordered the elevator without clearing it with us. We did not want the Soviets to put in this elevator. We wanted it to be American because we knew they would use the opportunity to bug the embassy. I fought with this guy for months and months and months. We came to very harsh words. Finally, one day I knew I had won because I went over to call him again delivering a new protest over, and I learned that this particular Soviet engineer had been transferred. I knew the thing was over. They gave it up and they had an elevator which they could never use because they couldn't put it in any other hole. It was built expressly for that particular shaft.

I dealt with the Soviets a lot and that was a very useful thing to do. When I became a political officer, subsequently, I did very little. I went over to the Foreign Ministry a few times and took notes and so on. Basically, all I did was what the other political officers did which was to sit there and translate the press, which you could do back here in this country. So it was the first job that was the good job at that time.

Q: I guess that's often true. As you say, the consular job, the administrative job can often get you wider and broader contacts.

DYESS: Particularly if you are a new officer, and almost certainly if the society is not an open society, if it tends to be closed at all.

Q: Svetlana defected maybe while you were there in 1967.

DYESS: Yes, she did. It was a very touchy thing. I guess about the most interesting thing that I did in the Soviet Union, other than my official work, was making contact with artists. You see, these are mostly Russian paintings here -- avant garde, underground. We got to know a number of artists and bought things from them, and went to the theater, went to museums looking for little pieces of protest. At one time it looked as if Khrushchev was going to raise the curtain a little bit. It was a thaw. Some of these paintings were exhibited, but they didn't stay up very long. They were taken down. It was clamped down again. I followed this community and, as I say, I had some friends there, but tried never to play games with the Soviet authorities. I traveled a fair amount and we were always tailed, but again I tried not to -- with one exception where we did play a game. But I tried never to play games. We would just let them go with us.

The only time my wife and I played, we were down in Tbilisi and they just had their new subway system installed. We thought we'd take a ride on it. We got on -- it was very, very cold -- and we rode from the city out to the outskirts in the suburbs. Then it comes out from under the ground and it's on top -- elevated system like ours here in Washington. We were being followed. We got out and crossed under to the other side to go back in town, because all we wanted to do was just to ride on this thing. This guy followed us over. The train pulled up, and everybody got on. To this day I don't know why I did it, but I didn't get on. I stepped back at the last minute and pulled my wife back. That poor guy had to step back. The train pulled out and we went to the end of the platform where there was a little glass enclosure. We stood inside this glass enclosure waiting for the next train which must have been 20 minutes away. That poor soul was having to stand out on the platform freezing to death. He was not in adequate clothing. He just had to wait. Finally, the train came and we did the same thing again. Then we got on. He got on and he sat down. So we sat down right across from him. Everybody in the car was looking at us, staring at us, staring at our clothes, our shoes. The shoes are the way they tell that you're a foreigner. Everybody was staring at us except this one guy, and he couldn't look at us. He was looking at everything else in the car but us. I have about a dozen stories about being followed, but I never played a game except for that one. I wished I hadn't done it because, if you play games with them, they can get angry with you and make it unpleasant.

JONATHAN B. RICKERT
Staff Aide to the Ambassador

Jonathan Rickert was born and raised in Washington, DC and educated at Princeton and Yale Universities. After service in the US Army, he joined the Foreign Service in 1963, serving tours in both Washington and abroad. His foreign posts include London, Moscow, Port au Spain, Sofia and Bucharest, where he served as Deputy Chief of Mission. In his Washington assignments Mr. Rickert dealt primarily with Eastern and Central European Affairs. Mr. Rickert was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: Well you had mentioned before that Ambassador Foy Kohler had selected you to be staff aide in Moscow in the Department. The assumption was that he would still be there. Was he there when you finished your tour in London and did you go to that position or did you do something else in Moscow?

RICKERT: He was still there but his departure was already scheduled. So, in October of '66, I transferred to Moscow and I had about two weeks with the Kohlers and my predecessor, Richard McCormick, and then there was a fairly brief interregnum – a couple of months, six weeks or so – over the Christmas holidays and then Ambassador Llewellyn Thompson came in January of '67.

Q: And you were then his staff aide?

RICKERT: So I was his staff aide as you probably know, at that time, and still in one form or another, the Ambassador's staff aide lives in the Ambassador's residence, Spaso House. I lived in what was a two-room apartment on the ground floor where it had previously been the billiard room, and an attached bedroom that's been expanded and other facilities had been added since then. But, I was very much a member of the family. I had two meals a day with the Ambassador and his wife and three daughters – not breakfast, but the other two meals. If they were out, obviously not, but in principle, two meals a day for which I paid. We had an arranged schedule, a payment, and I was, in effect, the live-in GSO [General Services Officer] at Spaso House as well as I was responsible for the staff of 17 which included three Italians, two Chinese Communists and a bunch of Russians. The Chinese are interesting. They were technically Chinese Communists. These are two gentlemen named Tang and Chin who were brought by journalists as house boys to Moscow – an American journalist – around 1940 or so. Then the journalist left and they couldn't go back to China for one reason or another. They both married Russian women and they got employment with the embassy.

Q: In the early post-war period or ... ?

RICKERT: Well, I think during the war. I'm not sure exactly when. They're mentioned by George Kennan. He devotes a page to them in one of the volumes of his memoirs. They were both there when I arrived. But Chin was suffering from terminal cancer and died shortly thereafter. I was responsible for arranging for a burial in the local cemetery. His widow didn't want him to have an autopsy, for reasons which I didn't know, which was standard procedure in Moscow at that time. And it was difficult for the American embassy to request the Soviets not to perform an autopsy on him – an officially Chinese Communist. But we did do a diplomatic note, which was the first diplomatic note I ever wrote, which asked on behalf of the former American embassy employee that they not do an autopsy and they didn't require the autopsy.

The funeral – Russian style – the coffin was placed on a flat bed truck and driven to the cemetery. It was in the winter, it was snowing; it was like something out of a Russian movie. In a very dignified but unceremonious; it was placed in the ground and covered over with no ceremony at all. Nearby, I remember there was a Soviet burial taking place with an off-key brass band and long speeches about the comrade and all that he had done for the cause. It wasn't the way I would want it, but that's the way it was done in those days.

Q: Now, in addition to basically being the manager of this household staff and taking care of problems in residences that had occurred, you had other duties, too, in the chancellery, the embassy, in the ambassador's office or did somebody else do much of that?

RICKERT: Well, I did have other duties but Ambassador Thompson didn't use a staff aide the way some other people would. I did a lot of protocol stuff, guest lists and arrangements for events and served as a form of communication with the embassy staff. But on substance, he did not use me directly. As time went on – I was there for two years – I kind of latched onto the clerical section and was able to get some additional duties, which in those days in Moscow was a lot of reading of the press and reporting of what was in the press, and I did some of that. But I didn't do a great deal for Ambassador Thompson other than the things we already mentioned.

Q: It seems to me that in this period there was often a rotation program. I know of officers about this time who went to Oberammergau and then came to Moscow and often they would start in the GSO section and then go in to the political section. So there'd be a rule, sort of an organized rotation. You really didn't do that.

RICKERT: No. I know exactly what you're speaking of and many of my friends and colleagues did that. Usually, many of the tours were two years – well they were virtually all two year tours – but one spent in one section and one in another. There were jobs in admin that were often the first year. There were jobs in consular that often were the first year. There were two jobs in an unusual section. It's known through all of Moscow – it was the publication procuring office. Two FSOs who did that would do it for a year. It was a lot of traveling and somewhat difficult, wearing work and then they moved on to the political section or the econ section or some other part of the embassy. So, many of my colleagues and friends did do that. I did not. My job was unusual in almost every respect in comparison to the other jobs that existed at the embassy at that time.

Q: Did you get involved with visitors much?

RICKERT: Yes. That was actually one of the most enjoyable things about the job because there were a lot of very interesting people who used to come, and many of them stayed in the Spaso House. The most interesting was, of course, Richard Nixon, who came and stayed for about five, six days at Spaso House. I had a chance to meet and talk with him, which was very interesting.

Q: At this time he was out of ... ?

RICKERT: He was gearing up for his successful run for the presidency.

Q: In '68?

RICKERT: In '67. Well, this was in '67 but he ran in the '68 election.

There are some interesting things that happened there internationally that are worthy of note. The Soviets decided – by everything I could tell – that he was a “has-been” and they did not pay any attention to him. He had no official appointments, although he asked for them. He asked to meet with his old nemesis Khrushchev, of course, that I understand, but that was not permitted. No Soviet official of any standing saw him. As a result, Ambassador Thompson had to try to keep him occupied and he did two things that I recall. One was a reception for the foreign and American press corps at Spaso House, which was sort of a press conference. There was a lot of skepticism among the press as to whether Nixon was going to be there.

After he lost the election for governor in California, then they sent him out to Central Asia for sight seeing on the trip to various places, to raise his profile as an international expert. The Russians were doing nothing to help him. From Moscow, he went to Bucharest. In Bucharest, Nicolae Ceausescu treated him as if he were sitting president. As we'll see later on, that paid off, because the first visit that President Nixon made to a Warsaw-Pact country was not to Poland, not to the Soviet Union, but to Bucharest, Romania, with consequences that in various ways are still being felt. But I think that the Soviets missed that treating him as an important political figure. They wouldn't have had to give him – not royal treatment but – he was still a significant person and they must have calculated that whatever intention he gave them, whatever they gave him, might assist him in his bid to become president which they didn't want to do. The Romanians bet on a long shot and cashed in big. So that was one.

Other people who came during that time were McGeorge Bundy and his wife – they came and stayed at Spaso House.

Q: He was still ... no longer National Security Advisor ...

RICKERT: No. He was ... out. The McNamaras came. Robert and Laura McNamara came, and I ended up being his tour guide in Moscow for a couple of days. The Thompsons were away at that time and he had the courtesy of staying, and he knew that he was allowed to stay at the residence. George Romney came ... kind of a feeler-bit for his presidential attempt. On the diplomatic side, Chip Bohlen came for a visit.

Q: Former ambassador?

RICKERT: He was former ambassador. I think he was in Paris as ambassador. Of course, Ford Collins was there when I arrived. And Opportune came on a visit. He was the office director. Charles Faire, a former diplomat who had lived in Spaso House, had been a colleague of Ambassador Thompson's during WWII. Katherine Graham came, Susan Mary Althaus, Martha Schlesinger, Robert Ellsworth – he came with Nixon and was later to be ambassador to Brussels and was sort of an aide to Nixon. Carl Kaysen, who had been at Kennedy's white house who was then director of the institute for advanced study in Princeton. Sol Hurok came. Lillian Hellman, Dinah Shore and of course, Anatoly Dobrynin came for meals occasionally. Gunnar Jarring, he was the Swedish Ambassador and you probably know from his ... He was one of the early Cyprus mediators under the UN, perhaps the first.

Q: ... and very much involved in the Middle-East also, with the United Nations.

RICKERT: Yes. He was a very distinguished Swedish Ambassador to Washington. My about-to-become-wife worked for his embassy, so I got to know him and his colleagues, but that comes a little bit later.

So there were a lot of interesting people who showed up. In many cases I was involved with taking them sightseeing and showing them around. I spoke Russian, and I usually spoke reasonably well, and that was one of the little perks of the job. There's one little Sol Hurok story I'd like to tell. He came to lunch one day. He gave his definition of U.S.-Soviet cultural exchanges. It's not a correct one, but it's amusing anyway, and in his definition was the following. He said: "They send us their Jewish violinists from Odessa, we send them our Jewish violinists from Odessa." He had a nice sense of humor.

Q: What would you say about the general state of U.S.-Soviet relations in this period that you were there?

RICKERT: It was difficult because of primarily Vietnam. Llewellyn Thompson had been sent to Moscow – I would have to say, by all appearances, somewhat against his will by President Johnson – to negotiate an _____ treaty. Thompson was extraordinarily closed-mouthed on that. I knew nothing of what was going on with those negotiations, as was appropriate. I had no need to know. But that's what he spent his time doing on those afternoons when he was away from the office. But the cloud of Vietnam hung over everything. And then, of course, in August 1968, there was another event in Prague which complicated things from our side. So, I wouldn't say that relations were openly hostile, but there was a considerable reserve. I would speculate that the fairly new Soviet leadership, which was Kosygin and Brezhnev at that time, also was still consolidating itself. There was still some movement and jockeying and being a leader in the Soviet Union was not a job with a guaranteed tenure. So, there may be that there was some absorption and seeing where the chips would fall there as well. Eventually Brezhnev ended up being the unchallenged leader and remained so for a number of years, but in the late 60s it wasn't quite so clear yet.

Q: Who was the DCM there?

RICKERT: The first DCM was John Guthrie, a very interesting fellow. He was there for the first year. He had been teaching in Japan when WWII broke and spent WWII digging Japanese coal mines and learned Japanese. He was requested by Emory Swank, who was there for the second year. They're both very nice and good professionals.

Q: Okay, anything else we should say about your assignment to Moscow from 1966 to 1968? When in '68 did you leave?

RICKERT: I left in ... oh, that would have been in summer of '68.

Q: So you were there during the Prague ... difficulties? Prague spring and what followed.

RICKERT: Yes. That summer was, of course, a very uneasy one. In the earlier part of that summer, there was great speculation that the Soviets would invade. I remember we had one USIA officer at post of Czech origin named Jaroslav Verner, Jerry Verner, who followed all this with great interest and anxiety. Because he had a personal stake, it seemed, in the good things that were happening under Dubcek and was obviously dismayed when things went bad.

But, later in the summer, it seemed as though the situation had stabilized, so the attack on August 21st of '68, came as a surprise. In fact, the evening before, I had met a Swedish diplomat friend and spent the evening playing tennis at the Czechoslovak Embassy – they have their own court – with two Czech diplomats and a Swedish friend, Loserich Greendale. Somebody invited me to play doubles, and then we went in to the embassy and drank some Czech beer and the two diplomats gave no indication at all that anything untoward was about to happen. But the next morning, or during that night, the tanks rolled and the next morning it was in the press.

There are a lot of incidents that happened in Russia that were of interest, to me at least. Some of them had to do with Ambassador Thompson, and I recorded those in a separate memo which I can provide. One of Thompson's daughters told me that she wants to write a book about her father and I collected several pages of recollections of my days with him. I could provide them.

Q: Well I'd suggest that we'd append this to your oral history transcript. I don't think we necessarily need to repeat all of that here if you have it recorded.

RICKERT: I have it written down, and I've even added to it occasionally as I recall other things. Memory's a tricky thing and sometimes out of nowhere an incident or an event will pop up; one I've forgotten for a long time. So, it's in my computer and I just added something the other day that I thought of.

There are a lot of interesting things that happened that didn't involve Ambassador Thompson. I travel a lot in the country, which was a fascinating experience. In those days, you have to get permission from the government organ that was responsible for the caring, feeding and oversight of foreigners.

Q: Foreigners in general or foreign diplomats?

RICKERT: I suspect ... well, certainly foreign diplomats. Probably there were other branches of the KGB that took care of other foreigners. But in order to travel anywhere... One must recall that from Moscow, there was a 25 mile radius beyond which one couldn't go without permission, except for certain designated routes. One could drive to Leningrad. There was a route south that one could go on for a certain distance, but any other travel had to be approved. The travel plan had to be submitted 48 hours in advance, and they issued the tickets and made the hotel reservations so you could always be sure that you got a room that had electronics. This made a lot of trips impossible. I was in demand for travel because a lot of people did travel, and we had to travel in pairs for security reasons. I was single, so people often asked me to join in on consular trips and I made a consular trip to Kursk with Bill Farrand. He and I went to Kursk, the site of the greatest tank battle of all time. When two American women were injured in a car accident, this consular officer at the time went down to provide consular support, but he had to have someone to go with him, and I was selected. I visited, one way or another, a lot of places.

There was a lot of concern about attempts to compromise American diplomats by the KGB. The honey-trap was the most famous and much talked about – the only time that I had an experience with that particular approach. It was in the metropolis of Ufa and there was a publications procurement trip with, probably Bill Price, a very nice fellow ...

Q: I know him.

RICKERT: ... and a wonderful traveling companion. He was the Publications Procurement Officer, and I was shot-gun with him. We went to Ufa, and we went around, and we went to the bookstores and bought things, and then we went to the only hotel that was fit for foreigners, I suppose – only barely so – and had dinner. We sat down in a big empty dining room with a rather pathetic combo, nothing in front, playing music badly. As we sat there and ordered our dinner, two young Russian guys came over and said, which is common in the Soviet – was common in the Soviet Union – anyway, they said, “you mind if we join you?” There were a lot of empty tables. We said no and they sat there and spoke to each other in Russian and we spoke to each other in English and one of them said, “Do you speak Russian?” And we said yes, and then the conversation started.

I think they were legit. They were recent university graduates who had been sent to Ufa – they're engineers – to do some form of national service. They were bored to tears and very curious about the outside world. We talked about all sorts of things. The Kennedy assassination – they were convinced that it was the work of Lyndon Johnson, because he was the one who benefited from it, so who else could it have been ... and other things of that sort. They wanted to know about the United States. But we were sitting there and talking very amiably and drinking vodka and two young ladies came over and one of them said to me and Bill, they said, “My friend and I have been listening to you and you speak such excellent Russian but we can't tell ... are you Czech or are you Polish?” And we said no, we're Americans. “Oh, _____ _____ [unintelligible Russian]” They went on and on, and we tried to ignore them, but they didn’t go away. So eventually they said, “Could we sit down with you?” One sat next to me, and the other next to Bill. We really kind of ignored them in the conversation, but one of them sitting next to me finally leaned over and started whispering and said, “This is such a fascinating conversation, why don’t we go to my room and continue it?” I pretended that I didn’t understand or hear and then she tried it again and it became impossible not to respond. I had a stroke of vodka-fueled genius, and I said to her in terms that she would certainly understand that Bill, who looked a little older than I did, I said: “Do you see that man over there? He’s my boss and I can’t do anything without his permission.” She made a half-hearted attempt on Bill, which got nowhere, and that was the end of that.

Q: [chuckle]

RICKERT: [chuckle] But, there were things like that which happened.

Q: The requirement to travel with another officer, another American, was an embassy requirement?

RICKERT: That’s correct. That’s correct. While we were there, one of our military attachés, who was traveling with his British colleague, was drugged and put in a compromising position for photographs and that sort of thing. These things did happen, so it wasn’t just some fairytale. These kinds of things did happen. People did have approaches of varying degrees of seriousness.

Q: Okay, anything else we should say about your assignment in Moscow?

RICKERT: One of the things I had to do as staff aide was keep track of the provisions in liquid and solid. When I took over the job, the store room in Spaso House I had to make an inventory. Everything in it was sold by Ambassador Kohler to Ambassador Thompson. I found that there were five bottles of rye whiskey there, and I didn’t know what they were for. Eventually I found out that they had been bought for John Foster Dulles, who drank rye whiskey, when he was Secretary of State. It was expected before the Gary Powers incident, the U2 incident, that they’d be coming to Moscow. Someone had gotten the whiskey for him. Why he needed five bottles, I don’t know, but I suppose that was just being cautious. But they were still on the inventory and being sold from one ambassador to the other, untouched.

Q: Six years after or so. [laugh]

RICKERT: Yes, that’s right. They may still be there, for all I know. Russia was fascinating. The Seven Day War took place while I was there. I recall walking down the street in Moscow, just as that was going on, and hearing someone blasting from a window in June, I think, so it was warm and sunny. They were blasting out the window on the biggest loud speakers that person could muster. It was the theme song from Exodus. Russians that I spoke to at the time said, “Why is it that we always end up backing the scum bags?” Or Russian words to that effect. They were not very fond of Arabs and Muslims and other people that they found themselves aligned with.

Q: Did you know of Russian Jews of that period during your ... ?

RICKERT: No, I didn't. This was before. Of course, in the '60s, embassy people kept very close. They had good relations with the outstanding Russian Jewish dissidents. There were a few old friends of the Thompsons who may have been Jewish, but that was incidental. They were Russians first, Jewish second, and some of the later ones became Zionists and more open to being willing to declare their Jewish background.

Q: Now Llewellyn Thompson had served in Moscow once before?

RICKERT: Twice.

RICKERT: He'd been there in WWII. Then he'd been ambassador in the late '50s.

Q: Oh, this was his second time as ambassador?

RICKERT: Second tour as ambassador, which I think, in part, accounts for the lack of overwhelming enthusiasm in which he approached the job. I don't even imply for a moment that he wasn't totally and completely dedicated, but I think if he had his choice, he might have been in some place else at that particular stage in his life.

A couple of other things: Going to Easter services and Christmas services in Zagorsk, which was then the head of the Orthodox Church, the name has changed to something else. The cathedrals in Moscow were always very interesting in an officially Atheist country. There was a lot more attachment, at least to the outward signs of religion, than I would have expected. People said it's only old women, but on those occasions you would see quite a range of ages and even of social classes. You saw some people who were clearly not peasants or workers. That struck me. Of course, since 1989, there has been something of a revival of the Orthodox Church in Russia, not to mention the appearance of other churches which existed, like Baptist and others, but were extremely carefully monitored.

Going back to the household staff at Moscow for a moment ... The elderly Chinese gentlemen who didn't die, who was named Tang, had difficulties seeing. When he was outside of Spaso House he wore glasses, but he refused to wear them in the house. We asked him why, and we said he should wear glasses, and he said, "No, only the master can wear glasses in the house." He knew how to serve, and all the things that he needed to do – although he had been superseded as the senior butler by an Italian named Clemente. One of the best pieces of advice that Dick McCormick gave me before he left was, "Never allow Tang to serve white wine by candle light." Because he'd miss the glass, and I did see that on occasion. The other thing that Tang did was to keep water for mixing in drinks like whiskey and water in gin bottles. But, on at least one occasion, he mixed up the gin bottle with water and poured a mixture of gin and scotch, which wasn't quite well received.

Q: Okay, I think we probably ought to stop at this point, Jonathan. It's about the time that we had agreed on. We'll pick up next time with any last words about Moscow and go on to your next assignment okay?

RICKERT: Okay, sounds fine.

Q: Thank you.

We're picking up the oral history interview with Jonathan Rickert at the Association for Diplomatic Studies and Training. My name is Raymond Ewing. It's the 26th of September, 2003. Now when we stopped last time, we were just about finished with the assignment – it was your second overseas assignment to the embassy in Moscow – you may not remember exactly everything you said nine months ago, but is there everything particularly important that you would want to mention and we'll go on to the following assignment.

RICKERT: Well thank you, I'm glad to be back and to be picking up where we left off. I don't recall exactly how far we got in to Moscow but the one thing that I need to mention and I believe I did not mention back in December was the fact that I met my wife-to-be in Moscow in January of 1968. We became engaged that summer and married eventually. It's important because the personal aspect of foreign service life is of equal importance to the professional, and also because, since my wife is from Sweden and was working at the Swedish embassy at the time we met. It's one we'll see through the ensuing chapters of this great saga. I have been to Sweden many times without knowing enough that would make some sense, but in any case, we're still married after 35 years, which is unfortunately not the case with all of our contemporaries.

WILLIAM T. PRYCE
Publications Procurement Officer

Born in California and raised in Pennsylvania, Mr. Pryce was educated at Wesleyan University and the Fletcher School of Tufts University. After service in the US Navy he worked briefly for the Department of Commerce before joining the Foreign Service in 1958. Though primarily a Latin America specialist, Mr. Pryce also served in Moscow. His Latin America assignments include Mexico, Panama, Guatemala, Bolivia and Honduras, where he was Ambassador from 1992-1996. Ambassador Pryce was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1997.

PRYCE: I knew that I was going to Moscow and I knew that my first job would be as a publications procurement officer. I don't remember when I knew that. You trained to a slot. Not everyone in the class knew where they were going but I think most of us did. At least three of us were going to Moscow at the same time, another junior officer, myself and a USIS officer.

Q: You got to Moscow in '66?

PRYCE: I got to Moscow in the summer of '66.

Q: You were there until when?

PRYCE: I was there until the summer of '68. My first year was as the publications procurement officer which was a wonderful job.

Q: I understand it got you all over the place.

PRYCE: It got you all over the place.

Q: Can you explain what the publications procurement officer did?

PRYCE: I would go around and buy books that were supposed to be available easily, either through exchanges or on the open market, to satisfy the needs of various government agencies back in Washington. The Library of Congress had an exchange with the Lenin Libraries but they were never getting the books that they needed so basically you would go out and buy them in bookstores. There were a whole series of government agencies that were interested in these books. You would go around and make the rounds of the stores in Moscow and then in various other cities buying everything from physical abstracts to modern poetry. I remember that one of the hardest books to get and what everybody wanted quickly was, for example, when they would come out with an edition of Voznesensky, the poet, or Yevtushenko.

Q: Yes, they weren't completely in bed with the regime.

PRYCE: That's right. They were somewhat independent and slightly avant-garde. Everybody wanted to read the book as soon as they could and find out how many copies there were. You actually made sort of, how shall I say it, friendly acquaintanceships with the people at the bookstores who for example often had quotas to meet. You would go around at the end of the month, you knew that you had a number of books that people would be interested in, and buy at the end of the month to help them fill their quota. It also helped them have a friendly attitude so that when, for example, the Yevtushenko book came in they would save a copy or two for you because there was a tremendous demand.

As I say it was a challenge, it was hard work. You went out, you bought these books, you came back, you were visiting other cities, you wrapped them up, took them back and put them in the basement of the embassy. Once every two weeks or so you would go down and sort out the books that you had bought and decide who needed them. It was interesting because you didn't have much time so you had to go in and look at the titles, make a quick judgment as to whether it would be interesting for someone. For example you might get a book that looked like a very interesting treatise on physics but it might just be a textbook. You didn't have that much time so you'd say well it's probably interesting so I'll buy three copies. I can remember being down there sorting out books and saying gee whiz, I wish I had bought more copies of this or why did I buy ten copies of this and who can I send it to?

It really opened up the country because you had to try to get around and go to various cities. One of the interesting things was it was difficult to get to travel because there were three different way that the Soviet government would keep people from traveling. One, you had to send a formal diplomatic note two full working days ahead of time requesting permission to travel. We always said we didn't need permission so we would send a note informing them of our intention to travel but they could call back and say we are sorry but you can't go to this or that city. That was one way to block us. The second way is that you had to get airplane tickets to get to these places and sometimes they would say we're sorry but there are no tickets. You also needed a hotel room and sometimes there were no hotel rooms. Then there were a number of times when the city was closed and I can remember that there was a phrase that you heard so often which was the city of Kiev is closed for reasons of a temporary nature. It might be there were troop movements, tanks were going through or whatever it was.

I can also remember that there were times when you visited one of these cities, let's say Kazan. You'd get there and you'd get to four or five bookstores and word would get out, the Amerikanski are here and all of a sudden the stores would close. I can remember there were all kinds of reasons why these bookstores were closed. Zakrit was the Russian for closed and one of the reasons was zakrit chot, that means it was closed for audit, or zakrit savital [inaudible] (Russian word) which means that it was closed for sanitary day, it was their day to mop the floors. There was a little game of cat and mouse situation.

Q: I assume you would go on these, as was our practice, always with somebody else?

PRYCE: That's right, you always traveled with somebody else. We were harassed at times, yes. You would be followed, often closely and sometimes not. It was interesting. One of the things that a young book clerk would sometimes joke about was they would say "stovash druiip," who's your friend, the person behind you. Some of these guys were so ham handed, some of these KGB agents, they would be reading books upside down watching what you were doing. They made attempts at seduction. They were difficult at times and it was sometimes difficult but you never were, at least I was never physically abused. Some of the military attachés at times were. You were followed and sometimes had a difficult time.

Q: What was your impression outside of Moscow of the Soviet Union?

PRYCE: For one thing it was and in many ways still is, in many parts of the Soviet Union underdeveloped and there was a thin veneer of sophistication both economic and cultural. The Soviets tried to keep people from seeing what was really happening in the countryside. They had an Intourist system of special hotels, special trains, special everything which insulated the country from foreigners. They didn't want the foreigners to understand what conditions were really like and they didn't want their own people to interact with foreigners.

The system often broke down in small towns. For example there were never enough restaurants to go around so in those days you didn't have a table to yourself. You would go into a restaurant and you'd sit down and if there were places at the table someone unknown to you might come down and sit down because they needed a seat. Often with us they would come over and put a little American flag at your table so that nobody would come and sit with you. We often just sort of left that flag and sat at some other table. You got to know people for a temporary period of time.

I would say that the Russians, the Moldavians, almost the Latvians and Lithuanians and the Gurdezies all were fairly friendly people. The people themselves had a great admiration for the United States. We tried was to get to know any Soviets which was very, very difficult. We tried to do was we tried to get to know our counterparts at the Foreign Office. I learned that you could never invite one person from any office because they would never come. They always had to come in pairs. For example in the Foreign Ministry it had to be two people from the exact same office. You couldn't invite someone from the Americas section.

In fact when I moved out of the book buying business and into the political section I was responsible for U.S. bilateral relations which meant I was the low man on the totem pole. I was the low man on the totem pole but I also handled the Middle East and Latin America. If you invited somebody from the Americas section and somebody from the Middle East section they wouldn't come. You had to invite two people from the same section and one person would come and talk and the other person would sit in the corner and just watch. It wasn't always the same person; sometimes they would switch. It was really a repressive regime.

I had a friend that was obviously passed on to me by the ambassador's former aide whose job it was to keep tabs on me. I was his subject. I knew who he was and I knew he was a KGB agent reporting. He had some cover job and he could get plane tickets when other people couldn't. He would invite you to his house once in a while. I'm not sure it was his house or some house set up for him. It was again a cat and mouse game but you could get individual impressions of Soviets especially when you traveled because they couldn't control always. You could often sit on a plane with somebody temporarily where you could get a real conversation and the feeling of the Soviets.

Q: What was the interest of the Soviet citizen that you talked to in the United States?

PRYCE: One, they were very, very interested in what our economy was like. They obviously had been given a lot of propaganda. They were wondering what a capitalist economy did with poor people. They were always interested in what happened to minorities. They were also interested in music, culture and in the ability to have free thought and discussion; there was a great deal of interest in that. There was also as I say really a positive attitude toward the United States. I remember at one point, I think it was in Yerevan or maybe Baku...

Q: You're talking down in the Caucasus?

PRYCE: Yes, in the Caucasus. ...being taken to a museum of World War II and the guide made of special point of saying "Won't you please come back to the back part of the museum. There is a little area that shows a siege." And he says "Look at that truck, it's a Studebaker." They remembered Lend-Lease where the United States had supplies they had given to the Soviet Union during World War II.

Q: When you were down in the Caucasus or in the Kyrgyz or Kazakhs or other places, were you picking up any reflections of it's them and us with us being the Kazakhs and them being the Russians?

PRYCE: Oh yes, very definitely, very clearly. That's one of the things that we were trying to observe. Most of the top positions in all of the governments were held by Russians and that was resented by the local populace. There was very clearly the feeling that it was them and us. In the Baltic republics, Latvians and Lithuanians, but also certainly in the Caucasus and to a lesser degree in the Ukraine, Belorussia and in the far east, you really had people who to them the Soviet Union, and Moscow, was a distant place and almost a foreign country.

Q: Did you find that you were treating the Baltic countries, Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia, differently because we've never really recognized the Soviet occupation of those? Was there a different approach even at your level?

PRYCE: Not really, no. There was a recognition that many of the people in those republics resented, more than most, Soviet domination. People would tell you frankly, "I have to speak Russian and I have to work with the Soviet bureaucracy or I won't get anywhere." There was a resentment again that most of the senior officials in those countries were Russian as opposed to Lithuanians, Latvians or Estonians.

Q: When you arrived in the Soviet Union our ambassador was Llewellyn Thompson, is that right?

PRYCE: No, I think when I arrived it was Foy Kohler.

Q: What were you picking up as sort of the junior officer and brand new there, what our attitude towards what the situation was in the Soviet Union at that time and the threat of the Soviet Union? What was the feel of what it was going to do?

PRYCE: I think there was a feeling, certainly with Ambassador Kohler who was only there for about six months, that the Soviet Union was a dangerous power. It was still seeking to expand its hegemony and we needed to know as much as we could about what it was doing. I remember the difference, Ambassador Thompson replaced Ambassador Kohler, and this was his second tour. I think that he had a viewpoint that Soviet society was developing to a point in which it was eventually becoming, I wouldn't say more democratic but certainly it was becoming closer to a democracy than it had before. There would be a gradual evolution within the communist system which would force it to become less despotic. There would eventually be an increase in the level of cooperation between the two countries.

Q: When you arrived I guess in the summer of '66, who was the top dog? Was Khrushchev still there?

PRYCE: No, it was Brezhnev.

Q: This was very early Brezhnev.

PRYCE: Right.

Q: What were you getting within the embassy of what type of person was Brezhnev?

PRYCE: Brezhnev was a conservative, not very imaginative, skillful politician who had no interest in much changes. Khrushchev at one point remember had really tried to open up the country. Brezhnev was not interested in opening up the country. He was not interested in allowing much intellectual interchange. He was pretty stoic, repressive.

Q: What was the feeling towards the threat? Did we consider that things were on a sort of a hair trigger?

PRYCE: My recollection is that we thought it was an animosity but, no, I don't remember us believing that there was a hair trigger situation. There was a constant worry about what might happen because of the tremendous ability to mutually self self-destruct. There was a feeling that there was no way that we were going to change the Soviet approach and so we had to defend against it. We had to try to find out as much as we could about intentions. If there were openings, if there were weaknesses, that the Soviets were to be taken advantage of. But there was not a feeling that they were about to have.

Q: I'm probably over-exaggerating this but I have the feeling that during the time of Kissinger it was basically with Nixon in charge of foreign policy, there was a feeling at least at that level that the Soviets were maybe going to dominate over the long run. We had had problems with Vietnam and all and we had lost a certain amount of confidence. That might not have been true but this is the impression that I have. At the time we are talking about, we are involved in Vietnam but it is not the be-all and end-all. Were we feeling that we could outlast the Soviets at that point?

PRYCE: Yes. I think that in the embassy we felt, certainly I think Ambassador Thompson felt, that we had to be ready for a confrontation, we had to be strong, but that there was probably not going to be a confrontation and that in the end that we would survive; not only survive but our system would prevail. I think Ambassador Thompson thought it was a question of time. He would not have been surprised by subsequent developments.

Q: Because we are talking about a little more than 20 years later, the Soviet system imploded on itself because of internal problems. Were we seeing any of that?

PRYCE: Not really. Probably Ambassador Thompson saw it more than anybody. I remember having a talk with him as I was leaving and he was saying that he thought the two systems would come closer together and that there would be a better understanding. He felt that in the long run there would not be a confrontation if we kept strong. I think he felt that the Soviet Union would have to change.

Q: You were there in October 1967 which is known as the October War, the Six Day War, and things got kind of harried at one point where it looked like the Soviets might be giving massive troop supplies to particularly their Syrian allies, and the Egyptians too at that point. How did this particular period, it was only a short time but do you recall anything?

PRYCE: There was a lot of tension, a lot of tension. Clearly we were on opposite sides on a conflict and there was worry about escalation. There was worry about the Soviets' involvement. We certainly didn't want to have a confrontation but my recollection, and as I say I haven't really focused on it in 30 years, was that although a confrontation was possible, neither we nor the Soviets wanted it.

Q: Were there any high level, presidential, vice presidential, senatorial visits or something that you got involved in during this time?

PRYCE: There weren't many visits in that time but one that was the most interesting was not-yet President Nixon. He came to the Soviet Union and he was looking for advantage in the elections. The Soviets I think did not want him to become elected and they froze him out. As a result he had time on his hands and he came to the embassy at work time where he gave a brilliant exposition of his thoughts on foreign affairs. You saw the good side of Nixon, the able side of Nixon. We were very fortunate to get his candid first-hand thoughts about where the country might go because the Soviets wouldn't see him.

Q: This is one of the sort of enigmas. Really there is a great deal of respect for Nixon as I do these interviews, in foreign affairs. He really had a first class mind. He really thought these things through and yet he couldn't stand the Foreign Service in a way or at least he was very suspicious and yet the Foreign Service of all organization had...

PRYCE: That's right. I think many presidents have not a distrust but a lack of full confidence in the Foreign Service. Presidents are often interested most in the loyalty and they are not sure whether objectivity will help. If you had to pick between objectivity and loyalty, I'm not sure how you would pick, as it shouldn't be. Obviously in the Foreign Service you should be objective. There was I think a respect for the Foreign Service. There was respect for Nixon's ability.

One other thing was later on in the opening of China where he had the courage and the political ability to make that move. This is just an aside but I remember when I first came into the Foreign Service and Walter Robertson was the assistant secretary for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, you felt you were putting your career in jeopardy when you expressed an opinion that maybe we ought to be thinking about dealing with the communist government in China. That was absolutely not acceptable to the policy levels at the State Department. Obviously people did talk about it and obviously people did make recommendations but you did it with some peril.

Q: Did you get a feel for the Soviet, maybe East Bloc corps of our officers because it was competitive? Did you get a feel for the type of person they were?

PRYCE: Well, able, very able. I am trying to think back. There was a little bit of a Soviet club which frankly I was not a part of; I did not spend the bulk of my career in Soviet Affairs. A group of Soviet complete experts and people like Malcolm Toon and Jack Matlock. They spent the great bulk of their career on the Soviet Union so there was a great deal of knowledge; it was respect. I think that there was also a little bit of feeling that it was a closed circle.

Q: With your experience in the higher reaches of diplomacy as an aide to Tom Mann, if you mentioned the Dominican Republic thing to the other officers did their eyes glaze over?

PRYCE: No, no. Obviously there was a high interest in the Soviet Union but it was not to ignore other things that were happening. No. There were people who were interested in Vietnam, people were interested in the Dominican Republic. There were broad gauged people and there were people who were sort of Soviet internal specialists who would tend to stick with the Soviet Union but there were many very able people. I can think of Kurt Kamman for example, now our ambassador to Colombia who was deputy head of INR. He had been in Cuba, was not really a Sovietologist but he was an expert in Russia. There were a number of broad gauged people like Bill Brown who later became head of our interest section in China and I think ambassador to Israel. There were a series of people who had broad interests. But there was also the sort of club of people like Bill Lewis, Mac Toon, who were Soviet experts. I later worked on Soviet affairs where I ran the educational cultural exchange programs for students and I again had a great deal of respect for the people that were involved in Soviet affairs.

Q: While you were there was there any feeling about the Soviet intellectual group, intelligentsia? Did they seem to play a part, somewhat comparable to that by the intelligentsia in France and all? Were they seen as a target for us?

PRYCE: Very, very definitely. As a matter of fact they were our principal targets because they were the kind of people that you could get to know. I was mentioning to you this KGB agent that was my contact. He knew what we were interested in. We gave him nothing but he would get tickets to plays that were avant-garde where they would push the envelope, as you would say. There was a Soviet intelligentsia who were very unhappy with the Soviet Union, very unhappy with the repressive controls. There was samizdat, which was a self-produced press with people running off mimeographs at night.

One of the things Joan and I did was we invited every week as many Soviets as we could. We started out with locals in the embassy and then we moved to intellectuals, we moved to artists. We got to know a lot of the Soviet artists who were only interested really in expanding their understanding of art. When they would come to your house, they'd pay their price which was to go around the next day to the police station and give a complete dump to the KGB as to what they had seen or heard at your house.

When I left the Soviet Union, we gave a big party for all of the Soviets that we'd gotten to know, I guess about 60 people in this very small room. There was a lot of noise and a fair amount of food and drink. A number of people opened up at this very last party figuring that the microphones couldn't catch the people talking about how much they admired the United States. A couple of them were saying what they had to go through to maintain the contact they had with us. I remember one guy saying, "You know they were always asking me what I was doing and I told them I was coming to this American residence because I was interested in what was going on and I was a loyal Soviet. I knew that I would not betray my country and that there is no reason why I shouldn't go and I have no reason not to go so I kept going and I have nothing to apologize." But he said they asked him every time.

The Soviets were always trying to find out if you were making anti-Soviet remarks; if you said anything that was derogatory toward the Soviet Union or obviously if anything you said would be a weakness. But there were a number of Soviet intelligentsia who seriously questioned the regime and were unhappy with it. It was understood that they would like to see a more democratic regime.

Q: Were you under personal or official instructions to be careful when you were getting together with people not to use this as a time to sort of attack the Soviet system? What was your approach?

PRYCE: Your approach exactly was to be careful. You basically explained the U.S. system and you were trying to get attitudes, elicit attitudes of your colleagues about the Soviet system or about the United States. You were careful not to take the lead and criticize because what you were interested in was to listen. You might encourage them to criticize or to just ask how they felt.

Q: You left there in '68, what was your feeling about whither the Soviet Union and Soviet-American relations? You had seen the monster, you had seen the elephant, what did you think about it?

PRYCE: I thought that obviously, one, it was still the other power. I remember feeling that it was a very challenging experience. It was very difficult because you really couldn't penetrate very deeply into society. It was very difficult to do your job and to understand and interpret what was going on because it was so restrictive. A lot of the reporting that we did was out of the press. We would put interpretations on it but it was really hard to get good intelligence from your Soviet contacts. I think to answer your question more directly, it was a feeling that this is our major adversary and we want to continue to understand as much as we can about it. I was surprised, I must admit as most people were, with the implosion of the Soviet Union. I thought that was going to be 30 years away. I thought it would happen but never so quickly.

Q: There is a tendency particularly by our military and others who painted the Soviets as being ten feet tall and in later years and all, did your look at the Soviet system, as you were saying a lot of things didn't work.

PRYCE: Oh yes, very definitely.

Q: I always think, I was in Yugoslavia at the same time and I always think of lift nerodi, which is the elevator that doesn't work which was usually always in any hotel. It didn't work very well and the Soviet Union was much worse than Yugoslavia. Did this have an effect on you?

PRYCE: Certainly, certainly. As I started to say, you understood more closely that a great many parts of the Soviet Union were really underdeveloped countries especially for example in the Caucasus or in some ways in the Ukraine. The Soviets spent a lot of money on their military and they spent a lot of money on creating a veneer but the average citizen lived very badly and the system didn't work very well.

One of the things that I felt very strongly about - I'll jump ahead to when I ran the educational cultural exchange program - the Soviet intelligentsia would come over here and I always felt and still feel that this is one of the reasons that the Soviet Union imploded was the exchange system. I can remember people coming over here and saying, [inaudible] (Russian phrase), we have this too, when they knew damn well they didn't and we knew damn well they didn't. The comparison was tremendous in terms of the standard of living and the stage of economic development in the two countries. Having lived there you knew, at least you felt, I was always a little skeptical of some of the intelligence estimates as to how powerful the Soviet Union was because you knew the system didn't work very well.

Q: You left the Soviet Union in '68, where did you go?

PRYCE: I went to Panama.

YALE RICHMOND
Russian Language Studies, Foreign Language Institute
Washington, DC (1966-1967)

Counselor for Public Affairs
Moscow (1967-1969)

Yale Richmond was born in Massachusetts in 1923. He received a bachelor's degree in 1943 from Boston College, thereafter he joined the Army from 1943-1946. He then receives a master's degree from Syracuse. His career included positions in Germany, Austria, Russia, Poland, and Laos. Mr. Richmond was interviewed in June 2003 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: By this time what were you doing, working on your Russian?

RICHMOND: At the end of '66, I went to FSI for a year of Russian language studies, and then to Moscow in the summer of '67.

Q: How long were you in Moscow?

RICHMOND: Two years.

Q: Who was the ambassador then?

RICHMOND: It was initially Tommy Thompson and then Jake Beam, for whom I had worked in Warsaw.

Q: How did you find the embassy?

RICHMOND: There was no USIS post. We were integrated into the embassy. We had a press and cultural section which in any other place would have been a USIS post. We were a part of the embassy. We attended all the staff meetings. I had the rank of counselor for press and culture.

Q: This is equivalent to what, the top USIS job?

RICHMOND: Yes, it was the PAO.

Q: Looking at that time, how were relations when you arrived there in '67?

RICHMOND: Bad. Vietnam was heating up. Vietnam was a constant problem during those years.

Q: This was the last part of the Johnson administration.

RICHMOND: Yes. Vietnam was really creating problems. Then there was a meeting of the Communist Party organization which took a very hard line against the United States. It was very difficult for us to do anything. Then came August 20, 1968: the invasion of Czechoslovakia, which further set back U.S.-Soviet relations and they did not recover until Nixon was elected and came into office in January '69 and turned over a new leaf. The Soviets turned over a new leaf, too. That was the beginnings of detente.

Q: Let's talk about this. How did you find dealing with the Soviet press or did one deal with the Soviet press?

RICHMOND: I didn't. We had very little contact with them. They had nothing to do with us. By agreement between the 2 governments, they limited the number of correspondents in each other's country to 26. They were the ones who were trying to report on what was going on in Moscow. But we were often a source of their information. The ambassador would hold a Friday afternoon session with the American correspondents in his office. I attended that. He would discuss what was going on in the Soviet Union that he thought they should know.

Q: I would have thought that in many ways the correspondents would get out more than our officers could.

RICHMOND: They had difficulties, as we did, with travel. Most of the Soviet Union was closed to travel by foreigners. Anyone who wanted to travel whether he was an embassy officer or an American correspondent or a British correspondent or a French correspondent had to file a travel plan 48 hours in advance. 48 hours in advance you had to tell them where you were going to go, what you were going to do, where you were going to be, whom you were going to see. They would run that by the KGB and they would approve the travel or not approve it. Even areas that had been previously open would suddenly be closed for "reasons of a temporary nature," which means they didn't want any Westerners in that town at that point. The job was very difficult. Our correspondents were often harassed. Embassy officers less likely, but correspondents were often harassed by the KGB if they were poking around too much.

Q: What about your operations there?

RICHMOND: One thing, we were managing the exchanges program. There were all kinds of little problems that had to be attended to. Housing. The main problem for American scholars and students was access to archives in which Russian lethargy and inefficiency was as much a reason as the KGB. Housing was very bad, particularly in Leningrad, and still is today for students and for other people if you read the "New York Times." The third was travel. During semester breaks or at the end of their studies, most of the Americans wanted to travel in the Soviet Union and see what things were like outside of Moscow or Leningrad. The Soviets would deny that in most cases. Whereas the Soviets in the United States could go anywhere. We had closed zones, but for official people in the embassy and UN mission but not for students. Anybody on the exchange program was not subject to our closed zones. They could go anywhere provided we knew in advance where they were going.

Q: Was there any movement in the U.S. to say, "Hell, if they're going to do this to us, we're going to do that to them?"

RICHMOND: Yes. There was. That came up all the time. However, when Kennedy was elected President, he offered to do away with this closed zone business if the Soviets did it also. They turned him down. That offer was made several times in different administrations and every time, the Soviets turned it down. Their military and their intelligence services did not want foreigners poking around in various places.

Q: Were you able to get out and around a bit?

RICHMOND: Yes, I got out as much as I could. I went to Leningrad several times, to Georgia, to Kiev, I traveled with some of the American performing arts groups in Siberia... A visiting American organization or institution was always an excuse to tag along and go with them.

Q: How were these American performers received?

RICHMOND: Anything American was always a box office attraction no matter what it was. The Soviets had a great curiosity about the world beyond their borders because it was taboo, because it was closed to them. So anything foreign was attractive. You couldn't judge the audience reaction by the press reviews because the press reviews were always very guarded. In our country, we're used to seeing a press review in the morning after. In the Soviet Union, it might be as long as a week later because they had to be cleared by people all the way up in the political hierarchy before they could print it.

Q: Did you have any problem with these traveling groups?

RICHMOND: No, never.

Q: I would think something like jazz groups would be very popular.

RICHMOND: Jazz was popular, but the Soviets even had a problem with jazz. We sent all the major established jazz groups under the exchange program. We sent Benny Goodman, Duke Ellington, Woody Herman, Dave Brubeck, New York Jazz Repertory, Preservation Hall from

New Orleans, but the Soviets turned down jazz groups that they thought were too avant garde. They also turned down American ballet groups that they thought were too avant garde. If something was traditional and established, okay. If it was something new, they saw it as dangerous.

Q: Did you get any chance to talk to the cultural movers and shakers in the Soviet world?

RICHMOND: When I was there, it was a difficult period and it was very difficult and dangerous for Russians to have close relations with Americans. But some of my predecessors and people who followed me did have very good contacts with Soviets. I recall I met a lot of important people at diplomatic receptions. Moscow had a large diplomatic community. You were always getting invitations to cocktails 6-8 and you went to the extent your time permitted because that's where you could meet Russians. We would invite people to our diplomatic parties and they would come if they had a written invitation which they could show to the Soviet guard outside our residences or outside the embassy.

Q: Was there much free flow or talk when you got in there within a reception?

RICHMOND: It's often been said that anybody who served in that part of the world automatically looked behind him before he opened his mouth. It's quite true. I found myself doing that years after I had left Moscow. You looked around to see who was listening. You were very careful what you said. In Eastern Europe, there was no problem. In Czechoslovakia, there was a problem. Less in Hungary. And no problem in Poland. Poles didn't give a damn. The Poles would tell you whatever they wanted.

Q: Was there a buildup to the Soviet clampdown on Czechoslovakia during the Prague Spring? Was everybody wondering how far this would go?

RICHMOND: Oh, yes, this was a real test for Ambassador Thompson. Washington kept asking him, "Are the Soviets going to move or not?" It's all been written up. This was the kind of cable that didn't get broad distribution in the embassy, but I think Thompson comes out looking rather good on this.

Incidentally, a little sidebar on this. I was in Finland the night the Soviets invaded. I had taken my summer leave with my family, a wife and 3 little children, for 2 weeks. We were on our way back with a station wagon loaded with goodies for the next year or so. We drove up to a town on the Finnish side of the border and stayed overnight in a hotel planning to drive non-stop to Moscow the next day. I woke up Sunday morning, August 20, and went out of the hotel to check my car and it was deathly still on the street. There wasn't a person in sight. I knew something had happened. I ran back to the hotel and asked the clerk what had happened. He said, "The Russians have invaded Czechoslovakia and we Finns are wondering if we are next." It was a very tight situation. There I was in neutral Finland with a wife and 3 kids. Should I stay there? Should I go back to Moscow? I had a shortwave radio in my car. We listened to all the newscasts from all the radio stations we could. My wife and I decided we could go back. So we went across the border and they let us back in again and we drove back to Moscow listening to all the radios, wondering if World War III was about to start.

Q: How was the drive from Leningrad to Moscow?

RICHMOND: Terrible. A 2 lane road. Bumps in the road. Few gas stations. I remember stopping at one place to get gas and I asked if they had any water. They said, "Yes, around the back." They went around the back and there was a well with a bucket. So I had to pick up a bucket of water to put in my radiator.

Q: Did you spend overnight there?

RICHMOND: You could spend overnight in Leningrad if you made reservations in advance.

Q: How about when you were in the Soviet Union, were you followed most of the time?

RICHMOND: A lot of embassy officers were followed. I'm not aware that I was followed. They knew who I was. They knew I was not CIA or intelligence service. I tried to do everything just as I would in any other country. I was not paranoid. I made a decision early on that I was going to treat the Soviets just as I treated people in any other country and I was not going to be harassed by this. It worked. They knew everything I did because phones were monitored – perhaps our offices, too. I had nothing to hide.

Q: How did you treat the 3 Baltic states – Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania?

RICHMOND: That's an interesting story. In the beginning, there was strong opposition in the United States to our including the 3 Baltic states in our exchange agreement because we did not consider them part of the Soviet Union. They had embassies or legations here in Washington with which we maintained the fiction of reciprocity. But I changed that. I'm very proud of this. Until I got to Moscow, we would not allow American students to study in the Baltic states. When I was in Moscow, we got a cable from the State Department that IREX, who was going to nominate an American of Lithuanian origin who spoke Lithuanian and wanted to study in Vilnius, and did the embassy have any objection? I went to Ambassador Thompson and said, "Look, it's time to end this. It's in our interest to have that American go to Lithuania and study." We changed the policy.

Q: Did you get any feedback or kickback?

RICHMOND: Not at all. Years later when I was on the exchanges staff in Washington, we wanted to send American exhibits to the Baltic states. I called in the representatives of the Lithuanian, Latvian, and Estonian communities. The three of them sat around my desk and I said, "We have this big exchange program with the Soviet Union. We want to send our orchestras, our dancers, our jazz groups, and our exhibits to the 3 Baltic states. Do you have any objection?" They said, "No, but don't quote us on this." This is how a mid-level official can often change policy. He can push it in one way or another.

Q: How did your family like the Soviet Union?

RICHMOND: My wife at that time – we’re now divorced – was one of these native born Americans who can learn any language in 6 months. She was fluent in Russian, Polish, German, French, Italian, Spanish. She loved it. She was out all the time. We had a Finnish nanny living with us who took care of the kids. My wife was out all over the place.

Q: How big was your American staff?

RICHMOND: When I arrived, we had 4, including myself, 5 with a secretary. Then we lost one. Somebody was PNGed and didn’t come back. Then we had an operation called BALPA, Balance of Payments, where all missions abroad were asked to analyze their staffs and see if they could give up a position or 2. I, to the consternation of Washington, USIA, gave up a position. I said, “There is not a hell of a lot we can do right now. We’re doing it very well with the staff... We’re one man short.” I gave up a position. My colleagues in Washington were furious.

Q: Did they get out and around?

RICHMOND: Yes, the ones who spoke Russian, and everybody had to speak some degree of Russian to get assigned to Moscow. They did get out. It’s awfully difficult on a small staff. In a place like Moscow, you’re deluged with telegrams from all over the world. There’s a temptation to sit at your desk and read those telegrams. I made it a practice to get out of my office every day to do something, no matter what it was. Every time I got out, there was something worth seeing. I stumbled across something that was very interesting.

Q: This is the thing of fighting the tendency to end up reading the newspapers and sitting at your desk, which you can do back in Washington. How about the local staff?

RICHMOND: The local staff in Moscow was presumed to be working for the KGB and they were, we knew it. So there was not much you could do with them. We had in the American embassy what we called “cult up” and “cult down.” A cultural section up on the 8th floor which was behind the Marine guard security. A cultural section down which was open to the Soviet public. People could walk in, if they dared to go by the guards. We had a little library there and a lot of the American students would come in, and the African students came in, too, because that was the only Western library... No, the French had a library. And we were the only other one.

Q: Any problems with people trying to defect to the embassy while you were there?

RICHMOND: No, not while I was there. There was a case of a famous Pentecostal family who defected and snuck into the embassy and had to be put up there for several months until it could be arranged for them to immigrate. But that happened after me.

Q: By the time you left, were you there when Nixon came in?

RICHMOND: Yes, I was there. Nixon was inaugurated in January 1969. I left in June 1969. Over those 6 months, everything opened up. Everything changed. We were able to do things we couldn’t do before. Because of the invasion of Czechoslovakia, the State Department had suspended all high level contacts with the Soviets, which in retrospect was a very stupid thing to have done. We weren't allowed to see any high level Russians. They couldn't see us. We didn't send any orchestras, have any exhibits. All that changed when Nixon was inaugurated.

Q: Did you get any feel for the hand of Henry Kissinger while you were there?

RICHMOND: No, but he came to Moscow once as a Harvard professor. We would often get telegrams to "meet and assist," which meant a trip to the airport and it usually took 3 or 4 hours out of your day. Once we got a telegram that a professor from Harvard named Henry Kissinger was coming to Moscow. "Please meet and assist and provide appropriate assistance." I used to tell my staff Harvard professors were a dime a dozen coming to Moscow in those years. I sent my press officer instead, so I missed a chance to meet Henry Kissinger in Moscow.

Q: You left there in '69. Did you really feel that there had been a change?

RICHMOND: Oh, yes. That was the early stirrings of detente. That was followed by these high level visits – Brezhnev to Washington and Nixon to Moscow – and these 11 cooperative agreements that I talked about. It was the start of the joint space missions that we had with the Soviets.

Q: Did you ever find yourself acting as embassy spokesman?

RICHMOND: I was the embassy spokesman, which was very tricky because your TV and radio and press correspondents, when there's a story they're reporting on from Moscow would always try to get the embassy to say something. You still see it today: "The embassy spokesman said..." "I was the embassy spokesman. You had to be very careful because what you were saying was for the record. Lyndon Johnson had in his office 3 televisions tuned to CBS, NBC, and ABC, and anything you said was on one of those televisions. If Johnson didn't like it, you heard about it.

Q: Did you have any problems?

RICHMOND: Not a problem, but a humorous story. (end of tape)

There was a Scandinavian Airlines flight that flew from Kabul to Stockholm with a stopover in Moscow and it was a drug route. The Soviets were aware of this. They would often find some Westerner, including Americans, and they'd arrest them for possession of drugs, which was a very serious offense in the Soviet Union. We would do our best to keep it quiet and negotiate, get them out of the country as fast as possible because these things often escalated up to a very high level and created a problem in bilateral relations. Once we had such an American arrested and we managed to get him out. After we got him out of the country, the Soviets broke the story. The Associated Press guy called me and said, "Yale, you didn't tell me that you had an American in the Soviet Union in prison." I said, "You didn't ask me." He said, "Every time I call you from now on, I'm going to end my conversation and ask, 'Do we have any Americans imprisoned in the Soviet Union?'" He did that for several months and then he stopped doing it – and again one was in prison.

Q: How did we work it? Was it more a matter of letting things quiet down and then quietly shipping them out of the country?

RICHMOND: Yes, it was a question of the state of relations. What else was in play? Whether the Soviets wanted to create an incident or whether they did not want to create an incident. Very often you could work this out.

Q: Did you have any counterparts in the Soviet system?

RICHMOND: There was an office of cultural relations with foreign countries in the ministry of foreign affairs. I had a contact there whom I regularly dealt with. I asked him once for his home telephone number. I said, "We have a lot of problems that come up over the weekend, so I may have to call you. Can I have your home phone number?" He refused to give it to me. Later on, I found that he lived in the building right next door to the embassy and he wouldn't tell me that either. He was strictly business. He was KGB, by the way.

Q: Most of the people you had to deal with were probably KGB?

RICHMOND: In exchanges, yes. Not all of them, but most of them. But I must say that some of them were pretty straight guys. They were smarter than the rest of them. They were more outspoken. They would tell you things, particularly in the Soviet embassy in Washington, that no Russian would ever tell you in Moscow. We had a very nice working relationship with the Soviet embassy people here. They would help us out on things we wanted to do - certain limits - and we would help them out in exchange. I visited one of them after the Soviet Union collapsed and the poor guy was broke. He was going to the ministry of foreign affairs every day to eat lunch in their canteen because it was subsidized.

Q: You were dealing with a very difficult society. During this whole time that you were working in the Soviet Union, was there the feeling that - this still had 20 years to go - the clock may be ticking on the system?

RICHMOND: No, I had no feeling at all. The military and the KGB and the Communist Party were securely in charge. In fact, many American scholars will tell you that the Gorbachev reforms did not have to happen, that the anti-Gorbachev coup that the army and the KGB staged could have been successful if the people who led it had had more guts, if they had had more courage. They backed down. But the Soviet Union, the KGB and the army and the Party, they could have clamped down on it. They could have continued for another decade perhaps. The economy was falling apart. Everybody knew that. Anybody who served in Moscow knew that the Soviets were not 10 feet tall, that we had overestimated their strength year after year. But what was holding it together was this police force.

Q: Did you get any feel for the divisions within the Soviet Union? It broke up into Belarus and Ukraine and the Stans and the Baltic states.

RICHMOND: Very little. Anybody who stuck his neck out would have it chopped off. There were dissidents. We knew that. This happened after the Helsinki Accords, another chapter in U.S.-Soviet relations. But after the Helsinki Accords were signed by the Soviet Union, all of these dissidents started speaking up, especially the Soviet Jews who wanted to emigrate to Israel and other countries, and became more emboldened because they were given freedoms under the Helsinki Accords, and the Soviet Union was obliged to respect those agreements.

Q: Did you get any feel during the time you were there about the Soviet Jews? Was this a defined group more or less? Did it have aspirations or anything that we were interested in?

RICHMOND: There are so many ramifications to that. There were a lot of Jews in very high ranking positions, but never in the top spot. Very often you would visit an institution of some Soviet office and the number one person in charge would be a Russian and his deputy would be a Jew who really ran the operation. But you knew enough not to cultivate those people. You could only get them into trouble by seeking them out. But here and there, you would meet people at diplomatic receptions, but they were always very careful what they said.

Q: But we had no equivalent to a program or targeted thing?

RICHMOND: No.

Q: To any of the ethnic groups?

RICHMOND: No, except in our Voice of America and Radio Liberty broadcast and in our magazine, "America." We distributed under the terms of the cultural agreement a "Life" sized photojournalistic magazine, a very pretty magazine and highly prized by its recipients. I have a chapter on this in my book. We were allowed to distribute 50,000 copies plus 2,000 distributed gratis by the embassy. Every time we published an issue – it was a monthly – we would check to see whether it was distributed. Very little was distributed through the kiosks in newsstands. Most of it was by subscription, which was very good because only the important people were allowed to buy subscriptions, so we were reaching the important people that way.

Q: Did the Voice of America, was it running a policy somewhat different from what you were doing?

RICHMOND: I worked at the Voice one year. I was in charge of broadcasts to Vietnam. We took our guidance from the State Department in those days. It was the voice of the U.S. government and there was no difference in policy. Radio Liberty was somewhat different. It had much more of a free hand. It was funded by the CIA, but the CIA gave them a relatively free hand in what they could do and say.

Q: Did that cause any problems for you?

RICHMOND: No. They were both heavily jammed. I saved Radio Liberty once, possibly from extinction. We were asked in September of '68 to monitor Radio Liberty for a week and give us a report on whether it could be heard above the jamming. I volunteered to do it because I have a degree in electrical engineering and I had a shortwave radio in my car. I drove around the city of Moscow at night 7 days in a row and wrote down where I was, what frequency, and the headlines of the news over the jamming. Then I'd go back to the embassy and send a cable out right away to Washington and Munich. I proved that you could hear Radio Liberty above the jamming. When I came back, I went through New York and saw Howland Sargeant, who was the head of the Radio Liberty Committee, a former Assistant Secretary of State. He told me I saved the radio station and my cables showed that you could hear it above the jamming.

Q: When you left there in '69, was it with some reluctance? Things were beginning to open up.

RICHMOND: After the Nixon administration came in, Frank Shakespeare, a former official in radio, was appointed director of the U.S. Information Agency. On his first trip abroad, he came to the Soviet Union to open an American exhibit called "Education USA" about the American educational system. I took him up to Leningrad. Before the exhibit opened, he made a preview tour of the exhibit and he focused on the books. The exhibit had a library of books on that subject. This was a library of books on education. He went through it and pulled out a couple of books that he didn't like. He put them on a table and said, "I don't want those books in here." Well, we had this problem with previous USIA directors and we figured this was another one we'd have to educate. So, we were in a room that was used by our exhibit guides – we had about 20 American guides there who spoke Russian, most of them college students, and they were on the floor of the exhibit interpreting, engaging with the Russians and answering questions. They had a room where they would retreat for a smoke or a cup of coffee. We were in that room. There were these books on the table and Frank Shakespeare was there. His assistant, Teddy Weintal, was there. I was there. Pic Littell, the assistant director for Eastern Europe. And Jerry Verner, press officer. I said to Littell, "What do we do about this?" He said, "Look, we've had this problem with every USIA director. We might as well face this one now." So, I said to Shakespeare, "What's wrong with these books?" He started going through them. There were 2 textbooks that teachers were to use with classes and there were photos. One book was of the city, and one was of the country. The one of the city showed various photos of life in a large American city – New York, Boston. And the teacher was supposed to ask the class, "What does this mean to you" and stimulate a discussion. Shakespeare didn't like several photos in there. One photo showed a kid in a slum in a backyard sitting in a bathtub that had been discarded. We started discussing this. Shakespeare said, "I don't want anything that shows badly on the United States." Jerry Verner said, "Look, this represents the prosperity of the United States. The Soviets would be amazed to see that someone would discard a bathtub in an alley. You don't see that anywhere in the Soviet Union. This shows how rich the United States is that people throw away used bathtubs." Shakespeare kept getting hotter and hotter under the collar and finally he stuck his finger in my chest and said, "Look, our mission is to overthrow the Soviet Union. Anyone who doesn't understand that doesn't belong in USIA." He looked me right in the eye. This room had to be bugged. It was where the American staff rested and talked. I said, "Oh, no, Mr. Shakespeare, that's not the policy of the State Department. We want to live with these people in peace." He got apoplectic and he blew up. They had to get him outside, walk him up and down the street to cool him off. I did not go back to Moscow for a third year. I was an FSO-2 at the time. I was held up for promotion to class one until Shakespeare resigned. After Shakespeare resigned, the next promotion panel promoted me to class one. He resigned because of differences in policy with the State Department. This is going in my memoirs after I consult a libel lawyer.

Q: My understanding is that you can't really libel a public figure if it's not done for malicious purposes.

RICHMOND: Shakespeare's differences were well documented.

ROBERT WILLIAM FARRAND
Russian Language Training, Foreign Service Institute
Washington, DC (1966-1968)

Consular Officer
Moscow (1968-1970)

Mr. Farrand was born in Watertown, New York in 1934 and graduated from Mount Saint Mary's College. He entered the Foreign Service in 1964. He served in numerous posts including Kuala Lumpur, Moscow and Prague and was named ambassador to Papua, New Guinea in 1990. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

Q: This is the 17th of May 2001. Bill, 1967, how did you find, you took Russian I take it from '67 to '68 sort of?

FARRAND: Roughly.

Q: How did you find Russian?

FARRAND: It is a majestic language. It's a marvelous language. At that time of course, it had a cache which perhaps today it doesn't, but I viewed it then and view it now as the mother of the Slavic languages. I suspect that's wrong. I suspect they would say that's not anywhere near correct, but given the importance of the Soviet Union at that time I was anxious to study it and enthusiastic about the idea. In fact, maybe had I not gotten Russian language training I might have just decided to move on into something else. It was kind of my determination that if I could go to the Soviet Union then I might stay in the Foreign Service. That has its flaws, too, not being a Soviet expert, just a journeyman coming in from the side, but it was okay.

Q: Did you pick much up about while you were taking the language, did you get much of a feeling from most of your teachers and from your area studies about the Soviet Union? How did you find the training?

FARRAND: The teaching of the language itself was better than the area studies by a wide mile. Area studies could not, there was a very fine fellow, I forget his name, forgotten his name who was in charge of area studies and he sought to do what he could to bring the cadre of language students up to a certain level of understanding of the Soviet Union, but you had so much on you and it was only once a week and it was on a Wednesday afternoon or whatever. I did not find that very effective and there was a great disparity among the students themselves in their level of understanding. I perhaps because I was interested would fall in the category of someone who had never really studied the Soviet Union, but through newspapers and magazines and being interested in things, I suppose I had a modicum of understanding that might have been in keeping with the rest of the class. Although several others, one had a Ph.D. in Russian history and another in literature, so you couldn't deal with that.

Q: In your group that was studying Russian at the time, do you remember any of the names?

FARRAND: Oh yes, yes. People who did quite well, there was Sheridan McCall who became deputy director of the Soviet desk and later deputy chief of mission in Stockholm. There was Michael Wygant, Michael went on to become ambassador in the South Pacific about the time when I was there. He was there before me. William Maynes, Charles William Maynes, who left the Foreign Service. He was picked up by the Carter administration, made assistant secretary for international organizations and then became for a time the founder or at least the editor of foreign policy.

Q: I've interviewed both Mike Wygant and Bill Maynes.

FARRAND: Well, there you are. So, they were both in the language study and their wives and you know it was a good class.

Q: Did you know what you were going to do when you went to the Soviet Union?

FARRAND: Well, because I was still a junior officer, my presumption was and because I had more or less kind of put my name forward to go to the Soviet Union as I've indicated, a lot of people didn't and wouldn't have wanted to, but I did want to. I knew that probably I would be good in one of the lower rung starting jobs in the embassy when I got out there and in fact, that was the case. They made me vice consul. There were three consular officers. There was a consul and two vice consuls. The consul was Robert Barry who has done wonderfully in the Foreign Service.

Q: Bob's still in Bosnia right now.

FARRAND: We were together in Bosnia. He was in a different organization. A fellow who had gone to Garmisch, just prior, both Bob and this fellow had graduated from Garmisch Partenkirchen which put their Russian on a whole different level from mine.

Q: This is the additional training at the military school of Garmisch at the Department's Detachment R?

FARRAND: And so, all of the young officers except for McCall and for Wygant, the young officers had gone to Detachment R so all of their Russian was considerably behind theirs.

Q: You were there from '68 to '69 probably?

FARRAND: Summer of '68 to the summer of '70. Yes, we're talking Moscow.

Q: What was the situation, vis-à-vis, when you arrived, what sort of relations between the Soviet Union and the United States when you got there?

FARRAND: Well, it was the great period that we now call stagnation, at that time I don't think I heard that word very much, but Brezhnev was, well, let's see '68, Stalin died in '53 and Khrushchev was pushed out in what year?

Q: Oh, '64 or something, '65? So, he'd been out for four or five years?

FARRAND: Yes. Brezhnev was still very much in power. The KGB was in power and at its strongest or at least at a very strong stage. Brezhnev was a man, what can I add to millions of words written on Brezhnev? All I can say is there was this sense of stodgy stability at the top of the Soviet government committed to control at all costs. I had never been there before. I was a little in awe in the first weeks and months. I was in the consular section and as a result I had a tendency to see some ugly things, as you do when you're in consular work. Bob Barry was the consul and another fellow, George Humphrey, who left the Service, and I were the vice consuls. We rotated between the two of us every six months. There was a heavy concentration of official visas because Soviet delegations would go to the United Nations, Soviet delegations would come to the United States and, of course, it was reciprocal. So, we had to have a careful set of rules of which I became familiar in time on the job. There I didn't have a special course, but I had been consular officer, had taken the consular course when I first got in the Foreign Service three years earlier. I had been consular officer for nine or ten months in Kuala Lumpur where I did everything virtually everything because there was only one officer. I got very close to FAM 7 and 8 and 9.

Q: These are the consular Foreign Affairs Manuals. These are the instructions of what the rules and regulations of how to do.

FARRAND: Foreign Affairs Manuals. Yes, I got very close to them. I knew that. Then I went to the Soviet Union and it was almost as though you put those blue books on the side because there was another book and it was called Annex A or something. All the sheets were salmon colored, yellow colored, salmon colored, as I recall. It was not as thick as the others, but it was very precise on all sorts of techniques and procedures one needed to follow in granting a visa to a Soviet citizen or official. That was a whole new world and that was not trained. We were not trained in that prior to going out. So, I had to learn that on the job. There was no part of the consular course back here that took in that.

Q: When you were there, you said you saw some ugly things. What did you see, as a consular officer?

FARRAND: Well, I don't want to get into you know, story telling.

Q: Well, story telling is important in this type of interview because it gives a flavor for the time.

FARRAND: One of the things that happened that gave me an incite early on into the Soviet Union and what a secret police system entailed. I'll just talk about two out of many. The first was three young people, Americans, the Vietnam War was on and they were in the generation of opposing the war and they went over and out into the world. They found themselves in, as I recall in Afghanistan, in Kabul and they were what I guess you would call, hippies, whatever you want to say something of that generation. It was three young men. One young man who was a son of a wealthy family in New England. One young man was the son of a sharecropper, a Mexican sharecropper in the southwest of the United States, probably California. The third young man I forget. They wanted to go. This was just prior to my coming. They wanted to go from Kabul to Stockholm because Stockholm was the center of liberal acceptance of anti-war types.

Q: And people who were denouncing the selective service and they found refuge there.

FARRAND: In Stockholm, Sweden. They wanted to go from Kabul to Stockholm. Now there's ways you can do that of course. You can get on an airplane and you can go to, I don't know some major point in the Middle East and then you can fly to Rome, Italy and then up to Stockholm or you could go to Frankfurt, or you could do a number of things. They didn't want to spend the money doing that and they knew if they got to Stockholm and had some marijuana, I think it was marijuana in this case, hash, hashish. I never did know the difference, anyway hashish. They went to a bazaar and a trader saw them and said that he could sell them the hashish and they were going to invest what money they had, they didn't have a lot, even the rich fellow didn't have a lot, the parents had cut him off. They were going to take the money, spend it on hashish, then they were going to smuggle it across the Soviet Union into Stockholm, Sweden and on the basis of the hashish they could live fine because they would cut it up and sell it and they would be just fine. Now, this fellow that sold this to them, this trader in the markets of Kabul, said, "I not only will sell it to you, but I also have here, right here a suitcase that I can sell to you, too, that has a secret compartment." Being young men of discernment and quick eye they saw this as a great idea.

So, they bought from this fellow and they put their hashish in this secret compartment and they went to the airport and they flew from Kabul to Tashkent, in those days it was the Uzbek Republic and they set down the airplane and were met there by police who took the bag and confiscated the hash and put them, arrested them and put them in prison, put them on trial and Bob Barry's predecessor, the consul, one of the finest Foreign Service officers I've ever met, named Samuel Edwin Fry, Jr. Yes, he's taller than you are. Sam was the fellow that had to go down there to Tashkent and sit through those trials and counsel these people and write up reports and Sam and I became friends at that point. I got there early, left my family behind for about three weeks. Sam and I became close friends and remain, but he taught me a lot about that case and his successor, Bob Barry, my boss had to take over responsibility for the case, but inevitably there was a lot of skol. Now, these three young men were put in prison. I'm going to draw this to a close. They were put in prison and they were transported occasionally whenever we asked for consular access to Moscow and we learned that by asking we quickly learned, Bob Barry was a real Soviet hand expert and had worked on the Soviet desk in the bilateral division. So, he had worked with a lot of this mucky stuff on this side of the ocean and so he brought that stability to that situation. We knew that their prison conditions in Tashkent were deplorable for each of these three men. We knew that one of them; the son of the sharecropper was a defiant sort. He wasn't going to be broken and he was put into solitary. Now, we would put a note in to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, MID, and we would ask for consular access. They would then start their song and dance every time, song and dance, every time, song and dance. So, no sooner than we'd meet with them, then we would prepare and within a very few weeks we would put another note in because we knew it would take a couple of months to get the access, but we also knew that having those boys flown into Moscow from Tashkent that they would be washed, they would be cleaned up and that they would be given some food so that they looked okay. They would be threatened we knew and I would go, it would depend, but I went a number of times and saw these guys at the tough prison in Moscow in those days. It was a prison was called Bokitar and it had a bad reputation.

They would come into the room and they would sit opposite, of course, there was green hatted Soviet officers sitting around and I'm sure there was not only the prison officials, but KGB in the room and we would talk to them. Now, they couldn't say much. But we would talk to them, we'd bring them what letters we had, we'd bring them clothing and food and stuff that had been sent from the United States for them and we, too would go out on our own and we put a little fund together amongst them and then we would buy stuff for them and take it to them. Now, these boxes of stuff that we would give them was just absolutely golden. These young men were shaken up thoroughly by this time, they realized they were going to be in prison for three years. There was nothing to do for it except to keep on it. I got inside the Soviet prison. I got to see the KGB rub them like this and I found that sobering and I realized at that time. In fact, I wrote a letter to the editor of Life Magazine and they published it about the prison conditions in the Soviet Union and about how young people should not just go around thinking that because they hate the United States government that other governments are more benign, particularly when it comes to drugs. We did get these guys eventually out, we did. Eventually we were able to work out an arrangement. I went to the airport. They were delivered to the airport in a special room in Cheramechuva. I went there and I said goodbye to all three. I had been working with them. By that time I was consul. It was my second year, I was consul. I had said goodbye and on they went to the airport. After all that I received a letter from one of them. Which one do you think sent me the letter?

Q: The sharecropper?

FARRAND: The son of the sharecropper. I don't know why you thought that.

Q: Well, I was thinking that normally you wouldn't think it would be.

FARRAND: It was a very nice letter thanking us. It was good and bad. It was bitter and sweet. It was sweet and bitter. Thanking us for taking the time, knowing that it was our job, but we did it with a special humanity. He was appreciative of that. The other two, they just went off. He said, "I must also tell you, however, that my job situation here isn't very good, so I am going to have to begin trading drugs again." That was a depressant. Now, so that story taught me so much. It was a great benchmark to come in and have three young people in prison and have to deal with that and have to deal with all of the practical and theoretical legal considerations. That was a great learning. That has stuck with me the rest of my career.

The other time when I was consul in my second year, there was a professor from Cornell University who was also of the anti-war pro-dissident category. Now, I don't care about the anti-war, but he was doing what he could to assist the dissidents in the Soviet Union in his writings back at Cornell. But, anyway, they permitted him to come with his family. His wife and two small children, girls as I recall. He was at one of the universities at Leningrad State University. He was bearded, more bearded than you, and he had a tendency to let his hair grow long. It was all of that. He was picked up by the KGB and was thrown into what they call the big house up there in Leningrad which, if anything, had as hard a KGB contingent as there existed because it was close to the city in the west, Leningrad. He was in prison. I was not yet the consul. Bob Barry was still the consul. He sent me up there to look after this man's family and they put her up in a hotel. She was a very practical woman and a very concerned one. She was very concerned about what was happening her husband. The husband I met, I went to the prison and met him and I said now what are the circumstances and he told me. He was doing what in this country would be certainly all right. Just going by and visiting some poets. The day I went to the prison though, the KGB headquarters to see him, I did see a man being pushed into a car rather roughly and I found out later that it was Joseph Bronsky. I was there, happened by chance to see Joseph Bronsky being picked up, the famous dissident poet. They let this fellow out into my custody, but he had to stay in a hotel. In talking to this young man I realized that there was a wide, wide gap in the understanding of the Soviet Union by intellectuals in the United States, or at least by this one intellectual who represented I presume a couple of others, at least and the practical realities of what happens when you come there and start pricking the bear.

One day the KGB called for him and they wanted him to come down to the big house. I said, "Well, he's not going without me." So, I walked down with him and we stood in this cold interior, this dark interior of this room waiting for somebody to come. We stood there and we waited, and we waited and we waited and we waited. Of course, they saw me coming because it was and they could see you. I remember that after about forty-five minutes and nobody came, I said to him, "Let's simply go now." So, we turned and we walked out and we walked away from that building. I remember in those days I had hair and the hair on the back on the back of my neck was rising as we were displaying our backs to that window to that big building because we knew that we were being observed and we knew that they could have taken us out if they wished. We did get the guy out finally. I don't think we ever received anything from him, but there was an idea and of course, these are the heroes of life, but on the other hand to bring your wife and your family into that. If you want to do it yourself, that's one thing.

Q: How did your wife and your kids were pretty young, but how did your wife find living there?

FARRAND: The period of 1968 to 1970 was a watershed in our marriage. She, in fact, left me. She did not like the Soviet Union. She did not like living there and she learned not to like me, so.

Q: I mean, this is of course, one of the untold stories about the Foreign Service, it puts strains on a marriage that are difficult to imagine. Particularly some posts are so much worse than other posts and that makes a strain even worse.

FARRAND: In those days this was 1968, this was before the 1972 agreement between Under Secretary for Management, oh I forget his name, but there was an agreement with the wives and spouses and the Department that no longer would wives be expected, you know. They couldn't become a part and the evaluation reports and all of that. But, up until then it was still wide open.

The difficulty is that I had three children at one point. I'm not going to go into this deeply. She took them, I said, "Fine, why don't you leave a little early." When the time came for me to depart and she left about a month early and I stayed on and wrapped up activities, writing evaluation reports and doing all the other things and turning it over to my successor, Peter Burke. I left, but she. When she took my children she just kept on going. So, it was a pretty traumatic time for me.

Q: Who was the ambassador while you were there?

FARRAND: I was fortunate. My first six months was Llewellyn Thompson, one of the great, greats of the Foreign Service. The last eighteen months was Jacob Beam, a wonderful, wonderful man. I don't suppose that Jake Beam ever reached the pinnacle of, I don't know, being well known as was Thompson, but he was a man of solidity and in those days Henry Kissinger was first Secretary of State, he was National Security Advisor.

Q: He was National Security Advisor, came in with Nixon in '69.

FARRAND: Exactly and that was the second year of my time there and about, well, I don't know the times when the president comes in, but certainly, probably in the spring of 1969 an embarrassment happened that we all in the embassy staff were aware of. In those days the embassy was so cramped, it still is in the same building; they put up all of this new construction. That is one of the great tragedies, the construction of the embassy in Moscow is one of the great, the level of the understanding of the Soviet Union and of management of resources that went into that building. I got my syntax screwed up here, is almost unforgivable. I was asked by Boris Klaussen, ever remember the name? God rest his sole. Boris was the deputy chief of mission, first was Koby Swank. Koby Swank was the Deputy Chief of Mission when I first arrived. A grand gentlemen and a supporter of junior officers in the proper way, not because he was told. Klaussen was the same. They couldn't have been two finer DCMs, of course, this goes back when I'm younger and more naive, I suppose. But, still, I knew a little bit about management from my navy years and they served first Llewellyn Thompson and Jake Beam. Jake Beam was a diffident man. Jake Beam was probably, you know in the Meyers Briggs, he was probably an introvert. Kissinger actually came to Moscow and was installed on Lenin Hills in one of the apartments by visiting dignitaries by the Brezhnev regime and then called Jake Beam up to Lenin Hills and Kissinger was sitting there. This was a rank insult of the very first order. To take a man like Beam who was a professional at the top of his career and to come to town because you see, the Nixon people didn't trust the Foreign Service or the State Department, they had this deep mistrust. As I have found, republicans often do. They just, it was just an absolute, you know, you just can't imagine and Jake Beam took it and he turned the other cheek and took it. You can debate on whether that was he right thing to do or not. I would like to think that I would not have. I would like to think that he should not have, but he did because he said the president runs foreign policy. There's nothing in the constitution that says there's a secretary of state or anything else that runs foreign policy. We remained, of course, loyal to him, but we were appalled that the embassy could not be trusted to be brought in on a visit of the national security advisor to Moscow. I think I saw that, I saw other things that Kissinger has done and you're either going to have a structure, you're either going to have professionals, you're either going to have it or you're not.

Q: How did you find life in Moscow or did you get to make any trips? Were you harassed, or were there problems or how did things go?

FARRAND: I had said on an earlier tape when I was in Kuala Lumpur I would try one more tour in the Foreign Service to test it to see if this is really what I wanted to do. I wanted to get away from the reach of Coca-Cola. Well, I was successful. I found myself in Moscow and there was no Coca-Cola, not on the local stamps, anywhere. Today, I guess I would have said McDonald's. But, today McDonald's biggest stores in the world are in Moscow. I found it absolutely fascinating. I lived on the outskirts, but far away from the embassy and I would often walk to the metro which is one of the world class undergrounds in the world. I would walk. They didn't have many stations so that was a problem, but I would walk just to see the people on the street in the morning. Then I would go down deep, deep down and I would make my way across town by metro and I would observe people, observe their faces. On August 21, 1968 I was there now about seven weeks, the Soviet Union invaded Czechoslovakia. I remember in my own little way saying, "I'm going to watch." After it sunk in on us that they really had I was in Moscow and the people were grim. The faces coming up and down these big long, and these were deep, deep, deep escalators far deeper. I mean, the one at Rosslyn here is very deep, but the one over there would be even once and a half again and you're going down a very steep incline. You could see these folks. There was a grimness that I reported to the political section, but you know, that's something that you can't. But, I had been doing it enough so that I noticed there was a certain grimness in the people and a certain concern because they were being served garbage by Pravda. I found the conditions of life there; the conditions of supply were deplorable. It was summertime, when I first arrived, July, August, September and that made it as nice as it could be. Dust and dirt, drab, drab storefronts, the system of supply were such that each store supplied only one item. For example, this is dairy and you have to go another two blocks and find one that sells meat, if they sell meat at all. Then you have to go another three or four blocks that might sell some vegetables and the women walking around, trudging around with their little string bags or no bags. Shoes, terrible shoes, very gray, very gray, but I was fascinated by it. I saw, this was where I wanted to be.

Q: Did you have any problems with the KGB just in going around?

FARRAND: Well, the place where we lived was watched. There was a policeman at the front door so as you went in and out there was always a policeman. Any hotel you ever went into, each floor in any hotel had a woman, her name was Dejernia. Her job was to apparently look after your needs, but in fact to look after you. She would always be a woman of uncertain age and she reported directly. You always got your tickets and you got your hotel reservations and train tickets wherever you were to go and we always traveled in twos, two by twos. You could never travel alone, two by two. You could travel with your wife and that would be two by two, but basically they wanted two officers. Your officers went through a central place, Opideka, and wherever you went was always checked with the KGB and they would pick you up. I can recall being in Kiev along the banks of the Inyepit River and walking along and seeing a man reading a newspaper, standing and reading a newspaper. I thought to myself people don't stand and read newspapers, you read it against a building. Oh, you might, but his age was such that I didn't think that was entirely appropriate. I saw that many times. You could pick them up much more easily because they became fact in their own country. They weren't up against real and I wasn't a professional, so they weren't up against the real stuff. So, they got sloppy, you could pick them out. You didn't have to turn around to stare at them. You could pick them out. That sort of thing. Did they ever try to knock me off a train platform under the third rail, did they ever drive my car off the edge of the road or something of this nature. No, no, but you knew they were there.

Q: What was the sort of the feeling, I mean you would be talking to the other officers about this, were you seeing this as a system that really was running into, maybe not then, but eventually would run into a dead end because of the economics effect? It wasn't really delivering things or not or was it felt to be a presence that would be there forever and ever?

FARRAND: That question I hope you're asking of everybody that's been there. It's really on target. How is it that a group of young Foreign Service officers, mostly male in those years, but female as well later, could, with all their education with all their exposure to democratic principles and the so-called free market and all of this other stuff, how is it that, and I was part of them. That we could be there and we could watch all of this and we could not predict with some certainty that this is not going to go on. This is a train rocketing down very slowly. It's like that train out there in the Midwest the other day rumbling along, nobody could shift it or change it.

Q: It was a train that got started without the driver and nobody was on board, it just accidentally started going. I'm just putting this on the side.

FARRAND: Yes, and it went for sixty-five miles, sixty-three miles with nobody on board at speeds of forty and forty-five miles an hour through towns, I mean, incredible in Ohio. Now, the Soviet Union did have a driver when it started. Lenin and his ideas, he wrote them down and then, of course, he gave it over to Stalin and then other things happened along the way. By the time we were there, there wasn't anything that wasn't going to change the direction of that train. That train under non-thinkers, arterial sclerotic people like Brezhnev, there was no chance that anybody was going to be able to pull the train over to the siding and see whether all the valves are working right, there was nothing. It was headed, but no one that I know was coming forward with a report. This would include the friends up the river, the CIA. There was no one saying this train is headed for a wreck because even though on a daily basis we saw how wholly inadequate the system was to do anything for the people. I won't go into it. It's been written about too much. To produce those things that a normal, modern society needs so that the people could have a standard of living above that of just the essentials on Maslow's hierarchy of need. Except for the party types, they were of course, up on the top there of Maslow's pyramid.

The annual two times a year, I guess it was done in October and then again, I guess on the day of the great revolution and then on May 1st they would put these big parades through Red Square. They'd have this massive rumbling through of tanks and guns and these troops all coming through. That was what was broadcast to the world. It was a display of a lot of heavy stuff and then, of course, you knew about all these secret places that you couldn't go and missiles and bombs and airplanes and guns and tanks and all of this business. Somehow we all became mesmerized thinking that was the key measure and despite the fact that they couldn't produce enough meat for the people or good quality shoes or their clothes in the stores you couldn't sell at a thrift shop here in the United States.

That was true, we all knew that that was reflective of something else going on and the quality control, but the facts were they could still blow us off the face of the planet and we had to take them seriously. Nobody was prepared to say that this train wreck which was coming was going to happen, when it was going to happen or when it happened that the train wouldn't fall over in such a manner that it would destroy the entire train station and that train stations around the world. That was a very bad analogy. Nobody could predict that this thing was going to implode, they thought it would explode if it ever came to an end and nobody was ready, me included. Yet, there were times when I would say, I would say it to my friends, "What the hell are we afraid of?", We'd say, "Yes, why are we worried, we could run these people into the ground." But, they had the bomb and they had it deployed, you know. But even the great thinkers, they didn't pick it up. I think the CIA got it wrong and there's a professor at Harvard at Vassar, his name is Marshall Goldman. He came as close as anybody. He's still in the business and he's a very bright, fine man.

WILLIAM M. WOESSNER
Office of Soviet and East European Exchanges
Washington, DC (1967-1968)

William Woessner was born in 1931 in Queens, New York. He attended Queens College. He later received a Fulbright Scholarship which took him to Glasgow University. He then returned to the United States and attended Northwestern University. He served in the Korean War and then entered the Foreign Service in 1956. His career took him to Germany, Austria, and London. Mr. Woessner was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: What job were you expecting?

WOESSNER: I was assigned to the Office of Soviet and East European Exchanges. The head of the department was Boris Klossen. The deputy was Art Wortzel. Art had recruited me for this job. The problem was that at the point that I came home, U.S.-Soviet relations had gone into one of the bleakest phases of the Cold War. Everything was frozen, but especially the exchanges. In that sense, there was no job. I had the assignment; I moved into the office. But there was very little going on.

Q: How long were you doing this non-job?

WOESSNER: Altogether seven months. I need to explain that when I spent an abbreviated home leave with my parents in New York City and then reported to Washington, a lot of things came together. We left Berlin on a high. It had been an enormously satisfying and happy assignment. Our two youngest children were born there. I mentioned that the Soviets buzzed the city the day we picked up an honorary Berlin birth certificate for one of them. We had a wonderful home. The two youngest children were sent on ahead with a friend to stay with my parents. We came with the three other children. It was the last crossing of the USS Independence. It was taken out of service after that. We got home and within three days, I had to take my father to the doctor for pains in his stomach. It turned out it was cancer and he in fact died within two months. That was totally unexpected and devastating. At the same time, my wife was diagnosed with a breast lump and had to go for a biopsy. Fortunately, it was benign, but that was the first shadow of that kind that came over us. In the midst of this family stress, we moved with the five children to Washington. For the first time in my life, I had the pleasure of buying a house. I had to go into debt to do it and I don't take kindly to debt. I hadn't learned how to be a good American yet. The combination of all these things - we moved into the new house just weeks before my father actually died - triggered health problems for me, which I understand in retrospect is not unusual. But most significantly, I was stricken with what was then diagnosed as ankylosing spondylitis, a form of spinal arthritis, which meant in effect I couldn't walk. My ankles, knees, and hips were all affected. I got around with great difficulty using two canes. There I was, in a non-job. It was a major turning point. You bounce back and keep on going. I had a very close friend who has been a friend to this day, Frank Meehan, who had been my immediate supervisor in Berlin. By this time, he was up in the Executive Secretariat. After checking with Art Wortzel and checking with my wife, he asked me if I'd like to go to the Operations Center and onto the watch. The reason he put it as a question was that in those days the Operations Center operated on a highly irregular cycle. You worked eight hours one shift beginning at 7a.m. for two days and eight hours another shift beginning at 3p.m. and then another beginning at 11p.m. Then you had two days off and started again. Days of the week had no meaning anymore. Neither did hours of the day or night. Nonetheless it certainly had the desired therapeutic effect. The job was very stimulating, very demanding. Even with my infirmities, I really enjoyed it and did well. One of the most exciting nights of my 30 years in the Foreign Service occurred in September 1968. I was in charge of the watch team when word came that the Warsaw Pact had invaded Czechoslovakia. That was a night to remember. We would have gone off duty at 11:00 p.m. The normal rule was, no matter what was going on, you just handed over to the next watch and they took it from there. But not that night. All hell broke loose and the Operations Center was filled with very important people and a lot of FLASH messages. That was the first time I ever received a CRITIC message.

Q: Here you had been a German hand. How did you see the East German reaction? Was this a surprise?

WOESSNER: The invasion itself? I can't pretend to any expertise on that. The experts in Washington in the intelligence community everywhere were split right down the middle between those who argued that the Soviets had such a stake in economic, commercial, and other relationships with the West that they wouldn't jeopardize that to put down the Prague Spring. On the other side of the equation were those, including my friend Frank Meehan, who argued that ideology and Party supremacy came first regardless and in a case like this dealing with heresy and a threat to orthodoxy, the Soviet leadership would not tolerate it and would put it down. Sadly, they were proven right. I can't say that I lined up on one side or the other. I just didn't know.

Q: Was there any thought of what we would do outside of making noises?

WOESSNER: Our thinking was overshadowed by lingering guilt that we had led the Hungarians to believe that if they rose up, we would go to their aid.

Q: We're talking about '56.

WOESSNER: Yes. So, this time around, I don't think that was seriously considered. The spheres of influence were clearly drawn. But it was a bitter disappointment to see the whole thing crushed that way.

You asked what I thought about the East Germans. The East Germans did participate in the armed forces that were posted around Czechoslovakia. It was fascinating too that we knew everything about troop movements, military placements. What we didn't know was what was going on in the inner circle of the Kremlin. The Prague Spring was suppressed. You asked what my take was on the East Germans. What was so wonderful about the two years in the Operations Center was that that narrow focus disappeared now into a sense of the full range of our diplomatic activities. I learned so much and it gave me a real sense of how the Department works, how the whole foreign policy structure in Washington works, relationships with the Pentagon, with the White House etc., and in that context East Germany, Eastern Europe really dwindled. For some people (Dean Rusk maybe notoriously), it didn't count for anything. But for me as part of my education as a Foreign Service Officer, that was a marvelous assignment.

G. NORMAN ANDERSON
Administrative Officer
Moscow (1967-1969)

Ambassador G. Norman Anderson was born in Delaware in 1932. He received a bachelor's degree from Columbia University. He served in the U.S. Navy from 1954-1958. He attended graduate school at the Russian Institute at Columbia. Ambassador Anderson has served in the Lebanon, Germany, the Soviet Union, Morocco, Bulgaria, Tunisia, Sudan, and Macedonia. He was interviewed by J.P. Moffat on June 18, 1996.

Q: When you returned to Russian training at Garmisch, it must have been a pleasant year.

ANDERSON: That was a very nice year. Our first activity was a week devoted to learning. We had a very good group of Russian former officers, who had mostly defected during World War II. Previously I had studied Russian in the Navy with various princes and counts who had defected or left in 1917. So this second group was an entirely different group, brought up under the Soviet system. So it was complementary to the earlier training.

In any case, after a year in Garmisch I went to Moscow as a rotating trainee, became the assistant administrative officer and later political officer. Actually, administrative work gave us more contact with Russians than political work. I was the liaison officer with the so-called UPDK, which was the organization that took care of all the servicing of embassies, including providing local personnel. So I had to spend much of my time at UPDK headquarters negotiating for drivers and maids and various services. And when the Ambassador's plane came to Moscow I had to organize the unloading of the aircraft, which meant dealing with the KGB, whose officials were all over the cargoes and made life difficult for us. The KGB, for example, came up with new rules for cargo every time the plane came in. Without notice, for example, we were told to list everything on board, all the equipment and things of that kind. Some of the equipment was very sensitive and couldn't be listed, it was in sealed containers. In any case, we very often had a stand-off during which we had to wait at the airport for many hours, but finally the cargo was always released after the KGB had inflicted what pressures it could.

Q: Were you impressed or unimpressed by those elements of the KGB with which you came in contact with?

ANDERSON: I found them very heavy-handed and very blatant. We of course were followed and watched and our apartment and offices were bugged, but it was all extremely blatant. For example, in our apartment building the shifts from the listening room came down every eight hours in the elevator, so you always knew they were coming from the upper floor. That always reminded you, of course, that you were not alone in your apartment or office.

Q: Of course this was in the Brezhnev era, and perhaps the most exciting thing that must have happened in the period was the Czechoslovak affair. Were you at all touched by this?

ANDERSON: Yes, I was in the political section at the time and the ambassador, Llewellyn Thompson, had sent in a message to Washington regarding what the Soviet Union might do. As I recall, he estimated that the chances were 50-50 that the Soviet Union would take military action. Well, one day in August I woke up and listened to the BBC, which I did every morning, and I learned that the Soviet Union had invaded Czechoslovakia. So of course, I rushed to the embassy. There was no sign of activity in Moscow, however. We all met in the political section and mapped out our activities for the day. We were sent out into town to try and put our finger on the pulse of what was going on. The only unusual event was that Pravda did not come out that morning on time, and this had not happened since the death of Stalin in 1953. As we were out in town Pravda did come out and it was tacked up on various bulletin boards. Not too many people noticed that on page four there was an article saying that the Czechoslovak party had requested fraternal assistance from the Soviet brothers. But anyway, this was the announcement of the invasion, which was not exactly spelled out very clearly. The reactions in Moscow itself were practically invisible. There were no protests to speak of. One very small group of about three or four people protested in Red Square, but they were immediately carted off by the KGB. But aside from that there were practically no reactions whatsoever. This held true in the following days also.

Q: Do you think that this was because of repression or do you think that people didn't care? What passed for public opinion?

ANDERSON: I think some dissidents did express their opinions very quietly, but it was very dangerous at the time to speak to foreign diplomats. So I think most people just did not want to be arrested and carted off. Anybody who spoke to a foreigner was at considerable risk. At one point, for example, we got lost driving to our destination near Moscow and a truck driver stopped and asked whether he could help us. He probably didn't know we were diplomats. We noticed as we were driving off that our KGB follow car stopped the truck, and obviously the driver was taken away for interrogation. So, it was not easy to speak to foreigners.

Q: Do you think Washington was adequately prepared for this move into Czechoslovakia?

ANDERSON: I think Washington was probably pretty well informed because I believe our embassy had signaled the serious possibility of military action. Of course, in retrospect it is hard to know what we could have done about it, probably not very much. Just as there wasn't much we could do in the case of the Soviet repression of Hungary, which had taken place earlier, in 1956.

Q: ...common knowledge that what few dealings there were during such a difficult period with the Russians often took place in Washington, leaving the embassy out in left field. Was this the situation during that period?

ANDERSON: It was hard for me to judge since I was rather a junior officer at the time. I know that very frequently it was hard to get appointments with high level officials in Moscow. They made appointments very difficult to obtain. I assume that a lot of business was done through Ambassador Dobrynin in the United States, who had access to the highest levels, it seems.

Q: The Soviet Union/Eastern European and the Arabic speaking world came somewhat together in your next four or five years when you went to the Soviet desk and then the Egyptian desk. Can you give us an overview of what you worked on during these periods?

ANDERSON: On the Soviet desk I was involved in Soviet foreign policy, mostly in the Middle East, but also U.N. activities. I did many, many briefing papers during that particular time. Actually, when I shifted to the Egyptian desk it was something of a carry-over because Egypt at the time was very much under Soviet influence. I think there were something like 15,000 or more Soviet troops or technicians in Egypt at the time. Bases and missile systems had been installed. During the first part of my tour on the Egyptian desk, the United States only had an interests section in Cairo with a handful of people, but then came the 1973 war and, following that, peace efforts. Finally we did renew diplomatic relations with Egypt during that time. So, it was a very active period.

Q: During the shift to the Nixon administration were you on the Soviet desk or the Egyptian desk?

ANDERSON: I was on the Egyptian desk during much of that period.

Q: Did it have any effect at your level? Did you notice any changes?

ANDERSON: Of course, Henry Kissinger became Secretary of State during the time I was on the Egyptian desk, and I think that he brought in a very noticeable difference. He was quite interested in Egypt, and he made a great number of trips there. Also, President Nixon went to Egypt during the later part of my time on the desk. There again we, of course, did many, many briefing books. For the first Kissinger trip to Cairo, I think he did depend on us a great deal, but as time went on he neglected to report back what he was doing in Egypt. He probably found our input much less useful as time went on. But in any case, we did quite a lot of, one might say, legwork for Kissinger. I remember one case in which he decided that the United States would donate a large sum of money to a charity being run by Mrs. Sadat. I was given the task of implementing this decision, which was not too easy to do, since there were all sorts of laws that were involved. It involved donating some surplus currency in Egyptian pounds to this particular charity, and that required a presidential determination that this was in our national interest. The decision thus had to be authorized by President Nixon. We sort of had to pick up the pieces as Henry Kissinger went through his diplomatic activities.

Q: Did he rely on alternate sources of wisdom as time went on or did he appear to do it entirely on his own?

ANDERSON: I think that he liked to have various analysis, but when it came to his own contacts with the highest levels he was the person who knew most about them. There wasn't much we could tell him about what had gone on in these contacts since we were not privy to the exchanges.

Q: ...expertise must have come into play when the Soviet/Egyptian friendship treaty was signed. Were you involved from both sides or from one side or the other?

ANDERSON: Well, we were asked to analyze the significance of this treaty. I was on the Soviet desk and Walter Smith, another Soviet hand, was on the Egyptian desk. The two of us put together our analysis and we agreed completely that we should not overreact to this particular friendship treaty. We didn't think it would have much practical effect. We thought it was mostly a propaganda move. However, our analysis was edited as it went up the line. The outcome was an analysis by our superiors that this was a much more dramatic development. By the time it ended up this was a tremendously important treaty. Actually, I believe Walter Smith and I were right about it because the whole thing fizzled out as time went on and eventually the Egyptians threw out the Soviet technicians and military personnel there.

DAVID M. EVANS
Analyst, Soviet Economic Division, INR
Washington, DC (1967-1970)

Mr. Evans was born and raised in Philadelphia, PA and was educated at Harvard University and the University of Belgrade Law School. After service in the US Army, he joined the Foreign Service in 1963. As an Economic Specialist, Mr. Evans served in Warsaw, Belgrade, Moscow and London. In addition to his economic assignments, he served in senior level positions dealing with International Security and Counter-Terrorism. He also served as Political Advisor to the Commander-in Chief, US Naval Forces in Europe. Mr. Evans was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1996.

EVANS: I was in INR from the end of 1967, and I left in the summer of 1970, so it was for two and a half years. This time I was assigned to the Soviet Economic Division, and given an extraordinarily interesting job replacing a fellow you probably know, Art Smith. The job was monitoring Communist shipments of military items to Vietnam. This opened up an extraordinary contact with the whole intelligence community because I worked very closely with the CIA, and the DIA, and various parts of the State Department in monitoring the shipments which were both by ship and by air. It involved a lot of highly classified intelligence, special intelligence; a lot of back room stuff, examination of photographs, markings, and keeping record of ships and ports and sources of delivery. It was actually quite a fascinating job.

Q: What was your impression? Was this an all-out effort on the part of the Soviets or the Chinese, or the Bloc, or was the feeling that this was a moderated effort? Was any conclusion made, about that?

EVANS: Well, that is an interesting question. I don't know whether it was moderated, but it certainly was not, I think, an all-out thing. It was a little bit of fits and starts, some stuff was good, some stuff wasn't; some stuff was new, some stuff wasn't, particularly the Soviet aircraft that were sent out. Then there was a big question about the stuff that was coming from Eastern Europe. For political reasons, there was a great deal of pressure to show that the Eastern Europeans were not sending military things. So, I had the sometimes unhappy task of telling people that it was military. The State Department, for whatever reason, at that time, wanted to show that what was coming from Eastern Europe was mostly military support, and therefore, should not block our assistance, or whatever other programs we had going on with Eastern Europe. Therefore, if there were overcoats, they were not deemed military things. If they were trucks, they were not deemed military. They were support. At one point, the CIA brought me unmistakable evidence that the Romanians were sending anti-tank grenade launchers. These were very sophisticated, very good anti-tank grenade launchers that would pierce armor.

Q: We are talking about, what I guess were called RPGs?

EVANS: Exactly.

Q: Rocket propelled grenades.

EVANS: RPG-7s.

Q: I have one at home.

EVANS: Well, you know exactly what I mean then. I wrote up this report, and sent it forward and immediately was reprimanded for revealing this, because the Administration wanted to get Congressional authorization to supply Romania with a heavy water reactor for nuclear energy. My processing of this information did not help. That was a somewhat surprising thing.

As I got more involved in the whole Vietnam issue, not just the delivery of arms but the actual progress of the war I realized that we were losing the war, and by all projections, we would lose the war. There was no way we could kill enough Vietnamese to win the war. That wasn't the way we were going to win the war anyway. I was reading all this data, writing it up and analyzing it. I thought I had documented it very thoroughly and come to a very sound conclusion. I handed it to the Deputy Director of INR. The next day, I asked him if he had agreed with the paper, and whether he had sent it on up. He pushed the paper back to me, and said, "I can't send that paper forward." I said, "What do you mean, this is very important, it shows that we are losing the war. The Secretary of State has to see this." He said, "We are under strict instructions not to send the Secretary of State any analysis that shows we are losing the war." I thought, "Good God, I do not believe this." That this was the policy: that the senior people were being purposely denied access to the truth or the facts. It was very disturbing. I referred to this many times in the past.

I was also in INR when the Tet Offensive began. We had a discussion about that and there were a number of people who thought this was a sure sign that we were going to win. My analysis was that this was a sign that we were going to lose. I saw the Tet Offensive as the major turnaround, the signal that the game was up.

So, INR was very interesting. It exposed me to a lot of intelligence sources and analysis, but, also pointed out a lot of political forces that were in play that did not always square with what intelligence and the facts would show.

Q: What was your impression of the intelligence apparatus from your perspective, of what you were getting, like the CIA, NSA, the DIA?

EVANS: It was amazing, but I was impressed with the breadth of it and, particularly CIA and DIA. I worked very closely with them. I used to come out to Arlington Hall and have a lot of meetings with DIA. I was impressed with the ability, the dedication, analytical skills, and the technical capability. I was amazed at what we were able to pick up through satellite photography and through human to human reporting. I was very impressed.

Q: Well then, you left in late 1969?

EVANS: Actually, it was 1970.

CHARLES WILLIAM MAYNES
Economic-Commercial Officer
Moscow (1968-1970)

Ambassador Maynes was born in South Dakota and raised there and in Utah. He was educated at Harvard University and Oxford. Entering the Foreign Service in 1962, he was first assigned to the State Department in Washington, then to Vientiane as Economic Officer. Following Russian language studies, he was posted to Moscow as Economic-Commercial Officer. Resigning the Department in 1970, he served a two-year assignment in the office of Senator Morse, after which he joined the Carnegie Endowment and later served on President Carter's Transition Team. From 1977 to 1989, he held the position of Assistant Secretary of State for International Organizations with the rank of Ambassador. Ambassador Maynes was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

Q: You got to Russia, then, I suppose around August of '68?

MAYNES: That's right. That's when.

Q: You were there from when to when?

MAYNES: From August of '68 till August or July of 1970.

Q: Before we get to the reaction to the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia, what was your impression of the Soviet Union when you got there, compared to what you'd been thinking about it?

MAYNES: I think it was pretty much what I expected, except that I didn't . . . I mean, I knew it was certainly a very highly authoritarian place with lots of repression and official anti-American ideology. What I wasn't prepared for was the warmth of the Russian people toward Americans, which was very genuine at the time. And that's probably changed, but it certainly was very strong then. I also wasn't prepared for our own isolation and self-imposed isolation, our fear of contact and our own paranoia, which was much greater than I would have expected.

Q: How did this translate itself, this paranoia?

MAYNES: Well, fear of contact with Russians. Part of this stems from our foolish reaction - in terms of policy response - to the invasion of Czechoslovakia. Since we didn't want to do anything that was substantive, we were all ordered not to talk to Russians. So having spent 10 months learning Russian, I was ordered by the security officer at the embassy - not ordered but strongly encouraged - to avoid all contact with Russians. In fact, we were under an official prohibition from talking to them officially for several months, which of course simply cut us off from information and any modest influence that we could have.

What I also realized very quickly after I arrived - and I had not understood this - that Soviet studies was a radioactive field. I remember encountering a professor a couple of months after I was there, a distinguished professor here in the United States, and he told me he had been the first professor in the Cold War period to be permitted to spend a year at the Russian Institute, studying there. And I said, "Well, you must have written an interesting account of that." He said, "Oh, no, I couldn't possibly." And I said, "Why?" He said, "Well, if I said anything favorable, I would have been ostracized in the United States, and if I said anything unfavorable, I would have been denied a visa to return." So that was a big shock to me, and then I began to realize and noticed that - we quickly noticed - that the best analysis of Soviet reality was coming out of the CIA and not out of the State Department. And since I knew the people in the State Department and to my mind they were just as gifted and in some ways, I thought, maybe even more than their CIA colleagues - and I think certainly on the whole a more elite group - there had to be a reason for it. And the reason was that the CIA had anonymity, and we didn't, and people were scared to death to say anything that deviated even slightly from the party line, whatever that might be at the moment. So it was not as radioactive, I suppose, as Chinese studies, for which people were actually thrown out of the Service and that sort of thing. But people learned their lesson, and there was an orthodoxy that you had to follow, and you were only permitted to deviate from it if you got to a very, very high level and were very much trusted by the people in power back in Washington.

Q: Well, your job is what at that embassy?

MAYNES: I was number two in the economic section.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

MAYNES: For one year, Thompson, and he did have the reputation where he could talk truth to power. And then Jake Beam, who was a very distinguished ambassador but did not have that confidence back in Washington.

Q: I'd like to try to get the feeling of the atmosphere there. When you say that the reporting, particularly let's say on the political side, which you would have access to now, did you find that. . . . This is the early Brezhnev period, I guess, wasn't it?

MAYNES: In retrospect, I think you can see that the Soviet Union was fitfully trying to reform itself really from 1956 on, and the big chance came when Khrushchev finally had supreme power, and while we were there, he was thrown out, but they knew that they were in trouble, because basically the model for growth that they had was running out of power. The model was, take surplus labor with the status quo technology, marry them - in other words, take peasants off the kolkhoz, put them in a factory, and you get a one-time immediate shot-in-the-arm increase in GNP and growth. By the time I arrived, they were facing a labor shortage, and the technical journals were filled with articles about this, and it was clear that they knew that they had to do something about this. This, of course, ultimately brought them down. Actually, I personally wrote some airgrams at the time predicting that this couldn't last. What I didn't understand was how long they could hold on, but it wasn't that I was so prescient; it was that they were saying it themselves. You just had to read the journals. And they were floundering around trying to figure out how they could solve this dilemma. And they talked about putting the handicapped to work. Of course, that wouldn't solve the problem. Or making students go three years to university instead of four. All these were one-shot, small solutions to the problem. There are only two solutions, and both were dangerous for them. One was reform, to increase entrepreneurial activity, and also the implementation of new scientific discoveries into the economy. And they tried that. They created a scientific - I've forgotten - state committee for science and technology. They tried to develop technology to take the existing labor force and make it more productive. And the trouble was that they needed to open up the system, really, to do that. And then they tried entrepreneurial reform, and they had something called the Shchokino Experiment while I was there, and they were going on and on about this. And it did give them big gains where they allowed the director more authority. But they were afraid of replicating it, so it was just like a little hothouse plant out there in the middle of Russia. And then they tried importing foreign technology, and that's, of course, when we were slapping sanctions on them trying to stop them from doing it. But they were getting a lot of technology from Western Europe and Japan, but there again, they'd buy these plants, they would be state-of-the-art plants, turnkey projects, and they were so afraid of infection from the outside that they would dismiss the foreign specialists as soon as the plant was completed, and then they never could bring it up to full capacity. So you'd walk into these modern plants, and they'd be working at 50 per cent capacity. So they were trying everything they could to change the system and not lose control. And then came the invasion of Czechoslovakia, and that really closed the reforms down. The reforms sort of stumbled on for a while, but it's clear now that the invasion of Czechoslovakia basically closed a chapter that had begun with Khrushchev's speech before the 20th Congress. Then it greatly intensified when he became head of the Politburo, then began to lose momentum but still was continuing in the early days of Brezhnev and Kosygin and got virtually shut down with the invasion.

Q: How did the invasion of Czechoslovakia. . . . You're the new boy on the block, and often your antennae are more alert to things. How did you find our embassy reacted to this, particularly the political section?

MAYNES: Well, the embassy had predicted the invasion, but in a bureaucratic manner that didn't help very much. In other words, they said the chances were 51-49 that the invasion would take place. Thompson was gone, and we had no access to Soviet leadership, so we basically had a reasonably professional response to it, but I don't think we showed any great insight because we were really denied anything. . . . We were ordered by Washington not to talk to Russian officials; Thompson was gone; we couldn't fight that prohibition; and we were followed every place we went. From the minute that the invasion took place, the KGB put agents on us wherever we went. So we were reduced to reading the newspapers, you know - and actually, we were very skilled at that. People in Moscow developed, particularly after they'd been there about six months or a year, a very fine sense of what words meant, and so we did a good job of that, but I don't think we brought any great. . . . we didn't perform the normal task of diplomacy, which is to somehow get into the mind of the leadership of the other country and be able to inform your own country of what's really motivating them and what some of the pressures are. It wasn't until Thompson came back that we began to articulate a reasonable version of what might have taken place inside the Russian leadership, because he had that finger-feel for it. He also had contacts like no one else in the embassy.

Q: Well, you're pointing to one of the things, too - the bureaucratic response. When we have a crisis with a country, we often withdraw our ambassador, we tell people "Don't have contact," which always has struck me as being just the wrong thing.

MAYNES: It is the wrong thing.

Q: You don't go into a pet or a pout. I mean, what the hell. This is when you want a full-court press.

MAYNES: I agree. When you have one of these crises, for a US Government or for the Administration in power, the domestic public relations are more important than the diplomatic considerations. So it's more important for them to have a headline in the post saying we ain't talking to these nasty Russians because of what they've done, rather than sitting down and trying to figure out whether there's any opportunity really to influence this decision.

Q: In your observation, is this an American way of responding to these things, or is it a diplomatic-

MAYNES: Yes, primarily, and it basically comes down to the fact that Congress has such a role in foreign policy. In other words, you can have a democratic system and have a very important parliament and a traditional form of diplomacy, but you can't have it with the American system, because the Congress has an independent power base totally separate from the Administration, and Congress may not only have different views, which it often does, but it has different political interests often and will manipulate the crisis - as will the Administration - for domestic political gain in a way that I don't think takes place to the same degree in any other democratic country.

Q: In the economic side, did you find yourself, again, reduced pretty much to reading journals and all?

MAYNES: Yes.

Q: As opposed to getting out and looking around?

MAYNES: Well, I traveled quite a bit, and we would visit Russian factories. But of course none of us were technically expert, so it was more of a political mission than a diplomatic mission. At the end of my tour, there was a burst of commercial activity, which was held in check by Kissinger, who was trying to follow his "linkage" theory and get the Russians to help us in Vietnam.

Q: We're talking about Kissinger at the time was the national security advisor.

MAYNES: That's right, and founded this theory of linkage. The Russians were building a major truck plant, and Henry Ford came over and a number of very prominent American business came through the embassy interested in trade with Russia.

Q: How about when Henry Ford came through? This would be Henry Ford II, I guess.

MAYNES: That's right.

Q: Did you get any impression from him of what his impression was of the factories?

MAYNES: Well, it was interesting. First of all, he had Christina with him, who stunned the Russians by showing up at an embassy reception in a see-through topless blouse, which also mesmerized the embassy officers; also they'd never seen anything like that, and she was gorgeous - at least that's my memory. It was very sheer - let's put it this way. I'd never seen anything like it before. Ford said something that I had never realized before. First of all, he said, "You know, the Russians are interested in having me participate in this, and I can't quite understand why, because I assemble trucks and automobiles, I don't manufacture them." And he said, "Only the Italians manufacture automobiles." In other words, they start with the ingot at one end and an automobile at the other. It's a totally integrated production. Fiat, for that reason, has won many of the contracts in Eastern Europe - in Poland and other places - because you had no automobile industry, no suppliers, and you'd walk in to an empty wheat field and build a plant that goes from the ingot to the-

Q: When I was in Yugoslavia around this time, a little earlier, they produced what became the Yugo, which was a Fiat, called the Zastava.

MAYNES: Okay, so he said, you know, he couldn't understand why they wanted him and that if he got the contract he would have to strip his empire of all of its most talented people and send them to Russia to put this damn thing together. So that was an interesting kind of insight, but then we saw why the Russians were interested. It turned out that the minister of the automobile industry had been a young worker in Dearborn in 1932 or something like that, when we had these exchanges.

Q: Actually there was a Ford plant put up in the Soviet Union at one time.

Q: In the 20's or '30's.

MAYNES: That's right, and that was when Walter Reuther also came over and worked there. So this guy had made his career, you could realize - I mean, I'd seen this phenomenon: someone's educated in a particular country, and of course it's the reason we all want them to be educated in our countries, they learn our specifications, they learn our way of doing things, and they make their career by saying the American or the French or the German way is the best - "It's the best," you know. So he was very anxious to have Ford bid for it.

But those were my two dominant impressions of that period. I also remember Bill Miller, who later became secretary of the Treasury, showing up in my office and telling me how smart he was. That was when we were in merger mania, you know, and the sign of a great businessman was to assemble as many diverse factories, regardless of what they produced, as possible in one gigantic trust, and he had outdone everybody else. So he, of course, showed our ignorance. I knew the name and the name of the company, but I wasn't as familiar as he thought I should be, so he spent an hour telling me how he was the smartest businessman in America and at that time, I guess, was. Shortly after he left, the company collapsed.

But we had several people like that come through at that time, scouting out the landscape, but basically restricted by US policy.

Q: What about agriculture? Was the agricultural attaché part of your section?

MAYNES: Yes.

Q: Because agriculture and the Soviet Union have always been two really key ingredients.

MAYNES: We had a very active agricultural attaché, who, of course was reporting regularly to Washington on what the harvest was going to be because that would influence how much grain the United States might be able to sell. And then we had a science attaché who maintained contact - he probably had the most interesting job in the embassy, because it's just the reverse of here. Here scientists tend to be conservative, and English and history professors tend to be liberal; and in Russia it was just the opposite. The language and history professors were ideologues, and the chemists and the physicists - as we can see now, many of them have become leading reformers - and that was because those were the fields where you could express yourself with fewest restraints. So the more liberally minded tended to go in those professions.

Q: Do you remember the science attaché's name.

MAYNES: Yes, Chris Spire was his name. He's dead.

Q: It turned out - obviously it was a combination of political and economic factors, but the economic factor seems to be the major cause of the Soviet Union.

MAYNES: I think it was. I think the Soviet Union basically began to disappear the day that Stalin died, because the day Stalin died, they stopped shooting people. Before that, if you were a dissenter in the Soviet Union, the threat to you would not only be that you'd lose your freedom but you'd lose your life, and not only your life but your wife's and your friends' and your children's lives would be threatened maybe with extinction. After Stalin died, they stopped shooting. They still were harshly repressive, but decreasingly so and erratically so. And so more and more people - and you have them in every culture - who don't conform, won't conform, want to raise questions began to raise questions, and the Soviets didn't know quite how to handle them. You know, they tried intimidating them, and of course they succeeded in most cases, but then there were some people, like Sakharov, who wouldn't be intimidated, just would not be intimidated. And while I was there, you had the first protests in Red Square, and I think, in retrospect, it was a clear process that was going on. And then you had a change in pokalenniya, a generation change. The Soviet Union after the great purges was basically run by a group of people who were almost all the same age. You've got to remember that Gromyko became ambassador to the United States in the midst of World War II, I think, when he was 32 or 33.

Q: And he'd been DCM before that.

MAYNES: And Kosygin - he was jumped up to a major position in '39. In other words, it would be as if all of us are starting out in our careers and suddenly some great catastrophe eliminates all the people who are 40, 50, and 60. And so suddenly these jobs are open. So it isn't that everybody who got the job was talented, but they were all sort of the same generation, and they were all ready to leave the scene. So that's one of the reasons that I think when Gorbachev came in, the change was even greater than might otherwise have been the case if you'd had, as most societies do, sort of mixed generations in power. You have somebody 60 working next to somebody 40, and they both have jobs of equal . . . because of the accident of promotions and that sort of thing. But in Russia, everybody was about the same age, all getting old together, all holding on as long as possible, and suddenly, at some point, you had to make a break with the past. So they tried two old guys after Brezhnev died - Andropov and Chernenko. They were the same age.

Q: And they died.

MAYNES: They died right like that. So finally at some point, you have to make a break. You have to say, "We have to reach out to a new generation." Well, this new generation was the generation that had grown up at the time of the 20th Party Congress and had a totally different point of view. And not only that - all the jobs suddenly began to open up because all these people were dying. So I think it was the combination of the fact that they stopped shooting people. Well, it was three things: they stopped shooting people; the system, which did work in the 30's of taking standing state technology and moving people off the farm, ran out of steam and they couldn't find anything else to replace it; and then you have this generation change. You put those three together, and it was explosive.

Q: While you were there - again we're talking about the '68-70 period - did you have any feel - I realize you were cut off, but I was wondering whether you were able to have the kitchen table conversations with any of the intelligentsia or others - about how the ideology was going, because in many of the countries, the Marxist ideology was taught in the schools and seemed to be sterile as hell and didn't have any real-

MAYNES: When I was there, of course, Kosygin and Brezhnev were still in the full use of their powers. I guess my view is that the system, there was great cynicism about the system, but less about the ideology - that people did believe in it, because they didn't know anything else - but who knows; there were no public opinion polls, that sort of thing - but I had the impression that what they wanted was socialism with a human face. That's why the Czech experiment had a big impact on the intelligentsia. That's what they wanted. They didn't want our system, but they wanted their system with a human face. They did not want Stalinism. They wanted more freedom. They wanted more experimentation. There is a collectivist ethos in Russian history, not just in Bolshevik history. There is in Russian history. They are suspicious of dog-eat-dog capitalism. They still are. They're going to be even more so after this last currency crisis there. So you didn't run into many people - maybe they were afraid to say so - who were sort of Milton Friedman libertarians - of the sort you run into now. You run into quite a few of those people now, who are pro-capitalism à l'outrance (to extremes). But then, I think the more adventurous spirits - I mean really adventurous - would say we'd like to be like Sweden. The sort of more normal adventurous spirit would say we like what the Czechs were doing and we made a mistake. That is the way we want to go. And I think that's basically where Gorbachev thought he was taking it, and it wouldn't work. I mean the system couldn't stand that kind of reform, I don't think, because in the end, the truth is, and that was the unpleasant truth, the system really did depend upon repression. In other words, it wasn't an aberration of the leadership. The system would collapse without the repression.

Q: Well, in my interviews and from other readings, I came away with the impression that you're moving into the Nixon-Kissinger period, but particularly with Kissinger, who seemed to of the opinion, which is really sort of a European one, that maybe the Soviets were going to come out ahead in power, politics or whatever it is, and the best thing was to try to cut a deal and work with these people because of what was happening in Vietnam and we were beginning to lose our will.

MAYNES: I think that's true.

Q: And I was wondering - this would be very early on - but I was wondering whether there was any of that feeling among your colleagues.

MAYNES: Well, I told you that we wrote a couple of messages to Washington suggesting that Russia could not sustain the arms race, that it was, for all the reasons that I've mentioned - labor shortages, inability to use new technology, or develop it on its own, etc. - that it was on a course where it could not compete. That was not an accepted view, and I think there was a fear that the Soviet Union would exist for 200 years and we were losing our will. But I've got to remember also that this was the period when we landed somebody on the moon, and so that was, I remember being at the embassy, and the head of the Internal Section for Political Affairs came by and he said, "We're just too good, aren't we? We're just too good." I'm not sure everybody had Kissinger's pessimism about America.

Q: And also, this was early on. I mean, a little later we were talking about things going bad in Vietnam and protests were going on.

MAYNES: I think Kissinger clearly saw his mission was managing a soft landing for America's decline and trying to consolidate some kind of structure of stability before we no longer had the influence that we had at the time. And I think he did see the Soviet Union as stronger than in fact it was. But I'm just saying that you could see at the time, and it was reported at the time, and this isn't because we were so far-seeing. It was in the God damned literature, and all you had to do was read the literature, and they were saying it themselves.

Q: Did you get any feel - it's always very difficult for somebody there because of the limited contact - I sometimes have the feeling that our people in the Political and Economic Sections knew far more of what was going on in the Soviet Union than even a well-informed Soviet did, because you had the time and leisure to read all the literature, where the normal engineer or others didn't MAYNES: That's true, but of course that's the privilege of being a diplomat. When I subsequently became an editor, at one point I found myself appearing quite often on television on morning news programs when crisis would break, and it wasn't that I was the most informed person in the United States on any particular issue, but because I was paid to read, basically. They suddenly discovered that I knew a lot about everything going on in foreign affairs. Well, a diplomat sitting in Moscow is in the same position. I mean you're paid to observe and read and study, and after a while, yes, you do get to be better informed than almost anybody, except maybe some academic specialist. Unfortunately diplomats still have a lot of unnecessary bureaucratic make-work.

Q: What about other diplomats? Did you find that we were using them, they were using us?

MAYNES: Well, there were only a couple of what I would call serious embassies in Moscow, as is probably true here in Washington also. Now by serious I mean who are engaged in more than visa facilitation and trade promotion, people who are studying the high politics and economic strategy of the country. And those countries were preeminently Britain, which has sort of imperial inertia driving its foreign service, and they invested heavily in the training and recruitment of this kind of person. So if you went to the British embassy, you ran into people like yourself who had been given language training and who saw as their job to try to do more than just facilitate the businessman or congressional visitor but to understand the country and to try to interpret it for their government. The French did that. The Germans less so, but they had a couple of people, one of whom ended up as the German ambassador here. And the Japanese also invested heavily. And then the Yugoslavs, for obvious reasons. The other East Europeans tended to run that kind of almost intelligence activity, which is really what. . . . I mean, diplomats are involved in legal intelligence, and the East European countries would run that activity through the part of the Party relationship rather than through their embassies, so their embassies were not as well informed. But the Yugoslav embassy was very well informed. The Italians had at least one person who was of this sort, and that was about it. And then everybody else was in trade promotion and visa facilitation.

Q: And did you find them sort of leeching off us when they had to do a report?

MAYNES: Yes, they descended upon the Americans to find out. But you see, we leeches off them too, because the Soviet system was closed, but it wasn't completely closed - couldn't be - it had some outside contact. By the way, I forgot to include the Finns in that group. The Finns had an outstanding embassy, outstanding, probably the best in the country, better than ours in terms of quality of people - of course for obvious reasons. This was very important to them. But all these other countries would have contact with the leadership, which we didn't have very often. It's a two-way exchange, because many of them had more contacts. Now the Finns were especially valuable because they not only had the analytical capability; they also had the contact. And so that's why they were so valuable. And their current ambassador, Otto Maassela, was a third secretary when I was there, and he was already seeing his prime minister on a regular basis to report on Russian affairs. And he would accompany the prime minister to see Kosygin.

Q: What about our CIA reporting? Were you privy to much of it?

MAYNES: I wasn't privy to the reporting from the field. That went through a separate channel. Of course, I got all the reports coming back, and I must say I had a much higher regard for their analytical capability than their spy recruitment and all that stuff. The kinds of people they have in Washington and Moscow, I didn't think they were the top people, but their analytical staff back here was terrific.

Q: Did you see Thompson in operation much?

MAYNES: Yes, I did, and he was like a swan among the ugly ducklings. I mean, to the degree the Foreign Service has deteriorated, I think one of the reasons it's deteriorated is that the system no longer invests in people the way it used to. If you look at that sort of great generation of Kennan and Bohlen and Thompson and Henderson, they received the equivalent of a Ph.D. in Russian studies. Kennan was sent for three years to study at the University of Berlin; Bohlen, three years at the University of Paris. I don't know where Thompson was sent. And then they were given almost nothing but Russian studies and Russian assignments, Russian-related assignments from then on, and the result was that they got a deep grounding. My generation got eight months in FSI, and it showed. Maybe they were much better than we were - I'm perfectly willing to concede that. They weren't that much better, though. And yet they did better, and I think that we do not invest in our people the way we used to, and Thompson was one of the last who had come up through the system and had developed a deep historical appreciation of Soviet behavior, was able to put things in context in a way that the rest of us weren't. I mean, when airgrams would be sent up to him, he could point out that this had happened a few times earlier, and this kind of thing. And so he just had a depth, and he also had a character that made him different.

Q: One can say that in October of '62 Thompson was probably the key figure who might have prevented World War III, by being the Soviet expert sitting with the Kennedy Administration dealing with the Cuban Missile Crisis. He was the one who gave the guidance that seemed to steer us clear of a complete confrontation.

MAYNES: He was a very wise man, very good ambassador, very wise man.

Q: How about Jake Beam, who was also ambassador to Poland and had been around for a while?

MAYNES: He didn't have the depth in Russian studies that was necessary. He couldn't speak Russian. He was a very fine ambassador, but there is a difference between the kind of knowledge that I'm talking about and simply diplomatic experience, which he had in spades. He was a very distinguished diplomat and a lovely man to work for. He was more dependent on us than Thompson was.

Q: Did you have any feeling at that time about the beginning of the Kissinger-Dobrynin sort of channel?

MAYNES: No, except that we were getting complaints from our Desk back in State Department that they didn't know what was going on, being cut out. But we didn't know the extent of it, and I had left when Kissinger committed the unforgivable mistake of showing up in Moscow and not even telling the ambassador until he'd left that he'd been in town. One thing I did notice, by the way, during my career in Moscow is that paradoxically, Soviet diplomats knew more about these exchanges than American diplomats. Quite low-ranking Soviet diplomats would know about exchanges in Washington that we were not informed of.

Q: It's one of the aberrations, and actually, I think, many would say it was a real weakness of the whole Kissinger time, that brilliant as he may have been you almost had the feeling he was playing games with the American bureaucracy-

MAYNES: He made some big mistakes.

Q: -and he enjoyed this. I mean, you know, it wasn't just tactics - there was a certain amount of pleasure.

MAYNES: That's right, he did. And he made big mistakes as a result. I mean Jerry (Gerard) Smith's book, Doubletalk, documents in a devastating way mistakes that Kissinger made in SALT I because he did not consult his own staff, and they were the kinds of mistakes that led to problems in the Senate ratification and the subsequent attacks on what he had done. Many of those could have been avoided if he'd just had the common sense or humility to talk to some of his own people.

Policy Planning
Washington, DC (1975-1977)

Warren Zimmerman was born and raised in Philadelphia, PA. He received a bachelor's degree from Yale in 1956 and attended Kings College, Cambridge as a Fulbright Scholar. He served briefly in the U.S. Army before entering the Foreign Service in 1961. Ambassador Zimmerman's career included positions in Caracas, Belgrade, Moscow, Paris, Madrid, Geneva, and Vienna. He was the ambassador to Yugoslavia from 1989-1992. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on December 10, 1996.

Q: Today is March 18, 1997. Warren, you were in INR. I would like to get the dates at the beginning. You were there from when to when?

ZIMMERMANN: I was there from the late summer of 1968. In fact my arrival in INR coincided with the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia. I stayed until long about March of 1970.

Q: Okay. What was where were you in INR?

ZIMMERMANN: I was in the part that was then called RSB. I don't remember what it stands for anymore, but it was the Soviet foreign policy. I was responsible for Soviet policy in Africa and Latin America, and later on in my tour there Soviet policy in Eastern Europe.

Q: You mentioned you arrived, what was it, August of 1968 is when the Soviets invaded Czechoslovakia with the willing support of their allies. I am putting quotes around willing. Although it wasn't on your desk, what was the general presumption you were getting from people; why was this happening, and also were they talking about the Brezhnev doctrine at that time?

ZIMMERMANN: Yes, there were various formulations of the Brezhnev doctrine. Of course, the Soviets never referred to it as that. There was a Pravda editorial as I recall that talked about the need for every member of the socialist commonwealth as they called it to meet certain standards, and if they didn't meet those standards, that was not just their affair alone, that was the affair of the entire commonwealth. Of course the leading nation in the commonwealth was the Soviet Union. We had been getting mixed signals from Yugoslavia as to whether the Soviets would invade to choke off the Prague spring. I personally thought they wouldn't invade. I was surprised by what they did as a lot of people were I think.

Q: Well, was there any feeling that by doing this, they may have sent out a strong lesson, but at the same time the Soviets sent out two lessons. One, they wouldn't tolerate this, and two that their relations with their other block countries while they might fear the Soviets they weren't going to embrace them. Were they a feeling they were developing antipathy?

ZIMMERMANN: Yes, I think in a way looking back, the Soviets were in a lose-lose situation. If they didn't invade Czechoslovakia it was pretty clear that things were going to get out of hand, that Dubcek was going to allow a totally free press that was heading in that direction anyway, that the Czechoslovak adherence to the Warsaw Pact would come into question as had happened in Hungary twelve years before, and that there could be an unraveling, a sort of a domino effect in the rest of the bloc. That was undoubtedly what was in the minds of Brezhnev and company when they went in. So they felt they had to stop that, but in stopping it, they won for themselves yet again the undying enmity of not only the people of Czechoslovakia but the people of Poland, the people of Hungary and everybody else, all of whom were going to look for the next opportunity to challenge the Soviets. It didn't happen for 12 years. It happened in Poland in 1980 and there it was extremely serious because these were workers. This was not an intellectual movement or a student movement. These were trade union people.

Q: And they were also sitting right on the Soviet supply lines for their main line forces.

ZIMMERMANN: That's right. This is a much more important country for them, the Soviets than Czechoslovakia was. Everything comes around of course, and now we are looking at the possibility of NATO expansion. And the Russians are fixated not on the Czech Republic or Hungary, they are fixated on Poland becoming a member of NATO and thereby putting a hostile alliance right on their border again, or for the first time. I should not say again, this is for the first time.

Q: Again trying to capture the spirit of the times, when you got to RSB, what was the thinking about the leadership, Brezhnev, and the Politburo? Was this a vigorous active group?

ZIMMERMANN: No, I think the general view was this was a very old fashioned group led by ideologues like Suslov who was mired in Marxist Leninist terminology that Brezhnev was not the sort of person you could expect to move into any kind of a major embrace of the west. There were actually some erroneous conclusions drawn from that because it was only a question of four years later that you have the Nixon trip to Moscow and made some actual progress in the U.S.-

Soviet relationship. But I think it undermined everybody that the Soviets were not going to let anybody mess around in Eastern Europe, neither the west nor the local leaders themselves. There would be a very narrow span or scope for independent activity in Eastern Europe and in the aftermath some leaders were able to manage things better than others. Probably the best in terms of winning some independence was Ceausescu in Romania and Kadar in Hungary. Two very different people of course. They managed to push the envelope about as far as you could push it in terms of independence from or relative independence from the Soviet embrace.

Czechoslovakia became a tragic case. There was a debate in INR over whether Husak who the Slovak who took over after Dubcek, he was put in by the Soviets, was a liberal or a conservative. The fact of the matter is it didn't make any difference at all. He was a Soviet puppet, and no matter how many years he spent in prison under the old regime which he had, he was going to do what the Soviets said, and he remained in power right up until the real Czech revolution in the late 1980s, and was a rather pathetic figure having no independence at all.

Q: Looking sort of at the other side, what was the feeling of your fellow officers and all as the Nixon administration came in? I mean was there any feeling about where this guy was going or anything about Nixon?

ZIMMERMANN: Well, as I recall, the first thing that happened was a flurry of requests from the NSC headed by Kissinger to the State Department to do all kinds of studies up and down and back and forth on all parts of the world. There were some cynics in INR who knew Kissinger, who said this is just an effort to tie us up because the real policy is going to be made elsewhere. We are going to have to do all these things and nobody will read them in the end, and Kissinger is going to go his own way. That turned out to be, of course, exactly accurate. That was one of Kissinger's techniques for insuring that the State Department did not play a major role in foreign policy making was to tie them up in paper. INR got the brunt of that.

Q: Who was sort of the hierarchy in INR as far as people you worked with?

ZIMMERMANN: Well, Hal Sonnenfeldt was the head of it when I started, but of course he was moved quickly over to the White House and became Kissinger's main person for Europe. Then Ken Kurst took over who was an amiable and competent, but not very flamboyant figure. The main problem in INR bureaucratically was there was a layering of the clearance system, so that the junior analysts of which I was one would write a paper. Then it would go to the immediate superior who would change it, and then if the superior of that immediate superiors didn't like what the immediate superior had done would change it in a different way, so by the time it actually became a product which would get to some policy maker, so much time had gone by that it was probably out of date and it had been eviscerated of any points it might have made at any stage during the process that it was useless. So, INR played an absolutely nugatory role I would say, in the State Department because of this very antique and antiquated clearance process. It improved a great deal when Mort Abramowitz took it over and he made it much more relevant to what the needs of the policy makers were. As I recall it, the INR that I worked in was an organization in which you generated your own ideas, your own papers. There was somebody we had who was interested only in Finland, and he would write paper after paper on Finland, a country with absolutely no interest to American policy makers. None at all. These interminable papers would come up on Finland. These were ones that passed the clearance process very easily because nobody knew anything or cared. It became a kind of a metaphor for what INR was doing. It was pathetic, I thought.

Q: Was there any connect between what you were doing and the desk?

ZIMMERMANN: Very little in those days. I think, again that has been a more modern occurrence.

Q: What you are saying now applies to the time I was in INR back in the early '60s where there was almost no connect. I was there when they added another layer of sort of sub continent directors on top of, under the continent directors of INR, just that clearance problem.

ZIMMERMANN: It was terrible, and it insured that INR would play no role at all.

Q: Well, but again, at least you were looking at the Soviets in Africa.

ZIMMERMANN: In the third world in general.

Q: Well let's talk about Africa first and then elsewhere. What were some of the developments during the '68-'70 period?

ZIMMERMANN: I must say I only dimly remember a lot that was going on there. The Biafran war was probably the biggest thing. There were certainly competitions between the Soviets and the United States for different pieces of Africa, the horn, West Africa and so forth, but the defining event, I guess was the Biafran war.

Q: Were the Soviets involved in the Biafran war?

ZIMMERMANN: I don't remember really whether they were very deeply involved. To the extent they were, I think they were on the side of the federal government against the breakaway Biafrans. But I have to say I was not particularly informed. I can't remember seeing very much of the intelligence that was generated on that even from the CIA. Because again, in those days there was not a very close relationship between INR and CIA.

Q: Well then, what other areas were of interest to you?

ZIMMERMANN: Well during the INR period, I volunteered to work on eastern Europe. Ultimately I was able to do that. That of course, was an area that I knew a bit more about and was closer to my own fields of interest. But again, I don't remember writing a single paper that had an effect on any U.S. policy because of these clearance and bureaucratic problems that we've discussed. It was a very frustrating period. The minute I had an opportunity to get out of it, I did.

Q: Well did you find a realization on the part of the people who were one rung above you, not just because of you but because of others realizing that they were a non-functioning system, or was there sort of a general tolerance, well this is just an assignment and get it over with, or sort of delight in doing this.

ZIMMERMANN: A lot of the people who had senior positions in INR in those days were not foreign service officers. They were civil servants. They had academic or quasi academic backgrounds, and they had very little interest in policy. They had very little interest in getting to the policy makers. They were much more interested in being right and making sure that if you said something wrong even if it was perhaps not even important, that it got corrected. So, I didn't feel that the organization was at all responsive to the kinds of things that a policy maker would want. To some degree that was attributable to the fact that foreign service officers were at the bottom rather than in the middle or at the top of the organization.

Q: Did you find the officers at your level were pretty restive?

ZIMMERMANN: Yes, everybody was restive. There was a general feeling of frustration. Morale was terrible. It was the worst two years I spent in 33 years in the foreign service.

Q: Well, in 1970 you were released on good behavior.

Q: I think this is true. Well then you went, your next assignment was Moscow. You went there when in '73?

ZIMMERMANN: I went there it must have been September. No, I guess it was July of '73 because I was there during the summer. I had always been interested in Soviet stuff, and I was already pretty old to have my first assignment to Moscow. I was 39, and I went as the deputy head of the political section.

Q: You were there from July '73 until when?

ZIMMERMANN: Until the summer of '75. I don't remember exactly.

Q: Was it hard to break in to the Soviet clique is not the right word, but the Soviet circle at that point or had your Belgrade and INR credentials enough to get you in?

ZIMMERMANN: Certainly the Belgrade and INR credentials were not. I did have strong support from Spike Dubs who had been my boss in Belgrade. He was an old Soviet hand. He was political counselor in Belgrade, and he was constantly trying to get me into the Soviet field. He was the director of the office of Soviet affairs in the State Department, so he basically greased the assignment for me, so I had a sort of a following wind from an important person in the Soviet field. Yes, but I had some trepidation because I hadn't been a member of the club. But it quickly vanished. When you get there you realize that nobody knows all that much. We have all been trained in Russian by then, so the language was not a serious problem. There were people of various degrees of experience in the political section that I came to. Mark Garrison, head of the political section, a brilliant officer, had not had much more Soviet experience than I had. Kurt Kaman whom I supervised had enormous Soviet experience. Actually his Russian was so good that he had been an interpreter. But it was a very collegial atmosphere. I am a strong believer that hardship posts bring out the best in people. People learn to live together and learn to be tolerant.

Q: Who was the ambassador at this time?

ZIMMERMANN: Dubs was the chargé for quite a while, nearly a year for the time I was there, and then Walter Stoessel became the ambassador. He was a very nice man and very easy to work with.

Q: What were relations during '73 to '75 with the Soviets?

ZIMMERMANN: Well, there had been the Nixon visit in '72. There had been the Brezhnev visit in May of '73, early in the spring, sometime in the spring of '73. So you already had had two summits. We were looking for a kind of a breaking out of very close relations and of course, that didn't happen. I found when I got there in 1973 an extremely rigid society, awfully hostile to the U.S. Your contacts were extremely limited to largely to the USA desk of the Soviet foreign ministry which was run by people who were not at all friendly. I would say that on the policy level while things were looking pretty good and there were plenty of high level meetings. Gromyko and Kissinger would meet quite frequently. One didn't get the feeling that this an amazingly important rapprochement. In the middle of this period you had the enormous mistake in my view of the Jackson-Vanik amendment which was intended to put pressure on the Soviets to release large numbers of Soviet Jews. The price turned out to be higher than the Soviets we were willing to pay. The trade-off would be they would release 60,000 Soviet Jews in return for which we would give them a trade agreement and most favored nation. They ultimately decided that wasn't the price they were prepared to pay so that was a rush of cold water on the economic relationship, and it also reduced the outflow of Soviet Jews for a couple of years.

Q: As that Jackson Vanik amendment developed, was there any input from the embassy or State Department that you were aware of?

ZIMMERMANN: It is one occasion where I wished I had pushed harder for a different U.S. position. The State Department including Kissinger of course, was opposed to the Jackson-Vanik amendment. There was a question of how much you were going to concede to the Congress. I felt in my bones that this was something the Soviets maybe wouldn't take. They wouldn't live with it. People higher up than me and people who knew more about the Soviet Union than me like Stoessel and Jack Matlock who by then was the DCM felt it would be okay, that we would still get the Jews out and the MFN and the trade agreement to go forward. I tended to let their greater expertise influence my own judgment. I didn't push as hard as I now think I should have for the alternative view which was they would do what they ultimately did which was say this is no deal. Our pride is not going to be dragged in the mud like this.

Q: Was anybody putting forward the fact Senator Jackson, Scoop Jackson from Washington was a very hard line basic very anti Soviet. Everybody is anti Soviet but you know, as anti Soviets go he was more anti than most. That this was an effort on his part either one to get a bunch of favorable constituents out of the Soviet Union or two, to screw up the growing rapprochement between the United States and the Soviet Union?

ZIMMERMANN: Well, he certainly didn't like the rapprochement, and he was heavily influenced, of course, by Richard Perle who was one of his chief advisors. I think his primary objective was to get the Jews out. Of course, that is something that everybody shared. It wasn't a question of was the objective right; it was a question of what was the best way to get there.

Q: Well, it worked.

ZIMMERMANN: It didn't work because the Jewish emigration went down and stayed down for the rest of the 1970s until the end of the decade when SALT II was being negotiated.

Q: You had served in Yugoslavia. We were both there. Yugoslavia with all its problems was sort of a country that worked, not wonderfully, but it was kind of fun and all that. What was your impression when you finally got to the Soviet Union, the big apple of the Slavic world and all that?

ZIMMERMANN: Absolutely worlds apart from what I had seen in communist Yugoslavia. Just no comparisons at all. In Yugoslavia you had a very broad range of people you could talk to and who would talk to you relatively freely. In the Soviet Union it was very limited to targeted officials, KGB people who were thrown across your path, and a very small number of dissidents, many of whom were probably working for the KGB also. So, it was a genuine dictatorship. It was totalitarian in the precise and literal sense of the word. Yugoslavia was not like that. Even the other communist countries were not like that. Yugoslavia was as far away from it as any communist country could have been, I think.

Q: What about your observations of the Soviet economy, the Soviet system?

ZIMMERMANN: Well, everybody saw that the economy didn't work as it pertained to the needs of people and consumers and to health care and that kind of thing. Our son Matt had his appendix out in a Soviet hospital. While the operation worked fine, there was tremendous apprehension that something horrible would happen because something horrible quite often did happen in Soviet hospitals. So, health care didn't work although it was universal. Consumer goods were not available. The consumers simply didn't get priority. The education system, by the way, was extremely good. We had all three of our children in the Soviet school, a normal Soviet school, not a special one for foreigners. The quality of the math was two or three grades ahead of American education. But it was very much rote learning. Your mind was not asked to expand. You weren't asked for initiatives. You weren't asked for creative thought or anything like that. Still it was a good education system. What we believed, and what I think was then true, was that what we were not seeing did work very well, and that was the whole military industrial complex. That was where the resources went. That was where the priorities were, and the Soviets could put people on the moon before we could, or they could launch enormous missiles. Their military was definitely one to be feared and one to be dealt with. That was true. So it is simple to say a country that can't even fix a toilet couldn't possibly be a great power because it is certainly possible that you can't or don't want to fix a toilet and still be a great power. I think Russia was.

Q: Was there a feeling that the Soviet Union was still poised maybe to do something nasty in Europe or something?

ZIMMERMANN: I don't think so. There was a great debate about whether Soviet policy was offensive or defensive. I think the answer was it was a combination of both, but it certainly saw the cordon of Eastern European countries as something that was necessary for its security. You have to look at it from the point of view of the Russians who were invaded five times from Europe in the 19th. and 20th. centuries. You could understand why they would have security concerns with regard to countries like Poland and Czechoslovakia and Hungary and so forth, East Germany. But what of course, was totally unacceptable was that those countries simply because they bordered on the Soviet Union, had to have the identical system and had to be totally under the control of Moscow. That was what was unacceptable. I don't think there was really any fear on the part of anybody I knew in the U.S. government that the Soviets were going to break through that cordon of Eastern European countries and invade Western Europe. I think there was no fear of that kind. There was a general tendency, an accurate tendency, to feel that Eastern Europe was really quite unstable because of the nature of the political relationship between the Soviet Union and those countries, and that you could have problems there. Of course you had them in Hungary and Czechoslovakia and Poland and so forth.

Q: What about Soviets and the Cubans dealing in Africa? Were they doing that at the time?

ZIMMERMANN: Yes. It was the one area where the detente, which is a word we used actually until about 1975, didn't apply. We did have an improvement in the bilateral relationship with the Soviets. We did have significant arms control agreements, SALT I, the ABM agreement, and the Vladivostok agreement in 1975 and so forth. There was the famous statement of principles that Nixon and Brezhnev had signed in 1972 which was a kind of code of behavior about how two great powers would act in the rest of the world. The Soviets totally trashed it. They paid no attention to it, and they kept running around in Africa and Latin America. There was a general expectation, this is an interesting fact, there was a general expectation when Saigon fell in 1975, that the Soviets would take over Vietnam lock, stock, and barrel. They would have bases. They would use it as a power projection point for the rest of East Asia, and they would be therefore the great power in East Asia. It didn't happen. They tried no doubt.

Q: Cam Ranh Bay was supposed to be a Soviet port.

ZIMMERMANN: That's right. And Indonesia would be threatened and the Philippines would be threatened. You remember all that. None of those things happened. So, maybe that was some reason to think even back then, that the Soviets did not make very good power projectors or imperialists. They were pretty deficient because they had a system which was not attractive to anybody.

Q: What was the calculation of what were the Soviets up to? I mean we are now faced with pictures of huge fleets rusty in Vladivostok and Sevastopol and elsewhere. They had a tremendous navy which is power projection way beyond the needs of just sort of defense of the motherland. What was the calculation during this '73 to '75 period? What was this all about?

ZIMMERMANN: Well, the head of the Soviet Navy was a very aggressive and powerful admiral named Gorshkov. I think part of the growth of the Soviet navy can be explained bureaucratically that he would constantly make the comparisons with our navy and saying you know, we are really not a great power unless we can project our power through naval vessels. But I think partly it was beyond that it was the general feeling of the politburo that Russian power and prestige is measured in terms of military might. They had to fill all the boxes of military capabilities.

Q: Well from what you said before it is true. I mean without the military might, the ideology, the system had no buyers.

ZIMMERMANN: That's right, no buyers. The Soviets won the allegiance and their links with countries of the third world through their military assistance program. It wasn't through ideology. It was because they were prepared to help countries like Somalia and Ethiopia and Guinea and Mali and so forth arming themselves. That was essentially how they did it.

Q: What was your particular function as deputy head of the political section?

ZIMMERMANN: I was in charge of reporting on foreign policy, dealing with foreign policy issues. We had two. We had Mark Garrison who was head of the section, and then we had myself in charge of foreign policy issues, and Marty Wenick who was in charge of, and later Mel Levitsky, who were in charge of internal affairs.

Q: I would imagine that foreign affairs in a way, could almost be dealt with rather easily. You had lousy connections with the foreign ministry. They certainly weren't going to sit down and tell you the scoop. There was nowhere to go. I mean the newspapers would only contain sort of the canned things. How did you work that?

ZIMMERMANN: Well, Kremlinology is a limited art but it is an art. You can get a sense of how a country is operating and what its approaches are and what it is likely to be able to accept and what it is prepared to reject by reading the press, by talking to the limited contacts you have in the foreign office or in the USA institute which had in it some people who were relatively free from total KGB control.

Q: Arbatov?

ZIMMERMANN: Arbatov's Institute. Although it was very heavily propagandist and had a very heavy dose of the Soviet line whenever you went over there. So, you got maybe 10% more out of being there and talking to them than you would get sitting back in Washington reading the Soviet press, but 10% more could be critical.

Q: One of the things that is often overlooked particularly in these days of tight budgets and talking about do we need embassies and all, there is a tendency to think that our diplomats do nothing but report like reporters and say you can see it on TV. I mean there is the other side of conveying information, talking which maybe in the Soviet Union isn't as important. Could you talk a bit about that side.

ZIMMERMANN: Yes. I mean we had a series of great ambassadors in the Soviet Union during the Cold war period. I think by far the best and this may come as a surprise to you was Tommy Thompson. I never worked with him, but this was a man who was twice ambassador to the Soviet Union. He spent many years there, and managed to adhere really through the pores a really fine sense of how the Russians would behave at any given situation. He was able to use that knowledge probably to save the possibility of a major conflict between the United States and the Soviet Union in the Cuban missile crisis.

Q: And he happened to be there and available.

ZIMMERMANN: He was actually in Washington in 1962. Kennedy brought him into the Excon, this small group of people that were working. Everything Thompson said turned out to be right. Thompson said, "If you put a blockade outside Cuba, the Russian ships will turn back because they are so secretive that they don't want to be searched." We did, and they did. He was right on that. He said, "Khrushchev will not agree to take the missiles out unless you make some sort of agreement on taking our missiles out of Turkey." And he was right on that. Thompson would not have had that seat of the pants knowledge had he not spent all those years in the Soviet Union. I think it is a perfect example of how on the job work and training in a man who is intuitively brilliant as Tommy Thompson was, could produce enormous dividends for our national security.

Q: Absolutely. I think it is one of the great moments of the foreign service at that time because the stakes were immense.

ZIMMERMANN: You know, curiously enough, I 'd conducted, both times I was in Moscow I would conduct a kind of an informal poll of Soviets who were in the foreign policy field. I would ask them who was the best American ambassador we have had. Thompson would get their vote about 70% of the time. It is interesting. I mean here is a man who understood them very well, and who was able to defeat them in the Cuban missile crisis, and at the same time earned their respect.

Q: Well also too in a way, a professional like that saved the professionals on both sides from their political masters who do stupid things.

ZIMMERMANN: That's true and it is even more true, or it is at least as true in countries where an ambassador has more opportunities to move around and get to know people because there is no substitute for having somebody who is there every day who is getting the feel of the place and who is therefore able to give you a kind of a continuous and reflected view of what is going on and what is likely to happen. You can't do that by jetting back and forth at a high level.

Q: Or by the telephone.

ZIMMERMANN: By the telephone or by sitting in Washington and reading the cables and intelligence reports. You have to have somebody there. It is an important country. You'd be crazy not to be represented by a smart, professional ambassador who can give you these kinds of insights in a unique way that are not available any other way.

Q: Well when you arrived there, you arrived in July, '73, and we had a bad little war in the October war in '73. How did that play in Moscow?

ZIMMERMANN: It was, well, you saw at our level, I mean the embassy level, we saw very little of what was going on because Kissinger came over almost immediately. I guess, the war had ended, so then it was a question of what would happen next. Kissinger came over and had high level meetings with Brezhnev and company. I don't recall that anyone in the embassy was even in those meetings. It is conceivable that Spike Dubs, who was still charge, was, I am not sure whether he was in or not, but I tend to think not. So, we were not really in the loop. I mean this was above the level at which Kissinger who as you know was very secretive with high level stuff, was prepared to engage us. There was one trip. You probably know this story. This is before I got there in 1972. I think it was '72 when Kissinger made one of his trips to prepare the Nixon summit in Moscow. He didn't even tell the American ambassador that he was there. The American ambassador found out only later that Kissinger had been in town.

Q: I heard that, yes. Incredible.

ZIMMERMANN: That is a wonderful way to undercut any usefulness that an ambassador can have for you.

Q: Well, looking at the foreign affairs side, what was your reading on the relationship during this '73 to '75 time between the Soviets and Castro?

ZIMMERMANN: It was something we rarely saw. I mean it was intended to be quite a quiet period in our relations with Cuba and the Soviet relations with Cuba. I don't recall that it was a big issue at all. In fact, I don't recall a single incident that came up. Of course, we knew that they were a major supplier of the Cubans, that it was a major drain on their own resources. It was the only thing that was keeping the Cubans afloat. We knew all that. I don't remember there was any particular incident or any particular crisis that got anybody's attention.

Q: One of the main rationales of our opening to China during this period was this is the so called China card. That by having relations with China, it meant that the Soviets could no longer rely on the United States and the Chinese being at dagger points, but by having a friendship there, it put extra pressure on the Soviets. Were we seeing that as a, how did we see that?

ZIMMERMANN: Oh I think that's right. I think that is an accurate description of what happened. In Moscow, there was an enormous Chinese embassy in Moscow, enormous, bigger than ours, or nearly as big. The Chinese were all over town spreading the nastiest rumors about the Soviets, usually not true, but they were tremendous sources of very negative disinformation about the Soviets. A very hostile relationship.

Q: Was this a continuing basis?

ZIMMERMANN: Yes, constantly. They were very wary of us, and it was only, I think I only once got invited to the Chinese embassy for a meal. They were suspicious of us. The real stuff that was going on between China and the United States was going on between Beijing and Washington. It wasn't going to be going on in Moscow in any case. Stoessel himself had actually played a role in the rapprochement with China. When he was ambassador to Poland, he was involved in some early negotiations with the Chinese, so you would have thought he might have been a person that the Chinese would cultivate in Moscow, but they didn't. So we didn't see it, but I thought that it was a brilliant coup for Nixon and Kissinger to do. I think it really did create some tension with the Soviets, make more incentives for the Soviets to keep a closer relationship with us. I think it very definitely helped out, had that effect.

Q: Did you find any of your Soviet contacts interested in what were we doing with the Chinese?

ZIMMERMANN: Oh, yes. There were a lot of questions about that particularly from the USA institute which had a kind of a license to ask you what was going on.

Q: Were you well informed about relations between the United States...

ZIMMERMANN: No, not particularly. Certainly we were not involved in any of the high level exchanges.

Q: What was life like for you and Teeny and the children in the Soviet Union?

ZIMMERMANN: It wasn't particularly pleasant. We lived in an enormous apartment block. I think there were 5,000 people, maybe a couple of hundred of whom were diplomats and journalists. The rest were Russians. Our kids the first year went to a Russian school which was very stressful and difficult for them, but there were some very good experiences. The Russian children were quite nice to them. The school itself bent over backwards to make sure they were happy because it obviously was a prestige item for the school to have some foreign children. There were only two or three other foreign children in the whole school. But you can't say there was very much hospitality there. You were in an atmosphere of mistrust. You couldn't be sure that even the friendly people were not being sent across your path as police spies and so forth. So, even a weekend away from Moscow or a vacation in the Soviet Union was not a vacation in any real sense of the word. The contacts, as I said, were very limited and quite stilted. There was still a great excitement that came from being in the center of our foreign policy problem. There we were; we were ground zero, and that was fascinating. Very hard for wives, I think. Most of them were not able to work in the embassy. Later on that changed. In my second tour, any wife who wanted to work, could.

Q: Well did you find this causing breakups of marriages and things of this nature?

ZIMMERMANN: I don't think more than usual in the foreign service. I could be wrong about that. I have never seen statistics. I don't know what happened after Moscow assignment. I suppose a breakup would usually occur after. But I mean there certainly were some, and it was no doubt at all a major test of a marriage. If a marriage was fragile to begin with, the Moscow experience would probably blow it apart. But if it was strong or was potentially strong, the Moscow experience could actually strengthen it even further I think.

Q: Were you aware of the infrared or whatever the intelligence test. Could you talk about that?

ZIMMERMANN: Oh yes. That happened while we were there, I mean one of the times. It was very scary because you didn't know what it was, what they were doing it for, if they were doing it on purpose and what the effects would be. I am still not at all sure that the study that was done after that, I think by Johns Hopkins, was an accurate representation. The Moscow rumor mill among people who served there in the days of the radiation has it that a disproportion of people died with cancer and other diseases that could have been caused by the radiation in Moscow and particularly in the buildings that were radiated than other foreign service posts. The Johns Hopkins study said that isn't true, there is no disproportion. You will not find very many people who served in those days that believed the study.

Q: I have heard many bitter comments about it and also how the State Department responded initially by not informing.

ZIMMERMANN: Yes. Walter Stoessel died of some sort of Leukemic disease. I have heard various stories about what it was. There was one story that there was radiation that leaked from our own communications office which was just above, on the floor above his office. That may have caused radiation that weakened his health. Other stories are the Soviets were targeting. It doesn't seem credible to me that the Soviets would have purposely tried to incapacitate or kill American diplomats by radiation. It is perfectly logical for me to believe that there were mistakes or that there was just a shoddy discipline of some sort that allowed these waves to penetrate. They may have been surveillance devices that went, that had these side effects. I can't understand the feeling that it would be in the Soviet interest to kill American diplomats by this way.

Q: It doesn't make sense. I mean you know the one place where looking at the Soviet conduct, they knew who our CIA people were, not only in the Soviet Union but also abroad in other posts. We didn't kill each other's chiefs of station. I mean if they were going to do that. But were you aware of the radiation when you arrived there?

ZIMMERMANN: I am trying to remember the time sequence. I am afraid I don't remember it. I simply remember we were told at some point there was radiation, and it hit the building. I lived in the embassy building which was where the radiation occurred. And we were told not to worry, that this was a very low level of power and way below whatever the acceptable limits were. I remember that we made protests to the foreign ministry, and of course they denied everything. They said there is nothing to it. I think there was more of it after I left, and that came back again in the early '80s when I was there. The whole thing came back again.

Q: Did you make any trips throughout the Soviet Union?

ZIMMERMANN: Not a lot because I didn't have a job related reason for doing it since I was doing foreign policy, but I did go to a couple of places. I went to Georgia with Senator Kennedy where we met an up and coming young communist party leader named Shevardnadze. This was 1974. I went to Leningrad, of course, a couple of times. I went to a number of towns around the Moscow area where there were pretty cathedrals or other sort of touristic things to see. I traveled actually more in the '80s when I was DCM and had reason to travel.

Q: Were we looking at the various republics as somehow being a source of weaknesses of the Soviet system at that time?

ZIMMERMANN: I recall believing, and I think I might have even written it in a cable at some point in the '70s that the Soviet Union is very stable, but it has the stability of a catamaran, a bi-hulled boat rather than of a mono hull. A mono hull can sway from side to side; it isn't going to tip over. A catamaran doesn't sway but once it goes, up to a certain point, then it could go all the way over. The Soviet Union was like a catamaran, and the two elements, the two hulls that were unstable were the economy and the nationality issue. And that if you got both of them working together, that is economic crisis and nationality problems, then it could go over. But I saw that as a relatively theoretical concept and Amalrik had already written his book, Will the Soviet Union Survive Until 1984. My answer to that was of course. Well, he only missed it by five years, seven years.

Q: Yes. Well I think this is true of all of us. I have just finished interviewing somebody who was in charge of keeping the Soviets from getting technology transfers. We are talking about 1988, and the Soviet Union was about to fall apart. Yet he had no feeling of the people that they were sort of sticking it to the Soviets just one more thing. This was just a policy. Well, did you develop, I am trying to capture the mood of the Sovietologists, our people there. You got people who won't or can't talk to you. You have a bureaucracy that is stiffing you. You can't travel and all. Was there anything about Russia, the Soviets and all that got people coming, I am talking about our people wanting to go back there and deal with it other than the fact that this happened to be our major problem?

ZIMMERMANN: Well, I think you got a straggling of Soviet experts in the United States who were not only interested in the politics and the foreign policy aspects, who were interested in the entire culture and history and so forth. I guess I would put myself somewhat tentatively in that group. I mean ever since I was in college, I studied Russian history and read Russian literature and. Of course, being in the Soviet Union, there are these wonderful art galleries that you can go to. There is wonderful music which was very easy to go to. I mean you just had to go and get a ticket from the KGB people who ran the ticket office in the embassy. I did quite a lot of that. Teeny was much less interested in that. Of course, there were people in the embassy like Jack Matlock who really were serious experts in Russian culture. Jack had taught Russian literature at Dartmouth for example. He spent a lot of time at the theater. But that was a kind of an interesting sidelight. There was avant garde theater that you could go to. Some of it was a bit radical by regime standards. That was even more true in the '80s than in the '70s. So there was a kind of a feeling that we in Moscow the elect. We were in the most important place in the world for the United States foreign policy. We were being subjected to all kinds of hardship, radiation etc. That in a way made up in terms of psychic satisfaction with a lot of the problems. I emphasize that was not the case with our spouses because they didn't have that kind of psychic satisfaction. They couldn't have it, so it was very difficult.

Q: Some of the people I have talked to served in the Soviet Union talk about going out. These were the ones who were really very good in Russian, to I don't know if I use the right term, to People's lectures.

ZIMMERMANN: Yes, the knowledge society, the Znaniye Society, had these lectures. For some reason, I think it was a mistake, they were open to anybody, so diplomats could go. What these were were propaganda lectures. I went to a number of them. They were quite fascinating, not so much because of the lecture, because the lecture was a propaganda lecture, To tell Russians what they were supposed to think. What was interesting were the questions. Somebody would say if we are so powerful, why can't I get bread? Things like that. That was very interesting, and they made very interesting cables, reports of those lectures because it really was one of the few opportunities you had to learn what was on people's minds really.

MICHAEL G. WYGANT
Moscow (1968-1970)

Michael G. Wygant was born in Newburgh, New York in 1936 and was raised in Montclair, New Jersey. He received a bachelor's degree from Dartmouth college, where he passed the Foreign Service exam during his junior year. He served briefly in the U.S. Army before entering the Foreign Service in 1959. Mr. Wygant's career included positions in Zimbabwe, Togo, Vietnam, and Gambia. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on August 14, 1990.

Q: Then you were assigned first to Russian language training and then to Moscow. You served in Moscow from '68 to '70. Who was the ambassador there?

WYGANT: When we arrived, it was Llewellyn Thompson, who was on his second tour as U.S. Ambassador to the USSR. He left in the middle of our tour and was replaced by Jake Beam. So I worked for two very distinguished Soviet specialists in the U.S. Foreign Service.

Q: Being a non-Soviet specialist, how would you characterize the people in our embassy at that time? I mean, you were sort of an outsider looking at this breed.

WYGANT: To some extent, although I had taken the full year of Russian language training. This had not been the case with my predecessor, who, I believe, had a few months of Russian.

We had of course our ambassador and DCM. We had political and economic counselors. And then within the political section we had a chief of the internal branch and a chief of the external branch. They of course were more senior officers with considerable background in Soviet affairs.

But there was a cadre of about eight or ten of us, as I remember, who were junior to middle ranking political, consular, and economic officers, all of whom had gone through the training at about the same time. As you've suggested, most were firmly committed to Soviet specialization, or at least Eastern European specialization, and so therefore only a few of the political officers were actually specialists in non-Soviet fields. There was another officer who was following Latin America for the first year I was in Moscow, who was basically more of a Latin American specialist than Soviet. We then had two China specialists serving in Moscow, both of whom spoke Chinese and Russian -- you might say they had a foot in both camps. We also had an Arabist who had spent more of his career in the Arab world than in Soviet affairs.

So there were some who had had experience outside of the USSR and Eastern Europe, but basically the cadre of officers who were there, particularly the more senior ones, were Soviet specialists and, I would say without any reservation, some of the finest people I have worked with in the Foreign Service. They were very well motivated, highly trained, and good language officers. At least that generation of Soviet specialists, I think, were some of the best that I've worked with anywhere.

Q: How did they look upon the Soviet Union?

WYGANT: They looked at it, I suppose you could say, in academic terms, trying to understand it, trying to understand what was going on, digging very deeply into the language and the culture.

Some of them were having difficulties with the Soviet administration, because they were getting into areas that the Soviets considered sensitive, particularly the unofficial artists and unofficial entertainers. To some extent they had opportunities to view the samizdat publications, which were considered subversive by Soviet authorities.

Q: This is the unofficial mimeographed publication.

WYGANT: Yes, they were occasionally mimeographed, but in most cases just typed over and over again. This was all of great interest to the U.S. government, but very sensitive as far as the Brezhnev regime was concerned.

Q: This was early Brezhnev.

WYGANT: Yes, quite early Brezhnev. He took over in 1964, so he had been in power for about four years. He was really pretty much at the height of his power at that time, I would say. Brezhnev orchestrated the invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968. And then the Soviets had some very serious confrontations with the Chinese in the spring of 1969. There were some islands in the Ussuri River that the Russians and Chinese fought over, with the loss of many lives.

Q: Ussuri River or something like that.

WYGANT: Yes, let's see, Domansky was the Russian name for the island group. The Chinese also have a name for them, which I've forgotten.

There were a number of troops killed on both sides in that battle. In the late spring of 1969 another embassy officer and I were the first American diplomats allowed to visit Khabarovsk since the Ussuri incident. The Soviets were sensitive about this area and didn't really want Westerners to come in, but they did finally give permission for us to have a look. We didn't see much. The fighting had died down, and Khabarovsk was then a sort of garrison town of Russians in a little corner next to China. But the people we met didn't seem to be too concerned that the Chinese were about to come over the borders.

This was a very turbulent time in China, as you may recall. The Cultural Revolution was going on; Mao was trying to shake the party up and get things moving again to his satisfaction. There were large demonstrations, both in Beijing and in Moscow, against the other side's embassy. In fact one of the things I remember particularly in that spring of 1969 was a major demonstration in front of the Chinese Embassy in Moscow, which we were able to see from the sidelines. It was very highly orchestrated and organized: the slogans were all pre-printed and the workers were bussed in from outer factories.

Q: When I was in Yugoslavia we used to call them "Rent-a-Mob."

WYGANT: Yes, we called them "Rent-a-Crowd." They were told, several blocks away, what they could shout at the Chinese and what they couldn't shout, and they were told what to do. Demonstrators were given bottles of colored ink, and when they got in front of the Chinese Embassy, selected members of the mob threw bottles of colored ink against the walls, which of course made splashes of red, purple, yellow, orange and green, and broke quite a few windows.

It was interesting that the building attacked was a largely unoccupied apartment compound that was on the main street. The actual embassy chancery, where the Chinese diplomats worked was half a block back from the street. The Chinese left this apartment building as is for a good long time, and it became kind of an eyesore. The Soviets were a little embarrassed that this building in the middle of town was looking so crummy. The Chinese said, "Well, if the Russians are this barbaric in the way they deal with foreign diplomats, we'll just leave this as a symbol of our disdain for their behavior."

Q: What was the atmosphere and the impression at the embassy? You had just arrived during the invasion of Czechoslovakia.

WYGANT: We were very concerned, obviously, but I guess the feeling was that, while we would protest and we would denounce the whole concept, we certainly had no intention of intervening directly. I mean, we were opposed to the so-called Brezhnev Doctrine, which said that the fruits of Socialism would have to be protected whenever and wherever, but I think it was pretty clear from the beginning that the United States was not going to oppose actively what the Soviets would do in Czechoslovakia (as we had not actively opposed the invasion of Hungary twelve years earlier). I think the feeling was that, while we could protest what the Soviets were doing and make them uncomfortable, we would not be in a position to use counterforce to try and stop them.

Q: You didn't feel that relations were on the verge of being broken or anything like that?

WYGANT: No, no. I think it was a very tense, difficult period, but it wasn't a comfortable period in general in terms of U.S.-Soviet relations. Later on that same year, Richard Nixon was elected president. He was somebody that the Soviets didn't much care for. They felt that he was a hard-line anti-Communist, and they had been highly critical of him at earlier phases of his U.S. political career.

It was interesting that, after he was elected, while they continued to be highly critical of many U.S. government leaders, including people that he'd appointed, they never attacked Nixon personally. Of course later on, particularly after he began to develop relations with China, the Soviets had quite a different view of Nixon and felt that they had an opportunity to begin some useful negotiations and discussions, and the detente of the early Seventies was born. But that came along after I had left.

Q: Did Llewellyn Thompson and Jake Beam have different styles?

WYGANT: Llewellyn Thompson was one of our most senior Soviet specialists; this was the second time he was ambassador to Moscow. Frankly he would tell us that he was rather disappointed. He felt that he had had an opportunity to come out and try to really get some things going with the Soviets in terms of negotiations over Berlin, in terms of arms negotiations and several other issues that we had on our plates at the time, but he felt that he really didn't have much access and didn't have the opportunity to do the things he'd hoped to do.

Thompson once noted to us toward the end of his two year tour in Moscow that Gus Hall, the leader of the U.S. Communist Party, could come to Moscow and get in to see Brezhnev any time he felt like it, but he, Thompson, had only shaken hands with Brezhnev at a huge New Year's reception which was about the only time he'd had a chance to talk to the Soviet leader.

Q: How about when Beam came, did things...?

WYGANT: Well, Beam also had served previously in Moscow. In fact, interestingly, he was the chargé d'affaires of the U.S. Embassy in 1953 when Stalin died. He had also had a very distinguished career in Eastern European affairs. He had previously been ambassador to Czechoslovakia, and I know he served in Yugoslavia. But I don't think his access particularly improved either. It wasn't really until the China card was played that the Brezhnev government decided that it needed to take another look at relations with the United States, and particularly with President Nixon.

Q: Could you tell me a little about life for a political officer in Moscow and in the Soviet Union?

WYGANT: I think that depended a lot on what you were doing. The officers who were dealing with internal things, particularly those who had some contacts with the unofficial artists and if not the dissident community, at least those who were on the outs with the regime, had a very difficult time because they were constantly being watched. Of course all phones were bugged, but people who were dealing with issues that were sensitive to the Soviets had a much more difficult time.

I was lucky, I suppose, in that the Soviets were not too terribly concerned about the African equation. I was seeing African students, which probably annoyed them. I was seeing some of their academicians and their journalists and commentators, but these were all people who were acceptable to the regime. So, except perhaps for African students, I didn't have contacts with the kinds of people that would get the Soviet system excited about what I was doing.

But, as with everybody else in the embassy, we were very closely watched. We had a policeman outside the door who knew when we were coming and when we were going. We knew that our phones were bugged, our apartments were bugged. It was just a fact of life; you expected that you were going to be watched and under surveillance all the time.

Q: While you were there, what was the Soviet interest in Africa, from your perspective?

WYGANT: I think they saw it as a growth area. Khrushchev had started out talking about countries that followed the non- capitalist path of development, and this was expanded upon by Brezhnev.

There were a half a dozen countries, in the late Sixties, that the Soviets felt had bypassed capitalism. They had basically gone from being colonial to something that was approaching Marxism-Leninism. Guinea was a leader in that category, as was Congo, Brazzaville. I believe Somalia was, at that time, as well as Sudan. Mali fitted the category to some extent. Of course they had enjoyed particularly close relations with Ghana's Kwame Nkrumah, and certainly felt he was moving things in the "correct" direction. But Nkrumah had been overthrown by his conservative military in 1966, and by 1968 the Soviets were definitely on the outs with the Ghanaians.

I think the Soviets saw opportunities for checking Western influence and activity in Africa through the development of regimes which would be favorable to the Soviet Union, favorable to a collectivist approach, and favorable to the kinds of economic and political development you find in the Soviet Union, Cuba, Eastern Europe, and Vietnam.

SOL POLANSKY
Moscow (1968-1971)

Ambassador Polansky was born in New Jersey and raised in New Jersey and California. He was educated at the University of California, Berkeley, and the Russian Institute, New York City. After service in the U.S. Navy, he joined the Department of State in 1952 and was commissioned Foreign Service Officer in 1957. A Russian specialist, he served in Poznan, East and West Berlin, Moscow, Vienna and Sofia, Bulgaria, where he served as United States Ambassador from 1987 to 1990. In his tours at the State Department in Washington, D.C. he dealt primarily with East Europe Affairs. Ambassador Polansky was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1992.

Q: You served in the Soviet Union again from 1968 until 1971. What were you doing there?

POLANSKY: Then I was in charge of the foreign policy or external relations branch of the Political Section.

Q: You must have walked in when all hell was breaking loose with this Czech thing; every country had something to say about it. How was this playing back in the Soviet Union?

POLANSKY: It was a tense and cold period in terms of our relations with the Soviet Union. There was a certain amount of official contact in terms of making representations. There was not any great sense of personal concern. There was concern for what the invasion meant for the lack of development of relations. I don't think anybody was concerned for one's physical being or somehow this meant a heightened possibility of a Soviet move west.

Q: As the officer in charge of Soviet external relations--observing them--what did you do? What were your interests and how did you go about getting information?

POLANSKY: It was essentially the same process of trying to use the Soviet media and press to get some idea of how they were looking at issues plus a lot more contact with Western European embassies, particularly the German, British, and French embassies to try and share ideas and experiences and exchange information. It wasn't until a year after that, that we developed some contact among Soviets themselves that added an additional element to reading the media and listening to the radio and watching television. It was not quite the same thing as an INR analysis of the Soviet media, but there was a lot of that still.

Q: What was the evaluation of Brezhnev at that time?

POLANSKY: We thought he was very much in control and a tough character.

Q: I was wondering if there was the feeling that while Brezhnev was a "tough cookie", Khrushchev was a "loose cannon" and maybe we are better off with a little stability.

POLANSKY: I don't think that was quite the case. We were under the very strong impact of the invasion and what it meant. We didn't think it was going to result in any offensive against Western Europe, but we didn't look on Brezhnev as a stable person in the sense of being able to know that things were under control and that was better than under the Khrushchev era.

Q: This is a little before we opened up to China. How was this observed from your point of view?

POLANSKY: I arrived in Moscow right after the invasion of Czechoslovakia and left the day that Nixon was going to China and must admit, had essentially, no idea that that was going to happen. I did recall at the time, and do recall now, really heard first from a source in the Romanian Embassy that there was a certain amount of travel going on by Kissinger in that part of the world. People at my level queried the Department on it and basically got nothing back.

Q: What were the differences between living in the Moscow in the Fifties and then again in the late Sixties?

POLANSKY: It was different in the sense that we had somewhat better accommodations that we were able to get, not easily, from the Russians. It was all in diplomatic compounds. For us the improvement toward the middle and end of our stay was the opportunity to meet some Russians in what were obviously very controlled, approved situations. It was better than when I was there from 1952 until 1955. That part was an improvement. In terms of traveling, the situation was a little bit better, but again, it was always hard to get away from the office, but there was a fairly travel active program to get and visit different parts of the Soviet Union. The food supply was a little bit better. There were more things to do culturally. It was probably more enjoyable and varied than the first time.

Q: Did you feel the heavy hand of the KGB as far as provocations?

POLANSKY: I don't think so. Again, having had gone through one tour, it was maybe easier to go through it the second time. I really didn't feel it was worse or more intrusive in any sense?

Q: Jake Beam was your Ambassador. You were closer to him. How did he operate?

POLANSKY: He operated pretty much through his DCM, who was Boris Klaussen. I went with Ambassador Beam frequently to the Foreign Ministry when he had protests or other representations to make to the Foreign Ministry and Gromyko. There wasn't an awful lot of preparation between the two of us as to what he was going to do. I went along as note-taker and helped with the translations. He did what he wanted to do. He was a shy, retiring type. It was uncomfortable for him to be on an informal basis with other people. That burden was taken on by Boris Klaussen, who was the main point of contact. He was a different kind of personality. He was easy to work with. Everyone respected Beam, liked his wife very much. She was a very outgoing, no nonsense kind of person.

Q: What was the feeling about Kissinger, the National Security Council, and the Soviets? Did you have a feel that they were playing a different game than what you were?

POLANSKY: I don't think a different game. I mentioned the business about the Romanian contact and Kissinger's travels to China. I don't recall that there was any great feeling that somehow things were being done in the NSC that were a level apart from or in conflict with what we were doing.

Q: You left in 1971 and you went to the Cultural Exchange program for a year.

ANNA ROMANSKI
Guide for "Education USA", USIA Exhibit
USSR (1969)

Born in England, Ms. Romanski was raised in England and in New Jersey. She was educated at Stanford and Yale Universities, as well as Middlebury College, where she studies the Russian language. Joining the State Department in 1974, her assignments both in Washington and abroad were primarily with USIA, serving in Public and cultural Affairs capacities. A speaker of Polish, German and Chinese, she served in Germany, Poland and China. Ms. Romanski was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005.

Q: You were at Yale for what, two years?

ROMANSKI: Two years, but I dropped out in the middle because I became a guide on one of the USIA -- United States Information Agency -- exhibits to the Soviet Union. The topic for our exhibit was Education USA, in Russian it was called national education (narodnye obrazovanie). The program started in December of '69, so I had to drop out of my Master's program at Yale to go to the USSR. I thought it would be worth it and I was right. It was one of the most formative periods of my life.

Q: How did you find it?

ROMANSKI: Oh, it was totally fascinating. The experience probably created as incorrect an image of the Foreign Service as my aunt's description of travel and lots of great parties had, but it was still fascinating. This was the Cold War period. The USIA exhibits traveled around the USSR for the period of a year or two. The itinerary would be divided into a civilized half which would go to Leningrad, Moscow, or other major cities in Russia and then a more ethnic half which would travel to the former republics of the Soviet Union. These republics have now become countries on their own. My half of the exhibit went to Baku, capital of Azerbaijan; Tashkent, capital of Uzbekistan; and Novosibirsk in Russian Siberia. Those struck me as quite exotic locations at the time, and still do. It was very interesting, although tiring, work.

We would travel from city to city. Since it would take some time to ship the exhibit by rail, we would travel within the Soviet Union between exhibit sites by air. That was fascinating as well.

Q: What were your impressions of this, of the Soviet Union and the Soviet people?

ROMANSKI: I really liked the Russians and, for that matter, most of the people we met. We also met some of the other nationalities: Uzbeks and Azerbaijanis, but most of the people that we had contact with were ethnic Russians -- most of whom were friendly. They were very curious about America, because all they had heard was anti-American propaganda and they wanted to know the truth -- or at least another version of it. The exhibits were very popular. We would often be mobbed. We would give out brochures on the exhibit topic. I know what it feels like to be a celebrity since we became near celebrities ourselves. Visitors would get the exhibit brochures and ask the guides to sign them. After a while, one had to refuse to sign because one's hand would get so tired. It was also very monotonous and one could never have a good conversation.

The most interesting part of being a guide would be having discussions on serious topics with a small group of visitors. We were supposed to discuss education, which was the topic of the exhibit, but one couldn't very well refuse to answer non-education-related questions. We talked about anything that they really wanted to know, and they wanted to know a lot. A lot of the questions were personal. My most frequent questions were whether I was married and how I had learned Russian. We would get serious questions about the Vietnam War and what we thought of it. We couldn't really go into politics in great detail -- because the Russians knew so little about what was going on in the United States, so they couldn't ask very specific questions.

Since we were so popular, we would often receive private invitations to go into Soviet homes, which we were allowed to do as long as we were accompanied by another American -- we could never go alone for fear of being compromised. It was very interesting to see how Soviet people lived: most Soviet apartments would be a little bigger than a small office except that they might be divided into two or three rooms. They would always put on a very lavish spread, as much as they could get. Russians are very hospitable. There would always be vodka, of course, and sometimes they would invite friends over. It would never be a huge gathering, because one could only invite people one trusted (not to mention that apartments were small), so it would just be either the immediate family or a few friends. The hosts tended to be people close to my age without kids, but still it was a fascinating glimpse of life behind the Iron Curtain.

Q: Did you feel any intrusion of the KGB or the government at all?

ROMANSKI: Yes. I think we were always being watched. I remember one time I was not feeling well so I was crying in the bathroom of my hotel room. We lived in hotel rooms -- not very comfortable ones. If you ever traveled to the Soviet Union, they had a system of spies right on the floor -- they were called dezhurnye - like door keepers. They were elderly ladies sitting at a desk who held onto the room keys. One wasn't allowed to carry around one's key. Perhaps the excuse might have been so that they could clean your room, but of course it meant that anyone could enter any room at any time. I don't remember that anything was ever taken, but papers were often re-arranged and I'm sure letters were read so one could never write anything very critical. Interesting correspondence might be photocopied -- I doubt mine ever made the grade. In any case, the dezhurnia burst into the room to ask what was wrong. This convinced me that nothing was ever totally private. We had been warned not to talk about anything sensitive in our briefings. It was easy for me to comply as I didn't know any secrets, but we were also not to talk about sensitive or personal matters in the room or on the phone. If we were having some kind of anti-Soviet conversation to perhaps let off steam because the living conditions were not easy, we would always have to hold it while walking outside unless we wanted to risk being PNG'd or becoming a government incident. People were careful. It was only for six months after all and time went by quickly.

I remember one time a KGB agent locked my suitcase, no doubt after having gone through it. The problem was that I had no key for the suitcase so I had to pick the lock. It was really quite inconvenient, but I managed to pick up a new talent, not that I've made a practice of using it.

Ambassador Palmer was born into a Navy family in Michigan. He was raised both in the US and abroad. He was educated at Yale and Kiev University. He became a civil rights activist and entered the Foreign Service in 1964. He served in New Delhi, Moscow, and Belgrade and held an ambassadorship in Hungary. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1997.

Q: This, of course, was still the Johnson Administration. The Nixon Administration got nastier. Well, in '68 whither?

PALMER: I had been fighting and lobbying to get into Soviet affairs. I was selected to go to Garmisch to the Army training program there. As you probably know, for many years two to four Foreign Service officers were selected to go there.

You had to have already advanced Russian language skills and you normally had to have had some other experience with the Soviets. You went there for one year and then you went to Moscow. It was guaranteed that you went first to Garmisch and then to the embassy.

You were trained along with Army officers who were going either as attaches or as intelligence or whatever. There were people there from NSA also being trained. And it was wonderful! It was the greatest program!

Q: Of course, this program was run completely in Russian, wasn't it?

PALMER: Right.

Q: Was it lectures mainly?

PALMER: Lectures by people who were all Russians or Ukrainians or whatever. They were émigrés and had come out, many of them, after the Second World War. Some of them were quite recently defectors. And they taught everything. They taught Soviet economics, Soviet politics, Soviet military stuff.

We were allowed to do a lot of reading, too, on our own in Russian. We were allowed to speak only Russian while we were in the institute. You could speak with your wife otherwise, but in the institute you could only speak Russian. Also as part of the program, we had a long trip to the Soviet Union as a group which was very, very useful.

Q: Was there a Soviet counterpart to this?

PALMER: Not to my knowledge. They trained people as interns in their embassy in Washington, but I don't think there was. Well, there may have been and I just wasn't aware of it. There was at that time already Georgy Arbatov's institute for U.S.-Canadian things and some of their people did train here but it was a little different. That had a more academic flavor, I would say, than what we did. We were really being trained functionally.

Q: What about the military officers who were going there? Was there a difference between the attitude of Foreign Service officers and military officers that was noticeable, or not?

PALMER: Well, I think we had debates; but on the whole, no. A lot of people established strong relations there, inter-service and strongly continuing relations. This kind of joint training together is a really useful thing. It breaks down a lot of barriers. We used to ski together. We traveled together for two and a half months. We lived together in the same compound. I think it was a very good experience in that sense.

Q: Did you find that you were getting a pretty heavy dose of émigré thought?

PALMER: Yes, and we used to have a lot of fights. There was one guy, Yuri Marin, who was there who had come out more recently. He'd jumped off a ship off San Francisco and swum over to another ship. He played the role of the Commie in the institute. The older émigrés used to fight and argue with him, etc. Many of us used to argue with the older émigrés, too.

The older émigrés were always bad-mouthing this guy and saying, "No, no! He really is a commie!"

And all of us were saying, "No, that's preposterous! He defected. He's just been asked by the Army to play this role of the commie so that you have some richness here. After all, we're going to be dealing with communists there." Well, lo and behold, this guy re-defects! (Laughter)

So, he may have been planted. I don't think anyone really knows to this day if he was planted and this whole thing was their penetration of Garmisch. Was this really a very successful KGB operation to spot all of us, to get all of our bios?

We spent hours with him alone one on one. A lot of the work in Garmisch was very individual. It was wonderful to be able to do that, to spend hours talking in Russian about different aspects of Russia. So I spent a lot of time with Yuri, as did many others. He must have known everything about us for what it was worth.

Q: What sort of picture were you getting? We had the Soviet crushing of Prague's movement towards some liberation. This is early Bergen. What sort of feeling did you have about the Soviet Union?

PALMER: Well, I guess that in my own mind, and I guess in the minds of the other Foreign Service officers, in all of our minds it intensified our dislike of communism. We were in Lithuania the morning that Soviet forces invaded the Czech Republic. They had been moving over a period of a day or so through Lithuania into Czechoslovakia.

We were spending time with Lithuanians, talking with them in cafes and restaurants. They were acutely aware of what was going on. A lot of them thought that world war three was breaking out. They thought that the West might react. Also some of them bought the line that was then being distributed. This was that the Germans had actually invaded Czechoslovakia and the Soviet army was moving to meet the Germans. (laughter) This, of course, was complete crap but it was surprising how many people bought that line.

So I think it made many of us really hate the Soviets, hate the government and the system. It certainly did with me. You know, they were going against what was really the great hope of the region.

Q: Is there a difficult problem in going to a place in which you love the people and hate the government? I'm talking about before you went there. How did you feel about this?

PALMER: Right. I was desperate to go there. I had thoroughly enjoyed my student times. The thing I most wanted to do in my life was to spend time there so, no, it didn't change my desire to go at all. If anything, it intensified my desire. I wanted again to be in this environment of dissidence and of people who were fighting against the system. I wanted to try to figure out ways to help them.

Q: You went there in '69...

PALMER: Right. To '71.

Q: What was your immediate job?

PALMER: I first worked in the consular section and that was really, really interesting. Among other things, it allowed me to visit prisons, Americans who were in prison. Traditionally, people coming out of Garmisch had gone into either consular or admin initially.

It was thought of as a year where you continued your language polishing, but also had the time to get out. I, for example, spent a lot of time going to court, to trials just as a way to try to understand the society. I went to a lot of civil trials, and criminal, but not political. Political trials were closed.

Q: Were the civil trials just civil trial or were Americans involved?

PALMER: No, they were just Soviet. There weren't Americans.

Q: What was your impression?

PALMER: Well, it was immensely interesting in that you see a society in a different way through a courtroom. For example, I remember thinking that Russians really weren't so scared of the police or of the judges.

I thought that one of the great stereotypes about the Russians, which is that they 're sheep, was totally wrong. Stalin was right about one thing. He had to kill a huge number of people to control them. These are people who are inherently rebellious and not sheep.

I don't want to go on about that at length, but for me that was a fundamental kind of fact. From that proceeded a whole lot of things that I want to talk more about with you later. These things include what I did when I got more senior in the service, what I'm still doing, and where I think American foreign policy should be going. Still, today, it isn't quite yet there.

Q: Here you'd had "Yale In Jail." What was your impression of the Soviet prison system?

PALMER: I visited a prison. When I was doing the student Garmisch trip, I actually went and I asked our arrangements guide to take me to a prison. We visited about 12 cities, I guess, on our tour. She kept saying, "Next city. Next city." And, of course, she didn't want to show me a jail.

So finally I saw a jail, actually, from the bus when we were touring around. I told her I was sick that afternoon. I went and I got in this prison by fooling the guard at the gate. I went up to what was the administrative block where the head of the prison worked and the guards changed clothes.

I spent almost the whole day talking to the guards going on and off duty before they realized that something was funny. I said I was Czech, that I was a Czech expert on prisons and that I had been authorized by Moscow to be there.

Anyway, my impression from that and from other research on the prison system there is that, in some ways, the Soviet prison system then and up until today, is better than ours. They do a lot of job training or work while you're there. I think that both as punishment and as preparation for getting on, it's psychologically healthier, in some ways, what they do.

Now, there are other aspects of the Soviet prison system which are just truly terrible. These would include the level of food and that kind of stuff, the level of hygiene. And for political prisoners, of course, they shouldn't be there at all. There are some things, though, that are worth studying and registering for American legal practice.

Q: The American prison system is really not very good. It's getting worse.

PALMER: It's terrible. Really terrible. And the recidivism rate is just terrible. Of course, Russian recidivism exists, too; but not as much. It's not as high as it is in the U.S.

Q: In the consular section, what were Americans getting arrested for?

PALMER: Drugs. We had people coming through from Afghanistan through Tashkent and then they'd get caught at Tashkent Airport. There were other miscellaneous things, but drugs was the main one.

Q: How were they treated?

PALMER: Not well. Not well. They had a lot of problems, particularly health problems. But we tried to be helpful to them.

Q: Was there much we could do?

PALMER: We met with them every month. They were brought up to Moscow. We were allowed to carry one box of supplies for them. As a result, we developed the ability to carry extraordinarily heavy boxes. They were absolutely jammed with things that they could trade, like chocolate for eggs, coffee.

So actually, I think that we maybe saved some of their lives because this gave them physical possessions that they could trade to get proper medical care. Stuff like that. But they had tuberculosis, they had very bad skin diseases. One of them had a nervous breakdown. It was, you know, not easy for these guys.

Q: How about protection and welfare of U.S. citizens? Did you get involved?

PALMER: Yes, I mean I did all the standard stuff. I did lot of hospital visits, people dying. I had 12 Americans die. At the time, I was responsible for that. And I had a very interesting disinterment case. I had to dig up a body that was buried against the will of the American relatives, buried there in Russia. I had to dig it out, get it shipped back. It was something!

But the most interesting part of my time there was the second year when I worked on internal political affairs and I was allowed to do...and there had been a person who had done this in the embassy in Moscow traditionally and well over half of them had been PNGed and been thrown out...focusing on the dissidents, on the writers, theater directors, painters, the musicians, the Samizdat, the writers for the drawer and all that kind of stuff. The Solzhenitsyn's, etc. And so my second year in Moscow, I did just that. I just focused on that group in the society. My first year, I knew I was going to do that job so I was already beginning to do it even during the first year. I was moving into that, making the connections, taking over the connections my predecessor had that he was passing on to me. So the second year I was really able to function and do good reporting.

Q: One wonders about that looking back on it. I mean we spent a major effort... I mean both the press and the embassy and all... on dealing with the dissidents. Was this, in a way, worth it? Were they really representative of anything?

You know, one could do the same thing, say, in the United States or somewhere; and you could end up with really a very peculiar view of the world, because this is not overly representative.

PALMER: Right. I thought they were the representatives of Russia and that the government was not. It was not legitimate; it wasn't elected. It didn't represent anything. It represented a narrow group of people who had a completely wrong view of history and of the interests of the people. So I thought these were the only people who would speak the truth about what was going on.

I thought that we spent entirely too much time taking seriously what Communist Party officials were saying to us. And this is still true today. I mean I had lunch with George Shultz yesterday. Still people tend to think of what Gorbachev did as opposed to what ordinary Russians did.

So, anyway, not to jump ahead, but yes, I think it's profoundly valuable in societies where dictatorships exist, including in Saudi Arabia today, or China today, or Nigeria today that it is in many ways the most interesting and useful things that an embassy can do. Its an outpost to the people of another country, not to the dictators.

And this is something unique the Foreign Service can do that really no other part of the U.S. can do this in the same way. This is because in most dictatorships, other things are not allowed to function. They're not allowed in very often. Also, our embassies are protected places where you're not worried that you're going to get thrown in jail. The worst that happens is that you get thrown out of the country. You get PNGed for your relationships with these people.

So I would say that this is one of the very most important functions of our embassies in the 40 percent of the world that still remains in dictatorships. Even in transition situations, in unstable transition places like Ukraine or Russia today, it still remains terribly important for the embassy to relate to the opposition and to the dissident voices, to the voices of change, not just to whoever is in power at the moment.

Q: You say most of your predecessors had been persona non grata-ed, PNGed. Here you've spent a hell of a lot of time studying Russian and all of that. And all of a sudden to have the Soviet Union denied you. And once you're PNGed, that's it, you know. You can work around the periphery, but that's it.

I would think that, not only for you, but for anybody else in that job, this would be something that...you're putting your all on the line and it's up to some apparatchik to decide whether you can continue or not. How did this play with you?

PALMER: I think I was so caught up in it that I didn't even think about that. You're absolutely right. Logically, you should and there would be a temptation to trim your sails as a result.

The only thing I can remember trimming my sails about was that a friend of a dissident artist type offered me 10 Kandinsky watercolors, which would today probably be worth about 10 million dollars or something. I don't know, a lot of money. They were beautiful. I love Kandinsky and they were beautiful. But I was not sure whether he was doing this really illegally, in which case I had no problem with it. That is, I would have bought them. Or if it was a set-up to trap me, in which case I would have been kicked out. So I didn't do it.

Others in the embassy actually were doing a lot of this. And journalists, American journalists were doing it. Dusko Doder, who was The Washington Post correspondent, had an immense collection and he got them this way. But I didn't because of that, but I was tempted.

In terms of my work, I don't remember really thinking about this. I just knew it might happen and of course it could happen with no relationship to what you were doing. Very often PNGs took place because we'd kicked some Russian out of here. So then it was just...

Q: ...your turn. (Laughter)

PALMER: And of course, I never served again in Moscow anyway, although I've been back dozens of times already. So in that sense it's future danger.

Q: Can you talk about some of the dissidents that you dealt with and your impression of their role?

PALMER: Well, the hardest core dissidents one couldn't get to because they were in prison. But there were people who were sort of in the middle layer of dissidents, for example theater directors, actors, writers. Their role was to try to work the edges of the system; that is, to sneak into plays at the Taganka and Sovremennik theaters, messages that were not welcomed by the system and could get them into trouble.

So there was this game that was always going on. So they were always pushing the margin and it was interesting to be with them and to be sitting in the audience. I went to 50 plays in a single year. One of the main ways to communicate was through the theater, including classics. Use the classics to do it. So it was fun to be even just a witness and partly to encourage them by your presence.

I don't think one should exaggerate our role then or later in bringing about changes. Yet I do think it is of some assistance to dissidents in these kinds of societies that Americans will come and stand next to them; be in their apartments; bring literature for them; connect them with the outside world; sympathize with them; hug them, you know.

They're very lonely, very threatened, and it's important for them to know that the world appreciates them. They should know that we think they're on the right side of history. Clinton, yesterday, said about Ziang Zemin, "You're on the wrong side of history." I love that phrase. It's one of the few things that I think Clinton has done in this field that I think is a powerful thing.

Q: You know, one thinks of the Soviet Union these days as being a very intense police state yet activities are going on, including your being able to go see people and all this.

PALMER: Well, it was tricky because you never knew. Some of the people you went to see, of course, were reporting and may be full time KGB people. So it was complicated. Then, sometimes you'd go and then the people wouldn't open the door. They had been told, you know, "No more with him." People would call you and say, "We're sorry. We'd love to come tonight for dinner, but we can't." So it was kind of not easy.

I think a lot of us developed techniques that perhaps in the normal world would not have been thought of as sensible. But, for example, one of the best things to do was simply to go to public lectures and listen to the questions that were being asked by ordinary Russians of the lecturer. There was a very elaborate system called the Znaniye Society of public lectures on all sorts of topics, foreign affairs, everything. People would ask really interesting questions and we did a lot of reporting based on what was on the minds of Russian people who went to these lectures.

Ed Hurwitz, who was my boss, and I used to go to railway stations buffets and just sit next to workers. These were really grubby railway stations and ask them, you know, what were they thinking about? They weren't dissidents necessarily, but it was a way of trying to feel what really was going on in the society.

So, I think again, this side of what the Foreign Service can do in these kind of dictatorships is really, really special. It's one reason I would change the way our embassies are organized. I would have two types of embassies: an embassy in a normal place like England or France and an embassy in a dictatorship. I think they should be organized differently, have different resource bases, different objectives.

Q: Was there the problem of being concerned about compromise, provocation, and all of that? Were you ever troubled by the KGB?

PALMER: Well, they did a lot of harassment of one type or another. They broke my windshield. They unplugged the refrigerators in the apartment. They threatened my wife, threatened to murder my wife. They roughed me up. I was on the front page of The New York Times in '70 or '71 because they roughed me up.

Q: What happened?

PALMER: I was coming out of the Taganka Theater which was the big dissident theater. It was a wintry day and three goons came up and started shoving me around. I've had that done to me before in this country, too, by security forces, so I wasn't surprised, particularly.

Q: What about your wife? How did that work?

PALMER: She fought, argued back. She wasn't intimidated. But some awful things happened. For example, Ed Hurwitz's wife was in the car when they broke the windshield and glass went all over and into her scalp. So it wasn't always done nicely. They made a major effort to intimidate us, but I think none of us were shaken off course. The dissidents went through much worse than we did. We knew they weren't going to kill us or it wasn't likely that they were going to kill us.

Q: With the dissidents, for the most part you were not performing the normal information gathering business of finding out what they knew and all of that. It was really more to say, "We're with you." and "Keep up the work." Was it that?

PALMER: Yes, it was certainly that, but it was also very much what was happening in the society. They were great sources of perception about what was happening in the country, honest sources. That was hard to come by. So, I think, because I was in the internal side of the political section and because in Washington there was a lot of interest.

There still is today in what happens inside Russia. That was a valuable part of our reporting and we reported all the time. I reported on these plays. I wrote 50 play reviews. I didn't just go to the play. I wrote the plays up.

And you'd think nobody in Washington would be interested, but we got commendations for all this stuff; conversations with dissidents and all of that stuff. And I think that's true today. You know, in Saudi Arabia (or in China or Nigeria) if you talk to modernizing elements and report that to Washington, it is a valuable source of intelligence or whatever you want to call it, information about what's happening.

Q: I would think that going to a play, despite how good you are in the language... the subtleties of trying to slip something over... obviously these people were trying to slip something over on the goons who were monitoring it... and you coming from outside won't have the context. Were you able to go up to someone and say, "What's this all about?" or something like that?

PALMER: Sometimes, if I didn't understand, I'd ask some old lady who was sitting next to me but usually I knew enough. I knew actors. I knew the directors. I knew what they were trying to do. So, it usually wasn't difficult to understand.

And the audience would react. You know, the audience would laugh or cheer. The audience knew what was going on, too. So you could get indications from the audience. Sometimes people would even see that you were a foreigner and tell you. You know, "Did you understand?" (Laughter) And I often went with friends, with Russian friends and they would help.

Q: How important were the intellectuals there? One knows that in France the intellectuals do have an importance far outweighing, you might say, what the intellectuals would have in the United States or maybe Britain or Germany. What about in the Soviet Union?

PALMER: Well, I'd maybe put it slightly differently. I think that ideology or intellectual context, that the assumptions that people have in their heads, ordinary people have as well as the intellectuals have, determines history. In that sense, in Russia the role of the intellectuals in shaping the assumptions in peoples' heads was very important in determining what was legitimate. This role resulted over time in the revolution that we have seen and the change that took place.

It was this intellectual context changing and coming to fruition. It wasn't Gorbachev standing up and saying, "I want to be a democrat." It was the efforts of hundreds of thousands of people around dinner tables and in newspaper articles; and all the ways that these things happen that change the assumptions in the society about where they're going and where they want to go. And I think in that sense, the intellectuals, theater directors, etc. have been absolutely critical to how we've seen history move in that country.

Q: Were you aware of a disillusionment? You know, we're talking about the railroad workers and others. Did you feel that the communist ideas, the lectures, all this had really taken root? We're talking again about the '69 to '71 period. Did you feel communism had really taken root?

PALMER: No. And this again is something that used to drive me crazy as a student in listening to professors. And it used to drive me crazy about the Foreign Service also. Because it was absolutely clear, if you spent any time with villagers or with workers in railway buffets, they always talked about "we/they."

Who were the "they?" The "they" were the government. The "they" were the party. The "they" were the czars. The "they" were, throughout Russian history, the elites. And they never identified with the elites. Never. There's never been a time in Russian history when they've really felt that those people in the Kremlin were "us."

That is a fundamental truth about the nature of that society and I think of all societies. It was absolutely clear, then, that they were alienated from the system. You'd watch their attitude to cops on the beat, for example.

So, as you'll hear about, not very long after that I started to agitate for quite a radically different approach to seeing the future of that country. It goes back to this rooting, my time as a student, and my time in the embassy where I really thought that to believe that these were sheep or these were people who've always wanted it to be that way or these were people who liked communism. All that was rubbish. It is not true.

Q: Well, I interviewed Ed Hurwitz and he was talking about going to these Znaniye lectures. Could you tell your experiences and what you were gathering, because he said this was really one of the greatest ways of getting the pulse of things? Could you explain more or less the context that they were put in and then what you were getting from them?

PALMER: Absolutely. Well, I'm interested that Ed said that. My memory of what was valuable stands out. What was really valuable was that, of course, you could hear what the party line was on subjects that weren't necessarily always in the press. There was a layer of sensitivity with which they were dealing which was not closed, exactly, but anyway these sessions were a link that you didn't see in the press. So you could learn a little bit more even of the official position on things.

But what was much intensely more interesting was what was on the minds of people as they reacted to this kind of stuff. The example I'm about to give you wasn't the Znaniye Society but it was sort of similar. Ed and I were always looking for notices for these lectures and trying to find some that weren't listed in the papers because they might be more interesting.

There was an apartment building right near the embassy, one of these tall Stalin designed "seven sister" kind of buildings. I saw this notice for a talk and I thought it was Znaniye Society. So I showed up that night, and went in, and they closed the door. It was a small room, and that seemed a little bit unusual to me. Then they started calling the roll and I thought, "Wait a minute!" because at the Znaniye Society lectures they never call the roll. It was just people off the street, usually large. It turned out this was a communist cell group of people who lived in that building, mostly older people.

The reason I'd gone was that the lecturer was a central committee staffer who was lecturing on the power of Western media on the Soviet Union. He lectured for about two hours on the subject. Then there was another two hours worth of questions. Early on in the thing, he asked people what their source of information was, their main sources of information about certain events.

For example, he cited Svetlana Alliluyeva's defection, you know, Stalin's daughter. You know, "How did you learn about this?" He said that the central committee had done surveys of sources of information. He wanted to compare people in that group and how they learned about things, with the survey results.

Well, what was immensely interesting is that the number one source of information for all the people practically in the room and in their surveys was what Russians call spletnya, which is gossip. So then the second question was, "So, where did the gossip come from? What was the source of the gossip?" Well, the main source of the gossip was foreign radio broadcast: Radio Liberty, Voice of America, BBC, and Deutsche Welle.

So we were having an immense impact on that society. They were getting most of their credible information about things, including things going on in their own society, including Party members who were getting most of their credible information from word of mouth that was based on foreign radio broadcast. I wrote a long piece about this.

Q: Fascinating.

PALMER: I tried to memorize the whole four hours and wrote a big thing. Frank Shakespeare who was then head of USIA wrote me a commendation for this long thing I'd done because, of course, it was wonderful for them in reinforcing the importance of their programs.

Q: Well, one almost has the feeling that during those times that Pravda and Izvestia, the two large official newspapers, were read more diligently by foreign embassies and by people trying to pick apart than by a normal Soviet citizen, who would probably turn to the back and look for the sports section or something. Did we give undue attention to the press?

PALMER: Yes, I think so. Much too much. In hindsight, we spent too much time reading it and I did, too. I used to read it also but I think it was... I wouldn't say that we shouldn't have read it. We should have. People in Washington were reading it, too. The embassy's function should have been more distinctly understood as different than that.

You know, we should have glanced at the press, but...Ed was wonderful about this actually. Ed was a really good role model. Ed believed that the important thing was to be in the street and that was right. We should have done even more of that than we did. Embassies in general should do more of it than we do.

Q: Who was the ambassador or ambassadors during the '69 to '71 period?

PALMER: Jacob Beam was the only one.

Q: What was his attitude? How did he operate from your perspective?

PALMER: I hardly ever saw him, I have to say. I was layered and I hardly ever saw him. I really have no idea what his attitude was about this stuff. He was a man of few words; a wonderful man, charming and all that, bright, but hardly ever said anything. I never saw any reporting that he did. I'm sure he did do cables, but I never had access to them. So I had no idea what his views were even, nor did I really care. I don't want to say that but I loved doing what I was doing and I had no interest particularly in anything else.

Q: I always treated the ambassador as like the normal Russian peasant: the Czar of Far Away (and may he stay there!) (Laughter)

Were there any sort of splits within the embassy as far as interpretation of events, whither the Soviet Union and all of that during the '69 to '71 period?

PALMER: I don't remember any big debates. Boris Klosson was the DCM. He was very encouraging of doing internal political reporting. He did some himself, I remember. He did a wonderful long piece about churches. I don't remember any particular debate or any real big difference. I don't think with Ed Hurwitz, for example. I don't recall any big ideological debates.

Q: Well, now we're speaking in 1999 when the whole thing has sort of come apart. Two of the things that one would hear people talking about, but almost on the margins then, but now have become all-important. One was the Soviet economy and the other is the nationalities issue. Did these play much of a part?

PALMER: Yes. We tried to do reporting on the nationalities issues. This issue was the specialty of Fred Barghoon, who was my advisor at Yale. I think many people were aware of the differences there. So we tried but I don't think we did a really good job on that, frankly. I don't think that was a side of the embassy's strength. It was difficult to do. The KGB was particularly sensitive about that and, as I recall, I don't think we did terrific stuff on that. I think we did some but I wouldn't say this was our crowning glory.

Q: Could you get out much into Central Asia and the Caucasus?

PALMER: It was hard. They'd let you go to certain cities. There were certain cities they'd always give travel permission for. And you had to have travel permission. You couldn't leave the city without travel permission. But I got fed up with that, with only being able to go to cities I'd always been going to. I'd been going to them for years, Leningrad, etc.

So I just dug in at one point toward the end of my consular section tour. I dug in and I decided that I was only going to apply for cities they'd never give permission for anybody to go to. So I applied and I think I got 18 turn downs in a row.

As they got up to around 12 or so, I got the embassy to push on the department to start turning down Soviet embassy travel requests and to say it was because I was not being allowed to travel. Finally, they got fed up, the foreign ministry got fed up and said, "Okay, you can go to Tambov," (laughs) which was one of the ones I'd been trying to go to.

Q: Where is Tambov?

PALMER: It's southeast of Moscow. It's part of Russian literature. Chekhov wrote about it. It's a kind of sleepy sort of place. It had been off limits. I went and, of course, the authorities turned out a huge array of people to follow and to spend time with me. I was there for three days and didn't achieve very much, but at least I broke through. (Laughter)

Q: What about the economy? I served five years in Yugoslavia a little earlier and the thing I came back with was a sign saying "Lift ne radi," "The elevator's not working." This was the real Achilles' heel of the whole Soviet system. Were we able to evaluate it properly, do you think?

PALMER: Nationalism.

Q: I was thinking of the economy.

PALMER: Oh, the economy. Sorry, my head was back in this other stuff. No, I think we didn't evaluate it properly. If you look at the CIA analysis year after year, on the whole I think they were much too accepting of the... perhaps because of the lack of any other way of dealing with it ...you know the Soviets always had X percentage of growth a year and they had much too high GNP per capita figures.

The CIA used to do a sort of discount factor on the official statistics. But basically they took them and that was the U.S. government's view. It wasn't just the agency's. It was the inter-agency, intelligence community view. I think many of us thought it was crap.

If you just went around and looked, if you got into places like Tambov, and you looked at what was in the stores; and you looked at what people's per capita income was in terms of their apartments, how they lived, it wasn't anything like what we were being told. This was not a formidable economic engine. So, I think this was another area where we didn't do enough "in the street" comparison with the official reality and come up with our own views.

Q: You had dealt with the Soviet threat from the NATO perspective before you started this Russian training. What was your feeling and maybe within the embassy about the Soviet threat? You'd had the Czech invasion by the Soviet forces. Brezhnev was a fairly formidable character at that point. What was the feeling?

PALMER: I can't really remember what my own personal assumptions were exactly at that time. Because I didn't tend to think about those issues. That wasn't what I was working on in the embassy. It wasn't even my real interest in life. I know it sounds funny, but I can't remember what I thought about them as a threat, a military threat, etc. I'd hate to speculate because I'm not clear in my head what I thought at that time.

Q: Well, it could have been one of those things that was just there. You know, you had other things to think about, and the Soviets are a problem and... How did your wife find living in the Soviet Union as an Indian?

PALMER: She loved it. She loved it. It was a really good experience for her. She managed to attend classes in the medical school there, Second Moscovski Medical Institute. She had a corral in the Lenin Library, the big library downtown. She had colleagues in her field of nutrition and public health, biochemistry. It was helpful that she was seen to be Indian, partly.

She almost got into Lumumba University. She almost got admitted to Lumumba University ...she said that she was married to an embassy officer. They thought it was an Indian Embassy officer. Then, of course, unfortunately, we couldn't carry that all the way. So when they discovered it was an American Embassy officer, they wouldn't let her in at all.

But she was able to do a lot. She liked my work and participated. She enjoyed going to the theater. She had good Russian, too. She has a remarkable gift for languages. It was a wonderful time. We had a lot of great friends in the embassy and in other embassies. I think for many of us looking back in our whole Foreign Service careers, an early Moscow experience is very special.

USIS, Moscow Exhibit
Moscow (1969-1970)

USIA, Assistant Cultural Attaché/ Press Attaché
Moscow (1975-1978)

John Harrod was born in Illinois in 1945, and received his BA from Colgate University. Having entered the Foreign Service in 1969, his positions included Moscow, Kabul, Poznan, Warsaw and Brussels. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on March 1, 1999.

Q: You were dealing with a Moscow exhibit both in Washington and in Moscow. This was from when to when?

HARROD: Well, the exhibit was from June of '69 until maybe July of '70, and it was not Moscow. Moscow was one of them, but these were the large traveling exhibitions that USIA ran for many, many years, and we were in six different cities of the former Soviet Union, so having spent from roughly September of '68 to June of '69 working at the Washington end getting ready for this thing - the exhibit was "Education in the USA," and my job back in Washington had been to sort of get together some educational technology and other things that we would use as display items in the exhibit. And then in June of '69, off I went with the advance party to Leningrad, which was the first of our six cities, and then the exhibit opened, I think, in July of '69, and I spent a year... We were in, if I remember, Leningrad, Moscow, Baku, Tashkent, Novosibirsk, and Kiev, I guess were the six cities, not in that order.

Q: When you were going there with education, one, how were we treating the education problem in the South? Although technically schools were no longer segregated, it was still an uphill battle there. How were we dealing with that?

HARROD: Well, actually, the simple answer is the exhibit itself, in terms of displays, didn't deal very much with it. I think there were some visual displays about integration, but the exhibit was heavy on technology. Essentially we were trying to show the Soviets new ways of learning, including - this is now thirty years ago - things like computer - assisted learning, where students would push buttons for the correct answers and language learning by tape - all these kinds of things. But the real reason for all of those exhibits, no matter what they were called, whether they were education or hand tools, we've had a bunch of them, was simply to give Russians a chance to talk with the young American guides.

Anyway, the Russians would ask guides, well, where do you live in the United States and what's your family like? So it became much more of a give and take about life in the United States than it was the technology. The technology was the introduction, and each of the guides would work on a particular stand in the exhibit and give a little presentation about what it was all about, but usually things shifted gears pretty quickly. I was not a guide. I was given the grandiose title of assistant general services officer, and my job was essentially getting the exhibit put up and taken down and maintained and being interface with the Soviet labor crew and the customs people and stuff like that. Essentially, what USIA had done was ship me off to the Soviet Union for a year to see the country, practice my Russian language and be a sort of resource for the exhibit, and whenever I'd get bored I'd walk out on the floor of the exhibit and pretty quickly people would come over and start asking me questions, and I could do the same guide thing. I must say also I had blinders on in those days, since I had been a summer intern with USIA and had worked in the Office of Soviet and East European Affairs, my assignment was pretty well cooked when I joined the Foreign Service. The people who had encouraged me to take the test knew that I had passed it, and when I was sworn in at USIA, I was already 100 percent sure that I was going to be going to the Soviet Union. We had a panel interview with personnel officers from USIA where they got us in in threes, I think, and sort of said where would you like to go and what would you like to do? And one of them asked me the question "Is there any part of the world you wouldn't want to go to?" the answer, of course, being, "Oh, no, I'll go anywhere." But I said, well, Asia, Africa, and Latin America. And they sort of looked shocked, and the European personnel officer sort of shuffled his papers and said, "Well, Mr. Harrod's been taken care of." So I already knew that I was going to the Soviet Union, and that was kind of, as I say, an investment in my future, by shipping me out there. The Exhibits Program also, to put in a plug for it since we don't have it any more, an awful lot of those young graduate school guides who went out for six-month stints on exhibits later took the Foreign Service Exam and ended up in quite senior positions in the Foreign Service. It was a great training program for future Foreign Service people.

Q: Were there any security problems that came up while you were on this?

HARROD: On the exhibit? Yes. I worked on two exhibits. I worked on another one later and I was familiar with several others, and on virtually every exhibit there were security problems, generally in the sense of the Soviets attempting to compromise some of our young guides, and generally they did. We had to ship a couple of people home from every exhibit that I can remember for having done something they shouldn't have done, usually of a sexual nature. I finally came to the conclusion that we really should have a ringer in each group of guides, somebody that would come out and we'd ship them home a week later to make an example to everybody else, but we actually didn't have to do that; the Soviets kind of did it for us. So yes, we had security problems.

Q: When there were sexual problems, I mean, what was it, because with these guides, even if they took pictures I can't see that it... They're not government employees - well, in a way they were.

HARROD: In a way they were, yes.

Q: But it wouldn't compromise their career; they'd just ask for extra copies.

HARROD: That's what Sukarno, I guess, did at one point. But no, the idea was they would compromise them and then attempt to get them to report what was going on and, you know, feed any information that they could to the Soviets, and it was all the stuff that the security officers tell you can happen, photography through pinholes - it was all very nasty stuff, I must say, and it helped bring me around to the conclusion that at least some people in the Soviet Union were extremely nasty. And an interesting thing is as the exhibit would go from city to city, some of the cities had obviously a much tougher KGB contingent than others. There were certain cities where we would have almost no security problems at all and some where it was a daily struggle to try to keep the goons out. We had other kinds of security problems, in the sense of people who visited our exhibit and asked particularly provocative questions, who were obvious plants, or some innocent people who asked the wrong kinds of questions who literally would get beat up in the parking lot outside the exhibit. We saw lots of fairly nasty things, which helped shape my view of the former Soviet Union.

Q: What was your impression of the impression that these young guides got.

HARROD: Most of them, as young graduate student types, would tend, I think, to fall into the sort of liberal to leftist group, and by the time they would finish their six months in the Soviet Union, we tended to put them into two groups - the radical group, which wanted to nuke the place, and the moderates, who simply wanted to build a large wall around it and leave it alone for a hundred years and then look over the top and see what was going on. Yes, it had a big impact on most of them, and as I say, some of them who probably hadn't ever thought about working for the government then took the Foreign Service Exam and ended up being very good Foreign Service officers with the Department or the USIA. So it did have a big impact on them.

It also, I think, had another impact on them, and certainly on me. All my education had been Russian area studies - Russian, Russian, Russian. Being on an exhibit that goes to places like Uzbekistan and Azerbaijan - even the Ukraine - I think really gave me the sense that this is not Russia - this is a country that is made up of lots of different groups, and I think it planted the seed in me way back there in 1970 that the Soviet Union's nationality problems would eventually be its undoing. I thought it would take 50 or 100 years, but I became much more interested in the nationality and ethnic issues in the Soviet Union by virtue of having spent time on that exhibit, where a lot of my Foreign Service colleagues who spent all their time in Moscow were still Russian-centric. They still looked at it through the Russian prism. I began not to. I began to look at it in other ways.

Q: Our educational system - I mean, you'd gone through it, I mean the university at Grinnell and Colgate and Georgetown was very Russian-centered.

HARROD: Very much.

Q: I mean, there just really wasn't any way of doing the Caucasus or Central Asia or something like that.

HARROD: No.

Q: Or the Ukraine, which is as big as France.

HARROD: No, that was something that I think was a big failing of our system. We tended to be just interested in the Russian part of it. Later when I came back to Washington, I found there was a network of academics back here, many of them affiliated with the Woodrow Wilson Center, who did specialize in ethnic issues, and I began to go to some of their sessions. But I think way back in '70 was when I first got this perception that this country is a lot more varied.

I remember going to Estonia. After our first exhibit city we had a week off. Usually between cities we had a week or so off while the stuff was being shipped to the next place. Some of us went to Tallinn, the capital of Estonia, and this is July or August of '69, and I remember seeing something scrawled on a wall in downtown Tallinn in Estonia, and by some discreet inquiries with Estonians I could figure out what the words meant, and it meant "The Russians have stolen our country." And then I went back a year later to Tallinn, and the same thing was still in faded chalk on the wall because, clearly, the Russians didn't understand what it meant because they never bothered to learn the local language, but there was this anti-Russian sentiment, which I had never appreciated as a graduate student or even as an undergraduate because everything I was getting was the Russian version.

Q: What about as the assistant general services officer, what about dealing with the Soviets on, you know, a working basis, getting things done and all? How did you find that?

HARROD: Depends on who they were. We were escorted everywhere we went, all around the Soviet Union, by a crew of people from the so-called All-Union Chamber of Commerce, which was the outfit that USIA had signed contracts with. They were supposed to be our counterparts and our interface with local authorities wherever we went, and they would pick up some locals from whatever city we were in, but the same crew went with us, and they were all basically goons from Moscow. They could be reasonable if you're working with them. Sometimes the customs people could be extremely difficult. I spent a lot of time working with Soviet laborers because we would hire them to help put up the exhibit, which did a couple of things. I began to see what ordinary Soviets were like, and I learned to swear in Russian, which is a talent that became useful later in life. But it was an interesting experience, I must say.

Q: Did you find the system works, I mean as far as getting laborers to do things, or get things from hither to yon and all that?

HARROD: Well, it's a command system. If we wanted 12 laborers, they would give us 12 laborers. Now whether the laborers could do anything was another question. I remember one case where we were trying to open a large shipping container and there were 12 laborers and 11 of them were standing around watching and one guy was hitting a recalcitrant bolt with a hammer. And one of the Russian laborers said to me, "This is the way we do things here - 11 people watch and one guy beats on it with a hammer." And you know, that's the way the system was. It was a command system. It didn't work. Some of the people were okay, and some of them were nothing but police agents. But it was an eye-opener.

Q: Did you find any interest in the theme itself, education?

HARROD: Among professionals certainly. I mean, what ever city we were in we would get visits from groups of teachers and educators, and we had a library with the exhibit that contained books in English on education, and a lot of people who could speak English would come in and utilize it. Yes, there was some professional interest. With every exhibit there was some of that, and what we always tried to do was have a sort of semi-professional component and then have a sort of mass appeal side of things, no matter what the exhibit was. The other one that I worked on for more than a year later on was about housing, "Technology and the American Home." Then again, a lot of it was mass appeal. Electronic garage doors. Whoopee. If you're a Russian, you've never seen one, but in every city we went to we'd also try to organize a seminar and bring in an American expert or two or three on a subject like historic preservation or building in seismic areas and get together with Soviet professionals in that area and have a real serious discussion.

Q: How about any of the areas you went to, were there any problems, stories, or anything else that you think of?

HARROD: The first time around, in that '69-70 period on the exhibit, Novosibirsk, out in Siberia, we had some particular security problems that I probably don't want to go into, but I mean it was during Vietnam, and it was a difficult time, and people were out to get us. Same in Tashkent. I remember being in Baku and having a different feel about Baku, and that was partly because there was a new Communist Party boss who had just taken over in Azerbaijan and he was trying to thumb his nose at Moscow, so they were being nicer to us there than they were somewhere else, and I went back to Baku on another exhibit in '75, and it was even more the case then. I mean, it was a very sharp contrast, and that's when you begin to see that this isn't one country; this is a lot of little satrapies connected to Moscow. But there were plenty of security problems. 1970 was, again, the height of the Vietnam situation, and it was a little bit difficult at times, but a fantastic experience. I mean, one thing that the Foreign Service didn't do in those days was get you out of Moscow or Leningrad. There were travel restrictions. If you were assigned to the embassy or the consulate you were pretty much stuck, whereas the program I was on, I got to see a lot of the real Soviet Union.

Q: Were there people who were trying to come to the exhibit to sort of vent their dislike of the system and all that, you know, Soviets who were fed up with things?

HARROD: A few, a few. Some of them, as I said, got beat up in the parking lot outside the exhibit, and some would come and try to make a contact with an American and try to talk to them afterwards, particularly, I remember, in Leningrad, which was sort of an intellectual center of the Soviet Union, there were a number of quasi-dissidents who kind of sidled up to us as the Americans in town and would try to see us after hours and make contacts. There was a bit of that, less so if you were in a place like Tashkent or Baku, where there was less of an intellectual opposition network. There was some of that in Novosibirsk, and I alluded to security problems we had in Novosibirsk, and some of it was connected with the fact that there were possibly dissident-possibly provocateur types out there who were trying to make contact with us.

Q: The exhibit would shut down in the evening, I supposed, at a certain time. Did you have problems? I mean, was it sort of your responsibility or part of your responsibility to make sure that the guides didn't stray too far off the ranch?

HARROD: It wasn't specifically my responsibility. We tried. Some of the guides would make contacts and go out in the evening and go drinking and have social lives with Soviets if they could. A lot of times people were just too pooped. I mean, the exhibit would start at 10 o'clock in the morning and go to seven o'clock at night, and by the time you ate dinner there wasn't a whole lot of that. We had one day off a week, and a lot of times the Soviets would try to organize activities for us on the day off - you know, go visit a collective farm or whatever, largely to keep track of us, I suspect, and keep us busy. But you know, some of the security problems we might have had had to do with people making the wrong kind of contacts after hours, but there wasn't a whole lot of that. I remember one person who had a little too much to drink and fell down in the gutter and broke her arm. That was a medical problem then.

Q: Did you have much to do with the embassy?

HARROD: Some, with the USIA Press and Cultural Section in Moscow. We'd make weekly courier runs up to Moscow to pick up the mail and get a few things from the commissary and then fly back to wherever we were. And for the opening of the exhibit in each city that we were in, somebody from the embassy, whether it's the ambassador or the press and cultural counselor or somebody, would come out and cut the ribbon. So we had sort of contact, but not a lot of it. And when the exhibit was in Moscow, which it was for one of those periods, then we were living at a hotel not too far from the embassy and would go over there and use the snack bar, and I remember having Thanksgiving dinner at somebody's apartment.

Q: What, during this essentially '69-70 period you were with this exhibit, what as you saw it was the state of relations between the Soviet Union and the United States?

HARROD: Not very good at that particular time. '69-70 was a rather tough period because of Vietnam largely. Relations were not good. Being an exhibit we were a little bit exempt from that. People would ask us, you know, difficult questions about relations, but because we were not official representatives of the embassy, per se, they probably cut us a little more slack. But it was not a particularly good period, particularly when we would do things like bomb Haiphong Harbor and a Russian ship might sustain a little bit of damage, then people would get on our case. So it was a little bit tense. When I was back on the other exhibit that I worked on in '75, that was a period of the Apollo-Soyuz link-up, and relations were a lot better then.

Q: You came back from this with, I assume, even greater fluency in Russian by this time, didn't you?

HARROD: Well, that depends on whom you ask. I thought I did, but then I came back and took a test at the Foreign Service Institute, and the old émigré instructor who was testing me didn't seem to like the fact that I'd learned a lot of Soviet slang, and the contemporary terms for some things that she was still using the old pre-Revolutionary terms for, so I didn't test out a whole lot better in Russian when I got back, but that was because of who did the testing. I was a lot more fluent than I had been when I left.

Q: Yes, well, then towards the end of '76 you moved to another job?

HARROD: End of April in '76 I came back. The exhibit ended. I came back to Moscow, and for the next year and three or four months, until the summer of '77, I was officially assistant information officer, which was a double-headed job. I sort of backed up the information officer on some of the press work, and I also was in charge of the exhibits program, if you will, from the Moscow end. I helped negotiate two agreements with the Soviets on subsequent exhibits, including a bicentennial one that we had, and that was essentially what I did until the summer of '77.

Q: Who was the information officer there?

HARROD: It was Gil Callaway, who is still a good friend. I just talked to him on the phone the other day.

Q: Where is he now?

HARROD: He's up in Chevy Chase, somebody you might want to talk to: Gilbert Callaway.

Q: How did you find, at the heart of it, our information program ran, looking at it from the embassy point of view?

HARROD: Well, looking at it from the embassy point of view, at that stage, our information program was Amerika Magazine, the Voice of America, and press releases and the daily news bulletin. Because of the nature of the beast at the time, there wasn't a whole lot you could do outside of Moscow, which was one of the things I'd been trying to do on this exhibit, take our presence to places where we hadn't been. What I discovered in practice, both as AIO and later when I succeeded Gil as the press attaché/information officer, was that so much of the information work in Moscow was taken up essentially with press reaction to the Western press on crisis situations, of which there was a steady stream. So you really got tied up in working what Jamie Rubin's doing over here at the State Department these days, responding to whatever the issue of the day was. It was great training for somebody to be a press officer, quite frankly, but in terms of a coordinated information program, that was really the people back in Washington doing the Amerika Illustrated and Voice of America and stuff like that. We didn't have much chance to do a lot of that in Moscow.

Q: Were you able to have contact with sort of the cultural world or the media world? You know, you do in other places.

HARROD: Some. There was some contact with the Soviet media, quote-unquote, because that was part of the job. I got to know, meet - I wouldn't say know but I got to meet - the editors of most of the major newspapers, and I had some contact with cultural people, depending on the issue we were working. But at the time security was pretty tight in Moscow, and you kind of reached the conclusion that the people who were free to deal with you were not necessarily the people that you wanted to deal with. And a couple of times I had to curtail developing relationships with people that I actually liked because I was afraid I'd get them into trouble. We lived, as everybody else did, in guarded compounds, where there were police all around the compound, and in fact, unless I miss my guess, Anatoly Sharansky was arrested leaving the apartment of one of the embassy officers who lived in the same building that I was in. So it was kind of difficult to have any normal relationship with people. I had some contact with them, particularly later on when I was information officer and we put on an exhibit of Ansel Adams' photographs from Moscow, which was the first time Ansel Adams' work had ever been exhibited in Moscow. And we were essentially trying to make the point that photography is something more than photojournalism, which is what the Russians tended to view it as, and working with a Soviet TV personality who was also an author and a naturalist. He was sort of their version of Marlon Perkins (if you remember Marlon Perkins, the zoo guy from the old television show). He cosponsored the exhibit with us, and we put it on, and we couldn't get Ansel Adams to come out because his health wouldn't do it, but he taped a message for us. It was a good experience, and I met a lot of artists (quote) through that exhibit, but again, under carefully controlled circumstances. You didn't necessarily invite them over to your house or go out drinking with them because it might get them into trouble.

Q: How would you describe the mood of the embassy and how it looked at the Soviet Union in this, what, '76-77 period?

HARROD: Well, it was an interesting period. We had one administration, the Ford administration, going out. We had a new administration coming in at the beginning of '77. Stoessel, who was a very good ambassador whom I greatly respected, left. He was replaced by Mac Toon, who was also a very good ambassador whom I also respected and had a lot of fun with. It was a time of human rights. The Carter administration brought in the human rights issue, which upset the Soviets greatly. There were a number of these sort of crises, whether they were local Moscow crises or had broader implications, that came up consistently throughout this period. So we were always reacting to something. In fact, at the time we had a policy that the embassy spokesman, which was me, would not be identified by name, because they were afraid if somebody's name was associated with all these critical remarks about the Soviet Union, that person might find his windshield smashed or his tires slashed, so at one point when Hodding Carter and Cy Vance were out there, we delivered an official protest to the Soviet Foreign Ministry about interfering with Western news transmissions, and I did a briefing with Hodding. And the traveling press wanted to use my name, and I said, "I'm sorry, but our practice out here is we don't do this." I think it was Dick Valeriani from NBC who said, "So we can't use your name in the interests of press freedom here, right?" But that was our policy.

But as I was sort of thinking to myself about what went on during that time, it was kind of a steady stream of these little crises. When Toon came out, at the end of '76, on a recess appointment from the Ford administration, nobody was really sure how long he would stay as ambassador - new President gets elected, what? But we had a visit by Secretary Vance in '77. The new administration had hardly got its feet wet and Vance and Hodding Carter came out, and

I guess Toon kind of predicted to them how the Soviets would react to the Carter administration's new proposals to radically reduce nuclear weapons, and I guess Toon was right, and they kept him on. Toon was a marvelous ambassador to work for as press attaché, because his first reaction was to comment. Stoessel, being a good career diplomat, his first reaction was to not comment, whereas Toon led with his mouth.

I hope I'm not telling tales out of school here, but when Toon arrived as ambassador, I don't even think he'd been officially accredited yet, and he did the first of the traditional weekly background briefings. The American ambassador every week would meet with the Western press on Friday on no attribution, "senior Western official" or something, and I think Toon's first briefing one of the correspondents, David Willis from The Christian Science Monitor, asked him what he thought his role was as the new American ambassador, and I believe, if I'm not misquoting Ambassador Toon, he said something like, well, he thought his role was to teach the Russians how to act like a great power, and not like some two-bit banana republic, which got people to sit up and take notice. And Mac tended to react that way, and he was a pleasure to be the press spokesman for, I must say.

Q: How did the embassy - I assume you're talking to your colleagues - view the Carter administration? In a way, you were watching what they were saying on the campaign trail, and this is all a new, unknown thing, and campaign promises and statements come out, and these things sort of dissipate after the election, when they have responsibility, but can you give a feel for how you all kind of felt about it?

HARROD: Well, I remember how I felt, and I think I'm not stretching it to say that at least some of my colleagues felt the same way. There were two things that struck us immediately with the new administration. One was the emphasis on human rights, which I think we - while we felt deep in our hearts that this was the right thing to do - also felt that it was going to piss off the Soviets no end and would lead to all sorts of tensions in the relationship. The other, interestingly enough, was the amazing contrast between Cy Vance and Hodding Carter, with whom I worked quite closely, and their predecessors, namely Henry Kissinger. Kissinger was known for being imperious - brilliant, but imperious. When Vance came out on his very first visit to Moscow in that beginning of '77 - I believe he arrived on a Sunday, and we, of course, were all at work in the embassy on Sunday getting ready for the Secretary, and the Secretary of State actually came around through the embassy in his cardigan sweater saying hello to everybody, patting them on the back, and thanking them and apologizing for the fact that they had to be in working on Sunday. And we all sort of looked at ourselves and said, my God, he's a nice guy! And we all wanted to work hard for a nice guy. I think we all had a feeling that we were willing to go the extra mile for this guy because he was treating us like human beings rather than bossing us around. I remember one of the visits that Vance made to Moscow - I don't think it was the first one; it might have been a later one - where I was waiting with Hodding Carter at the ambassador's residence to go back to the hotel where there was to be a press briefing. We were waiting for Vance to get back from a meeting he was having with Gromyko or somebody, and then we were going to go to the hotel and brief. And Vance came back and went in with the ambassador and Hodding to another room to have a drink and talk about what they were going to say, and I'm waiting out in the hall, and the ambassador came out and said, "Why don't you come on in and join us." And I said, "Oh, no, no, no. I'm just waiting. When Hodding comes out, we're off to the hotel." The ambassador went back in and said something, and the Secretary of State got out of his chair, came out in the hall and said, "Jack, come on in and sit down with us." And you say "Yes, Sir," and you do. That was another reaction that we had, that these were decent folks. That doesn't always make a good administration, but at least they were nice people.

Q: Well, I'm not sure if this first visit was the one, but as I recall, Vance came out very early on with a-

HARROD: It was a radical new proposal.

Q: -radical new proposal where there really hadn't been much homework or preparation for, and frankly came back with a pie in his face.

HARROD: And that's, as I said earlier, I think Ambassador Toon, who was the Ford administration recess appointee, I think - I'm fairly sure that what Ambassador Toon did was look at the proposals they brought out with them and said the Russians are going to laugh you right out of the room, which, in fact, is exactly what the Russians did, and sent them scurrying back to Washington with a sort of "Are you guys crazy? You know, we've spent how many years working on one track, and all of a sudden you come out and switch signals on us." So that was an educational experience, I think, for Vance and his people.

Q: One does have the feeling that the Carter administration had, you know, good ideas but not necessarily well thought-out ideas, and there was a very long learning curve, you might say, in this.

HARROD: Possibly, although my experience, perhaps like yours, is that each new administration that comes in tends to follow - even if it's the same party - but each new administration comes in with the basic bureaucratic premise that first prove your predecessors were idiots. So they come in, they don't want to listen to anything anybody has to say, and they learn, slowly but surely, that you can do some things, you can't do others. The Carter people may have had a more radical change with the preceding administration in some ways. I don't think their learning curve was any longer than anybody else's, frankly.

Q: Did you have any concern about, I think, Carter - and I'm not trying to pick on Carter, I'm just trying to get your reaction - that Carter came in with a basic, almost Christian, idea that if you're good to your neighbor and all that they'll be good to you, and let's not be confrontational and let's try to work this out.

HARROD: For a guy who didn't want to be confrontational, his human rights policy was a thumb right in the Soviets' eye.

Q: I was over in Korea at the time, and this human rights policy did not sit very well with Park Chung Hee.

HARROD: Oh, I can imagine. It didn't sit very well with the Soviets, either, quite frankly. And one instance I remember is each ambassador in the Soviet Union, or at least the major ones, usually got about three minutes on Soviet television on the national holiday of that particular country to deliver a little homily to the Soviet people. And July 4 of '77 it was Toon's turn, and I was one of two people in the embassy who wrote his speech. One of the political officers and I co-authored his remarks, and we felt compelled to mention human rights. And so we wrote the speech, and we went to the TV station, and they were going to put it on the teleprompter, so they took the text and copied it onto the teleprompter, and then they decided that they wouldn't let him say these things on Soviet television, and so Mr. Toon didn't deliver his Fourth of July address in '77. And of course, we went back to the Fourth of July reception at the American residence after the quote taping unquote that never really took place, and everybody was asking him about his speech that night, and his only answer was, turn on your TVs at nine o'clock. And that's what I told the press, and about three minutes after nine I remember one of the wire services calling me up and said, well you told us to watch but there wasn't anything there. I said, "Well, there's your message." They wouldn't let him mention human rights on Soviet TV. But to give the Carter administration some credit, those of us on the USIA side of things, who are supposed to reflect American values and society and not just the politics of the moment, should give Mr. Carter some credit - and I don't think he was a particularly good president, personally, but you have to give him some credit - for at least getting back to basics. I mean, you know, the United States is supposed to stand for certain values, and he reminded us that yes, we are, and just getting along with the Park Chung Hees and the Leonid Brezhnevs of this world is not the only consideration.

Q: Well, if I sound like I'm down on it, I'm not.

HARROD: No.

Q: Actually, I think there was an earth change in our policy because of - maybe rather inept at the beginning and all, but the human rights thing has changed the way the world looks at things, things that no longer would be tolerated. I sometimes felt that the Henry Kissingers and also particularly the Europeans, you know, tended to get so bloody sophisticated that they couldn't move.

HARROD: You know, another advantage that we had in the Soviet Union in those days was the Soviets were, of course, their own worst enemies and would often do things that fed precisely into this line. I mentioned that we had delivered a protest about their interference with American or Western transmissions. I had the wonderful experience of being sent to the Soviet Foreign Ministry to deliver a protest where they didn't know why I was coming, I just requested a meeting. And I sat down, and I said to my interlocutor, I said, "the first thing I want to do," I said, "personally, is thank you very, very much," and I said, "because I'm a fairly mid-level official in the embassy and I normally don't deal with the Secretary of State directly," I said, "but because of your total screw-up here with the Western correspondents, the Secretary of State himself, personally, told me to come here and..." and then I read my protest. And you know, they played right into this. While I was there, while I was press attaché, we had several outrageous violations of the human rights of people, including American citizens. We had the Pentecostals, who came into the embassy and set up housekeeping. We had the shoot-down of the first Korean airliner, not the one where-

Q: This is the one that didn't get shot completely down.

HARROD: Well, it went down. Only a couple of people got killed. It landed in Karelia. It was a precursor of things to come. A good friend of mine who was an International Harvester representative in Moscow was dragged out of his car at a stoplight and thrown into the Lefortovo Prison as a bargaining chip for two people we'd picked up in the States for espionage. There were a lot of not particularly pleasant things which, quite frankly, taught me how to be a press attaché. I learned all sorts of tricks which I later would tell new generations of USIA officers, about how to circumvent such things as the Privacy Act.

Q: Well, how would you?

HARROD: Well, the International Harvester chap who was dragged out. He and his wife - not wife at the time - his girlfriend at the time (we were later at their wedding here in the States) were on their way to our house, actually, for dessert after they'd been somewhere else for dinner, and he stopped at a red light, a car pulls up behind him, they force open the doors, drag him out of the car while his girlfriend is screaming, and they throw him in prison - allegedly for currency speculation, in fact, as a bargaining chip. So once the word was out that this guy had been thrown in prison, all the correspondents in Moscow wanted to know, What did he do? What is he guilty of? Well, first off, we weren't sure he was guilty of anything, and so the American consul, head of the consular section, went over to visit him at the prison at the first opportunity, came back and said, "The guy says he didn't do anything. He's totally innocent." And I said, "Good, I'm going to go tell the press." And the officer said, "No, you can't do that - Privacy Act. He didn't sign a release. You can't tell anybody anything." And so I called the bureau chief of The New York Times, who had been the first one to enquire about this, and I said, "Dave, I'm real sorry. The Privacy Act won't let me tell you anything. If it wasn't for the Privacy Act, I could give you a very firm declaration of his innocence, but I can't do that." He said, "I understand." And after that, we got his girlfriend to sign the release for him and then we could officially put out the word. But the hypothetical "I'm not allowed to do this, if I were, I could tell you" is something I learned. And later on in another case involving an American citizen who had been "detained" in the Soviet Union, I called the UPI bureau chief at the time, and I said, "You know, you have wide distribution, wire service all over the U.S.," I said, "How does a human interest story about an American citizen who's being forcibly detained in the Soviet Union and can't get out sound to you?" He said, "Sounds real good to me." And I just was quiet. And about 30 seconds go by, and the light bulb goes on, and he says, "Jack, do you know anything about an American citizen who is being forcibly detained here in the Soviet Union?" I said, "Joe, I'm glad you asked me that question." And we got the story out.

That's one of the things about Ambassador Toon. He was not reluctant to use the media. There were a couple of occasions where in the embassy we would have debates about how we should handle a particular issue, with most of my State colleagues, and even some of my USIA colleagues, tending towards, you know, "Let's not do anything." And on a couple of these occasions, after the group dispersed, Ambassador Toon would pull me back in and say, "You know, " he would say, "I really don't mind if the story gets out." And so a couple of times we got the story out before the Soviet version could be put out, and it helped. We actually got this one particular detained fellow out of the Soviet Union because it became a press issue in the States.

Q: I think this points out one of the things that the normal sort of Foreign Service establishment has been so chary. It's been burned so many times by the press. There are some who are so terribly sensitive to it that they don't understand how to use it when you want it. I mean, why don't you use it for attack instead of always being defensive?

HARROD: Well, in one of these cases the director of USIA was out visiting at the time, along with my boss, the area director from Washington, and one of these stories blew up in the press, and the area director said to Ambassador Toon, she said, "Someone told me that Jack had leaked this story," and Toon looked at her and looked at me and said, "Oh, Jack would never do anything like that," and then he winked at me because, in fact, we had deliberately put this story out.

Toon's first reaction was always to react. When he would leave, the embassy under other leadership would revert back to its no-comment mode, and one thing I think that State Department officers, if I may enter this into the record, don't understand, is that "no comment" is a red flag to the journalists. That means "I know something, but I'm not going to tell you." I told one of the bureau chiefs when I first took over as press attaché that if I ever told him I didn't know, that meant I didn't know. If I ever had to tell him "no comment," that meant I knew but I couldn't tell him. And he said, "As long as we play by those rules, we'll be fine." I have some lasting relationships with the media from those days in Moscow. I trust them; they would trust me. And I don't think... I was on a panel discussion in London, at something the University of London sponsored back in '96, with Maggie Thatcher's former press spokesman and a couple of journalists. And I was the only one on that panel who was taking the position that government officials and the media could work together. Everybody else had this adversarial view, whether from the government or the media, that the other guy's lying and you can't trust him. My experience, I think partly because I was in difficult outposts like Moscow, or later when I was handling media for the Iran Hostage Task Force, these were difficult situations and the media people understood, and you could have a good relationship with them and trust them. They fed me some material that was useful to me, and I fed them some things. So I don't have that view at all, as long as you know who they are. There are some media people who've burned me that I didn't know.

Q: I think this can be quite... It depends. In Moscow, you're ending up with the cream. I mean the people have had to learn the language. In a way, they're all living in difficult conditions, and-

HARROD: Not all of them.

Q: Okay.

HARROD: We had a few who were not quite so...

Q: I've been in places - I was in Saigon at one point, and you had some pretty scruffy characters there too. There were some responsible, and there were some who were just absolutely unreliable.

HARROD: If I got to know the person and trust him, or her, you have to base this on some track record. Where I got burned were people that I didn't know well enough to trust. There was a new bureau chief who came in once whom Ambassador Toon almost declared war on. I mean, he had just arrived, and Toon had one of these Friday press backgrounders that I mentioned. And the issue was always whether Brezhnev was dying or not. And the Chief Justice, Warren Burger, had been in Moscow on a visit, and Toon had gone with him to pay a courtesy call on Brezhnev. So the question at the backgrounder on Friday was how did Brezhnev look? And Toon said, "Well," he said, "I don't want this to get back to me in any way, but he looked..." I don't know whether he was better or worse that week, but this bureau chief then did a story that said "According to a senior Western official who was present at a meeting between the U.S. Chief Justice and Brezhnev..." And Toon went right through the roof because the attribution was perfectly clear. We gave that guy one more chance, and he basically shaped up. But if you know your people, you can trust them. If you don't know them, you can't trust them.

Q: Well, now, just on a case like this, how would one handle it? Would you call in that person and tell them what they'd done?

HARROD: Yes. That was my job as press attaché, basically was to tell him, "You screwed up. The rules of the background briefing are there is no attribution that comes back to the briefer, and that's so obvious, there's only one other person in the room, he's it. You can't do that." We had another case where Toon gave an interview to a Western periodical, and we sent the transcript of the interview to Washington, and somebody in Washington didn't like something that Mr. Toon said, and my job was to contact the media outlet in question and get them to take back something the ambassador actually had said that we had on a tape recorder. And they didn't really like doing that, but they figured, I guess, that it was in their long-term interest to keep Mr. Toon as a happy camper. And he said it. I mean, he admitted he said it, and he believed what he said, but somebody in Washington didn't like him saying it, so we had to get them to kind of edit that out of their final version - which they did. They could have very easily said, no, we're not going to do it, and they would have been well within their rights. I said I learned a lot about being a press attaché, which I think stood me in some stead later on in my life, but it was a tough time in Moscow because each one of these things would kind of pop up.

We also, in the middle of this, in the summer of '77, had a fire. The embassy burned up. I had just moved into my new office. Gil Callaway had left, and I had cleaned out his office and put up my posters and decorations on the walls, and the embassy burned up. That was probably, in a way, the biggest story of the whole time I was there.

Q: I'm in the middle of a set of interviews with Bill Brown, and-

HARROD: Yes, Bill was there.

Q: -and I'm talking about the fire, and he said one of the things he really learned about this was that the ambassador was there sort of trying to direct and do things, and he should be at one remove because things were happening too fast, and it would have been much better if he had moved back a little.

HARROD: Well, the ambassador, I remember also, was in his tuxedo because he had been at the Romanian embassy or at a farewell for the Romanian ambassador or something, and then there he was in his tux directing the firemen.

Q: And he was saying that the firemen were pouring into the place with brand-new firemen's uniforms on.

HARROD: Well, not the first crew. The first crew were real firemen, and then when the fire was sort of under control, a whole new shift of firemen suddenly appeared. But for me it was an interesting experience because we had a houseguest who had just arrived, one of our old exhibit guides from the '75 exhibit had come, and he was staying with us in our little apartment. He'd just come that afternoon, and we'd just had dinner, and we're sitting around reminiscing, and the phone rang, and I picked it up, and it was the sort of junior guy I think from the AP bureau who had the night shift, and he called and he said, "What can you tell me about the fire at your embassy?" And I said, "Huh [What]?" and I said, "Let me get back to you." I put the phone down and called the embassy and got no answer, and you never got no answer, so I immediately put my shoes on, said farewell to my wife and my houseguest, and sped down the road. And you could see the glow in the sky. And I got there, spent all night out on the street with the media folks as we watched the place burn up.

Q: Well, you say you had three jobs there. What was the third?

HARROD: The third was press attaché. I segued from assistant information officer in the summer of '77 directly in to the information officer/press attaché job because Gil Callaway left after two years. I think everyone assumed he would stay for a third year, and I guess Gil decided he would - I think he ended up going to Rome, which was far better than Moscow. And so suddenly, the fellow who'd been in the pipeline to replace Gil was at Garmisch for year of Russian, and so I got boosted up into the press attaché job, which was for me wonderful because I had direct access to the ambassador. I think it was the first job I'd ever had in the Foreign Service, except my trainee time in Afghanistan, where I actually had a direct relationship with the ambassador. I was one of about a half a dozen people in the embassy who could see him just about whenever we needed to.

Q: With this direct access, how did Toon view - I mean this is the dying time of Brezhnev - how did he view the Soviet leadership and whither the Soviet Union, from what you can gather?

HARROD: Well, I don't want to put words in his mouth, but I think the question here is how do you spell "whither." I mean, I think Mac had a very realistic and jaundiced view of the whole aged, crumbling leadership of the Soviet Union, trying to teach them, as he said, how to act not like a banana republic. So I think he had a very realistic view of them, and I think one of the critiques of him back in Washington in the Carter administration was that he was too much of a quote hard-liner unquote. His version of that was, he said, "If by that you mean that I am a realist and look at these people the way they really are, then I guess I am a hard-liner." I guess I tended to be a hard-liner that way, too. But I think he was a good counterpoint to the Carter administration tendencies. In fact, I think he once said that there was nothing that couldn't be cured by having him and Marshall Shulman change jobs for a couple of months, so Shulman could actually-

Q: Marshall Shulman being the-

HARROD: Head of the - he had a higher loftier title, but he was essentially in charge of Soviet policy back here, whether he was at the NSC or the Department. But the idea was, you know, if Mac went back to Washington he'd see what you had to put up with in Washington, and if Shulman could come out to Moscow for a few months he'd see what the place really was like.

Q: During this time, was the USIA or the embassy looking at the Soviet Union... I mean, this was still the Cold War; things had settled down so the Cold War was luke-cold. To try to say, why don't we start messing around with the republics? I mean, you've got all these nationalities, and why don't we sort of encourage them to show separatist tendencies, because if this weakens the Soviet Union, this is a plus for us.

HARROD: Well, there may have been something like that going on, but I was utterly unaware of it, and in fact, everything that I noticed in Moscow was the complete reverse. I had spent 15 months of my life traveling around the boondocks essentially to develop some appreciation of what was going on out there, and when I got back to Moscow I found out everybody in the embassy seemed to think that the Soviet Union began and ended in Moscow. No, I did not see anything like that. Once in a while, some issue would perk up onto the radar screen that involved one of the other republics, but it was always seen as sort of a slight variant of the basic. The Politburo was in Moscow. Mac Toon once said there are only 15 guys in this country who know what's going on and none of them are talking. And essentially all of them were based in Moscow. A few commuted in from the provinces, from the republics. But no, I did not detect that. I would have been one who would have been strongly in favor not of trying to foment any nationalist attitudes but certainly paying a lot more attention. My view at the time was that nationalism would some day be the undoing of the Soviet Union; it's just that I thought it would be 50 or 100 years down the road. I never thought it would happen this fast. But no, I did not see anybody deliberately playing that card. Maybe there were people in Grandma's House across the river who were thinking about it, but I never saw it.

HARRY JOSEPH GILMORE
Assistant Cultural Affairs Officer, USIS
Moscow (1969-1971)

Ambassador Gilmore was born and raised in Pennsylvania and educated at Carnegie Institute of Technology, Indiana University and the University of Pittsburgh. He entered the Foreign Service in 1962 and served at the State Department in Washington, DC and at the following posts abroad: Ankara, Budapest, Moscow, Munich, Belgrade and Berlin. He also served as Deputy Commander at the Army War College. In 1993 he was named United States Ambassador to Armenia, where he served until 1995. At the State Department in Washington he dealt primarily with Central European Affairs. The Ambassador was interviewed in 2003 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: So, in 1969 you went to Moscow for two years, assigned to the press and cultural section, which was very unusual for an FSO in those days.

GILMORE: Yes. And it did not help my career, initially.

Q: I would have thought it would have been really career enhancing.

GILMORE: In the long run, I think it was. I thought it was very useful. But the first efficiency report I got for being the Assistant Cultural Exchanges Officer in Moscow, the first official reaction I got to my fitness report was a letter which said, "You've been ranked in the lower 15% of your class." Before that I had been always ranked near the top of the class. Nothing had happened. I was doing a good job, working in Russian, by the way. If you were the exchanges officer, by God you were working with Russian, and with ministries, and the academy of sciences in person and on the phone. But the State performance panel may have had difficulty evaluating a USIA efficiency report.

They didn't seem to understand how difficult it was to be the educational and scientific exchanges officer in Moscow. And I made a mistake too. I indicated, where you had the opportunity to write your own little paragraph commenting on the report, that in many ways the work I was doing, if this were an embassy in Western Europe, would have been done by FSNs (locally hired Foreign Service Nationals).

Q: Yes.

GILMORE: So what I was trying to suggest was that I had now to operate in Russian in a way that was really challenging. But I think it could have been read both ways. But I think the big problem was that the State promotion board literally did not understand the USIA terminology. I don't think they knew what a "USINFO", a USIA channel telegraphic message was. I think they may not have known what an exchanges officer did. But, subsequently, the job I did was taken over by two people: a science attaché and an exchanges officer. So what I'm saying is I did a lot of work. It seemed to me to be very useful too.

By the way, I got to travel some in the Soviet Union. I had daily contact with Soviet officials. I was at the Ministry of Higher Education and the Ministry of Education all the time. And I actually got to work with real Soviet bureaucrats on a very regular basis. So, I thought it was a great experience.

Q: So, having been in Hungary, how did you find getting into the Soviet empire?

GILMORE: It was quite interesting. In many ways, the embassy in Moscow, as a whole, was under a very similar kind of surveillance from the police and the security services as the mission in Budapest, so there was comparability there. Soviet citizens were generally much more cautious even than the Hungarians in being in touch with us. Except the ones that you knew, obviously, were licensed, who were instructed to buddy up with you. Contacts with ordinary people were even harder than in Hungary. Contacts were generally easier outside Moscow and Leningrad. I was lucky because I traveled. The whole press and cultural section traveled frequently because we accompanied American visitors, performing artists. I accompanied several performing arts groups. We traveled all over the Caucasus; all over the Ukraine; traveled to Leningrad a couple of times. We had students one year in Rostov-on-Don, of all places, and I went down to see them. So, I had a first-hand exposure to the Soviet Union that was as extensive during my two-year tour there. So, in that sense, I traveled more than I did in Hungary, but that was because of my work.

Q: The exchange program, in many ways, it was really a major instrument for getting the message across and getting contact.

GILMORE: I agree completely. And it was very skillfully run by Boris Klosson, who as I noted earlier, went on to Moscow to be DCM, and in many ways ran the place, not only as a DCM, but as an intellectual force.

Q: His name comes up a lot. Could you talk a bit about his background and how you saw him operate?

GILMORE: Well, I saw him in two places: as the director of the Soviet and Eastern European Exchanges Staff, and as the DCM in Moscow. He spoke fluent Russian, very serviceable Russian. He engaged easily with the Soviets; he could be alternately tough and relaxed. He had good contacts with senior officials. He was also a good manager. He understood the Soviets very well; they couldn't fool him on anything that was happening. He also had a good sense of humor. And he inspired loyalty from the staff. He knew what "loyalty down" meant. When he got to the top he cared about his people; he knew what they were going through. For example, if you were the head of the consular section during his time, you'd get a damned good efficiency report because he knew what you were doing and he knew how important it was and how tough it was. That was the kind of person he was. He subsequently achieved the rank of ambassador as an arms control negotiator. But all those of us who knew him thought he should have been ambassador at least once to an important country, and maybe eventually sent back to Moscow as Ambassador. I think the State Department didn't do itself a favor by not getting him into the ambassadorial ranks.

Q: Boris Klosson, what happened to him afterwards?

GILMORE: He went to do work on the SALT (Strategic Arms Limitations Talks) Delegation, with the rank of ambassador. That's the last I saw of him. He may have done work as a senior inspector after that, but he had an important role in the SALT talks.

Q: Is he alive, still?

GILMORE: I believe he is dead. His son was a very distinguished Foreign Service Officer, and served as an ambassador.

Q: By being at the embassy at the time, did you feel that you were on the "A Team"?

GILMORE: Had I been there in a State position, a typical Foreign Service Officer position, I would have felt more like it. A number of my State colleagues at the embassy would come up to me and say, "Are you a foreign service officer?" I said, "Yes." "Why are you with USIA?" "Well, I'm on reimbursable detail. I'm doing exchanges work." And they would say, "Oh, you made a mistake. You should be working in one of the State positions." And they would say things about USIA, some of them, that showed they didn't know what we were doing, and they thought we had no real substantive work to do. Of course, anybody who had worked on exchanges or tried to run an exhibit in the Soviet Union would have known it was immensely hard work.

Q: Yes, it was so important.

GILMORE: It was crucial. If we wanted to retaliate, for example, if we wanted to cancel some high visibility activity because we were angry with the Soviets politically, you could stop an important high-level exchange or hold it up and send a signal. It was used frequently as a kind of a political tool, the exchanges program. But only some of my colleagues realized that. By the way, my boss in Moscow, McKinney Russell, was a very distinguished USIA officer. Went to the very top of USIA.

Q: Yes, I interviewed McKinney (and his oral history is on the ADST website)

GILMORE: And a superb speaker of Russian, and student of the Soviet Union and Russia.

Q: But it really does show this cultural divide between the State Department and USIA. And I've come from the State Department stable, but I must say that so often the work of USIA got you out and meeting people, if it's the cultural side and the press, and also provided valuable management experience

GILMORE: Right. When I got to Belgrade as DCM, my USIA experience turned out to be very valuable because in Yugoslavia we had a huge USIA presence with the American centers. You are right, and the Moscow assignment gave me an in-depth exposure to Soviet officialdom. That experience proved of considerable benefit when as U.S. Minister and Deputy Commandant of the American Sector of Berlin I dealt extensively with senior Soviet officials.

Q: Tell me about some of these trips that you made and groups that you shepherded around.

GILMORE: Well, for example, I escorted the University of Illinois Jazz Band, which was one of the exchange program participants. Officers in the Press and Cultural sections took turns as escort officer. I escorted half of the band's tour of the Soviet Union. They were very good jazzmen. They were grad students, and many of them were Army vets who were back in university. Cecil Bridgewater, for example, the trumpet and Flugelhorn player, and his wife, Dee Dee Bridgewater, became well known jazz musicians. One got to see real people when one traveled out in the boondocks, even though the Soviet security officials, including the interpreters that were sent with us, tried to keep our groups isolated from ordinary citizens. They couldn't. That kind of group was too much of a magnet. So you got a chance to see another part of Soviet society. Also, you got a chance to work with the Soviet State Concert Agency, the Goskontsert interpreters. They were all carefully chosen. You were with them day and night for three weeks in a row, including at meals, and you got to see how the Soviet Union actually functioned. During the Nixon-Brezhnev summit in 1972, when I had already left the embassy in Moscow and was teaching at the Naval Academy, my next assignment, I was asked to escort a chamber music group on its tour of the USSR. The group was composed of the Composers String Quartet from New York, the New York Woodwind Quintet, and a stringed bass player. They were top flight American chamber musicians. We played in six cities during the Nixon-Brezhnev summit, the three Caucasus capital cities, and Moscow, Leningrad, and Kiev. We were taken very good care of, particularly during the summit, because there was an effort to promote a sense of warmth in U.S.-Soviet relations. When we got to Moscow, for example, we suddenly were in touch with a whole series of people from the Bolshoi Orchestra meeting with our clarinetist and oboist. The same thing occurred in St. Petersburg now, then Leningrad. So we got a chance to look more deeply into Soviet cultural life. Also, I got to travel to the three capitals of the Caucasus. I subsequently became the first U.S. ambassador to Armenia in 1993, and it was an advantage to have visited Soviet Armenia years earlier.

When I was the exchanges officer, working for USIA in Moscow, I visited Rostov-on-Don. We had to travel in pairs. We had three graduate students down there - a couple, and then a single student. We'd never had students in Rostov before. It was a rough, tough port city with one of the worst crime rates in the USSR. We didn't know the full extent of it then, because crime was pretty well covered up in the former Soviet Union. But I saw Rostov through the eyes of the American graduate students who were literally struggling to survive down there. The embassy officer who traveled with me, Robert Peck, Bob Peck is now dead – we wrote up some telling reports on that trip.

Q: What were the students doing there?

GILMORE: They were graduate students. One was working on getting a Ph.D. in Russian language and literature; another was doing research for his doctoral thesis for a Ph.D. in history. They were assigned to different university faculties. Typically, the only places where long-term exchange students were placed were Moscow and Leningrad state universities. But the Soviets had expanded the program to include Rostov and Voronezh state universities. That experiment lasted only one year. What I'm saying is, the insights you got from working on exchange programs with the Soviet Union were very, very special, and in a closed society such insights were rare.

Q: But, didn't you, over a couple glasses of vodka, get into heart-to-heart talks and all?

GILMORE: I was careful, partly because of the danger of provocations. But when escorting performing arts groups you could have a little more of that. In the first place, you and the Goskontsert escorts were out together for two, three weeks. Typically, the head escort on the Soviet side was a fellow in his 50s who had been around, been through WWII. One could drink with some of those escorts. I remember a fellow by the name of Drozdov. I got to know him pretty well. He was guarded and we didn't get into current politics; but we could talk about WWII. He would say positive things about Lend-Lease; he would say humorous things too. The Soviets, for example, called Spam "The Second Front", because they said, "The Americans won't open another front in the West, they'll just send Spam." But you could have more contact and more in-depth contact with Soviet officials when traveling than in Moscow, where the police blanket was all over you.

Q: Did you get any feel at this time of divisions within Soviet society? That places like the non-Russian republics were just not part of, or weren't going to be part of the Soviet empire, if they had a chance?.

GILMORE: Well, only hints. One place I got it, of all places, was in Armenia, when I was escorting the chamber music group. When U.S. ensembles performed in the Soviet Union, they had to have their programs pre-approved by the state concert agency. They didn't want performing arts groups to perform any music that they didn't know about in advance. The chamber music groups had three pre-approved programs, and when we sat down with the Armenian State Concert Agency, the escort from the state concert agency in Moscow said, "This is what our guests are going to play." But the representative for the Armenian agency, said, "Wait, you are in Soviet Armenia, and we will decide what our guests are going to play here." So he basically just faced down the Soviet central concert agency's tour manager.

Georgia and Armenia seemed clearly more relaxed than Moscow, Leningrad and Kiev culturally. We had a post-concert party in Georgia featuring new Georgian wine from that year's harvest, and the Georgian officials who attended were a little more relaxed and open than those in Moscow and Leningrad. But the most interesting experience was at the cathedral in Armenia. Etchmiadzin is the seat of the Catholicos, the universal bishop, the head of the Apostolic Church. It is a short drive from the capital, Yerevan. We went there briefly on a Sunday morning. The service of the Divine Liturgy was underway and we observed that the singing was of a very high quality. We asked our hosts why, and they said, "Well, some people from the Opera sing at the church." Well, that would not have happened in Moscow or in Leningrad. If you were an important opera star in Moscow in the 1970s, the last place you could be seen was singing in a church. It would be considered beyond the pale, considered a kind of an anti-regime gesture. So, we saw little differences like that. We could see that cultural nationalism was one way that the Armenian and Georgian republics could show their special Armenian-ness or Georgian-ness.

Q: Did you get any, I think of Armenian composers and all that...were you able to delve into that at all?

GILMORE: Well, several people in the group were fans of Aram Khachaturian, and we did visit his museum in Yerevan. But we were still, when we got into our hotels for the night, whether they were in Baku, Tbilisi, or Yerevan, we were still under control. If the participants left the hotel it would be noted. One exception to that was with the University of Illinois Jazz Band in Leningrad. Turns out there was quite an underground jazz scene in Leningrad, and several Soviet jazz enthusiasts just took a couple of guys from our trumpet section home. I didn't know where they were for a while. In fact, one of them picked up a venereal disease. Which was an interesting thing. He mentioned it to me, when we returned to Moscow. I had the doctor at the embassy look at him, and sure enough, it was a venereal disease. But, basically, there were just hints like that, that there was another kind of cultural and social life going on that we at the embassy weren't a part of.

Q: Did you get a chance to play the piano with these groups?

GILMORE: Not really, although my musical background helped me with the music groups. But what I did do in Moscow, with my wife as a professional singer, singing in the British ambassador's choir, was occasionally to accompany the choir. There was a British student at the Moscow Conservatory, a pianist, who was better than I, and he did more than I did. But being an occasional accompanist opened doors for me with the musicians. For example, I remember David Glazer, who was the clarinetist with the New York Woodwind Quintet. He and I hit it off because we could talk music, and when he did make contact with some important clarinet players from the Moscow Bolshoi Orchestra, he included me as the interpreter. So, it was that kind of enhancement. And also, with the Composers String Quartet, Matthew Raimondi, the lead violinist, and the second violinist, Anahid Ajemian, and I became good friends. We talked music, and when we met Mrs. (Lina) Prokofieva [Ed: wife of Sergei Prokofiev] who came to their concert in Moscow. Mrs. Prokofieva was a gracious and charming person. - they brought me right in and again I interpreted. So there was an advantage to being a musician. Dizard, Jr., Inventing Public Diplomacy: The Story of the U.S. Information Agency, (Boulder, CO: Lynne Reinner, 2004), especially Chapter Nine and pages 192-195.]

Q: Who was the ambassador when you were there?

GILMORE: Jacob Beam [Ed: who served from April 1969 to January 1973]. Boris Klosson was the DCM.

Q: Now did Beam, was he culturally interested in these things, or was he mainly political?

GILMORE: He was a career Foreign Service officer, a very shy man personally, very disciplined, with long experience in German and Communist world affairs. He had a dynamite wife, Peggy Beam. She kept Spaso House, the residence, lively with films with subtitles, or films dubbed into Russian with English subtitles. She kept him in touch with the cultural scene, and he encouraged this because he knew what kind of an asset she was. Otherwise, he was very kind, and very courtly, but not a particularly gregarious or outgoing person. But you always knew that he had long experience, and knew where he was. He was also a bit unhappy because Henry Kissinger, the National Security Advisor at that time, was making some contacts with senior Soviet officials that weren't always shared with the embassy.

Q: Well, he would appear in Moscow without letting the ambassador know.

GILMORE: Yes, and it was hard for Beam because he was used to being in every loop. He was a very disciplined and loyal person; it wouldn't have been a problem to bring him in. But I remember before the Nixon-Brezhnev summit, when Nixon came to Moscow, Ambassador Beam did not feel that he was fully kept abreast of developments and preparations.

Q: Well, this is sort of a nasty side of this. One almost has the feeling that Kissinger, particularly in this early time, was playing the sort of the Iago to Nixon's Othello, or playing on...

GILMORE: Yes, when Kissinger became Secretary of State, I think it changed a bit. Now I follow him as a columnist, and he's a tremendous national asset in terms of his understanding of foreign affairs. But you are right, he was operating very much close to the vest, and he was literally cutting the senior State Department people and the top State Department leadership out at that point. I guess Secretary Rodgers was not in the loop on a number of things.

Q: What was your impression of...did you get involved in the Nixon-Brezhnev summit [May 22-30, 1972]?

GILMORE: I left Moscow in July 1971, so I was only there with the Chamber music groups. I was the escort, so I was not involved. Subsequently, when Brezhnev came to the States, I was one of the captive audience, on the eighth floor of the State Department when they had a signing ceremony...but, no, I wasn't involved.

WILLIAM N. HARBEN
Science Officer
Moscow (1969-1971)

William N. Harben was born in New York, New York in 1922. He received a bachelor's degree from Princeton University. His Foreign Service career included positions in Germany, Indonesia, Rwanda, Mexico, the Soviet Union, Cambodia, and Australia. These are excerpts from his memoirs.

HARBEN ... In late 1969 I was posted to Moscow as Science Officer in charge of negotiating scientific exchanges and reporting on scientific developments in the USSR. I was the only Russian-speaking Foreign Service Officer with a scientific degree (geology). As it turned out, the job was primarily political - I was constantly dealing with American scientists expelled as "Zionist spies." Before leaving, however, I received a superb month-long briefing on all aspects of science - high energy physics, space exploration, chemistry, medicine, meteorology, etc.

My opposite number in the Soviet Academy of Sciences was a steely-eyed old colonel in the secret police who masqueraded as Head of the Foreign Relations Section, Stepan Gavrilovich Korneyev. At the State Committee for Atomic Energy I dealt with Ivan Smolin, assisted by a tall, full-lipped young woman interpreter, Valentina Kondratova, who was probably KGB and assigned to watch me and Smolin, who was, however, a Russian patriot who had lost parts of several fingers in the tanks in the Second World War.

During my Washington briefings I was told that my predecessor had sent many translations of newspaper articles on scientific subjects which were not needed, since they received all the newspapers in Washington, where they were translated by experts. But my predecessor, Christopher Squire, had moved up, not out, and was my superior. Although I told him of Washington's disinterest in the articles, he constantly instructed me to make reports of articles he thought were interesting, which kept me away from more important things. Due to the close KGB surveillance normal diplomatic practice was impossible and the embassy staff underemployed and kept busy reading newspapers which were sent to Washington anyway.

As I said later in a letter to the Washington Post, we lived in apartment blocks to which no Russian without KGB permission was admitted past the guard. We were driven to and from the embassy by KGB chauffeurs, and closely followed whenever we left the embassy. As a result the political section could do little but read the newspapers, summarize articles, and send them to Washington with bland comments. Despite the fact that we had no real secrets, all rooms contained listening devices, as did our apartments. Our presence served only to justify the reciprocal presence of an equal number of Russians in Washington, where they used their abundant freedom to collect all sorts of military and technical information.

In the exchanges of scientists, too, it was mostly a one-way street. The Russians always arranged to have their scientists visit the U.S. first. There they were briefed on the latest scientific research, shown laboratories, etc. When the American return delegation went to the USSR they were shown very little. Many were infuriated by their treatment, but, in the interests of detente, were persuaded to write highly favorable trip reports on their return home. One General Electric researcher banged on Korneyev's desk and swore that he'd never again let a Russian near his laboratory. A high-energy physics delegation called me on the phone to say they were going home, for the Russians were showing them nothing. I asked them to come and see me first. They did, and I wrote on my blackboard that their telephone conversation with me had been taped by the secret police, who were undoubtedly alarmed; if they would return to their hotel they would certainly find some sheepish Russians waiting to take them to see what they wanted to see. Which is what happened.

During that period the Russian government was strongly anti-semitic - partly for historical reasons, partly because of demonstrations and attacks on Russian diplomats in New York by fanatic Zionist groups demanding free emigration of Soviet Jews, and partly because Zionism - an allegiance to a foreign state - was incompatible with Soviet patriotism. About ten percent of the Soviet Academy of Sciences were Jews. They were hard to punish or persecute because they were indispensable. The secret police seemed to be trying to prove that the discontent of these Jewish scientists was due to foreign, mainly U.S., spies and agents. As the American Science officer I was the obvious choice as mastermind of a fabricated plot. Literally carloads of KGB agents followed me, ransacked my apartment and my car when I was out, in search of some incriminating detail which could be embroidered into a "plot." Had I had sinister motives, however, I would never have executed them due to the tightness of the surveillance.

The disparity between the view of Russia held by the liberal scientific community in the U.S. and reality made my job very difficult. American scientists were quick to accuse embassy officials of being "cold warriors" and yet it was my job to ensure that they did not unwittingly play into the hands of the KGB. I briefed them in a jocular way, frequently praising the Russians but remarking that they were suspicious and not to be alarmed at surreptitious search of their baggage, warning that "pickpockets" in Moscow were especially fond of address books (here I would wink).

I had to try to protect their Russian scientist counterparts from their naivete. An opened and resealed letter (with the new KGB glue drooling out from beneath the flap) from an American scientist asked me to thank a Professor So and So next time I saw him, for the valuable information on his research. This was sent right through the open mail! Once even a letter from some office in the Pentagon which had simply been dropped in a street mailbox! Since this missive concerned Russian civil defense and was classified, it was quite impossible to dispel Russian suspicions of me, and Russian civil defense was not in my area of responsibility anyway!

Stepan Gavrilovich was extremely thorough. The Viglierchio case gave me some insight into the workings of his mind. He summoned me one day to inform me that a Dr. Viglierchio, a specialist in nematodes (a less military subject cannot be imagined) was a “Zionist spy” and had to leave the country immediately. Amused, I replied, “Mr. Korneyev, in Washington they’ll believe almost anything, but not that anyone named Viglierchio is a Zionist anything. Why not say he’s an agent of the Mafia?”

“The competent authorities have determined that he is a Zionist spy,” Korneyev insisted stonily.

So I had to find out why poor Viglierchio had been singled out. He was stunned.

“What have you been doing in the past few weeks?” I asked.

“Working on Nematodes...!” he replied.

“What else? Any social activities?”

“Well, he took me to a party one evening.”

“Who was at the party?”

“A lot of Russians,” said Viglierchio.

“What did they do?”

“Mostly we listened to poetry of some poet who was there.”

“What kind of poetry?”

“I don’t know. I don’t understand Russian.”

I took Viglierchio to McKinney Russell, our cultural affairs counselor and explained the problem. Viglierchio thought he could recognize the name of the poet if he heard it again. Russ recited the names of “bad” (in the eyes of the KGB) poets, and Viglierchio cried “That’s the one!” after one name of a Jewish poet. This coupled with the fact that a Jewish journalist Anthony Astrakhan, had left his card in Viglierchio’s box at the hotel was enough to convince Korneyev, apparently. So Viglierchio left, and gave me a large number of gift scientific books to send by embassy surface pouch, since he would be overweight otherwise.

Next a young physicist named Stephen Solomon, from the University of Oklahoma, fell into Korneyev's net. I worried that Solomon might be a target because of his juicily Jewish name. Tactfully the KGB launched its shocking expose of Zionist skulduggery just after Solomon's departure: a full page article describing how he received from traitorous Soviet Jews rocket secrets in men's toilets, etc. McKinney Russell was named as the spymaster of the whole operation.

Why not me? Russell had never even met Solomon. I was passed over probably because I was in a position to exact revenge. Some months before, I had been detached, with a Jewish embassy officer, to escort three Congressmen around Moscow. One of them insisted on visiting the synagogue. When we were leaving the Congressmen's hotel the infuriated KGB was smashing my car and that of Martin Wenick, my colleague. An obvious KGB officer was impassively supervising the destruction. I walked up to him and said, "Tell your boss that this is going to cost you about a billion dollars!"

A young man stepped off the sidewalk to help me change my slashed tire. He apparently thought I merely had a flat. The KGB plainclothesman muttered something to him and his face suddenly became a mask of fear. He stumbled quickly back into the passing crowd.

The embassy was always short of cars for errands. I used my personal car for business when my wife did not need it. In it I used to deliver scientific information of incalculable value to the State Committee for Atomic Energy from our Atomic Energy Commission. So when the material came I just stacked it in my office and in my bugged living room I told my wife, "I'm not going to deliver anything until I receive all the parts for the car from Germany. And if this happens again I'll throw all this nuclear technology in the river and they can swim for it!" This may have been the reason I was not named as Solomon's "spymaster." The AEC material was desperately needed by the Russian nuclear energy program. There must have been some angry exchanges between Smolin, the GRU man at the State Committee and the thugs of the KGB

The delivery was humiliating anyway. I had to bring the boxes - cubic yards of technical data - to a small, one-story brick extension to the State Committee. Inside there was a narrow room about the size of a small apartment kitchen. The floor consisted of a hinged trap door so that the workers behind the roll-top steel curtain along one side could push a button and send any suspicious visitor hurtling into the cellar. There were two buttons on the wall. One was marked "SECRET;" the other "non-secret." They never opened the curtain if I pushed "non-secret," so I pushed "SECRET." On a couple of occasions they refused to accept the shipment. Once because it was "non-secret" and the other time because it was addressed to a certain professor by name and they claimed not to know of him. Infuriated, I replied that delivery to the proper office was their problem, not mine, and as far as I was concerned they could throw it all in the garbage if they wished, and I walked out. I held up the Soviet nuclear energy program about six months. The VW parts were slow in arriving.

I don't recall if it was before or after this that Dr. Glenn Seaborg, Chairman of the AEC, arrived for a visit with several prominent American scientists. They were particularly interested in meeting with Dr. Flerov, at Dubna. Flerov claimed to have discovered Element No. 116 in nature. Seaborg spoke in awed tones with his colleagues about this discovery, which was far over the heads of the KGB (and mine), who would have prohibited the article in which Flerov announced it, had they known of its implications. Unlike U-238, which splits into only two parts, Element 116 split into very many, releasing incomparably more energy. A revolver bullet made of the stuff would blow up a city (if the problems of manufacture could be worked out).

Radioactive elements leave traces in glass caused by the particles emitted. A study of these tracks indicates what element is emitting the particles. On the earth's surface cosmic rays leave such a multitude of tracks that they obscure everything else. Most radioactive elements occur with lead and disintegrate into isotopes of lead. Lead began to be used in bottle glass in the late 18th or early 19th century. Dr. Flerov reasoned that exuberant drunkards often threw their empty bottles down wells, which, if deep enough, protected them from cosmic rays. It was in such bottle glass that he found the tracks. Seaborg said, "This is a very sobering discovery, Dr. Flerov!" The KGB people looked at each other in confusion.

Apparently they decided to educate themselves by stealing Dr. Seaborg's attaché case in Leningrad, claiming it was a burglar. Seaborg's assistant called me, very agitated. "Don't worry!" I said, "I'm quite sure they will catch the burglar before Dr. Seaborg departs." The attaché case was returned the next day.

The Russians had pirated several of Seaborg's books and gave him several thousand rubles which they said were "royalties" just before he left. Seaborg thought he might buy a few dozen watches with the money, but I warned that few of the watches worked, and not for long. The stores were out of cameras, so he had to buy art books. These being very bulky, I offered to pouch them along with any other papers. I did so.

I then uncovered still another example of American bureaucratic stupidity. I began to be bombarded with telegrams from Seaborg's staff asking where his pouched books were, and letters from Viglierchio making the same complaint. I had been told by the security officer (why Washington would send such an idiot to Moscow was beyond me) that the classified pouch (i.e. secret) was taken to embassy Helsinki by an embassy officer on the train. I had sent other parcels to other scientists via this pouch and all arrived within three weeks. Seaborg and Viglierchio were the only scientists whose parcels had been pouched who were of special interest to the KGB. I went to see the Security Officer and asked him to tell me, step by step, what happened to the pouch on its way to safe hands in Helsinki.

"Well, an embassy officer takes it with him in an embassy car to the station and he takes it onto the train with him and accompanies it to Helsinki."

"In his compartment?"

"Oh no. It's too large for that!"

"Well, where the hell is it?"

"In the baggage car," replied the fool, as though it were the most natural thing in the world.

“You mean the Russians have our secret pouch in their sole possession for fifteen hours?”

“Well, yes, but it’s sealed!” Such stupidity was beyond belief. I remembered Brautigam, the prewar German consul in Tiflis telling me in Germany how the Tiflis and Kiev consulate pouches were received in Berlin with the seals reversed. So I had to explain to Seaborg and Viglierchio that the delay was caused by the secret police going through the contents of their parcels and that they would receive them in due course.

One day a visitor to the embassy called me from the Marine desk. An American scientist. He insisted on seeing me although I was very busy and asked him to come the next day. I offered him ten minutes. He was a paleontologist specializing in the Permian - a subject even more harmless than Viglierchio’s nematodes. He was quite agitated. When he tried to hail a taxi at the Academy of Sciences Hotel to come to the embassy a man in front of the hotel said something in Russian to each taxi and they drove off. Finally he had walked up the street and caught one and managed to leave.

“And that isn’t all,” he continued. “The Academy fellow who came to the hotel asked if I had any foreign literature, and I said I had copies of Time and Newsweek but hadn’t read them yet. I said I would gladly give them to him when I had. Then he wanted to take me on a tour of Moscow. I said I was too tired. Then he asked if I could buy a gift for his mother-in-law in the foreign currency store. I was specifically told in Washington I wasn’t to do that. I think he wanted to get me out of the room so that somebody could search my baggage.”

“I can’t imagine why they are interested in you, particularly,” I said. “They could always look in your baggage at the airport before they bring it out where you pick it up. They often do.”

“Well, I arrived a day early, so...”

“Aha! So you slipped by them...”

“I guess so. But I wanted to see you anyway because a fellow named Solomon at my university asked me to deliver a package to some friends of his at Novosibirsk, where I’m going.”

I was stunned. “Didn’t Mr. Solomon tell you that he had been exposed in the Soviet press as one of the most sinister spies ever to set foot in Russia?” The paleontologist’s eyes bulged. “So now we know what they were looking for. But how did they know you had it?”

“Solomon said he’d write a letter ahead. I guess they intercepted it.”

“My God! And where is this parcel?”

“Here. I brought it with me.” He held it up. I took it and opened it. A Hebrew grammar, a history of Israel and similar subversive literature.

“Okay. Here’s what you do. Go to Novosibirsk. At some point somebody - obviously a KGB agent - will sidle up to you and ask if you brought a package for someone. Tell him very nonchalantly that you were going to but you were afraid your baggage would be overweight and you had to leave it. Apologize profusely.”

It happened as I predicted and the fellow had no further trouble.

I love wild mushrooms and had studied them for years. The Russians are also avid mushroom hunters and will travel tens of kilometers to get to a suitable forest to look for them. I therefore was very puzzled to see one of the most succulent mushrooms of all, the “shaggy mane”, or Coprinus comatus, growing abundantly and untouched all over Moscow’s parks and vacant lots. Together with a mushroom-loving colleague I spent weekends and lunch hours happily gathering them and eating them in every way imaginable. Once, as I stooped to pick one, a passing Russian said, “Nyet - poganyy!” (No! poisonous!)

Our KGB tails became frantic. Why were the imperialist spies picking poisonous mushrooms? I had examined the official mushroom identification chart and “shaggy mane” was missing! Shown, however, was a related species, Coprinus atramentarius” which is somewhat poisonous when taken with alcohol. The state had decided to omit “shaggy mane” lest it be confused with atramentarius, or rather, vice versa. I had planned to return to a spot near the embassy to get some that were just emerging the day before and found them all stamped flat. The KGB, of course. I mentioned it to the new security officer, who said, “Obviously they think you’re picking up microfilm wound around the stems.”

The Nixon administration was eager for some spectacular joint venture with the Russians in order to impress the voters, and, as I was told after my return to the U.S. by a colonel in the NSC, to gain the votes of the many NASA employees in Florida and California. Thus the Apollo-Soyuz space linkup was born. The Russians were wary, but Washington moved patiently. The scheme alarmed me, since it would involve a massive transfer of space technology to the Russian space program, which was entirely military. With such technology the Russian goal of an orbiting space station would be greatly advanced. I forwarded to Washington translations of articles in the Soviet press which spoke frankly of such military uses. An article by Academician Zuyevov said that from such a station targets on the earth thousands of kilometers apart could be located with an accuracy of a few tens of centimeters - i.e. missile targeting. Articles in Red Star, the organ of the armed forces, even spoke of launching missiles from such a platform.

For forwarding these translations I got the reputation in the White House and in NASA as a “hard-liner.” This underscores an interesting problem of Foreign Service reporting. If an officer does his duty by reporting facts which tend to call into question the desirability of a particular project or policy he may be accused of a personal distaste for that project or policy. If he fails to report such facts and the project results in disaster, he may be accused of concealing essential information. I thought I would avoid risk by expressing no opinion of my own and relying entirely on the published utterances of those with whom NASA proposed to enter into a joint venture. I was wrong.

I did what I could to bring the scheme to fruition, but there were other pitfalls along the way. A Foreign Service Officer must learn to disregard the official designations “Secret” and “Unclassified.” In fact much that is stamped “Secret” can be revealed without risk, and much that is “unclassified” should never be revealed. During the period when NASA was wooing Moscow it offered, in an unclassified telegram to me for delivery to the Russians, to help the Russians with the latter’s unmanned lunar landing, which was in difficulty. The McGraw Hill correspondent, Axel Krause, came to see me and asked if NASA had offered cooperation in the Russian space program. Some instinct made me deny it. That very day the NASA functionary who had sent the telegram was asked by suspicious Congressmen the same question, and he denied it! If I had told the unclassified truth to Krause I would have been accused of “poor judgment” if not sabotage.

Finally a NASA delegation was to arrive in Moscow to start talking. Since I learned by experience that visiting American scientists had to wait as long as an hour to get their baggage at the airport while the KGB picked the locks of their suitcases I advised the delegation not to lock their suitcases. The trouble was that the clumsy KGB, after examining the contents, locked the suitcases and two of the five NASA engineers had not brought keys. A locksmith got one open, but the other had to be broken open. Upon their departure there was an embarrassing moment when we had to search high and low for a string to tie it up with!

There was another embarrassing moment at the technical meeting. Lunney, of NASA, had brought a model of the crucial docking mechanism. When he put it on the table to show how it worked, it would not! “God damn, the thing worked perfectly when I packed it in Houston!” he cursed. The KGB had obviously taken it apart at the airport, and, unable to get it back together, had forced it and bent something.

Ambassador Beam was a quiet, but perfectly honest man. He signed my warning communications without demur.

GARY L. MATTHEWS
Soviet Affairs Officer
Washington, DC (1969-1971)

Gary L. Matthews was born in Missouri in 1938. He received a bachelor’s degree from Drury College in 1960, a master’s degree from Oklahoma State University in 1961, Columbia University in 1969, and a master’s degree in international affairs. He served in the U.S. Army from 1955-1958 and joined the Foreign Service in 1961. His career included positions in Germany, Poland, Vietnam, Malta, and Washington, DC. Mr. Matthews was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1996.

Q: So you moved over to Soviet affairs, SOV, in the Department of State, and you were there from when to when?

MATTHEWS: I arrived there in the summer of ‘69. At that time the Office of Soviet Affairs had two main sections, bilateral political relations, and multilateral political relations. Bilateral political relations was your day-to-day normal back and forth relations with the Soviet embassy in Washington, and of course our embassy in Moscow, and all the things that go on in terms of bilateral issues. The section I was in, multilateral political relations, was essentially to deal with all of the other issues where we and the Soviets came into conflict, for the most part, conflict and competition. That involved what they were up to in Asia, Africa, the Mid-East, Latin America and, of course, Europe. It also involved functional issues, certain scientific nuclear related issues, limited space cooperation. Many of these cooperative programs were in their extremely initial formulative stages. It was essentially a very competitive adversarial relationship. And most of my two years in that job was, in fact, dealing with the problems of how the Soviets were basically trying to screw us every place in the world that they could conceivably have a chance of doing that, and what we should therefore do about it.

Q: Who was the head of Soviet affairs at that time?

MATTHEWS: Spike Dubs was the head of the desk at the time. A great guy, a dear friend.

Q: He'd been chief of the political section, political counselor in Belgrade when I was there, and later assassinated in Afghanistan.

MATTHEWS: Herb Okun was the deputy director of the office, later ambassador to East Germany, and the UN, also a good friend. My immediate boss, the officer in charge, head of the multilateral political section, was Lewis Bowden. He's still around and I see Lew from time to time. And generally in that section we had five officers assigned to it. Jack Perry came in to be head of the section for my second year. We always had officers assigned there more or less who were experienced in the region of the world where you were tracking what the Soviets were doing, and dealing with the policy implications for the US. For example, our chap who looked at the Mid-East was someone who not only was an Arabist in our Foreign Service, but had also served a stint in Moscow. My watching brief was Eastern Europe and Germany, since I had experience in both of those areas. Similarly the other guy that worked full-time almost on China and other areas of the Asia Pacific had also served in that region. I'll come back to this office later on because some years later I came back to be the head of that office.

Q: Again, it was '69 to '71. In the first place, to recreate the time, could you explain how we saw the Soviet threat at that time?

MATTHEWS: Well, the Soviet threat was certainly seen as very real, very possible. This was in the aftermath still of the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia and the expressions of the Brezhnev doctrine. They had laid it out pretty clearly, this is how it was going to be, by golly, etc. Of course, this was also the period when we had our own major buildup in Vietnam, and the US perceived threats in many areas of the world, either directly from the Soviet Union, or backed by them, the liberation movements in Africa, Latin America, you name it. So it was a highly adversarial and confrontational time, and virtually all of our considerable work pertained to that side of things. There were very, very limited cooperative contacts between the US and the Soviet Union, including some limited cooperation on retrieving space objects which came down from orbit.

Q: Nuclear matters...we both wanted to keep other countries from getting in the club.

MATTHEWS: We had a committee for disarmament in Geneva, and there were the SALT negotiations.

Q: One of the charges that has been made, and particularly made a little later during the Kissinger time which would be just after you left there...or you got a little of that while you were there.

MATTHEWS: He was still at the NSC.

Q: Right, you were there during his time. We saw things as a global conflict with the Soviet Union, whereas most of the disputes, particularly the Middle East...the problem there was mainly Israel, there were other problems. In Africa most of the problems were at a local basis, and Latin America was the same thing. You were at the heart of the monster looking at it almost from what the Soviet Union was doing. Did you find you were at all in conflict with what you might call regionalists against globalists within the Department?

MATTHEWS: No, I don't recall any of that. In fact it was our office which had most of the contacts with the regional bureaus, obviously NEA, the Middle East Bureau, or FE, or East Asian Pacific affairs would have people directly dealing with these issues. But I can't recall any time really when...you're right, we did tend to take the global challenge as it was presented, and something which had to be dealt with. My recollection is that we worked quite congenially with the regional bureaus, and that there weren't any great differences of opinion in that regard. We also worked very closely with INR, the Intelligence and Research Bureau, which had a very strong Soviet and East European research office at the time.

Q: Your particular area of focus was East Europe and Germany...

MATTHEWS: And the whole then budding steps, some very tentative, many very propagandistic on the part of the Soviet Union and its allies, to marshall up a European Security Conference, the big grand poobah of all gatherings of European nations.

Q: What was the European Security Conference?

MATTHEWS: Viewed from 1996, or even a few years ago, one would say now that back then it really was the precursor to what eventually became the CSCE, the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. But at that time, and I well recall, it was seen almost entirely as a ploy on the part of the Soviet Union to score propaganda points, and to divide us to the extent it might succeed, to divide us from our good and loyal NATO allies who might be more susceptible to these insidious aspirations for contacts in this and that field. Not much happened. Every now and then there would be a major piece in Pravda or a Soviet government commentary on the need for this or that in European security, and we would mutter back about self-serving aims of this and then it would all subside until the next Soviet thing got cranked up. It seemed more or less perfunctory on their part. They were doing the same thing, by the way, in terms of Asian security schemes which we were equally suspicious of, with good reason I believe. It was all seen as being in that vein.

Q: From your perspective we're seeing a stepped-up Soviet domination within the area you're looking at -- the European, Germany and Eastern Europe -- after the Czech business, were the Soviets calling the shots a little more than before?

MATTHEWS: That's my recollection, that indeed they were. Now that you ask that, I think I have that strong recollection. At that time the great exception, the beacon of "democratic life" shining away out there was, guess where? Romania.

Q: When you're dealing with Romania, Ceausescu, this is fairly early Ceausescu. Well, medium Ceausescu, he'd been there for a while. Was there any disquiet on your part...I'm talking about our representatives and what we're getting from the embassy about what was happening in Romania?

MATTHEWS: I don't recall any. But on the other hand my good friends in the office of East European affairs, where I always thought I should have been anyway rather than in Soviet affairs, I can't fully ever recall anyone expressing undue concern about the course of events in Romania. Generally it was known to be the very authoritarian, dictatorial place that it was in fact was. But on the other hand, the whole region was so dominated by the Soviet Union.

Q: Well, actually, Nixon had made a trip there.

MATTHEWS: Nixon made a trip there, that's right.

Q: Probably '69ish. I remember when I was in Saigon in 1970 I had to get William Randolph Hearst II, who was as far right as you could come had been on a trip with Nixon going to Romania, but the fact he had a communist visa in his passport I had to personally vouch for him at the Saigon airport.

MATTHEWS: Yes, you've got to watch out for these people with communist visas in their passports. No, you're right, in fact that was the spirit of the times.

Q: Were you all feeling the hand of the NSC and Henry Kissinger during this time? Or were you kind of far removed from all that?

MATTHEWS: It was a very congenial hand in my personal experience. The chap at the NSC with whom we dealt most directly was Bill Hyland, who was and is a marvelous person. An expert in his own right, a very solid person. My memory is that on certain things we needed an NSC chop, though I don't think to the extent that you do now. Everything now flows electronically so essentially you get it that way. But back then it was a pretty big deal, call up the NSC and talk to the person...usually Bill Hyland if you needed a clearance because you were doing such and such. I recall doing that, several times, for greetings on national day events, pretty tame stuff but it seemed pretty exciting at the time. I don't have any memory of calls from the NSC, why have you done this, why are you not doing that? It seemed to be quite congenial.

Q: Were there any issues at the time that particularly engaged your attention, incidence issues?

MATTHEWS: The big, big incident of the time that affected my colleagues in the Office of Bilateral relations was the case of the seaman, it turned out a Lithuanian-American seaman who jumped ship, in Boston I think it was and was returned to the Soviet ship captain.

Q: The Coast Guard returned him after a rather perfunctory check. A lot of heads rolled on that one.

MATTHEWS: So that was a painful experience for many as you know. I know there were periodic problems and incidents of an espionage or other nature, although since my duties were in multilateral affairs it was really hearing about them from the colleagues who were having to manage the bilateral aspects of the problem in the office of bilateral relations.

Q: What was the feeling you were getting from the Soviet desk? Was there a feeling of comfort with Richard Nixon and Henry Kissinger in the saddle?

MATTHEWS: Oh, yes. I certainly have no memory whatsoever of any discomfort. It was felt, I believe, we all felt that we were managing the major relationship, challenge if you will, as handsomely as could be. There was, I think, a decent interface with our embassy in Moscow about issues and we always paid great respect and heed to cables from the embassy and particularly if they were from the ambassador himself.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

MATTHEWS: I think Foy Kohler was there for part of that time. Malcolm Toon, I think, was subsequently our ambassador there during part of my second tour on the Soviet desk. An assignment to the embassy in Moscow was sort of the Mecca for many of those aspiring to go on in Soviet affairs.

MCKINNEY RUSSELL
Cultural Affairs Officer, USIS
Moscow (1969-1971)

McKinney Russell was born in New York, New York in 1929. He received a bachelor's degree from Yale University in 1950 and served overseas in the U.S. Army from 1951-1953. His career included positions in Germany, the Congo, the Soviet Union, Brazil, Spain, and China. Mr. Russell was interviewed on May 10, 1997 by G. Lewis Schmidt.

RUSSELL: In the middle of '67, after 2 years in the Africa area office, I was transferred to take over the direction of the VOA broadcasts in the 4 languages of the Soviet Union that the Voice broadcast in at that time, Russian, Ukrainian, Georgian and Armenian. My earlier experience at Radio Liberty, where I was Deputy News Director when I left, prepared me for this job, as did my knowledge of Russian. Those 2 years were, I have to say, singularly demanding and complicated. There were 120 people in the division which had been, when I arrived, part of the European Division of the VOA. We all felt rather uncomfortable under that umbrella, since the problems we faced were so different, and I began early on working for the creation of a separate division. After 6 or 8 months, that was successful, and the USSR Division was created.

The non-Russian services were much smaller-the Georgian and Armenian services had only 5 or 6 members, the Ukrainian might have had 10-but the Russian had some 85 or 90...they were broadcasting in Russian 17 or 18 hours a day. There was a challenging range of complexities in that job. One, of course, was that of creating interesting programs every day for the audience, and it was an audience with which, at that time, I had never had any contact. I had never been to the Soviet Union when I took over this job in August 1967. I had hoped that soon after the move, say within 6 months, I would make a trip there to gain on the ground some direct sense of the audience. I made that trip in December 1967 to all four of the areas, Russia, Ukraine, Armenia and Georgia to which we were broadcasting.

The policy issues were very complicated, among other things, because there were political differences within the services, often between people who had divergent backgrounds and saw things very differently. In the Russian Service, for example, there were those who had come out after the 1917 Revolution who were men and women already in their sixties. Then there were those who had remained in the West during or after the War. And there were yet others, most of whom had come out in the 1960s. These different generations had very varied different experiences and perspectives and often they were at loggerheads with each other. There was a lot of mediation and keeping people apart that came with heading up that broadcasting unit at the VOA.

The most striking single event during my tenure was the invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968. When I joined the VOA, there had been no jamming by Soviet jammers since 1962. It was during the invasion, with the move of Soviet troops into Czechoslovakia, that jamming was reinstated and again created the problems of getting through that interference.

The mid-'60s were in general a period of Americanization of the VOA broadcasts to the USSR. My immediate predecessor, Terry Catherman, a particularly energetic and effective officer, had spent 3 years there, and had made it his policy to bring on many young Americans whose Russian may not have been perfect but who had a much brighter and fresher approach to broadcasting. He had introduced programs of popular music with the disc jockey work being done by young Americans rather than Russian emigres. Terry's predecessor had been a former Soviet general who had defected in 1934 in Athens, a man named Alexander Barmine. He was a very conscientious, very committed broadcaster, but also a very authoritarian figure, and one who did not think that young Americans whose grammar in using the Russian language that was not perfect should be on the air. Well, Catherman had made a new approach stick during his tenure, and I was very pleased to continue in the same track that he had initiated.

I was scheduled to go as Cultural Affairs Officer to Moscow in 1968 after one year in the Voice of America, but that transfer was postponed for a year until 1969. So I had 2 full years in the VOA, and still have friends from that period. There is a special kind of esprit de corps among Voice people that we foreign service officers came to appreciate very much.

The standard procedure in those years was that the heads of the various geographic divisions would be foreign service officers. The head of the Near East Asia Area would be someone who had recently served there, and the result was that there was usually a close and cordial personal relationship between the Agency's foreign service and the broadcasters. At the same time, though, in part because of the pressures that built up when broadcasters had been on the job for 10 or 12 years, 15, 18 years and had gained real expertise as broadcasters. Repeatedly there would be a foreign service officer who would move in as head of the division and this was bound to generate resentment.

A policy shift began later that saw civil servants, broadcasters with the VOA, at the head of the various division units. This must have started in the early or mid-'70s. By now it's become standard and there are very few, if any, foreign service officers in positions of broadcasting authority at the VOA. But despite some tensions in those years, it was, I thought, a very positive way of keeping two distinct elements of the Agency talking to and working with each other. John Charles Daly was the head of the VOA at that time, a serious American broadcaster and well-liked quizmaster, a very open-spirited, energetic man. An old friend from Radio Liberty days, Francis Ronalds, was VOA program manager. It was a very stimulating and interesting place to work, and I have, as I say, very fond memories of it.

I then went to Moscow as CAO, arriving in July 1969, arriving on July 2 to be exact, with my wife and children. The 3 children were, at that time, 10, 8 and 5. As CAO, I held the number two position in a five-officer post. Five officers and two locals made up the full USIS staff at the American Embassy in Moscow in 1969. We were not called USIS but were known as the Press and Cultural Section of the American Embassy, and that was then standard practice in the USSR and Eastern Europe. Arriving on July 2, the first thing that we did that was particularly memorable was to attend the 4th of July events at Spaso House and at the Embassy's dacha. Four or five days later, the Public Affairs Officer, Yale Richmond, left on home leave so that I was Acting PAO within a week after arrival.

Now on the way back to the United States, Yale Richmond joined the then Director of USIA, Frank Shakespeare, and PAOs from Poland, Hungary, Romania, Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia, for a PAO Conference in Vienna. This was the first time that Frank Shakespeare had met the Public Affairs Officers from Eastern Europe. He had been appointed by President Nixon as Director of USIA in the spring of 1969, and was a particularly activist anti-Communist in his view of the world.

Apparently, as I understand the story several public affairs officers later told me, the Director asked each what he thought would happen if Communist power were to collapse tomorrow in each of their countries. How the other people responded I don't know, but Yale Richmond reportedly said that he assumed that after -- at that time it would have been some 50 years after the communists seized power -- that many people in the Soviet Union would opt for some kind of socialism and that an immediate shift, a total shift into new political direction, seemed to him to be unlikely. This response reportedly made the Director extremely angry and very critical of Yale, to the extent that he removed him as Public Affairs Officer in the Soviet Union more or less on the spot. Yale Richmond never went back to Moscow then, and the USIS secretary, Mary Keeny, packed up his family's effects at his apartment and had them shipped back to the U.S.. He went on to an extremely active and effective tenure in the old CU, and is today a recognized expert on East-West exchanges. But in summer 1969, I thus found myself as PAO in the Soviet Union.

By late August Frank Shakespeare had decided that I could hack it, that I was the one he wanted to take the job, which put me rather on the spot, because here I was PAO with only two years of overseas experience in the former Belgian Congo. So, although it was at that time a Class I position, old Class I now corresponding to Minister Counselor, my rank at that time was Class III. I was in a way over my head, and had a lot to learn. At that time, I had, between working in the Radio Liberty and at the VOA, something like 11 years of experience of working and using the Russian language a great deal, so I was quite at home in it. I was able to get much involved in things Soviet without having to worry about interpreters or major misunderstandings.

First of all, I was very interested in supporting the VOA. I set up a system, soon after my arrival, of a monthly reporting and analytical airgram to the VOA in Washington. . In those days, the airgram was used a great deal. It was a message sent by pouch, not by telegram, and, in order to give the Voice of America broadcasters a sense of what was going on, what people were talking about, what might be interesting to them, my staff and I wrote every month a detailed airgram telling them what seemed to be on people's minds and trying to reflect the atmospherics of life in the Soviet Union. We also let the broadcasters know what their audibility was -- we set up a system of having travelers to other parts of the country take along a VOA radio on loan and try to tune in and report back to us on whether or not they had been able to listen to VOA.

Q: Were you able to travel quite freely at that time, or were you quite restricted?

RUSSELL: It was always a problem to travel at that time, but what made it necessary for us to travel was a rather interesting circumstance. In return for our agreeing in the original cultural agreement signed, I believe, in 1958 with the Soviet Union, to allow a very limited number of Soviet scholars to come to the United States on an exchange basis, a whole cultural agreement was developed under which there was also a system of national exhibitions. The Soviets would do an exhibition on some aspect of life there that they would send to us, and we in return, i.e., USIA, would mount one and send it to them. Our society, at that time as now, was a completely open one, but theirs unlike the present, was still tightly closed. Naturally, the impact of these national exhibits was far greater in their country than in ours. Our exhibit on education, for example, was shown in 1970 in the city of Baku, the capital of Azerbaijan, which had never seen an exhibit of any kind about anything in the United States. Its popularity was enormous. The arrangement was that an exhibit would be in the country for one year; it would go to 6 cities for about a month in each city and then take a month to pack up and move on by train to the next city.

Just before I arrived in July of 1969, a new American exhibit on our educational system had opened in Leningrad. The first time that I left Moscow was 3 or 4 weeks after arrival to take the measure of this important show. There were serious problems with it, including inadequate coverage of certain aspects of education, not very lively exhibits, in fact, a whole range of problems. The exhibit was to move on to Moscow in September and everyone wanted it to be as successful as possible in the capital. I recall writing a lengthy and detailed critique back to the Agency describing what was lacking or wrong as I saw it, along with comments from Soviet visitors and from the young American guides at the exhibit. The Agency responded very quickly and by the time the exhibit opened in Moscow, a number of improvements had been made.

The guides in these exhibits had learned Russian or knew it from the families. They were, of course, the stars of the show, because they would spend 7 or 8 hours a day talking to audiences and explaining, for example, how one got into a university or how public schools worked in the United States. There were 25 or so guides, young men and women and they took advantage of a very interesting opportunity to participate in the exhibits and gain unique access to Soviet citizens who came to the exhibit. It was unquestionably one of the best things that the Agency was ever involved in doing, because the long-range impact on the minds of the young Soviet citizens was very great and lasting.

The guides and staffs of the exhibits helped make an enormous difference, and many of them have now gone on to many kinds of other things. Jack Harrod was with one of the exhibits, perhaps the education one, and retired recently as Western Europe Area Director. There is a marvelous broadcaster at the Voice of America named Mary Patzer, whose Russian was virtually native, who got her start as an exhibit guide back in the '60s. In any case, the fact that this exhibit, besides going to St. Petersburg and Moscow, went to Ukraine, to Kiev, Baku in Azerbaijan; went to Tashkent in Uzbekistan, and also scheduled to go to Novosibirsk out in Siberia...six altogether interesting cities.

This meant that the USIS staff, which was called Press and Cultural, had to do the advance work, negotiate with the local Chambers of Commerce, agree on a site, to install the exhibit. It was extremely labor-intensive to do that and demanded a lot of effort. I made 2 or 3 trips to Tashkent by air, 4 or 5 hours from Moscow, or maybe more, to set the exhibit up there for its opening for instance. I recall being scheduled to go to Baku to open the exhibit there, and having prepared a short speech in the local language, which I was never able to give because the plane, it being deepest winter, was never able to take off. I recall that my wife and I spent over 24 hours at one of the airports outside Moscow waiting for the departure of the plane to Baku that never left.

Q: I have one question in that regard. The young people who were handling the exhibits up to that point had studied Russian, but these exhibits in other locations required the knowledge of other local languages...for example, Ukrainian, and so forth. Did you have young people who were also sufficiently fluent in these other languages to handle the question and answers involved, in showing the exhibits in these varied places?

RUSSELL: I don't think any exhibit we sent went to Ukraine without having Ukrainian speakers, though there were fewer of them than Russian speakers. There may have been Armenian speakers in those that went to that republic, but the principal effort was that, since Russian was understandable everywhere and we were going to have exhibits going to 6 cities and 3 of them were inside Russia, the guides would need a good command of Russian.

There is one interesting political event connected with the opening of the education exhibit in Novosibirsk, in Central Siberia. In May of 1970, when the exhibit was supposed to open, everything was all set and was going to be opened on, as I recall, May 9. A very significant group of people were coming from the United States, fascinated by this rare opportunity to go to Siberia. Frank Shakespeare himself was coming; William F. Buckley, who was then a member of the USIA Advisory Commission at the time was coming. There may have been a few Republican members of the Congress that were planning to come. They were all set to leave to go to Moscow around May 4 or 5 and go on to Novosibirsk and to be there for the opening of this American Education Exhibit.

Two or three days before they were to leave, I received a call very early in the morning from the Foreign Ministry to tell me that the Exhibit could not under any circumstances open on the intended day because there was a shortage of electricity in Novosibirsk. The exhibit used very little electricity, in fact, and the whole story was completely invented, but there was no room for discussion. The exhibit would not open and it would not be open until some time later when the electrical system would be fixed again. As a consequence, all of the visits by the VIPs coming from Washington had to be canceled.

It was only several days later that we realized what it was that had happened to cause the cancellation, or the postponement rather, because the exhibit did open a week later. That was the precise time, May 1970, when the incursion into the Parrot's Beak Region in Cambodia had been ordered by President Nixon and had touched off a tremendous storm of reaction and criticism in the Communist world. At a time when the propaganda criticism of the United States over this decision was so intensive the Soviets decided that it would look very bad to have Frank Shakespeare and William F. Buckley and other representatives of the American Administration wandering around, being seen, and reported on in Novosibirsk. It was a kind of a lesson to all of us that the reason that people give for something happening can often be far from the reason. It had nothing to do with the electricity. The faulty generator in Novosibirsk was all in Southeast Asia.

In those days our problems in Moscow were much affected by the problems and challenges of dealing with the Soviet authorities. The Foreign Ministry's Cultural Section, the Ministry of Higher Education, these organizations' people were extremely hard characters to negotiate with because they all had political agendas of their own to limit access and the ability of American cultural diplomats like us to what was going on in the country or influence attitudes there. We had all kinds of complex negotiations about these national exhibits. They would check the list of all of the books in the library that had come in, for example, and if in one of those books there was critical comment about Karl Marx, say, that book had to be withdrawn, not burned, but not put on the shelf.

There were politics everywhere, and it was rather exhausting. On the other hand, every time that you gained some fresh insight into what was going on in that society, it gave a special satisfaction that you had learned something that you didn't know before, something that was worth knowing and reporting. I found during those years we did a great deal of cultural-political reporting and received even, I recall, a commendation from the Department of State for the quality of the reporting on the cultural activities that we produced.

Marlin Remick was my Deputy at the time, a stalwart, first-rate negotiator with the Russians, and very helpful. Our Cultural Affairs Officer was Harry Gilmore, a State Officer on loan to USIA, who was later Ambassador in Armenia and is now the head of the Senior Seminar at the Foreign Service Institute. I recall that relations with the Embassy were very close because USIS, called the Press and Cultural Section, was very much part of the Embassy structure and one was treated on a par with other sections.

Working at this period in Moscow, when access to the society was so limited and policed so rigorously, U.S. correspondents and the Embassy worked quite close together. Every Friday afternoon, the Ambassador would meet in his office in an unclassified way simply to exchange impressions and ideas with the resident American press corps. We entertained each other a lot and became good friends during those years. For example, the New York Times correspondent at the time was Bernard Gwertzman who is now the foreign editor of the Times. A Time Magazine reporter was Stan Cloud, now an author and senior editor of the Time Magazine.

Within the Embassy, most officers were people of very high calibre. The recent Ambassador in China, Stapleton Roy was in the Political Section; Mark Palmer, Thomas Niles, William Farrell, Bill Maynes-these were some of the well known names in the diplomatic world who were all in Moscow at that time. It was an important place to be.

EDWARD HURWITZ
Political Officer
Moscow (1969-1972)

Edward Hurwitz was born in New York in 1931. He received his bachelor's degree from Cornell University in 1952. After serving in the US Army from 1953-1955 he entered the Foreign Service in 1956. During his career he had positions in Moscow, Seoul, Washington D.C., Afghanistan, Leningrad, and an Ambassadorship to Kyrgyzstan. Ambassador Hurwitz was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in August 1996.

Q: You were in Moscow this time from when to when?

HURWITZ: From 1969 to 1972.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

HURWITZ: The ambassador then was Jake Beam, he had just gotten there.

Q: How did he operate?

HURWITZ: He seemed to be pretty much low key. I don't think he spoke Russian at all, if any it was very, very minimal. He seemed to be not heavily involved. I don't know why. Maybe he was already getting beyond his most active period. He did go on to write a book, but I have not read that.

Q: Who was the DCM?

HURWITZ: The DCM was Boris Klosson.

Q: What was your job?

HURWITZ: The political section was divided into two parts. One was multilateral and one was internal. I was head of the internal section and had three people under me.

Q: Now this is middle Brezhnev wasn't it?

HURWITZ: Yes. It was 1969 and Brezhnev came in in 1964.

Q: Did you find any differences in the way you were operating then and the way you had operated earlier?

HURWITZ: Yes, there was a big difference. The regime closed in on itself with respect to contacts. When I was there in 1958-60, Politburo members would show up for the Fourth of July and there was a lot of contact. It was an atmosphere, I recall, for example, in 1958 at the Queen's Birthday Party at the British embassy, a lot of diplomats went in their cords suits and I remember standing with Kirichenko, who was a member of the Politburo, in a dark black suit and he looks at me and says, "Do you think I am dressed all right?" That came to a sudden stop and you were lucky if you got a few people from the America Section or a few of the technical ministries. No Politburo people or Party people would go around.

Q: Was there any sense that the embassy was being somewhat bypassed by the Kissinger/Dobrynin relationship?

HURWITZ: Yes, some things we only learned about later. Even Kissinger's memoirs talk about back channel. The most glaring example of this was made clear to us out there when Kissinger came to Moscow in 1971 or '72 and was there for at least a day without Beam, the ambassador, knowing about it. He had brought on his plane Dobrynin. So you have the situation where Dobrynin is chatting with Kissinger all the way across the Atlantic. Beam was left out of the picture entirely.

Q: In many ways one might say that Beam was particularly selected in order not to be a challenger.

HURWITZ: Yes, you could conceivably say that. Kissinger cut out not only the embassy, but the State Department too.

Q: How did this reflect itself on what you all were doing?

HURWITZ: It didn't affect my work. My work was very low level. We were seeking out information where we could get it. The newspapers became much less revealing, although they had never by any means told the full story under Khrushchev, they told less and less of the situation as time went on. So, I was doing again a lot one on one, man -in-the-street type of conversations. I would go to lectures, etc. An example during my first tour, although there were others later, right after Pasternak won the Nobel Prize, the press was full of denunciations of the Nobel committee and Pasternak was a turncoat, etc. I went to a lecture at the University of Moscow, a student lecture, and the lecturer is standing up there denouncing the book, denouncing Pasternak, saying the book says this and it is wrong. Then one student leaps up in the back of the hall and points his finger at the lecturer and says, "Have you read the book?" The lecturer had to admit that he hadn't read the book. That was the end of lecture, consternation.

This sort of thing didn't make the press and it was the kind of thing that we reported on. We reported on food shortages, salaries levels that were never published. It was the kind of thing that Kremlinologists were doing carefully with the analysis of the press and the journals. One of the great coups really along these lines was Marray Afeshbach who was analyzing data from seemingly innocuous Soviet statistics. But, if you put them together with other obscure statistics it showed terrible developments in infant mortality or in alcoholism or in population welfare in general. A lot of our effort was trying to determine what was really going on, where things really stand. It was not a question of talking about policy, you knew what they were going to say. And, certainly at my level, and even at Beam's level, it wasn't a question of making demarches frequently on what the Soviets ought to do. That was done by Kissinger, by Nixon.

Q: What were you getting about the Soviet attitude towards Vietnam?

HURWITZ: Well, the Soviets, and this became clear in so many ways, didn't know what to think about Vietnam. Yet, if you absorbed the line and you were inclined to spout it yourself, it was easy for a Soviet student or a man in the street to parrot that line. More often than that though, you came across this sort of conflict. The Soviets through many, many years of experience almost automatically wrote off what the regime told them. If the regime said so, it can't really be true. I can't think of any specific instance, but there were many instances where I struck up a conversation with somebody and after you got through all the praise for what the Americans did for them in World War II, he would then go into, "We don't know what is going on in Vietnam. I don't know, it is a question. Maybe you should be there, maybe you shouldn't be there, but if our press is saying that you are doing wrong, I am not so sure." The Soviets faced that problem in later years. Almost everything they said was almost immediately discounted, and that was true about Vietnam.

Q: Were you picking up disquiet about what China was up to?

HURWITZ: Absolutely. That stems not only to the concern about this huge neighbor that is making claims about Russian areas, but it is also a prevalent Russian racism that extends to the Chinese, and their own "black" people, the Central Asians. They are terrible racists.

Q: There had been a great push in the late '60s, Lumumba University and all that. What were you getting both times about third world students and their indoctrination or lack thereof in the Soviet Union?

HURWITZ: There were many, many incidents between black African students and Soviet students. Both sides were very unhappy with the situation. The Russians were unhappy with these guys going out with Russian girls or flaunting money, which even the limited money third world students might have, seemed like luxuries to what the Soviets had. And the Africans were unhappy with the way they were being treated. One would have to question in retrospect was this much of a plus or just throwing away a lot of money at something that had a counterproductive effect. I seem to think it was counterproductive. It certainly worked with some. I think it worked with Afghans, but they were neighbors and that would be a special case. It worked with Cubans because the Soviets followed up with enormous influx of technology and bought the Cuban sugar. But, in other cases, I'm not too sure how that really paid off. I don't think it paid off at all.

Q: Did you find since you were in internal affairs for the second time that there was a certain change of focus yet about looking at the nationalities as nationalities?

HURWITZ: Yes, it was beginning and again more so with the Baltic states. My view at the time I think was pretty much borne out, was that Central Asia was not an area that was either a tender spot at the time nor would it really develop into one. Central Asia with some exceptions, Uzbekistan is probably an exception, really benefitted--Kyrgyzstan, no question.

Q: Oh, it was very obvious that it was on the receiving end rather than the giving end.

HURWITZ: That was the debate that took place sub rosa all the time. By the time Khrushchev came in with glasnost, people could talk about it publicly. The debate was whether Central Asia took more from Moscow or was forced to give more. In most cases they took more. And, they were Islamic to the extent in most cases they were circumcised and they married and died with Muslim rituals, but other than that there was no real interest in Islam. That has sort of almost artificially been stimulated now.

Q: What about the Orthodox Church during this time, the '70s?

HURWITZ: I used to go very frequently but there wasn't much movement. Khrushchev, liberal as he was in other areas, was not very friendly to the Church. For years you would go to church and there would be only old people there, basically old women. We always used to go to the Easter service, which is bigger than Christmas, and you would have the midnight service and then there would be a procession around the church (Christ has risen). At all these events, outside partially held back, restrained by the police, there would be a big crowd of Komsomol types who had been dragooned into this. Although this was one instance I think where the political line, atheist line, was pretty much in line with what most students did honestly think. That is, the Church is corrupt, was a narcotic to the masses. This, of course, was stimulated by the press.

Q: What about the Jewish community at this time?

HURWITZ: Well, even during my first tour, we began following very closely the Jewish question. I did it partially out of curiosity to see what it was like. The congress was beginning to get interested in seeing what the situation was--not immigration that was too far in the future. Remember in 1948 Stalin was gearing up for the Jewish doctors plot but he died fortuitously. So, part of every officer's itinerary when he went to a town was to see whether there was a synagogue. Now that led to some odd situations. I remember looking for the synagogue in Lvov, which was a big center of Jewish settlement years ago. There was no active synagogue and I couldn't find it. The Russians very, very rarely had a phone book, and even if they printed one they were always unavailable, but they did have these information kiosks where you went and asked for an address or phone number and paid your three kopecks. I used to have these little jokes. I would go to a kiosk, and my Russian for a brief sentence was accentless, and I would ask for the number of the American embassy and they would get very concerned, they didn't know it. In Lvov I went and asked for the address of the old synagogue. She was very disturbed and may have even called somebody. So, I walked around town and finally went into a small bakery shop. The guy looked Jewish to me and I asked him where it was. He knew and pointed down the street. I went down there and it was now an indoor basketball court which was ideal because under the old system the men sat downstairs and the woman sat in the gallery so you had a place to play basketball on the floor and the spectators would sit around the top. We followed that in every city we went to if there had been a Jewish population.

Q: Was there something that was identifiable as a Jewish community?

HURWITZ: In Moscow, yes. In my first tour we went frequently to the main synagogue and in those days everybody was old who was going in. Around the synagogue on Saturday morning were old Jewish beggars. There would always be one or two Jewish guides who were working for the government who seeing you were a foreigner would try to separate you from the people so you couldn't talk to them and offered to bring you inside and talk to you. You tried to avoid that. That happened wherever there was a synagogue. That was in the '50s and the beginning of tourism and the Soviets quickly learned that they had to control the Jews that might be coming to either see relatives or see what it was like. That changed drastically in my second tour for one reason, the Six Day War.

Q: We are talking about the Israeli tremendous victory over the Arabs.

HURWITZ: Yes. That energized the Jewish population, particularly the young who had nothing to do.

Q: It also meant they were no longer losers.

HURWITZ: Right. It gave them pride. So, when you went to the synagogue on Friday night, the street was filled with kids dancing and just talking. We had an embassy officer who was assigned to go down there every Friday and just stand around and talk to people because you found out lots of things because the Jewish population by this time was willing to talk. This was sort of a turning point from a group that had been very frightened to a group that was becoming self assertive. Now, the older ones were still sort of frightened because they remembered the worst. These younger kids didn't remember the late forties. The Soviets gradually, even under Brezhnev, began to open up. There were Yiddish traveling theater groups that played for a few days in various cities. And then, of course, you had the opening up, the immigration infusion which began in the early '70s.

Q: Was the political section involved in the immigration?

HURWITZ: At first there was real immigration, they allowed it. We got involved in the whole issue of Refuseniks when they were shutting it down. That happened when I was on the Soviet desk in 1979. Back to the 1969-72 period, immigration was just beginning to get underway.

Q: Was there any Israeli representation of any sort?

HURWITZ: During my first tour there was an Israeli embassy which was closed after the Six Day War, so by the time I went back in 1969 it was closed, there was no representation.

Q: What about Arab representation during this 1969-72 period? Were they very apparent?

HURWITZ: Oh, yes. The Egyptians were there in full force, the Egyptian military people were there. I remember I got friendly, and it was sort of touchy for him but he was interested, with an Egyptian air force major who lived in my complex. He had me to dinner once or twice and we talked. He was a very nice fellow. It started because somehow they were delivering my "Herald Tribune" to his mailbox. But they were there in pretty big force as well as the Syrians and the Iraqis.

Q: What was the impression of our embassy to the relations of the Soviets with the Arab group? Was this a marriage of convenience or was there more to it? This was the Kissinger period when there was sort of the feeling that everything that happened in the Middle East was somehow instigated by the Soviets.

HURWITZ: I didn't work directly on that but, yes, I think the view was that we were backing the Israelis and the Soviets were backing the Arabs and that was that.

Q: Because, when you talk with people dealing with the Middle East they were saying that this was a home grown thing and the Middle Easterners were taking advantage of both the United States and the Soviets.

HURWITZ: I don't think we viewed the Soviets as stimulating any of this, but that they were to some extent clients which was taken as a matter of course, I thought.

Q: What about the feeling towards the Soviet economy during the 1969-72 period? Looking at this Brezhnev period, how was the economy?

HURWITZ: They were going through some difficult periods then, although it was much worse in 1981 when I went back for a couple of months TDY in Moscow as political counselor. It was far worse even in 1986-88. But, already in the '70s you were getting shortages, hidden price rises, items disappearing and reappearing either at smaller quantities for the same price or higher prices for the same amount. We all saw big problems, although I don't think anyone in the embassy had a big enough picture or privy to enough information to make global estimates as to what the Soviet economy might do or was doing. Things just didn't trickle down. Cement production might have been the greatest in the world but didn't mean a thing. Later at lectures in Leningrad we would hear things like, “The USSR is the largest producer of shoes in the world. Leningrad was the center of shoe production yet what we do with our shoes, the lecturer was saying, “is to take them directly from the factory to the warehouse. We don’t send them into the retail network because nobody wants to buy them. So, we just let them rot in the factories.” We were all beginning to see what was essentially a basic flaw in the Soviet system, and that is that there was no connection between production and consumption. The factories produced to meet a plan, not to sell. We were reporting this kind of stuff, but I don’t think anybody drew the conclusion at that point that if this continues they will be exhausting resources for no real gain. You could see the waste there. They were living high on the hog with oil exports, but not really doing anything with the proceeds.

Q: The thing we were really concerned about was the military threat and all accounts were that the Soviets were building up a tremendous fleet, had very advanced aircraft, tanks, artillery, etc. I would hear tourists come back and say, “How can the Soviet army be that much of a threat when the elevators don’t work?”

HURWITZ: We constantly reported on these anomalies that whatever the overall statistics say for production of A, B or C, it simply is not evident in the civilian economy at any rate. What is evident is exactly what you said, the elevators don’t work, things break down, people 50 kilometers outside of Moscow were living Tolstoyan lives in terms of food transportation and facilities.

But, I think what became clear and was becoming clear at that time was that there is a real separate approach to the economy--the best in resources, the best in facilities, the best in minds were devoted to the military production. And, this is something that we in the embassy really couldn’t see. At the time there were obviously overhead photos, but this was something that I didn’t see. And, going back now, I worked in the historical office for a while, you would see some of the reports CIA was doing and you would be looking down on pictures of submarines in various places and see what they had access to which didn’t exist in the embassy, at least at my level. So, you couldn’t see the best. If you looked at what we saw and the perceptive tourist saw, not just the Kremlin and things like that, yes, the feeling was that these guys were going to hell, they were not going anyplace. What we didn’t see was the elite military kind of devotion of resources.

Q: Looking back but also at the time, was there a mind set, do you think, within not just the embassy, but within the government, and maybe the United States in general, of the Soviets as being a threat and not looking at the other side, the major weaknesses that brought it down?

HURWITZ: Well, there were things that brought it down that were not evident at the time at all, in fact, didn’t exist. No, we saw the threat. Washington through all these intelligence reports was aware of the military capabilities. We tended just prudently to accept a lot of what the Soviets said about “We are the wave of the future.” We did see them active in all parts of the world. So, it was perfectly reasonable and prudent to consider the threat real. That we in the embassy and some other people who visited saw the weak parts of the Soviet Union, the economic weaknesses, the grumbling, public discontent, lack of initiative, yes, that was there but you still didn't say that despite all this other stuff it really was not going to work. I think we felt it would work.

What we didn't see at the time and neither did the Soviets see was that there was something else that would begin to work (and this is all retrospect, although we played a role in its beginnings), and that was that information could not be controlled. They tried, there was jamming, but in time technical advances just made it almost impossible to control. And the Soviets, I think were faced with a dilemma. If they were to bring the rest of the country along, to match the West economically, technically and militarily, they had to have contact with scientists in the West. They had to know what was going on elsewhere. That is the kind of dilemma. How do you keep abreast of what is happening and get nuclear scientists believing we are the best when they know that everybody else is doing a lot better? We contributed to that from the very beginning with the radio. I remember I had a funny feeling...I was in Donetsk, which is way in the south of either the Ukraine or Russia. It is an old coal mining area and where Khrushchev is from. I remember standing in the square, I had gone there in 1971, of Donetsk and looking around and feeling...I had been listening that morning to see whether VOA...that was another thing we carried radios with us to test VOA or Radio Liberty reception. Well, Radio Liberty and VOA came in very well and I was just thinking that these people need this information from the outside the same way that they need bread that they were buying at the store. The Soviets couldn't have it both ways. They couldn't show the world through exchanges and things like that, that they were doing fine and keep out the rest of the world. And that was something that hastened or made the fall inevitable.

RAYMOND ELLIS BENSON
Language Training, Russian Language Institute
Garmisch, Germany (1970-1971)

Raymond Benson was born in New York City in 1924. He served in the U.S. Army between WWII and the Korean War. He graduated from the University of Wisconsin and attended the Russian Institute at Columbia University. He joined the United States Information Agency (USIA) in 1957. His overseas posts include, Zagreb, Belgrade, Hamburg, Turkey, and Moscow. Mr. Benson was interviewed by Robert Daniels in 2000.

Q: Then in 1970 you went back to Europe.

BENSON: In 1970 I went to Garmisch. During those two years when I was the head of Research, the question of my clearance for service in Moscow was settled favorably. When I went to Garmisch to the U.S. Army's Russian Institute, it was as a step already signed and sealed to go into Moscow. This period of two years during which all of this was settled brought to a culmination all of the things you and I have talked about, Bill, in the preceding hours.

In the first place, Dick Davies began, greeted me as the head of Research, and said we must have lunch, so we had lunch. And he said, "It's too bad things worked out as they did in 1967, but this is a great job you have now. You can go in now as PAO (Public Affairs Officer) instead of CAO, cultural affairs officer, but we've got to get the clearance question settled, which remains is your father alive or not. There's no way that we can send you unless we can attest to that." I said, "I have no way of knowing," and he said, "I have an idea. You write to Mikoyan." I said, "What do you mean by that!?" and he said, "Well, let's go back to the office." And he called somebody in the State Department who gave him Mikoyan's address. Well, it was not a very elaborate address. He was then retired from his position as president, and he had an office in the Kremlin and everybody knew that he had an office in the Kremlin, so an address was sort of jerryed up. He said, "Write to him," so I did.

In 1968 in the autumn I sent a letter to Mikoyan, mailed it in Bethesda just in a post box, in which I said that for personal and legal reasons I should wish to know of the whereabouts and welfare, or something like that--of your colleague, Mikhael H. Benson. In the spring of 1969, I was mowing the lawn when a truck from the Post Office, came zipping up, came to a stop right in front of me there on the lawn, with a huge envelope from Moscow. I signed for it, and it was a letter from my half-sister, whom I'd never been in touch with before. She said, handwritten in English, "You were right to have tried to find out about our daddy," something like that, "in the way that you did." So then she goes on to tell me that he had died in 1964 and that she had a son, and so on, various other inconsequential family matters. I wrote back to her a letter which I thought was less than gushy--oh, we have found each other, and that sort of thing--I didn't do anything of the type. And I told the security people at USIA, to whom I gave a copy of this letter, a xerox of it, I said, "You see, we now know that he is dead." And they said, "We don't know anything of the kind. We have a letter from your sister. We don't have a death certificate." I told them that I don't know anything about her husband. I said he might be the chief of police of Moscow for all I know. I know that she is a doctor and she has a son, and so on, and my letter was very formal. I thought she should have it in the open, since they knew who I was. So, I wrote I am a Foreign Service Officer of the United States. I've served here and there and I am now in Washington, so on and so forth; and anything you have written to me before, I never received.

Q: We are returning to our Oral History interview with Ray Benson, today is May 1st, 2000. Ray, we were discussing your time in Washington with USIA and the experience of getting cleared to serve in the Soviet Union.

BENSON: I think we got to the point of my presenting to the Security Office of USIA the letter from my half-sister, which they said was not sufficient proof. She said my father had died in 1964. This was 1969. But it wasn't sufficient proof for them. I discussed the matter with Dick Davies, with others in the Soviet and East European area and with USIA's personnel people, and told them I really did want to go there. But there was nothing they could do, they told me, and time passed. Later in 1969, I was at my desk at USIA when I got a call from the Red Cross, Constitution Hall headquarters, and they said that they had a message for me, if I could prove who I was, from the International Red Cross in Geneva; they further said the message was from Russia, the Soviet Union. So I told them who I was and all that. They trusted me on the phone. They sent over a courier, and it was a copy from the Russian Red Cross to the Geneva International Red Cross for me. It was a copy of the death certificate of my father.

BENSON: Well, I had sent that letter which said “for personal and legal reasons,” and personal reasons were taken care of by the letter from my half-sister, and this was the legal document that I suggested that I needed. It did not say, they could not tell me, from which person or office it came; just that it came from the Russian Red Cross. Anyway, here it was. So I went back to the security people and the Soviet area and personnel people, and the Security people said, “This will do it,” and I was cleared just like that, no further questionnaires or panels or anything, for service in the Soviet Union. The question then was how to schedule my departure, so that it dovetailed with the departure from Moscow of the Public Affairs Officer there, who was then McKinney Russell. It was decided that what the Agency would do would be to appoint me to be director of the next exhibit, USIS exhibit, USIA exhibit, which would be going through the Soviet Union, and I would do that, travel with the exhibit as its director. When Russ left, I would leave off being the director of the exhibit and come into Moscow and take up that post. So they decided that the schedule was such--it would be about a year away that the exhibit would be going in--they decided that a good place to park me for a year would be at the US Army’s Russian Institute in Garmisch. I forget who replaced me in Washington as the head of the Research Service, but there was somebody who wanted to do it and who was available, and so this would fit.

Now there are always, certainly then, four/five/six/seven civilians at the Russian Institute in Garmisch. The State Department would send two or three, USIA one or two. The NSA had people there. The CIA had people there. The rest were military. The instruction was in Russian. The faculty was all Russians except for one who was a Serb who had been educated in the Soviet Union and through some circumstance that was very strange really but it doesn’t matter here, and an Estonian who had been in the Soviet Foreign Service assigned to Copenhagen when the war broke out and chose to remain in the West. There was a Chechnian, Afterhanuf.

Q: I know about him. In fact, I even met him at Radio Liberty in Munich.

BENSON: Sure, Abdulrachman Afterhanuf. The rest were Russians. It was an unclassified school; there were no classified documents there. By then, this faculty, they were all, to a man and a woman, stateless. There was another person who was not--no, she was married to a Yugoslav--she was a Russian, she was in the language department. So we spent the year from 1970 to 1971 in Garmisch. In the spring of the year, April first, April Fool’s Day, I got a call from Washington saying that Frank Shakespeare had decided that a friend of his, who was a Foreign Service Officer, Andrew Falkievicz, who had served in various posts and was desirous of being an ambassador--he was very conservative, he had very good connections--they couldn’t place him as an ambassador. He was relatively junior, he was a Grade 3 Foreign Service Officer, and there was no place to assign Andy, and he was going to assign him to Moscow and that was that. So friends called me from Washington, from the inner circles of the Agency, and said, “This is a disaster. No one was asked, but at the morning staff meeting--the one per week at which personnel, senior personnel, positions were either opened or closed; that is, people were told that they were open or people were told who would serve there--this was announced, to gasps from the people who knew me well, including Henry Loomis, who was then the deputy to Frank Shakespeare. He ordered a friend of mine--it was Walter Roberts again, who by then had been appointed to the position of deputy, you might call it a Deputy Under Director of the Agency. He would be the fourth person in the Agency. "Call Ray and tell him we owe him." So I got another phone call, this one telling me that they owed me and where would I want to go. And I said, "What, in heaven's name, is open?" The question of being on the exhibit is out of the question now. This was in the spring of 1971. What's open in 1971? Well, there was only Iran, which my friends said to me, "You would not want to go to," because MacArthur is the Ambassador there and he's very difficult to deal with.

I said to them that what I want is to go to the Soviet Union somehow sometime or a country proximate to it with which it has very close relations. That's of interest to me. So we were talking about Germany, perhaps Poland, Turkey, Iran, of countries where I could aspire to speak the language, but Turkish I didn't know. Turkey was going to be open only in 1972. They said, "We will assign you to Turkey as of 1972. In the meantime we will give you Turkish language training in Garmisch if the Commandant will allow you to stay.

The Commandant would, provided, in addition to Turkish language study, I did research on topics he would suggest, Russian-Turkish relations in certain periods, and I would read papers before the various classes. I said, "Fine, that's good with me." They sent a man down. They'd hired a man from Berlin and Munich, the United States Information Agency did, a Turkish émigré, linguist, married a German, living in Munich. He would come down by train every morning, five days a week, and try to inculcate into me, then he would go back. This lasted only a few weeks of the summer. He took a vacation. I went to Berlin to visit a friend with Shirley when we got a call from the embassy in Bonn. They were looking for me.

The Public Affairs Officer in Turkey had been assigned to Saigon because the Ambassador there, whoever he was [Ed: Ellsworth Bunker, ambassador to Vietnam from 1967 to 1973], knew him from an earlier posting. The Public Affairs Officer was leaving, somebody was going to replace him, and the ambassador said, "No, I want this guy, Bob Lincoln." So they called me and said, "How soon can you go?" I said, "I can go soon, but I don't know any Turkish. I know 300 words. It's a complicated language." They said, "It doesn't matter. He doesn't know the language at all, Bob Lincoln." And so at the end of July, early August, of 1971 we went back to Garmisch, and I packed up and drove to Turkey. The family followed more gracefully after I got set in the house. That's how my tour in Turkey began in September of 1971.

PETER B. SWIERS
Russian Language Training, Foreign Service Institute
Washington, DC (1970)

Consular Officer
Moscow (1970-1972)

Peter Swiers was born and raised in Brooklyn, New York. He graduated from New York University and entered the Foreign Service in 1961. He served in Greece, Germany, the USSR, Malaysia, and Denmark. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1994.

Q: Then what happened?

SWIERS: Then I went into Russian language training.

Q: Where did you go for your Russian language training?

SWIERS: I went to FSI. The teachers at that time were Nina De LaCruz and Mrs. Bouchet. Nina De LaCruz was from a minor aristocratic family, if I remember correctly. She had been born in Estonia where her father had fled from the Soviet regime and she ended up in Brazil with her family. She married somebody of Spanish origin and came to the United States, divorced and then became a teacher. She was there for years and years. She had a very elegant, old-fashioned way of speaking Russian, but she was an excellent teacher; there was no question about that. She had a native ability for it.

Q: Had you volunteered to go to the Soviet Union?

SWIERS: Yes, I volunteered even before my Harriman days. It resulted really when I was in the Op's Center in 1966. Frank Meehan was the senior watch officer. He had been in Moscow in the late 1950s through 1961. Then came the famous part of his career. Frank was the man who did the prisoner exchanges in Berlin and became a friend of Wolfgang Vogel, the infamous lawyer.

Q: He exchanged Soviet spies for American spies.

SWIERS: Abell was one of the cases that Frank handled. Frank was the one who had the major role in all in the Cheroniski affair though he wasn't quite as visible because he was then ambassador to East Germany. I have his address if you would like it.

Q: Yes, please.

SWIERS: He is somebody that would really be fascinating to interview. Frank urged me to consider Moscow even if I did not plan to make Soviet affairs a career. He said that one really needed to have a tour there to understand things. I had put in from the Op's Center for the language training which was scheduled for 1969. Naturally if Harriman had stayed on and the Democrats had not lost in 1968, I guess that would have been postponed. So I went into the language training. The other teacher was Mrs. Bouchet; she was not quite as cultured as Nina De LaCruz. The tension between the two classes was very visible throughout and at times quite amusing. Then there was another lady whose name I can't remember; she was from Leningrad. The training was good.

Q: How long was the training?

SWIERS: The training started in August with the three week area course and then you were supposed to be in language until June of the following year. In my case, that was until June 1970. Unfortunately, Bill Farrand, if I remember this correctly, had to leave Moscow for personal reasons about a month early; so I was pulled out of the course early. In addition, and this is one of those interesting choices that you make in your Foreign Service career, I had been promoted at the time and I was then told that since I outranked the other two that were going out that I would be chief of the consular section. That was a political officer's job in the old days and a very interesting one. However, that meant that I had to leave in June. I had the option of going to Garmisch for another year, but I didn't do it. I had the Vietnam business with Harriman and I really thought that it was time to get on with a normal job. In retrospect, it meant that I never acquired Russian fluency at a full level and today my Russian is really quite rusty. I haven't used it in many years. I went out then to Moscow. We entered the Soviet Union on June 22, 1970, and in retrospect I really think it's funny, as June 22 is Barbarossa Day.

Q: That's when the German's in 1941 launched their attack.

SWIERS: My wife and I had visited her family in Denmark. We had picked up a car; in those days, the two cars that were the highest rated by "Consumer Reports" for being trouble free were the American Motors Javelin which was sort of a sporty car and the Dodge Dart. Prior to leaving I met Tom Buchanan who was to be the political counselor - he was one of the real old Soviet hands.

Q: Where is he now?

SWIERS: Tom is here in Maryland. He lives just out on MacArthur Boulevard in one of those houses overlooking Little Falls Dam. He would be very fascinating to talk to. Tom got the Dart and I got the Javelin. We drove and arrived in Helsinki on St. Pance evening. The weekend was coming; so we decided to drive in the general direction of the border and we were about to reach the town of Paulbu which is this beautiful old Finnish town. It was the first Finnish capital. Just before reaching town, we had seen a sign for a hotel; so we turned and we came upon a place called Hikon Katano, which is a manor house that had been changed to a very lovely hotel overlooking the gulf of Finland. Why I mention this at all is because what its great claim to fame was it was where the Czar came to visit. This was Nicholas II. The whole family had been there and they still had the menu autographed by them. When drove to the border in those days you drove on this beautiful Finnish road. Then you began to know that you were in an almost "no man's land" or a zone which the Finns controlled very carefully because of the tremendous increase in the number of Finnish troops that you would begin to see on the Finnish side at the border. Basically you went through the town of Hameenlinna and continue on to the border and there was a small, very neatly done, Finnish border station where you would turn in your passport and then drive on a bit. This beautiful Finnish road would dead end at a barrier and on the other side was a young Soviet soldier. You could see fence all the way up and down on either side. The soldier would then first scrutinize your passports - not friendly at all, not welcoming you to the Soviet Union. When he saw that we were diplomats he gave us a little bit faster treatment, but I wouldn't say too much faster. They opened the gate and then you drive for another two or three miles along a winding, terribly maintained road. It was worse than roads normally were in the old Soviet Union. Eventually you got to this very large station. There you would park and go in with your passports and stand and wait. They knew I was a diplomat, but always the customs tried to get me to open the trunk. That was your first lesson; say "No." You refused; they knew you were diplomats and that was the end of it. Then we drove on through the beautiful Birch forests of Karelian, to Leningrad arriving fairly late in the evening. It was the high point of summer; it was quite nice. Beautiful as you came in even though it was slightly run down. We were put up in something called the Baltiskia Hotel which is where the embassy always put people up. It was a totally run down place and you had to pay to make the reservation. They had a little scheme there; they were pretty good businessmen in a certain way. If you were staying for two days, you paid for three; if you staying for four then you paid for five - there was a day for reservation. That was our first introduction to the Soviet Union. We had to park the car back at the Astoria parking lot; it was the only protected place and we didn't lose our mirrors - yet. Side mirrors went very fast in the Soviet Union in the old days. I remember going into the hotel to verify that everything was okay and came out to see my wife and son looking not frightened, but somewhat concerned. This rather unusual American car was surrounded by Soviets three to four deep, looking at it curiously. They were fairly polite. We took our bags in and went back and parked the car and then walked back again. The restaurant was closed, but then we had one of the positive experiences in the Soviet Union. We had a small, blond child, (he looked very much like his mother) and obviously we needed food and there was no food. We went down to the kitchen and explained it and instantly they agreed, because of the child. It seemed to take ages; there was nothing pre-prepared there; it was all freshly done and finally up came the best chicken soup you could ever have, plus chicken that was a bit bony but there was enough meat in it and some saulk - that strange fruit drink that they have - and potatoes and cold cooked cabbage and carrot salad. They came in beaming, because there was the little boy that was going to get fed, along with his parents, thank God. It was quite charming.

The next day we drove on to Novgorod, the beautiful old town with the Kremlin and stayed at a place called the Satko, just downtown. It was equally run down, but it worked. I think that's when we quickly began to realize that things worked. With the embassy, you had to file a note permitting you to travel and it was very clear that every point along where there was a State automobile inspection Police - the GUYE. They would have a post overlooking the road and as we passed, somebody would run out to note our license plate which had been given to us by the embassy. Sometimes they would see it from the tower and they would notify the next place that we were coming. This was a cycle that you had - literally from the Finnish border until we reached the embassy in Moscow. It sometimes had its value. Tom drove out later that year and there was some snow and he slid off of the road into a ditch. After a period of time one of the GUYEs came past and slowed down very slightly and then continued on. Within a short period of time, a truck showed up and pulled them out of the ditch, so that they could continue on their way. It was interesting that the truck came from the direction in which they were going, not the direction from which they were coming. One assumes that the GUYE from the one before was checking on them reports to the next one and it's the next one that is responsible for sending out the truck. So it had its advantages, one could say.

Q: You arrived in June of 1970. What was the political situation of the Soviet Union with the United States?

SWIERS: Very cold. It warmed up considerably within the two years that we were there. Vietnam was still going on.

Q: Nixon had been in power for little more than a year.

SWIERS: It didn't have anything to do with Nixon. Things started downhill again with the Sinyovski Danielle trials - that must have been sometime in 1966. We had that brief moment in 1968 when Kosygin came to Washington; then things went up a little. But then came the invasion of Czechoslovakia in the summer of 1968 and relations really deteriorated. Our relations became very cold and very formal. For other reasons, harassment surveillance had not yet started; that came later on. To travel around the country was very difficult. Even more difficult than usual. 90% of the country was permanently closed. Even the areas that were temporarily open would be closed at the time when somebody wanted to travel.

When I first arrived, as I mentioned, we relationships were very cold in political terms and for that matter economic terms - to the extent that there were any economics. We had very little contact with the Soviets other than "official" and that consisted of going to whatever ministry it was necessary to go to. Most of the time, we were required to do things through the foreign ministry. I recall one incident after another related to military attaches in particular going out and doing their work.

Shortly after I arrived, Bill Farrand took me to Donetsk where a naturalized American woman of Ukrainian origin had been arrested ostensibly for speculation - i.e. sending things into the country for sale to her husband's family and herself trying to smuggle gold into the country. A typical case because as it turned out and I think there was truth to it, she and her husband had been sending things back to his family in Mariupol from which both had come. I don't think they were married until after the war. The only member of her family left was her sister who was living in Lvov. The case was being dragged out and we were having quite a bit of difficulty getting to the bottom of it. It turned out that there were two elements to it: one of which we found about in the course of getting the woman out and the second in effect afterwards. Dick Combs, who is now working for Senator Nunn as his foreign policy advisor was with me during this time. The consular section was composed of three offices - the chief of the section and two others, Robin Porter and Larry Sumakes, both of whom are retired now as well. But when you normally went on a trip you took somebody from the political or economic Section with you. You always traveled in pairs. We generally got access, but we were not allowed to see Ishdonof until the actual trial took place. We were only allowed to go to Donetsk. We could then meet with the woman. She was allowed to come up to Donetsk in the presence of the KGB investigator. Because it was a smuggling case, it came under the jurisdiction of the KGB rather under the police which was part of the ministry of the interior..

It was very much like the FBI and the CIA together versus the local police. As you know they dropped the word "police" and called them "militia". I think they have gone back to calling them "police" again, but I'm not sure. The word "police" was close to being abolished with the revolution. As it turned out, the case was began when her husband's family had some type of break up and the people to whom all of these "care packages" had been sent, instead of using them for themselves, were selling them on the black market and then rather stupidly putting all of the money in the bank. They began to develop this huge bank account. Another branch of the family was in some type of political struggle at some lower level in the town of Ishdonof and was on the outs with the local party chief or the local government chief or both. She in many ways was the unwitting vixen in all of this, because when she arrived on a visit to the family, they had somebody to stick it to. Then began the investigation. In fact, they confiscated all of the money that these people had acquired as a result of their operations. We finally began to piece the story together. The reason they got her - she claimed that this was true and I would see no reason to lie because the amount involved was so small - was because she was a dental technician and had in her pocketbook a small package, no more than 1/8 of an inch thick of these little sheets of gold that dentists use. She claimed that she had forgotten that she had them in her purse. Whether she was carrying it as a little insurance in case she needed it we don't know, but it was enough to hold her in jail. It was only when this "investigation" was concluded after a period of several months, that she was then able to have a defense lawyer. Or rather the defense lawyer was then able to have access to the investigative materials. How much of the file he saw is unclear. The defense lawyer was Jewish and as one began to see that the only real positions that Jews were allowed to have in the judiciary system was as defense lawyers. So you had defense lawyers who were largely Jewish and the investigators who were largely Slavic. I thought that was interesting as to the structure of the society even then. He built a case, and basically all the defense lawyer could say was that she had to plead ignorance of the law. That was her best bet. Finally, we were allowed to go to Ishdonof. I believe we were there twice - once to talk to her and secondly for the trial. The first time, Dick and I stayed in a hotel and I remember that it was interesting because it was the first time that I had ever been under surveillance. It was very clear that people were following us around. The location was lovely, overlooking the sea, but you could already see the beginnings of the terrible pollution which built at an accelerated pace over the next twenty years. Today in the Soviet Union, many areas are an ecological nightmare. I remember this very large factory, presumably a chemical factory in Ishdonof, which was had about four stacks from which were spewing different colors acidic smoke from each stack.

The woman was staying with her family and needless to say the tension between her and her husband's family by this time was quite strong. They lived in a rather primitive house without any amenities, in the upper part of town with this view overlooking the water. Really primitive conditions, but they were not poor in that sense. The food was adequate; it was like a peasant's house except that it happened to be in the city. The case went to trial. The other relative's were there; they were all criticized for it. There were the usual three judges and she was convicted. They said that although her defense might have had some validity, the law was the law and so she was convicted and sentenced to two years in prison. But we were going to appeal it. It was interesting that as one of the judges came out of the court (she had looked sort of sympathetic throughout) she said to the woman in Russian: "By all means, appeal." That signaled something and sure enough a few months later we were up in Kiev in the court of appeals. By this time she was in contact with her sister who was furious with her that she had not been in touch with her before. She hadn't told us about the sister. Needless to say, she was still a little suspicious of us. It was very difficult getting her confidence. We went to the appeals court and within a few minutes there was the decision that while she had technically committed a crime, it was clear that it was unwittingly and since she had already been under detention for several months, she was released and she was not expelled from the Soviet Union. If there was no further incident within the period of the sentence of two years, the case would waived. We then went to the airport with her and the sister and got them on a plane to Moscow.

I remember that they stayed at the Metropol for the night, (they had money) so that we could get her out on the very next plane the next day. We took her to the airport as we did in those day to make sure that she got on. Somewhere along the way we got the other side of the story, or maybe it came out actually during the appeal case. She had been working in the labor office in Ishdonof during the war and when the Germans left, she went with them. She successfully convinced them or they began to realize that she had not been a collaborator and that she in fact had saved several Russians or Ukrainians who were being put into forced labor. She managed to frustrate that process a little and she did not leave with the Germans, but she was taken by the Germans. In any case, she got on a plane and went home and we never heard from her again.

Q: To follow-up on this, as a consular officer at that time this type of case was rather unusual because there weren't many American citizens in the Soviet Union and also the consular officers felt that by their presence it would help the case and it would also make sure that she would get out of the country.

SWIERS: Absolutely. The rule of thumb was "get them out of the country as quickly as you can". The rule of thumb was in terms of dealing with the Soviets was to get it over with and get them out.

Q: What about the presence of the court?

SWIERS: Basically our position was that this case better go smoothly. Needless to say, we were all in frequent contact with the foreign ministry. This was not a matter of presenting our side of the case, forcing it. Our question to them was "do you really want this," recognizing that this was a very low period. It was only later on in 1971 that one could see something changing. They were working on SALT I at the time.

Q: Strategic Arms Limitation Talks.

SWIERS: The Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty - SALT I - which was signed during the first Nixon summit.

I just described a good example of a case that we would have. Other cases involved Americans losing passports. They were much more complicated than usual because when they lost their passport they also lost the Soviet visa. Then we had to get the visa replaced and the travelers had to go through an agonizing process of determining for the Soviets when they entered and how long had they been in the country. Of course, if they had overstayed, there would be a problem. If an American ever got sick, which unfortunately a number of them did (they would make the mistake of arriving after a long trip and having stomach trouble en route or as a result of something they ate upon arrival, they would be put into Bubkin Hospital, which was an interesting place, for ten days for observation and by then their visa had expired), we had to go through that process of helping them to regain their entry visa and their exit visa. It was constant drama and a huge relief as one reached the airport and watched the PANAM plane land. These people looked at it as if it were heaven and get on it and on their way.

Q: Who was the ambassador at the time?

SWIERS: The ambassador at the time was Jake Beam.

Q: Could you talk about his method of operation?

SWIERS: Yes, indeed. Jake Beam was not a gifted speaker. He was, on the other hand, a gifted writer. He was a very shy man with very good political sense. He was a classic old line foreign service officer. His wife Peggy who is still alive - Jake died last year - was an absolute character. I think she may have been a foreign service secretary. She was very funny and a total contrast to Jake Beam. He gave his staff quite a bit of flexibility. He judged us accordingly. I remember when I arrived that there was a lot of nervousness about me because I had just been promoted and according to the rules I had to be chief of the section. I was only 32 and I looked terribly young. It seems the best way to get ahead in the foreign service is to look as though you're going to die the next day. I remember that Boris Clausen, who was the DCM, was particularly nervous; he thought that I was too young. This issue was highlighted because of the two fellows that I ended up supervising, one was five years older than I was and the other was four years older than I was. Both of them looked much older. Robin was absolute first class. I must compliment them; they were very good consular officers. There was never any tension because of the age differential. Robin had been in the Navy for a lengthy period of time; he was from an old Navy family in fact. It was an interesting period. Jake had confidence in me right from the beginning. On the other hand I really had to work on Boris. My age really worried him. Boris was a dear, but I guess he forgot that he had been that age once.

Q: I've heard stories that for the chief of the consular section, they wanted somebody tough there. Why was that? In other words it was not a traditional thing.

SWIERS: You had to be tough; there was no question of that. That's one thing they got with me; I was somebody who was very tough. Because you dealt with the Soviets, they would always try to intimidate the American official. In a real nasty period, they would just be nasty and would throw up bureaucratic obstacles. Their method of operations would be that if they could find a regulation to stop something, they would. So you had to constantly go after them. You could never take "no" for an answer. You would just have to go back and be quite forceful. I fortunately had the experience with Harriman and the Vietnam negotiations, which was quite a bit of help.

I do want to mention something else because I probably share a view closer to George Kennan's on this than I think many others do. I think quite often we tended to look at the Soviet Union simply in terms of the Soviet Union as a communist country. I felt that you should also look at it in terms of its history and Russia. Many of the systems that you saw, the ways of doing things, had been in existence under the Czar; it was very, very Russian. The double headed eagle had been replaced by the star and now the double headed eagle is back again. Interestingly enough, the fact that my first post had been Greece was enormously helpful as well - the Byzantine culture and Russia as the third Rome. One could apply a lot of the psychology that one had learned in Athens for example in terms of dealing with the Soviets and the Russians. I use the word Russian a lot and perhaps it's just because we're getting used to saying that again. I found it quite effective to deal with them in those terms. I think too often we tended to look at them strictly in Western terms and in Marxist terms, almost as though they were German. After all, Marx was a German but the Soviets aren't. They thought differently in many ways from how we did in the west. They had missed the Renaissance. There was that Oriental side to it as well. I often felt that Soviet Union was a schizophrenic society, constantly struggling between east and west. These were all factors that came to play and exacerbated the problem of a totalitarian society.

I learned from Harriman to was push them, to push them very hard. Be very hard, be very firm, be very tough, but at the same time make sure you always leave an escape, or loophole - something that would help them get out. When you've really backed a Russian into a corner and he felt that there was no way out, he would really come out fighting. I don't mean literally, I mean figuratively although sometimes it could have turned the other way. I think that was very important in dealing with them. Particularly in cases where you had consular matters, because after all we were dealing with human beings. We were either dealing with Americans who were in trouble for one reason or another or you were dealing with Soviet citizens who had come to the embassy for one reason or another. I never believed that you could sacrifice those people for whatever particular principles you wanted to establish.

Q: I think you're making a very important point. Our system is that the individual in the long run is more important than the principle. Whereas on the other side - am I overstating it? - the principle sometimes got to be more important than the individual. It's two different approaches.

SWIERS: Yes, two totally different approaches. We had that throughout and it was important that we dealt with them in those terms. I might talk about another incident involving Jim Peipert of AP. I don't know where Jim is now; I lost touch with him when he left Moscow. He had been summoned to an interrogation at La Bianca as a witness in a case that was being built. In retrospect, we know now they were building a case against Vladimir Vocovski, a dissident; he was eventually expelled from the Soviet Union and I believe he lives in Britain now. Jim wisely came to the embassy to talk to me about it. He sought embassy support before going to the Soviet interrogation. He agreed that I could demand of the foreign ministry that I accompany him; he would refuse to attend unless a consular officer could be with him. I think in that particular case I was paid what I consider to be one of the biggest compliments a Soviet ever paid me. It was an old consular officer type named Posnekov who was either GRU or KGB; I don't know. His English was excellent and of course he spoke Russian formally. I looked at the consular convention and decided that we could try to invoke article seven. Under the normal consular convention, the Soviets had either 24 or 48 hours before they had to notify us of the arrest of an American, or detention of an American. This situation did not fit under that category; in fact there was no real specific reference to this situation, but I found that under article seven, there was phrase concerning "protection" or something like that. I demanded it under that I be allowed to accompany Peipert; Posnekov looked at me and said in Russian, a word that meant sly and clever and it's usually derogatory, or it sounds derogatory. I was paid that compliment and I was also able to accompany Jim and we did go to La Bianca I guess I was one of the few Americans who have had the dubious pleasure of seeing the inside of a La Bianca interrogation room. The interrogator was a short, stock man - very Slavic in his appearance with what I would call "fish blue" eyes. They were dead. He was cold and he was formal and you realized that this person, if the system had changed again and allowed torture to be used or whatever else was necessary to produce a confession, he was quite capable of it. However, he was under restraint at this time. He was under even more restraint because he was interrogating an American witness to a case who had the American consul with him. So he was a little bit more careful. His room was basically bare except for a desk, a table with chairs and one portrait of Duzinski who had been the first chief of the Checa. Duzinski was Polish. I asked him where Brezhnev was and he said something to the effect of we only have him, meaning we only answered to him. From the manuals we found later, the KGB's description was the KGB only had to answer to itself. We saw that this was one of the things under Khrushchev, where what had been a ministry or separate organization became a committee of the council of ministers and that the subsequent chiefs of the KGB were members of the Politburo. That I think was quite significant in itself. Perhaps it goes back to an earlier discussion we had of the changes in 1953. One forgets that there was really a change in the Soviet Union with Stalin's death. If you were an ordinary citizen you didn't have to be concerned any longer if there was a knock on your door. If they knocked on your door there was a reason for it. Also the extreme methods which I learned about in greater detail in another case, which I will describe, were stopped. The KGB interrogator had some questions which turned out not to be anything particularly special in terms of how Jim. He knew the person and clearly what the KGB was trying to do was build a case against Vocovski as having betrayed something of the State to Americans. He also wanted Jim to sign the document. I had with me a copy of the criminal code of the Russian Federation and the criminal procedural code. It's a very interesting document if you read it because on paper they were quite similar to the codes you would find in any Western European country that used the Napoleonic code system. It was very clear that you didn't have to sign a document and you didn't have to admit things. There's a whole series of protections built into it. I counseled Jim not to sign and I understand Jim did not sign it. He did not have to do it. Needless to say the KGB guy was quite sour, but he realized there wasn't much he could do about it. On the other hand, I did develop a great admiration for the courage of a Soviet dissident who even though he might have been familiar with these documents, would be alone in a room with the investigator and perhaps others who would be harassing him, and threatening to harass his family and saying to him if you don't go along with what we put down here and sign it, we'll find something else to get you on. Of course in that system they were bound to find something on somebody. You began to get a real appreciation of it, but it was an eerie experience; I can tell you that. Going in there you felt totally what it means to be in a totalitarian society in terms of the police, the control they had as you came in, the uniformed KGB who were around. If I recall correctly, they wore a lavender band around their hat at the time.

There was another case. It was most interesting and concerned Alexander Doldent who was an American citizen, born in Buffalo, New York of Polish parents. He and his sister were born there. In the 1930s, the parents "returned" to the Soviet Union. I assume they had been born there before Poland became independent. They took their two children with them; they were one of those couples who had been attracted by the socialism. The Doldent children for some reason or another never accepted this philosophy and never became part of the system. I never explored the psychology of this in depth with Alexander. During the war, the parents were alive; the father became a chauffeur to some very high official, but there was something complicated in the life. The sister got a job with the British military mission during the war and Alexander was employed by our embassy. At the end of the war, the British got the sister out by putting her on a train to Helsinki sitting between two British military liaison officers. The sister was willing to leave. I believe their father had died by then. When I later met the sister, she had married an Austrian working for the IAEA and was living in Vienna.

Alexander, on the other hand, foolishly decided to stay on and take care of his mother. He had good job at the embassy. He even had an apartment in the embassy complex. He was in this “never-never” status - he was an American citizen and he had an American passport, but lived permanently in the Soviet Union. He had refused to accept Soviet citizenship. In 1958 he was, in the classic fashion, grabbed on what used to be Gorki Street (today is called Tavaya Street - named for the town Tavaya) and disappeared. What had happened to him was that he was first taken to La Bianca and then to Sukenofka which is even a worse prison, interrogated by the commander of the prison, who was a sadist. He nearly died and eventually was sent to the Gulag. Because of his illness, he was put into a hospital where he learned to be a practical nurse and developed a skill with medical books. Finally, in 1956, he was pardoned, not released, and forced to accept a Soviet passport. Then he made a living as a translator at a Western medical publications office until his sister managed to visit Russia in 1968 and relocate him. Then began the process of getting them out. I arrived in 1970 and we through a very difficult process trying to convince the sister and the ambassador in Austria that this was not a case to go public with. Something about the case bothered me and I felt that if we went public we might lose harm both of them. We kept putting pressure on the Soviets to release him as an American citizen. The Nixon visit was coming up and finally in September of 1971, we were informed that Doldent would be allowed to visit the embassy. I will be leaving quite a bit of this story out because there are some sad parts to it. I have some reservations about how our government originally handled the case; there are some participants who are still alive and I don't want to talk about them at this stage. But there was something about the case that disturbed me. There had been no real effort by the embassy to contact Doldent between 1948 and 1956. When he resurfaced in 1956, there was a decision to not contact him. When he came in to get what was left of his effects from the embassy, it was a surprise visit and there was no further contact with him until his sister arrived. That decision for those 12 years may have been correct; maybe be not. But certainly I disagree with the decisions that were made.

I remember Doldent coming to the embassy. I went outside to the police who were always in front of our embassy to “protect” us and I said to one of the officers: “I don't want to get into a debate with you, but there is a man by the name of Alexander Doldent arriving at 11:00 in the morning and he has full permission to enter and I don't want a hard time about it. Would you please go to your superior and tell him that?” and he said: “Oh we never stop anybody from coming in; we're here to protect you.” I said: “Look, let's skip it today and just do what I tell you.” I phrased a little bit more politely than that, but he got the message. As I walked back, I could see him signaling to a fellow officer and had him come in while he ran to the phone. At the appointed time, when I came out again (our embassy had two archways) I could see Doldent walking and I knew him instantly, even though I had never seen the man before because he looked like an American. It's something I confess that still gives me a certain emotion today. He had his head up high while a Soviet would come past the embassy slightly hunched over. There was something in him that made you realize that he was an American in spite of the fact that he had lived in the Soviet Union since he was a teenager. The clothing he was wearing was Russian, but he was an American. It was the most extraordinary feeling. I went out and put myself between him and the militia and brought him into the embassy. He started to tell me a story of what had happened. It was sort of an opening of things and I just pointed and told him that we would have plenty of time in the future to talk about this.

Q: You knew that the place was bugged?

SWIERS: Yes; there was no way that we could carry on a conversation, particularly if he wanted to say anything sensitive because I'm sure all of the bugs were on unless we had cleared them out. We simply assumed, that even though there had been a major effort to clean out back in the 1960s, that there were still bugs. It still took another three months to get Doldent out. They kept throwing up obstacles at the visa registration office. We couldn't quite figure it out. In particular, his new wife's mother had refused to give permission for him to get out. Your parents had to provide permission to emigrate if you were a Soviet (if you can imagine this) even though you were an adult. Finally in December 1971, we got Doldent out, but even at the airport they were still giving him a hard time at customs. I intervened and he wrote in his book later that I had leaped over the scales to come to him. I didn't quite leap, but I did come pretty fast and I flashed my pass and we went right in. I literally walked him to the plane and we got him out to Vienna and to his sister. It's interesting now that he can finally tell the full story. First of all, his wife's father was a KGB Officer. He and his wife were divorced but nevertheless it really upset the KGB that this was happening since they had a little son. More importantly though, as we learned a few months later, there was a report that a woman in Leningrad who had been one of the messengers for Solzhenitsyn's Gulag who had hung herself. A Norwegian correspondent named Paragel Hager, whom we knew, was PNGed after that. He had gone up to Leningrad to see this woman. She had been one of his contacts and I assume Paragel Hager was one of the couriers that helped to get Solzhenitsyn's book draft out of the country.

Q: We're talking about the book Solzhenitsyn's Gulag Archipelago.

SWIERS: The last time that Paragel Hager got to Leningrad he was accosted by "hoodlums" who beat him up and more specifically smashed his eyeglasses. He was quite myopic and he had no choice but to go back to Moscow and then he was subsequently PNGed. In fact my wife and I were at lunch at his house when he was late coming home; he had been called to the ministry. We were having lunch with his wife who was Danish, when he showed up to announce that he was PNGed. He laughed and said that he had completed his work, which I assume was being the courier for the "Gulag Archipelago." When you read the "Gulag" you'll notice that one of the principal sources for Solzhenitsyn's description of La Bianca and Sukanofka interrogations were a "AD" or "Alexander D;" that was golden. I think the KGB had a sense that there was something there, but they didn't have the facts. Doldent literally got out in the nick of time because when the book was published, they would have noticed the reference and I'm not sure we would have ever seen Doldent again. It was a very close one.

Q: We mentioned some of the things you'd like to talk about, such as the dissidents. Could you explain what dissident meant in the context of what it was at that time?

SWIERS: Even at that time one had to distinguish between a dissident; that is somebody who was objecting to the Soviet government in one form or another, but who was not planning to emigrate from the country and those who wanted to be emigrants. Most of the people that I dealt with were in that latter category. The first person who was more a dissident than an emigrant was Anatoly Sharansky. He was expelled; they accused him of making efforts to undermined the state - the usual charges - and then they added some spying things. We ended up exchanging of Sharansky for a few others - an arrangement who Frank Meehan helped to arrange. I often think he may have been not given him enough credit because he went public with Burt and all of the other people. But it was really Frank and his contact with Wolfgang Vogel in Berlin which resulted in the success of so many of these exchanges.

Let's start with Leonid Rigerman. We had a list of people in whom we were interested that we gave the Soviets every year. A specialist prepared that list for Nixon's visit near the end of my stay in Moscow. Leonid Rigerman was the son of an American woman and a Soviet father. I'm saying Soviet but I'm not really sure if he was Russian or Ukrainian; they were Jewish. The mother was an American citizen; the father was not and I'm not sure if the woman met him in the United States and if they married there. There was a large group of people who returned to the Soviet Union in the 1930s at the time of the depression. They were attracted by the "brave new world" they thought they saw in the Soviet Union. Some of them were disillusioned and some were not. Rigerman's mother whom I eventually met, left the United States; she was not disillusioned with communism. Maybe she was disillusioned with the way the Soviets implemented the theory and by the bigotry which the Soviets showed against the Jewish. Rigerman was conscious of being an American through his mother although he was born in the Soviet Union but had a claim to American citizenship. Once Stalin died and even during the periods of ups and downs since then, more and more information began to get through to the Soviet Union because of the such institutions as the "Voice of America," "Radio Free Europe" and newspapers. I think at some point Riegerman realized that he had a claim to American citizenship. One day when I was in my office I was told that there was a man outside my office who claimed to be an American. He spoke perfect English. I walked out and there was this fellow that looked like an American tourist. He was wearing a very nice jacket and tie and he had a camera over his shoulder. Once he entered my office, he announced who he was and that he was trying to get out. What he had done was to fool the militia in front of the embassy door into thinking that he was an American. That did not happen again, I can tell you! They knew about it because we were located in a secure area which was access-limited. We also had local employees who reported to the KGB and we were "bugged" as well. So the police realized that this guy had fooled them. I took down all of his information. I have always felt that if somebody came in and claimed American citizenship, you had to consider the case favorably. The object was to get the person out of the Soviet Union; we would worry about the technicalities afterwards. Needless to say the passport division did not always share that view. I was very distressed because this was the early Nixon Administration and these guys pretended to be high patriots. I remember when I went back I saw all these people with all of their Halderman-like crew cuts and their little American flags on their lapels. But at the same time they were still willing to keep the people out of the U.S. even if they had some claim. I asked Rigerman to return at another time.

Q: How do you spell his name?

SWIERS: R I G E R M A N. His story was written up in the newspapers when he finally got to the States; an aunt of mine actually sent me the article. He ended up in the Bronx where his family originally came from. I believe his mother and father had died by that time. In any case, the next time Rigerman tried to come in to see me, he called me; I knew there was going to be trouble and I met him at the gate of the embassy. At that time there were these big double gates for each archway of the embassy. We made a very strong principle of access, which was canceled sometime in the 1970s by Ambassador Malcom Toon after an incident when somebody set himself on fire or managed somehow to get to the consular section. I personally felt that it was a mistake; you had these incidents once in awhile, but it was important to maintain the principle of the right of access; what we did was simplify the militiamen's work. The north entrance was sealed off except for a door which was kept closed which made it easier to block people from getting in. On the other entrance, they put in one of those gates that went up and down. The second time Rigerman tried to get in, it was something to see because he was a little fellow and the militiamen usually resembled the Olofon caricature of the police.

SWIERS: I remember that I was protesting saying that they couldn't block access to the embassy. The militiaman said the usual thing about "We don't know who he is and he's a threat." You had to be very careful about how you handled things; you always had to remember that it was Rigerman that was going to suffer, not me. The worse they could do to me would be to PNG me. You have to draw that line. The militiaman finally got disgusted with arguing and picked Rigerman up under his arm. I can still remember Rigerman's eyes as he was being carried away. He was desperately trying to maintain his dignity but he had that look of a deer that was about to be killed. You could see his fear in his eyes. In many ways, this gave us a crisis that we needed and we made a massive protest to the foreign ministry. This was 1970; they wanted to minimize the number of incidents they had and we were eventually able to get Rigerman out of the country. I gave that story to the press. I thought that was a useful one to give.

In the Dulgan case which we discussed earlier, something bothered me about it and as we found out later on, he not only knew the details of La Biana and Sukonofka, an even worse prison then where a sadist was the commander and he actually personally tortured Doldent. Naturally he gave all of this information to Soschonika's for the "Gulag Archipelago." There were a number of other cases back and forth that got out with varying degrees of difficulty. It was interesting because we were building up to detente and occasionally we would have to stop.

One of the more difficult cases involved a woman by the name Dora Gashonawitz who had also worked in our embassy at the same time as Doldent did back in the 1940s. That was a case that we worked on for some time. I have to apologize, but the details have escaped me over the years. She was living somewhere in the Ukraine. I finally was able to get through to her on the telephone not too long before the Nixon visit and just before I left. We finally broke her out so that she could also leave. She likewise had a claim to American citizenship as did Dolgen and the others. Similarly to Dolgen, she had either been denounced or the police had been able to build up their case probably through Valinko. We've never been able to prove this, but it was generally felt that they brought her in and she cracked.

Q: What was her position?

SWIERS: She was the senior local employee. She was very efficient and was very good. I confess that I never looked up in detail when I got back what her background was, but it was always felt that she was another one of the Americans or partial Americans who had remained a communist. She was caring for her mother. She's dead now, I understand that she died of cancer. It was a very complicated story. As you know, we have many locals working in an embassy, particularly in the consular section. The ones in Moscow were terribly efficient. They did their work well, but you always knew that whatever they did would be reported to the Soviet government.

Q: We had an old woman who was our receptionist in Belgrade, just about this time and we were sure that she had to be reporting. But she would come and say "Somebody is seeking asylum;" she was trying to make the waiting room clear.

SWIERS: Mary would notify us if somebody managed to get into the waiting room in the embassy if we hadn't noticed. Sometimes that happened; somebody would get in. It was a strange relationship.

Q: They had a very difficult time and I think that all of us realized that, but you could work around it.

SWIERS: You could work around it; the question was how much were they doing because it was the only way to survive and how much was because they wanted to, which is a question that usually goes to the grave with most of them.

Q: Did you run across Pentecostals or Jews?

SWIERS: Pentecostals. There was a case but I can't remember the name. Her maiden name was a German name; she was an American who had gone to Czechoslovakia and lived there. She and her husband had been Pentecostal missionaries. Her husband was Ukranian and she had a Ukranian name. She had a substantial family in the United States who kept trying to make contact with her. They did periodically get through and they were desperate to have her come home for a final visit. They thought maybe she wanted to immigrate and she really just wanted to visit. It was one of those more ambiguous cases because again when I was finally able to get through to her, she actually complained to me that the embassy and her family had been making trouble for her because the local administration was very upset with her for seeking an exit visa. I think that case finally ended after I left. There were a number of them that were finished and I think that was partly because of the Nixon visit. I believe she did in fact manage to get over for a final visit with her family and made it very clear that at that stage in her life she had no intention of returning to the United States. So often these people had "acquired" Soviet citizenship - usually forced upon them. We had a strange process for these kinds of cases. We would issue the American passport, quite often limited just for travel to the United States; they would have to get a Soviet passport with a Soviet exit visa and then we would put a phoney visa in the Soviet passport. That seemed to satisfy the socialist legality which started to evolve after Stalin's death. Mary Lidvininko and her crew had the little stamp that they would use to do this; then we'd issue the parallel American passport. They used the Soviet passport to get out of the country and then used the American passport for travel once they were beyond the Soviet Union - e.g., if their flight had to put down somewhere, or they were stopping somewhere. Usually this didn't happen because they just barely had enough money to get out of the Soviet Union. The visa cost a huge sum of money, the tickets cost them and then they were only allowed to take out a certain amount of cash with them. That meant that they had to abandon all of their property and possessions. I can tell you that it was a regular process all of the time. The consular section was busy with these exits on one side and with protection of the American citizens on the other.

Q: What about American citizens who got in trouble there?

SWIERS: That was a hard one because you had many combinations of that. We would have people coming in to make trouble, or doing something that would get them in trouble - not necessarily political. Then there would be people who were totally innocent, and then there were people that the Soviet system wanted to go after when they came back. Let me start with the case of an old woman who had come the Soviet Union; I had Robin Porter take care of that one. When she arrived they found a disassembled pistol in her luggage; she was arrested and we went through a long process. She was quite elderly and finally we discovered, as did the Soviets, that she was bringing the pistol to shoot a member of a local government in the district in Ukraine where she had come from. He had betrayed her to the Nazis. She was sent out to a concentration camp or something like that and she was coming back for a final piece of revenge on this man who had done some terrible things to her and her family. Once this was determined and verified by the Soviets themselves, they gave her the technical penalty for bringing a concealed weapon into the country and then expelled her rather than put her in jail. Needless to say, the Soviets were delighted with get this information about the Ukrainian which they were going to use against him. I think he may have died.

Q: It sounds like in a way despite difficult relations the same thing goes on in almost every country. The greatest weapon of the consular officer is that you usually are working on the same side of the street as the authorities; they usually want to get rid of foreigners for the most part in their jails. They want to make sure their laws are observed, but foreigners are just a problem as if they can expel them after making their point, it's all to the best.

SWIERS: I would say that unless there's a reason - e.g., if she had been proven to have collaborated with the Germans, that would have been the end of it. The same went with this older woman; if there had been another reason I think that would have been the end of it. It varied from case to case, but I think there were three things I realized: one, there really was a change in the country with the death of Stalin. We have to understand that the ordinary person was no longer had to be afraid of a knock on the door and a "final" solution. If you basically just lived a normal life, while it may not have been a pleasant life, in fact it was a difficult life, you would not get in trouble on the political side.

Secondly came the emergence of a socialist legality. This development is also related to the Stalin period when people were simply shot. Afterwards the Soviets did ostensibly want to follow the laws; they could bring pressure to bear ( I'll get into this in the third case which is probably pretty relevant to where we're going) on the way they wanted the law interpreted. You could use the law against the government if you knew it. One of the things I made sure I acquainted myself with was the code of the different republics in the Soviet Union. So we if we used the Soviet code of criminal procedure, we had the two things we used for example in signing a document. One did not have to sign a confession under the procedural code, but naturally in very few cases, did the people not sign because their interrogator would remind them, unless they had the protection of somebody like us, that "Fine, we'll find another way of getting you." And they could, as we well know, the way the system worked.

The third thing was the bureaucracy. This was a massive bureaucracy, and in dealing with it one needed to realize you were dealing with a bureaucracy which was like most bureaucracies. It was simply accustomed to saying "No," trying to block, putting obstacles, and one had to overcome that all the time. The important thing was to keep your cool.

I guess there is a fourth aspect which was the psychology of a society that was essentially Eastern Orthodox - Byzantine in nature. I think too often people from the West started to deal with the Soviets as if they were dealing with Westerners. In fact that they were not; they had been split off from the West at the time of our Renaissance, and had adopted a highly mystical religion.

It turned out oddly enough that my experience in Greece was quite relevant. Some of the things I remembered in terms of dealing with the Greeks became quite relevant in dealing with the Soviets. The Soviets had a similar psychology in that they had both totalitarian and ideological components. Kennan has actually written considerably about that. Kennan I think gives more weight to what we were seeing to the view that the Soviet system was an extension of the czars under another system. I would say: "Yes, that was true," but you also had a schizophrenia which was brought on by the imposition of what was in effect a Western ideology - i.e. Marxism. It enabled them to be totalitarian in a way the czars never were. Nevertheless they never approached the efficiency of the totalitarian state that you found, for example, in the GDR.

Q: German Democratic Republic being eastern Germany.

SWIERS: I found that in many ways the only saving grace for the East Germans was that that government never completely achieved a "legitimacy" as you found had in the Soviet Union. Even in the eastern European countries where a regime was imposed, people somehow still reflected an element of their society. The East Germans regime remained in power simply because Soviet power was there, and then we saw this thing collapse.

Q: There was nothing to hold it. When you were there, did you get involved in the Nixon visit?

SWIERS: Yes, very much so. That was in May in '72.

SWIERS: Exactly. We divided up all the responsibilities. I had one of the escort responsibilities, and also the handling all of the passports and documentation. It was quite a visit. Very dramatic visit. Let's see if I can go through it. Would you like me to go through it?

Q: Yes, please. Was he the first American president to go there?

SWIERS: Yes, he was. I just thought of that the other day when the issue of whether Clinton should go arose. I frankly recommended to the White House that this was commemoration for the Russian people and their suffering. That it meant no approval of Yeltsin was really necessary; the Russian people would understand that - i.e., that the American president was coming to honor the Russian people; they know exactly what that meant; he was not coming for the government business or to argue that the Soviets facilitated a war by the Hitler-Stalin pact. That may be true, but the fact is that the Soviets ultimately lost 20 to 27 million people in that horrible conflict.

I remember that Harriman told me at one time that he always regretted that Eisenhower was not able to make it to the Soviet Union in 1960. In fact, and I want to be careful of my memory (I believe he said this as well; I certainly heard it elsewhere), that Khrushchev really used the Francis Gary Powers shooting down as an excuse not to have Eisenhower come.

Q: Because this was one of the main effects of the U2 incident.

SWIERS: It was, but Harriman felt, and I certainly did, that it was more an excuse not to have Eisenhower to come. They could have obviously very easily had the shoot-down and handled things quietly, but they decided to make an issue out of it. I think that the reason was because the Soviets understood (remember it was only 15 years after the end of the war), that there would be an outpouring of emotion and positive attitude toward Eisenhower that probably would have exceeded that shown during his 1945 visit to Moscow..

Q: He actually stood in Lenin's tomb with Stalin.

SWIERS: With Stalin and Harriman. Stalin did control the visit; Eisenhower planned to travel around the country; there was no question that the Soviet people knew who Eisenhower was. Another Eisenhower visit would have reminded them once again that Americans were their great helpers. Remember that Stalin tried to limit Soviet understanding of what lend-lease meant to the Soviet ability to sustain the war. He was unwilling to acknowledge Normandy. The Soviet Union was a continental power, but very few people understood the magnitude of effort required to make an amphibious invasion - far beyond that for mounting a land invasion. Nevertheless even Stalin finally and reluctantly acknowledged the Normandy operation.

So Nixon's visit was the first presidential, but naturally he could not convey the emotion that an Eisenhower visit would have generated. It was difficult to control, and I remember, almost to the end, going on one of the last buses with the remains of the delegation which included Marty Hillenbrand who was an assistant secretary of State, to Minukover. Nixon was leaving from Minukover to go to Kiev first and then to Leningrad or the other way around. Literally as the last bus was going they were taking the flags down in the streets and on the buildings; in other words, they did what they had to, but they did not want that to get too far.

I think the visit was overwhelming for the Soviets. An American president's visit is not simply Air Force One. Since he was going to three places that meant a steady stream of staff going from Moscow to Minukover to Kiev to Leningrad bringing in all their equipment. For a couple of weeks before Nixon's arrival and after, we were in seventh heaven because in those days the Soviet telephone system was distinctly primitive; even if you could place the call it would take several hours before you could get through to anyone, in part presumably because they were hooking up the listening devices.

While Nixon was there, we had the White House communications office which installed instant communications between the three cities which we were allowed to use. All we had to do was dial an embassy extension and you get on the phone this obvious military voice saying "Kiev, Sir." You would tell the number you wanted in Kiev and get right through. It is difficult to describe to the average American what that means when you could just take care of anything of that nature.

I remember very much the final signing and the announcement of the SALT treaty. Jerry Smith, our principal disarmament negotiator, and a number of others hit some final snags which were being negotiated in Helsinki; therefore they were delayed in Helsinki. Kissinger, though, went ahead with his press conference at the embassy cafeteria. To this day, I remember Jerry Smith coming into the press conference, furious, because Kissinger had, as Kissinger was wont, stolen the limelight on the announcement of the details and the briefing of the press on SALT which was obviously the crowning point of the visit.

Politically it really did represent an opening. I was there from '70 to '72 and you could feel things sort of loosening, remembering always what we were dealing with. But the key thing was, just before Nixon arrived, he made the decision to bomb Haiphong harbor and that was...

Q: This was in North Vietnam.

SWIERS: That was interesting on two counts: number one, the Russians went ahead with the visit anyway despite - I can't remember, was Kosygin actually in Haiphong at that time?

Q: He was there during one of the bombings, I can't remember exactly when.

SWIERS: The fact was that in spite of a real humiliation for the Soviets - not just because Kosygin was there but bombing just before the start of the visit - they went forward with the trip. I would say that Kissinger and Nixon correctly judged what the Soviet response to the bombing would be. It signaled how overriding to the Soviets was the bilateral relationship with the United States, and their desire to reach these arms control agreements and open up detente.

The second part of it was that at the time of Haiphong there was a huge coverage of it in the Soviet press, almost building up to the conclusion that they might cancel the visit. All of us, at almost the exact time for everybody, were approached by the locals in our embassy. We should put that, for the readers who don't know it, the Soviet locals in the embassy were not directly hired by the embassy. There was an organization called UPDK, "Administration for Assistance to the Diplomatic Corps," and we in effect contracted with UPDK for the employment of local staff in the embassy. They would be periodically called to UPDK for various conferences. When we bombed Haiphong they were called - that one was actually done quite openly. We were subsequently approached, all of us by our respective locals, really expressing deep concern over this Haiphong thing and the danger for U.S.-Soviet relations.

The visit was important, not just the formal statements which each side had been told to make -

they were almost identical, but for the way each phrased their comments. The Soviets looked at us and we saw a real fear on their part on two counts: one was the image they had of the U.S. formulated during and after WWII; we must never underestimate the Russian people's regard for the United States. It was very rare that we ever encountered personal difficulties in the Soviet Union, or let's say at least in the Russian part of the Soviet Union. On a personal basis, the average Russian was very friendly to the United States. Of course, there were officials who were nasty; there was this image of that.

There was also the very real fear of conflict in the mind of the average Soviet which remained from the war. We saw that in Afghanistan when they finally went into that conflict; we're seeing it again today in Chechnya; it has not left them. The effect WWII on them is much stronger than the effect of Vietnam on us. The important thing is that the Soviets went through with the visit and it was an enormously successful one.

I'll tell you another little anecdote of the visit. As Nixon was leaving, we went out to the Minukover; he was on his way to Kiev and Leningrad. Since it was in-country flight, he was going to fly on an IL 62 which was fairly new at the time. There were two IL 62s on the runway, but Air Force I was around somewhere. Kosygin accompanied him to the airport. I got up real close to the party; the Soviet officials knew me and I sort of fought my way up. I remember at one point, one of the Soviets finally said to me in Russian, "Mr. Swiers, you know you can't go any further than this." I sort of laughed back.

We were watching. I was right up close to Kosygin who had walked Nixon to the plane and walked back to the steps of the VIP hall at Minukover. He was standing there watching; the plane didn't take off, the engines didn't rev up or anything, and this went on for a good 15 minutes; and you could see Kosygin getting fidgety. Kosygin was noted for his temper; he was much more a technocrat than he was a real hard-line politician; you could see the red beginning to creep up on his face. Suddenly the door opens and out comes a stewardess followed by a crew member; it turns out there was something went wrong and the plane couldn't go.

So all of the Nixon party had to come down and get on the back-up plane. Kosygin was absolutely near purple with rage - the humiliation of that. Of course, he walked back and smiled, but you could tell that underneath he was fuming; I don't know what happened to the ground crew or the crew of that plane, but I suspect they never flew a VIP flight again; they ended up on some Podunk route out in Siberia. You should have seen the look on his face.

The communique which was issued ended up talking about a Quadripartite agreement had just been signed or was just about to be signed at the time of the trip. Somewhere the Soviets had inserted a reference to what they called the Quadripartite agreement on West Berlin. Marty Hillenbrand, who was in the bus with us, had not been in on the final draft negotiations; this was the major thing Kissinger and Nixon went to do. I remember Marty was really in distress in the back of the bus, but it was too late; the document was had already been agreed upon and included the reference to a Quadripartite agreement on West Berlin.

I don't know how familiar you are with that issue, but the Soviets always wanted to say it was only referring to West Berlin; we wanted it to say it was referring to all of Berlin; so the final agreement brilliantly done by Ken Rush was that it simply said Quadripartite agreement, and Berlin was called a referenced area or something. In many ways you can trace the unraveling of the Soviet system to that agreement, because it legalized, three years before Helsinki, which confirmed it, a relationship and exchange of information between East Germany and West Germany. In effect it broke an existing theory; there were a number of supplementary agreements to the Quadripartite agreement which finally acknowledged that what in the old days used to be called “interference in internal affairs” was acceptable.

PIERRE SHOSTAL
Political Officer
Moscow (1970-1972)

Pierre Shostal was born in Paris in 1937. He graduated from Yale in 1956 and from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy in 1958. His postings include Leopoldville, Kinshasa, Brussels, Lilongwe, Moscow, Kigali, Hamburg and Frankfurt. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on June 16, 1997.

Q: You left there in 1969 to where?

SHOSTAL: To FSI to study Russian for a year and then go to Moscow.

Q: What caused this move? Did you apply for this?

SHOSTAL: Actually no. It came as a surprise. At that time, the Embassy in Moscow had an Africa watcher. The job was created in the mid-'60s because of concern that the large numbers of African students coming to Moscow to study that they would be brainwashed and would have no American input into their thinking. So, a position was created in the Embassy to maintain contact with students and African diplomats.

Q: Before we get to Moscow and your Russian training, I know I've been through some sense of language training before and often you pick up quite a bit from your, not just the language, but also the culture and the outlook from your teachers. What was your impression of this?

SHOSTAL: Well, I was very fortunate and had a remarkable Russian teacher. By the way, it was a very, very small class, only three of us.

Q: Who were the three?

SHOSTAL: Peter Swiers and Jim Schollaert. Peter has been working for the Atlantic Council for several years and Jim Schollaert is still in the Department.

Q: Were you picking up anything about, I mean sort of what was your attitude about going into the Soviet Union at this particular time?

SHOSTAL: Well, it was an interesting problem, let's put it this way. At that time the Russian teachers at FSI that I had were people who had left Russia many years before. The principal teacher was really excellent, Nina Dela Cruz, left in the early 1920s when she was a small child. 1920s, in the early '20s anyhow. Her family was a member of the aristocracy. So, the view of Russian society, Russian culture that she gave us was of course, an old one that did not have the Soviet overlay. The other teachers had come out, both of them, during World War II. So, it was not an up-to-date view of Russia that we had. And, that was a problem that existed for several years until the first Soviet emigres started coming out in the late '60s, early '70s when you started getting people who had a contemporary view and experience of Russian society.

Q: What was the attitude, we're talking about '69, '70 about the Russian speciality? Obviously, in the '40s and '50s and early '60s anyway, this is where the top stars, the Kennans, the Bohlenes, the Thompsons and there was a lot of competition to go to Russia. Had things changed by this time, do you think?

SHOSTAL: To a certain extent there was still some of that esprit about it. We did have some really outstanding officers serving at the Embassy at that time. Stape Roy who was there; Mark Palmer as well. So, the Soviet career track was attracting some very fine talent. On the other hand, I discovered pretty quickly that the Administration at that time was not interested in having a strong Embassy and a strong Ambassador. This was the period when Henry Kissinger was National Security Advisor and was dealing directly with the Soviets, the back channel was of course the principal channel and most of what happened in policy terms was going on in Washington between Kissinger and Soviet Ambassador Dobrynin.

Q: I'm told at one point that Kissinger went to Moscow but the Ambassador didn't know he was there, or something like that?

SHOSTAL: I was there when that happened and that was really, perhaps the biggest shock that I had as a professional Foreign Service Officer. It was a shock of humiliation for the Embassy and for the Ambassador that Kissinger came and met with the Soviet leadership and the Ambassador didn't learn about it until later. I think that is just about the ultimate humiliation an Ambassador can suffer.

Q: You served in Moscow from '70 until when?

SHOSTAL: To '72.

Q: What was your job?

SHOSTAL: Well, there was some confusion about that. I had been told before I left that I was to be the Africa watcher, the liaison with African diplomats and students. When I got there I discovered that the Embassy was not particularly interested in my doing that. They wanted me rather to do other things. The other things being to monitor what the Soviet press was saying in terms of the United States, the theme of anti-American propaganda and trying to discern in trends there. That was a particular interest of the Ambassador and DCM. Another area of interest was Latin America. This was the period when you had Allende in Chile; you had a leftist military regime in Peru and it looked like the Soviets might be on the march in terms of influence in Latin America.

Q: That's when Cuba was there?

SHOSTAL: And Cuba was there of course. So, there was a lot of interest in the Embassy in coverage of that and in maintaining contact with the Latin American Embassies and getting to know Soviet specialists in the Latin American field. So, I found myself really kind of torn during the two years that I was there between, what on the one hand I had been told the African Bureau was expecting me to do and what the Embassy was expecting me to do. So, I tried to balance those things, but because there was an awful lot happening on the bilateral U.S.-Soviet track, as well as in Latin America, I found myself spending more time on those issues than on Africa.

Q: Let's talk about the African students and Lumumba University. What was your impression of the students at the University and I suppose other technical schools too?

SHOSTAL: Well, they were a very mixed bunch. There were some people who were very bright and talented, also trying to work hard to get a good education. But, that was by no means the rule. And, what I certainly learned very quickly was that most of the students there felt that they were in the minor league by being in Moscow. Had they had the choice, would have much rather been studying in the United States or in Western Europe where, they felt, the quality of education was higher, living conditions better, climate better. To me the big surprise was their view that interracial relations were better. I'd heard over and over again that African students were very badly treated by Russians on the street.

Q: They use the term "black monkeys?"

SHOSTAL: Yes, that kind of thing was very widespread.

Q: I heard that in Yugoslavia and talking to African students who came through when I was there. And, Bulgaria was particularly bad.

SHOSTAL: That was rough and of course, anything like African students going out with Russian girls exposed them to a lot of abuse.

Q: Did they have a little more money than the normal Russians?

SHOSTAL: In some cases, yes, but not in all of them. The stipend they got from the Soviets was very meager, but some of them had money from home.

Q: In a way, was it the sort of general feeling that this effort on the part of the Russians to create a new Soviet African man was pretty much on the way out and what had been done and being done at that time?

SHOSTAL: That period, 1970-72, I think marked a low point in Soviet interest in Africa. There was, a few years later, a revival of interest when the Soviets thought they saw opportunities to make strategic gains in Southern Africa, in Angola and eventually in South Africa, but that came several years later. That came when they started using the Cubans as surrogates.

Q: Let's turn to the other part of this international watch you had. What were you getting from the Latin Americans?

SHOSTAL: On the whole, an anti-Soviet attitude with rather mixed feelings about the United States. Here, I have to add that I've never served in Latin America and didn't speak Spanish, which was a handicap in dealing with the Latin Americans. My own contacts with them revealed that there were some Latin Americans who were really very friendly toward the United States, admired our country, but others that had degrees of skepticism and even antagonism which I felt pretty quickly in my contacts with them. But, I did have a number of very good contacts and even friends among the Latin American diplomats. Although it took some time to kind of develop those relationships, I'd say by the second year that I was there that it was really very productive in terms of reporting and in terms of my own understanding of what was going on. So, it was really valuable from the educational viewpoint.

Q: What about the situation in Chile? I'm not clear on my dates. When did Allende come in and when was he overthrown?

SHOSTAL: He came in, let me see, I believe it was late '69, or it may have been early '70. He'd just recently come to power when I arrived in Moscow. I can't remember when he was overthrown. I think it was '73.

Q: So, the whole time you were there, Allende was in power? So, you didn't have the repercussion afterward?

SHOSTAL: That's correct, yes.

Q: Was he the darling of the Soviet press? How was he playing in the Soviet press?

SHOSTAL: He was very much the darling of the Soviet press. Not portrayed as a Communist, because I think that the Soviets recognized that portraying him as a Communist would have negative repercussions in the United States. People who were hostile to Allende would say, "The Soviets, his friends, are embracing him as a Communist." So, they were careful to call him a progressive nationalist and somebody who was leading the struggle for liberation from Yankees Imperialism and that kind of thing.

Q: Were you getting cables from Chile and from other places, sort of keeping up on Latin American affairs?

SHOSTAL: To a certain extent. It wasn't frequent enough. I think this point that you're getting at is a very good one and that is that there was, and I think perhaps there still is a certain degree of bureau parochialism in the State Department. The natural tendency when a reporting officer does a cable, is to think in terms of sending copies to the posts that he most frequently deals with or that are really on his mental horizon. I think that showed itself, for example, in reporting from Latin America. They didn't include us as much as I think would have been useful for me to be well informed about Latin American affairs. I wouldn't say that it was entirely bad, but it wasn't as good as it might have been. I think it was symptomatic of a fundamental problem.

Q: What was the feeling that you were getting, both from the Embassy of the offices that had been dealing with this problem for a long time and from the Soviet press and your various contacts with the Soviets about Cuba?

SHOSTAL: On the official level for the Soviets, everything was hunky dory. Fidel Castro was a great patriot, a true Communist, etc. etc. Though, in talking, for example, to a Soviet journalist that I got to know there was definitely an undercurrent suspicion about Castro, that he was a kind of a cannon that might go off and do things that would embarrass the Soviet Union. He wasn't as disciplined in his approach to communism as they would have liked it, too impulsive in launching initiatives that didn't have follow-up and that kind of thing. So, there was among Soviet experts on Latin America quite a lot of skepticism. And, I think there was a worry that Cuba might also turn out to be an economic drain which to a certain extent it was. Let me just add to that. I think that the Soviet suspicions were overridden by the attraction of having a toehold right next to the United States, even though it was a tenuous one, which a few years before had led to possible conflict. So, the Soviets I suspect at that time were also suspicious of Castro's ability to drag them into a new confrontation with the United States.

Q: What was the Soviet government like and how did we view it from the Embassy during this period?

SHOSTAL: It was a very slow-moving, bureaucratic, uninspired operation. There was certainly nothing in the way of charismatic leadership from Brezhnev or Kosygin. You also sensed that any kind of impulse for reform that had existed with Khrushchev had really petered out. I think here the real turning point in all of this that produced a very defensive attitude and policy by the Soviets of putting down the government in Czechoslovakia.

Q: And this was when?

SHOSTAL: 1968, and I got to Moscow two years later. I think that what I perceived as the big fear internally of the Soviet leadership was that any real experimentation, any loosening up would produce a momentum that could end up in something like the Prague Spring. Now, what they tried to do, I think at that time was to very gradually improve the supply of consumer goods. During that period if you kind of looked at it from a two year time span, you could say, at least in Moscow and the major cities, that life seemed to be getting a little bit better. There seemed to be a few more consumer goods available, more variety of clothes, a little bit more variety in way of food, especially things like fruits and vegetables, exotic fruits and vegetables. But, it was still pretty miserable as compared with Western standards. Externally, I think that regime was beginning to really kind of feel its oats, it seemed to have recovered some self-confidence from the Cuban missile crisis.

Q: Of 1962?

SHOSTAL: That's right. The Cuban missile crisis of '62 produced a real shock in the Soviet leadership and they vowed never again to be in a position of such military inferiority that they would have to back down. They then embarked on a very intensive military buildup, which by the period of '70-'72 was giving them increased self- confidence. They were beginning to produce MIRVed intercontinental ballistic missiles and the Soviet Navy had been built up.

Q: Blue Ocean they called it.

SHOSTAL: Their Blue Ocean navy was perhaps not at the level of the United States', but was still considered by the American military as an increasing threat. And, of course, the Soviet conventional land forces looked pretty threatening at that time as well.

Q: As you're sitting there in Moscow, what was the feeling of what the Soviets are going to do with all this military might. Are they going to go through the Fulda Gap in Germany or what's going to happen?

SHOSTAL: I think there wasn't a very clear view at that time. There was a concern about what could they do, why were they building all of this. One area where there was obvious concern was the Middle East and whether the buildup would mean increased capability for foreign intervention.

Q: Air borne?

SHOSTAL: Air borne and that kind of thing. Well, not just air borne, but building a big transport plane for example, combined with the increasingly close relationships that they had with governments like Syria and, up until a certain point, Egypt. Remember Sadat only threw the Soviets out, I think in '71, or '72, but the Soviet relationship with radical regimes in the Middle East was very strong. There was certainly a concern about how Soviet military power could translate itself in the power balance in the Middle East. We had seen how in the 1971 India-Pakistan War Soviet military equipment helped tip the balance in favor of India. So, I think the principal concern was not so much tanks rolling through the Fulda Gap, but how the Soviets might use their military capability to tip the international balance in other parts of the world.

Q: What was the feeling, I'd like to take a temperature of people who served there. I've never served there. The closest I've gotten is Yugoslavia. Here you are, you've served in various places including Malawi, but to go to the Soviet Union, our great rival and you take a look and see people in lines for food and all that and other things. How were you looking at this great military strength and this obviously, terribly poor delivery system for the people?

SHOSTAL: There was a definitely, as we would say today, a disconnect between those two. Very quickly after most of us arrived there, I think we became very skeptical towards and even hostile toward the Soviet system. I think virtually everybody who served there departed much more hostile to the whole Soviet system, the propaganda, the system of controls, than when they arrived. I think this was the product of seeing how badly the system treated its own citizens coupled with the propaganda which of course painted everything in rosy colors. There was thus the hypocrisy and duplicity involved in it. It was very clear from even the limited contacts that we were able to have that the privileged lived much better than the average person.

Q: Special stores?

SHOSTAL: Special stores and all the rest of it. Sort of golden ghettos for privileged people, large dachas, hunting lodges, all those kind of things which the well-connected in the party were able to have while the rest of people lived in misery. This added to the hostility I think that we felt toward the Soviet ruling class.

In foreign policy it was for me a very interesting period in terms of changing official attitudes between the two countries. And, a real turning point in not just the attitudes, but in the substance of policy. When I arrived in 1970, that Fall, you had one of the real low points in U.S.-Soviet relations, occasioned by a Middle East crisis, the Black September events in Jordan.

Q: Could you explain what the Black September was?

SHOSTAL: These were radical Palestinians living in Jordan which appeared to be ready to overthrow the regime of King Hussein and to install a radical leftist Palestine regime. The King with considerable logistical and other help from the U.S., put down that budding rebellion. But, it looked at that time as if there might be a Soviet move with more direct involvement.

Q: The Syrians actually sent troops on the way and they turned back, I think after the Israelis set a few rules, you know what I mean?

SHOSTAL: That's right, yes. There was real concern that the Soviets might get pretty directly involved as well. You could have had a very nasty situation. So, that was a kind of low point. For the first year or so of my Moscow tour, relations were really very bad, because of that, because of Vietnam. But, beginning I would say in late '71, to early '72, Soviet attitudes began to change. I think that they felt that they had an opportunity to reach an understanding with the United States that would grant them recognition as kind of an equal partner, an international partner with the United States. Something which I think was a driving motivation for Soviet policy was to be recognized by the United States, by the rest of the world, as the other great power and co-equal in influence. That desire produced a policy that was very strongly debated, very stiffly debated within the Soviet government. At the time of the party congress in early '72, Brezhnev wanted better relations with the United States as well as arms control agreements, which I think he also probably wanted to achieve. Here I am speculating, but he probably wanted to achieve arms control agreements because he recognized that if he wanted to improve the standard living of the people, an all-out drive for military hardware and spending on the armed forces would make that impossible. So, he wanted, I think, to have the arms control agreements that would produce, first of all, greater stability strategically, but secondly also would at least restrain the arms race and allow the Soviets to do more on the domestic front.

The opposition to this course was ideological as well as prompted by the Vietnam War and there was a big debate in the Soviet leadership which Brezhnev won in the Politburo. We were able to track really the improvement of the relationship by things like talks between the Soviet and American Navies on ways to avoid dangerous incidents at sea.

Q: They'd been playing chicken with each other.

SHOSTAL: They'd been playing chicken with each other, they'd been a number of really dangerous incidents that could have gotten out of control and both sides recognized and it made sense to try to have some rules. But, these talks were also symptomatic of a desire of both sides to improve the overall relationship. The Administration at that time also was developing its triangular relationship diplomacy with China, which meant that to be influential in both countries we had to have improved relations with the Soviets to play off against the Chinese. So, it became a very complicated chess game, leading up to Nixon's first visit to China, and his visit to Moscow in the late Spring of '72, only a few weeks after he had first visited China. This of course was a very bitter pill for the Soviets to swallow. They had seen Nixon go first to China and then come to Moscow, but they still swallowed it. There was a final stumbling block, which was the Vietnam War and our bombing of Haiphong Harbor just a few weeks before the visit.

Q: As it was a Christmas bombing, I think it was?

SHOSTAL: It was in the Spring of '72 and touched off a new debate in the Kremlin about whether the visit should go ahead. The Soviets went through with the visit because Brezhnev felt that he had a strong commitment to go ahead.

Q: You were there when the news that we were opening up to China. First place, how did that hit the Embassy and then what was the reaction you were getting, both official and sort of unofficial?

SHOSTAL: It really hit like a bombshell in the Embassy. The first hint of it was picked up by our China hand, Stape Roy, who saw the first opening with the so-called ping pong diplomacy. He saw this as really the opening of a very significant change. The visit to Beijing by Nixon produced a lot of excitement at our Embassy, although we weren't quite clear as yet what the strategic framework for all of this was. It was one that did pay dividends, I think, in our relations with the Soviets because it gave the Soviets an incentive, along with the economic incentives to want to improve their relations with us so we wouldn't be completely wrapped up in the arms of the Chinese against the Soviets.

Q: What was the Soviet reaction that you were getting when this first happened? Were they sort of upset or how was the newspapers handling it?

SHOSTAL: The newspapers, as I recall, were hardly talking about it. That was their way of dealing with something they didn't like or that they found unpleasant, it wouldn't be mentioned. My reporting beat was not that area so much, so I really can't say or I don't recall what Stape and others were saying about what the Soviet Asia specialists were saying.

Q: Who was our Ambassador or Ambassadors within the '70, '72 period?

SHOSTAL: Jake Beam was the only Ambassador that I had while I was there.

Q: Can you talk a bit more about how in the political section it was perceived and who was the

DCM by the way?

SHOSTAL: Boris Klosson.

Q: About how this whole thing was perceived with Kissinger, particularly this is before Kissinger became Secretary of State and he was having in many ways, fun. I have to say it, but it sounds like having fun in his earlier days in the Administration doing things on his own and sort of rubbing the nose of his State Department. What was the reaction?

SHOSTAL: Rage and frustration, as it became clear, the extent to which the Embassy and the Department were being cut out of the action. There was really a feeling that we had a lot to contribute to the making of our policy, because we were on the ground and did have contacts on insights that could be helpful. But we also recognized that the people who were making decisions which really mattered weren't paying any attention to what we were doing. So, among the people who were motivated, very bright and ambitious, there was a lot of unhappiness. To what degree the Department was cut out, became evident during the Nixon visit itself, in the plans for what the Secretary of State should do.

Q: Secretary Rogers?

SHOSTAL: Secretary Rogers at that time. I remember being in one of the planning sessions with the White House party when somebody said, "Well, we don't have this particular afternoon anything for the Secretary of State to do." And, somebody said, "Well, we could send him to the puppet theater, there's an excellent puppet theater in Moscow." I remember saying, "You must be nuts. Can you imagine what the American press would do with a story on Rogers going to the puppet theater while Kissinger is negotiating all of these agreements." So, finally a job was found for Secretary Rogers which was to negotiate the agricultural trade agreement, the delivery of wheat to the Soviet Union.

Q: The Nixon visit. What was the impression of the Embassy of how it went?

SHOSTAL: It went very well. I think from the point of view of producing agreements, which was really kind of a yardstick. You had after all, SALT I signed at that visit and a whole range of others, bilateral cultural, agricultural, science and technology agreements. So, from that viewpoint it went very well. There was no question about it, both sides wanted to achieve significant results. There were, however, a couple of things that troubled us and really became a problem. One of them was the fact that we hadn't really consulted other allies, and I remember the day after the summit ended, as usual somebody went to NATO to brief the allies. They were outraged that they had not been consulted at all on what was obviously a major turning point in East-West relations. And, in particular that the United States and the Soviet Union at the summit had signed a joint statement in which the Administration had agreed to a lot of the Soviet vocabulary on how the relationship should be conducted, including the term, "peaceful coexistence." This was a very ideological loaded term which really meant that we were to stop confronting each other, but that ideologically competition could continue. And many of us in the embassy felt that that was a bad concession to have made to the Soviets because it seemed to legitimize this political trouble-making in the Third World.

Q: You said there were two things that didn't go well.

SHOSTAL: One was the content of that joint declaration and the other was the lack of any consultation at all with the allies. That was part of the secretive diplomacy that Kissinger was conducting.

Q: Was there any feeling at that time about this combination of Richard Nixon and Henry Kissinger, both of whom came to be very suspicious of their own bureaucracy and also this joy at kind of doing things on their own and feeling very much in charge. Did you get that feeling at that time?

SHOSTAL: Oh, yes. There was definitely an arrogance about the White House party that was there that was palpable and difficult to stomach. I must say among the top people in that group, the only one who I thought was really interested in what was going and interested in talking to people was Brent Scowcroft. But, the others in the White House staff totally focused on the President and anything that made him look good was what mattered.

To me it was also a very interesting moment, because in thinking back about it, what I was able to see at that summit was both Richard Nixon and Brezhnev at the peak of their power. Everything went downhill from there for both of them. The Watergate break-in took place a month after that summit meeting, so it was an interesting moment historically.

Q: What was our impression from the Embassy of Brezhnev at that time? What type of person was he and what motivated him and how much in control was he?

SHOSTAL: Very much a person interested in power who knew how to exercise it at that point. He had fought his way up the ranks. One of the interesting parts of that visit was that I had several opportunities to see him up close. He was somebody who had the aura of exercising power and was dominating, in a physical sense almost, the people around him. Very different from the feeble Brezhnev of few years later. I don't think that at that time he had much of an idea of what to do with power. He certainly did not have any thought-out strategic vision. He was more I would say a tactician in the sense that he knew he needed some breathing space in the arms race, for example, with the United States to keep things under control at home. During the time I was there he certainly had achieved ascendance and you could see that just by the way he was talked about in the Soviet press, over the other people in what had originally been called a Troika. When I first got to Moscow there was quite a lot a talk about Kosygin, the Prime Minister, being something of a reformer. The President, Podgorny, being something of an old Stalinist. Brezhnev was seen as somehow being between them. But, as time went on it was really very clear that Brezhnev was the dominant personality and the other two tended to fade.

Q: In dealing with the Soviets, were you able to make any contacts and all?

SHOSTAL: Some, but only limited ones. Some of the contacts that I had were among journalists, a few Soviet diplomats, a few people that we met on the street literally, but with whom I felt we needed to be very careful so as to protect them, not expose them or endanger them. And, there were some dissidents and people on the dissident fringe. But, it was a relatively small circle of contacts given the size of the city and the importance of the country. There were a lot of people who simply shied away and who really discouraged contact with us.

Q: What about trips? Did you take many trips and if you did, was the KGB presence there?

SHOSTAL: I took quite a number of trips and the KGB presence was almost always around and quite visibly so. They didn't really make much effort to hide that they were shadowing us. In fact, I think that they tried to make it quite obvious that they were as a way of intimidating us and of trying to limit contact with people. I think they figured that if we knew or we saw that they were following us we would be more reluctant to have contact with Soviets for fear of getting them in trouble. I tried to strike a balance between, on the one hand, doing my job and talking to people, but tried to do it in a way that wouldn't be provocative and cause trouble for the people that I was talking to. But, I did get to the Baltic, did get to Kiev a couple of times, to Georgia a couple of times. One big regret was I wanted to get to Central Asia, but that trip got canceled because of Nixon's summit. With trips outside of Moscow, I'm sure you've heard this from other people, there was always a problem of getting permission from the authorities. You never knew until the evening before you were going to depart whether you had permission. They would always keep us kind of dangling before we learned whether or not we would get permission to go to a certain place.

Q: Did you ever have any provocation by the KGB or anything like that?

SHOSTAL: Yes, one in particular I can think of. One weekend, a Saturday or Sunday, my wife and I went to one of the outskirts of Moscow and were walking around the street. I think we asked for directions from a woman who had a couple of children and we struck up a conversation. This woman invited us to her place, I think for a week or two later. So, on the appointed day, my wife and I and our two children got in our car and we drove to the area where they lived, on the outskirts of Moscow. On the way there we had to go over a great poorly paved road. As we were going along very slowly trying to avoid pot holes, a Russian car bumped into us from behind. It didn't do any serious damage, but enough that I got out and looked at what had happened and went over and started to talk to the people in the car behind us. Well, it was very clear that these were KGB people and were along for the ride really to harass us. So, we got to the house of the people who had invited us, I told them, "Look, maybe it's not such a good idea for us to spend a lot of time with you, because the police, the KGB is after us." So, we had a rather brief visit with them. I really was concerned about not getting them into trouble. The woman's husband was an Aeroflot pilot and was very uncomfortable during the whole time. I just felt that this wouldn't be fair to them. They were vulnerable and might get in trouble. I've thought often about that incident and I think, were something like that to happen today with my perspective, I think that I would not have cut off the contact as quickly as I did, because I think the point needed to be made, or should have been made that this was a problem of their government, not ours. In a sense I fell into the trap, played the game that the Soviet government wanted us to play, rather than standing firm which I think I should have done.

Q: But, it's very difficult, because you know how vulnerable these people are and is the game worth the candle? When you left in '72 what impression did you come away with from the Soviet Union?

SHOSTAL: I was revolted by the society, by the system that organized it, and on the other hand, very much taken by the Russian people that I had met. I really loved the language and the culture. I found that in the cases where we were able to make friends that these were really people of depth who cared about our friendship. So, it was really a very mixed feeling and I think a lot of Americans came away with that view, almost a schizophrenic view. The Russians as a people had our sympathy for their plight and at the same time we felt disgust for the system that they lived under.

Q: Where did you go from there?

SHOSTAL: From there I went back to Africa to Rwanda as DCM.

DAVID M. EVANS
Russian Language Study
Garmish Partenkirchen, Germany (1970-1971)

Economic Officer
Moscow (1971-1973)

Mr. Evans was born and raised in Philadelphia, PA and was educated at Harvard University and the University of Belgrade Law School. After service in the US Army, he joined the Foreign Service in 1963. As an Economic Specialist, Mr. Evans served in Warsaw, Belgrade, Moscow and London. In addition to his economic assignments, he served in senior level positions dealing with International Security and Counter-Terrorism. He also served as Political Advisor to the Commander-in Chief, US Naval Forces in Europe. Mr. Evans was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1996.

Q: Where did you go?

EVANS: I remember that I was at home, I think, in early 1970, when I got the call, "Would I be interested in going to Moscow?" Moscow was my ultimate goal, going back to my earlier studies of Russian, back in 1955, and this is where it was at. The only problem was, I knew that my wife didn't want to go. So, when I broke the news to her, or presented the question to her, she was very upset. At this point she had settled into a very good life. I don't think she had completed her master's degree, but she was working on it. She was teaching art. She was having shows. She is still teaching art in one of the Washington schools here. I didn't fully realize at that time, that she didn't just dislike going to Communist countries, she hated it with a passion. Her father took me aside and said, "David, do you really have to go to Moscow? Couldn't you just get a job here, or really, it would be better to quit the Foreign Service and do something else." I was appalled at this, because here was the fruition of all my life's work up until then, and of my studies and of my whole direction. I had gotten Moscow. Not only that, I was being offered the opportunity to go to Garmisch first, for a year of language there, and that was the more prestigious way to go, and certainly a nicer way to go. It caused a real problem. I consulted a lot of people in the family. This was the beginning, unfortunately, of a major problem in our marriage. Many marriages did flounder with Moscow assignments, particularly at that time. In the end my wife agreed to go unlike the wife of a friend of ours, who had a very similar career pattern, who absolutely refused to go to Moscow. Her husband came home and burnt his whole library of books about Russia and the Soviet Union, and everything. He never, ever forgave her. Of course, they subsequently got divorced. They had a very bitter divorce which mine was not. Anyway, we left Washington in the summer of 1970, and went to Garmisch.

Q: Could you describe the Garmisch experience? It was a year's course, it was called Detachment R, I think.

EVANS: Well, that name had stopped, I think. The Detachment R referred more, as I recall, to Oberammergau. By the time I went in 1970, it was the U.S. Army Russian Institute, not Detachment R. There were three State Department officers, and one USIA officer, and one CIA officer for five civilians in my class. Then, there was the regular Army class, which was a two year class for them. We were put in the second year, the senior year, as it were, with those military. The most memorable and unexpected aspect of Garmisch was that the Lieutenant Colonel in charge of The Russian Institute was a psychotic. I am trying to be accurate here in using words like that, but I think that is a fair description. He was the extremely bizarre type of military officer that you see depicted in certain films: totally irrational, knew Russian very well, was prone to great rage and hysterical reactions to the failure of students to perform the way he thought they should. It caused his military students, of course, a great deal of harm. I heard from them, mostly about his excesses. We were spared most of that, and I happen to speak Russian quite well, and he seemed to respect that and leave me alone. He was a bully, and unfortunately, one of the worst examples of a military officer. Garmisch, itself, of course, was a beautiful place to be, that goes without saying. The level of the instruction which was all in Russian, by Russian emigrates, was quite good, and their dedication to their work was very high. I liked and respected virtually all of them. Both the language instructors and the substance instructors, in political science, history, and geography met high academic standards. But, there was tension throughout the whole year, as a result of this Colonel's obsessive behavior. That made for a lot of personal and social problems; for friction between us and the military, very often serious. But, overall, I was pleased to be there and proud that I had been chosen to go to Moscow that way.

Q: Then, you went to Moscow from 1971 - 1973?

EVANS: 1971 - 1973, two year assignment, and I went into the Economic Section. By this time, I was permanently implanted in the Economic cone, which I had chosen, because way back in Warsaw I thought, that was the way that, ultimately, the Soviet system would crumble. I wanted to be in the economic end of it, because I thought it would be the key way to pursue my career goal of helping to bring down the Communist system. I think I was proven right in the long run.

Q: During your 1971 to 1973 period, can you describe relations? This is fairly early Brezhnev period. How were relations seen? Nixon was firmly in the White House, Kissinger was calling the shots, at that point.

EVANS: To the extent that, as you know, he traveled to Moscow several times, without the knowledge of Ambassador Jake Beam, another man of the old school, as was Ambassador Cabot. He, too, was in his last post. Relations in 1971 were terrible with the Soviet Union. They were exacerbated by a number of incidents on both sides, in the intelligence area, and in factions of the JDL (Jewish Defense League), for example, in New York.

One case was a JDL bombing of a Soviet diplomat's apartment. A fire bomb was sent through a window, and fortunately, for that Soviet, the child who was playing in the apartment, was not hurt, but could have been. It was viewed as a very serious thing. I think that occurred in July 1971. I arrived in Moscow with my wife and two small children. About three weeks later, our shipment of effects arrived. We were sent to live in a new apartment block, obviously just for foreigners, diplomats, and a few businessmen. We were one of the first families to be there, and at that time, they still had not completed the fence and the box where the militia men, the milimen, as we called it, with an extra key to monitor us. We had a very large, spacious apartment. It was not in the center, shall we say, and we had a car, because we drove in. But, we did not have a telephone for some time, which was very difficult. About three weeks after we got there, we were unpacking our shipment of effects, which was a great joy, and everything seemed to be in order. It got late. It was about 2:00 in the morning, and we were still unpacking the boxes. All of a sudden, the quiet night air was shattered by the unmistakable sound of glass and metal being smashed. I knew instinctively what it was. I ran to our balcony, we were on the eighth floor, and sure enough, looking down, I saw my car being attacked by three thugs wielding crow bars and hammers. They were systematically smashing every bit of glass they could find, beating in the hood, smashing in the doors, of my beautiful Oldsmobile, the first new car I ever had the luxury of buying. On the seventh floor, lived the junior Naval attaché, Steve Khime. He rushed out to see what was going on. We yelled down to each other. I was so appalled, I didn't know what to do, here I was, on the eighth floor. My wife had bought a big treasure for her, which was a big plant, and it was in a pot. My reaction was to take this potted plant and hurl it down to these people. My wife stopped me from doing that. She was not ready to sacrifice the pot, and of course, it would not have done any good. Steve shouted, "Well, I've got my car. Let's go after the bastards." We raced down and got in his car. By that time, the thugs had gone off. Of course, I knew that there wasn't any point in doing it, but, just for the hell of it, we went to the local police station to make the report. I just thought that I would do it. As we drove in to the police station, I noticed a white Volvo parked there. It was the car with the three individuals, so we went ahead, and I said an act of hooliganism has been perpetrated on me, and my car had been shattered. This was about 2:30 at night. So, of course, the policeman said, "That is impossible, there is no hooliganism in the Soviet Union, and therefore, there can be no hooligans, therefore this thing didn't happen." "Well, it did happen, and, not only that, but the people who did it, are right here, because there is the car." Well, I guess it was lucky we got out of there. But, I called up a friend of mine, named Bernie Gordsman, who is the correspondent for The New York Times, whom I had known at Harvard, and I told Bernie about this, because I was very upset about it. He ran a story, which ran on the front page of The New York Times and The Washington Post, the next day, naming me, and one other American diplomat, who had also come with me and whose car had also been demolished. This was the first and only time I had been on the front page of The New York Times and The Washington Post. It turned out that this was a retaliation for the JDL bombing, and possibly, because it was publicized, and possibly because, which I didn't know at the time, work was already underway for the planning of the Nixon visit next year. That was not the last nasty incident. There were a lot of nasty incidents, harassment, and threats, and so forth, against American diplomats in Moscow.

I have to say, and I'm being very frank in this interview, that the reaction of the American Embassy was appalling. I found myself, the victim, having my car demolished. But I was taken aside by the political counselor, and very severely reprimanded for having spoken to the press about this. He said, "Don't you realize that bigger things are at play here, and things that you don't know. You just can't go popping off to the press." I think I was right. I think it was very beneficial that it was publicized. However, the State Department refused to pay to repair my car, nor would they lend me another car. The Embassy garage said they would work on what they could. I called PanAm and I called General Motors, and miraculously PanAm, at no expense to me, flew in the parts, and General Motors, at no expense to me, contributed all the windows, all the headlights, new hood, new side panels, whatever it was, the chrome around the whole thing. But, I remember Ambassador Beam saying, "It is unfortunate David, but those are the breaks of the game, and we can't be responsible for such things. I realize you are going to be out of pocket for this." I thought that was pretty shoddy.

When we did get our phone in, we were subject to a lot of threatening, weird types of annoying calls. The Cold War was very much on, which made living there miserable, brought home all my wife's worst fears, and, although she very gamely taught art at the Anglo-American school, the situation changed radically in the beginning of 1972. This was when we found out that Nixon was coming for what was the first pattern of summit meetings. This was in May of 1972.

Q: Could you talk about the Nixon visit and what you were experiencing, and, from others who were dealing with it, how it went. What sort of expectations we had for it, in that whole thing.

EVANS: The Nixon visit in May of 1972 was truly a seminal event in U.S.-Soviet relations. It was, of course, an absolutely momentous event for the Embassy. It affected the lives of, I think, every officer, and therefore, every family at the American Embassy in Moscow, in the months running up to the visit, during the hectic time of the visit, and then, of course, in the mop-up afterwards.

The visit was announced to those of us who were not in the upper echelons of the Embassy. I was number two in a three man Economic Section, as First Secretary. In those days, the Section Chiefs were called "Counselors," now they have been elevated to "Minister Counselors," and then there was a Second Secretary. So there were three of us in the Economic Section. We were told, I suppose, around maybe, late February or March, that this summit meeting was taking place. Neither we, lower down, and I think not even the Ambassador himself knew that the negotiations for this visit had been carried on secretly by Henry Kissinger. He had come over to Moscow, without informing the State Department, without the Ambassador's knowledge; had at some time, been whisked out to private dachas for meetings with the Soviets, and on one occasion, had actually, been living in the basement of SPASO House without the knowledge of the Ambassador . . . Extraordinary.

Q: Extraordinary, yes.

EVANS: What we did notice, about simultaneously with the announcement, was the remarkable change in our ability to contact Soviet officials. We prided ourselves, in the Economic Section, that, although, we were only three, compared to about 12 in the Political Section, on being a lean, mean, team. We had a very active and up-to-date Rolodex of contacts in the various foreign trade organizations, ministries, and business associations. But, we were really unable to contact people. All of a sudden, we were. The Soviets sought us out, gave us their direct telephone numbers, and when we called, they actually were there. We used the analogy that everybody who went through that period, did, simply: the red lights all turned to green. It wasn't an amber first. It was from red to green. Everything was "go", as far as contacts. The atmosphere that I had described previously, with my car being demolished, and the harassment that we had endured on the telephone, and that sort of thing, all abruptly stopped. That was very beneficial.

The visit, of course, was remarkable, in that it was the first Nixon summit meeting with the Soviets. This started a pattern of annual summits, alternating between Soviet Union and the United States, and continued on, pretty much, regularly, until the Afghanistan period, and has continued on up to this date. So, it was an historic moment, setting the precedent for these summit meetings, at which, the precedent was also established of preparing a whole raft of documents and agreements to be signed. The summit meetings had various purposes, and one was to conclude agreements, which, of course, had been negotiated before. The first START Agreement was signed.

Q: START, being Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty?

EVANS: A whole range of treaties were signed by Nixon, I think there were about six to eight, believe it or not: on arms reductions, in science and technology, in trade, which very much affected the area in which I was working. It set off the period of what we called "economic detente" because the Bilateral Trade Agreement was signed. In fact, the summit started the formal period of detente between the two countries. Later, the trade agreement had to be ratified. There were problems with that, and a whole mechanism of implementing trade and economic relations was established, including the establishment of U.S.-Soviet Trade and Economic Council, which was to be chaired on the U.S. side by the Secretary of Treasury. There was also an agreement on the environment, and perhaps, cultural exchanges.

The preparations for it were my first exposure to the White House phenomenon. We were subjected to advance team visits and it was pretty obvious from the, almost fear, of the higher echelons, the counselors and the DCM, that this was something that had to be approached very seriously. I remember sitting in on one of the advance team visits when Haldeman and Ehrlichman came out, Haldeman being Nixon's Chief of Staff. He and Ehrlichman were referred to, among other things, as the two Prussians. Indeed, Haldeman not only looked it, but acted it. So, there was a certain amount of tension, pressure and almost fear, to make this thing successful, all the while, feeling that a whole lot of things were being kept from us that we didn't know about. So, we were trying to do the best we could to make the arrangements.

My involvement was in Kiev. Nixon was to spend, maybe two days in Moscow, and then a third day in Kiev. For whatever reason, the Economic Section and the Science Attaché were delegated to handle the Kiev visit, Kiev, of course, being the capitol of the constituent Republic of Ukraine. So, the Consul, Lou Bowden, and I, went down together with the Science Attaché and some administrative people leaving the third Economic Officer to hold the fort in Moscow. This was a couple days before the summit, to set up the logistics and work with the Soviet authorities in Kiev. One of my duties, to give you an idea of the degree to which this thing went, was to prepare instructions for the President's briefing book on how to eat Chicken Kiev. The White House was convinced that, going to Kiev, the President would be served Chicken Kiev. So, I had to research this, write it up: how you put your fork into it at an angle, away from you, so that the hot juice inside doesn't splatter on your shirt; the history of Chicken Kiev. Well, of course, in the end, they did not serve Chicken Kiev. They served some sort of beef dish. But, that shows some of the attention to detail. Another one of the interesting things, was the clear precedence that Kissinger had over the White House, and that the National Security Council had over the State Department. Kissinger was housed in the best villa, or palace, or whatever it was. It was quite grand, and the poor Secretary of State, William Rogers, was housed, literally somewhere out in left field, away from the cluster of the main players.

Q: But Henry Kissinger was close to Nixon?

EVANS: Right. He had significantly better accommodations, wherever it was. I don't know whether we have time for any anecdotes about it . . .

Q: I'd rather have the anecdotes. We are in no hurry.

EVANS: One interesting, and I think, telling anecdote, that I learned from my wife and son, and other friends, who were at the airport, seeing Nixon off from Moscow to Kiev, since I had already gone down to Kiev. Nixon was really successful, and triumphant, after his ceremonial state visit to Moscow, but he had to fly to Kiev. The Soviets, as a matter of pride, wanted him to fly on their relatively new flagship aircraft, called the Ilyushin 62, which was actually a knock-off of the Boeing 707, and not a particularly a good one. The Secret Service, of course, was against this, and felt that the President should fly down on Air Force One, which was parked at the airport. But the Soviets said that this would be a matter of great honor for them if Nixon would fly down on their plane, the flagship of their Presidential fleet. Nixon finally said, "All right." He overruled the Secret Service, and said, "I will fly down on the Soviet plane." So, the band played and great hordes of uniformed servants loaded up the plane with food, Kosygin came out to see him off.

Q: Kosygin was the President. He might have been the President, and Brezhnev . . . I mean, I don't know, there was a formal President . . .

EVANS: Right. Well, I would have to go back and check, because Kosygin, for many years, was the Prime Minister. He might have become President at that point. Anyway, Kosygin was number two, basically, after Brezhnev, and he was delegated to come out, and come on to the plane to see Nixon off. So, the Nixon party arrived, and my son, who was then about eight years old, took a picture that came out to be Nixon's pocket, but, he always treasured it, because it was a picture of a coat, and it was Nixon's pocket as he swept by. Nixon got on the plane, and the band played, and everybody was saluting. The engine started and nothing happened, and nothing happened. There was a long, embarrassing pause. The protocol people were starting to sweat, and mop their brows. A lot of stirring around, and finally the engine stopped. One of the rear doors opened and this long line of equipment, and white coated women came pouring into the plane, and began taking off all the food, and carrying it over to Air Force One.

Q: Oh, God!

EVANS: Everybody said, "Oh, my God," you know. So, Kosygin had actually closed the door and bid farewell, but he was now standing there, and was beet red. He went up to the plane, I learned this later from friends, and went into the plane and said, "Mr. President, what has happened?" He was informed by the Soviets that the pilot refused to take off because one of the engines was not working correctly. He said, "Mr. President, this is absolutely a great embarrassment to the Soviet Union, and to the Soviet people," and all of this, "you tell us what to do with this worthless captain," meaning decapitation or whatever. Nixon thought for a moment, and he said, "promote him." Kosygin stepped back and said, "why?" Nixon said, "because he had the good sense not to take off." I thought that was an interesting story.

Q: Very interesting.

EVANS: Anyway, they arrived a little late. We knew there was a problem because we were out in the airport in Kiev, waiting with the cavalcade, and all the numbered cars, and that whole business. Kiev went smoothly and no Chicken Kiev disasters. I got a very nice letter from Nixon, in due course, thanking me for my assistance. We then went back to Moscow, and suddenly realized the whole ground had changed. We were now in a dialogue with a country, instead of being in a hostile confrontation. We were actually in a working relationship, with, if not a friendly country, an engaged country, and that was a major, major change.

Q: You know, when you look at it, with the great annoyance of, you might say, the Foreign Service establishment, at Henry Kissinger playing these games, secrecy, and all, but all the same, something did happen, with the Soviet Union, which is often forgotten because of the China opening. Something really did happen from the Nixon/Kissinger combination.

EVANS: It did. But there were painful aspects. I'm sure the Soviets wanted to keep Kissinger visits secret. And Kissinger liked to play his cards close to the vest too. Moreover, Nixon did not trust many others. He had his problems with the State Department too. Many administration people have felt that the State Department was not to be brought into key decisions. We all know that. In this case, maybe that's the way it had to be. But it was tremendously embarrassing and insulting to the Ambassador to have all this happen without his knowledge. For Kissinger to come live in the basement of SPASO House was extraordinary.

Q: The Nixon visit was in May of 1972, and you were in Moscow until when?

EVANS: I was in Moscow until July of 1973. I had come a year before, and then remained another year after the Nixon visit. The two years were like, if not, night and day, certainly radically different as far as being able to work effectively with the Soviets; travel, have business contacts. Suddenly doors were open and I was tremendously busy with American businessmen, who immediately got the signal that, now is the time to start doing business with the Soviets. I was just inundated with work that second year and our section was still only three people. There was no staff increase there. Much of what I did tended to be with American businessmen. I participated in some of the negotiations, not the actual negotiation, but the process of negotiation for our first multi-million dollar deal, which was a ten million dollar deal. This must have been signed, maybe in the late summer, or early fall of 1972. It was for Dresser Industries, a subsidiary of Kellogg, to provide a foundry for a truck plant. In connection with that, I went down to a town called Togliatti, which is where the main truck industry was located, in a horrible area of Tatarstan. Things like that weren't possible before. Then, we had the business of American companies wanting to open offices and to obtain accreditation. Occidental Petroleum came over. Arm & Hammer came over. In other words, the welcome mat was out. The green light was on and it was all systems go for American business.

One evening, I was working around 6:00 or 6:30 in the office, and the telephone rang. This American voice said, he had been switched to me by the Marine Guard, this American voice identified himself as an American businessman. He and a delegation of air traffic control people from Raytheon and Westinghouse, a high level group, had come in. But something was either wrong with their visas or they had been so naive with all this excitement that they had failed to get visas. Anyway, they had been impounded in a hotel out at the Sheremetyevo Airport which is used to house people at when they either don't have visas, or they don't have the right visa, or for some other reason. The Soviets wouldn't let them into the country and held them until their next chance to be sent away on another plane. So, he called for help. Well, this illustrated the difference with what would have happened a year ago. I called my contact over at the Ministry of Trade or the Ministry of the industry that dealt with that sector. In any event, within half an hour, I was informed that they were going to be let out of the hotel, and given a bus, and a hotel reservation had been made for them, in town. I was delegated to go out and see that all of this happened and to escort them in. Now, that sort of thing would not have happened prior to the Nixon visit. It would have been unthinkable.

Q: What were you telling American businessmen when they were dealing with the Soviets at this particular time, when they would come in? People who come from American business really aren't that well informed. Nobody was informed on this. What was our line and your personal thoughts?

EVANS: You are quite right. The three of us, and the Embassy in general, and some of the western embassies were probably as well informed as anybody, except the old time. There were a few old time traders who were trading in chromium, and that sort of thing, with the Soviets, going way back. Obviously, we told them it was a difficult market with great potential. We told them that financing was a problem, that Soviet money was a problem, although, ironically they had more money then, than many of the Russians do now. Many of the problems we are looking at now, some 25 years later, are almost identical to the problems we had to deal with then. Bureaucracy was terrible. Red tape was terrible. There was a maze of contacts you had to go through to get to the right person. But, once you did, and had the signal an agreement was reached, you could go ahead. Multiple trips were necessary to establish your credentials, your interest. The Russians were testing Americans, as they did, I think, with all Westerners to see whether they really were interested in this and whether they were prepared to pay up front the money required, if it was a joint venture. "Joint ventures" was the big word at that time. Joint venture meaning an arrangement by which the American would put up the money and hope eventually to get it out in some way. So, it was a process of not trying to discourage Americans, but sometimes to try to tone them down, and say, "Look, yes, the light is green. Yes, in contrast to a few years ago, we are supporting doing business with the Soviet Union. Yes, the Government is behind it. We have this bilateral governmental body. Yes, it is easier to meet with the Soviets now. Yes, they want to meet with you. But there are problems in financing. There are problems in production. There are problems in quality, if you are not buying a raw material. And most Soviet manufactured goods, were out of the question." So, the emphasis was mostly on selling. The machine tool builders trade mission came over there. We were inundated with trade missions, I think every major association, like machine tool builders, and electronic producers, and agricultural equipment, producers sent over trade missions, there was much wining and dining, and relatively little business done.

Q: Were trade controls your concern, particularly about advanced equipment, or anything electronic, or what have you, that the Soviets might buy a few of these, and (1) turn to military use, or (2) they might copy them? Was this a consideration, or was that taken care of elsewhere?

EVANS: That was basically done, by most companies, back in Washington. They complained to us about it. But that was basically done in Washington, I think. We either held their hand on the issue or explained from our point of view why this didn't make sense in our long-term national interest. It wasn't a problem that the Embassy dealt with so much. It was just getting businessmen together in a climate where for years, you have to remember, we were mortal enemies. The idea was suddenly to get people together when the Soviets wanted, as Russians do, to combine a lot of drinking and dinners with business. We also advised American businessmen to be prepared to be challenged, to be drunk under the table, and that sort of thing. If you could hold your vodka as well as your Russian counterpart, then that pretty well assured you of getting on.

Q: What do you do in a situation like this? It's all very nice to have these drinking contests. But, let's say, for medical reasons, or just for personal reasons, you don't want to get into that, at that time. How did one deal with it?

EVANS: The medical reason nobody mentioned to me. There were some people, obviously, who did not want to, or couldn't handle, more than a couple shots of vodka. We just had to advise them to either somehow make do, but to keep raising their glass, and not drink it down, to the bottom, the way the Russians would, and then ask for another, immediately. So, the advice, basically, was to keep up the game, don't pour cold water on the Russians, after having a good time. What you had to do, was, very diplomatically, reduce the amount of drinking, but be part of the party. If you were a party pooper, that pretty well put the kibosh on your business relationship. First, they didn't like people who were like that, and second, they thought you were a weakling. It was a combination of macho and hospitality. There were also elaborate feasts which were paid by the State and the State run foreign trade organizations, ministries, and State owned things. There were false expectations on both sides.

Q: On the working level, when you weren't dealing with these trade delegations, and all, could you go and meet the number four person in the Ministry of Agriculture or elsewhere, and chat with him or her, have lunch, that type of thing, that you would do in other countries? Or was everything sort of a State secret, as far as getting information?

EVANS: We were able to do that, but, generally in pairs. For instance, the Economic Counselor and I would generally go together. He would call up, or I would call up on his behalf, and say, "we would like to meet with the head of the Foreign Relations Department of the Ministry or the Foreign Trade Organization for lunch," and they would say, "fine." Or they would call us up, depending on where the issue was. That again was different. We were sought out a lot. This was for receptions and dinners, particularly for a reception type thing, which meant, showing up, maybe at 6:00, and going on until 9:00 with this huge groaning board followed by caviar, which was flowing like water, that's a wrong analogy, but there was a lot of caviar. These tables were laden with food. But one-on-one was still not really possible. Our Embassy didn't encourage it either. So, it wasn't just the other side. But, generally, two of us, either the Counselor and myself, or if it was a thing that the third guy in the section was dealing with, he and that person would go. Later, when the Counselor left, I became acting Counselor. So, then, I would take the lead, and go with one of the other two. We did not entertain socially. In other words, this did not lead to inviting Soviet trade, or economic or business officials to our houses. If there was an occasion, like a visiting delegation, the Counselor might host a reception. But just to have a couple to your house for an evening, to watch a film or something like that, was still not possible, at least in our area. There were some areas of the Political Section, that were able to do it. My wife, as I mentioned, was an artist, and we had some artist friends. So, we had some Russians in that field, who came over to the house. But, they were still followed, even after the Nixon visit, when they left, and harassed for coming to our apartment.

Q: When you weren't dealing with trade, the Economic Section, in many ways, was one of the major thermometers. What about this creature, called the Soviet Union was up to? There was all this emphasis on the political side-- you have 12 people in the Political Section and three in the Economic Section. That represents the way we dealt with the Soviet Union. It was who was standing where on the Kremlin reviewing stand, or the Red Square reviewing stand. But, at least 50% if not more of what caused the breakup of the Soviet Union was the economy. This is the high Brezhnev period, but the economy was not producing the way the European economy was. How were you looking at it? We are talking strictly about the time you were there, 1971 - 1973, or so.

EVANS: Well, one of the first things the Economic Counselor did, the very first thing he did after the Nixon visit, was to submit a request to the State Department for more people. This was for the Economic/Commercial Section. I am proud of having been a major player in seeing to the establishment of a commercial office. It was in a building down the street from the Embassy. I recently talked with the Commercial Minister Counselor -- at that time, it was headed by a Commercial Attaché -- and the building is still there. That was the building I was largely responsible for getting up and running as a commercial office. We realized that we would have to have more people because, suddenly, economics, trade, and commercial relations were on the cutting edge. The political area remained sort of the way it was. But, I chose, purposely, when I was in Warsaw, to go into the Economic cone, because I felt that that would be the cutting edge of bringing down the Soviet system. I think I was right. That is what put the pressure on Gorbachev to make the changes.

Q: We are talking about the late 1980s?

EVANS: Right. So, the seeds were germinating. What did we see in the early 1970s? We saw this tremendous disparity between the Soviet military might, the space accomplishments, the research centers, and the civilian sector. The money going to science, the favored position of the Committee on Science and Technology, which contained the key people. Kosygin's son, I think, headed that committee. We don't know a lot about them. We knew that a lot of them were KGB types. So, there was that level. But, the rest, the 98% of the country, was floundering along, in less than Third-World status. You could drive through the city and see buildings that had holes in the walls. The way the concrete blocks were laid, they were not lined up, and there were air holes between them. Our building, where my wife and I and our two children lived, was a brand new building when we arrived, in the summer of 1971. It was way out in the boondocks. We were certainly in the city. But it was a 45 minute drive to the Embassy. It was surrounded by this sea, absolute filth of mud, which, on occasion, would be almost waist-high. The idea of landscaping a building was totally alien. The building was set in an absolute wasteland of muck. The dirt was unbelievable. I don't know what it is about the Soviet system or Communism, but, dirt in Communism is so much more filthy than anywhere else. It was part of the grease and the grime. The total lack of attention to anything. They started building a building next to us, and when we looked out the window, watching this, my children were fascinated. They would drive up in these old trucks, and, of course, the trucks were absolutely caricatures of trucks. It was amazing they moved at all. The trolley cars were packed with poor people stuffed in. Everything was decrepit, barely able to work. We watched out our window for several days as they were building something next door, which they eventually gave up on, which was typical. A delivery truck of bricks would come, all piled in, and then the truck would tilt up, and dump all the bricks. In the process, about half the bricks would break. At that point, a slew of, maybe, 15 workers would appear, and would load the broken bricks back into the truck by hand.

You had this tremendous disparity between national security achievements and the life of the average person. My colleagues would say, "How can they possibly have the GNP," estimated by the CIA? "How can they possibly be growing at this rate, and how can these figures be right?" Just your visual observation would lead you to believe that this was a decrepit economy, which was equivalent to something in the remotest part of Africa. Yet, we were told by the CIA reports that this was a booming economy; that investments were high; trade was expanding, and building was achieving greater goals. It was hard to believe. It was total nonsense. Sixty percent of glass shipped in the Soviet Union broke before it arrived. Seventy-five percent of fresh vegetables rotted before they got to the market. The waste was absolutely staggering. Now, people say, "Well, how come the CIA misjudged it so much?" One reason, and I do remember talking about this, at the time, in the early 1970s, was that the CIA prohibited its economic analysts from visiting the Soviet Union. So, all the reports that the CIA produced, were based on the statistics they were able to get, and they got most of those statistics, where from? . . . the Soviet Union.

Q: Is it just that they didn't want their CIA people to be exposed to the Soviet Union, I mean, because of fear of their divulging things?

EVANS: That's right. They were so afraid of a CIA person being compromised, drugged or hit on the head, or God knows what. Remember my previous stories about the Polish blondes. I suppose they still were worried about Russian blondes. If we have time, I'll tell you an interesting story on that score. In any event, it was well known, that while we had a CIA station chief in the Embassy and there were CIA officers there, they were not primarily doing economic reporting as far as I know. They were doing personal contacts and developing resources, and analyzing the traditional, political type things. I remember maybe when I went back to Washington we were told that the CIA can't send economic analysts out. The Big Red mentality was still there. It was shocking.

Q: I used to hear from people . . . I had never been in the Soviet Union, that this place wasn't working. I had spent five years in Yugoslavia in the mid-1960s. I thought, this sure isn't paradise on earth. And then people coming from the Soviet Union, would say, "This is great, this is paradise." All of us would kind of wonder, well if this place can't put it together, why is it such a worry? You would even hear of some visiting Americans, who were not officials, who would say, "You know, nothing works. These people are not 10 feet tall."

EVANS: That's right.

Q: When you went there, did you sense that there was, almost a confrontation, between the CIA analysis and what the Economic Section was doing, or was the Economic Section so busy, that it really wasn't looking at the withering Soviet Union?

EVANS: I have to admit that it was a case of the latter, particularly after the Nixon visit, because we were focused, almost entirely, on commercial relationships. That was my major role, dealing with the American business community and that sort of thing. The number three man in the Embassy was the one who did the reporting on Soviet domestic economic scenes, such as it was. But he was generally pulled off for our commercial work. We were three people dealing with an onslaught of business people in Delegations. We were also dealing with messages coming out of Washington - take care of this group from Texas, take care of this homebuilders association, take care of the concrete makers, and, it was just flat out. So, there was very little economic analysis that we did. What we did do was to try to reflect the reality and to show some skepticism. I remember in the quieter periods of trying to take the reports that would come out in the Soviet press, which, of course, were then used by the CIA, and adding comments as a standard way of reporting. We did it mostly by typewritten airgram. So, you would report an announcement or an event and then comment: "Based on our observations, it is hard to believe this is even one fourth the production claimed," or something like that.

Q: Did INR, which was the intelligence branch of the State Department, play a different role? The economic side of the INR was it more or less, depending on the CIA? Or did it even play any role, as far as you remember?

EVANS: Well, I had come out to Moscow from the economic office of INR, but I was dealing with military shipments to Vietnam. I do not recall, even when I was in INR, let alone, when I was in Moscow, that we got much of anything of value from INR about the Soviet economic situation. In retrospect, I think it was a black hole that was . . . “neglected” is the wrong word, but there were so many other priorities. This dichotomy between lofty achievements and the obvious visual reality that everybody saw, for some reason, was just not brought sufficiently to people’s attention. In a way, in a perverse way, I think, the United States officially wanted to believe that the Soviet economy was doing better than it was. Let’s say, if I were to have written an analysis saying that the Soviet economy was actually to the point of breaking down, I’m not sure the embassy would have transmitted it. I can’t be more precise, or say why, but there was a two super-power thing. There was almost the feeling: “Well, if they are our enemy or protagonist, then they have to be a worthy protagonist.” We ascribe to them a level of economic achievement, that we almost knew they didn’t have. But we didn’t want to admit they didn’t have it.

Q: How about with your colleagues and the rest of the rest of the diplomatic community? I’m thinking about the French, the Germans, the British, and others. In a country, such as the Soviet Union, there tends to be much more collegiality, because they are having such a rough time too. Let’s continue to focus on the economic side. Was there anybody running around, say from the Finnish Embassy, or Uruguay Embassy saying, “What are you people worried about? They’ve got a big army. You have to have a big army to deal with them. But at the same time, this place is falling apart.”

EVANS: Each section, whether it was economic, political, or press and culture, and, to some extent, consular, had close relationships with its diplomatic counterparts in the Western community. We had, I think, monthly, maybe bimonthly, semimonthly lunches with our economic colleagues from the Western embassies. The French, the Germans, the British, the Dutch, were always very close to us, the Italians, and then others. I would say that, without exception, the Americans were the most well informed about what was going on, and that the other embassies eagerly looked forward to these exchanges, as a way of pumping us for what we knew. Everybody looked up to America because America had signed this trade agreement that put us in a preferred situation. The French and the Germans were sort of jealous of this. They were trying to catch up and tag along, with this opening of détente. We were the lead motor in this Western trade opening and detente. More than that, I would say, without hesitation, that the training, language ability, dedication of the American Embassy officers was way in advance of any other embassy there. Most embassies knew that and admitted it. So, we generally were the ones sought out for both factual information and for interpretations of events. If there was an announcement in the press about a certain thing, inevitably we would get calls from our Western colleagues, asking, “Well what do you think about this?” “What does it mean,” that sort of thing. I don’t remember discussing with other embassies this dichotomy or the contrast between the alleged, official economic achievement, and the obvious failure of the economic system to function. We all would get together and have stories about how decrepit things were. The mainstay of any of these diplomatic encounters, whether they were a luncheon or a dinner party, or an informal get-together, was swapping stories about the most atrocious thing that had happened to people that week. Some of them were funny when you talked about them. But most of them were horrendous at the time. Hideous communications problems. Horrible building problems. Awful telephones. Nothing worked. You were lucky, during the day, if you had a list of, say, 10 things to do on a Saturday, once you got out of the embassy, if you got one of those done. You felt that it was an accomplishment. We couldn't find things. Suppose you wanted something for your apartment. Forget it. Or maybe there was one shop somebody had heard of, across the town. You got there and it was closed for repairs, or something of that nature.

Q: You mentioned you had sort of a story about provocation, or something of that nature?

EVANS: This was quite a story, yes. This is before the Nixon summit. Naturally, all of us going into Moscow were thoroughly briefed about security concerns, and at that time, prior to the Nixon visit, in the summer of 1971, when I went in, the KGB was very active. We had to be on guard for things. Never travel alone. Very often, for example, some of the new officers were delegated to accompany the military attaché s on their trips. I might just mention that, because it was an interesting trip, that I took within a month of getting there. I was told that I was to accompany a Marine major on a trip to Murmansk by train. My cover was that I was to write a report on the Murmansk ship building industry, or something like that. But, the real point was to get to Murmansk because of some Soviet Naval activity going on. So, we got on a very nice train car, with beautiful Oriental carpets and women making tea in the hallway, beautiful wood, polished brass compartments. We settled in and some sort of heavy looking types got on who settled into the next compartment. My military colleague told me who they were. In fact, the two of them knew each other. As soon as Soviet citizens get on a train, they immediately take off their good clothes, hang them up, and change into jogging suits, and then, for the duration of the trip, which I think was three-days and two nights, everybody pads around in these jogging suits. As we were going along, the first day, passing through some woods, the military attaché seated himself, facing forward, and I seated myself facing the other way. He indicated to me that I should not talk about what he was doing, and he produced a camera. He started taking pictures out the window. Each time he did, he would cough very loudly. The first time, I was trying to figure out what he was doing, but he said he was trying to cover the sound of the camera going off. We probably have much more sophisticated cameras now. I realized what sort of thing we were on. Well, we finally got to Murmansk, and, of course, we were noticeably followed by a team of three people, including one woman. I couldn't quite figure out why there was a woman. But, the attaché dragged me on top of a hill, so he could photograph the harbor from there. I remember this woman, who had high heels on, struggling gamely to come up through this rocky way after us. Anyway, we went back to the hotel. I think we only had one night in the hotel, and as we were getting ready to go to bed, my friend produced from his bag an enormous stash of empty Coca Cola cans (I thought he had a rather large suitcase for a one night visit). I looked at this in amazement. He piled them all up in front of the door like a pyramid. He said to me, "If somebody comes in, we'll know it." So, we went through this cat and mouse game. Unlike Poland, where there was access to women and access to people, there really wasn't that much chance of being compromised in the Soviet Union unless there was some really exceptional situation, where you were isolated, and then approached.

After my car was demolished, and before we had a telephone put in, one night, and again, long before the Nixon visit was on the horizon, in the fall of 1971, we showed a movie to some of our Western friends in our apartment. At that time, the embassies behind the Iron Curtain got movies from the military, which we showed at home, for entertainment, since it was almost impossible to go out. We would invite other Westerners over, and they loved it. So, we had these informal parties. On this particular night, I showed a vampire film, called The Return of Count Yorga, which I heartily recommend. It was really quite scary. One guest actually got so scared, she went and hid behind the sofa, as the film was nearing its conclusion, which had two beautiful girls chomping each other, one of whom, was a very striking blonde. By the time the guests left and we went to bed, it was 2:00 in the morning. We had had a lot to drink, inevitably, at a party like this. I went into a deep sleep. I was woken up by a frantic pounding at the door of our apartment. At this point, no telephone, no car, no milimen, and no blue box outside, no fence around the building. So, the first thing I thought was, "My God, somebody from the embassy is trying to reach us." So, I went to the door, and then, I had a sudden feeling, "Well, maybe it isn't quite right." Something from the movie, some sound of danger from the movie came back, and before I opened the door, I said, "Who's there?" There was sort of this muffled scuffling, and this female voice said that she needed help. So, I called for my wife, because I immediately sensed that this might be a problem. My wife was absolutely, totally out of it. I went back to the bedroom, and I couldn't wake her at all, after the party. So, I went back to the door. I talked, again, through the door. She said, "Help! I need help." So, I opened the door. I was in my bathrobe, bleary-eyed, and now it is 2:15 in the morning. There, standing outside, was probably the most striking blonde I have ever seen, in long blonde hair, she must have been about 5'10", at least, very good looking, probably early twenties with a brand new trench coat on, with all the epaulets and stuff on, which was rather short. It came down above her knees. She had very shiny leather boots on that came right up to the knee. We looked at each other, and I was trying to clear my head. I realized the girl looked identical to the blonde girl in the film. I was determined that I was not going to go out in the hall, which is what she seemed to want me to do. Again, I wasn't going to let her in. First, I thought, maybe this is some sort of Swedish nanny who has gotten lost, because we had a Finnish nanny, but some friends of ours had a Swedish nanny. But, this was no nanny. Then, I realized, and all of this is going through my mind, we were way out in the sticks, how could some girl dressed like this, even get there, get through all the mud and muck at 2:00 in the morning, with no taxi cabs? She obviously was delivered. She didn't seem to want to come in though. The first thing I thought was, "She is going to come in, and try to compromise me. Well, my wife and children are here, that is ridiculous." Then, I noticed, behind her, there was an alcove where the trash shoot was, and a shadow moved. She noticed that I noticed, and she said, "Oh, that is my friend, Irene." Getting more excited, she said, "You come." She tried to get me out into the hall. Well, I realized that "Irene" was probably Boris, or somebody of that nature, so, at that point, I slammed the door in her face. There is no peephole, which was a big fault of the embassy. They should have had a peephole, but I don't know what happened. I slammed the door, double-locked it, and went back to bed. The next morning, I got up and told my wife about it. She looked at me and said, "You've had too much to drink." I said, "Come out in the hall, maybe there is some proof of it." We went out into the hall, and looked around. There was nothing there, no earrings or anything. We had put on our door, as a little indication that this was our place, an antique, lion's head door knocker, belonged to my grandfather, I think, and I was very fond of it. It had been ripped off, the screws had been pulled out, the splintered wood was there. So, somebody was angry, and obviously, the girl had failed in her mission, which I think, was to beat me up, probably, because I had reported the car. This was shortly after I had reported the car. I do think that if I had gone out into the hall that night, I would have been beaten up, possibly kidnaped, I don't know. It was pretty scary, in retrospect. But, what was interesting, and I believe this, that they sent this girl because she looked like the girl in the film. How could they know what the girl in the film looked like? It meant that they had to have surveillance capability of the interior of the apartment. Well, later on, in about a year's time, we discovered that, in fact, this was what was going on. One of the American businessmen who had come over was in his apartment, and he had dozed off, and woke up at about 5:00 in the afternoon, and he saw this tiny red light, coming out of a hole in the wall. He reported it to our security people. They went over, and tore the wall apart, and found that this was a laser video monitoring system. The Soviets were capable of some very definite scientific achievements. They could monitor the whole interior of the room, day or night. I honestly believed that in some way, this was no coincidence that this was an obvious attempt to try to get me, following the showing of this movie, and that the woman was like the one in the film. An average person would say, "My God, what paranoia." But, that is the sort of thing that you had to deal with there.

Q: Is there anything else that we should cover, do you think? Oh, I can't remember, if in our last time we talked about it, but, did you go to these, I don't know what you call it, "people's lectures" dealing with economic matters? I have talked with other people, Horowitz, and others, who used to go to these lectures.

EVANS: Actually, no. Ed was there, when I was there. He was in the Political Section. With their manpower they were delegated to go to these things. The economic counselor refused, as a matter of principle, to have us do that sort of thing, because he said that we are busy enough. My poor boys and I, are too busy to do that sort of superfluous thing, and so, we did not. I would say, those of us in the Economic Section, were out meeting more real people than the Political Section. These lectures, of course, were all propaganda sort of stuff. Although, they tried to gauge the reaction of the audience . . .

Q: I was told the questions were much more revealing than not.

EVANS: Right. I remember Ed doing that sort of thing, his language was good, and he liked that sort of thing. We went out, on an average of six nights a week, and, generally, at least two events each night. It was extraordinary because of all this commercial stuff and everything. There was a wide range of activities.

Q: Okay, one last question, and then we will finish with the Soviet Union for this time. What about electronic surveillance, microwaves, and this sort of thing, was this an issue when you were there, or not?

EVANS: You mean, of the embassy?

Q: Yes.

EVANS: We didn't know it, but, obviously it was, and I'm very bitter about that. Extremely bitter about that, because the Soviets were bombarding the American embassy with microwaves to try to neutralize our radio collection facilities on the roof of the embassy. But this was kept secret from us. Now, when I arrived at the embassy, in 1971, I noticed that the whole front of the embassy was shuttered up with iron sheeting. When you went into the embassy, it was like going into a submarine, or something. You went down and you didn't see any light. The whole front of the embassy was covered with this metal sheeting. Well, they said this was for security purposes, so people couldn't take pictures. In retrospect, it was obviously to protect the people working on the front, from these x-rays, as we found out later. The State Department, of course, knew, and the Ambassador knew, and was told not to tell us that this was happening. Now, if this isn't criminal activity, I don't know what is. If a company had done this, they would have been sued to high heaven, and the damages would have been extraordinary. The Economic Section was on the back of the Embassy. The counselor's office actually had a little balcony off of it. Although we realized we could be photographed, we sometimes waved to people. I liked to see the blue sky. I insisted that my window be open. The security people would come around all the time and tell me to close the shutters. I'd do it, then I'd open them again. But, afterwards, when all of this came out, I put two and two together. The Minister Counselor lived on the front. His wife died of cancer a few years after. The Science Attaché's office was on the front. He died a few years later. One of the two Agricultural Attaché's whose office was on the front, died. The General Services Administrative officer died. Coincidence, who knows. But that's not the State Department's finest hour.

Q: Well, we'll pick this up in 1973. Where did you go when you left Moscow?

JACK R. PERRY
Soviet Desk Officer, Bureau of European Affairs
Washington, DC (1970-1974)

Ambassador Jack R. Perry was born in 1930 and raised in Georgia. He received a bachelor's degree from Mercer University and a master's degree and doctorate from Columbia University. He served in the U.S. Army from 1951-1954. Ambassador Perry's career in the Foreign Service included positions in Moscow, Paris, Prague, and Stockholm, and an ambassadorship to Bulgaria. Ambassador Perry was interviewed by Henry Mattox on July 2, 1992.

Q: After SAIS, you were in the Department?

PERRY: Yes, Soviet Desk.

Q: Were you what was called then, I guess perhaps still is, desk officer, or office director, or what?

PERRY: No, I wasn't that high. I was the head of one part of the Soviet Desk, which was Multilateral Affairs, which means that we dealt with Soviet foreign policy. The Bilateral part of it dealt with U.S.-Soviet relations, and so they got all of the exciting stuff about when somebody was arrested, or when we were going to build a new embassy, or all those bilateral things. Whereas we occupied ourselves with foreign policy.

I was on the Soviet Desk from 1970 to 1972, and my first boss was Spike Dubs (Adolph Dubs), who was later kidnaped and murdered in Afghanistan. Spike was one of the great Foreign Service officers of my time, I think, and, I've always felt, was a martyr. A wonderful man to work for. I had served briefly with him in Moscow, so I knew him. He was great.

Then Spike left after my first year on the Soviet Desk, and my next boss was Jack Matlock. Jack and I had served together in Moscow, and in fact I took my first major Soviet trip as an embassy officer with Jack, and we went to the Baltic States, to Riga and Tallinn and Vilnius, and that was wonderful. Jack was my boss, then, for a year before I moved on.

So I was very fortunate in my bosses on the Soviet Desk.

Q: And he was later ambassador.

PERRY: He served in Moscow four times and then he was the last ambassador to the Soviet Union. I'm happy to say, Jack is going to come down and speak for me at a conference in November. He's a Duke graduate, you know.

Q: From 1972 to 1974 you were special assistant to the Director of the Council on Environmental Quality.

PERRY: Yes, that was an out-of-service assignment, or whatever you call them, and I think in many ways was the most pleasant assignment I ever had, certainly in the United States. I was never that enamored of Foggy Bottom; I never felt at home in the State Department. This was at the Council on Environmental Quality, which was, and is part of the Executive Office of the President. It was physically located on Lafayette Square, across the street from the White House. My boss, and the chairman of the Council on Environmental Quality, was Russell Train, who went on to be head of the Environmental Protection Agency, and then, when he retired from that, became the American head of the World Wildlife Fund -- really sort of Mr. Environment. That was a great assignment. And Russ was a splendid boss.

Q: What on earth was an FSO doing on that council?

PERRY: Well, in the spring of 1972, Richard Nixon went to Moscow and had his first summit with Brezhnev and signed several agreements. One of the many agreements that were signed by Nixon there was an environmental cooperation agreement. I played a small part in helping prepare for that signing, and then Russ Train and the Council were given the job of implementing this agreement, and so I was sent over to help them make this Soviet-American agreement work. I did some other things, too, especially international things, but a lot of what I did the two years I was at the Council had to do with U.S.-Soviet relations. We went on a trip to Moscow in the fall, soon after I joined the Council, and negotiated the agreement that really filled out the umbrella that had been signed by Nixon. We traveled all over the Soviet Union, went out to Lake Baikal and had just a fascinating trip, and then came back and tried to make the thing work. Those were the high tide days both of detente and of the environmental movement.

Q: Were you the only FSO in the office?

PERRY: No, there was one other FSO named Otty Hane, who was also working on international things.

Q: Well, do you know, I think I'm going to call a pause here, because your next three assignments were at a senior level, all overseas again, so I think it's fairly logical point to stop for the moment. The next time we meet, with your permission, we'll go over them, and I'll have some sort of general wrap-up questions I'd like to ask you. Now is there anything that I've forgotten to ask, that you think you would like to speak to on the initial part of this interview?

PERRY: No, you know, old FSO's can always dredge up anecdotes about anything, but I don't have anything special I want to tell you.

MARTIN WENICK
Political Officer
Moscow (1970-1974)

Mr. Wenick was born and raised in New Jersey and educated at Brown University and the University of California at Berkeley. In 1961 he joined the State Department Foreign Service serving several tours in Washington, where he dealt primarily with Eastern and Northern European Affairs. His foreign postings include Kabul, Moscow, Rome and Prague, where he served twice, his second tour, as Deputy Chief of Mission. From 1988 to 1989 Mr. Wenick was Deputy Assistant Secretary for Coordination in the Bureau of Intelligence and Research. Following retirement in 1989, he joined the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society as its Executive Director, working there until 1998. Mr. Wenick was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2010.

Q: So you went to Moscow when?

WENICK: November 1970.

Q: And for how long were you there?

WENICK: I was there three years and three months; I left in January of 1974.

Q: What was your job?

WENICK: - Well I had a dual function. I was in the political section. The Political Section was divided into two parts, and I was in the internal part of the political section. I also served as staff aide to the Ambassador (Jacob Beam). I was still single, so I lived in a very nice apartment in the residence. For about a year, I was one of the officers in the internal political section. Then for the last two years or so, maybe a little bit more, I was the chief of the internal political section of the embassy.

Q: When you got there in 1970 how stood relations with the Soviet Union?

WENICK: They were pretty grim; relations were very distant. There wasn't much going on with Brezhnev in control together with Podgorny and Kosygin. We were involved in Vietnam, and they were supporting the North. And we were still getting over this period of their intervention in Czechoslovakia, that was still hanging over us in terms of the bilateral relationship. The period of détente really didn't start until somewhat later.

Q: So who was the ambassador?

WENICK: The ambassador again was Jacob Beam, with whom I had served in Prague. The DCM (deputy chief of mission) was Boris Klosson and Thomas Buchanan was the Political Counselor.

Q: Well when you're talking about "internal," what- did you have a particular piece of the internal action?

WENICK: Yes, I did have a piece of the internal action. First of all, each member of the Internal Political Section was responsible for following several republics of the USSR. We received newspapers every day, and much of our reporting was based on newspapers. Then I was involved with following the domestic political scene, the dissident scene and the Jewish movement there.

Q: What- Did you have any republics?

WENICK: I recall I had responsibility for republics in the Caucasus and also in Central Asia. The Central Asian area was of some interest to me because of my previous service in Afghanistan.

Q: Well did you, we'll move to more central things but with the republics, with Central-Caucasian republics and the Central Asian republics, were we really very interested in what was going on there or was this sort of an aside?

WENICK: This was more or less an aside. Central Asian republics as well as those in the Caucasus were sort of fiefdoms. We were watching them to see whether there was any leadership changes there in those areas that might impact on leadership in Moscow or vice versa. We watched these areas to see whether Moscow was becoming dissatisfied with leadership or with problems in the areas in which case they might take some they actions. Essentially, we were reading "tea leaves". But most of the action was related, in terms of what the embassy did was related to Moscow and the central government.

Q: Okay. Well you dealt with the Jewish community.

WENICK: Right.

Q: Was there an area where- was the Jewish community in the Soviet Union more or less concentrated in Moscow or Leningrad or were they dispersed or what?

WENICK: There were several distinct Jewish communities in the USSR at that time. There was the Georgian Jewish community which was unique in that it was probably the one that was strongest and best organized. It was probably the most cohesive community in terms of maintaining its religious beliefs. It was a pretty active community.

And you also had a Central Asian Jewish community, particularly in Uzbekistan; it was reasonably active. Within the western areas of the Soviet Union, the Jewish community had pretty well been destroyed, and the authorities tolerated just a nominal presence. The same was true with the other religious groups, even with the Orthodox Church, which was very heavily under control and many of the churches had been closed. The Roman Catholic Church was almost totally destroyed. So religion was under serious attack during this period and reflected itself in the nature of the religious communities in the Soviet Union.

Q: Well we're talking about the religious communities and then there's just plain Jews. I mean, that's almost a different breed of cat, isn't it?

WENICK: That's correct. In some ways this distinguished the Jewish community from others because if you were Russian Orthodox you were a believer, and you went to church. For many members of the Jewish community, religion was a very small part of their identity. Their identity was signified by a line on their internal passport which identified them as a specific ethnic group, i.e., Jewish.

Q: Was your work, I mean that particular part of your work with the people who were identified as being Jewish but not particularly of a religious- I mean, was this also a distinct group as far as- or was this group pretty well inserted into all of Soviet society?

WENICK: For instance in Moscow, where we had our best opportunity to observe it, those who were religious were older, and it was a declining population. At the time there were two functioning synagogues in Moscow. The younger people only knew that they were Jewish because of the so-called "line five" on their passports in which they were identified as Jewish and by that time I arrived in Moscow in the '70s there were numerical obstacles to their entrance to higher education and jobs etc. And so the, let's call them the secular Jews or the younger population, they were beginning, largely after the '67 War in the Middle East to have a Jewish national consciousness and that started the efforts to emigrate from the former Soviet Union. So in large measure much of what we were watching was that pressure from the younger members of the Jewish community to emigrate and the Soviet government's reaction to that.

Q: Well how did it manifest itself?

WENICK: Well it manifested itself in large measure in the younger members of the Jewish community congregating around the main Moscow synagogue on Saturdays, not participating in services but being outside. It was a place for them to meet and to exchange information. It manifested itself in their contacts with the foreign press that was there and letting the press know what was going on, who was being refused or people who were being permitted to emigrate. And at the same time the embassy was watching pretty closely the dissident movement. There was Samizdat -- self-published, non-official documents -- beginning to appear.

Q: This was self-published-

WENICK: Samizdat being some-

Q: -mimeographed-

WENICK: -mimeographed, typed with carbon copies; Samizdat being self-publication. And we were always interested in getting our hands on Samizdat and the foreign press corps was very good about passing on to us in the Embassy the Samizdat material that fell into their hands. It was much harder for Embassy officers to go out on the streets and accept that type of publication.

Q: Well it was- These could be provocateurs-

WENICK: Absolutely.

Q: -who were trying to slip you stuff, weren't they, and this would lead you open to charges, maybe persona non grata or-

WENICK: Absolutely.

Q: -trying to recruit you into the intelligence service.

WENICK: Absolutely. So that's why we sort of relied on our contacts with the largely the American press corps to get copies of these documents which we could then send back to Washington. One of the major Samizdat documents of the time was the Chronicle of Current Events, which appeared periodically.

Q: What about- What was happening, were the Soviets giving some Jews visas or permission to leave?

WENICK: During the early 1970's it was a very slow movement, very limited. It sort of increased as détente developed and then after the Jackson-Vanik Amendment was passed to a trade bill in Congress in '74, the emigration flow diminished greatly. in response to the pressure they perceived to be from the U.S. Congress. So a large part of our effort was to watch the emigration flow and obviously then you started developing these so-called refuseniks, people who were not being permitted to leave because they had been working in so-called security industries.

Q: One of the things I've talked to people who served in the Soviet Union at various times and found that a good source of kind of what was going on was to go to these educational meetings they used to have. Did you get involved in that; could you describe what this was?

WENICK: Very much so. When I first got to Moscow, the head of the internal affairs section was, Ed Horowitz. Ed was very much into this type of activity, and he got all of us involved. When we'd be out in the street we looked for posted signs about neighborhood meetings. Ed encouraged us to get some outerwear that made you look a little more Soviet. For instance I bought a typical Soviet style fur hat and a long overcoat. You'd be out on the street taking a walk and you would pass an apartment building and you would see signs up announcing a lecture. The Znaniye Society was the one that was most active in this. The lectures could be on domestic or international themes. And we would go to these lectures and with our Russian looking clothing, try to act inconspicuously. We would generally sit in the back of the lecture hall and listen to what the lecturer was saying. Frequently the more interesting part of the lectures were the questions that you got from the members of the audience who were in attendance. So it was a useful way to try to understand the particular lines of concern that the Soviet regime was trying to propagate at the time.

Q: Well did you find, were the questioners serious people who had serious questions?

WENICK: Yes, I mean, sometimes the questions were inane. For instance, somebody didn't get the apartment that he or she wanted and so therefore they had a particular beef. But frequently there were individuals who had some knowledge of what was going on in the world. Some Soviet citizens did listen to foreign radio broadcasts -- Voice of America, BBC, Radio Liberty -- even though the Soviets tried to jam them in populated areas. Every so often someone would pop a question that you knew that they had gleaned from a foreign radio broadcast. It was interesting to see how the lecturer handled that. The lecturers came from this so-called Znaniye Society, and they were people that were trained propagandists. And so that was frequently very interesting.

Q: Well what about, I mean, in the first place, being able to go to these things and being followed? I mean, the KGB give you personally, harass you or give you a rough time or anything like that?

WENICK: I had a particularly rough time because I was following the Jewish issue and so I was subject to a fair amount of harassment in the course of my tour in Moscow. I had the windshield on my car broken when it was parked downtown. I was actually picking up a member of an American congressional delegation so he sat in the glass, which made a lasting impact on him. So it was an action that backfired in a way for the Soviets. On another occasion, all four of the tires on my car were slashed one day outside of the largest hotel in Moscow. I had my car windows painted green one day. And then there was the standard surveillance that took place. It wasn't every day. We had a reasonably large embassy, and it would have taken massive numbers to follow everybody every day. But you know, when we went to these public lectures, we hoped that we weren't being followed but sometimes we were. Once or twice I can recall a piece of paper was passed up to the lecturer to say that there was an American diplomat in attendance.

Q: Did everybody turn around and look at-?

WENICK: They turned around and tried to figure out who it was. We were helped by the fact we had the Russian style hat and the coat.

But the KGB was pretty active in those days.

Q: Well were there concerns while you were in Moscow about being compromised?

WENICK: Always was. When you're assigned there, when you're assigned to Eastern Europe countries or the Soviet Union you obviously had a session with the folks in security of the Department of State to discuss with you what the issues might be, ways in which the Soviets might try to compromise you. Obviously it's one of the reasons we were very careful about getting documents outside the Embassy. I mean, you just didn't let people come up to you on the street and try to hand documents to you; it was a no-no. Most of the dissident documents that we got, we received on our premises, I mean, in my office. We received very little material directly. I mean, obviously there are people that you met or you dealt with over the years that were provocateurs. In fact, I don't think he was a provocateur at the time, but I can remember being stationed at the American Embassy Rome in '74-'75 period, and somebody came through on his way to the United States. He called me, knew I was at the embassy, and we went for a cup of coffee. He apologized to me because he said that while he was being interrogated by the KGB in Moscow, he had provided to them information about me. So we were aware that this was a possibility, that compromise was a possibility. Perhaps I was a little more of concern to our security people because I was a single officer at the time.

Q: I was going to say, a single officer, I mean, were there blonde young ladies around waiting for you?

WENICK: I don't recall- I don't know. Maybe I wasn't that much of interest to them. I don't recall ever being approached in that sense. So there were disadvantages to being stationed in the USSR as a single person. But, we had a relatively large diplomatic Western diplomatic community so there was a lot of socializing that could go on in that sense and that made it a little less tedious.

My apartment was at the residence of the American Ambassador so the Soviets had pretty good control over who came and went because they had a policeman stationed at the entrance to the residence. I am sure that they had a pretty good idea what I was up to.

Q: It's, yes, when I was in Belgrade I used to- sometimes we'd have a courier run and have it on a sleeper train and all and I vowed that when that beautiful blonde spy came I would certainly keep one knee on the diplomatic pouch and it never happened.

WENICK: Some of the things that you would have thought happened did not happen in that respect. On the other hand a lot of things that the security people warned one about earlier in the security briefing on did occur, and you know keep it in mind.

Q: Were you at the embassy during the, I won't say x-rays but during the, you know what I'm talking about, the omissions on the windows which were considered perhaps to be dangerous and probably were dangerous.

WENICK: Yes, I was, and I have a certificate of exposure to this radiation that was directed at the Embassy. In fact, I did have an office that was on the front side of the building for about two years of my three plus years there. It was that side of the building that got most of these rays, and the Department subsequently spent a fair amount of money doing some surveys about the dangers and about the health ramifications of this Soviet activity. So yes, I was there during a period when radiation was directed at the Embassy.

Q: Well couldn't they have put the equivalent to metal screens or something or reflect that damn stuff right back down on the Soviets?

WENICK: Well once they realized what was going on from their monitoring, they put screens on the windows that of mitigated the impact of the radiation. During that period, to the best of my knowledge the Embassy staff knew very little about it.

Q: Yes.

WENICK: And it was not- it wasn't an issue that was raised with the staff in any meaningful way.

Q: Were there any demonstrations against the embassy during the time you were there?

WENICK: Yes there were. The Vietnam war was ongoing, so we did have the demonstrations.

Q: Well we were pulling out at that time, weren't we?

WENICK: Well not '70, '71. When I got there, '70, '71 we were still pretty actively engaged in Vietnam. So we had various types of demonstrations, some with the anti-Vietnam themes and then you would get- they would charge up the African students and so, you know, free Africa campaigns, that sort of thing. So there were various types that would occur.

Q: Did you have any real contact with Soviets?

WENICK: That's always a difficult question. Yes, we did. I mean, I did. I knew some of the artists, and I knew some of the Jewish dissidents. So- and I got to know some of the people in the literary world, for instance Andrei Amalrik who wrote "Will the Soviet Union Survive Until 1984?" He was in prison at the time, but his wife lived near me, and I would see her from time to time. I met her through some journalist friends of mine and she would come to the apartment with others to view movies. So you know, there were limited contacts.

Q: Was there much collaboration say with the British, Canadian, French, German embassies regarding information?

WENICK: Yes, that was ongoing. Everybody was desperate for information living in such a restricted environment. As I recall, there was a political officers' group that met periodically; the NATO ambassadors met regularly, and there was a group of us who were following internal affairs. We used to meet I think once a month or once every two weeks. It was also a way to get to know colleagues from the other embassies and then you could develop your own separate relationships with them.

Q: How did we view the politburo at the time? Because we're moving towards the time when it was getting to be really a geriatric outfit. But when you were there, this is a little before that, wasn't it?

WENICK: When I was in Moscow, Brezhnev was clearly first among equals with Kosygin and Podgorny who were also in the leadership. And Brezhnev in those years, I mean he wasn't an intellectual giant by any means, but clearly anybody that gets to the top of the politburo had to be a survivor and had to understand the system. He wasn't facing the health issues that plagued him in the declining last years of his leadership of the Communist Party. What we were more interested in in those days was how the politburo members related to each other and who was in first place and who was in third place and who was in sixth place. You would look to see who was standing next to whom on the reviewing stand on the top of the Lenin tomb on holidays, at pictures that were posted at election time and that sort of thing to try to get a clue who was up and who was down.

Q: Well did you peruse the local papers to pick up bits of, you know, what's going on by getting into sort of the farmer's daily of some province or something like that?

WENICK: Well we did several things. First of all, we read the national press which would have been "Izvestia" and "Pravda" and "Sovetskaya Rossiya," and "Red Star," the military newspaper, and then as I said previously, each day we read more specialized newspapers, and we divided those among the officers in the Internal Political Section. For example, there was an agricultural newspaper, and "Trud," the labor unions' newspaper,, and then each one of us would look at a few regional papers every day to see what they were saying. We were looking to see how they were parroting the national line or whether in fact there would be something that showed a little independence. So reading the newspapers occupied a good portion of our time.

Q: Well I take it at a certain point you developed a certain mindset or whatever focus on being able to look at this turgid prose and pick out items without having to go through all the gobbledygook that communists were prone to print.

WENICK: Obviously first of all it's a foreign language so you had to- it was always obviously a little bit more work than reading in your own language. So you sort of got a feel for how to attack it and usually you would look at the headline and look at the first few paragraphs and if it- the first few paragraphs didn't indicate anything significant you just moved on. Otherwise you would never have finished, and you had other responsibilities than just reading the press.

Q: Were there any significant developments or major visits or anything like that?

WENICK: Well détente was very much developing in those days, and Brezhnev came to the United States, and Nixon came to Moscow during my stay. Kissinger came to Moscow on several occasions. I can remember one of Kissinger's visits; it must have been some time in '72. He came unannounced even to the embassy or to the ambassador, and he was staying at one of the guest houses of the regime up on Lenin Hills. At a certain point the ambassador was called from the Foreign Ministry and said to stand by, that they wanted to see him later in the day. And this was shortly after the Gulf of Tonkin episode. The ambassador thought he was being called to the Foreign Ministry to receive a protest our activity in the Gulf. So, he asked the political officer who followed Far Eastern Affairs, Stapleton Roy, to stand by to go with him to the Foreign Ministry. Subsequently, he received another telephone call from the Foreign Ministry asking him to come there alone. (Later on in his career in the Foreign Service, Roy became the U.S. Ambassador to China.)

Q: Yes.

WENICK: And so the ambassador went alone and when he got to the foreign ministry they took him to a government guest house on Lenin Hills where he met Kissinger. That is how Ambassador Beam became aware that Kissinger was in town. And the next episode of that event was that we were having a dinner at the residence that night in honor of the widow of Ambassador Thompson.

Q: Llewellyn Thompson.

WENICK: Yes, Llewellyn Thompson. She was in town with a friend and the Ambassador invited her to come to Spaso House for dinner. I was there and the DCM, Boris Klosson, and his wife were also there. At some point during the dinner, the major domo came to me and said there's a telephone call for me. So I excused myself and went to take the phone call. It was a correspondent from the Associated Press, whom I knew, and they had picked up the fact that Kissinger was in Moscow and wanted me to confirm the story. I knew nothing about it so I could neither confirm nor deny it.

So I went back to the table and a few minutes later there was a second call, which I took, and I came back and it was the one time- I had a really excellent relationship with the ambassador- it was the one time that I saw him get agitated. He said just forget about all those phone calls. And I was sitting next to Harriett Klosson, Boris Klosson's wife, and she just grabbed my hand. She realized there was tension at the table. And then the next day we all found out that Kissinger had in fact been in Moscow.

Q: Well I mean, you know, it was almost- he was national security advisor.

WENICK: Yes, he was Nixon's National Security Advisor at the time.

Q: But it was really- This is Henry Kissinger really playing a game. I mean, looking back on it; show I'm powerful, I can do this and really the ambassador counts for nothing. It was really denigrating to the ambassador.

WENICK: Well it was both denigrating to the ambassador not only in the sense of his title and who he was as the head of the embassy but in terms of his relationship with the Soviet officials and how they viewed him. They didn't have to deal with him, and I'm sure as time went on the ambassador felt that because it was not only that particular visit but Kissinger was dealing directly with Soviet Ambassador Anatoly Dobrynin in Washington. So, much of the substance of the relationship was not even in the hands of the Department of State; it was in the hands of Kissinger.

Q: Well the Secretary of State was William Rogers.

WENICK: And I was just going to say-

Q: Who was probably the least clued in of all secretaries of state of modern times.

WENICK: That's right, and that was very visible when Nixon came to Moscow. He had almost no role, he came with Nixon but he was not included in the more important meetings. I don't recall now all the specific details, but certainly he was the odd man out in terms of participation, and the ambassador was obviously not clued in either. And the ambassador had been specifically chosen by President Nixon for the post in Moscow, as a result of his experience in 1967 when Nixon was trying to rehabilitate himself politically. Nixon had lost the presidential election in 1960 to Kennedy, and I recall that then he ran for governor of California in 1962 and he also lost that race. I think in 1962 or so, he said I'm through with politics. But in 1967, when he was testing the waters for a possible run for the presidency in 1968, he traveled through Eastern Europe. When he came to Prague, Czechoslovakia, Ambassador Beam, ever the gentleman, showed him the respect that someone of Jake Beam's nature would show to someone who had been formerly a vice president of the United States. And Nixon remembered that and so when he was elected president in 1970, he remembered Jake Beam, who was still serving in Prague. Beam was invited to come back to Washington to meet with the newly inaugurated President in February or March of 1969. I can remember picking the Ambassador up at Dulles Airport, and it was during that time that Nixon offered him the ambassadorship in Moscow. So it was somebody that Nixon had chosen specially for the post, and then only to have ambassador's role diminished by the way they acted in the White House was, in my view, a travesty.

Q: And, you know, looking at it this is why, I mean this really, history I think, as a professional diplomat will diminish the role of Kissinger because he's not into these things of playing these games where you had to have the central role.

WENICK: That's right. And by this time once detente started in arms control and our disengagement from Vietnam all coming together at the same time, relations with the USSR was a central foreign policy issue. And it is clear that Kissinger was obviously driving it.

Q: Yes.

WENICK: And he wanted to control it, and he did. And I think he even mentions in his memoirs the fact that the U.S. Ambassador only found out about his visit to Moscow once he was there in Moscow. But Dobrynin knew about it long before.

There were other ways that Kissinger's approach to the Soviets manifested itself. For instance, while not overly significant in the context of the direct policy issues, Kissinger made decisions that were not in the best overall interests of the United States Government. For instance the Soviets got Mount Alto, which is the highest point in Washington, as the site for their new embassy compound. Kissinger made this decision despite opposition from the intelligence community because of the location of the new embassy compound commanding a dominant position in Washington.

Q: Yes, because of its commanding position for eavesdropping.

WENICK: Absolutely.

Q: Well eavesdropping equipment is- you want to sit on the highest area you have.

WENICK: That was one example. Another example is that we had a really restricted environment in Moscow. Embassy staff travel was limited to 40 kilometers from the center of the city without permission. You had to apply two days in advance. You didn't know until your time of departure whether you were going to get permission or not. The Soviet side never gave you a yes; it was only the no that they gave you. But we did have a dacha; a property that was out probably just within the 40 kilometer range. It was a typical sort of Russian type style compound. There was that one large villa and one small cottage on it, and it was our recreational place. But we had a pretty large embassy so that your chances of getting the big house were probably once in two years. The smaller residence was the so-called ambassador's cottage, and if the ambassador wasn't using it single people could vie for that and that freed up some of the pressure on the bigger house. Well the Soviets wanted to get a place in the Washington area for recreation and they succeeded because Kissinger approved a very nice place for them on the Eastern Shore of Maryland -- far better in terms of location and potential facilities than we had in Moscow. I don't know whether they still have it now; it's was near Centerville, MD on a tributary of the Chesapeake Bay. The grounds were quite large, and the Soviets brought over small cottages for their people to use. It was the type of thing that wasn't major in the context of bilateral relations, but it reflected the times, and Kissinger didn't want to derail anything in terms of his issues by what he considered extraneous issues.

Q: Well he also made too many compromises on rebuilding out- to put up a new embassy too.

WENICK: That came later.

Q: Rather than- He was going to let the Soviets help build the thing, which they loaded with eavesdropping devices.

WENICK: And it had to be rebuilt.

Q: Rebuilt.

Did you feel, although you're obviously pretty far down on the food chain, did you feel that what you were reporting was getting to the right people or was- or did you feel that the National Security Council with Kissinger and all was completely bypassing the embassy and did you- were you really a player in the game or not?

WENICK: Well we were and we weren't. I mean, Washington, even if the National Security Council and Kissinger, chose to disregard things we were reporting on, the dissidents, problems with the Jewish community, issues relating to the leadership, there were audiences here in Washington for that material. So you know, I think when you were stationed in Moscow you felt that you were at an embassy whose reporting had a rather wide audience in Washington.

Q: Well then you left there in 1973?

WENICK: The beginning of 1974.

JON DAVID GLASSMAN
Junior Officer

Mr. Glassman graduated from the University of Southern California and Columbia University. He served in numerous posts including Madrid, Moscow, Havana and Kabul. He was named ambassador to Paraguay in 1991. He was interviewed by Peter Moffat in 1997.

Q: You were then transferred to an area of your greater expertise - Moscow - but one that was also under something of a dead hand politically at the time. Did it live up to your expectations when you went in 1971?

GLASSMAN: In those days we all lived in diplomatic apartment buildings. All the foreign diplomats, including Eastern Europeans, lived there. The first year we were out at Leninsky Prospekt 93, which was at the edge of the city. Every morning when we got ready for work we would see eight to 10 Soviets leave the building. They would have live electronic monitoring in those days. When you would leave the building, perhaps to take a walk, they would start telephoning your wife and so forth, and doing all kinds of things. In the first six months we were there, we would get phone call provocations and threats. It was a rather tense time in the States because the Jewish Defense League was persecuting the Soviet diplomats here. So, in retaliation, the Soviet KGB would do things to us and threaten us. They would also follow and surveil us.

We were often followed very closely when we traveled. I visited 17 provincial cities. We would try to engage in conversation with people on those trips but we would try to choose the people with whom we would talk, rather than allowing the KGB to set up our encounters. We would go sometimes to public parks and sit down with people and just try to talk about what was going on in the city. We would also go out and buy books. There was a person - a publications procurement officer - who would buy books from provincial publishing houses. We would go with him on trips and frequently on the trips they were watched very closely. Sometimes there would be sixteen people in different teams of four and several cars that would follow us. When we would go in the bookstores, they would come very close sometimes, really close, and lean up against us to intimidate us. They would also sit down at tables in restaurants with us. Once my wife and I were at a restaurant outside Riga - a place called the Yuras Perla Restaurant. We had made reservations late in the day so they had placed some KGB people at our table. They had not used their English speakers - it was too late in the day. I could, of course, understand everything they were saying in Russian. They were saying that they had to engage us in conversation and, if it wasn't worthwhile, they would wait for us down at the train station. So we got very nervous of course and quickly departed for the train station with them in hot pursuit. Those kinds of things would happen. Once, I was down at Dushanbe, Tajikistan. I and the other officer in the room were sleeping and then a crack of light appeared at the door. Two people walked in. I yelled in Russian, "Get out of here!" We then walked out to the woman who was the duty officer at the hotel. She said, "It was just a couple of drunks walking in." The Soviets would do things like this. People would go on picnics and Soviet girls would enter their tents. All kinds of provocations would occur. That was the atmosphere of the times - very tight, very suspicious.

Q: Remind us who your Ambassador was at that time?

GLASSMAN: That was Jacob Beam, a 40 year veteran of the Foreign Service. I recall a terrible instance for him. He once called a staff meeting and was almost in tears. "What's wrong, Mr. Ambassador," we asked. He said the most terrible thing had happened to him, Henry Kissinger who was the President's National Security Advisor had come to Moscow but did not inform the Ambassador. Kissinger was engaged in the back channel contacts then.

About that time, the famous Moscow Summit of 1972 was held. Nixon came and there was quite an interesting little scene there. They had divided the American delegation and they put Secretary of State William Rogers in the Hotel Rossiya. Kissinger and Nixon stayed at the Kremlin, which isolated the Secretary of State from this. I was on duty one night at the Rossiya and received calls from the Nixon entourage people like Dwight Chapin who later became famous in Watergate. Chapin brusquely ordered the Secretary of State to go immediately to the Kremlin - it was clear that Roger's status was very much subordinate.

Q: That was a pattern that continued all through the Kissinger years.

GLASSMAN: I'm sure it did. Kissinger came to Moscow several times. I remember meeting him at the airport. He thought we were the Russians, we all wore these fur hats. He said, "Thank you for your hospitality comrades." We said, "We're from the embassy." He turned his head and quickly walked away - he was really quite something.

Q: Were you privy to any of the Nixon Summit doings?

GLASSMAN: Not the substance. As a junior officer, I mainly partook of the wonderful food the Soviets put out during the time of the visit. Notwithstanding the historical significance of this period - the dawn of detente, a number of amusing incidents took place. Nixon wanted to give a present to Brezhnev and so he gave him a Cadillac. Brezhnev was so reckless he broke a windshield, and we were always bringing him spare parts. Another interesting thing happened during the Summit, again sort of revealing. The Soviets would not allow Nixon to use Air Force One for internal flights. When Nixon departed for Kiev, the Soviet leadership put him on an airplane and lined up to see him off. They were standing there on nationwide television and the plane wouldn't start up. So a terrible thing took place. Soviet Minister of Defense Marshal Grechko had to go up on the Aeroflot plane and tell Nixon he had to get off. A replacement plane had to be towed in, oranges and other special items unloaded from the first plane. Of course, television coverage ceased immediately.

Q: As an excellent Russian speaker, were you able to integrate into any social life, local life, or was it really artificial?

GLASSMAN: We would go around and speak to people in these provincial towns. You would discover very interesting things out there. Once, when we were down in Donetsk in the Southern Ukraine, we were sitting in the park one day chatting and we heard rock and roll music on a transistor radio. I said, "This is amazing, you know, I didn't realize the transistor radios could pick up short wave broadcasts." "That's not short wave. It's a local station," a local resident said. It turns out there were amateur radio operators broadcasting in the Soviet Union. This was the first idea we had that people were starting to generate their own autonomous non-regime cultural activity.

We also, on another occasion, got on a train and were talking to some of the Soviet troops who had just gotten back from Germany - very interesting. We were able to report on popular points of view and also on emerging attitudes in Central Asia. I had my own special hobby, collecting Soviet Military books, not only current ones but also old ones. Every weekend, I would have a regular routine - I would go to the Military book store and to used bookstores. I accumulated a superb collection. I had almost every Soviet military book published from the 1920s onward which I subsequently gave away to Harriet Fast Scott who was sort of an expert on those things. No one in the embassy, believe it or not, was reporting on arms control in those days. So, even as a humble consular officer, I was able to start calling at the USA Institute and at IMEMO (the Institute of Economy and International Relations). I spoke with their arms control people, many of whom were retired Soviet military people. This worked out very well - it was the beginning of the so-called Mutual Balance Force Reduction (MBFR) talks. Subsequently, the State Department established a permanent arms control position reporting at Embassy Moscow.

YALE RICHMOND
Deputy Director, Soviet Union and Eastern Europe
Washington, DC (1971-1978)

Yale Richmond was born in Massachusetts in 1923. He received a bachelor's degree in 1943 from Boston College, thereafter he joined the Army from 1943-1946. He then receives a master's degree from Syracuse. His career included positions in Germany, Austria, Russia, Poland, and Laos. Mr. Richmond was interviewed in June 2003 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

RICHMOND: They sent me back to USIA as policy officer for Europe. I had that for a year. As policy officer, you go to meetings at the State Department with the policy people. There's a meeting at the State Department every morning, or there used to be, before the spokesman goes on the air. Then you'll discuss what the issues of the day are and how you want to handle it. I would go to those meetings and I would go to a corresponding meeting in Europe earlier that morning and then bring the policy back. "Here's the party line." After a year of doing that, Dick Davies, ambassador to Poland - he should have been ambassador to the Soviet Union, but he got bumped by somebody - Davies was Deputy Assistant Secretary for Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, called me up and asked if I wanted to come back to the State Department and work on the Soviet exchanges. I said, "I sure do, if you can get me out from under Frank Shakespeare." So, I went to the State Department and was there 2 years as Deputy Director of the Office of Soviet Exchanges. Then when somebody else moved out of the CU office of Soviet Exchanges, I went into that for 4 years. I ran exchanges with the Soviet Union for 4 years.

Q: So this was in the State Department?

RICHMOND: Yes.

Q: Wasn't this because Senator Fulbright didn't want USIA to have exchanges?

RICHMOND: I don't know about that.

Q: When you came back, what were you picking up about Frank Shakespeare? Was he having...

RICHMOND: He was having problems with the State Department continually. He was a far right winger.

Q: On the exchange program, what were we doing? You were doing this from when to when?

RICHMOND: From '71 to '78 until CU came into USIA and then I went back with it to USIA. They created a special position for me. When CU was transferred back to USIA, the whole Soviet program came with it. Charlie Bray had a meeting with Bill Hitchcock, the first deputy assistant in CU, as to how to handle the exchange program. Hitchcock told him, "You can't run it without Yale Richmond." So, I went back to USIA and they created a special position for me as Deputy Assistant Director.

Q: So you continued this until when?

RICHMOND: Until I retired in January of 1980.

Q: Let's talk about this 9 years with the exchange programs. In '71, where did things stand?

RICHMOND: In '71, Kissinger was National Security Advisor. Kissinger was formulating his opening to China policy, his opening to the Soviet Union. The idea was cooperation instead of confrontation. Exchanges boomed. Not only did we have the official exchange, the cultural exchange program, the numbers were increasing, the numbers in all categories, but we had these 11 cooperative agreements that I spoke about which moved thousands of Russians and Americans back and forth. Also the private sector got very much involved. Most exchanges have traditionally been the prerogative of the private sector in this country. Now that the White House was giving its go-ahead and having all kinds of exchanges with the Soviet Union, the private sector got involved. We had all kinds of organizations calling up. I spent a lot of time on the phone with people calling up, "How do I invite a Soviet to my conference next month?" What I remember best was from the Texas Bar Association. Someone called up and said, "We want to invite a Soviet lawyer to our annual meeting?" I said, "Whom do you want to invite?" He said, "Anyone. We don't care. Just as long as he's a Russian." I told him how to do it.

Q: This must have been quite a strain. Somebody had to identify people. It would end up being the embassy or your office.

RICHMOND: Well, the more people who traveled, the more names they brought back. The more Americans who went, the more they suddenly became overnight experts on the Soviet Union. They had been there and traveled around and met people. So the word of mouth was very important.

Q: Did you have a feeling that the KGB was beginning to lose control of the system?

RICHMOND: They were very much in control, but they were relaxed because the official policy from Brezhnev on down was that exchanges are good and should be encouraged. So, the KGB screening of people was not as thorough as it formerly had been. Nobody came without KGB clearance.

Q: Were families coming with them?

RICHMOND: Yes. Families started... The Atomic Energy Commission had an exchange agreement with the corresponding Soviet agency for the peaceful uses of nuclear energy that was annexed to the cultural agreement. Under that agreement, we started to get Soviets coming with their wives for the first time because they were considered in work so highly sensitive that the Russians did not want them to come without their wives, thinking they would be entrapped. The first Soviet came with his wife to Chicago to the nuclear laboratory there at the University of Chicago, Argonne National Laboratory, and that opened it up to others.

Q: Was your slice of the pie strictly Eastern Europe/Soviet Union?

RICHMOND: Yes. The China program was separate. A program developed with China in those years... I had gotten tired of working in Soviet exchange. I went over to see Pickering, who was Assistant Secretary or Deputy Assistant Secretary. I heard they were building up a big exchange program and I went over and asked him if he would take me into his office to run the China program. He listened. I knew him because he was a neighbor of mine out in Virginia. He didn't want me there. He wanted to make a clean break with the Soviet controlled system. That's how the Chinese program developed without the system of controls that we had over the Soviets.

Q: It turned out to be a huge program. It had significant repercussions within China.

RICHMOND: It did. You had a lot of Chinese professors who had studied in the United States before the war and already had the contacts with their American colleagues. We didn't have that with Russia. With China you had it and they could recommend students to people they had gone to school with in the United States who were now professors.

Q: We used to have Yale in China and others. There is still a lot.

Did things change within Eastern Europe? How were these exchanges run during this time?

RICHMOND: Things relaxed considerably. Exchanges with Hungary expanded greatly, even with Czechoslovakia, which was still under Party leaders. Bulgaria expanded. They took their cue from Moscow. If the Soviets were having exchanges with the United States, the Eastern Europeans wanted them to. The only country that was never brought in was Albania. That was a class by itself.

Q: Sort of like North Korea.

RICHMOND: Right. IREX started into East Germany, too. IREX, which was running programs with the Soviet Union, also was running programs with East Germany.

Q: This was a time when we recognized East Germany in the '70s. We established an embassy. It became part of Eastern Europe.

RICHMOND: Yes. I made a visit to Berlin in those years. Sol Polansky was our man in Berlin. He gave a lunch and he invited the East German guy who was responsible for cultural exchanges. I made my pitch that we should have cultural exchanges with East Germany. He was non-committal. I pointed out that we had it with the Soviet Union. We had it with all the other East European countries. Why not with East Germany? I told him what we were doing in each of these countries and he listened very carefully but he didn't bite. They were still cautious.

Q: By the time you left, had they moved into it?

RICHMOND: IREX, but not any of the other official programs.

Q: Were we still running cultural teams going in?

RICHMOND: Exchanges with the Soviet Union under the cultural agreement continued until the late 1980s. At the Reagan-Gorbachev summit meeting in '85, a new cultural agreement was signed considerably relaxing the controls on both sides and opening it up. The cultural agreement gradually faded away. By about 1988, we were no longer doing things strictly under the cultural agreement. We were just going ahead and doing them.

Q: Were there any real cultural exchanges that you particularly enjoyed or felt made an impact?

RICHMOND: The biggest effect was in places like Poland and Hungary. Soviets had difficulty getting out to visit the United States or Western Europe, but it was very easy for a Soviet scholar or scientist to go to Warsaw or Budapest. That was within the Soviet Bloc. So, all of the exchanges we had with Poland and Hungary and later with Romania and Bulgaria had a ripple effect in the Soviet Union. Soviets could then go to Poland and Hungary and find out what people in their field were doing in the West. Poland has traditionally been Russia's window on the West. That was true in the czarist era and it was true under the communists also.

Q: What about things like publications? Every field has a series of publications where they pass on information. Was that part of the cultural exchange?

RICHMOND: No, it was not, but the Soviet think tanks like their USA Institute and another one whose initials were IMEMO, they subscribed to all the Western publications. Also, in those years, the 1970s, there was a big exchange between Soviet and American university libraries. The Library of Congress has had an exchange with the Soviet Union for many years going way back to the 1920s. That expanded. But universities which had Russian study programs like Indiana, Illinois, Harvard, Columbia, often had a counterpart library in the Soviet Union with which they exchanged publications. That was not part of the cultural agreement. Those books were put on the shelves. They were not just read by the cognicenti.

Q: Did you see a change in the society in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe?

RICHMOND: Oh, sure, you saw all kinds of changes. You saw the globalization of American culture. You saw it with the Soviets starting to wear jeans and leisure clothes. You saw it with the opening of McDonald's in Russia. You saw it with the sale of Western publications, with family reunification moves, immigration to Israel. The Soviet Union was opening up. All this was happening in the 1980s under Gorbachev, who himself was in a way of product of these exchanges. Gorbachev's father of glasnost was Alexander Yakovlev. Alexander Yakovlev was in the first group of Soviet students to come to the United States under the exchange agreement. He studied a year at Columbia University and then went back and became rather high up in various organizations and then was ambassador to Canada for 10 years. He has told someone that the one year he spent at Columbia University was more important to him than the years he spent in Canada because he read all kinds of books that he couldn't read in the Soviet Union. It was due to Alexander Yakovlev that Gorbachev pushed through his perestroika restructuring and glasnost (openness), but there is another twist to this. Gorbachev when he was a law student in Moscow was in the same class with a young Czech law student. They were in the same class for 5 years. They lived in the same dormitory. They got married on the same day. And this Czech was Gorbachev's first contact with the West because he was a communist and he rose up to a very high position in the Czech Party, became involved in the Prague Spring, and was booted out but maintained his friendship with Gorbachev through all of those years. This guy was a very sophisticated westerner, as the Czechs are, and Gorbachev was undoubtedly influenced by this guy.

Q: I'm still talking about the '71-'80 period. Did you find that the tenets of communism, the teaching of Marxism, were you getting that this had pretty well run its course and it really didn't have much bite within the Soviet empire anymore?

RICHMOND: Yes, very few people believed in it anymore. They realized it wasn't working for them, that there had to be changes. And the KGB was a leader in the movement for change because the KGB, its foreign part of it, had been exposed to the West and they saw how the West was progressing economically and socially and the Soviet Union was lagging behind. So, there were very few diehard ideologists by the end of the 1980s.

Q: Did that change what we were doing at all?

RICHMOND: It made it easier to do things, send groups that we could not send before.

Q: What type of groups... What were the groups that you enjoyed sending most?

RICHMOND: This may sound strange, but the university bands because the State Department had a very small budget for cultural exchanges - I think it was 5 million for the whole world and half of that went to the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe - we were always looking for things that didn't cost us much money. One thing was the university symphonic band. The idea of a symphonic band was new to Russia. It was just inconceivable that a symphonic band of brass and woodwinds could play symphony music, but they did. So, we sent the University of Michigan band, the Minnesota band, the Eastman Philharmonic, some jazz groups, and all we had to do was buy them a blazer with a university emblem and pay their per diem and travel and they didn't require an honorarium, whereas if we sent a major symphony orchestra, that was several hundred thousand dollars out of our budget. And the Soviets at first didn't like this. They said, "You're equating your student groups with our professionals." But then they learned that many of these academic units were really professional, on a par with professionals.

Q: You retired in 1980?

RICHMOND: January 1980.

ARTHUR MEAD
Foreign Agricultural Service
Washington, DC (1972-1975)

Arthur Mead was born and raised in Wisconsin and educated at the University of Wisconsin and American University. After service in the US Army in World War II, he joined the US Department of Agriculture and was involved in its overseas relief and grain storage operations, including the administration of Title I, Public Law 480. During his career Mr. Mead dealt with many overseas programs, including those concerning India and Vietnam. Mr. Mead was interviewed by Ray Ioanes in 1994.

Q: Well, 1972-73 was the time of the huge Soviet purchases from everywhere, not just the United States.

MEAD: Yes. India declared itself self-sufficient at the end of the sixties. They were out of the Title I program for a few years, but came back in 1975 and for a brief time thereafter. As I recall, India was not very happy to get back into food aid after having being able to say it was self-sufficient. They came to see Secretary Butz several times, but were reluctant to make a request for the assistance. The Secretary and I would do a lot of listening and it became a bit awkward. But we had the rule of needing a request and we were not innovative enough to develop a way to offer them a program without acknowledgment of a request. My recollection was that they had something less than one million tons in mind for Title I. After they got over the problem of making a request they then asked that the agreement be negotiated in Washington. That was not what USDA wanted to do, given the history of New Delhi negotiations which could get prolonged and complicated; I can remember, for a particular agreement, sending a curt cable to the agricultural attaché to get the agreement signed and I'm sure he showed it to the Indians to get things moving.

State pressed strongly for the request of the Indians and we had to negotiate in Washington. We did this regularly with the Israelis but their negotiations were very informal, and obviously Israel was a special case. The negotiations with India in 1975 were formal; I was the Head of the U.S. delegation and we had other U.S. agencies represented and India had its several representatives. India wanted to make changes in the format of the agreement to emphasize that this was a dollar deal, which it was on a long term, low interest basis. But they wanted to make it look like a harder deal. We indicated that they could be a bit imaginative in the way they handled their announcement as long as they didn't go overboard, but we had to keep our agreements intact. They were not in a hurry to sign the agreement since they were buying wheat from us commercially and keeping their ships busy.

One tough issue dealt with was the fact that India had earlier borrowed wheat from Russia to be repaid in kind. We did not want them to repay wheat to Russia while they were importing concessional (soft sale) Title I wheat from us. After a lot of haggling back and forth, there was an unpublished side note developed that said that the issue would not arise. And the issue did not arise. Noting the commercial purchases of wheat by India, there was a specific UMR provided for in the agreement as one of the conditions for fulfilling the agreement. It may have been the first time in this final agreement but I am not positive about that point. It was not an issue with them as they had already taken the position that there would be times when commercial imports would be necessary. There were times, also, when they would export some wheat and I suspect this came when they had accumulated substantial stocks and were not in a position, in their view, to utilize such stocks for domestic consumption.

In any event, we were not more successful than New Delhi in crafting a prompt negotiation. In this case we could not send a cable to ourselves telling ourselves to get going.

DAVID NALLE
Cultural Attaché, USIS
Moscow (1972-1975)

Mr. Nalle was born in Philadelphia and graduated from Princeton. He entered the predecessor of USIA in 1951. He served in a number of posts including Afghanistan, Iran, Syria, Jordan and Moscow. He was interviewed by Dorothy Robins-Mowry in 1990.

Q: Yes. Did Moscow follow after--

NALLE: Yes. Frank Shakespeare, by that time, was director of the Agency. I think he'd just come in about the time I got named as area director. I don't think he was ever terribly comfortable with that, because I assume he knew I was not a Republican and perhaps didn't think the way he thought. In any case, after he and I had been in proximity for a year, I guess, he as director and I as area director of Near East, he said one day that he had a new policy. He announced this to the staff, that anybody who wanted to aspire to top-level positions in the Agency--and I quote directly--"had to feel the red menace in his gut." [Laughter] And he said, "To start my implementation of this policy, I am going to send Dave Nalle to Moscow as the cultural attaché."

To me it was very much of a brierpatch situation, because I was fascinated with the idea of going to Moscow. It never occurred to me that we might go there, because I didn't know the language. I had only the normal American familiarity with the place and the culture. Frank seemed to feel that if not exactly a punishment, this was a very severe task that he was placing on me. But I thought it was a great idea. Since he and the deputy director, Henry Loomis, felt that I was making this great sacrifice, I, more clever than I usually am, said to them, "Okay." (I'm not sure I put it exactly this way.) "I want to make one condition, however, that you have to teach both me and my wife the language." They said, "Okay." I said, "As a real student. She has to be a recognized student."

Q: This was in the early days for wives going into language training.

NALLE: I believe Peggy was the first USIA wife ever, as a full-fledged, enrolled student.

Q: That's been a real breakthrough, I think.

NALLE: Yes. The interesting sidelight was that Henry Loomis said, "Okay, you go and find a place that will take both of you as students, and we'll send you there." So I went to FSI, and they said, "We'll take you, but your wife will have to come on a space-available basis." I said, "No good." Monterey was the same thing.

So I went back to Henry Loomis. He said, "Anywhere in the world. You go find it." [Laughter] That was the kind of gesture Henry liked to make, I think.

So I went to London and found a suitable school. Of course, paying money, they would take us both. So we spent that year of 1971-72, the academic year, studying Russian at the Polytechnic of Central London. That was nice for us, though it was terribly hard work. We worked all the time, because we were by then in our forties, and that's late for learning Russian, particularly.

Q: Especially a hard language.

NALLE: Yes, which Russian is. We worked all day every day, all night. We did homework every night.

Q: At least there were both of you at it, so that's a great help.

NALLE: Yes. It was harrowing, and it wasn't as good as if we had studied in Monterey or FSI, because it was not designed for our kind of work, but we worked hard and became at least competent in Russian.

We went to Moscow in 1972, which was the beginning of detente and a relatively pleasant time to be there. Pleasant in the sense that you could actually do some things, which had not been possible before.

Q: Who was the PAO then in Moscow?

NALLE: Andy Falkiewicz. He left after I'd been there about three or four months, and I was promoted to PAO. They don't call it PAO; they call it counselor for press and cultural affairs.

Q: Who was ambassador then?

NALLE: Jacob Beam. There was a long hiatus when Spike Dubs was chargé d'affaires. Spike Dubs was later killed in the Afghan situation.

Q: Yes.

NALLE: The ambassador who came after him was Walter Stoessel, who died last year.

Q: You said this was a period of detente, so it made things a little bit different. How long were you in Moscow?

NALLE: Three years.

Q: From 1972 to '75?

NALLE: We were there two years and then Jim Keogh asked us if we'd like to stay for another year. By that time we were getting much better in Russian and were enthusiastic about it. I must say it was really too long, at least for the Russia of those days, because even though it was detente, it was still a very pressured situation, as I said earlier. Leaving and going to Helsinki, you felt just a wonderful lifting of oppression.

Q: How often did you get out?

NALLE: We should have gotten out more, but we got out, I guess, once a year.

Q: That's all?

NALLE: Yes. Well, to Helsinki, more often. But really out; we went to Greece one year.

Q: What kinds of things did you do in Moscow at that time? Not you particularly, but what was going on by way of USIS programs?

NALLE: Of course, there was no facility, no center that people could come into, because people can't come in--couldn't at that time, certainly. There's now talk of starting one, reciprocally. But the real challenge was to communicate, how to communicate with this public that wasn't allowed to come in to you to get information, a public that was being communicated with by the Voice of America, and a public that couldn't communicate with you comfortably on the political level, but could on a cultural level.

I set up what I thought--what I still think--was the necessary route to go, and it involved a couple of things. One, it seemed to me that we couldn't contact a lot of people directly, but we did know who some of the people were and what their jobs were and why we wanted to contact them. We could get those names and we could meet them officially, but seldom ever, at the beginning at least, socially.

So I established a contact management system with great difficulty, because the Agency was not yet into it. I finally got a "key-sort" system. I don't know whether you know that, but it's like a primitive computer which functions with cards, with holes around the edges, and you knock out some of those holes. You put a spear into the system and turn it upside down, and the cards you want will all drop down. But it's just like a computer. Of course, now you have, I assume, computerized contact management systems. But we set that up, and I brought in a succession of Americans' wives to be the "contact management operators," let's say.

We began to fill up our cards, and you could then write right on the card, which was very satisfying: "We gave So and So such and such on April 14th. On May 14, he came to the embassy for such and such a movie." You got a whole picture of your contact with these people, even though you seldom saw them face to face, except maybe in an audience or, as you saw them on the list, as a recipient of Amerika magazine. We also started a Russian edition of Dialogue magazine, which at that time was a serious intellectual publication. Wonderful Juri Jelagin, back here, translated and edited it, and was very enthusiastic about the whole process. That was, I suppose, typical of our best efforts, because here was a magazine at a high cultural level, which was the appropriate level for the Soviet elite, the intelligentsia. We would send it out specifically to them by name--the fact registered, of course, on their key-sort cards.

I also tried to start a program of targeted presentation of books. We did this successfully, I think, on one level. We needed to remodel our USIS premises in the embassy, and I got the Agency to agree to send in an architect. We got an architect named Hans Hohlein from Vienna, who is now world-class; John Jacobs helped us with that. I'm afraid our project wasn't world class. But he came and designed the "USIS" premises. It's actually called "P&C," the press and cultural section. So that each of the officers had his own section and was surrounded by bookcases with books related to his particular field, and tapes and records and the whole thing. We had a very small--about the size of this room--viewing room for showing films and videotapes. The architect was necessary because you had to get all this into a very small space.

Q: Because you were part of that embassy building. Everybody's all together.

NALLE: Right. But it was really very attractive. When you had a good officer sitting in the right desk, and he knew that he was to contact people on education, for example, and he had the materials to do it, and if he was energetic and whatever, in my mind it focused his attention on what he was supposed to be doing, and he had the equipment to do it, the tools to do it. That, put together with the contact management system, I think resulted in greatly improved communication, much of which was never face to face. It couldn't be.

Q: Did you get any feedback?

NALLE: As I started to say, then I encouraged those individuals and myself to find exceptionally worthwhile people to cultivate more closely, if possible. For example, I got to know one of the leading literary critics in Moscow, and I said to him, "Look. I know you can't get books. I can get you the books you want if you tell me what they are."

His reaction was, "Oh, you mean you'll send me propaganda?" I said, "No. I'll send you book reviews. You tell me what it is you need, and I will get the Agency to send it out." And I was able to do that for about half a year. Then the Agency lost interest and it took more work back here than they were willing to put into this sort of thing.

I wrote to them and asked, "What is more important to you and to us than to communicate with the elite intelligentsia of the Soviet Union?" But the Agency was not geared up to worry specifically about a post in this way.

Q: Not even Moscow? That seems funny to me.

NALLE: Because the person who knew the books wasn't the person in the desk job. So that meant, I assume, that somebody, like the area director or the deputy area director, had to be behind this whole thing.

Q: The desk has to push.

NALLE: Then the desk officer had to push the ICS person, or whatever it's called, who would choose the books. Someone had to know what books to choose, what a Russian member of the intelligentsia would want to read and would find worth reading. It just took too much work, apparently.

Q: Was it all right for them to receive all these books, or were they about to get into trouble because of that?

NALLE: It had become all right by then. It was culture, so it was all right. I wasn't trying to send him books on democracy versus communism. No doubt he got questioned, because our apartment was bugged. We set it up at a cocktail party in our apartment. But he could say, "These are cultural books. See them? There's nothing subversive about them." To me, that was the way you had to communicate.

The only real kind of cultural center program that we could do was at the ambassador's residence, where we did put on films. You get so frustrated when you're out at the end of the line. We pleaded with the Agency to send us new films that we could show, or send us old films that we could show. They said they could send us new films, but we couldn't show them. So we finally got them to send recent films that we could show. That was a tremendous success, because the Soviets, as we know, are film crazy. At that time their own good films were still suppressed. We would do films or we'd do other things at the ambassador's residence that would bring in elites.

Q: They could go to the residence, I take it, safely?

NALLE: Yes. Yes.

Q: More or less safely?

NALLE: Yes. Things had let up to the extent that they could. Even dissidents could go there. Dissidents went anywhere, practically anywhere, but dissidents could be included in a party there, and non-dissidents, mainstream intellectuals, of which there were some very good ones. The fact that they were mainstream didn't mean they were uninteresting.

I think the most fun we had was putting on--the Department got a collection of paintings from the Metropolitan and other museums to hang around the residence, really good stuff, and much of it contemporary or recent. We put on a real happening for that, with Tom Freudenheim, who was then, I think, curator of the Baltimore Art Museum. Anyway, he's now deputy secretary or assistant secretary of the Smithsonian [Institution]. He came over with his wife, and we opened the exhibit. It was a two-week long happening, with videotapes about contemporary American art, with tea and drinks and the whole works. It was a wonderful ambiance. Tom would lead tours around the rooms, explaining the paintings and so forth. It was just a lovely atmosphere to be in. I went a number of times on his tours. We got all sorts of good contacts in that the embassy hadn't seen ever before, who could come into this thing because, again, it was a cultural activity. The basic invitation list dropped down from our key-sort system.

Q: There is all this discussion, and even some letters to the editor, about the role of books and libraries in developing a sense of the importance of democracy and democracy as the real, the right way to go, in Eastern Europe, as a motivator of the current events that have gone on in the last six months in Eastern Europe. Given your experience in Moscow and the fact that you say you could deal with these people culturally, but not politically, to what extent do you think this kind of impact from the United States is really a part of this discussion of democracy and resurgence of democratic ideas in Eastern Europe?

NALLE: To what extent do I think the resurgence of those ideas is the result of--

Q: That's right. There's been letters to the editor that USIA contributed to this because all over Eastern Europe--now, you were in Moscow, of course, but in Eastern Europe there were these various programs and also, of course, in Moscow, which has led to the recognition of the importance of democracy and a preference for democracy over what they've been having.

NALLE: Short answer, obviously. I think that a successful USIA program overseas must necessarily communicate with the intelligentsia, the elite of a country, and to do that, the content of your communication must be up to their level. If you are funded and if you're intellectually able to do that, if you know what books to choose or what films to show or whatever, then you can have successful communication, and it follows, I think, that you will have an impact of the kind that you're talking about. I think, undoubtedly, the distribution of things we distributed in the Soviet Union had that kind of impact on some people. Whether it's the people we now see in the vanguard of the Soviet Union, I don't know. But you had to try to do it, and you had to try to reach them if you were going to communicate successfully with the society, because they process it and communicate it to the rest of society, obviously.

I think the pamphlet series I did in Jordan, modest though it was, did that kind of thing. And I think that's what we should concentrate on. Sometimes, as I think I probably have, wittingly or not, suggested, your communication may be oblique. You may communicate through a very good recorded concert for somebody who is deprived of music, and that puts him in--how to put it? That is the only kind of communication perhaps that your relationship with him can tolerate. But it will create a bond between you and him--not personally, necessarily, but in the abstract. "Here's American culture. I have had some access to the best of American culture. The other aspects of American culture may be of a similar quality."

If he's also a politician or a teacher or whatever, then he may, as a result, have a more open mind towards those other aspects of America.

Q: And you're opening up a new world of ideas, emotions, cultural emotions, and so forth, for which they've had no other kind of opportunity to gain access. Therefore, the suggested freedom, I suppose.

NALLE: In the Soviet Union, it was as if the people were on an island and they were deprived of all normal communication with the rest of the cultural world. The paradox, of course, is that nowhere was the Voice of America more popular than in the Soviet Union. Now, I guess, the Voice of America is becoming less interesting, less popular to the Soviets, because other things are coming in. People in the rest of the world, India--what is the motivation to listen to the Voice of America? Very little. But in the Soviet Union, there was a tremendous motivation. Off and on, I think the VOA lived up to it. Perhaps it didn't do as well as the BBC, because the BBC had somewhat less and fewer constraints.

Q: You obviously said some fascinating things about the programs you developed in your three years in Moscow. Do you have any kind of overall comment to make about your time there? Was it, in personal terms, very difficult? I mean for you and for Peggy. What did Peggy have to do in order to function? She had already been through a lot by this time with some of those posts. Did you travel to Leningrad?

NALLE: You reveal the natural bias against the Middle East. Most of those posts were ideal places to live, as far as the climate and comforts. And Peggy was very much involved in the kind of programming I'm talking about, which was absorbing and, I believe, rewarding for her, too.

Q: Part of that was in listening to Tom Tuch talk about this. He talked about some of the problems of importing food. I didn't know to what extent you imported food in some of your posts in the Middle East. He talked about this for his family time in Moscow.

Did you travel around? Did you get to Leningrad on and off? Did you get into the central Soviet Union?

NALLE: Yes. Sure, as much as we could. A lot of the area was off-limits. That wasn't exactly the question you posed earlier.

Q: I've really got two things going that have to do with the personal hazards of functioning day to day.

NALLE: Very difficult. That's why I think I mentioned, or started to talk about the third year. The third year became really quite debilitating. It's too long to spend in the kind of pressure situation that that was at that time, still, even though it was detente. There was a listening device, I'm quite sure, a beeper attached to our car, so that it was never unknown to the authorities where our car was. That was symbolic of the kind of awareness you had of being watched all the time.

It was six months after I left the Soviet Union before I could sit down in front of a coffee table and say anything I felt like saying, because in the Soviet Union, I knew that our coffee table, or something like it, had the bug in it. You always thought first before you spoke or said anything, even to your kids. Our two children were with us, at the beginning, at least, in Moscow, and it was very hard for them, because they couldn't mix with the population. They did have their Canadian-American school, but it was a very artificial life.

Peggy, already knowing Russian, did get to meet particularly some of the unofficial art community, which was interesting for her and interesting for them. It was a good relationship. But still, it's a very restrictive life. It takes a toll on your nerves and your disposition and just about everything. So you do have to get out and you do have to recover if you've been there a while.

The food, you know, gets boring. It was better then, 15 years ago, than it is now, the food supply and market in Moscow. But there were enough alternatives. It wasn't really a hardship, because you could order from Stockman's in Helsinki or Denmark supply houses, or you could go to the dollar gastronomie, as it's called. You could put together enough food, and you had a servant provided by the state, a Soviet, who could do the cooking for you if you wanted that. So from that point of view, I don't think life was hard, but life was hard psychologically and physically. It was enervating.

I remember just noticing that we had been out every night for six weeks at one time, mostly receptions at Spaso House or some other kind of a thing the foreign community was doing or whatever--theater or something like that. But being out every night for six weeks, that's enough.
[Laughter]

Q: You want to stay home, don't you? [Laughter] What about traveling around outside of Moscow?

NALLE: It was always difficult, but it could be rewarding if you could get permission. I tried to go to Central Asia as often as I could because of my particular interests there. I was given permission about 50 percent of the time I asked. That's one of the characteristics of Soviet society that it has been totally arbitrary in the way things happen. They'll just say, "No." Or they'll say, "For reasons of a temporary nature, no." And you expected it and you asked again later.

When we got the Soviet permission, we got, of course, to Leningrad, where eventually we had a branch office, and to places in the Caucasus--Tbilisi, for example.

Q: You went out to the Caucasus primarily as tourists?

NALLE: No, primarily in connection with visiting cultural attractions, and we had some great ones. As soon as detente opened things up, we had the New York City Ballet, the San Francisco Symphony, Arena Stage, things like that, which everybody had to be involved in. And the big exhibits, traveling exhibits, which went to various cities. We went to a city you've probably never heard of, called Ufa. Ufa is the capital of the Bashkir autonomous republic, and it's right in the middle of the Russian republic out there. I'm not sure where it is. They're Tartars. We went there because the exhibit went there. We opened the exhibit, gave a little talk. And you had these wonderful kids who were the guides. So whenever we could, we took that excuse to go.

Q: You think those exhibits, which took a lot of doing to put them together and it cost a lot of money, were very worthwhile?

NALLE: Yes, if they're well done. At the beginning of the three years, we had more trouble than later, because detente was just beginning to take hold. There was a lot of provocation. A lot of provocations worked against the guides. They'd be entrapped in various ways, and one fellow had to be sent home because he got entrapped. But that fell off markedly in the second or third year.

One thing I instituted at that time, I persuaded the Agency to send out a regular Agency officer to be, in effect, the cultural attaché at the exhibit. The first one was Jack Harrod. Do you know Jack?

Q: Yes.

NALLE: I think he was a little skeptical of the whole thing, but he was very good. He was just what I wanted, because he was intelligent, he spoke Russian, and he was active. His job, as far as I was concerned, was to go out and just be the American representative who didn't have to work all day at the stand, but could get to know the community. What I hoped was that he would feed back to us names of the intellectual leaders of each city, so we could stick it into our card machine and then communicate with those people subsequently. That did work out to a certain extent, and I believe they've done that ever since. You know, there's a coda to all this: Peggy and I have signed up to go to Dushanbe, Tajikistan, with the exhibit that's going there in the fall, to be the reports officers, Peggy speaking Russian and me speaking, in this case, Persian to the Tajiks, which is their native language.

Q: How wonderful! This proves the very good life one can have after the Agency.

Now let's see. We're in the mid-1970s. You came home after Moscow.

JOHN TODD STEWART
Russian Language Training, Foreign Service Institute
Washington, DC (1973-1974)

Commercial Officer
Moscow (1974-1977)

Ambassador Stewart was born in New Jersey and raised in New York City and San Francisco. He attended Stanford University and the Fletcher School and entered the Foreign Service in 1962. His first post in Munich was followed by posts in Venezuela, Geneva, Moscow, Jamaica, Costa Rica, Canada, and an ambassadorship to the Republic of Moldova. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: This might be a good place to stop. In '73 you left Geneva and whither?

STEWART: In '73 I went back to Washington into Russian language training.

Q: What brought this about?

STEWART: I wanted to go to Eastern Europe. One of the courses I had taken when I was at Fletcher concerned the economics of central planning. I thought that a tour in one of the communist countries would be quite interesting. I was originally assigned to Hungary, but due to one of those chains of events in personnel - somebody got into a car accident and couldn't do this, which means somebody else had to do that - my assignment went by the boards, and I was penciled into a slot in the commercial office we were establishing in Moscow, via 10 months of Russian language training.

Q: Okay, so we will pick this up in '73 when you are going to Russian language training. We'll talk a little bit about Russian language training and then on to Moscow.

***

Today is the 2nd of December, 1999. Todd, let's talk about language training. How old were you when you started this?

STEWART: That would have been 1973 so I would have been 33 years old.

Q: How did you find the language?

STEWART: I found the language learning process for Russian to be tedious. It was far and away the worst designed language curriculum that I had encountered up to that point at FSI. There was really no good instructional material beyond a model village of Moscow. That was clever, but we exhausted its possibilities after the first month or so, and the material after that was nowhere near as good.

Q: Sometimes when you take a language, one of the big things that you learn is about the country from your instructors. They've been there, and you are on pretty intimate terms with them, sitting in a classroom six hours a day. Were you picking up much about the Soviet Union at that time?

STEWART: Not about the Soviet Union since all of these instructors came out of the émigré community. They had either been born in the West or had left Russia as very small children. Certainly one of the most amusing things about the program was that there were no dialogues dealing with the telephone since none of them had really talked on the telephone in a Russian-speaking city.

Q: What job were you going to?

STEWART: I was going to a new position in the Commercial Office in Moscow, which had just been established. Tom Niles, who had served in Moscow before, was named director of the office and commercial attaché. Jim Blow from the Commerce Department was the deputy director, and then there were two commercial officers, Sam Fromowitz and myself. We were both assigned from the State Department as first secretaries and commercial officers.

Q: A commercial officer in Moscow in the '70s sounds almost like an oxymoron.

STEWART: No, it was actually a very good time indeed. Detente was in flower and American corporations, particularly the very big ones, were anxious to do business there. Consequently, we had close contact with many captains of U.S. industry.

Q: When you got there, and I assume you got there in '74, can you describe who the Ambassador was, how he operated, and how the Embassy operated from your sort of "new boy" perspective?

STEWART: Walter Stoessel was the Ambassador, and he had been there for about a year or so. Jack Matlock, who subsequently became Ambassador to the USSR, was DCM. The staff had expanded greatly in the year or so before my arrival. Because of detente we had more positions, and people were coming out of language training to fill those positions. Certainly one of the clearest reflections of the new detente relationship was the new Commercial Office, which was not located in the old chancery but a block down the street in a storefront area in the first floor of an apartment house. And the Commerce Department, which had financed the interior decoration of the place, spared no expense in making it attractive. Indeed, it was some of the best, if not the best, office space in Moscow. We had not only our offices there but an exhibit area and a seminar room. One of the things that we pioneered was the so-called exhibit-seminar, for which we would bring in six, seven, or eight American firms to put on very small exhibits in that space and then hold seminar presentations tightly focused on some particular subject like water pollution, drip irrigation or ferrous metallurgy. All of those were seminar-exhibit topics when I was in Moscow. We exhibited a lot of electronic measurement equipment for medical or biological research, and very frequently the manufacturers would show some apparatus that they would sell right off the floor to a Soviet buyer.

Q: How did you, I mean you personally, find relations with the Soviets?

STEWART: We were pioneers in a sense, for up to that time all the relationships in the commercial area were with the Ministry of Foreign Trade, which in the end had to sign the purchase contract. But thanks to détente, we were able to develop direct relationships with the ministries that would be the end users of the products purchased, and of course they were the ones that in the end told the Ministry of Foreign Trade to place the orders. The Ministry of Foreign Trade was simply an intermediary. These relationships were extraordinarily interesting because everything was new. Officials in the end-user ministries hadn't dealt very extensively with foreigners before, and we were feeling our way also. So we would put on an exhibit-seminar for the Ministry of Electronic Industry, for example, and then would take the material from that seminar over to say the Ministry of Ferrous Metallurgy and say, "Hey, we did this with your colleagues over at the other ministry. Now here is what we would like to do with you," and pull out the materials and talk about the kind of program that we wanted to have. There was a good deal of contact in this way. It wasn't a smooth process by any stretch of the imagination, but we made genuine progress at that time and there was as a result a good amount of both commercial interchange and personal interchange. A lot of Soviets went to the U.S. to inspect machinery as it was being assembled and tested, and a lot of Americans went to the various parts of the U.S.S.R. to help install the machinery. It was this kind of increased contact, I believe, that was one of the main reasons why communism started to totter. More and more Soviets understood that the system was not working well compared to our market economy.

Q: Did you feel that everything was sort of a one-way street, going from the U.S. to the Soviet Union? Was there much going to other way?

STEWART: There were some exports to the U.S., particularly in area of raw materials, precious stones, for example. Furs were a traditional Russian export. In a sense the two systems were beautifully matched to each other because in a capitalist economy firms love to export, and in a centrally planned economy the government loves to import. It was a marriage made in heaven until Afghanistan came along, but that was after my time.

Q: You were there from '74 to...?

STEWART: '77.

Q: Can you talk about sort of a typical day there, what would you be doing?

STEWART: I lived on the north side of the city in an apartment house which was set aside for foreigners. That was certainly one of the strange aspects of diplomatic life in the Soviet Union, the fact that the Soviets had us foreigners cordoned off. It had nothing to do with ideology or politics. In my apartment house lived a number of North Vietnamese, and other Embassy people lived next to Eastern Europeans of one variety or another. The line was drawn between Soviets and the foreigners, whatever their political coloration, in living arrangements.

So I would get up in my apartment - I was single at that point - and breakfast on orange juice, cereal and milk which were imported from Helsinki by the commissary we had at the Embassy. However, I would buy my bread across the street at the state bread store. It was a basic truth about Soviet Russia that the bread, tea and caviar were almost always good. My bread was invariably excellent, in fact, and consequently I would always cut myself a nice slice to have with my Finnish imports.

I would drive into the center of the city and encounter very little traffic. It took 15 or 20 minutes to get down to the Embassy. Parking was no problem. There were normally places to park on the street, and in the case of heavy snow we could park on the sidewalk. If I had opera tickets in the evening, there was usually a parking space right in front of the Bolshoi.

In the Commercial Office we had a wonderful ambiance as the appointments were very bright and cheerful, quite unlike the gloom outside in a Russian winter. Winter was hard, for Moscow is so far north that it was pitch black when we went to work and it was pitch black when we drove home. It was tricky navigating the streets of Moscow under those circumstances as pedestrians had the rather disturbing habit of walking halfway across the street and standing in the middle. As everybody was wearing a dark coat and a dark fur hat, they were almost invisible.

Q: Were there many accidents?

STEWART: Surprisingly few. I had one with a bunch of foreign students who were backing up a car as I was going forward. During my tour there were no fatal accidents although there had been one in the months preceding, when a member of the Embassy community was killed driving to Leningrad.

Q: What about your contacts? Were they with the Ministry of Foreign Trade?

STEWART: And the end-user ministries too. Each end-user ministry had a so-called foreign relations department whose officials were authorized by the security folks to deal with us. So we would try to make arrangements to talk to them on a regular basis and establish some sort of relationship. It was extraordinarily difficult to have any sort of relationship that could be described as a friendship. But I dealt, of course, with official Soviets, and we did have people on the staff who dealt with the unofficial community. The twain really didn't meet, and you couldn't work both sides of the street if you were in Moscow. Joe Presel had the dissident beat at the time, and he had a hell of an existence. He suffered all sorts of harassment by the KGB. However, I never had any problems at all. That was because of the kind of work I did, which was something Soviet officialdom was quite interested in fostering.

Q: Did you make any trips around the area?

STEWART: I traveled a great deal. Some trips were business-related, and others were essentially tourism. The Embassy encouraged us to get out just as much as we could in order to get some feeling of what was going on outside Moscow. This made all sorts of sense because once you got outside of Moscow, the atmosphere was generally more relaxed, and you could have interesting conversations.

I recall, for example, a trip to Donetsk, in what is now Ukraine, the center of a coal mining region. I'd flown down there for a trade show. I was having lunch at a local restaurant, nothing very fancy, and in the USSR you were seated anywhere there was an empty chair. There was no such thing as one party per table. And it was definitely acceptable to start talking to the people that you were seated with. So the fellow at my table struck up a conversation. Soon he knew I wasn't Russian, but he assumed that I was from one of the Baltic republics. This would be a logical assumption because my Russian clearly was not native, and the idea of finding somebody from the West would be weird. But I explained I was from the U.S., and immediately he started asking me questions--how much my father received as a pensioner, that kind of thing. So I asked him one too. I said, "Donetsk is very beautiful"--which it was. It had all sorts of green parks and even the median strip on the road coming in from airport was planted with grass and neatly mowed, which was virtually unheard of in the USSR. I asked, "What's the reason for all this greenery?" He laughed and said, "That's our party first secretary--he likes grass."

And that's the kind of story that you got when you were traveling. We periodically compiled and sent to the Department what we called a vignette-gram with stories that happened to us or that we heard from Soviets. They were all true but not reportable in traditional messages. But they probably gave a truer flavor of what Soviet life was like than anything else we sent to Washington.

Q: What were your impressions of Soviet industry, particularly when you got away from Moscow and out in the field?

STEWART: It depended where you were going and what you were looking at. First of all, you were not going to be shown a plant that was a disaster. You had to bear this in mind, but we saw a number of plants which were really quite decent.

I remember one week I spent in Ukraine with somebody from the U.S. Bureau of Mines visiting iron mines and beneficiation plants. A beneficiation plant is a facility that takes iron ore from an open pit mine, which is lower grade, and raises its iron content to the point that it can be put into blast furnaces. The mines and beneficiation plants were not especially impressive--in fact, the Soviets were actively interested in acquiring U.S. technology to improve the latter. However, we also visited a sintering plant, an installation that accretes iron dust resulting from other processes into pellets large enough for use in blast furnaces. My colleague from the Bureau of Mines said that most of these plants in the U.S. were dirty places with high levels of dust in the air. However, the Soviet plant had installed an efficient dust collection system that worked so well we could walk through the plant in suits. My colleague found that very impressive, and that was a judgment from a specialist who knew the industry backwards and forwards.

I also remember a visit we made on that trip to a manganese mine in Ukraine. Manganese is generally found on land at a certain depth in a fairly narrow seam because it was deposited on the ocean floor eons ago before the ocean receded and other material was deposited above it. So you have to go down more than a hundred meters to reach a seam that is only a couple of meters thick. But it's valuable stuff so it's worth it. The catch was that this deposit, which was on the bottom of what had been a larger version of the Black Sea, was located under some of the best farmland in the U.S.S.R. What to do to save the topsoil? What they did was to set up a series of conveyor belts which removed the overburden from one side of the excavation, carried it all the way around to the other side, and redeposited it at the same depth. So what you had when this gigantic series of conveyor belts was working was a gigantic hole which moved very, very slowly across the landscape. It was one of the darndest things I've ever seen.

There were some fascinating innovations like that, but as I say, what we got to see was by and large the best that there was to see. Soviet gigantomania was quite apparent, too. One of the places where a lot of U.S. firms were installing equipment was the big Kamaz truck plant at Naberezhniye Chelny, which was way too big for efficient production. When they finally got it up and running, the trucks they were turning out were obsolete. It was kind of a crazy project, and it was the last project financed with U.S. government money before the Jackson-Vanik amendment became law.

Q: Did you get to look at agricultural things? Were we involved in sales of agricultural equipment and that sort of thing?

STEWART: We certainly had people trying to sell agricultural equipment. John Deere was active in Soviet Union at that time, and we were working with some irrigation equipment companies that were trying to make a sale. But nobody really was very successful. And that struck me as odd, and rather a strange mistake for central planners to make, because in the U.S.S.R. at that time capital investment in agriculture would have paid big dividends. For example, a very high percentage of the grain crop was rotted, simply because there weren't sufficient storage facilities. We were talking to Soviet officials about getting Harvester or another silo manufacturer to set up a factory to turn out storage bins on a mass-produced basis. They never developed any interest although the losses were very large and the central planners had to import grain to make up for them.

Q: Was there a concern that the Soviets might be getting things that were of a critical strategic nature, but even more than that, that we might be helping to make their system work?

STEWART: I don't think there was all that much concern about either. There were all sorts of export controls that we and our allies had to make sure that the Soviets didn't import super-computers and other equipment that had strategic value. Despite the criticisms that were leveled in the U.S. press, I never felt that the Soviets were much more likely to make things work with our help than they were without it. The flip side of this is that in exchange for whatever economic or technological advantage they got, they had to subject their system to more and more openness and that in the end turned out to be quite fatal for the system. It was a good thing for the Soviet peoples, of course, but not for the system.

I think one of the best stories about the Soviet attitude toward collaboration with the West was a conversation I had with the deputy director of the Foreign Relations Department at the Ministry of Non-Ferrous Metallurgy. Mr. Davydov was a delightful man, and if the system had been different, I am certain he would have become a friend. He had been the Moscow tennis champion in his younger days and had a good sense of humor. He called me over to his office one day and said, "Mr. Stewart, we'd be most grateful if you could contact the XYZ corporation and see if they would be interested in licensing to us some flotation cells. (A flotation cell is used for separating minerals from the ore.) I replied, "Well, sure, I'd be happy to do it." And we got talking and he said, "You know, we could develop these ourselves, but our situation reminds me of the story of little Ivan, who was late to school one day in his village. The teacher said, "Little Ivan, you are late." And Ivan answered, "Yes, teacher, but I had to take the cow to the bull." The teacher asked, "Yes, Ivan, but couldn't your father do it?" And little Ivan thought a moment and replied, "Well, yes, teacher, but the bull could do it better."

Q: Was there sort of a market for gadgets. In other words, I can see the head of an enterprise being particularly interested in whatever were our gadgets of the time, which probably wasn't a major need, but still, what the hell, they are fun to have.

STEWART: There was some of that undoubtedly, but I think a better story in this area was about a California firm that manufactured electronic devices for the blind. They had, for example, a calculator with a Braille keyboard and an oral readout. Another gadget allowed a blind person to read a text by rolling a scanner over it and feeling the shape of the letters with his fingertips on an electrically charged screen. All very innovative things. The firm was founded by a Stanford professor with a blind child and did not make a profit beyond a return necessary to provide capital for further research and development. The firm's representatives were invited to Moscow, and indeed they did make some sales. We had no information about who the end users were, but sure as shooting some member of the Central Committee had a blind relative.

Q: Were you able to look at some of the wheat or cotton growing areas? The Soviets were often portrayed as pushing the limits of the way you could grow these crops. For example, cotton production is reportedly destroying the Aral Sea area. Were you able to get a feel for any of this?

STEWART: I didn't do so personally. We had a pretty sizable Agricultural Attaché Office, and the people there traveled a good deal. They would set off from Moscow in a heavy-duty station wagon, an early-day SUV, loaded with as many spare tires and spare wheels as they could get into their cargo space. And it was just a question of how far they could get before their last wheel went, for the roads were pretty horrible.

One piece of agricultural equipment that did sell well was something called a vacuvator. This was a kind of giant vacuum cleaner that went into the hold of a grain ship and sucked out the grain. The Soviets needed them for unloading the ships from the U.S., Canada and other grain producers. I sent a message back to whoever in the intelligence community was doing the estimates of Soviet import plans saying, "You really ought to count how many vacuvators they are buying and estimate the life-span of a vacuvator. Then you could get a pretty good idea of how much grain they are planning to import."

Q: Were you ever subjected to harassment on these trips?

STEWART: First of all, we always traveled in pairs. I told my parents we were like nuns. The only form of harassment I recall was getting an occasional call late at night from some woman down in the lobby wondering if I were lonely, and even that was pretty rare.

When our trip included a weekend, the hotel where we were staying--we tried to stay at the best one, which was generally none too good--would generally have a band and dancing. When we would go down for dinner, it was perfectly legit under the Soviet social rules to invite any woman in the place to dance. And we certainly held up our end. When we'd start dancing, we would introduce ourselves as being from the U.S. Embassy. The ladies would either swoon away in our arms or just start asking questions about what life was like in the U.S.

Q: Did you have much contact with the rest of the Embassy officers, or were you off to one side?

STEWART: We were perhaps more isolated than anybody else. But the community there was so closely knit that there was a great deal of interchange. Our office reported to the Economic-Commercial Counselor at the time.

Q: Who was that?

STEWART: It was Noble Mellencamp. We would go up to the Economic Section before the Commercial Office opened in the morning to read the traffic since we couldn't have anything classified in the Commercial Office. If we were writing any classified messages, we would draft them at that time too. We also collaborated a fair amount with the Science and Technology Section because so much of what we did had technological overtones and with USIA to a certain degree because we were both in the exhibit business. Obviously we had friends in one place or another, and those relationships expanded our range of contacts. A great meeting place for the American community at that time was the snack bar. The snack bar, I always thought, was a scene straight from Hades because you'd walk in on a dark winter day and encounter an interior decor in black and red. In addition, the defective ventilation system would allow steam and smoke to bellow out of the kitchen as the hamburgers were prepared. We had an Italian chef who was rumored to be a millionaire five times over as he supposedly dealt in caviar on the side. It was the meeting place for the entire American community - Embassy staffers, family members with kids, etc. - so everyone got to know each other.

Q: What were you getting from the Embassy officers who were involved in traditional diplomatic work about how the relations were going at the time? What was the Embassy thinking about the Brezhnev regime at the time, '74-'77?

STEWART: This was the end of the Ford Administration and the start of the Carter Administration. Under Ford, Kissinger was Secretary of the State, and there was a tremendous amount of official interchange involving Henry. I believe the Embassy was fully hooked into what he was up to.

Q: He was not doing his normal by-pass?

STEWART: No, not like the days when he was National Security Adviser and Rogers was Secretary. When Henry was running the Department and the Foreign Service, we were all hands the Kissinger plantation and quite involved in his activities.

We had a large number of congressional visits at that point, too. I think the biggest group was a delegation of some 25 senators, the most senior being Hubert Humphrey, who had been to Moscow many times. This group was wined and dined like a collective head of state. We had a control officer for every senator and, of course, the Soviets did too, all KGB types. After a gala dinner one evening, every senator got into his own limo with his own Soviet escort and was taken back to the Rossiya Hotel, which was down near Red Square. I was there at the Rossiya, which was my post for the evening, watching the senators get out of their vehicles. It was naturally assumed that they would go into the hotel and go to bed. As a result, the KGB escorts all started to congregate together to have a smoke and discuss the day's events. However, the senators didn't go straight in but formed a little group themselves. It appeared at that point that Humphrey said, "You guys haven't been on the subway yet? Hey, I'll show you." And all 25 senators disappeared down an escalator into the subway system, where all the signs are in Cyrillic. We turned and looked at the KGB types, and I've never seen such looks of naked horror. Every one of them could see his transfer orders to Yakutsk when the U.S. press reported that 25 senators had been lost in the Moscow subway system. I've never seen so many people run so fast, throwing their cigarettes in every direction and charging down that escalator.

Q: You can picture yourself in the shoes of a KGB agent trying to ride herd on a bunch of foreigners, and that would not be fun.

STEWART: A lot of my KGB associates were certainly not bad personally, and if the system had not been what it was, there were several that I would have been friends with. I remember having lunch with one KGB officer who was older than I was, somewhere in his 40s. He had spent a good deal of time in the West, his English was very good, but he always had trouble getting U.S. visas because he had been involved at one point in industrial espionage. He knew the western system well enough, and he mused to me, "You know, if I were in Chicago or in London, I could be a corporate CEO or maybe a number two, but I can't have that kind of responsibility here at my age." He was right.

Q: It's not that hard today.

STEWART: Yes, times have changed. I wonder what some of my erstwhile associates are doing, now that you no longer have to wait until somebody dies before you can move up a notch in the bureaucracy.

Q: Speaking of which, looking at the top, what were you getting, particularly from your colleagues who were following the Central Committee, about Brezhnev and those immediately around him, because we knew at that period that the top guys were beginning to totter. Was there a lot of talk about who's really calling the shots?

STEWART: It wasn't so much talk about who was calling the shots at that point. Brezhnev was still perfectly ambulatory and was meeting people. I certainly never met him, but he would greet Kissinger and people at that level. I'll tell you one thing that we did discuss a lot, and I should explain the context, which is probably kind of interesting too. Mike Lemon, who is now

Ambassador to Armenia, was the Ambassador's aide at that point in the Embassy. With that job came an apartment of sorts in Spaso House, which was actually the old billiard room. Mike had adequate space and was centrally located so he came to host regular Friday night parties for single people. We drank more than was good for us, I'm sure, talked shop and sometimes got to discussing deeper issues. I remember one of the things that used to come up was the generation gap in the Soviet Union. Old war horses like Brezhnev were running the Soviet Union at that time, but we hypothesized quite correctly - it didn't take much genius - that they were going to start dying off and the successor generation was none too numerous because many were killed in the war. And so it was pretty obvious that what you were going to see was the leadership skip a generation from the Brezhnev group to much younger people who were too young to fight in World War II. That is, of course, exactly what happened. When Chernenko finally went to join Marx, the mantle fell to...

Q: To Gorbachev.

STEWART: Who was too young to have been in the war. We did not have the faintest idea what these young people were going to be like, but we had every reason to think that their advent was going to be an opening for change and indeed it was.

Q: Did you have any feel about the acceptance of Marxism? Did people believe in it, or were they just token Marxists for careerist motives?

STEWART: I don't think we ever met anybody who believed a word of it.

Q: I was talking to somebody about this time in Poland, and he said there were probably maybe at most three dedicated Marxists in the whole country.

STEWART: It was pretty slim pickins.

Q: A tremendous effort was going into this façade, but even the people maintaining the façade didn't believe the lectures, the publications, the turgid prose, and all that?

STEWART: I don't think that anyone in the older generation wanted to confront reality. You know, if you are in your late 60s or 70s and you have been doing something for that many years, it is not easy to confront the habits of a lifetime. The other factor was, and this can't be overstated, that there were a lot of people who really did owe something to the system. And I mean this in a very positive way. I knew all sorts of people who had come out of a village someplace and were given educational opportunities that they would not have had in a million years under the old regime. They got an education, they got started in the hierarchy, and they worked their way up. When I knew them, they had a dacha outside of Moscow, a car and a driver, and all those things which made them, in Soviet terms, at least upper middle class. In comparison with living among the pigs in a little town out in the countryside, they'd come a long way. There was gratitude for what the system had done for them, and if it had meant reciting all this hogwash periodically, why not? I think that was an important psychological factor as far as many people were concerned.

Q: Life in the village must have been tough. From what I've heard and what I experienced when I spent my five years in Yugoslavia, when you leave a major city, you'd go back four or five centuries practically. Oxen were the major form of transport.

STEWART: Yes, it was a very, very primitive sort of existence. The possibility of escaping that life was quite important.

One other thing that I was going to say in this regard was about Soviet perks, which were interesting because they all came with the job. This was a powerful disincentive to retire if you were in the top echelon of the government or party. Your lifestyle would take a real battering if you left, and consequently, people didn't. The only person of any note who really did hang it up, apparently willingly, and keep his perks was Anastas Mikoyan, the old Minister of Foreign Trade. He was still around during my day and would be invited to Kremlin receptions and so forth--and that was rare for a retired member of the Politburo. We hypothesized that the reason he could keep his perks was that he had no-holds-barred memoirs stashed with lawyers in Zurich to guarantee the good behavior of his colleagues.

Q: Did we perceive the Soviet Union as an aggressive country at that time, which was, of course, pre-Afghanistan but post-Czechoslovakia in 1968?

STEWART: I don't think so. George Kennan said at one point, referring to Brezhnev and his cronies, who were his contemporaries, that when you get to his age about the last thing you want to do is conquer the world. And I think he had that right, but little paranoias would still crop up in the U.S. One of them was a theory in the right-wing press that the Soviets were building a massive system of nuclear fallout shelters. We were under standing instructions to report any evidence of this. Satellites would go over the USSR and spot a suspicious half-buried installation, and someone from the Defense Attaché's office would go out and take a look. Generally, the installation would have "Men" on one door and "Women" on the other. I guarantee nobody would want to spend very much time there. In all the plants that we visited, I don't think I ever heard of one that had instructions posted as to what to do if an air raid siren sounded. Best of all, some right-wing analyst said that evidence for the existence of this supposedly massive program could be found in the number of general officers that had been assigned to the civil defense command. We thought this was hilarious because this guy had apparently never heard of a turkey farm.

Q: You have to explain for somebody who doesn't understand what we are talking about.

STEWART: A turkey farm is a bureaucratic division where you put your least desirable people if you can't discharge them for one reason or another.

Q: In our bureaucratic terminology, a turkey is an employee that you can't place.

Were you seeing or considering that the ethnic divisions in the Soviet Union would really become divisive or did you think that the USSR was going to stick together?

STEWART: Certainly we saw no evidence, no direct evidence, of severe ethnic tensions. There was no Chechen Freedom Movement or Uzbek Liberation Army. However, one fact that was perfectly clear at that time was that the growth rates of the populations in Central Asia were much greater than those in the Slavic parts in the Soviet Union, and we thought that fact was going to have consequences. But no, I am not aware of any political manifestation that we could monitor at that point. I think that aside from the Baltics, when the Soviet Union fell apart, it was not because of any great desire to seek national liberation on the part of the various constituent republics. In the Baltics you did find continuing resentment against Soviet rule, and I recall one story that a friend in the Consulate in Leningrad told me. He and a colleague were in Tallinn, the capital of Estonia, and went out for dinner. When they neared the restaurant, they became separated, and one reached the head of a long line before the other did. The first person there simply asked in Russian, "Is it possible to get a table?" and the answer was "Nyet." Then the second came up and said in English, "We're Americans. Can we get a table?" and the doorman replied, "Oh, sure."

Q: What role did the economy play in the downfall of the Soviet system? It just wasn't up to par, compared to what was happening in Asia and Japan and in the West. Were you seeing the economy as the Achilles heel of the USSR, or was there a feeling that the centrally planned economy could muddle through?

STEWART: It was perfectly clear to us when we were there that the system wasn't functioning very well. My own theory is that central planning will work as long as growth comes from increasing the output of raw and semi-processed materials. Because there, if you are making up an economic plan, you can impose objective norms. You can tell whoever is running a beneficiation plant that he has to turn out so many tons of beneficiated iron ore with no less than 85% iron content. You can measure the result pretty easily by sending your inspectors around to sample a few nodules on an irregular basis and make a measurement. If the plant manager does well, he fulfills his quota and gets a pat on the head. It's much harder when you deal with end products, especially consumer goods, where questions of taste become dominant. Heaven only knows how you establish norms for taste other than through the market, the antithesis of central planning. And if you are in a fast changing industry, God help you. By the time you get a norm established for a computer, the computer will be obsolete. You'd be mandating obsolescence.

Q: Were you looking at things such as infrastructure? You were talking about the inability to preserve grain, and also the abysmal highways. Flying over Russia is so different than flying over the U.S. You really can't see roads there while the U.S. is checkered with roads, even in the countryside. Did you regard the infrastructure as being extremely poor?

STEWART: That certainly is true. You have to remember, though, that there was very little travel by car compared with the U.S. If you were going somewhere, you would fly or go by train. In addition, rail transport was far more important than truck transport.

Q: What about helicopter factories in Kyrgyzstan that used inputs from Poland?

STEWART: Tom Niles said that the experience which epitomized Soviet central planning for him came during a picnic with his wife and two kids in the countryside outside Moscow. It was late summer, the harvest was underway, and as they sat on a blanket under a tree, they watched with bemusement as one truck loaded with melons passed another truck loaded with melons going in the opposite direction on the road in front of them.

Central planning also involved siting factories for political reasons. We suffered the consequences of such a decision when I was in Moldova, where a steel scrap mill, a so-called mini-mill, had been built in the 1980s for, as far as I could tell, purely political reasons. A similar mill was built at the same time near the Pacific. Both locations were bizarre because there was no close source of scrap, no transport other than the rail, no close market, and no immediate source of power as the electricity was produced from gas imported from Siberia.

Q: Of course, steel factories were often like that, even some in the West. When I was in Italy close to this time, you had steel factories down at the boot of Italy, at the lower end, that had no market, but by God they employed a lot of people. You couldn't very well shut them down, or you'd have political consequences that were tough.

STEWART: Another odd thing about the Moldovan plant was that it was located in a place where there weren't very many people so they had to import workers too. I already mentioned Kamaz, the truck plant in the Naberezhniye Chelny. The town had been a village on the Kama River, where it was decided for reasons best known to Moscow to put this humongous complex. When I visited there on one occasion, I talked to a young Soviet woman who called herself an economist, but I guess production planner would be our term. She was Russian but from some place in Central Asia, and she said, frankly, that the reason she was there was that she had a good chance of getting an apartment. She didn't rate one where she was from, and the only slight catch was that she had to live in a so-called dormitory until the apartment houses were built.

Q: When you left there in '77, what did you think about the future of the Soviet Union?

STEWART: I certainly wasn't predicting a collapse in 1991. I mentioned before that we didn't know what was going to happen when the generation gap manifested itself. We knew that the system wasn't working very well. But to predict that people would start questioning the basis of the system once the last of Brezhnev's generation died out, that was something well beyond my predictive powers. But in the case of Will the Soviet Union Survive until 1984?, written by a dissident historian, the title was intended to be provocative, but my Lord, the man only missed by seven years.

Q: Were we a bit, do you think, hung up on our own sense that the USSR was a dangerous place, that it was strong, that it would be very dangerous to underestimate the Soviet Union?

STEWART: No, we were all pretty convinced that the economy didn't work and that the system wasn't worth a damn. I don't think there was any significant degree of ill will toward individual Soviets, but some aspects of the system were abhorrent. I recall one particular case. We had a science attaché, not a career person but someone we picked up from Hewlett Packard. He was a European Jew who had been in Auschwitz, survived, and reached the U.S. This gentleman began receiving telephone calls late at night with obscene anti-Semitic content. Finally, Jack Matlock went into the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, described the calls, and said, "Don't you have any sense of shame whatsoever?" And the calls ended.

NAOMI F. COLLINS
Spouse of Foreign Service Officer

Mrs. Collins was born and raised in New York City and educated at Queen College, City University of New York; Indiana University; Harvard University; and Moscow State University. Married to American Foreign Service Officer, James Collins, she accompanied him on a number of his assignments in the United States and abroad, including Izmir and Moscow, where her husband served as United States Ambassador from 1997 to 2001. Throughout this time Mrs. Collins continued her separate career, primarily in the fields of International Education, Humanities, and Political Development, notably Russian, authoring numerous publications on these and other subjects. She is currently an Independent Education Consultant in Bethesda, Maryland. Mrs. Collins was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2012

Q: Were you having any contact with people in the Foreign Service at that time?

COLLINS: No, at that point I was just out there on my own. My relatives thought Jim had left me; they assumed that's why my parents were housing the two toddlers and me. They had that look, "Sure he's coming back...." But, no, no contact with the Foreign Service for me. I assume Jim was in regular contact. And then they sent orders for Jim in the spring of 1973 to go to Moscow.

Q: This was a full time position in Moscow.

COLLINS: Yes. He was to serve in the political section. By that time, baby Jonathan had almost figured out who Jim was and no longer cried when Jim "babysat" him. But as we prepared to rent out our house and ship out, another shock occurred. Jim was diagnosed with cancer. Two weeks later he had surgery, followed by six weeks of radiation every morning. Cobalt they said it was. It was a grim and scary period, dwarfing other concerns. We were both 30-something and the kids were too young to understand. Although the surgery was not difficult, the radiation sickened him. Daily I drove him to the treatment at Sibley with the two little ones bouncing around in the back seat of our used VW Beetle.

But Jim was determined to continue working, and went from radiation treatment to bus stop to State Department until he could no longer stand up the last two weeks or so....in bed being sick all day long. As you can imagine, the State Department didn't want to give him medical clearance to go to Moscow and I could not fault them for that. But he fought it and won. He argued that the conditions in Moscow would be no different from those in Washington regarding the recurrence of cancer.

On the face of it, it made sense. That was before we knew about the microwave radiation trained on the Embassy. If somebody in the State Department had known this in 1973, they sure didn't tell us. They let Jim go anyway, rather than factor in this possible threat. The rest is history. We went. Jim had an exemption that required him to return to Washington after one year for a medical checkup. I thought he needed more frequent sophisticated checkups, but could not complain about a visit home during the summer of 1974.

Q: From when to when were you there?

COLLINS: We went out in August 1973 and returned in August of 1975.

Q: What kind of quarters did you have?

COLLINS: We had excellent housing. It was in a new building at the outskirts of Moscow, about eight miles from the Embassy. They had merged two Russian apartments to create a three-bedroom flat with two bathrooms. Very comfortable. Of course we didn't yet know that we would be without hot water during much of two cold summers.

Q: Where was this?

COLLINS: Moscow was then built out with high-rise buildings from Khrushchev's era, massive ugly housing projects growing from the center to periphery for about eight miles. Just beyond that you suddenly found old villages with small huts, village pump, muddy dirt roads, chimneys spewing smoke in winter. We were in the last of the buildings before the fields began. These were new buildings, built for foreigners, fenced, gated, and guarded. There was – as far as we could tell – only one other American family (with children) in the three-building complex. Others were from all over the world.

Q: Who was the Ambassador at that time, and how was the spirit?

COLLINS: When we arrived, there was a chargé, Spike Dubs. Then Walter Stoessel became Ambassador. The morale of the Embassy in Moscow has always seemed to me to have been poor during the periods I've known it. Some people say that in the Foreign Service people become like the place they're in. In a city that was gray, dilapidated, and monotonous; topped by the Cold War suspicions and surveillance, there wasn't much to cheer. And daily frustrations. Nothing functioned. People were rough, in survival mode since the war, at least in the 1960s and 1970s. It made New York seem gentle and civil.

The embassy was large and bureaucratic as you can expect. Many people were complaining about something. Most things were in short supply, so if people wanted a washer or needed a crib, they couldn't get them easily or quickly. I became one of the grippers when the embassy seized the crib from under two-year-old Jonathan, who loved it, to give it to another child because they didn't have another crib. Jonathan was unhappy and insecure in a bed, so he chose to sleep on the floor instead, sometimes under the bed. Small things can get to you when you're living in a taxing and vexing environment, both inside and outside the embassy. That said, of course, there were wives who enjoyed living in Russia during the Soviet times. I admired them. It wasn't a good fit for me.

Q: Did you have a servant?

COLLINS: The State Department did not pay for any hired help in Moscow, even though we were expected to entertain. Other countries' embassies we knew of did supply help for their officers in Moscow both for entertaining and for the hardship shopping there. And we couldn't just go out on the market for a teenage babysitter. So with my working, the kids needing some babysitting, and the need to entertain, we were forced to pay out-of-pocket for a housekeeper, for Olga, something we would never have considered doing at home on our salary.

Q: Was Olga part of the system in which the Soviet government would essentially assign somebody?

COLLINS: Absolutely. You couldn't hire anyone without going through, UPDK, the diplomatic services department (Administration for the Diplomatic Corps.) They could ask the prices they wanted and collect the pay in "hard currency," dollars not rubles. And they would send whomever they wanted. One giveaway was that the people they sent to clean house seemed a tad "overqualified": they usually spoke English well, were educated, and- in the case of Olga – refined.

Q: Everybody felt this was part of the KGB apparatus.

COLLINS: Yes, for good reason. There was evidence they reported back to the "authorities" about us. We had nothing to hide, yet the invasion of privacy went with living there, and made me uncomfortable. But I did need help babysitting during the times between the end of nursery school and my arrival home from work; and of course welcomed the cleaning and even some preparation for meals.

I think I may have mentioned that I did get a job with the embassy after a number of months seeking professional work there. I worked for a wonderful Public Affairs Officer (PAO), David Nalle, and worked in the "library" slot. I replaced Ann Odom, who was peerless, General Bill Odom's wife. Unfortunately, they are no longer living. My job was to maintain contacts with influential Russians in organizations in the arts, culture, and education, helping to determine whom to invite to embassy events, or who might enjoy having a particular book we had available as a gift. David taught me a lot.

Q: How would you say your relations were with Russians then: were you being shunned or could you meet people?

COLLINS: It was possible for most of us to meet only those Russians who were cleared to associate with foreigners. There were people at the embassy whose job it was to know dissidents, minorities, and nonconformists. They did befriend and socialize with people "on the outs." We chose not to because it seemed, overall, that many Russians had enough risks in their life without associating with suspect foreigners. We felt it was the right thing for them not to have us enter their lives.

At the time, we knew a Russian pianist, Lev Vlasenko, whom Jim had met when he came to Harvard in 1960. As soon as we arrived in Moscow, we looked up his performances at the Conservatory. When we attended one and went backstage to see him, he hugged Jim with tears in his eyes. I guess we said something about getting together, and he looked into our eyes, and simply said, "I hope you will understand." And that was it. We could greet him after performances, which we did. But it would have been selfish to impose our well-intentioned hospitality on him. He had occasional clearance to travel outside Russia. When he did, he'd send Jim a postcard. But we didn't want to jeopardize his career or travels, or his wife's career.

Now to jump ahead from the 1970s to the late 1990s concerning Lev: when we returned to Russia after it opened up, we walked on our first day to the Conservatory. Outside was posted a notice of a concert to be performed the next day-- at his memorial service. The soloist was his daughter. Jim had managed a brief visit with him in the early '90s, but how inhuman it was that we couldn't maintain a friendship during most his adult lifetime.

As for other Russians, we would meet and talk in casual relationships, parks, restaurants, trains. Like Americans, Russians talk to "strangers." And they were curious. But developing deeper relationships was dicey, other than with those sanctioned to know you. This didn't mean that everyone at the embassy felt or acted the same way: this is what we chose.

Q: What about daily living: did you have to stand in line for things? How good were you?

COLLINS: How good was I? Well patience has never been my forte, so I wasn't good at the standing-in-line thing. But I had learned in the 1960s the multiple-line-dance of procuring something to eat. Also ate up a lot of time – and kept consumer demand down. Life was easier at the embassy than it had been as students, because we had a car and we could shop at the "diplomats store" using dollars rather than rubles. The embassy basement housed a very small commissary – a very small room. It had some canned and packaged American items at random. Breakfast cereals and tuna fish were among the more popular. And the appearance of Oreos could really get a rush of people. Several of the goods were rationed. I bought things at the Russian stores of course, as I had when we were students. Prepared foods. Fresh bread. That was not too difficult. But it was hard to find specialty items, like cream for cooking. Fresh milk and eggs. What I truly missed – as did our little sons- were fresh fruits and vegetables. That said, we were way above deprivation or hunger. So I was "good enough," I suppose: I shopped and cooked daily while working ... did the things that had to be done.

Q: Well did you find there was a grouping of a "wives mafia" or something like that?

COLLINS: Probably several little groups. I did make some wonderful friends of wives who were there, friendships that have lasted to today. There were several, unfortunately, whose marriages didn't survive Moscow, women with advanced degrees and professional experience that they were not allowed to use there, and so they went home. They did well in the long run.

Q: The Foreign Service has been particularly rough on marriages, especially in eastern European assignment. I know when I was in Yugoslavia, Jim Lowenstein, Larry Eagleburger, David Anderson, all of them when we served in Serbia together ended up divorced.

COLLINS: Yes, some hung in and remained married. Some wives left but didn't divorce.

Q: Spike Dubs didn't remain married.

COLLINS: Spike Dubs, the DCM at the time, got divorced.

Q: What's the problem? Why would this happen?

COLLINS: That is a good question. First, we would have to ascertain whether the incidence of divorce was indeed higher among this group than among those who served in other regions or worked in D.C. I don't know. I'm also not sure if it's higher than it is in comparable professions, although it appeared to be higher than that among military officers. If it is indeed higher, it's probably because of the strain put on families: difficult and challenging setting, few cheering sides to life, and of course officers working seven days a week, evenings, weekends, and holidays, leaving families on their own in an unappealing setting. Constant surveillance even in the "home." So few outlets. In the few spare hours, professional "entertaining" and attending events is virtually required. As for cause and effect: hard to know if East Europe drives people to greater divorce, or if officers who select that area are already less concerned with family life than, let's say, those who choose Latin America. I'd love to see longitudinal studies...but I do agree that divorce rates appear to be high.

Q: I know times change, so I wonder whether there was an effort at that time to send out any marriage counselors or the equivalent? Or was anything else being done?

COLLINS: They did have a chaplain, but I don't know whether he was trained in counseling. I know that when his wife was killed in an auto accident in which he was driving, he stayed at the post in denial as if nothing had happened. There was one American MD there, but I don't believe he was trained in counseling either. I think there may later on have been an occasional visiting psychiatrist on circuit, but I think he was there more to assess people with issues and decide if they should be sent home rather than to counsel them during his short, intermittent visits. If there was help available, I doubt people could avail themselves of it in that fishbowl setting and believing it could not help their "efficiency" report.

Q: I was wondering if there were any efforts by senior wives to encourage junior wives to go and speak with Jane Doe who seems to be experiencing some difficulties, and maybe you can help here....

COLLINS: I didn't see that, but it may have been occurring. It didn't seem as strong as the military wives' community efforts.

Q: And a senior wife, like Jane Dubs?

COLLINS: She did take her role as a senior Foreign Service wife very seriously in the formal and social sense of the word. She asked me to tea and when I said I was working at the embassy she said I would just have to come anyway (remember the theme: "my husband is higher than your husband.") I was young and felt in a bind. So I asked David, my boss, what to do. Of course he said, "Just go." I felt bad about "skipping work."

I do think that the wives overall were very good at helping one another, reaching out and supporting each other, especially at times of need (like illness). But when marriages unraveled, women left. Interestingly, several of them might have stayed and worked things out had they been able to use their professional expertise in a paid position. One with top of the line Russian, one Ph.D. economist, one accountant, budget and fiscal specialists – all were frustrated at being unable to use their experience there. And many others with great talents – writing, teaching, nursing, social work, administration – stayed and did what they had to do to support their husbands.

Q: Were you aware of the radiation in the embassy at all?

COLLINS: Not at all at that time. Jim learned of it after we completed our two years living there. I first read of this in the New York Times. Jim went out there with the assumption that he would be no more subject to recurrence of cancer there than at home; we left our children in the embassy basement nursery school; we worked in the building near windows– we had no idea the possible risk. But we all knew the considerable number of people who contracted cancer then or in the years following, numbers greater than we knew in comparable populations in our neighborhoods or other offices. One telling story – and it’s in my book – is of a high level officer’s experience. He later told us that he knew there was something afoot when he came into his embassy office one day to discover that the fluorescent light bulbs he had left on the floor – unplugged – were lit up on their own.

Q, I am not an expert on this, but understand there was a building across the way that was irradiating the embassy. There may have been the idea that somehow this radiation could feed microphones or pick up signals or relay conversations. But the real concern was of course the question of what was happening to the people who were being fried by this radiation.

COLLINS: I have no idea why the Russians did it, what they thought they were getting from it. One assumption was that somehow they were gathering intelligence that way. Whether it was from microphones planted in the walls, or from electric typewriters, or from radio frequencies and cables , or something else completely – not sure anyone still knows. But what we do know is that the measurable level of microwave radiation at the embassy was higher than what the Russians themselves considered to be a safe and acceptable level for human exposure.

Q: I wonder if there were policy reasons that prevented doing something about it, like saying, “stop that or we’re pulling out,” which we could have done.

COLLINS: I think there were things that could have been done. They later added special screening to cover the windows, which they could have done sooner. Perhaps they could also have arranged desks away from direct line with windows, against walls instead.

And whether the medical department at State knew about this and made decisions about sending or not sending people accordingly, we never knew. Or whether attempts were made simply to say: “enough already,” as you suggested. That we can’t subject Americans to this. What most of us at the embassy at that time observed then and later, beside the number of cases of cancer, was those among younger people. In the couple who had our apartment before us, both of them – in their 30s – contracted cancer, and one survived (a good thing, with their young child to bring up). There were few couples in which at least one didn't get cancer, although, happily, many have survived it. The scientific study that the State Department commissioned from the Johns Hopkins University Department of Public Health was, to my mind, faulty. When the surveyors called to question me, I asked whether they had spoken to individuals A, B, and C. – all of whom had contracted cancer. The interviewer told me they had not been given those names. Nor did they follow up a few years later, either, with the additional cases that sprouted. So I think they missed many key people and cases that might have shown a higher incidence, in keeping with what most of us observed.

Q: I think what we are talking about here is something that many of us in the Foreign Service are concerned about, and that is that there are many instances in which it's best not to make waves, not to mention it if it might create waves. There's a strong suspicion that policy had priority over health.

COLLINS: Over people, human life.

Q: Over people.

COLLINS: I think there was a culture of secrecy and lack of candidness that pervaded the Service. You obviously didn't want people breaching security, saying things harmful to American interests. Yet under that cover not enough distinction was made between things that did or didn't have to be secret. Policy issues, relations with Russia, security issues were one thing; the health and welfare of families, of children, that is another. Another example of not knowing enough – beside radiation – were intestinal parasites.

Q: Now things have reached such a state that our Embassy in Beijing gives a daily report on air pollution, which the Chinese government does not. So people in China are checking what the American Embassy is saying because they don't trust their own government.

COLLINS: Now that is a good one! Moscow, of course, had foul air in summer's heat when the peat bogs burned in July or August, filling the city with the acrid smell and smoke of burning peat. We were supposed to suck it up. But you're right that the Embassy did nothing to warn people or suggest what they might do to avoid asthma and bronchitis. One American wife and mother died of it while we were there. Perhaps they do things differently today. When I talk to younger people today, they're apt to say, "Why would you put up with this?" Or, "We'd never put up with that." The discomforts, secrecy, and disregard. They feel entitled to more respect and better treatment, professionally and personally.

Q: I think there have been so many suits in court, some things may have changed. But the government is not a benevolent mother to its employees.

COLLINS: No signs of benevolence, no. It was a battle all the time. It's probably true of many bureaucracies, places where employees don't necessarily feel it's in their interest to serve those they're paid to support, those who were filling the State Department's mission in the field, those who do diplomacy, economic and commercial reporting, consular work for U.S. citizens, and such. There seemed to be little or no accountability for performance. On a bad day, I would picture callous people leaving their office at 6:00 p.m. to drive to their comfortable suburban homes around D.C., with electricity, hot and cold running water, washing machines, air conditioners – even a crib!

Q: You did get this job for the cultural affairs officer. You mentioned it was probably the only professional level job for a spouse. What were you up to?

COLLINS: Technically, this was a “librarian” slot because it was in the American library. It later became an Officer’s slot. These embassy libraries, as you know, are opened to the people in the host country to learn more about America. But in Russia it was impossible in most cases for a Russian to breach the walls and enter past the Russian guards outside. It had a nice little collection of literature by American authors, as well as books that were designed to be given as gifts to Russians to provide them greater understanding of American life. So the goal was to promote American culture.

David Nalle, the PAO I mentioned, had me engaged as a “contact management system officer,” the title it was given when it became a regular USIA (United States Information Agency) Officer’s position. Nowadays I’m sure it’s done on computers. The notes and records I developed, and systems for sorting these, were designed to help us know which Russians in the arts and culture might be interested in and invited to which events at the Embassy. Whether it was the university rector or the head of the Bolshoi Ballet or dancers, artists, educators, or others, it was about maintaining these relationships. I also got to help determine which books to give to which Russian officials. I attended events, met people, and noted later those who attended and who didn’t, to see interest level. In large groups, it wasn’t always easy. We would try to do a head-count. Simplest way was to set out, let’s say, 200 coat hangers on racks, and count the empty hangers – or extra coats! I mentioned that David was wonderful to work for, and I learned a great deal. He and his wife Peggy are still good friends of ours.

Q: Were you able to keep up with world events at that time?

COLLINS: It was very difficult to keep up with world events, a great frustration for me, feeling uninformed. Those at the Embassy had the wire services. With Internet today people cannot imagine how isolated one can feel abroad without fresh news. By the time Newsweek arrived, or the shared copy of the Tribune, the events had long passed. Sometimes Jim could bring home the ticker tapes, but I couldn’t count on that. We could sometimes tune into the soporific sounds of the “Voice of America” (VOA); and on a good day, hear the BBC World Service. The Soviets tried to jam all those stations. Even today there are holes in my knowledge of these years.

Q: Was Jim trying to keep up with the Middle East?

COLLINS: Yes, his job entailed working on Russian relations with the Middle East. Of course he’ll tell you more about this, but he was always interested in Russian foreign relations.

Q: What sense did you have from your two stays in Russia about the Soviet government's efficiency, popularity, and other things?

COLLINS: In our student days I found the Russian graduate students disinterested in ideology, both bored and irritated. But somehow I did not then project ahead to what would happen when these 20-somethings became 50-somethings, and in good positions in government, education, and the professions. We knew that they felt the restraints of a hermetically sealed and isolated country; fears of the uncertain hand of "Authority;" and backwardness of development. It's almost impossible today to imagine such a totalitarian state, or a place so cut off from world news, now that we have Internet. During those years, people's gait and carriage were different from what they are today: they tended to look down at their feet or straight ahead, not wanting to see too much, I always thought. The popularity of the Soviet state, system, and regime did not run high among its educated subjects. As for efficiency, outside the military, it didn't abound. Many sights we saw looked like the proverbial (and of course stereotypical) "Polish jokes."

Q: Avoiding eye contact, you say.

COLLINS: Yes, avoiding eye contact, avoiding looking too much to one side or the other, avoiding looking up from the ground. "I am minding my own business." That made me feel a sense of fear, uncertainty, closedness. People were careful to avoid appearing to know anything that might bring knocks on their doors in the middle of the night to question them.

Q: This is interesting because I am told that some of the old timers look with nostalgia at the Brezhnev era because of the stability; it lacked the turmoil of elections.

COLLINS: No chaos, for sure. Stability.

Q: Everything was pretty well ordered and so there wasn't much of a challenge.

COLLINS: That's right. And this was especially true if you were privileged, a party member who was part of the elite. So if you can look back to this "special status" life, perhaps it looks pretty good in retrospect! Even in this country, many people look back in nostalgia to what they see as easier and better days, forgetting the bad parts, the discrimination and lack of equity, especially if that didn't affect them.

In Russia if you managed to get yourself into the higher levels of the party or had a good job to go with that, you had a life of relative comfort and ease. The advantages came with "station." This was not yet a monetized society, so some people were rewarded with special benefits. Two main ones were housing and access to rare goods. So those at the top had large enough flats not to have to share kitchens and bathrooms, and for couples to have their own bedroom. Through special stores they could acquire appliances like a refrigerator or washing machine. A coupon book came with their paycheck. These coupons allowed them to shop in stores that might have boots from Eastern Europe, nicer things. We knew those shops because we could shop there with our U.S. dollars.

Several people we knew were members of the “Academies,” the National Academies of Sciences. (The Russian “Academies,” unlike the American ones, included history and other fields we do not include in “sciences.” “Wissenschaften” is a better word for it.) They not only had secure positions, but support staffs and the benefits anyone covets in that kind of research environment. There were not a lot of women in these positions compared to the number of men, especially at the top. So you can see that there was a lot for some people to be nostalgic about, to remember fondly because the system worked so well for them. Some people in this country now call that “entitlement.”

Q: Being of Jewish background means that you’re likely to be more sensitive to Anti-Semitism. Were you sensing that in conversation?

COLLINS: I was not so likely to hear that because we dealt mainly with “official” Russians. So their conversation was constrained, restrained, careful, narrow, and limited. They were not apt to wax eloquently on any subject. But I know you don’t have to scratch deeply below the surface to find anti-Jewish sentiment in Russia. And many Russian Jews who lived there encountered prejudice in university admissions and/or a “glass ceiling” in their profession. There was reason to believe this was true. Some did not appear to notice or encounter it, or at least to find it an issue. But if most Russians were careful to avoid raising doubts of their loyalty to the Party, Jews may have been even more so (e.g., by avoiding visiting with foreigners). There were some Jews who did rise to higher positions, served as military officers, were active in the Communist party, and may or may not have believed what they professed, like others.

Q: Well the dissidents of course.

COLLINS: Yes, many but certainly not all dissidents were Jews; but most Jews were not active dissidents. All dissidents were “anti-system.” They lived in a sort of limbo.

Q: I know that Communism was taught throughout the eastern bloc. People told me at our embassy in Warsaw that in Warsaw there must be at least three dedicated Communists in the country.

COLLINS: Yes, they taught courses in Communism, Marxism, theory at the university and at lower levels. These were required courses.

Q: Did you think when you were there that Communism had lost its luster? Was too far removed to be meaningful to people?

COLLINS: I think even in the 1960s and 1970s there was a lack of “gung ho” spirit for the whole idea. The ideology, theory, ceremonies, phrases, banners and buntings all seemed so stale and uninspiring. The exhortations on posters, so anachronistic.

Q: Striving toward a greater future....

COLLINS: Yes, and the visuals. The graphics were so retro. They harkened back to a period before I was born. They looked like the older photographs and movies I saw in my childhood, images from the 1930s. I had the sense that the Brooklyn I knew in the 1940s as a small child was more “modern” than the Russia of the 1960s and 1970s. Stale and static. And almost nothing had changed over the decades we lived there; when we returned in 1973 from having departed in 1966, everything looked frighteningly the same, right down to the location of the ladies with their ice cream carts on street corners. I wasn’t sure whether they were the same ladies or not. But it was so incredibly stagnant, unprogressive. It was like a still picture frozen in time. Should have been in sepia tones...but was actually gray.

Q: Well it is like the ballet. They do wonderful ballet of the Tsarist times but modern dance, fancy free, has moved way ahead of them.

COLLINS: Yes, modern dance in America dates back to before I was born. Martha Graham and company. And later, Twyla Tharp, Merce Cunningham, Alvin Ailey. It was part of the orthodoxy of Russia and the Communists that you could not have a female dancer who was not en pointe, on her toes. Any dance with soft shoes or flat foot on the ground was not “kosher” and was not going to happen. New choreography was as unlikely as abstract art. In the 1970s it struck me was that they had achieved fantastic technique in the arts, but lacked create spirit, at least in the public venues. There wasn’t the freshness and originality that you get from new interpretation.

I understand this was true in music as well as in dance and visual arts. In theater you had greater and richer range because you could do more with acting, tone, and the selection of traditional material interpreted in ways that could seem current. Subtle, sometimes. You could do The Brothers Karamazov with shifting emphases. Puppet shows also allowed greater candor. But I found that the stasis of the times extended to the arts. I think some people who saw one performance of Swan Lake, for example, might swoon in awe. But by the 16th performance it would lose its luster, without the fresh interpretation or uniqueness of each performance. That said: performance arts were of the highest quality, amazingly proficient and professional. And sometimes truly awesome.

Q: Well the talent was there and nobody was tapping it.

COLLINS: Right. And the talented artists and performers, and film and theater directors, knew just how far they could go. They had some very good films too, as you know, but they also knew the range of subject matter and the range of attitude that you could express in any of these. I had always thought then that if they hadn’t stalled in the 1920s and could pick up from there (with Malevich and Kandinsky and all) – amazing art could emerge. And today they are picking up in literature, modern dance, and graphic arts with new interpretation. So with free reign, I think the arts can again flower in Russia. Of course without confidence in the safety of free expression, the arts can whither again...or burrow back underground for safety...or just not flourish.

Q: Well, any of us who have had liberal arts education were brought up with Russian 19th century authors and composers. They dominated – and still dominate – those fields. Then, “thump,” it stopped.

COLLINS: It was with a “thump” – a bang not a whimper – that it stopped, but before all of us were born. Lenin, Stalin, the 1920s and on. Why risk your life for the arts? Of course many people did and many didn’t survive that bet.

Q: Did you feel that you were living in a conflicted world?

COLLINS: For me, personally, and I assume for other Americans living there, we were living in two worlds at once. But I’m not sure if the Russians really felt they were living in a conflicted world. They may have felt a need to “compromise.” Perhaps some of those in higher education, arts, sciences, academic fields, did sense limits and uncertainties, calibrating their choices. We felt that people in professions wanted to know more and do more than they were able to in their setting. And the more sensitive people knew there was more and were aware of parameters. Of course for us, living between two worlds was living at the intersection of being foreigners in Russia and being the enemy living in their midst and listening to their propaganda, being under surveillance 24/7 (as we now say).

Q: Did you have any problems with surveillance?

COLLINS: I had a real problem living with it. And I had a problem with the concept. I found it very disturbing, intrusive, and discomforting. I didn’t take it very well. It made me edgy even though I had nothing to hide. I don’t think Jim and some others necessarily felt the same way because he and they were less bothered by it. Knowing our bedroom was bugged bothered me a lot. Knowing my movements were monitored... like a mouse in a maze. They kept close tabs on us, close scrutiny. It’s inhumane. I like to talk candidly, as you’ve probably figured out, but I couldn’t do that in Moscow for fear that my grievances, annoyances, and ideas might be used against me – or more likely, against Jim. He tends to be far more careful in what he says, controlled, and good at secrets. Living with that pall made me more cautious, careful, and less opened: I didn’t like what it did to me.

Q: How did you talk?

COLLINS: Well, we didn’t really. We didn’t talk candidly when we were indoors, ever. Conversation was very limited. When we had something that was really important that had to be shared, we had to discuss it outdoors in the open air in any season, sometimes freezing. Sometimes if there was enough background noise from a crowd of people in the apartment or the music up loud, it might be possible to speak and not be overheard. Perhaps this brings us back to the high divorce rate we were discussing earlier. A marriage can survive temporary travel for a few weeks, but over months and years, this kind of constrained living takes its toll. Couldn’t even talk about one’s own children or their issues, let alone exchange or share concerns of daily life. Openness, privacy, luxuries that could not be afforded during all those years living in Russia.

Q: Did you find there were wives who couldn’t take it at all?

COLLINS: Well, the stresses were hard on everybody. I would be surprised if anybody thought all this was fine, fun, comfortable, easy, or joyous. And if the pressure of Russian surveillance weren't hard enough on families and marriages, then there were the incredible and endless working hours of the Embassy--weekends, holidays, and evenings all considered normal working hours. When people in Washington have those schedules, at least there are outlets for their families: movies, playgrounds, restaurants, children's events, a beach or pool or mall. There wasn't even one good working playground for children in the whole city. No place for the slides and swings and climbing for a little child.

Q: Well, Russians love their children and I would think there would be children's parks.

COLLINS: There were parks, but without equipment. So kids could run around and make up stories and that's fine, too. And little play spaces with broken swings and bars, rusted metal and splintered wood. But the Russian kids would play in the building courtyards with granny, and mostly dig in the earth with their little shovels... fill their pails, dump their pails. And so we did that, too. I took the children to those places to play with the kids and the earth and shovels and pails. And the Russian kids and ours also had toy trucks they could push around or use to move earth and such. And that was fine for the little kids although I think for larger children it would have been a challenge, finding what to do. The grandmothers would talk to me and ask questions, such as why my toddlers were not wearing more clothes than they were. Why they didn't have more scarves and more hats and more mittens.

One time I was walking down the street with Jonathan in the stroller and Robert walking along and somebody stopped me and said "Why is he in a stroller?" I was thinking he is in a stroller so we can carry our stuff, so he doesn't escape, so we can cross the dangerous streets, so I can keep track of two kids -- all these complicated things going through my mind that seemed natural for a two-year-old or three-year-old in a big city in the States. The woman declared, "But he can walk, can't he?" (Insensitive question, in case he couldn't actually.) "Yes, I said, he can walk." "Then why are you pushing him in a stroller if he can walk?" I stumbled over ways to describe the many reasons I found wheels a better idea, but was mainly thinking, "mind your own business." No one had any qualms about butting into your life. So much intrusiveness. Culturally acceptable there, but irritating to me. I know I should have been more tolerant of it and I admire those who were. I did, however, always remain polite and courteous.

Q: We had this experience, too. Our first child was born in Germany. People would keep stopping us and tucking the blankets in and then looking at us with our German shepherd puppy as well, and wondering why we had a child and a puppy at the same time. So we were getting instructions on the street all the time about what we should be doing.

COLLINS: Well we did too! We certainly got instruction about the kids. If we let them climb or do anything active, we were warned to be careful or not let them do it. The big difference -- and I find this culturally significant -- is that they kept their children under very tight control from an early age. In retrospect, I think part of the reason was that it was grandmothers rather than mothers caring for the kids: now that I'm a grandmother I see that I keep closer and tighter watch on my grandchildren than I did on my children. They held their hands tightly all the time. The Russian kids actually did not run loose. They did let them play in these little courtyards or play areas, while they sat on the bench chatting with the other grannies, keeping close watch not just on their own child, but on all children.

One day, when I was walking in Gorky Park with Robert and Jonathan running loose, I heard my name called by a Russian we had known when we were students almost a decade earlier. (God knows how he found me right then and there, but....) He walked with me for a while, and then observed, "Your boys, they are so free." I said, "What do you mean so free?" He replied, "Well they are just running around by themselves. You're not holding their hands." They were probably at that time three and six. He said he always held his children's hands, and wondered if all Americans let their kids walk on their own in parks. I said once they were this age, sure. They weren't infants or toddlers any more. He added, "That is not true with Russian children. We hold very tight by the hand and not so free." Then he thought about it for a while, because he always had a very free spirit, and had been a risk-taker. He thought to wonder whether this difference might be significant. I thought it was.

Q: You hear studies about Soviet children and swaddling clothes, and how they're all bound up when they are very young.

COLLINS: They are. But that wasn't unique to Russia. I understand that Greeks and others do this, too. Yet they did bind their babies tightly in wrapped blankets from birth. Perhaps in some cases they did it with a board, too, like the American Indians. Their babies looked like little burritos. I don't recall when they stopped swaddling, but I'd guess it's when babies could hold their own heads up, weren't so floppy any more. They would air babies out year round, including in the dead of winter. Bundled up until they got used to short periods of cold, increasingly longer. But you could hardly see the baby at all for all its wrappings. Now I hear that some Americans have found that it calms babies to swaddle them so they don't flail all about, with their uncontrolled arms and legs. The tight controls continued into nursery schools at which they were treated more strictly than in ours. It seemed they had to give up teddy, bottles, and diapers at a very early age, around one year old, much earlier than we would have done. So I didn't send our kids there, feeling there is enough time to build discipline in later years, but let them enjoy being babies or toddlers.

Q: So you left there in 1975. How did you feel about leaving?

COLLINS: Oh, I was always happy to leave there. When the airplane took off on the way home I always felt exhilaration. Of course we were going to a nice home in Bethesda, to family and friends, and I couldn't wait.

RICHARD M. MILES
Soviet Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1973-1975)

Ambassador Miles was born in Arkansas in 1937. He earned an associate degree from Bakersfield College, Bachelor's degree from University of California, Berkeley and a master's degree from Indiana University. He joined the Foreign service in 1966. His overseas posts include Oslo, Belgrade, Moscow, Leningrad,

Berlin, Azerbaijan, Bulgaria and Georgia. Ambassador Miles was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

MILES: I went on the Soviet Desk. Yes, '73 to '75.

Q: Who was sort of the head Sovietologist?

MILES: Well, Jack Matlock was head of the Desk. Jack had a distinguished career and later was Ambassador to Czechoslovakia and the Soviet Union. In fact, I worked for Matlock three times in my career, starting with that assignment to the Soviet desk. Matlock had three outstanding deputies: Bill Luers, later Ambassador to Czechoslovakia and Venezuela; Bob Barry, Ambassador to Bulgaria and Indonesia, and Milt Bearden. Milt was with the CIA. Later he was quite involved in Afghanistan matters after the Soviet invasion and has written two really good books about that period. Stape Roy was the head of my section, which was what we called "Multilateral Affairs", and then Stape was later replaced by Ben Zook. I don't know if you knew Ben or not.

Q: No.

MILES: A real character. I loved Ben. Stape Roy went on to become one of our Career Ambassadors and Jack, of course, had his own career as Ambassador to Czechoslovakia and Ambassador to the Soviet Union.

Q: Well, how stood relations, this would be '70-what—'72 to '74?

MILES: What was that then, I'm sorry?

Q: I mean, when you were on the Desk?

MILES: Seventy-three to '75.

Q: Seventy-three to '75. In '73, when you got there, how stood relations with the Soviet Union?

MILES: Well, this was the heyday of détente, you remember, and so relations were good but, of course, that only went so far. You had the beginning of our programs of scientific co-operation. We were doing a fair amount with the Soviets on ecology, putting tags on polar bears, that sort of thing. Soviet scientists could attend conferences in western countries; our scientific people could go to the Soviet Union. There would usually be an annual summit—the Desk would help to prepare for those. But the Russians still had their agenda and we still had ours and they were still considered "the threat". I used to go out and talk to college groups and groups of interested citizens, international affairs councils, that kind of thing, around the United States, to talk up détente, basically, and it was not always an easy sell out there. Oddly enough, in the Midwest there was more understanding than there was in some of the more sophisticated parts of the country, because, you remember, we were starting to sell grain, to sell corn and wheat to the Soviet Union, and the farmers thought that was just jim-dandy. But on arms control issues, the Americans I talked to, and this was all over the country—the West, the South, wherever—people were uneasy, they were skeptical.

Q: Well, did you have any particular piece of the action?

MILES: No, not on arms control issues. Arms control is a world unto itself and I just never entered that world. That may have been a mistake on my part, but that's the way things worked out for me. In our shop, multilateral affairs, we basically divided up the world geographically. I did Africa, the Middle East, Central and South America and the United Nations. The United Nations portfolio got me into all sorts of other interesting things like direct broadcast satellites—that's what we called them at that time. Of course, there were no such satellites then, but the Soviets and the French in particular really wanted to have very strong national control of whatever TV might eventually be transmitted into their countries or into francophone Africa or the Soviet bloc. What with all the satellite TV that we have now—you can receive satellite TV everywhere from a New York penthouse to some hovel in Bangladesh—it seems strange to recall all those food fights over these issues in various international forums and the like. But that's one of the issues that I followed some thirty years ago.

And then we had someone else in the office who did Asia—Southwest Asia and Asia proper. And then there was a whole different office that did Soviet internal affairs. The bilateral relationship was largely handled by Matlock and the deputies.

Q: Well, how did we view Soviet activity in Africa? Because there was quite a bit at this time.

MILES: There was a lot of concern over the Soviets in Africa and in our own minds we drew them maybe larger than life. We saw that they were spending a lot of money there; we saw the Patrice Lumumba University thing in Moscow, where they would bring people up from Africa or other parts of the third world for full scholarships to study everything from engineering to medicine. The students would study six or seven years to become a doctor or whatever and then go back to their home country. There was a lot of fretting about that. We saw them peddling arms; we saw them cozying up to dictators and strongmen. And we worried over the ideological appeal of all this. There was always this constant argument in the Department about ideology—is there a Soviet ideology, and if there is, how important is it? To what degree do people actually subscribe to it? And with the exception of Cuba, maybe, I don't think the Washington foreign policy establishment ever really paid that much attention to ideology. I was always interested in ideology because I had studied Marxism-Leninism in college and I felt that it was a motivating factor; maybe not the primary motivating factor any more, but still a motivating factor and I thought that it had a certain appeal in the third world, especially to young, idealistic people. But frankly, we never were able to get much traction on the issue of ideology with the Seventh Floor in the Department or over at the White House.

Q: Well, from your own personal viewpoint, did you see the Soviet effort taking hold in Africa?

MILES: Well, they were active certainly and we couldn't tell how effective it was; there was a question mark over it at that time.

Q: This is tape three, side one, with Dick Miles. Yes.

MILES: The Soviets had strong diplomats in Africa, very good people. They were selling some arms; they were providing some economic assistance. They still had a stronghold in Egypt. That was before the switch. They had a stronghold in Somalia, which was on the Red Sea. Well, stronghold in the sense that they had a strong relationship. So yes, we did fret about the Soviets and about the Cubans as well. The Cubans were heavily involved in Africa as well—we believed at Soviet behest. I'm not sure to what degree that was true, but in any case the Cubans were definitely there so there was certainly a hell of a lot of smoke to be seen if not a great amount of actual fire.

Q: What about Latin America? Was there much happening there?

MILES: Well, not a lot at that time. The radicalization of Central America came a bit later. With hindsight, there was probably more going on than we realized, but we on the Soviet Desk didn't pay much attention to Central America at that time, to speak frankly. Cuba was sort of isolated and we were happy enough with that situation. Remember I'm talking about these situations from the standpoint of Soviet policy.

Q: Did you have a Middle East—?

MILES: Yes. And I spent probably most of my time on the Middle East.

Q: What was happening in the Middle East at this time?

MILES: Well, the Soviets were heavily involved with the Egyptians. We were still heavily involved with Saudi Arabia and in Iran, of course. The two pillars of our regional policy, Kissinger said. I remember sitting in when one of the fairly high ranking Soviet diplomats from their embassy in Washington called on the Israeli Desk officer. It was a Friday afternoon, on the eve of the October War, and I sat in from the Soviet Desk. The consensus among all of us was that, despite heightened tension in the region, it was going to be a quiet weekend. We were concerned because the Soviets had withdrawn their dependents from Egypt and we had indications of a military buildup on the Egyptian side but we also had indications that the Israelis were aware of this and had organized a counter-buildup as well, so, practically speaking, we didn't think the situation would deteriorate over the weekend. And that meeting actually calmed us all down a little bit because the Soviet officer indicated that this withdrawal of dependents was just a precautionary measure on the part of the Soviet Ambassador in Cairo and that the Soviet Embassy in Washington thought things would quiet down.

Well, I was called the next morning, Saturday morning, by Jack Matlock who said, "Dick, do you remember our conversation yesterday after your meeting? I'm sorry to say that war has broken out in the Middle East so you may want to come on in." Well, that began a pretty intense period of activity. Of course, Kissinger was extremely busy with all this, but we all did our best to provide him the best information and analysis that we could produce.

I don't remember if Dr. Kissinger was still at the NSC or if he had moved over to the State Department at that point but he was of course vitally interested in what was going on there and the degree to which the Soviets might be involved. And there was a considerable fuss over whether or not some Soviet nuclear weaponry might or might not have been shipped out through the Bosphorus for potential use. It was never clear. It was never settled, really, but, boy, there was a lot of interest in that, let me tell you. So that was a very exciting time, I must say. And of course the United States was doing things like going to a higher DEFCON status which meant that the American military planes were all fueled and ready to go, weapons checked and made ready. So it was a tense time.

Q: Well, if I recall, were not the—some Soviet airborne divisions alerted or something?

MILES: Yes. I think seven divisions were alerted down in the Northern Caucasus and made ready for possible deployment. That, plus the possible movement of Soviet nuclear weaponry, got us pretty excited.

Q: How much information were you getting from the Israelis about what was going on?

MILES: Well, you know, there are layers and layers of intelligence, and at the level at which I was operating at that time I didn't see a lot of that intelligence. And so the stuff that I got through the ordinary communications system was not terribly helpful, frankly.

Q: Was there a feeling at your level that the Soviets might come in?

MILES: I think the general feeling was that they would not, that they were posturing and, of course, we would do that too. We'd send an aircraft carrier just to be there, to demonstrate that we know what's going on, we're uneasy, we are prepared but we don't really intend to use our power. And the Soviets were doing the same thing for the same reason. Anyhow, I think that was the general feeling in the Department and the NSC. But there is always an element of unpredictability in these matters and so there was also genuine concern in Washington over developments.

Q: Well, weren't the Soviets, too, in a sort of peculiar position? Because Sadat had essentially kicked the Soviets out, hadn't he?

MILES: Not yet.

Q: Hadn't kicked them out?

MILES: Oh, no, not at all. I don't remember the exact degree of military involvement that they had at that time, but Egypt possessed mountains of Soviet-supplied military equipment. All of the Egyptian officers had been trained by the Soviets and I'm sure they had strong personal relationships. But I don't think Soviet officers were out in the front area particularly, except for a few military observers. I never had any good information along those lines, but certainly the Soviet officers were still present in Egypt and in large numbers.

Q: Although you weren't dealing with internal things, you were surely aware of the work of Khrushchev? How was he viewed from the desk?

MILES: I don't recall exactly who was in power at that time; I'd have to look at the chronology.

Q: Actually Khrushchev was out by then.

MILES: I think he must have been.

Q: Yes, he must have been out. It was Brezhnev.

MILES: I had studied some of Khrushchev's actions when I was back at Indiana University and I think, with the major exception of the Cuban Missile Crisis, which broke out while I was at the university, I think the general feeling was that Khrushchev was doing some pretty exciting things which were going to change Soviet society but that it would remain Soviet, you know—these things wouldn't bring the Soviet Union down, cause its collapse or whatever, although basically the things that Khrushchev initiated were the beginning of the end of the Soviet Union. We just didn't see it at that time.

Q: Well then, you left the desk in '75?

MILES: Yes.

JOHN NIX
General Services Officer
Moscow, USSR (1973-1975)

John Nix was born in Alabama in 1938. He attended the U.S. Military Academy and served in the U.S. Army from 1960 to 1971 as a major overseas. Upon entering the Foreign Service in 1971, his assignments abroad have included Nairobi, Moscow, Nicosia, Athens and Berlin. Mr. Nix was interviewed in 1994 by Raymond Ewing.

NIX: In '73, I came back to Washington, studied Russian, and then went off to Moscow as assistant GSO in the embassy in Moscow.

Q: How much Russian did you study? How many months?

NIX: I was able to get in about three months of Russian, which got me to the 2/2 level.

Q: Had you had some Russian before?

NIX: No, I had never studied it before. But it's a fairly easy language to get up to the 2/2 level in. Making the next step is difficult.

Q: Fluency.

NIX: Complete fluency is very difficult. But it was absolutely necessary to get to the 2/2 level because, in those days in the embassy in Moscow, we had about 300 Russian employees assigned to us by the Russian Foreign Ministry. The interface between those Russian employees and the embassy personnel was with the lower level employees like myself. As the assistant GSO, I supervised the Russians who did the maintenance work in the apartments and office buildings. We also operated our own garage, motor pool, etc. It was absolutely necessary to have at least a 2/2 level in Russian. By the time I left, I had gotten to the 3/3 level in terms of the working vocabulary that I needed to communicate with the Russian workers.

Q: Because the Russian employees that you worked with or supervised mostly did not speak English?

NIX: A few in the front office spoke English. But when I was out on a job working with the crews, no, they did not speak English at all. At least, they didn't admit it.

Q: Who was the ambassador at the time that you were there and what was the political situation generally?

NIX: In the beginning, Spike Dubbs, who was later killed by terrorists in Afghanistan, was the chargé. He remained the chargé for about a year, and then Walter Stoessel took over as ambassador. We were in a period of what in those days was considered detente. Nixon, of course, had started this policy toward the Soviet Union. As hallmarks, I can just mention that in the summer of 1974, Nixon made his last trip abroad to Moscow. We traveled with him around the Soviet Union. I helped support his visit to Yalta. He was accompanied on that visit by Henry Kissinger and Al Haig and various other well-known figures. They spent a couple of days in Yalta with Brezhnev. So, we were in a period where we considered relations to be on the upswing, let's say, at least on the national level. For example, on the day I left Moscow in the summer of 1975, we had the Apollo-Soyuz linkup in outer space, which at that time certainly was the high point of our relations for many years. It wasn't long after that that the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan took place, which led to reintroduction of the Cold War for a number of years.

Q: I'd be interested in hearing a little bit more about President Nixon's visit to Yalta and the Crimea. That was, what, in the summer?

NIX: The summer of '74, very, very shortly before he resigned.

Q: He also went to the Middle East on that trip, didn't he? Or was that a separate trip?

NIX: I believe he did go to Egypt and Israel.

Q: But the talks with Brezhnev were held in Yalta because that was kind of their summer...?

NIX: Well, there was that, but there was also the idea that in some way President Nixon wanted to undo the results of the Yalta meeting from World War II days. There was a lot of symbolism, but in actual fact, of course, because of Nixon's weakened political situation, to my knowledge, there were no significant agreements reached.

To back up just a moment, in '73, you remember, of course, Henry Kissinger was appointed the Secretary of State and the Mid East war broke out. His first trip abroad as Secretary of State was to Moscow. We had worked closely with Moscow through that period from late '73 to the summer of '74, trying to resolve the Mid East conflict and eventually, of course, did sign the disengagement agreement, which basically is still in effect to this day with Egypt. We're still patrolling the disengagement zone.

Q: Right, and I think there was also at least an understanding reached with Syria about the Golan Heights.

NIX: There probably was at the same time, but I'm just trying to put in context that Nixon's trip came more or less at the end of this period of closely working with Moscow in trying to resolve the Middle East problem. I think most of the discussions probably revolved around that.

Q: What were some of the other main responsibilities, chores, problems that you had while you were in Moscow?

NIX: The biggest thing, of course, was the day to day life. For example, we did open, while I was there a commercial office. It was the first one we had ever had in Moscow. Tom Niles, who is now ambassador to Greece, was our first commercial officer.

Q: Was that in the embassy?

NIX: No, we had to acquire space and prepare it and outfit it so that it could function in a way that would at least be helpful to American businessmen coming to Moscow and trying to set up some kind of business presence there. In those days, it was still very common for a businessman to come to Moscow, check into a hotel, stay there two or three years trying to get a business relationship going and when he left, still be in the same hotel. You just couldn't get facilities. You couldn't get apartments to live in. You couldn't get office space. So, our new commercial office, as we called it, turned out to be their offices. We established rooms and cubicles and so forth with telephones and connections to the outside world.

Q: Where businessmen could actually function.

NIX: Where businessmen could come in and use the facilities to their hearts' content and have access to whatever advice and support we could provide to them. One of my major responsibilities was to set up this office and get it running and then to conduct the interminable negotiations with the Soviet foreign ministry over every minor detail involved in the process. Even to put an air conditioner outside the building, so that we could keep it livable in there in the summer, required months of negotiations.

Q: Did other countries have similar commercial offices in Moscow at that time or were we kind of setting the precedent?

NIX: We were setting the precedent because this was one of those statements emanating from a high level meeting: "We will establish commercial offices in each other's capitals." Then, of course, it boils down to how do we get this done. It took a year to actually get the thing set up and running.

I did get to travel around quite a bit in support of high level visits. For example, Treasury Secretary Simon made a couple of very important visits there and I was assigned to be his advance man in Tashkent. I spent two or three weeks out there preparing the ground for his visit. This experience was very interesting to me travel, since travel outside Moscow and Leningrad by foreign diplomats was severely restricted. You couldn't just book a flight and go somewhere. You had to have a reason and it had to be approved by the Foreign Ministry.

Q: But from the point of view of the Soviet government, they probably were pleased to have the American Secretary of the Treasury or the American President prepare to visit and allowed us, allowed you, to do some things in Tashkent or Yalta or wherever that a political officer of the embassy probably wouldn't have been able to have done at all.

NIX: Possibly. I think that's one interpretation. Usually, it boiled down to the simple question of embassy resources and the fact that instead of sending a team of three or four people to a place, they tried to pick someone who both spoke Russian, had a little bit of knowledge of the country, that basically could handle all of the administrative aspects of the visit. So, you wouldn't have to send two or three people. You could just send one.

Q: To take the example of the Treasury Secretary's visit, you went two or three weeks ahead of time to Tashkent and then you stayed through the visit itself?

NIX: Yes, I stayed through the visit. Administrative support was my primary responsibility.

Q: And then, I suppose, others from the embassy, including perhaps the ambassador, came down for the actual visit?

NIX: They did accompany him on his plane to the actual meetings. He flew from Tashkent directly on to New Delhi. That was another thing that happened that had not been allowed by the Soviets before. They were able to depart from Tashkent directly to another capital rather than going back through Moscow and leaving in that direction.

The entire two years was interesting. As I said, things looked to be on the upswing when I left because of the Apollo-Soyuz linkup, which in itself, of course, was the culmination of a long period of close cooperation in the space program. We had Russian astronauts in Houston training and American astronauts had been in Moscow and out at the Soviet space facilities for two years.

Q: When did you leave? You left in 1975?

NIX: In July of '75.

Q: Which was just prior to the conference in Helsinki that President Ford attended of the Conference of Security, Cooperation in Europe, which was very important.

NIX: That's right. One of Ford's first trips abroad after the Nixon resignation was in 1974 to Vladivostok to meet with Brezhnev. For the Ford administration, that was a key point in its relationship with the Soviet Union.

Q: I think he combined that with some visits elsewhere in the Far East.

NIX: Japan. The interesting thing was, of course, that Brezhnev would agree to go to Vladivostok to meet him, which in itself showed that we had a fairly good relationship.

Q: Of course, it's amazing how large the Soviet Union was in terms of...

NIX: Of course, Vladivostok had been closed to foreigners since the war, let alone a national leader.

Q: At the time you were there, John, was our consulate in Leningrad open?

NIX: Yes, it was. It opened a year before I arrived. I actually studied Russian with Gary Matthews, who went out to be the deputy principal officer up there. Culver Gleysteen was the consulate general at that time. It was open and it represented another major step forward in our relations.

Q: Were you involved in supporting the consulate much?

NIX: To a certain extent. There were several things that we did help them with, but they had their own administrative and communications staff. Of course, they called on us when necessary. There were a lot of things they couldn't procure in Leningrad that we could get for them in Moscow. But on the other hand, they had easier access to Finland and to the outside world, so to speak, then we did, so they were able to get most of the things they needed for themselves.

Q: Helsinki has always been an important outlook, if you will, for St. Petersburg, Leningrad, Moscow. Were you getting a lot of administrative support in those days from Helsinki or from elsewhere in Western Europe?

NIX: We got most of it from Helsinki, although there was still a regularly scheduled military support flight out of Frankfurt. We also got a lot of support from Berlin. We had, for example, a food shipment allowance and most of it came out of the commissary in West Berlin via truck to Moscow. The mission in Berlin had a Moscow support unit. The consulate in Frankfurt had a Moscow support unit and the embassy in Helsinki had a Moscow support unit. We got our mail, our pouches, and so forth, through Helsinki. They came in by train each Friday from Helsinki. The APO was run through Helsinki. We got almost all of our fresh food from Helsinki by train.

Q: How often did the flight come in from Frankfurt?

NIX: It was irregular, basically because each flight required lengthy negotiation with the Russians. There was no such thing as just saying to the Russians, "Can we have a military support flight each month?" Each one was a new ballgame. You went in and started negotiating. I'd say, on the average, probably every three months.

Q: At the time you were there, had we started the construction of the new chancery, the new embassy building?

NIX: No, all I saw was the model. We had done all the preliminary work with the architects. Of course, the site was there right behind the old embassy. We had supported the architects in their evaluation of the site. As I say, they had gotten to the point of making a model showing exactly how the thing was going to be constructed. But then that had to be put in the deep freeze for a while because of a decline of our relations following the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. Then the well-known history played out.

Q: Part of that history, of course, involved questions about the Foreign Service national employees and to whom were they loyal and whether they were security risks for us and so on. Was that a major concern at the time you were there with the Soviet/Russian employees who you worked with? Were they competent? Were they qualified to do the jobs they were doing for the most part?

NIX: For the most part, they were qualified, responsive and followed orders. They didn't go beyond the minimum, of course. Their colleagues would not have accepted it if they had used their own initiative to do anything. Exactly what they wanted to do, they normally did. We were told that all local employers must be considered intelligence agents for the Soviet intelligence services. At the very least, they would all be required periodically to go back and be debriefed by the Soviet intelligence services on everything they had heard, seen, learned, while they were working for us. I'm morally certain that some penetrations of the embassy occurred over the years which could be traced to the Soviet workers.

Q: You mentioned at the time you were there, John, that American businessmen would come in, often spend two or three years in a hotel because they couldn't get other accommodations or facilities. The American community at the time, was it mostly the business people and generalists and a few students? Was that about it?

NIX: You've just pretty well summed it up. We had a fairly large embassy staff, which, of course, was the center of the American community in Moscow. We had representation from most of the leading newspapers and news organizations. Then a few business people and students. That was it. There were very few American tourists coming to Moscow in those days, very few. Since Russians were very restricted in their travel, to be honest, our consular section had very little to do. They worked a lot on minority affairs. For example, shortly after I left, a family from a Christian sect took refuge in the embassy and actually lived there for a number of years in the basement before the issue was finally resolved. Of course, the Jewish immigration question was always something that was of great concern to the consular section, trying to resolve the so-called "Refusnik" issues, people who had applied for visas to emigrate to Israel and the exit visas hadn't been granted. (Yes, the Soviet Union required exit visas for all its citizens.) But there was not a lot of intercourse with American tourists, nor with Russians and tourists traveling to the United States.

Q: Is there anything else about your tour in Moscow that was memorable that you want to mention at this point?

NIX: I remember an embassy under great psychological pressure. Living conditions were tense and difficult. It was by far the most unpleasant working experience that I've ever gone through in the Foreign Service because the people in the American community were on edge and under pressure. For example, during the time I was there, we had the infamous incident of microwave radiation being directed against the embassy by the Soviets. Of course, this led to galloping paranoia among everyone. We did, coincidentally, have a large number of deaths from cancer and several birth defects.

Q: After people had left?

NIX: During and after. We had at least three instances of birth defects in children born to people who were serving at the embassy in that period. Some of this happened during the time we were there. This built up into a climate of near-hysteria. Employee town meetings in Moscow were not easy things to get through.

Q: As I recall, the microwave incident, with the rays allegedly directed at the embassy, that became a public matter in the American press probably after you left Moscow.

NIX: It became public after, I believe, in 1975 or 1976.

Q: But you were quite aware of it at the time you were there?

NIX: Certainly the rumor mill was active. Of course, that was even worse than having it become well-known and officially acknowledged. I believe the Department made a huge mistake in not just coming clean with the employees up front, perhaps by asking them to sign a statement of awareness that in Moscow they were going to be subject to microwave radiation. The Department did, in fact, keep it secret from the employees for as long as it could, until the subject broke in the newspaper. That was an unenlightened personnel policy that would not be repeated in today's climate.

Q: Against everything you've just said about the difficulties of service in Moscow from the period of 1973 to '75, how would you describe the morale overall of the Embassy?

NIX: It was terrible, just terrible. The worst morale I've ever seen. The divorce rate among employees in Moscow was unbelievable. I do believe it had something to do with service in Moscow. I don't think it was the sole reason, but I think in a lot of cases, the service there just forced people inward upon themselves and led to a lot of family and personality problems that surfaced in this way.

Q: What sort of living accommodations did you have?

NIX: Living accommodations were not bad. I had a nice large apartment in the embassy, in the north wing, three bedrooms, fairly large living room/dining room combination, decent kitchen, quite a bit of storage space. The accommodations were good. The support facilities were always suspect. I mean, your electricity would go off and your hot water would go off and so forth. But you can find those kind of conditions in any third world country. We considered it a third world country as far as basic living conditions were concerned. The facilities just weren't there. Moscow had seven million people and not one functioning garage where a person could take a car to be fixed. It's hard for people to believe that such conditions could exist who've never experienced them, but they did. It didn't appear to bother the Russians. They were accustomed to this. But foreigners had a hard time adjusting.

Q: Many years after you left Moscow, the Soviet Union collapsed and the various republics that constituted the Soviet Union became independent nations, independent states. You described some of the problems of living in Moscow and the difficulties that were prevalent, very apparent at the time. Could you have anticipated that it was going to come to that within two decades of the time you left?

NIX: No, absolutely not. I could never have predicted that it would happen so quickly. If you look at it from the standpoint of the Soviet Union alone, it's still hard to believe. Even today, I'm sure there are a great number of former Soviet citizens who would like to return to the days when they had a fairly secure, well-ordered, predictable life. As we all know, they're having a great deal of difficulty adjusting right now. The Eastern European satellites, of course, we always knew were a weak point in the so-called "Soviet Empire." Even during the years when I was in the military and during my subsequent career in the reserve forces, one of the major estimates, if you will, was that the Eastern European satellites would not be reliable allies for the Soviet Union in the case of a crisis. Some people in those days who were experts on the Soviet Union went further to say that the nationalities within the Soviet Union would not be reliable and I think that's been proven to be valid.

But to your original question, I couldn't have foreseen it. I never thought the Soviet system made sense in individual terms or in national terms, but they seemed to have things tightly controlled. Even now, though I was stationed in Berlin just after the wall fell, it's still hard to believe that the system crumbled so rapidly.

Q: Let me come back to something that isn't directly related to your service in Moscow. You said you were in the Army Reserve after you left active duty. I assume that when you were in Nairobi and Moscow, you really didn't have any Reserve obligation, or did you?

NIX: I didn't technically have an obligation, but I was able normally to do my two weeks training every year. I took correspondence courses. I completed the Army Command and General Staff College and the Army War College by correspondence. I kept as active as I could. In my period back here in Washington between '75 and '80, I stayed very active and held several positions in Reserve units in the Washington area.

WILLIS J. SUTTER
Assistant Cultural Affairs Officer, USIS
Moscow (1973-1975)

Willis J. Sutter was born in New Jersey in 1936. He received a bachelor's degree from St. Joseph's College and a master's degree from the University of Pennsylvania. He served in the U.S. Marine Corps from 1954-1957. Mr. Sutter entered the Foreign Service in 1966. His career included positions in Thailand, the Soviet Union, Laos, Zaire, and Mauritania. Mr. Sutter was interviewed by Jack O'Brien in 1988.

SUTTER: The other assignment that really stands out in my memory is the two year period I spent as an assistant cultural affairs officer in Moscow, from 1973 to the summer of 1975.

Q: Did you go there with or without any language preparation?

SUTTER: I had ten months of Russian. The full load. It is impossible to go there without Russian -- or it is useless to go there without Russian. Not just because you could not do your work, but also because you really could not experience the Soviet Union unless you could speak Russian. Some Soviets speak English. There are some that do, but not that many.

Q: So, what year did you go to Moscow?

SUTTER: I went in 1973. June of 1973. Just as the ice was breaking. This was at the height of detente basically. I think President Nixon had been there in 1972 to sign whatever agreements it was that he signed with the Soviets. That made a great difference in the working atmosphere in Moscow. My predecessor had a very difficult time getting into see the Soviet officials. I had almost no trouble whatsoever in getting to talk with them. The difference was not our personalities. The difference was the Soviets had been told that things were relaxed and that they ought to work a little more closely with us.

I was in charge of the educational exchange program, so I had to go frequently over to the Ministry of Higher Education to talk about details of the exchange. My predecessor had a very hard time getting in to see people. I had no trouble whatsoever. On a couple of occasions, when I had an urgent matter to discuss, and could not reach my contacts on the phone, I would simply go over there personally and just walk in unannounced. That was unheard of earlier, but the atmosphere had so changed that the Russians took this without any particular affront or difficulty. They were not uncomfortable. We always got our work done.

What really stands out in my mind, is President Nixon's visit in June of 1974. This was about two months before he resigned because of Watergate. He had come attempting to refurbish his image. Before that he had gone to Cairo. He had been enthusiastically received by President Sadat. There was that famous train trip from Cairo down to Alexandria. Then he got on the plane and came to Moscow. For no other reason than to get some good media coverage.

The Russians, really wanted to support Nixon, and were very anxious to keep him in power if they could, because they were used to dealing with him. They understood him. Like everybody else, they do not like surprises or new personalities who they do not know very well. So they went all out to make Nixon feel very welcome.

They gave him a big reception at the St. George's hall -- in the Kremlin. It is a big reception hall with columns inscribed with the names of all the Russians who have been given the -- I think it is called -- the Medal of St. George, a czarist award. They have kept the hall for whatever reasons, and they use it for these ceremonial receptions. It is all gold and white.

I was invited. I attended. I can recall very clearly that President Nixon walked in along with Brezhnev, and Kosygin, who was then the President of the USSR, Gromyko was there, the Foreign Minister, and Henry Kissinger, who was at that time Secretary of State. They all marched in rather formally. They stopped about twelve feet away from where I was, while the band played the Soviet -- first the American and then the Soviet national anthem -- I can remember watching them.

First of all, they all looked like they had come out of a waxworks. They all looked deathly ill for some reason. I am not quite sure what the reason was, particularly the Russians. Although, Nixon was not looking in particularly good shape himself, the Russians looked like they had just stepped out of a waxworks or out of an embalmer's studio. They all looked, as I said, deathly ill.

Off to the side Was Alexander Haig, who was at that time, Nixon's Chief of Staff. He was wearing a gray suit and had a briefcase with him, which he was clutching to his chest with both arms and looking down at the floor, while they played the national anthems, as though he had great, deep, dark secrets on his mind.

Of course, he did. He realized that Nixon was on his last legs -- the Nixon presidency was on its last legs. I can remember very clearly the contrast between the grandeur as the national anthem was playing, and off to the side this grave presence. The evidence grieves Haig who knows all the deep and dark secrets, and "knows" what the real end is probably going to be. That has always stuck with me.

I forget what the term is -- you know, "How fast glory passes." Sic transit gloria. It was a rather sad occasion.

Weeks later a colleague of mine came down, woke me up in my apartment and said that Nixon was on VOA -- this was three o'clock in the morning, Moscow time -- Nixon's on VOA and he is resigning. We all sat up and listened to VOA as Nixon delivered his resignation speech. It was quite a moment.

Q: You spent how many years in Moscow?

SUTTER: I spent two years there.

Q: Did working conditions change after Nixon's resignation?

SUTTER: They changed a lot shortly after I left, because of the worsening of relations between ourselves and the Soviets. Yes, things got worse after Nixon left. That is for sure. I am not sure there is a real close cause and effect relationship there. I recall talking to colleagues after I left and they had much harder times getting in to see their contacts than I had. People were beginning to be harassed again by the KGB. People, that is, who had close contacts with the Soviets.

I was harassed twice myself by the KGB, because I had a very close friend -- not close friend, but a good acquaintance -- who was a well known dissident in Georgia -- Tbilisi. Whenever I went to Tbilisi on business, I would always see this particular person. The KGB did not like that very much. They would come to my hotel room at eight o'clock in the morning and say that the hotel administrator wanted to talk to me.

I knew very well who the hotel administrator was. I went to this little room and there would be this "administrator" sitting up at a little dais, almost as though he were a judge. He was flanked by people on his left and right. There would be one chair in front of his desk. He would ask me to sit down. In this particular occasion, I had spent all night out with my Georgian friend. He said, "We noticed you were not in your room last night. Where were you?" He said, "We know you speak Russian." I said, in Russian, "I do." They had a translator there, because I knew the person who was the translator. I said, "I see you have an English translator here and I would prefer to speak in English." He agreed to that.

Then he said, in Russian, very roughly, "We noticed you were not in your room last night. Where were you?" I said in English, "That is none of your fucking business!" I watched very carefully as the translator translated. He translated what I said exactly. With that, the so called administrator softened his tone.

He said they were very concerned about my welfare, because something could have happened to me and, of course, they were responsible to the authorities in Moscow for my well being while I was in Tbilisi, etc., etc., etc. I said, "I do not know what could have happened to me, because there are no hooligans in Tbilisi, as you know. So what could have possibly have happened to me?" I said, "What happened was, my friend and I were drinking a lot and I know that the laws against drinking and driving are very severe. I insisted that he not drive me back to the hotel that night, but that I stay in his apartment instead. That is what I did." With that, I got up and left.

Q: Did you travel with another American usually or did you go by yourself?

SUTTER: No. On all these trips to Tbilisi, I traveled by myself. That is to say, not with another American from the Embassy. The formal rule was, you were supposed to travel with another American from the Embassy. But, on many occasions, I went down by myself. I was sent down by myself. It was not as though I was sneaking out. Often those rules were honored more in the breach than in the observance.

Q: Tell us, Will, a little bit about the housekeeping side of working in Moscow. To begin with,

where you lived.

SUTTER: We lived in Leninsky Prospect which is on one of the major thoroughfares. It was, as I recall, on the southeastern side of Moscow. It was out near where Moscow University is located. It was a big block of apartment buildings that were dedicated to diplomats. On my particular stairwell, I think there were almost all Americans. But, in other stairwells, we had East Germans, Czech's, French, Romanians. As I recall, there were Cambodians there. Yes, there were Cambodians there -- not Cambodians, I am sorry, South Vietnamese. Because, when Saigon fell, I was in Moscow. I can remember the South Vietnamese diplomats leaving their apartments, packing up their goods and taking off, after the government had changed in Saigon.

Our apartment block was watched very closely. We had a KGB guard downstairs. He checked over everybody who came and went. No Soviet could come in to see us without first passing this guard. When we gave parties and invited some of our Soviet contacts, we would have to go downstairs and inform the KGB guard that Soviets were coming, to visit us. We would give him their names. When they came, they would show him the invitation that I had sent, and then he would permit them to proceed. But, no unauthorized Soviets could come into see us.

Q: In the office, did you have a Russian assistant, or more than one?

SUTTER: We had a Russian assistant in the cultural section in which I was, yes. Her name was Asaya, a very attractive Soviet woman, with a rather tragic personal history, as I recall. But, the common belief around the compound in the Embassy, was that Asaya was the KGB colonel in the compound. It could well have been so. She was a bright, able woman. I can recall once, somebody caught her literally with her ear to the keyhole, listening to a conversation in there. They could be very clumsy at times.

We always assumed that every Soviet in the compound was reporting on us, and we acted accordingly. Sometimes it was useful, because we could sometimes pass messages back to the Soviets by using these people, you know, by dropping a comment in front of them, that you knew would get reported back -- that you wanted to get reported back, particularly when we were in negotiations concerning visiting artistic groups from the United States, like the San Francisco Symphony, for example. If we were really frosted off by the attitude of the hotels, we would sometimes say that in front of our Soviet colleagues. They would pass it back, sometimes it was helpful.

Q: Did you listen to the Voice of America regularly?

SUTTER: We listened to the Voice of America all the time. When I was there, it was not being jammed. At least it was not being jammed as much as it had been. They did jam occasionally. The jamming station, as I recall, was about two blocks away from the Embassy. I can recall one of my first impressions of my tour there, was being taken by the assistant information officer to a window in the Embassy and he pointed to a tower, two or three blocks away, and he said that's where they jam VOA -- or at least one of the sites. There are, of course, many in Moscow.

Q: How about cooperation, if any, with allied countries? For example, in your area, the exchanges program? Did you compare notes with, say the British, or others on that subject?

SUTTER: We compared notes with the British from time to time, because they had a similar exchange to ours. We had the Fulbright exchange. We sent over, I think it was, about thirty graduate students a year. Most of them were doing their Ph.D.'s dissertations and needed to research the Soviet archives there. We would receive thirty graduate students from the Soviet Union, most of whom were in the sciences -- the hard sciences.

The British had a similar exchange. So, yes, we would get together with them and compare notes about attitudes and the Ministry of Higher Education, problems and so forth. Not so much with the other countries for, I guess, a variety of reasons. They did not have the same kind of exchange with the Soviets that we did. The British did.

Q: Did you leave Moscow wishing to stay longer or was two years enough?

SUTTER: When I left, I felt two years was enough. I had three unpleasant incidents with the KGB, within, I guess, two or three months of my departure. I felt that was enough.

The working conditions in the Embassy were not particularly salubrious and that tended to wear you out. The work itself was rather demanding, although exhilarating, too. When I left -- two years -- I figured I had enough of it. I would go back, if I could go back under the same conditions that prevailed in 1973. This is to say, ease of contact with both officials and private Soviets. But, things had tightened up shortly after I left and I would not want to work in Moscow under those conditions.

Q: Anything more on your Moscow tour you would like to discuss, Will?

SUTTER: Well, nothing professional. I had this interesting contact with this Georgian dissident who, several months after my departure, was arrested and tried publicly by the Soviets. His trial was televised throughout the Soviet Union, as I understand it. He was jailed. He was a Georgian Nationalist essentially. He was the son of a very prominent Georgian writer. He disliked the Russians simply because he thought they were attempting to destroy Georgian culture. He used to use me as a conduit for sending things out of the country to a variety of places, including Amnesty International in London.

Q: Did you have to check with your superiors before doing that?

SUTTER: Yes. They were always aware of what I was doing. I checked with them, with the security people and, of course, the people in the political section of the Embassy. I always kept them informed of what I was doing.

SOL POLANSKY
Soviet Affairs: Exchange Program Officer
Washington, DC (1973-1976)

Ambassador Polansky was born in New Jersey and raised in New Jersey and California. He was educated at the University of California, Berkeley, and the Russian Institute, New York City. After service in the U.S. Navy, he joined the Department of State in 1952 and was commissioned Foreign Service Officer in 1957. A Russian specialist, he served in Poznan, East and West Berlin, Moscow, Vienna and Sofia, Bulgaria, where he served as United States Ambassador from 1987 to 1990. In his tours at the State Department in Washington, D.C. he dealt primarily with East Europe Affairs. Ambassador Polansky was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1992.

Q: Then you got back into Soviet Affairs from 1973 until 1976.

POLANSKY: It wasn't necessarily what I wanted to do. At that point I didn't really want to go back into the Exchanges program, which is what actually did happen. It was the first time I really tried to get out of thing out of things in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, without success. I thought it would be worthwhile to have an assignment in Latin America, but never having an assignment there, and not having Spanish, there was no place for me. By default, the only thing that was open was on the Exchanges staff, and that is where I was assigned.

Q: Was this under Soviet Affairs?

POLANSKY: It was a separate office and covered both Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. As a result of one the reorganizations in the Department--trying to cut out positions--the office itself was divided up, with part of it going to SOV as a separate unit, and part of it going to EUR as a separate unit. I wound up being in charge of that part of SOV that dealt with exchanges with the Soviet Union and worked with people on IREX issues. That part of the office worked on a whole range of bilateral exchange agreements that various agencies had with the Soviet Union. I had to work with agencies in terms of implementation.

Q: One has the impression that we were really trying to get a reasonable exchange of people; the idea that the more we could reach into influential in another society, the more they will be favorably inclined towards us. At the same time, one gets the impression that the Soviets looked upon this as a way of getting agents into the United States....

POLANSKY: ....or gain technical information. There is a constant battle between us and the Soviets in terms of how the overall exchange agreement was written; we tried to insist on reciprocity. There was also a battle within the U.S. government and within the academic community--how this is carried out. Many of the agencies, from our perspective, perfectly willing to agree to things with the Russians that didn't provide for reciprocity or didn't give us the opportunity to try to get access to certain institutions in the Soviet Union and to bring over Russians without a comparable number of Americans going in the other direction. In a sense our allies turned out to be the FBI and the CIA against other parts of the Executive Branch and also with respect to the academic programs that were going on. It was not an either or situation, but a fluid one.

Q: What was your impression of the value of this exchange program at the time?

POLANSKY: I thought by and large if we could get a fair degree of reciprocity, it was worthwhile engaging in. I still think that was the case. I always had the feeling that when the Russians came over this way, they were better prepared for what they wanted to find or learn than we were in going to the Soviet Union. I think in a lot of cases, the people who were involved on our side simply were much more opened with what they wanted to do and less concerned about the reciprocity angle. From my perspective, that was always a problem.

Q: You ended up as being the heavy bureaucrat.

POLANSKY: I'm sure that was the case, not only within the Executive Branch, but also with respect to different parts of the academic community.

Q: The feeling was I assume, that if you hadn't, it would have ended up being completely a one-sided thing.

POLANSKY: Yes, that was our feeling. Maybe that's true. But when you see what's happened to the Soviet Union, you sort of wonder, would it have made any difference if we hadn't insisted on reciprocity. It's hard to know.

GARY L. MATTHEWS
Deputy Principal Officer
Leningrad (1973-1976)

Deputy Director, Soviet Affairs
Washington, DC (1977-1981)

Gary L. Matthews was born in Missouri in 1938. He received a bachelor's degree from Drury College in 1960, a master's degree from Oklahoma State University in 1961, Columbia University in 1969, and a master's degree in international affairs. He served in the U.S. Army from 1955-1958 and joined the Foreign Service in 1961. His career included positions in Germany, Poland, Vietnam, Malta, and Washington, DC. Mr. Matthews was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1996.

Q: Then you're off to Leningrad, and you're there from when to when?

MATTHEWS: I was in Leningrad for three full years as it turned out. I got there in late July of 1973, and stayed until July of 1976. I think on paper my initial assignment was for two years, and then I put in a request which was quickly granted, to extend on for a third year.

Q: This was the end of the Kissinger and what there was of the Ford administration essentially.

MATTHEWS: That's correct. In fact, I arrived just as the consulate general, the first ever in the Soviet Union, was officially opened. So my whole tenure there was both consolidating the physical plant of our building in beautiful downtown Leningrad, as well as opening up the contacts both in Leningrad and in the very wide far-reaching rich consular district that comprised the Leningrad consulate general's jurisdiction.

Q: Your position was?

MATTHEWS: I was the deputy principal officer, and also the political-economic reporting officer.

Q: Who was the principal officer?

MATTHEWS: When I first arrived it was Culver Gleysteen, whom I had known back in the Department years before in my earlier stint in Soviet affairs. And then after one year he finished his tour because he had been there earlier with the advance party, and my final two years were with a marvelous person, the late Joe Neubert.

Q: What was the Leningrad consular district?

MATTHEWS: It was indescribably diverse...I shouldn't say indescribably because I will describe it, broad and diverse. In the first instance it included the capital cities of the Baltic republics, Tallinn, Riga, and Vilnius, and as a practical matter, of course we were very careful about the non-recognition policy of the Baltic nations. I say as a practical matter because we were the contact point for dissidents, people who had been refused exit visas, and the like, and I made quite frequent visits to those areas, usually to the capitals, but on occasion to other areas within the republics.

Up north, you might say way north, we had Murmansk, Archangel, and that was the furthestmost area that we had as part of the consular district. Then we had all of Karelia, Petrozavodsk being the main city there. Then we had Pskov and Norgorod, that's up towards Moscow way. So it was very, very wide and rich.

Q: This is the opening of Nixon and Kissinger putting a great stress on relations with the Soviet Union, not necessarily friendly, but proper relations at that time. How were you received in Leningrad, and how did you deal with the Leningrad authorities?

MATTHEWS: The Leningrad authorities were very proper. I mean, officially they were welcoming in the sense that the reason we had opened a consulate general there, and the Soviet Union had opened its consulate correspondingly in San Francisco, was indeed the result of one of the summit meetings, Nixon-Brezhnev, I believe the summit of 1972. So officially, in the sense that this had been agreed at the highest level, the officials concerned with us were, shall we say, proper. The many other entities that made up Soviet officialdom, first and foremost including the KGB, were less pleased to have a fairly substantial American presence there. So the surveillance and the constant attempts by the KGB to get a handle on what we were doing, marked my entire three years there. The KGB was very active, and as I subsequently heard from someone, they considered it a point of pride that they could have their controls, their monitoring, of the Americans in particular and other resident foreigners, not that there were too many at that time, they could exercise that to a far greater degree than their colleagues in Moscow where, of course, there were many more missions and many more foreigners. So in that sense we had the darker side of the Soviet Union.

Q: Speaking of the KGB, in earlier times the KGB was always trying to trap people, either homosexual, ladies and various things. Was this part of a different era? Did you feel, not just you but the officers there had to really watch entrapment?

MATTHEWS: Oh we did, definitely. The earlier era still very much prevailed, and this was well before any relaxation on the part of the security organs, as they called themselves. So we did indeed have to be quite attentive. There were, by the way, about ten other foreign consulates in Leningrad, most of which were very, very small. A couple of exceptions to that: one, which was very active and extremely helpful to us, the Finns, the Finnish consulate general which was located not far from where our consulate was and is. They were very helpful because they were already there when we arrived, helpful in getting us logistically plugged in. In fact, over some time, I crafted a series of arrangements so that we got, especially in the winter, fresh fruit and vegetables from a little town across the border in Finland called Hamina. We had a monthly run with a van up there. The Germans were there, both East and West Germans, and we enjoyed particularly close relationships with the West Germans, the Federal Republic of Germany. The Finns I mentioned. We had similar very congenial relations with the Swedes who had a very active consulate general there, small but active. And similarly with the French, and to some extent the Japanese which was a very tiny operation. There were not very many resident foreigners, there were no resident foreign media.

Q: What about dealing with the citizens of Leningrad? One always hears that they take a different view than the Muscovites. Did you find this?

MATTHEWS: There was, and I believe today is, a pride that they are different. They were Leningraders, today they're St. Petersburgers. There was a saying, in Russian, meaning sure, Moscow is the capital but Leningrad is not the second city. So there was a pride, being descendants of Peter the Great, etc. And that was evidenced both by officials and I felt usually by people we came in contact with. We had to be fairly careful with at least contacts that we might initiate with a purely private person, because with heavy KGB surveillance and interest in us, there were instances when this would happen inadvertently. We would make some contact and we would later hear that person was called in for questioning.

Q: What did you see as your main task?

MATTHEWS: I felt, and I believe my colleagues did, first and foremost we had the horrendous job of getting the operations of the consulate general up and going. And this was a humongous undertaking because we had to finish off the consulate building, building and equipping portions of it which Soviet workers had not completed for good reason. And we also needed to establish the pattern of contacts, and find out who is who, who is where. Along with that, I would say, our big job there was information gathering. What do people think about this and that, the Soviet Union? How do they view such and such policies, what's going on here, and that extended to the very heavy defense industry, and nuclear submarine ship building, and other activities in the port area. So we had quite an active operation there.

Q: Could you talk a bit about finishing off the building? Because a great scandal around this time was the new embassy building in Moscow which turned out to be absolutely riddled with listening devices.

MATTHEWS: Well the new embassy building was starting then, the scandal came ten or more years later.

Q: How about what you were...

MATTHEWS: There were never any illusions about the situation in Leningrad because we were on an old street, and ours was a townhouse abutted on both sides by other buildings. There was never any doubt that both wired systems, as well as electronic systems, were at play in terms of intelligence gathering. You were very, very conscious of that at all times.

Q: How does one work in that environment?

MATTHEWS: It's not at all difficult. There are excellent ways to handle that sort of thing.

Q: I was in Yugoslavia and we had the plastic room, and unfortunately the ambassador smoked cigars which didn't help.

MATTHEWS: No, no, I should think not. My remark when I say we had ways of handling that, I didn't mean by any means the so-called plastic room. But in terms of being very careful about what we said, and didn't say, what instruments we would use to write on. Our transmission inscription capabilities, I believe that all went very well. In fact, there are some very simple methods to communicate. If you had something truly that must remain totally quiet to anyone who is listening, there are simple but very effective ways to do that.

Q: I think it's interesting to understand the environment. Did you feel that listening devices were just about anywhere, including the bedroom and everything else?

MATTHEWS: Oh, yes, and they were. There's no doubt about that. I satisfied myself on several occasions until it proved there was no further purpose served in trying to find just where things might be, because they were there. There were ways to check to see if things were there. But I don't want to paint a picture of unrelenting grimness here. For one thing, I was used to this way of life from two years in Poland where these things were not unknown, although there was no comparison with the intensity of how this was brought to bear in Leningrad. We were very busy and I think that was a great thing. For one thing, in addition to all the activities connected with consolidating the post physical and political-economic operations, we had a pretty heavy pattern of travel that I was responsible for setting up, and conducted a lot of it myself. It had me out with someone else somewhere usually once a month.

The third big area of activity was the one that was given us usually every weekend: to wit, all the American delegations, of which there were a lot, going primarily first and foremost to Moscow would be sent up to us on the weekends, very happily so from the standpoint of the people in Moscow. That is, both Soviet officials as well as the officials in the American embassy because we would show them Leningrad. We had, of course, the Hermitage, the Winter Palace, the outlying palaces...you know, Leningrad is a glorious city, St. Petersburg is a glorious city. So there was never a dull moment in terms of visiting congressmen, senators, governors, state officials, scientific groups. you name it.

Q: How were these groups treated?

MATTHEWS: Generally the groups were treated beautifully. And if it was a high level group like a group of members of congress, governors where there was a corresponding official exchange with the Soviet Union, they were given the highest possible reception, including the Leningrad equivalent of a state dinner at the official guest house out on Stone Island. It was all very la-dee-da. Those of us at the consulate general used to laugh about how once we said farewell at the airport to our departing US delegation, it was back to more realistic times. But they were treated very well.

Q: What was your impression of the Soviet economy?

MATTHEWS: It was pretty bad. I probably arrived in the Soviet Union with Poland somewhat in my mind's eye. There were a lot of provisions in Poland, but by and large, the Poles being the wonderful folks they are, they made things work even under that terrible system. Well, I arrived in the Soviet Union, and there was nothing there. It was a total economy of scarcity. There was bread, and there was greasy soup, some basics, etc., but I remember being continually impressed throughout my whole three years there by the lines, lines for everything, including lines that people just joined on the speculation that there would be something at the end of those lines. Sometimes there wasn't anything at the end of the line. And in that sense, particularly given what's happened as we look back in 1996, here was the spectacle of the great Soviet Union, this eminent superpower, which it certainly was in the sense of having extremely modern, capable intercontinental ballistic missiles, and sophisticated nuclear warheads on them which could be sent our way, tanks and artillery, and all of those indicators of brute military strength. But at the social level, at the basic human needs coping level, it was a mess, a total mess. And one of the things we did, as they did in Moscow at the embassy, was to report quite extensively and often on the nature of the economic depravation there.

Q: I would hear this from people who served, I'd never served in the Soviet Union, I'd served in Yugoslavia, and I just figured this is a rather primitive Balkan country. But from people who had served elsewhere, it was a paradise. The Soviet Union was continually played up as being this great power. Not only with its brute military force, but there was something about it that was almost irresistible, which was very handy in political terms in the United States, also for our military. How did we feel? I mean, you get all these delegations coming in, and we're pointing out the lack of clothes on the emperor or not?

MATTHEWS: I would do that, but going back to what I said about the delegations coming in, who were given the best possible treatment by Soviet officials, it was, if you will, the 1970s equivalent of Potemkin villages. They would come in, they would be greeted with flowers, whisked off to the best hotels at the time. Our old saying was, when traveling in the Soviet Union first class is always none too good, some expression like that we had. They were bused from event to event, and an official lunch, an official dinner, to the Kirov Ballet. They would often leave, if they didn't hear anything from us, thinking this is really a fantastic place. But they were seeing just that tiny little slice on their official program. I strived mightily during my time to impress upon people that this was not the real Soviet Union they were seeing.

Q: This is the very beginning of one of the factors during this time that eventually helped undermine the Soviet Union, and that was the CSCE's conference.

MATTHEWS: That's right, Security and Security Cooperation in Europe.

Q: ...Helsinki Accords. Were these having any reverberations yet that might allow for dissent within the Soviet Union?

MATTHEWS: It was just starting, and is one of the things I will always think back on as being the most fascinating part of my three years there. I arrived just after the conclusion of the final act of CSCE and, in fact, Walter Stoessel, who was then the Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs, had just been at the consulate general in Leningrad a few weeks before I arrived with my family in the summer of '73 to be part of the official ribbon-cutting that opened the consulate general. The reason he was there was that he had been attending that conference in Helsinki. And as we recall, one of the big provisions of CSCE was basket three which concerned human rights, and human contacts. It was very clear, as Soviet officials were never loath to tell us, that this was just a minor thing in their view, and that the really important stuff was recognizing boundaries, legitimizing, in their view, the existence of the socialist camp, etc. But as I say, one of the fascinating things for me is to think back how the seeds of that basket three, the whole human rights area and what have you, began to grow into mighty bushes. I had already begun citing the provisions on free immigration, lack of discrimination, respect for human rights, etc., when I would go in with approaches to Soviet officials in Leningrad, usually the office of visas and registration, on behalf of a given Jewish refusenik -- usually most of the people who had been turned down for exit visas were Jews from the Leningrad and Baltic areas, as well as some other dissidents, and little heed at the time was, at least in their response the Soviet officials responses to me, little heed was paid on their part to this Helsinki thing. I would always leave them a copy of the relevant portion. But, you're right, that was the genesis, and later on, of course, it grew into I think the biggest part...it was the tail that not only wagged that Soviet dog, but caused that dog to collapse.

Q: Were you ever able to have what amounted to a really professional discussion with Soviet foreign affairs officials about the state in the Soviet Union, and why the Soviet Union was sort of lagging in a lot of things. Or was this just not...

MATTHEWS: No, I had that conversation, and you got one of several reactions. One was that the Soviet officials were always very afraid of showing up on those taped transcripts of conversations monitored by the KGB. They were very careful about what they said, and what they wouldn't say. And a couple of them acknowledged to me, very quietly, that's why what they were responding to me sounded so stock...

When talking with Soviet officials, and plant managers, it would not have to be necessarily ministry officials, they could be managers...well, everybody in effect worked for the state because there were no private enterprises. But either they would be extremely careful to the point of being non-committal totally in responding because they would be afraid they were being overheard, or they felt they had to observe some Soviet communist party ideal, and claim ludicrously, of course, that everything was just great. Even though, God knows, they knew it wasn't. Or third, and I will say I ran into this particularly in Leningrad, you can understand why, they would acknowledge the degree of the problems of the deficiencies, whether in housing, or foodstuffs, you name it, and say, you must remember Mr. Matthews, Gospodin Matthews, that we had to endure the horrible 900 day siege of World War II, the great patriotic war, etc.

I should perhaps mention at this point one of the things that I did throughout my three years very, very regularly and it was a good thing I was young at the time because I wouldn't have the energy for it now. There was an official propaganda organization throughout the whole Soviet Union which had an extremely active chapter in Leningrad, called the Znaniye Society, Znaniye being the Russian word for knowledge. It came under the propaganda section of the authorities. And this took several forms. But the one that I was very involved in, is that several times during the week this society, whether it was at the main hall which was right in the center of Leningrad in the old...it was in the Red Army Club as a matter of fact, whether in that or in some outlying districts' smaller halls, they would have speakers come in, officials, military officers, you name it, professors, to talk about all manner of subjects in Soviet society. Sometimes international issues, but usually just what's happening here, what's our food chain like, why can't people buy cars. It was basic stuff. So several times a week I would go quietly, and sit in the back of those halls, and take all that in, take notes, go back and write it up, and send it to Washington.

Q: What would you be getting out of this? You got a very clear sense of what the Russians were saying to their fellow Russians, what the Soviets were saying to their fellow Soviets. In other words, these people had no way of knowing that there was a foreigner in their midst, moreover one who was going to fire it back to Washington the next day in a telegram.

MATTHEWS: I don't want to sound immodest, but I was told repeatedly throughout my tour that these reports had quite a wide readership back here, in terms of providing insights into that.

Q: I've talked to others, Ed Horowitz who said also, one of the most interesting things were the questions that came up. But the questions would be...I mean, these were just people who said this was on their mind, and they had a chance, and they were going to ask the question.

MATTHEWS: Exactly. We lived for those moments. Ed, my old friend and colleague, was one of the very best. He had done this I think years ago during his first tour.

Q: Yes. I'm doing an oral history with him this morning.

MATTHEWS: And my immediate predecessor, who had been there in the advance party for Leningrad, Bob Barry, had done it. I think I probably did it more frequently, mostly because we were official then and I had a good excuse if approached as to why I was at such a gathering.

Q: Obviously the KGB would be following you. So would you see somebody whisper to the speaker.

MATTHEWS: I know of at least half a dozen instances where, because of someone I knew in the chain of things, my presence was made known to the speaker. I believe these were mostly military speakers as opposed to people speaking on domestic matters. And a bug was put in their ear that there was a foreign agent or some such, in the audience. But since I really was going mostly to these events just to hear what they were saying about ordinary life, I don't think they bothered to warn those kinds of speakers. That was where I got my jewels, and as you just noted, the real pearls came from those questions.

Q: When you say that, could you give an example of the type of thing that you would get?

MATTHEWS: Well, I well remember one instance...it sounded horribly boring, and in fact I'm sure the canned presentation was horribly boring. It was on the state of Soviet agriculture, and the speaker...I forget after all these years who it was, but the person was in the know. This wasn't just some old guy who had gotten out of his rocking chair to come in and rattle on about not much of anything. So I went. I remember asking myself, why am I doing this? I'm tired, it's 8:00 at night, why don't I just go to home? But I went, and the canned presentation was indeed horribly boring. But it was a time, as so often in Leningrad, when there were acute shortages of basic foodstuffs. That was the winter of '74, I believe, and a saying, which was very popular around Leningrad at the time, was what is the most valuable present you can bring to a Leningrader if you're coming as a visitor? Answer: a cabbage wrapped in toilet paper. And, alas, this was all too true, not just cabbages, but any other food. Toilet paper, God knows, always in short supply, probably now as then. But there ensued a ferocious series of questions on the part of the audience. And most of the audience was comprised of elderly pensioners. Who else would go to such a presentation? And I was there, of course. And so this one person stood up and said, how do you explain we've had this series of totally miserable disastrous grain crops? How could this be? We used the army, we used millions of volunteers, collective farm people, how can this happen? So the speaker was somewhat rocked back, and started quoting some statistics. So he gets pushed again by another hard question. So then he comes back with a specific. I've never forgotten this but I had it written up in some detail. And then a fourth person stands up and said, that's all fine and good, but just what is the grain crop going to be this year? This happened by coincidence to be just after the harvest was pretty much gathered...and this guy knew the figure. And CIA and everybody had been dying to get their hands on what this might be, and I recall that it was around 165 million metric tons. He shot it right out, without any ifs, ands, or buts. I reported this back and it got indeed quite some notoriety, because the Department of Agriculture, and as I say the CIA, and everybody else was really keen to know what the Soviet grain crop was going to be that year. So there were some other instances like that where it was something that doesn't sound too earth shaking now.

Q: No, but still that in particularly in a country such as the Soviet Union is very important. Where they're going to go, what they're going to buy. What about your going to the Baltic states? You say we did not recognize the Soviet occupation of those states, but at the same time how did you cover them?

MATTHEWS: Well, it was a very careful minuet. There had been very protracted difficult negotiations leading up to the defining, the agreement on the consular district jurisdictions for Consulate General Leningrad, and Culver Gleysteen had participated in those negotiations, and the embassy in Moscow of course had worked for months on this. This is long before we opened officially, long before I got there. And that formula that they worked out provided that we would not by any means -- it explicitly said that nothing in the agreement affects the US non-recognition of the annexation, or the illegal annexation, of the Baltic republics. But, however, and I forget how this was phrased, for the purpose of rendering consular services to -- however that was phrased -- the capital cities of Tallinn, Riga, Vilnius, will be part of the Leningrad consular district. It left unsaid, or left half said, that anything else affecting American, US interests that happened there would have been something to be handled by the embassy in Moscow, again within the constraints of the non-recognition policies. As a practical matter, I would let it be known through the dissident channels that I was constantly in contact with in Leningrad when I was getting ready to go to one of the three Baltic capitals. They would get the word out to those Refuseniks and others who were outside the capital, and they would come in if they wished, to see me at the hotel, or wherever. These were people who had been refused and felt they had nothing to lose, so they did not mind being seen with me and my KGB army behind me. Their position was they couldn't possibly be delayed any further by such an action and it might help. I think by and large their logic proved to be correct.

Once, because I was with some US scientific delegation, I accompanied them to Vilnius, Lithuania, because they were just private, it wasn't a government delegation. The host, a civilian said, would you like to visit our such and such facility in the city of Kaunas. And, of course, the Americans in the group said, oh, certainly. I just sort of tagged along. I was one of the first US officials to get to Kaunas.

Q: That being what?

MATTHEWS: That being a very old and historic city in Lithuania which was quite unusual in that it was virtually untouched during World War II in terms of any fighting and damage, etc. In fact, a number of the Jewish Refuseniks came from the historic Jewish community of Kaunas, so it was particularly interesting to be able to go there.

Q: Was it technically off-limits?

MATTHEWS: Technically it was a closed area for US officials, which I should have mentioned. The coup, such as it was, came in my being able to tuck in and go to such an area. In Estonia, which is very small, that was the one Baltic country that we could drive to. I think I only did so once because it took so much time, the road was so terrible. But you could actually drive from Leningrad along a very bad road up by the big lake, through Narva, and hence to Tallinn. I usually flew to the other Baltic capitals. I think I took the train a couple of times, but basically flew there.

Q: What about Archangel and Murmansk?

MATTHEWS: At that time it was the odd bit that you had to fly to Arkhangelsk, you could not take the train. Yet you could only take the train, and you could not fly to Murmansk. There was no rhyme or reason to this.

Q: What were they like?

MATTHEWS: Those were raw frontier settings, old, shabby, sagging wooden buildings for the most part, and lots and lots of mud. I think once I did go to Murmansk in the winter, which was definitely to behold. Life was at its outer most difficult I would say in terms of cold, dealing with the elements, and not having much in the way of creature comforts.

Q: In the Leningrad area, I wonder if you could contrast it to Moscow. I'm told in Moscow that all you have to do is go 20 kilometers outside of Moscow and you're back in the 14th century.

MATTHEWS: Oh, absolutely.

Q: Was this also true in the Leningrad district?

MATTHEWS: It was. You did not have to go...I would say probably, especially if you were going up along the Gulf of Finland, that it was more sophisticated by far than what you would have run into outside of Moscow. I well recall on the main road, such as it was, between Leningrad and Moscow, you did not have to go very many miles at all, and women were out thrashing their clothes against rocks in cold streams. That was the washing machine, that was the laundry. And I dare say probably a lot of that goes on to this very day.

Q: What about the area that was taken, the Karelia Peninsula, that was taken away from Finland during the winter war? Was that off-limits, or could you...

MATTHEWS: They were careful about that. I went up there a couple of times by train. You could only see so much by train. I doubt that I was seeing much. I would have seen a huge amount more had I actually done it by car. I think we could only go by train, to Petrozavodsk which is the capital there. And we did not seem to have many Refuseniks from that area. There wasn't much up there. I think that's probably because there wasn't much of a Jewish community up that way.

Q: Most of the people who were refused at that time were ones by immigration were basically Jewish?

MATTHEWS: That's correct. There were some non-Jews, but 90 plus percent were Jewish.

Q: What was the reading on why during this time in the mid-70s the Jewish Soviets wanted to get out?

MATTHEWS: Well, there was tremendous discrimination. I mean, workplace, education, etc.

They felt this. I mean, there had been times when it had been perhaps less so. One of the big reasons for being refused, whether it was in fact, or contrived, was that either they or their spouse, or a relative had worked for a factory that came under a regime, which is to say, did classified work. So that would be cited as the most frequent reason for turn-down, and for a second turn-down, and for a third turn-down. Even though in many cases the individual being turned down himself, or herself, had not worked directly for one of these enterprises. To be Jewish and resident of Leningrad in the early '70s was not a recipe for getting ahead in government, business, or commerce.

Q: Was this an official attitude? Or was this reflecting the way the average Soviet citizen would feel?

MATTHEWS: It was definitely official. I would say it's not an either or thing. I mean, going back many years a strain of anti-Semitism exists in Russian society. We had a child born there. My wife went out to Helsinki to have the baby, our daughter Sarah...by that time we were using the occasional services of a woman, a tank-like figure of a woman who had fought in World War II against the Germans in part of the great siege. She was quite a figure. I well recall, my wife came home from Finland with the new baby Sarah...of course, the lady said, oh, what a wonderful baby, etc., and then she said, tell me, why have you given the child a Jewish name? She wasn't being nasty, it was just part of her make-up. Why would you want to name a child Sarah? As I say, the official treatment of Jews was very poor at that time. That had its reflection in terms of popular attitudes.

Q: What were relations like with the embassy?

MATTHEWS: They were certainly very congenial. One of the wonderful things was that Spike Dubs, my dear friend and former boss when he was director of Soviet affairs, was the DCM down in Moscow during my time in Leningrad. In fact, Spike was chargé for a good period there after I just arrived, and then subsequently Spike left, and Jack Matlock came in as DCM, also a good friend. Then in due course, Walt Stoessel came in as the ambassador. So I tried to get to Moscow periodically, although especially in my third year, I didn't get down as often as I had the first year or two. It was always kind of nice to go down to Moscow, and see my friends at the embassy. We would always invite them to come up and visit us, and some did. My sense was that our embassy officers in Moscow were very busy there...you know, they did travel around the Soviet Union, but they tended not to travel that much to Leningrad.

Q: You were there when Vietnam went down the drain in 1975. How did that hit you?

MATTHEWS: It hit me like a ton of bricks. I was just devastated. Well, first and foremost that the US government, in my view then as now, totally failed to observe any of the promises which we had so boldly made to the Vietnamese back in early '73, because I had personally participated in that. I took it very hard. I would wear occasionally...Soviet functions were always big on people wearing their medals, etc., so occasionally I would slap on my medals from Vietnam, and everyone was always very understanding. Maybe in Moscow they got more reaction, but none of the Soviet officials in Leningrad, that I recall, were throwing this in our face. They knew I'd been there and some were curious as to what I thought about developments.

Q: Were you getting any reflection about how the Soviets felt about the Poles, the East Germans?

MATTHEWS: It was clear to me that the Soviets knew they had an Eastern European problem. God knows with the Poles, and Hungarians. The Germans, they were virtually an occupation force there because of the huge numbers of Soviet Red Army military stationed there. We had pretty good contacts with the Polish consulate general in Leningrad. I'll never forget 1975 there was a big, big celebration orchestrated from Moscow to celebrate the 30th anniversary of the end of the great patriotic war, World War II we would call it. So all over Leningrad, as all over Moscow and every other place big and small in the Soviet Union, were the Roman numerals, XXX. So my Polish colleague, the Polish consul general, would never pass up the opportunity during this time...an X in Polish, they use the Roman alphabet, is pronounced "Ha". So he would point to this and say, Ha, do you know what that means? The significance of 30 years of the end of the great patriotic war. Everybody would always bite, no, what does that mean? He'd say, ha, ha, ha. He was not particularly concerned about being overheard by Soviets.

Q: It also signified 30 years of Soviet occupation.

MATTHEWS: Yes. I've often thought about that, and God only knows what Moscow was told by its viceroys in Warsaw, Budapest and all these other places, how much they may have gilded their reporting, etc. But one has to assume the KGB and others kept dibs on what people there really thought about them, which was that they did not think too highly of them.

Q: Did you get any presidential, vice presidential visits while you were there?

MATTHEWS: There was a presidential visit in '74 just before Nixon's resignation, which was just to Moscow. He didn't come up to us in Leningrad. I believe as part of that trip, Henry Kissinger, who of course had made repeated visits to Moscow, both as part of summits with the president, as well as coming in on his own was to visit us. It is said he sometimes in those days did not inform the American embassy of his arrival. But he himself had never been up to Leningrad, and actually did want to see it. So on that occasion in '74, he was to have come. We made elaborate arrangements with full cooperation from Soviet officials in Leningrad, and at the last minute Kissinger stayed on in Moscow to help negotiate whatever deal was pending there, etc., and Nancy Kissinger came up. She was the closest we got to a Secretary of State or what have you at the time. We had numerous other visitors, as I mentioned earlier, usually on the weekends, come up to visit us.

Q: How was family living there?

MATTHEWS: In a way it was very much what you and I might call the old Foreign Service in the good sense. I mean we lived as a community. There were about 25 to 30 Americans stationed at the consulate general. That included the basic contingent of six Marine security guards, plus with our dependents would be another maybe 60 some, 70 all told. We very much thought of ourselves as a family in this challenging new outpost, a sense of mission, etc. I've always remembered that quite fondly. I'm not sure they always have that same élan and esprit de corps these days, but that's probably my older head speaking. Things always look better the way we were.

Q: You left there in 1976.

MATTHEWS: I left in '76, that's right, which was a great year to have gone through there because that was our 200th birthday party, and we had all kinds of hoopla surrounding that. It was also the year...well, backing up, 1975 we had the first US Naval ship visit since the end of World War II to Leningrad. The Soviet Union sent one of their navy warships to Boston, as I recall. So that whole year, '75 to '76, was sort of a lot of ceremonial, good stuff here and there. That was also the Apollo-Soyuz, joint space flight between ourselves and the Russians. It was not all grim and bad, etc. I always felt I left at a particular high point.

Q: So you started there in '77.

MATTHEWS: That's correct.

Q: This is the beginning of the Carter administration. What was your impression...a new man on the block, campaign promises. What was the SOV Bureau's view of Carter when he came in?

MATTHEWS: By the time I got there, which was early July of '77, there was a strong sense that the Carter White House was not really very swift in terms of handling international issues in general, and conducting the US-Soviet relationship in particular. A lot of this had to do with what was a very confusing first visit by Secretary of State Vance to Moscow in March of 1977. This is just before I arrived in SOV but the memories were very vivid, plus my whole time was spent playing this out. That first meeting was between Vance and then Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko the famous, if not infamous, long serving Soviet Foreign Minister. There was a White House initiative, dictated by the White House, which Vance put before Gromyko and the Soviet side, a proposal for far ranging arms negotiations across a whole series of issues. In and of itself there was nothing wrong with that, except it was such a big departure from the way things had always been done because previously you were always very careful to prep in advance to say, this is coming. And that wasn't done, and of course Gromyko threw up his hands, and there was great unhappiness and consternation, etc. So Vance came back and everyone regrouped. That's about the time I arrived to actually take up my job there. Interestingly, perhaps even ironically, in the event, everyone did pick themselves up again...and we had a lot of problems with the relationship in those days, defectors, messy this, messy that. Interestingly, most of those arms control working groups, I believe there were eight, actually began, some not very successfully, to get going. I particularly worked in two of those, anti-satellite weapons negotiations, and conventional arms transfers negotiations. We held several sessions with the Soviet negotiating team.

Q: Let's go back, and then we'll move on to this. We'd had this way of appearing before the Soviets, particularly the equivalent to a Foreign Ministers' meeting, let them know what you're going to talk about. And Vance is an experienced hand. It wasn't as though he were the new boy on the block. He'd been dealing at that level for a long time and as a trouble shooter. Normally your feeling is that you don't want to spring surprises because it doesn't get you anywhere.

Everybody has to go back and explore, and essentially one, you can embarrass, and two, you lose time. Why was this done?

MATTHEWS: Well said. As I say, I was told that much of this was dictated by...given to Vance to carry to Moscow at the last minute by the White House. Brzezinski, of course, was the National Security Advisor who obviously would have had a big role in it. In general, as you recall, during that whole Carter administration there were problems, to put it mildly, between the White House and specifically the National Security Council, and the State Department. It was always an uneasy relationship in terms of how the cooperation went between the two bureaucratic entities and the like. That said, it seems to me, given other things going on in the Soviet Union at the time, it's not that we missed any great opportunities that otherwise would have presented themselves.

Q: Was there the feeling that the Brezhnev regime was beginning to dotage, I mean he was getting older.

MATTHEWS: Oh, absolutely. In fact to such an extent that I was involved in the lengthy preparations leading up to the summit meeting between President Carter and Brezhnev in Vienna in early 1979. It was very painful to work these issues because whoever was doing it at the Soviet embassy here was on a very short string from Moscow. Every word, every change of phrase, had to be checked back because we were pre-negotiating the communiqué, the joint declaration, etc. But then we got to Vienna and, of course, summits then were a big news. There were hundreds, indeed there were thousands of news people. You don't see this these days because everyone is very blasé about whatever the latest summit meeting may be. But at the first dinner between Carter and Brezhnev, I forget which side hosted first, whether the Soviets did it at their place, or Carter was hosting at our ambassador's residence in Vienna, Brezhnev was so out of it. He was out of it, and this wasn't just an episodic thing. He'd been like this a long time. Whatever the fare was, you can imagine it was a not bad dinner, so he would bring the fork of whatever it was on his plate up toward his face, and more often than not the tines would jab him in the cheek, the chin, and he was in bad shape. It was an embarrassment. And, of course, the Soviet officials were hovering to help with this, help with that. He approached incoherency so you can imagine what the conduct of the plenary sessions was like. They were terrible. It was just an exchange of set piece presentations which Brezhnev could barely mumble. Gromyko, of course, would handle one on one with Vance in terms of the real exchange such as it was. It was very sterile. And then we exchanged views and the two parties signed the pre-agreed joint declaration, and everybody went home.

Q: Did we get any feedback what Carter thought about it?

MATTHEWS: Just, I think, everyone was sort of thinking...this can't go on too much longer. In fact, Brezhnev lasted as we know for a couple more years.

Q: He was there in 1980 at least. He was in Afghanistan.

MATTHEWS: Exactly, it's like carrying this forward just a little bit, not much because it was the end of '79 that they invaded Afghanistan. I would say certainly that in our Kremlinology, and we all fancied ourselves to be practitioners of that science, there was total agreement, consensus, on the part of everyone that, well, this probably was something that to the extent that it had been run by Brezhnev at all...that the guy was clearly just not with it.

Q: What was the consensus in the Soviet Bureau who was running the store?

MATTHEWS: It seemed to us, and I think we later had reason to confirm this in more recent years when people could actually see Politburo records, that the level just under the General Secretary of the party, and the level or two beneath them, found this very congenial. Because here was el supremo, the General Secretary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union in whose name everything was carried out. And basically it left the KGB, the Foreign Minister, the Defense Minister and the other powers that be at that level, work out their own arrangements and the people below them also did very well. So you had sort of a structure where everyone thought this was not a bad situation, I mean, from their standpoint. So the central committee functionaries were in the loop doing their thing. The ministry power brokers were able to do their thing. But it was a time of just total stagnation in terms of any initiatives, and God knows any attempts to suggest reforms. It was don't rock the boat, and the boat was sinking.

Q: During this time, before Afghanistan, you're in the multilateral side which you were dealing with, there wasn't a hell of a lot going on, was there?

MATTHEWS: Oh, no, there was a lot happening in the multilateral area. In fact, that's where things were going on because on the bilateral side...that was a pretty frozen piece of tundra. They still had very little immigration. You just had your basic operation. On the multilateral front we had the then already deteriorating situation in Afghanistan. This is before the Soviets moved in, etc. You had problems in the Yemens. You definitely had problems in the Horn of Africa, bad problems, with a very heavy Soviet hand there. And the Angola thing certainly. There was the whole situation to the extent we looked, and we did look, at the Soviet involvement there with Cambodia, Kampuchea, the Vietnamese move into that. There were a lot of perturbations.

Q: Was there the feeling that these are sort of the apparatchik, but rather hard nosed ones who were taking advantage of any situation to expand. Was the feeling that this was, whoever was running the business, was in an expansion mode.

MATTHEWS: Oh, definitely so. In fact, it was very popular in academic circles, Soviet specialists, Russian specialists at the time, I would say perhaps even now as well, to always want to see things in terms of Soviet doves, and Soviet hawks. Those of us who worked continually in these matters day in and day out, night in and night out, tended to see mostly just hawks. We didn't see any doves flying around. So to that extent, even though we all, I think, recognized that Brezhnev was on his last legs one way or the other, there was no sense that had he been a stronger fellow this wouldn't have been happening, or things would be more congenial. I mean, I think the consensus was that the Soviet Union was up to no good in most areas of the world either directly or indirectly. About the best you could say of them, taking the Mid East for example, is that they were essentially interested in playing a spoiler role. In other words, to trip us up in something we were wanting to do. So we took, and I think correctly, a very harsh view of what they were about.

Q: All right, we're sitting there, we have American interests as our responsibility, what were we doing in the various places?

MATTHEWS: We had our own US policies we were pursuing in the various regions, whether that was bilateral diplomacy in a particular country, or often it would be that we were marshaling up diplomatic and other support in regional forums. We were forever demarching the hell out of the Soviets, calling in Ambassador Dobrynin, or sending our ambassador in there. We had an entire flurry of unhappy demarches about this problem, that problem. Why are you doing this? Why are you doing that? Let us not forget Cuba. One particular scandal at the time, which blew up in I think a Washington August which is always a great time for a scandal, was the issue of Soviet MiGs in Cuba. I think it was subsequently ascertained these aircraft had probably been around longer than the discoverers of them in August of whatever that year was, thought they had been. It was one case of neuralgia after another. And there were also bilateral problems, there were attempted defections of ballet dancers. It was not a happy time. This is all before the invasion of Afghanistan.

Q: Were we watching Afghanistan at that time?

MATTHEWS: Oh we were definitely watching, and in particular my colleagues in the Near East Bureau, NEA, were very, very attuned to that situation because you had the coup in Kabul...I forget the names of the parties involved. The reason I remember this quite well is by that time I was up spending a lot of my 75-hour weeks in Marshall Shulman's office as his special assistant, and we had very frequent briefings I recall from the NEA people, and INR of course, on the developing, unfolding situation in Afghanistan. This was both before, and God knows after the terrible death of Spike Dubs who was assassinated there.

Q: Before we get to that could you tell me a bit about Marshall Shulman. Who he was, and what was his particular role and approach?

MATTHEWS: Marshall Shulman had for many years been a prominent academic, Russian specialist at Columbia University. He had been at Harvard actually well before that, but he had been at Columbia for a good many years, was very well known in academia as a Soviet specialist, wrote in the field, attended conferences of this and that nature, and was also a good personal friend, and had been for many years, of Cy Vance. Accordingly when Carter won the election, the administration was geared up, Vance was named Secretary of State, and Vance turned quickly to ask Marshall Shulman to be his advisor. At first the title and all that was very fuzzy. In fact, Marshall was sort of commuting from New York to Washington. I guess the idea was he would come in and confer great wisdom on the conduct of US-Soviet affairs, and go back to being a professor. This, as we know, in terms of how you view it in the bureaucracy, did not prove to be effective...Marshall quickly saw that this was not the way to wield much influence. So by the time I arrived, July 1, 1977, in that very few months period Marshall had just moved in full time and had been given the title of special advisor to the Secretary of State on Soviet affairs, and had an office up in mahogany row very near the Secretary's suite. Essentially, you recall in the Kissinger days, we had dear old Hal Sonnenfeldt who was up there in a prominent role. I think Hal actually was the counselor, but he was sort of the guru on East-West issues. For a while you had Tommy Thompson, and people like that who were the big special person on Soviet affairs. So the role that Marshall Shulman was called to play for Cy Vance was not unknown in the State Department. In other words, there had been other great poobahs who showed up to be the super Soviet desk officer, if you will.

In this case, Marshall being the kindly fellow that he is, he went to great lengths not to agitate the bureaucracy, but rather to work as well as congenially as he might. And George Vest was the assistant secretary for European affairs. I was in the office of Soviet affairs, but Marshall knew all of us, and as the months went by more and more I wore two hats. I was the officer in charge of multilateral political relations section of Soviet affairs, and early in the mornings, late at night, and weekends I was Marshall Shulman's special assistant even though he had a couple of other special assistants. So we had a real interlock in terms of making sure that things done at his level, sometimes directly with the Secretary of State, were known to, and assisted by, the office of Soviet affairs. And I might say Marshall was also very good about bringing in the Soviet office division of the INR, Intelligence and Research Bureau. So in that sense he was a unifying and coordinating point. It is no secret, and it has been well described in several books, that Dr. Zbigniew Brzezinski, the National Security Advisor, felt that his view of how to handle issues with the Soviet Union was at least as good, and indeed better.

Q: Nothing like having two academics from Columbia.

MATTHEWS: This is true, and in fact this was a running problem. It didn't affect me and my colleagues in terms of the work we did, it was in terms of how the interaction went, mostly with the President. Those of us involved in the trenches were always very busy as I once said to someone which got into the New York Times. Don't ask me how this was...I think I was out speaking somewhere on US-Soviet affairs, which we did a lot of in those days, and it was good since we went all over the country. I was riding back on an airplane with someone from the New York Times, it may have been Steve Roberts, Cokie's husband, I can't remember for sure. He said, how did I see my role in the conduct of US-Soviet relations? I probably should have drawn myself up, and delivered some great profound thing. I said, and this actually was the actual quote that got into the newspaper story: I said, basically I think of myself as a gunslinger. But in effect, I was, which we were.

Coming to make the point, maybe then we can come back to this. In a very real sense, a very real sense, even though you had the intervening Reagan and Bush administrations, the situation we have now in the Clinton administration where Strobe Talbott came in initially as, if you will, this personage to handle the Soviet and Russian side, and now that he's deputy secretary, there's still someone doing that. What we had during those times has been by and large replicated and made even more formal. I think now the actual office of Russian affairs comes in the wiring diagram under this seventh floor personage, not under the European Bureau.

Q: Russian, and former Soviet affairs. Again, before we get to Afghanistan, I remember sitting next to...was it Thomas Watson who was ambassador, when I was in Naples when we were meeting the CINC South there, and he was telling Admiral Crowe that he was sent by Carter in order to open up better sort of commercial business type relations, and thought we might be able to put things on a better plane. And Jimmy Carter was, particularly before he got disillusioned all over the place, was on a very positive thing, that yes, we can do business with these people. Did you feel prior to the disillusioning process that the President was not being very realistic about the Soviet Union?

MATTHEWS: Yes. I did feel that way, and others felt that way. It was one of the problems, though the President was indeed well intentioned. But one of the problems, as those of us in the trenches perceived it, was that President Carter would give a speech which would sound great in terms of doing all these things with the Soviet Union, developing relationships, etc. but his next speech -- and sometimes with good reason because of the things the Soviet Union had been doing, would be a toughie, or would have those elements in it. I think not by design, but by the way it played out in whatever sequence, let's say five, six speeches he gave, mostly devoted to US-Soviet relations over that period, a two-three year period or whatever it proved to be, you had Ying and yang. So it appeared not to be coherent. It appeared not to be consistent. And I'm not one for always adhering to consistency. As I say, a lot of the times the President changed what he was saying because the Soviets had done something egregiously awful. He wouldn't want to be giving a motherhood and chocolate candy talk at that time. But poor Ambassador Watson, the late Tom Watson, who was a terribly kindly man, of great distinction in the business world to say the least, was caught in the middle of all this

Q: From IBM.

MATTHEWS: The son of the founder of IBM and indeed, in his own right, was very successful as CEO, etc. How can I put this? Tom Watson never really knew what was happening in the sense that he arrived wanting to do good things. And he was sent with that mandate from the President, and he solemnly felt that he had that, and I think he felt he had it from Cy Vance too. I don't mean to suggest any problems there. But he had no sooner arrived in Moscow than the downward spiral of the relationship, culminating in their invasion of Afghanistan, rendered it totally ludicrous that he could seek any amelioration of the relationship. So his whole tenure, which was relatively brief, was not a happy one. And he was often, by the way, back in the US on either vacation or consultation. So his was not, unfortunately, a memorable ambassadorship.

Q: I'm thinking it might be a good point to quit at this point. And to put in at the end that we're going to pick up that you were in the Soviet Bureau, we're talking first about the assassination of Spike Dubs and how because of Soviet complicity, or appearance thereof, and how we viewed it, and then about events in Afghanistan.

MATTHEWS: That's right, and our time frame here will be '79 and '80 leading up to the presidential election here in 1980, etc.

***

Q: You're in the Soviet Bureau.

MATTHEWS: The European Bureau Office of Soviet affairs.

Q: How did we view events, I mean there were a series of steps in Afghanistan in that period.

Well, maybe you can explain what had happened at this time, as you saw it.

MATTHEWS: As I recall, we checked the date of that assassination as we were leaving the last time, and Spike's assassination took place in February of 1979, and I believe we also talked earlier about the whole period in '77, and certainly '78, when the US-Soviet relationship was in a downward spiral for a number of reasons. There were problems in the bilateral relationship, there were things which the Soviet Union was doing in the various world regions. I think we mentioned the Horn of Africa. We mentioned things in our own hemisphere, and Eastern Europe and what have you. And, of course, the deteriorating situation in Afghanistan which I must say the Near East Bureau, NEA, had been very much on top of early on, and those of us working in Soviet affairs of course had paid very close attention as well. Against that background, it was so singularly shocking to have an area where we were already evincing considerable concern produce an assassination of one of our most distinguished, and indeed beloved, colleagues, Spike Dubs, who had been in Soviet affairs in a number of capacities, both in Washington as well as serving as deputy chief of mission and Chargé in Moscow. And then Spike had come back and as I recall he had been a diplomatic in residence, and then went into the NEA Bureau as a deputy assistant secretary. I mention all of this because that was preparatory to his going on assignment as ambassador to Afghanistan.

Q: When you heard about the assassination, how did it hit the Bureau?

MATTHEWS: It was just devastating for the whole Department. In fact, I remember this vividly because that was a weekend where the Washington area had been hit by an enormous snowstorm, blizzard, it was one of those real humdingers not unlike ones we had this past winter. It was nigh impossible to get in from the suburbs. As I recall, there were a couple of other bad things happening at the same time. I believe, for example, Vietnam had invaded Cambodia at pretty much the same time. So there was a lot going on. I lived then as now in McLean, and I remember I called to the NSC sitroom, and they were sending a snowplow to pick up Zbig Brzezinski, the President's National Security Advisor. I thought I had made arrangements that I could hop on the plow as it passed a certain point in McLean but needless to say when I stood out there a while it became clear that I had been passed by.

Q: The plow had passed you by.

MATTHEWS: The plow had passed me by, such is life. So I remember walking in, taking some time to accomplish that. And despite the storm a number of people had made their way in. As I recall, I remember sleeping on a sofa in the office of the Department for at least a couple of nights, trying to deal with all of this. There were exchanges with our embassy in Moscow, talking, of course, with the Soviet authorities because of the involvement of Soviet security people in trying, they said, to resolve the hostage taking.

Q: I've talked to people who were there who have raised the question of not ineptitude, but complicity. In fact, Bruce Flatin raised the question of perhaps the Soviet security, the KGB type, or something had actually killed Dubs.

MATTHEWS: It was never clear. The circumstances were very confusing and murky, there was a lengthy investigation, a very thick after action report which amounted to a compendium of everything known and suspected about it. And as I recall, some months later, no one ever made a definitive conclusion. But there was shooting. We know that there were Soviet security people present with the Afghan security types who said they were trying to resolve the kidnapping, the hostage taking. But gunfire broke out, and it was always very unclear as to the exact circumstances.

Q: What was the initial reaction in the Department, particularly Soviet affairs? Did you suspect that this might be a rogue KGB operation. What were you thinking?

MATTHEWS: As I recall, there were various lines of speculation. Of course, Afghanistan, and Kabul in particular, very tumultuous at the time in terms of plots, counter plots between factions within Afghanistan, the Red Flag faction one that I recall, versus some others. And the Soviets backing their people. There was just really no way to know definitively. I think everyone was so shocked that this had happened, particularly to a dear friend and colleague. But against the background of the upheavals in Afghanistan, and the very clear Soviet involvement, coups and counter coups. I would say at that time there was a growing consensus among those of us working, certainly in the trenches in US-Soviet affairs, that the Soviet Union was making a major power grab toward that region. So in that context the murder of Spike Dubs was seen as all the more alarming, and disturbing. And certainly no one ever dismissed the possibility that you mentioned just a moment ago, that indeed the KGB, the Soviet authorities, could have been more actively involved in the actual murder.

Q: Did you have the feeling at the time...I may have asked this question but we can always excise it if I have. Who was in charge of the Soviet Union at this time?

MATTHEWS: It was already in that period when Brezhnev was, if not in his dotage, at least he was not able to play an active role at all in terms of normal top leadership functions. That said, this had existed for some years as his health, pace of activity, declined. There had emerged a fairly stable collective leadership of those just under him, the power ministries, the foreign affairs, the security organs, the defense ministries, the related movers and shakers. Certainly there was no doubt on anyone's part that the KGB exercised immense influence at the time, both internally because there was horrendous repression, cracking down against Soviet Jews and other dissidents, including artists in the Soviet Union. And I believe I am correct also in terms of the kinds of operations which the KGB was mounting abroad in various world regions, not just there in Afghanistan. The intelligence assessment on the part of the State Department, and I believe the CIA and other organizations as well in the intelligence community, was that the KGB enjoyed a fairly free hand to mount operations and swing its weight around. So that added certainly extra levels of concern over the murder of Dubs.

Q: Were there other places in the world where you saw the...I won't say the fine hand of the KGB, but rather heavy hand, of KGB operations of destabilizing, or the equivalent?

MATTHEWS: There were indeed. In fact I think I mentioned the Horn of Africa, and there you had a pretty heavy and quite noticeable and provable hand on the part of the Soviet Union, KGB, and military intelligence as well. The same was the case in the Yemens at that time always to-ing and fro-ing, North Yemen and South Yemen -- today it's just one Yemen. At that time that was an area of perturbation. They were certainly up to doing all manner of things here in our hemisphere, the Sandinistas -- that was just beginning to get underway, certain other guerrilla movements that they supported. That was also the period when, of course, Cuban forces were present in large numbers in Angola.

Q: And also were they in the Horn of Africa?

MATTHEWS: They were also present in the Horn of Africa. I remember writing a number of papers pointing out the problem was not just one of Soviet arms, but of Cuban legs carrying those arms. So it wasn't just sitting back on the part of intelligence analysts positing a worst case scenario. I mean there really were tangible things you could see the Soviet Union doing, and their hand was very present in the cookie jar. This wasn't a matter of conjecture.

Q: There was the feeling, at least announced by the Soviets, and often used by the strong anti-communist within the United States, that the Soviet Union was on the march, and the Soviet Union represented the future. How was the Bureau looking at this?

MATTHEWS: The Bureau, both in my previous assignment in Soviet affairs in the late '60s, as well as during this assignment in the mid and late '70s, had always quite consistently taken a pretty hard view of what the Soviets were about because we were dealing with this as part of our daily platter of issues. There were those, and certainly prominent in academia, there were others perhaps here and about in some places in government, who tended to concentrate, very excessively in the view of us who worked in Soviet affairs as professionals, concentrated too much on trying to distinguish between hardliners and softliners in the Kremlin. And frankly most of the professionals did not discern any great body of territory between hardliners and softliners, and without any doubt Soviet disinformation which was quite active and reasonably good at the time as a matter of fact, played to that. I mean it was part of the Soviet peace campaign, overtures towards scientists and academics. But I would have to say responding directly to what you posed, that those in the United States who wished to present a very harsh view of the Soviet Union were given a lot of material to work with, and really didn't have to gild any lilies in my view, particularly during that period of time.

Q: How did we see the Soviet Union's control over what was known as its satellites, or whatever you want to call it, Eastern Europe at that time?

MATTHEWS: We saw that they were reasserting a stronger pattern of control during that period. And this manifested itself, as I recall, mostly in terms of our intelligence assessments that they were doing more together with the intelligence services of certain members of the Warsaw Pact, and some of those nations -- East Germans, Poles, Czechs -- ran pretty active intelligence operations in conjunction with the KGB at the same time.

Q: Were we monitoring particularly what later turned out within ten years to be major cracks in the Soviet Union? Those were the various nationalities, were we looking at that? Or did we see this at all significant?

MATTHEWS: We were certainly looking very intensely at it. As I mentioned a moment ago, it was a period of particular repression, repression of Soviet Jews, of other human rights activists of any stripe practically, and goodness knows in the Baltic states there was severe repression there. So we were very aware of the expressions of nationalist sentiment, and of the discontent that prevailed. But the KGB, not just externally, but certainly internally, seemed to exercise an extremely iron hand at the time.

Q: We may have covered some of this, so if its duplicating again we might have to pick out the best expression. But we're moving now towards close to the last two years, and this is the third year of the Carter administration, and Jimmy Carter had come in with ideas that maybe if we showed Christian understanding, and were forthcoming, nice things could happen despite the fact we had a National Security Advisor who knew in his Polish heart that the Russians were always evil. Were you as the working officer, and the people around you, seeing a maturing of the Carter administration and getting a little more practical maybe about the situation?

MATTHEWS: It became more practical. Unfortunately, you're right I think in your characterization of how he came in to office by thinking good thoughts, and doing good deeds, hoping that in Moscow they would see the logic of this and be brought along, and the hardliners would be shoved aside, the hawks would be put down, the doves would be ascendant. That had pretty much eroded certainly by '79, and I would say probably by '78. President Carter gave a number of speeches. I recall there always used to be intense interest as to what kind of a speech would he be giving this time on the subject of US-Soviet affairs. There was always great analysis, not unlike the science of Kremlinology where we studied the pronouncements of the Soviet leaders to see whose line was being predominantly reflected. Of course, as Soviet behavior became ever more egregiously challenging, and events disturbing, then it naturally tended to become more a situation where the competition was keenly felt.

Q: Did you find that there was almost a natural fit between the National Security Council with Brzezinski who was highly suspicious of the Russians, Soviets as plain Russians, and the European Bureau Soviet affairs which had been watching this crackdown, and didn't really think pleasant thoughts about the Soviets, certainly at this period. Did you find that you were almost in a certain alliance against other forces that were trying to make it sound better, had a more rosy view, or not?

MATTHEWS: We certainly worked congenially with our colleagues at the National Security Council, and I knew all the Soviet specialists there at the time, and we cleared things back and forth. Cy Vance was Secretary of State, and as I mentioned Marshall Shulman was his special advisor on Soviet affairs. And Marshall had been certainly among those who felt that we could craft, we could shape, a more constructive US-Soviet relationship by giving it more centrality. I think he was certainly right on giving it more centrality, but it often suffered from either too much attention, or too little attention, and has not had the consistency that it deserved, especially during the more confrontational dangerous period when you needed a lot of centrality in my view. But again, it's the pattern of Soviet behavior, certainly their invasion of Afghanistan in December of '79, which worsened relations.

Q: How did that hit us? I mean, just prior to, and when it happened, what was our analysis, and how were we reacting?

MATTHEWS: Things had been deteriorating, of course, in Afghanistan for a good while going back to the beginning of '79, with, of course, Spike Dubs' assassination, and before that with the coups and the plotting, etc. that the KGB was very directly involved in. When the actual invasion was mounted that was not just the straw that broke the camel's back, that was a whole heap of firewood that landed on the camel. That wrote the finish, absolutely finish, to any and all attempts to create, or recreate -- whatever verb you want to use -- a more productive, cooperative US-Soviet relationship. Thereafter for the remainder of 1980 up through the election -- through the end of the Carter administration -- there were almost no cooperative, and few pleasant components of the US-Soviet relationship. That behavior, their invasion, was seen as confirmation, corroboration of, if you will, the evil empire, which by the way was a perception that existed well before President Reagan's coining of that phrase after he had become president.

Q: Thomas Watson was the ambassador there. What sort of reports were we getting out of there during this period?

MATTHEWS: Thomas Watson was a very kind man, and I think we talked a little bit in one session, that he had, of course, an imminently successful career as head of IBM, having succeeded his father in that undertaking and further expanding it, making it into even more of a prosperous and successful company. But Tom Watson had an idealistic view of the Soviet Union from the days when he was a pilot ferrying lend lease and other goods to the beleaguered Russians, Soviet forces, etc. and he remembered that very vividly, as well he might have because he, I think, endured much danger and hardship, and was really in the thick of things at that time. And he hoped very much, and he hoped that the hallmark of his tenure as ambassador would be the creation, or at least to be present if not creating it, this more constructive, less confrontational relationship. And, in the event, quite the contrary. It was perhaps the most confrontational period we had between us and the Soviet Union since the days of Berlin and all of that. It was not a happy tenure.

Q: What were we getting from the embassy? Was what we were getting from the embassy more or less in sync with what the Soviet office was seeing? And also, what was it? I mean was there any difference, and if there was, what was it?

MATTHEWS: As I recall, that was already well into the period where, of course, we received embassy Moscow reporting cables, and we received their analysis including personal assessments from the ambassador. Then, and certainly as now, we relied more on our own analysis from Washington and I don't mean just the State Department, but CIA, Defense Department, the White House, wherever it might be. The despatches, the cables that would come in from embassy Moscow...I don't mean that they were disregarded or seen as unimportant, but my sense, and I've reflected on this a bit in the intervening years, my sense is that they felt very hard pressed just to cope with the deteriorating relationship. And more often than not, the embassy was in the position of having to march in almost every other day with a demarche protesting, or complaining, or asking for clarification, on our instructions from Washington. Most of the reporting stemmed from that as opposed to big think pieces about whither US-Soviet relations.

Q: What role, from your point of view, the feeling that the Soviet embassy played here in Washington?

MATTHEWS: Well, of course, Anatoly Dobrynin had been already the long-serving Soviet ambassador here, and those of us, professionals particularly, who worked in Soviet affairs always resented the access and the influence, and the power that the Soviet ambassador had here in Washington. Of course, a lot of this went back to the Kissinger era, but it extended up through the time we're talking about here. When our ambassador in Moscow had a hard time getting in to see the assistant librarian at the Lenin Library, everything there had to be approved by this committee, this official, and when you did get in to see a Soviet official, it was usually a very sterile exchange. Here, of course, Dobrynin for years had been very adept at cleverly getting in to see the president of the United States, privately I might add, anytime he wanted to raise his little finger. We really resented...

Q: What happened after the December '79 invasion of Afghanistan? Could you describe the reaction of the Carter administration, and what were you all tasked with responses, and that sort of thing?

MATTHEWS: There were heavy demarches over a protracted period of time.

Q: Before we go to the reactions from the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, something I don't believe we've covered would be the June 1979 US-Soviet summit held in Vienna. Could you talk about that?

MATTHEWS: ...between Soviet leader Brezhnev and President Carter. Throughout 1978 and intensively into early 1979, the US and Soviet negotiators had been working very intensively on the SALT II strategic arms limitations treaty number two agreement which dealt with a number of thorny issues concerning strategic weaponry of both sides. All of this negotiation took place against the background of what we'd been talking about which is a downward spiral in the overall relationship. This is very important that we come to this because it always seemed to me then, as it certainly has always seemed to me since, that when we were talking about those who said we should negotiate more with the Soviet Union, that we should be less harsh, should encourage their doves, etc, that almost all of them turned instinctively, and solely, if I may add, to arms control as the little engine that could pull the rest of the US-Soviet relationship. I always believed then that was a flawed view. It was the tail trying to wag a dog when the dog was becoming much too large. And, in fact, it does seem to me that was the problem. There were good reasons on both sides why the SALT II treaty was seen as important and that we carried forward, came to the agreement, and had the summit meeting to ratify it, but the subsequent virtual total crash of overall US-Soviet relations proved the point that no amount of arms control, including an important treaty on strategic arms, could carry the otherwise decaying corpse, to put it starkly, of the overall US-Soviet relationship. All that said, I wanted to make that point.

The process leading up to the actual summit was very intensive. I was charged to work on it together with Bob Barry, who was the deputy assistant secretary in the European Bureau responsible for the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. We were negotiating the joint declaration, communiqué or whatever you want to call it, which would be signed by the two chiefs of state, Brezhnev as head of the Soviet Union, Carter as our president, that would reflect the summit results. So that was worked back and forth very carefully, each word with a magnifying glass, etc. And it became evident as we got actively into that undertaking in late '78, particularly early '79, with all the other negative things happening in the relationship, that this communiqué, this joint declaration, was going to be not very much. In other words, I think the original thought had been that it would have mentioned lots of initiatives agreed by the two presidents, that we will cooperate more in this area, we will do more in that. But by the time in Washington, where we were doing this, we came to the agreed text, as I recall, it was not changed even in one word once the illustrious ones convened in Vienna and blessed it. It was basically just a short communiqué, joint declaration, that did little more than take note of the signing of the SALT II treaty.

I remember vividly that we tried to get the Soviet side to agree to a statement in the joint declaration that neither side strives for military superiority. The Soviet side refused. This was the subject of a lot of to-ing and fro-ing back and forth and the Soviets were not comfortable putting this into the document. So that's yet another indication of what we're talking about here. The actual summit meeting, which I attended coming over on Air Force One with the president, as usual the large accompanying party, was certainly in the history of US-Soviet summitry I imagine the most bizarre in several respects. Brezhnev, who of course was not doing well in general anyway, was in a very down period. Our intelligence people assumed that he was not always himself, obviously taking a lot of medication. There were several bizarre instances. But one of them was, at the official dinner, and I can't remember if it was the Soviets hosting it at their place, or President Carter hosting it at our ambassador's residence in Vienna. Whatever the cuisine, the food that was actually being served, Brezhnev would take his fork laboriously, raise up whatever it was, and more often than not the fork would go into the side of his cheek, and you can imagine what was lacking in terms of the repartee back and forth. Basically he had to have Foreign Minister Gromyko at his shoulder and other aides answering for him more often than not. That was the great summit of Vienna in 1979.

Q: Did you get any feel about how Carter reacted when all of a sudden brought up against the reality of who was the Soviet ostensible leader?

MATTHEWS: We all knew, and I think Carter certainly appreciated even before the summit that we were well into the leadership succession of the Soviet Union. Although I think we talked about it last time, Brezhnev went on to last another almost two years. It was incredible, and he became ever more of a vegetable as I recall. It certainly confirmed us in our view that, we were talking about the Soviet Union essentially ruled by a committee of people...Brezhnev had to keep himself alive somehow, and the folks beneath him found it comfortable to continue to exercise power in his name, etc.

Q: As we were looking at this, obviously we're trying to figure out who is going to take over. What were we thinking?

MATTHEWS: Well, I think, our Kremlinology proved to be pretty good. In the end I think we wound up being right among our short list of candidates we felt would replace Brezhnev...they all wound up replacing him because each then died one after the other. We thought that Andropov, who was then the head of the KGB, and obviously a man of some influence, would stand a very good chance of becoming the General Secretary of the Communist Party as the top guy. Although Brezhnev had taken on all manner of titles in those last few years, Marshal of the Soviet Union, grand poobah of whatever. His administrative assistant who had worked himself up mostly by being a good staff aide, was Chernenko, and in fact, Chernenko, when Brezhnev finally did die, managed to get himself chosen as the one to be general secretary simply because I think he was such a dull, unchallenging piece of blah. So much of the same situation continued to apply. He was virtually incapable of doing anything on his own. So then he died, and then Andropov took over, and then following him of course the now much aligned Mikhail Gorbachev.

Q: You were in the Soviet office from when to when?

MATTHEWS: From the summer of '77 through early '81.

Q: Did you get involved in sitting down and figuring out how to be beastly to the Soviets? We were cutting out wheat, and I was wondering if there was a think tank of how can we stick it to the Soviets.

MATTHEWS: Oh, very definitely. In fact, as officer in charge of the multilateral political relations section I was charged with drawing up a so-called hit list of sanctions we wanted to look at to impose on the Soviet Union in punishment for its invasion of Afghanistan. That's the one you're referring to? And this was a very interesting experience. I was no stranger to hit lists. The Soviets had done egregiously awful things, in human rights, or whatever it might be. So we had gone to the trough before, you know, suspending Aeroflot landing rights, etc, there was a lot of nutsy-boltsy stuff like that. You could even do things with travel restrictions. But it was mostly minor stuff. So this, of course, was the big Kahuna, the Soviet Union had invaded Afghanistan. They seemed to be on the march, rampant, heading for God knows where, warm waters, heading towards the Persian Gulf. So as you might imagine we had all manner of entities contributing their ideas for a hit list. I recall receiving an NSC memo which had a bunch of stuff on it, and we had worked up options. Well, I don't want to sound immodest, but as sometimes happens, as often happens when there is a great crisis, everyone gets very tired; one person who is less tired than the others is asked to do something. I remember well, we had all been working for weeks on what the hell we should do to show the Soviet Union that by God, they weren't going to get away with doing this without getting whacked back some way somehow. So, everyone was very tired putting in 20-hour work days. It was a Saturday afternoon and I and everyone was sitting around, and we had all this stuff, and we got the word from the office of the Secretary of State, Mr. Vance, that he wished to have a meeting early the next morning because he in turn was going over to meet with the President where they would actually decide what we would do. In other words, the actual sanctions would be decided upon. I remember staying until very late Saturday night, 11:00, 12:00, 1:00 in the morning, whatever it was. And at this point I couldn't do this on the basis of any committee because the clock was ticking, and things were actually going to happen. So I took all this stuff, and there were dozens of things that people had contributed that we could whack them here, or we could do this, but most of it was just, as I say, penny ante stuff. I separated it into two columns. One was a very short column, it had maybe five, six, eight things on it. The other one had maybe 20-30-40 things, who knows, on airport landing rights, on how we could deny them the sale of can openers under export control, add that to the list, etc. But also on the list, which I think had come from on high and wasn't generated necessarily by us, was the grain embargo, canceling participation in the Olympics, and there was one other that was of some consequence. I can't remember what that third one was. It may come to me because I think I have a note or two on this somewhere. So I drew up this memo, I guess maybe George Vest was the assistant secretary for European affairs, and a few others were going to be there, and I was invited to be present at the meeting with Secretary Vance also early Sunday morning before he went over to the White House. Well, Cyrus Vance was, and is, one of the kindest human beings you'll ever meet in your life. He never raised his voice, and God knows he never used any profanity or untoward language at all, and had great equanimity. We all admired him greatly for this. His office had received a copy of my memo which by the way was not changed. It's amazing, it's one of the few things I ever wrote, particularly going to high levels, that was not changed. I guess everyone was just too tired. So we get in the Secretary of State's conference room, on a Sunday morning, at an early hour. And he's been looking through the memo, and everybody is sitting around there, about eight or ten of us, whatever it was, and to our shock, we all almost fell out of our chairs, the Secretary of State says: you know, I've looked through all of this stuff, there are all these things...and he referred to the long list, and he said, that's all just, excuse me, "chicken shit". Cy Vance was not one to say anything like this. And, he said, there are only three things on here that will really get the Soviets' attention: grain embargo, canceling participation in the Olympics, and this third one that I can't think of. And he went over to the White House, and those were the three that were adopted.

Q: So a whole generation of American athletes can curse you.

MATTHEWS: Well, I think not for being the originator of the idea. This had surfaced elsewhere early on as to how in the world we could respond.

Q: For the record, the 1980 Olympics in the summer were going to be held in Moscow.

MATTHEWS: Yes. To recap, my role was to segregate all the penny ante options, to use a kinder term, from the several significant ones. There were another maybe four or five in addition to the three, but these were distinctly the three where Moscow would sit up and take notice.

Q: Did you get involved in the efforts to sell what we were doing to other countries, keep them out of the Olympics, not sell grain?

MATTHEWS: I was involved in it. There was one officer as I recall who took the lead in coordinating all the intense diplomatic activity to get other countries also not to attend the Olympics, etc. My office was closely involved in it, mostly just keeping track of what was going on. We didn't ourselves take the lead in doing the demarches.

Q: We started getting into this posture of confrontation. Nothing passes unnoticed in the Soviet Union, they usually come back at us. Were we seeing other things happening to us?

MATTHEWS: 1980 was essentially a marking time period. We had the unfolding of our boycott of the Olympics. We had the onset of the grain embargo. Essentially the US-Soviet cooperative relationship shut down.

Q: And you had the election in the states too.

MATTHEWS: We had the election in the states, and then of course everything went into suspended animation. And I recall that as being a period when there was not a lot going on. There was another flap over the presence of Soviet MiGs in Cuba during one of those summers, but that was just part of the list of perturbations that I referred to. The big one was the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the ensuing reaction. The Soviet propaganda machine for its part, of course, retaliated, or responded, that all this stuff that the United States was cranking up, the sanctions etc., was no more than what we had wanted to do to beat them about the head and shoulders all the time, and that it was just evidence of the anti-Soviet malicious attitude on the part of the United States.

Q: What did we find the world reaction was? Both the Soviet invasion, and our counter moves.

MATTHEWS: As I recall we were fairly pleased with the reaction we got from most of our allies. I mean, the non-aligned movement was shaky and flaky as so often in those matters. In the Mid-East itself you had, of course, the attitudes which were more a function of the Arab-Israel problems than they were of this. But I recall that most of our key allies, not all NATO by any means, were in fact alarmed by the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and concerned that it portended a more assertive move into the Gulf region, or could, not that it necessarily did, but that it could.

Q: What were we getting both from the embassy, from the CIA, and other agencies. At that time, during the aftermath up until you left, until '81, any disquiet in the Soviet Union from whatever passes for public opinion, even sub-rosa public opinion.

MATTHEWS: I don't recall our ever coming by any of that at the time. Later on, of course as we know, there were manifestations of discontent once the Soviets started incurring considerable casualties. But back then, adding of course to the alarm in general, in helping the US case it wasn't too long after they went in with the initial force of troops, that they began adding to their force strength by deploying large combat forces.

Q: Did you find things heating up as far as what we were doing during the 1980 period as the election came up. You had Ronald Reagan who represented at least in the context in those day about as far right a candidate, strongly anti-Communist as you could get in the mainstream political system, and seeing the Carter administration trying to up the ante. Did you feel the political tug?

MATTHEWS: Well, of course, we were very aware of it. You had team A, team B, certainly foreign policy played...

Q: What was team A, team B?

MATTHEWS: There was an effort mounted to show that a basic, overall intelligence estimate of Soviet intentions was too relaxed as to what the Soviets were about. It might have been by the Committee on the Present Danger, I can't recall. I know they were very active in doing things which were picked up by the Reagan campaign of 1980. The foreign policy issues in general played a much more prominent role in that election campaign than goodness knows it did here four years ago, and much more than now. Speaking as one who was in the trenches, one of the gunslingers, we felt we had our hands full just trying to deal with the ins and outs of what was happening in US-Soviet relations.

Q: When did you leave Soviet affairs?

MATTHEWS: The election, of course, was in November, and I had earlier been assigned as DCM, deputy chief of mission, to Helsinki, and had wanted badly to go because it was near and dear to my heart, and I had spent a lot of time in Finland over the years. Also, the US ambassador in Finland was Jim Goodby, an outstanding Foreign Service Officer with whom I had worked on many European security issues. Jim had asked me to be his DCM and I was honored and delighted. But fate intervened. I stayed on, and wound up not going to that assignment, staying on to be a continuity link as the senior special assistant to Marshall Shulman who was still working in the capacity of special advisor to the Secretary of State on Soviet affairs. The Secretary of State at that point was Ed Muskie because Vance by then had resigned over the abortive Iran rescue mission. The other thing in the background of all this, speaking of other perturbations, goodness knows was the Iranian hostage...

Q: By the way, in the Iranian thing did we see the Soviet hand there at that time?

MATTHEWS: As I recall, there were strong suspicions that they were very happy to see us in that situation, further sticking it to us over that. So the Helsinki position came and went as it were. I think the director general notified me that I was selected for the Senior Seminar...obviously after the election I was going to self-destruct, and had been at that point already another three-four years -- three and a half, in Soviet affairs again. So I got an assignment to the Senior Seminar which I was going to do. Then fate again intervened. President-elect Reagan asked Alexander Haig to be his Secretary of State, Haig among other phone calls he made at the time, called Walter Stoessel with whom he had worked closely in the Nixon years when Walt was deputy assistant secretary for European affairs, later assistant secretary, etc. Walter had been the ambassador in Moscow when I was in Leningrad. At that point Stoessel was serving as our ambassador to Bonn, Germany. So Haig called Stoessel and asked him to become Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs, and I got a call from Walt Stoessel asking if I would be his executive assistant in that capacity. So the Senior Seminar went out the window, and I wound up present at the transition between the Carter and the Reagan administrations, and all that then ensued.

Q: Why don't we talk about this transition period? We're talking about January 20th, 1981, because some transitions just are kind of transitions. But this one was a set of true believers on one side being replaced by true believers on the other side, in a certain extent in foreign policy. Or by that time disillusioned true believers on one side.

MATTHEWS: Perhaps, although within the State Department it was obviously mostly the political appointees...

Q: I'm talking about the impact of the political appointees. From your perspective how did things go?

MATTHEWS: I thought it went fairly smoothly. The transition teams had done their usual preparation of mammoth books that no one was ever going to read. Every transition team does this. You know, you kill thousands of trees to produce these briefing books, and that happened once again. But it had the beneficial effect, it seemed to me at that point, because some of those people we got to know, and they took positions here and there in the Department, and in some of the other national security agencies. I remained present in my office...it did not hurt that the office where I was, a nice office I might add, overlooking the monuments, mahogany, etc., was given to Walter Stoessel to be his transition office, before he had his confirmation hearings and moved into the big, big office of the Under Secretary for Political Affairs. So my memories of the morning of January 20, 1981...actually I guess I should say 12:01 p.m., were footsteps of the aides to Secretary-designate Haig coming down the inner corridor to see who was around, and putting up little signs as to who was going to be where. I did not suffer any indignities because it was already decided that our space would be Stoessel's, and it was known that I would be Stoessel's executive assistant. But it did not take the new team very long to settle itself into place. Of course, everyone had to go through confirmation hearings, so they were in designate status. And you had the Secretariat, of course, operating as point of transition, and very effectively so I might say during that period.

MARSHALL BREMENT
Political Counselor
Moscow (1974-1976)

Ambassador Marshall Brement was born in New York in 1932. He received a bachelor's degree from Brooklyn College and a master's degree from the University of Maryland. He served in the U.S. Air Force from 1952-1955. Ambassador Brement's career in the Foreign Service included positions in Hong Kong, Moscow, Singapore, Djakarta, and Saigon, and an ambassadorship to Iceland. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on April 11, 1990.

Q: You went to Moscow, again. This was as political counselor, from '74 to '76. How did you see the political situation then?

BREMENT: I was there for post-Watergate, after Nixon's removal. But it was still the Kissinger era of our diplomacy with the Soviets. So we were still maintaining our policy of detente, and still negotiating, trying to follow up on SALT I, with lots of summit meetings going back and forth. Unlike the first time I was in Moscow, the big difference was the busyness of our embassy. The embassy was enormously busy, people coming through, delegations, exchanges. In the '60's it was a reporting embassy. That was all the embassy did. In the '70's, it was a working governmental embassy, with all sorts of things, all sorts of people coming through.

The internal situation of the Soviet Union was very stable. In fact the mark of the Brezhnev period altogether in Soviet history is that he just got people in one job and if there was no trouble, then they stayed in that job. Now it is called the period of stagnation. But things were looking up for the Soviets in that period. The Soviets were saying and believing that the correlation of forces in the world was moving in their direction. The economy was still improving. New oil sources had been opened and the export of oil meant major hard currency accounts opened up for the Soviets. There was a good deal of cleaning up in the center of Moscow, with new construction along a street called the Arbas. Moscow doesn't change much, compared to other cities, but at least compared to its own past things looked a lot better and I think there was a certain sense of optimism, certainly in the Foreign Ministry. People felt the U.S. was in decline and that things were moving in Soviet favor.

Q: Did you find more openness with the Soviet officials and all?

BREMENT: There was much more openness, though I would say I was in a different position as Political Counselor than I was as a Second Secretary. And this was the era of detente so I could have access to many more people. Whereas the first time Moscow was a very buttoned up place. And I was Political Counselor, which meant that I had entre to everybody in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. There was always a reason for me to see somebody, whereas the first time I was dealing with Asia so I didn't have a particular reason to go, other than to deal strictly with Asian affairs, where we were at loggerheads. But the main difference was that in the era of detente it was quite encouraged by Soviet authorities to see people from the American embassy, if you had a legitimate reason to see them. So that was one factor, and then you had the dissidents, which was another factor. You had a whole new different angle on the Soviet Union that you couldn't get before from Soviet citizens. But even the dissidents weren't very good at giving the big picture. Their objectivity was always in question. They were painting a gloomy picture of their lives in the Soviet Union, of conditions in the Soviet Union, of the way they and their friends had to live, of the future of the Soviet Union, and of the lack of imagination of the Soviet bureaucrats, and so forth. But they weren't conveying a sense of a Soviet Union that was falling apart, or a system that was being broken down, or indeed of a system that was going to fall apart.

Q: The dissidents became quite a focus, but how did we feel about them, they were obviously damn good news for people who wanted stories. That was something else. But the embassy looks at any group from a professional view point, did you find them useful?

BREMENT: Well, they added to your work load, but yes, I found it useful to be able to talk to people who were native to the society who were skeptical about the society. They would talk honestly, and that is a heady experience after you have been in Moscow for awhile. I do remember going out to visit Jack Scanlan in Warsaw, and being enormously struck about how different the Poles were. The Polish officials sounded to me like Soviet dissidents, that is about the level at which you could talk to people. But of course I was in Moscow in the sixties for the Sinyavsky-Daniel trial, all remnants of the thaw that began under Khrushchev in the cultural field. The rigidly doctrinaire Suslov, their chief ideologist, cut off the Soviet intellectuals and really ratcheted down the situation. So stagnation culturally is probably a good way to characterize the situation. Politically there were no changes. Diplomatically they had a whole series of successes. They thought they resolved the German problem, through the various German-Polish treaties, and then through the Helsinki Final Act. They achieved what they had been aiming for all along, that was a ratification of the borders as they emerged from the Second World War in Europe. This the United States essentially ratified, and this was a major diplomatic achievement. It was what Gromyko had been working for twenty years. So things were looking up for the Soviets. And indeed, when they sent a Cuban army to Angola, that surprised everybody, because they hadn't done anything like that before. But it was part of the upbeat expansion of their role in the world.

Q: Did this Cuban army in Angola make us rearrange our thoughts about the top? Did we see this as a resurgent aggressive power?

BREMENT: Yes, I think we certainly did. I'd have to check Kissinger's memoirs, but I remember his last trip to Moscow was when I was there in '76 and essentially he was saying that. In not too veiled diplomatic language, he said that you can't really have an Angola and call the situation detente. You can't do that and then talk about not taking "unilateral advantage" of the other party, as was stipulated in a signed solemn agreement between the Soviet Union and the United States on the prevention of war. You cannot sign such an agreement in 1972, and then go on and ship a Cuban army to Angola. The two things are not compatible. When it came to the United States, in the Presidential election of '76, Ford got rid of "detente" as a word describing U.S. policy because it became extremely unpopular in the United States, and with damn good reason in my view.

Q: ..and was this the attitude? Did you see a swing in attitude of the officers of the Embassy?

BREMENT: No, they were all pretty shell-shocked. Life in Moscow became much less pleasant.

Q: This was not a euphoric time for anyone in Moscow...

BREMENT: I don't think anyone who has ever served in Moscow has ever been euphoric. The only time I ever saw a real change from the Soviet side was during the Apollo-Soyuz mission, the joint Soviet-U.S. space mission. The Soviet press for about three weeks read like the press of any other country. There was never anything wrong, no racial situation in Detroit, no lynchings in Texas or whatever. Nothing was wrong with the United States at that point, for about three weeks and then it went back to what it was before. You work in the embassy and you have the constant pressure from Soviet surveillance -- planting bugs, planting bugs on you. Indeed, we had the whole microwave problem at that time, which was pretty grim for a lot of people and sent Embassy morale into a nosedive.

Q: Would you explain what this was?

BREMENT: It was an interesting example of the different perspectives that you have on these things. Because of really different views within the United States government on what was permissible to happen to its employees, and the legal status and the moral status of those employees, we went public with the fact that for years the Soviets had been beaming microwaves at the sensitive sections of our embassy. It is still a question whether low doses of microwaves are injurious to one's health or not. Indeed, if they are, then a lot of people in this country are in a lot more danger than the people in our embassy in Moscow. Anybody living near a TV tower is getting a lot more microwaves than a guy in the American embassy. The difference was that they were beamed on a very narrow frequency, so that you were getting a charged beam at you in the embassy in Moscow, whereas nobody else in the world has ever suffered that kind of treatment before because you don't get that normally. On a navy communications ship the radiation is through the whole spectrum of microwaves, where in this case it was just one narrow beam. So anyway, when we went public on this, quite understandably a lot of ladies became very worried about what it was doing to their babies. Indeed, a lot of people talked about birth defects, and a lot of people got cancer. There was a mysterious outbreak of appendicitis in the embassy among people just on the right floor where the microwaves were being beamed, my wife being one of those. So, it became a tremendous morale question, and we tried to get the Soviets to turn it off. And they kept saying this is ridiculous, it is just Cold War thinking, and so forth. They never could really understand what it was we were talking about.

Q: As this really not understanding or was it just that the KGB was so much in control?

BREMENT: I think the Soviets genuinely felt that we wanted them to turn off the microwaves and that we were being ingenuous in our stated reasons. They thought the reason wasn't the health of our employees. The reason was we just wanted them to turn off those microwaves. And we were generating this publicity in order to put unacceptable pressure on them to get them to do what we wanted them to do. That, I think, is how the Soviets genuinely saw it, because their medical literature, and even our medical literature does not make an unimpeachable case that these microwaves are genuinely injurious. The dosage was well below our own safety standards.

Q: One final comment on this. I served five years in the embassy in Yugoslavia. We knew people were trying to listen, and sometimes I think we get hyper sensitive about being listened to. I am not quite sure. Do you feel that really a lot is coming out from this? Does it really make a difference from an intelligence point of view?

BREMENT: I think very little. I would say that there was a difference between the Soviet Union and other countries, in that we know that the Soviets devote more effort to this, an enormous effort. Something like thousands of people are employed in the various surveillance functions that they have just against the American embassy. I think the way they do it is that they have a bank of listening devices and most of the time no one is talking. When they start conversing something gets switched on and it triggers the recording mechanism.

I think the Soviets more or less size you up one way or another as a personality, and figure out what kind of work you are doing and if you are not a target, they really don't pay too much attention to you. If you are happily married, or moderately happily married, they really don't care about your sex life. But if they have some reason to think you may have homosexual tendencies, or that you may have financial problems that would allow them to blackmail you, something blackmailable, then the KGB will certainly operate. I know of two cases where they used homosexual bait essentially to get somebody at the embassy. And there is just no way they would have known that these people had homosexual tendencies without the microphones. One of them was married. So it can be a useful means for a blackmailer to learn the forbidden secrets of his quarry.

Q: So it is not so much the information but a means at getting to somebody?

BREMENT: Yes. I think it is more of a means to blackmail somebody. I think it would be rare indeed, that they would get specific information they were looking for from the domestic conversations of embassy officers.

I would really be curious to look at my own file, because I am sure it contains the most bizarre misunderstandings. They have people who are really good in English, but not that many. They couldn't really listen to even this kind of a conversation without making a lot of mistakes, unless they were native speakers, or close to native speakers.

Q: You don't have that many. Well, I want to move...

BREMENT: And very few people would talk to their wives about sensitive political or military information. The value of the listening devices is to get somebody.

She also served in Washington as USIA Desk Officer for Afghanistan/Pakistan and for South Asia and as Policy Officer for Eastern Europe and Newly Independent States. Ms. Taylor was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.*

TAYLOR: There were only eight of us in my junior officer course. We immediately bonded. The training took place at 1776 Pennsylvania Avenue, where USIA used to be. We had such a wide ranging group of characters in our little group of eight. It just made every day fun and interesting. The training, in retrospect, was very weak. USIA was extremely reluctant to assign me to Moscow as a junior officer because – and they were right – in Moscow during the '70s, we did not do programs the way USIA operated everywhere else. They said, "We're giving you this training to run a library and to have programs and all these other things and you're not going to be able to do any of that."

Nevertheless, when I got to Moscow, USIS Moscow was so glad to have me or anybody because although they had a staff then of eight or 10 officers, not counting Leningrad, everybody was so overworked. There was so much to do. Even though we didn't run a normal cultural center, we were trying to get out into institutions. So, just having another body, even though I didn't know how to do anything, was good for them. The training that I got in Washington was fun. I never learned how to write a cable. I didn't even know what EMBOFF [Embassy Officer] was. I started reading these cables in Moscow and finally said to Jim, "Who is this EMBOFF person? He goes everywhere! EMBOFF goes here and EMBOFF goes there. I've got to meet him." That's how naïve I was. It is just a generic term used in cablese language. I really think that a better kind of training would have better equipped me. On the other hand, I came with no preconceived notions. I got thrown into a situation where one of the more senior officers was quite ill for five or six months and almost literally was not able to come to work. So, I immediately had to do her job. This turned out to be the best thing for me. Many junior officers in the days when we had lots of staff had nothing to do. USIA in some places was overstaffed, so it was make-work for junior officers. I had a real job with real responsibilities, although when we went to our next post, which was Kabul, Afghanistan, it's true; the Agency was right. I had to learn everything all over again. There, I was the director of a cultural center and had an English teaching program of 1,000 students and a seminar room and a theater and a big library. I had not done that before.

Q: Go back to Moscow. You were there from when to when?

TAYLOR: '74-'76.

Q: What was the situation with America versus the Soviet Union at that point? What was life like there?

TAYLOR: America versus the Soviet Union in the '70s was probably the best time to be in Moscow. It was the height of détente. It was the Kissinger years. Kissinger was out there at least once a month, sometimes even more. There was a full blown bilateral cultural agreement between the United States and the Soviet Union which allowed us to do a lot of things. Although you could not travel as an individual throughout the country, because of the fact that we had this umbrella agreement, particularly in USIA, we were able to travel a great deal. I accompanied the Robert Joffrey Ballet, my old stomping ground. They came under the cultural agreement. I accompanied the St. Paul Chamber Orchestra to Baku, Yerevan, and Tbilisi. I don't think I could have gotten there easily because our travel was so limited and restricted. I accompanied the New York Jazz Repertory Company to Rostoff on the Don. And a number of other places by virtue of the fact that we had a vehicle that allowed us officially to be our cover, to travel. If you just wanted to apply as a couple or as a group of friends to go visit someplace, the Soviet authorities would most normally turn you down. So, that two year period, which by the late '70s was completely marred and turned around by the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, really was a flourishing period of relationships between us.

Also, I found, of all the posts I've been in, that was the best post for third country interaction. My husband was the Middle East watcher in the Political Section. We had wonderful relationships with representatives of Arab countries there that we would not have had in other countries. Everybody turned to everyone else because there was no information coming out of the Soviets, so you had to use your contacts. We had Egyptian, Syrian, Indian, and a lot of Western European friends. We just all bonded together. This created a wonderful third country international community that for us also existed in Afghanistan but less so in the other countries we've been in. The environment was difficult because it was hard to get appointments with Soviets. But at the same time, everybody was in it together and you had a lot to learn from your colleagues in other embassies. I don't remember talking as much in my entire life as I did for the two years we were in Moscow. There was just so much to be learned. Every day was a new experience. Every day, they'd throw something different at you.

Q: What were you yourself trying to do?

TAYLOR: The best way I could describe it is to divide it into the Information Section and the Cultural Section where we were. We worked with institutions varying from the press, to universities, to the think tanks that were around town. There was the Institute of History and the Institute of Social and Economic Studies. These were major institutions. Of course, the Institute of USA and Canada Studies, the famous one you hear about all the time. Our efforts were to try to bring American experts in a variety of fields into contact with the leadership or the faculty members or the editors of these institutions to set up a dialogue, if that's possible. We used the performing arts in the same way. Let me give you one example that might be illustrative of what I tried to do for two years.

A history professor from Temple University, Marshall Fishwick, a wonderful guy who traveled for USIA quite a lot, came to talk to a number of institutions, the ones that I could get agreement from, on the subject of freedom of the press and the subject of the press in the western environment. We tried not to make this too heavy-handed. But that was basically what the subject was. He was a man of tremendous energy and great humor and liveliness. He just galvanized the audiences that he talked to. But I remember at the Institute of History, where I did have a number of what I would call "friends" in Soviet society, he had a small display of journals, everything from Seventeen Magazine to The Journal of Foreign Policy and everything in between, some with lots of pictures, some very scholarly. Altogether, it was probably representative of maybe one percent or less of what is available in publications in the United States. I'll never forget that at the end of that lecture, people were crowded around Marshall and asking him, "How do you teach journalism?" They were asking informal questions based on what he had been talking about. One woman whom I knew came up to me next to this exhibit of the journals and magazines and said to me, "You know, I am so glad I'm not an American because I wouldn't know what to read. Here in the Soviet Union, people tell us what to read. You have so much choice that I just couldn't make up my mind what to read." I have never forgotten that. That to me said, "That is why we are here."

Q: Were you having problems with the KGB?

TAYLOR: Everybody understood that your phone was tapped both at the office and at home, that the maid that you hired would go through your personal papers. If you didn't hire a maid, there would be a certain amount of ransacking done at your apartment. The people who lived in our apartment before us were a military couple and they did not hire a maid. Not only was their place ransacked and things left upside down many times, things were also stolen. We had a maid from the central hiring authority, UPDK, which served the embassies – still do, I think – and I liked her. She was a delightful young woman. I knew that she had certain requirements. As long as you knew it and you understood it and you lived within those limits, I had nothing to hide. If she wanted to look in my checkbook, she could look in my checkbook. The one funny thing that happened once was that we had gone on a trip and Jim had taken some pictures of me at the beach in a bikini. These were hardly centerfold-type pictures. We had put them up on one of those folder displays where you put slides up and it's lighted from behind. We were going to sort them into trays. This photograph of me in a bikini disappeared for about a week from the house. So, we would say very loudly in the living room (We had quite a nice apartment actually), in the dining room, in every room, "You know, I know that slide was there yesterday. I saw it. It was right there on the third row in between these other two pictures." We just kept saying it. Pretty soon, it came back. The same was true of our address book. We were very careful never ever to mention the name of Russian contacts or to write their names or addresses down. I had nothing like that lying around. Everything else I thought, "Well, if they're interested in this, they're really wasting their time." So, that did not bother me so much. I assume there were times that we were followed in cars. The only time that I was concerned about it was when we went to visit dissident friends. If you recall, the dissident art movement was one of the big things then. Most of the USIA people had pretty good contacts within the dissident art movement. One time, I had Jamie Wyeth, the artist, in town as a speaker. I took him around to some of the dissident places and I know we were followed. But there was no way to do it otherwise. There was no way I could have gotten to these places. It was almost impossible to drive in Moscow. That meant that frequently you had to go with a driver. Simply by virtue of being with a driver, the KGB would know where you were going. The blatant following really occurred more out of town. Jim and a friend were followed in a very comical way in Minsk once. He and another guy had gone to buy books in Minsk. The Political Section had a big book buying budget. They bought up every book there was in Minsk. Since there were no cars in Minsk at that time, it was quite easy to tail Jim and his colleague. They knew they were being tailed by sort of a Mutt and Jeff team. It was pretty comical. One night, they went to a nightclub in the hotel they were staying in. These two thugs were sitting over there. They'd wave and they'd wave back. The funniest time when I was along was when we were in Leningrad buying books. We had been driving around all day buying books. I was with Jim at this point. You had to travel with somebody, either your spouse or someone else. So, I went on that trip to Leningrad. We went around and ordered all of the books. All of the bookstore people were familiar with this embassy program. They said, "Okay, it will take us three hours to bundle these all up. Come back in three hours." So, Jim and I went around and looked at things in Leningrad. At the end of the day, we went back and picked up parcels everywhere. It was the last stop of the day. It was snowing. It was winter. It was getting very dark, about 4:00 PM. Our tail was behind us. They had been pretty bumbling throughout the day and kind of comical. We were driving around in one of these little Zhiguli, which is those Soviet Fiats that belonged to the consulate in Leningrad. We pulled up in front of the bookstore and we went in. There were just stacks of books. I didn't know how they were all going to fit in the little car. We came staggering out with them and our tail came in the bookstore. They picked up the parcels, brought them out to the car, helped us put them in the car. We all shook hands. We spoke pretty good Russian at that point. We said, "Well, that's it for the day." That was one time when it was very obvious. We did nothing. Other than buying the books, we went to do some sightseeing. We went to lunch. Occasionally, when you were in another city, somebody very odd who spoke perfect English would show up sitting at your dinner table. There are some funny stories about happenings in Moscow.

The best story of all time that we still talk about now actually happened to Jim, but we were all involved in it. That was when he was traveling with the then Secretary of the Treasury, Simon. They were all on the same plane. A press guy, a radio guy who spoke perfect English, Boris, who worked for Radio Moscow, sat down next to Jim and they were chatting on their way to someplace on the Black Sea. Jim was reading a book by Laurens Van Der Post called The View of All the Russias in paperback. It is a wonderful book. Boris and Jim chatted all the way. At the end of the trip, Boris said, "I'd really love to read that book. Would you mind lending it to me?" Jim said, "Sure." Anytime you can get a western publication in somebody's hands. So, he gave him the book. Then a series of invitations came from Boris and his wife, who was a Swedish language broadcaster for Radio Moscow who spoke no English. This was a bit unusual. So, we told our various bosses that we were going to accept these. They said, "Fine." One night, we reciprocated by having Boris and his wife and a couple of other official Russian couples, no dissidents, at our apartment for dinner. The big thing in Moscow was to show movies. It was a great way to entertain. The Russians loved it. We were showing Blazing Saddles or something like that. One of our guests was to this day a very good friend to the then CIA station chief. He lived in the apartment directly below us. We had a bunch of other people. As Jim was taking the movie screen down (We had our own screen), Boris ducked behind the screen and pushed this little piece of paper in Jim's hand. Jim just quietly pocketed it and continued on. The evening continued on. I think Jim actually took Boris and his wife home that night, if I'm not mistaken. At the end of the evening, Jim opens the little note. It's an agent's message. So, we took it into the embassy the next day. Our friend Bob was there and other people were there. He said, "Yes, this is a legitimate message, but I have no idea why he's giving it to you." The station chief then asked my supervisor, the PAO, Ray Benson, a wonderful guy, who always likes a bit of mischief, and Jim's boss, Marshall Bement. Both of them authorized our continuing to see Boris just until the Agency could figure out what was going on here. So, this message went back to headquarters. It turned out that Boris was, according to what he said in the message, a legitimate double or maybe triple agent, but the Agency, the CIA, had dropped him over the years. They had used him years back, but then they dropped him. His information was of moderate interest only. So, life continued on. We would see them occasionally. Each time that we saw them, Boris would give Jim a message. Finally, we were getting ready to leave Moscow. I think it was the end of our second year. Boris and his wife invited us to the opera. They were going on a trip to the Black Sea and they had really wanted me to go with them. Every day, they'd call me up and say, "Oh, Louise, you've got to come with us. We love you so much!" I just wasn't able to go. So, I got together a little pile of paperback books for Boris to take and then I got some fashion magazines and house magazines for his wife. Because she could not read English, she liked to look at the pictures. One of the books that I got for Boris was Tinker, Tailor, Sailor, Spy by John le Carre. I thought he would think that is a good read. And a couple of other things. I put them in this bag and off we went to the opera. Jim had decided and he told the station chief that that night he was going to tell Boris that he really had the wrong man, that we were leaving and that if Boris really wanted the relationship with the embassy, he had to do it with the correct outfit. So, he decided to do this at the intermission. I went off with the wife. Jim went off with Boris. We got back to our seats and the lights went down and Jim whispered to me, "I can't tell you anything more, but just ditch the books. Don't give him the books. Give him the magazines." This was to have taken place later in the car. So, I thought something had happened. We got through the rest of the opera. As we went home in the car together, I gave her her bag of magazines and I put the books under the seat. What turned out to have been happening over a seven or eight month period... Boris was quite irate at Jim when Jim told him that Jim was not a real agent and that he was dealing with the wrong person. Boris said, "Well, why didn't you tell me this from the very beginning? On top of that, where is my money? I haven't been paid!" Jim said, "Well, I just don't know anything about this. I don't even know why you turned up in my life." Boris said, "Well, you activated me." Jim said, "I have no idea what you're talking about." Boris said, "Well, what about the word 'Cossack?'" It turns out that when Jim had handed the book A View of All the Russias to Boris, he had turned down the corner of the page where he had finished reading and it pointed to a chapter called "Cossacks." This was Boris' codename from the '60s. Boris had thought that the embassy was asking him to come back to work for them. All of the time, he had been passing these messages of moderate degree of interest to the CIA and they were not paying him for this and they were not giving him all the stuff he was used to. As we say to our friend Bob, and we still see him – we go out to dinner a lot – "Here he was, he missed one of the biggest stories that was right under his nose, right in our apartment, and he had no idea what was going on. He had no idea why Boris had resurfaced." So, when we got back to the apartment that night after the opera, Jim went straight to the bookcase. Boris had returned the book some months earlier and Jim had just put it back on the shelf. He took it off of the shelf and opened it up and there was Boris' first message saying, "I'm here. I'm back. These are my terms. This is what I expect." That had never been passed to the CIA because Jim didn't have a clue. I think that's really one of the best coincidental stories that I've ever heard and one of the best ones that happened to us.

Q: I think this is a good time to stop. We'll pick this up when you left Moscow in 1976 and you're off to Afghanistan.

TAYLOR: By way of Dari language training.

Q: Today is February 1, 2001. You wanted to add a few more things about Moscow.

TAYLOR: Yes. You had asked me a little bit about living conditions there. I wanted to make one more comment about living conditions and also working conditions. That was really what defined our existence in Moscow, what we were able to do, how much we were able to accomplish. First of all, working conditions. In my line of work in the USIS operation there, despite the fact that it was the height of détente with lots and lots of exchange going on between the United State and the Soviet Union at all levels, there were still thousands of prickly thorns in the side of the bilateral relationship. Many of these thorns would come to haunt us even though it might not be directly involved with what the USIS project of the day or month happened to be but simply because something had gone wrong in the bilateral relationship. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs would be instructed to make sure something didn't go right. As a junior officer, this was my first tour in the USIA overseas. I found that I would set up a speaking program on any subject of mutual interest. I talked about journalism last time. Maybe arts administration or the American university system. I would have a speaker lined up from the United States. I would have all of the visas and everything that you had to do to get it all done including having have the appointments made. The speaker would typically get to Helsinki. I would get a call typically at three or four in the morning saying that the speaker had been denied either entrance into the Soviet Union or the Finnish authorities had been informed by the Soviet authorities that they would not allow this person to enter the Soviet Union after all. So, you had a very irate professor from the United States or speaker or expert or even government officials on some occasions expecting to come to the Soviet Union for a two week professional tour. We had knocked ourselves out for weeks and weeks and weeks trying to make this happen. For some unknown reason, again, totally unrelated to the specific project but something at some other level in the U.S.-Soviet relationship had gone wrong and then the Ministry of Foreign Affairs would be instructed to make sure that further obstacles were thrown in our path. So, very often, the project did go ahead, but frequently there would be some little things that would happen along the way. Instead of being able to go to Vladivostok with the speaker, Vladivostok would mysteriously disappear from the itinerary and Habarovsk would be substituted and things like that. But when the speaker was denied permission to travel altogether, that really was a disappointment. We always worked so hard to make these things go right. So, that's just one comment on-

Q: Could you retaliate?

TAYLOR: It wasn't in our interests to retaliate. We didn't want to block the Soviets from carrying out their activities in the United States. On one level, it was in our interests to make sure that most Russians saw as much of our country as they could. Now, there were retaliations for use of the dacha. I think everybody knows the famous American embassy dacha that's 25 kilometers outside of Moscow. That was as far as we were permitted to drive. So, we had this fiction that Soviet employees of the embassies here and the consulate in New York could drive only 25 kilometers in a radius of New York or Washington. But of course, within 25 kilometers of New York or Washington, you have all the riches and splendors of the world, whereas in 25 kilometers of a radius of Moscow, you have virtually nothing other than this dilapidated old dacha which looked like Heaven to us when we got there. There were times when you'd get personally angry about these things. I remember once seeing a Soviet diplomat shopping at the Georgetown Safeway. I'd see these Soviet diplomats there just going up and down the aisles and putting all of these things in their cart and remembering my days in the Soviet Union when the scramble for food was really difficult – not just for the two of us, both of us working full-time, which made it even more difficult, but for families with children, getting nourishing food could be a full-time occupation.

I'm sure that people engaged in this program will have heard of the dollar stores. It was where you could find for hard currency the staple items as well as a few fresh food items – and by that I mean a very few items - for dollars. You could occasionally find a kilo of carrots, but of the kilo of carrots, at least half that would just be dirt. They would dig the carrots up and clumps of dirt and all would go in the bag. But they were fresh. You could occasionally find fresh apples. We quickly learned that there was one cut of meat and only one cut of meat that was edible. So, everybody ate filet in the Soviet Union for two years. It wasn't too bad, but it wasn't fabulous either. Occasionally, you could find a chicken. The U.S. embassy had a small, extremely inadequate commissary. It was vastly, shockingly overpriced. It cost so much to bring goods such distance and on the train and through all the diplomatic hoops that they had to leap through. The commissary was probably maybe twice the size of this room, which is a rather small space, and had one or two freezer compartments, which meant that such things as a little three ounce can of frozen orange juice was rationed. Each family, no matter how large, could purchase two of these small cans of orange juice per week. That barely gets two people through a week and you treasure your orange juice in the morning. Similarly, you could purchase one to two packages of Bird's Eye lima beans or frozen peas or whatever a week. This was rationed because there was no freezer space available. People who ran the commissary and the administrative counselor looked around for freezer space on the Soviet economy to rent so that we could have more foodstuffs. They found that it would really not be safe nor keep the food protected by renting from the Soviets because their freezer conditions and their capability was deemed to be not only unsafe but unsanitary. Whatever the temperature was supposed to be, it was at least five degrees higher than U.S. safety requirements called for. Anyway, it turned out to be unfeasible to get extra freezer space. So, if you wanted to have a dinner party, for example, for 15 people, and you wanted everyone to have frozen lima beans, you had to ration yourself and store up and horde for about 10 weeks before you could get enough of the right kind of food to serve a group of people. Now, we all lived this way and it became a joke. When my parents came to visit, for example, they brought in their luggage a rib roast that they had wrapped very carefully. We all ate it and treasured every bit. Still, I would say that, particularly for families with children, the issue of food was always a difficult one. If you spoke no Russian at all, it was almost impossible to get around. Much as in our country, there were very few signs in any language other than Russian. Including in the wonderful metro, if you didn't speak Russian, you couldn't maneuver in the system. I would say that life was extraordinarily difficult.

The only easy part of getting around Moscow was that since very few Russians had personal cars, there was hardly any traffic. The huge, wide boulevards were empty of traffic. So, we never once sat in a traffic jam.

Q: You all are replete with stories of male officers, married and unmarried, who find all of a sudden a pretty young lady presenting herself, obviously sent by the KGB. How about you as a married professional woman? Did nice looking young men come up and be available? Did you ever have any feeling that they were targeting you in this way?

TAYLOR: I mentioned in the story last time about the mistaken identity of Boris, the KGB spy. Boris and his wife, both of whom were considerably older than Jim and I were at the time, were actively trying to get me to accompany them on a trip they were making to Sochi in the south on the Black Sea. Certainly, had I agreed to go on that, there would have been some kind of entrapment involved, I'm sure - not with either one of them, but somebody else. The direct answer to your question is, no, I don't feel that they ever sent any attractive man in my way for any particular purpose. I do remember being approached a few times when Jim and I would be together, for example, walking around in Red Square. We had had a conversation in our apartment one night just speculating, "What would you do if you had a million dollars?" "Well, if I had a million dollars, I would..." We talked about travel, building a house someplace... Somebody in the group said, "I would never work again if I had a million dollars." So, the next night, Jim and I were wandering around Red Square just because it was a pleasant thing to do every once in a while. A very well dressed young Russian approached us and he had some cassette tapes that he wanted to sell. He supposedly also wanted to purchase our clothing. Then he had some little fake icons that he wanted to sell. The line that he used was, "Now, if you buy these icons and you sell them on the western market, you'll never have to work again." He said this in perfect English. So, whether this was just an unbelievable coincidence or they had taped us, they had thought, "Oh, here is a vulnerability. These people are talking about never having to work again," not realizing it was just fantasy and for fun, and they tracked us down to Red Square and set this thing up... It's almost too much to believe that they could have done it. But in terms of somebody being targeted on me, to my knowledge, I don't think that happened.

Q: When I was in Belgrade, I used to take the pouch to Sarajevo or to Zagreb from time to time. We had a compartment. I vowed that if one of these beautiful young ladies was sicced on me, I'd keep at least one knee on the pouch at all times. Nothing ever happened.

TAYLOR: I began to think at a certain point, after close to two years in Moscow when nobody was asking to buy my clothes anymore, "I'm getting pretty dowdy here." People would come up and start asking me instructions in Russian: "How do you get there? Do you know where this is?" I thought, "I've got to get out of here and go refurbish myself because I'm beginning to look like a Soviet citizen."

When we traveled with the pouch... You usually got a trip a year if you could get away from your office. That means we got to Helsinki twice in the two years we were there. But we had to have someone else with us. On the two occasions, one time, Jim was not able to travel, so I went with another woman. The second time, we were able to travel together. But it was not allowed to go on the Red Arrow train, that wonderful train that left Moscow at midnight and got into Helsinki the next morning around 9:00 or 10:00. It was a very leisurely, wonderful trip.

JAMES E. TAYLOR
Political Officer
Moscow (1974-1976)

James E. Taylor was born in Oklahoma in 1938. He received a bachelor's degree from the University of Southern California in 1960. He served in the U.S. Air Force from 1961-1965 and entered the Foreign Service in 1965. His career included positions in Iran, Germany, the Soviet Union, Afghanistan, and Israel. Mr. Taylor was interviewed on December 5, 1995 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: How was the Soviet Union looked upon at that particular time?

TAYLOR: From 1973-74, you were in the beginnings of the detente era so people, Nixon and Kissinger, were moving towards a policy of down playing the threat side of what the Soviets were trying to do: their efforts to export Communism, and to subvert foreign governments in various third world countries. We were running behind Willy Brandt, of course, because he had launched his Ostpolitik several years before it occurred to us to enter the detente mode. He was extremely imaginative. I have great respect for him as Chancellor of West Germany. The Ostpolitik was designed to open relations with the East, both Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. To get away from the rigid, hard line, Cold War policies generally of the sixties.

Q: You were in the military school and taught by emigres. I understand these were emigres for the most part who probably belonged to the Communist Party and couldn't get visas to come to the United States so we went to them instead of them coming to us.

TAYLOR: Some of them probably were that, but most of the staff at the Garmisch institute were as anti-communist as you could possibly imagine. There were a number who had been POWs, captured during World War II, and managed somehow not to go back and their anti-Soviet feelings were extremely sensitive. The entire curriculum and outlook of the Russian Institute in Garmisch was extremely hardline, anti-Soviet, anti-Moscow. There wasn't anyone who was willing to listen to the concept of "maybe we could work something out, we could deal with this regime somehow and try to work towards a common goal of some sort." That was not acceptable. By and large it was a generational thing. I think the youngest member of the staff had to be at least 60 years old. They represented a generation that was exposed in the Soviet Union pre-World War II. I don't think anybody came out after World War II. So, it was a very narrow, substantive time and curriculum there, not terribly rewarding by insights, but my major objective there was the language and to be able to develop an ear for it and try to learn to speak it as much as possible.

Q: So, in 1974 you left.

TAYLOR: In 1974 I went to Moscow.

Q: You were there from when to when?

TAYLOR: From 1974-76, two years.

Q: What was the situation vis-a-vis the Soviet Union at that time?

TAYLOR: I suppose one could argue that was the height of detente. There were efforts at the highest level to improve relations, to work together to try to solve various not only bilateral problems but to reduce tensions in other areas of the world where we were in effect competing, such as Africa, the Middle East and to some extent Asia. On the bilateral sense there were several, four or five, Kissinger visits. He would come over and would stay out in Lenin Hills, which is where the VIP delegations were put up and negotiations held on various arms agreements. This wasn't my field, but as far as I recall these were the beginnings of the major bilateral arms reduction treaties and agreements. It was a lot of alphabet soup at that time and subsequently I have forgotten a lot of that. But, it was interesting to see how a Secretary's delegation would come over and behave, especially with somebody like Kissinger. Of course, we all know his opinion of his role in the world.

We could travel in most areas of the Soviet Union. They had closed areas, of course. The major method of governmental control keeping us tethered to Moscow and Leningrad when we got too close was logistical. They made it so difficult to make flight and hotel reservations. They made it so difficult, even at the height of detente, in ways that made it so unpleasant that you would often give up trying to do much traveling.

One little program we had down there was price comparison of agricultural goods. There were great questions and uncertainty at the time about the Soviet grain harvest, which was either adequate or disastrous.. A lot of people felt we should let them starve to death and then communism would be less dangerous. So, one way of trying to evaluate the truth about this particular harvest, this was 1975 I believe, was to have everybody who traveled anywhere take along a check sheet consisting of various questions. What kind of produce you saw, what kind of meat, what kind of poultry and at what price? How long were the lines, not was there a line? We had a couple of Agriculture attachés, and I guess they were responsible for collating all of this information and trying to reach a conclusion from it. One argument was that if there was a lot of meat in the market that meant it was a bad harvest because they were slaughtering all of their livestock because they didn't have any grain to feed them. This was an interesting non-State Department effort, which I felt was worthwhile. Apparently it did contribute to some degree to our conclusion that they did have a disastrous harvest that year and we were able to construct a grain deal which meant a huge amount of money for Kansas and places like that.

So, that was a little side light of the kind of efforts the embassy did in terms of collecting information.

Q: As you traveled around, did you ever feel the heavy hand of the KGB giving you a hard time, or sweet young ladies appearing at opportune times?

TAYLOR: You always traveled in pairs and were briefed to avoid that particular latter point you brought up. As far as the official surveillance, it was definitely there and it seemed to depend upon the concern of the local security officials involved. There was virtually no surveillance in Moscow outside of your housing complex because there were just too many foreigners and it was too big a city and they couldn't track everybody all of the time. And, much was the same in Leningrad where the post was smaller, but still they just sort of let it go. But, if you traveled to a smaller town, into Siberia, the Caucasus or some place like that, you could definitely count on the surveillance guys being very, very evident. They often apparently decided they didn't care whether you knew they were there or not. They were just going to be right next to you and behind you and see what you did. If you didn't like it, that's tough, get on the next plane and leave, which is probably the purpose anyway. They didn't particularly welcome your visit and were probably just as happy to see you go as soon as possible. If a little bit of heavy handed surveillance contributed to that departure, so much the better.

So, I would say it depended upon the local official; in the smaller cities they probably were more nervous to have embassy people running around.

Q: Given all this, were you able to develop any friendly contacts?

TAYLOR: Probably fewer than you could count on one hand; say three people. We knew that they had to have official sanction to see us as frequently as we saw them and do the kinds of things together in Moscow that we did. But, despite the fact that we knew and they probably knew that we knew it, they continued to socialize with us. There was one couple in particular. They were both professionals, professors in different fields. One was a very senior economist in the government and she was in the arts. We went various places with them, to the theater, the symphony and things of that sort. But, you are right, it was virtually impossible to do that on a large scale. If you make a couple of friends, that would be about it.

And in those days, in the time of detente, one of our major goals was to try to convince the Soviet government to lay off, if you will, their own citizens who might be inclined to have contact with Westerners. That was part of the agenda we had during detente, that you have to loosen up internally and one of the concrete ways of doing that was to make it less threatening for your own citizens to have exposure and friendships with Westerners. How much we succeeded, I don't know, but some people felt that they had good friends. We did have a few, and some others in the embassy felt that they had developed reasonably close relationships with some Soviets.

Q: What was your job?

TAYLOR: The first year I was what they called the publications procurement officer, which is an overt collection effort. The person who has that job buys publications, books, encyclopedias, maps, anything that is in print from as many bookstores in Moscow as you possibly can, but also from out in the provinces in major cities where there might be different publications from those found in Moscow. It had been going on for about 15-20 years before I got there and went on for years afterwards. It is funded by 15 or 20 government agencies back here. The largest being CIA and State, of course. So, it was a collection, a logistical operation, a management kind of job. My budget was about $250,000 a year, so it required some budgeting effort. This meant a lot of books because they were very cheap. It was fun because I got out and was able to move around a little more and was exposed to unofficial Soviets a lot, people working in bookstores, the Soviet working man or woman.

Q: I have talked to people who have done this and they say in the big city it was a little hard to do it because they were a little more sophisticated, but when you got out in the boondocks the clerks were pushing books because they got more of a quota and were kind of interested. Did you find that?

TAYLOR: Yes, that is true. You would show up in some remote city and go to a couple of bookstores and people couldn't understand why you would want 20 copies of this stupid thing. You are right, they would be willing to sell you as many copies of anything. You could buy the whole bookstore if you wanted to and had the money to do it. But, in Moscow I ran into a number of people who were very leery of making everything available. They would sort of give me the impression that they were conducting their own censorship program as to what they should sell to foreigners.

Q: What was your impression of the book publications in the Soviet Union? How wide ranging they were and quality of them?

TAYLOR: There was a huge number of scientific and technical titles being printed at that time. I wasn't very surprised at that given the nature of the society. I guess there were a lot of people who depended upon technical skills to retain some standard of living and others who were hoping to develop these same skills in the technical field to get a better standard of living. But there were large bookstores that were doing nothing but technical and scientific books and they were doing big business. I don't recall any emphasis in any bookstore on what you would call fiction or current events or other fields that are so popular here. Even there they would have huge selections of scientific and technical departments. They were very limited in terms of writers. The writers who were well-known to be acceptable to the regime were there, but they weren't especially popular or widely read. So, I guess I would say it was much more limited than just about anywhere else in the West, with the emphasis on the hard sciences and technical fields.

Q: What did you do your second year?

TAYLOR: The second year I had the Middle East and Africa portfolio in the political section.

Q: What does this mean?

TAYLOR: The political section was a very large one. I think we had nine officers, about four in the internal side who focused on internal developments in the Soviet Union, analyzed them and reported back, and about five of us on what we called the external side, Soviet policy toward certain geographic areas of the world. One colleague had Western Europe, for instance, somebody else would have the bilateral arms negotiations. I had Middle East and Africa, and another fellow had Asia and another one Latin America. This meant in effect we followed Soviet policy toward these regions, Soviet reaction to developments in those regions. In Africa, for instance, Angola was beginning to become a big bone of contention in the bilateral relationship. That was the first time anybody could remember where an African issue really took a lot of time in a political section. And, of course, the Middle East; it was just after the 1973 war and the Soviet rearming and support for Syria. But not much moved on the bilateral front in the Middle East.

Q: Could you go to the Foreign Ministry and talk to the equivalencies of the Desk officer and say what is going on here?

TAYLOR: Yes, there was a particular officer with whom I dealt on the Middle East and there was a more senior official with whom the political counselor dealt. Most of the time the two of us would go over to the senior guy and I could on my own go talk with the junior guy, an appointment could generally be set up in a couple of days. Those were the dealings on the Middle East side. As I recall it was rather amusing when I first called their equivalent of the African Bureau and asked with whom do I speak on this particular issue or something like that. It took them days to figure out what to do because nobody had ever asked about Africa before because it had never been of interest to both countries. So that is the way that worked.

We dealt a lot with other embassies. There was an interesting practice on the Middle East side. There were eight or nine embassies with officers focusing on that or it was part of their portfolio. This was Germany, Britain, France, Canada, Japan, the Western allies. We would have a practice of about every three or four weeks get together for a long, long lunch at one of our apartments and discuss what had happened in terms of each particular officer's experience over the last few weeks. Basically we would try to time these to fall after something major like a Kissinger visit, or a visit by the British Prime Minister or the French Foreign Minister, or something like that so we could hang it together. Then, whoever was the lead, if you will, would give a briefing to his colleagues saying what you could without being out of school and revealing too much. Basically you knew you could brief these people and the information would go back to their governments.

Q: You were briefing the KGB at the same time.

TAYLOR: Probably. Yes. Our ambassador, the British, French and German ambassadors, had a meeting every Friday at rotating embassies and they would meet for about an hour. So they would do much the same thing. Ambassador Stoessel would call down and ask for some briefing points on what he could tell the other three ambassadors regarding our particular area. So, we would prepare him for these things. So, at all levels we were working very closely with our allies' embassies. It was a good way to learn things because obviously we were among the best informed, but not totally informed. Obviously our allies had contacts and insights that we didn't. So, it was a useful, cooperative effort. As I say, even at the height of detente one was still living in a controlled environment and information was still difficult to obtain and was very valuable and prized if you had something that other people wanted.

So that was basically what all of us in the political section were doing, especially the external guys. The internal guys had it a little harder because they didn't have a lot of other government officials to call on. You couldn't call on the foreign minister and say, "Well, is there anything interesting going on?" It just didn't work that way.

But, this was the days when there were incidents involving Soviet artists. It has been twenty years, but there were incidents where they were trying to hold art exhibits of some kind of contemporary art in a public park or somewhere and the bulldozers would come and smash it all and arrest some people and there would be some people lying in front of the bulldozers in civil disobedience, and things like that. So the internal guys had a lot of contact in the artist community, the dissent community and among the Jewish community. Jewish immigration was a major issue at the time. That played in different ways, both here domestically, and domestically within the Soviet Union and then bilaterally in the concept of human rights. So, the Jewish community there was a major target for our internal guys for gathering information.

Q: While you were in the political section, what was the evaluation of Brezhnev?

TAYLOR: This was mid-Brezhnev. He died four or five years later. Basically it was that he was really probably 98 percent fossilized intellectually and 75 percent physically maybe. The levers of power were in his hands or those of his advisers, but Brezhnev was not anyone who would advocate or focus on changes or anything innovative. The man was very limited, if not totally without any concept of reform and change and modifying policies of various kinds.

Q: How did you all view the various nationalities and their problems in the Soviet Union at this time?

TAYLOR: It was not an issue that was front burner. The general view was that Moscow and the Soviet institutions of power had everything in absolute control internally. There was no question of nationalities breaking away or staging any kind of uprising. Nonetheless, there was a feeling that they had taken as many steps as they were willing to provide autonomy, or recognition that the nationalities did in fact represent non-Russians, separate kinds of societies, values and cultures, but they were not willing to allow that to develop into a political movement of any kind. The lid was on and the lid was going to stay on. There was absolutely no doubt in anybody's mind about that. If anybody ever tells you that they were predicting what was going to happen in 1989, they are blowing smoke of some kind because there was never any discussion or questioning that the Soviet Union would exist forever.

Q: Looking at it from the outside I always thought it was a lousy system economically and all that, but as far as socialist control the communist system can really grab people and keep it from going somewhere.

TAYLOR: That is exactly right. I never read or heard anyone try to predict what was going to happen until it actually happened. I don't know if anybody has actually tried to claim that they did predict it.

Q: How did we view the two areas you were looking at? What were the Soviets after in Africa, particularly in Angola? Although, I imagine Ethiopia was also a place of interest.

TAYLOR: Yes, this was the time of competition over Ethiopia and Somalia in the Horn of Africa. There was concern that the Soviets were expanding. Not only was there the general view that the Soviet government was in control internally, but the general view was also held that they were quite willing and able to export their ideology and their political influence. They were trying to do it in the Middle East and they were really doing it in Angola and the Horn. We had considered Africa, in particular, an arena for both American influence, and a Western role. We were concerned with the Soviet willingness to expend political resources and also military and economic resources in Africa. That was going into a new area and raising the competition to a new level, which we considered threatening. Threatening in and of itself, not necessarily to vital American interests, although military control over the Horn was a broader question of access to the Gulf and South Asia, etc.

Q: Did Cuba enter into the equation in Angola at all?

TAYLOR: Yes, Cuba provided the manpower, the cannon fodder for the joint Cuba-Soviet effort in Angola. It was quite clear that the Soviets were funding this effort and that the Cuban army had always been equipped with Soviet equipment and quite capable of using it in Angola. They were quite effective, being much better organized than any of the Angolan parties. So, militarily they were quite a factor.

Q: I take it what you were doing almost the entire time you did this was reporting and there wasn't much representation, we don't like this, we wish you wouldn't do this, or would you please do this, with the Soviets?

TAYLOR: There wasn't much of that, no. My particular involvement would be a demarche with the ambassador or the political counselor, and that happened half a dozen times in my experience.

Q: You would draw up a statement and go over it and he would deliver it?

TAYLOR: Yes. They would note it and generally not respond, but we didn't expect them to.

These were the standard diplomatic approaches that one expects.

Q: Were you also watching other parts of Africa to see if the Soviets were fishing in troubled waters, etc.?

TAYLOR: As best we could. There were concerns in other parts of East Africa like Mozambique. They were obviously focusing in on former Portuguese colonies that were being left in chaos. The Soviets threw their surrogates into these former colonies in an attempt to use them as means of entry into the political arena in East Africa. Mozambique was sensitive because of its location close to South Africa. There was little doubt that if the South Africans felt a threat emanating from Mozambique, the South Africans would react and we didn't really want to be on the side of supporting any South African military activities into neighboring countries.

Q: To try to get to the mind set, here the Soviets are playing around in the Horn of Africa, in Angola and all, were you and your colleagues sitting back and saying, "Big deal. This is not going to go anywhere," or was there the feeling that this might start something that in a way we would end up with a series of hostile countries to American interests in Africa?

TAYLOR: I can't speak, obviously, for the highest levels of American policy making, but I got the sense that people both in the Soviet field as well as people working on the African side in our government, felt considerable concern that despite the various high level visits that had taken place by Nixon, Kissinger, Brezhnev and the atmosphere of detente and the publicity about cooperation, they were embarking on a real, genuine expansionist policy into an area which had not been part of their focus before. Whether people were terrified? No, I don't think they were, but I think there was genuine alarm that this was sort of counter to the understanding we thought we had with the Soviets because they were so willing and able to diverge from that and begin mucking around in areas which were essentially very unstable. The old phrase "correlation of forces" was in vogue those days. That being the doctrine that the tide of history was on the Soviets' side, the side of communism, and that it couldn't be stopped by Western reaction and efforts and that the Soviet Union had an obligation to support these revolutionary, what were called national liberation movements. They had done so in Cuba and would do so in the other areas of emerging independent countries. My sense at the time was that there was real alarm in Washington, that this was something that we had to address, even though there were no vital US interests in Mozambique and Angola, for example. On the Horn of Africa there were other concerns.

So, I guess in a nutshell, the alarm over Soviet willingness and eagerness in many ways to export ideology was coming to the fore. And, of course, this became even more heightened in the late seventies after the Shah fell, Afghanistan fell and Brzezinski's calling that area the "arc of crisis."

Q: We were drawing long red arrows towards the Persian Gulf, right through easy passage through Afghanistan.

TAYLOR: Yes. Again it was absolutely impossible for anyone to foresee that it would be only ten years from the fall of the Shah in 1979 to the fall of communism in 1989.

Q: It looked like it was going the other way.

TAYLOR: Exactly. And I detected, maybe people who worked in Africa and the Middle East felt that the universe rotates around whatever your particular job is, but I tend to think that maybe even the people higher up in the geographical Bureaus were concerned about what was going on.

Q: What about in the Middle East? You had the 1973 war which was just over. This was before Camp David which effectively took Egypt out of the equation and completely really changed the whole balance. From that time on it was a whole different set of calculations. But at this point, Egypt had shown up well in the war, although it lost it. We were very nervous about oil. The Soviets were resupplying the Egyptians and certainly moving into Syria and Iraq was practically their vassal state. From your perspective, what were the Soviets trying to do?

TAYLOR: They were trying to build a large enough relationship with Syria which was probably their closest ally, and favorite government with which to work in the region, to offset American influence on the Israeli side. Again, as you point out, this was well before Camp David. But at that time our policy was to try to get negotiations in a peace conference somehow started among the various parties, but doing it gradually, step by step. That was the cliché in our policy, don't do anything in a general type of peace conference which would achieve nothing and just overwhelm the Israelis diplomatically. We wanted to do everything possible to arrange a step by step negotiation among the various parties involved. The Israelis with the Egyptians, the Jordanians, the confrontation states, but including Syria. The Soviets did everything possible to support the Syrians in rejecting that approach.

So, I guess by and large at this particular time between the 1973 war and the beginning of the Camp David process with Sadat's visit to Jerusalem in response to Begin's invitation there was very little movement on the political or diplomatic side. I would say it was not a time of spinning wheels because there was a lot of effort and time spent by a lot of bureaucrats, me and thousands of others, working toward whatever we could achieve in terms of developing these contacts that would eventually lead to something, we hoped. Again it was one of those human things that you couldn't predict. You couldn't predict the fact that all of a sudden Begin would say, "Well, okay, if you want peace, come to Jerusalem and we will discuss it." And Sadat saying, "Okay, why not?" Who could have said that was going to be the way it would develop?

My own feeling, and it is a minority view but I am not alone in holding it, is that the 1973 war from Sadat's point of view was a last attempt on the military side to prevail. He indicated to his own military, who were and are a political force in Egypt, that we had our best shot. We surprised them, we got a lot of force across the canal. We did this and this and you guys did your best. But, we are not going to do it again. We cannot take these losses, withstand the cost in financial terms of another war and constant conflict. You have had your chance. I gave it to you. I gave you everything we possibly could in terms of building up your ability to fight this war and we lost anyway. So, no more military solutions. I am going to pursue the diplomatic and political side. And so he did. He came home with a huge prize in the Camp David Accords. He got all of the territory back, billions of dollars immediately and every year since. It cost him his life, of course, but in the larger scheme of things Camp David was far better than winning the war.

Q: In Moscow were you able to talk to the Egyptian and Syrian embassy people?

TAYLOR: Yes. I mentioned the practice of dealing with my NATO allies on a regular basis. There were two guys at the Egyptian embassy who were as top notch diplomats as I have ever run into and they were always readily accessible and wanting to talk and meet and discuss things. Never met a Syrian. Did meet an Iraqi once, but that didn't last very long. The Jordanians were good and very friendly. But, basically the contacts I had on the Arab side were more with the Egyptians than anybody else.

There was an Israeli trade office, or something like that, but we didn't have much to do with them. That kind of liaison all took place in Washington or in Israel. There was just not much to do with them.

Q: A question I like to ask at each post. Walter Stoessel was your ambassador. How did he operate?

TAYLOR: He was much in the mold of Armin Meyer. He was old line Foreign Service. Very formal, very gracious guy. He had his agenda working with other ambassadors and when necessary at the top levels at the Foreign Ministry and other ministries. He would spend every weekend out at the dacha. The ambassador had a dacha about 25 miles outside of town. He and his wife would go out there every weekend, so he was not tied to the office the way a lot of us were. But, he was very structured in his day. There were set staff meetings and some of them would be with the entire political section, sometimes with just two or three depending upon the issue. He tended to delegate the actual running of the mission to the DCM.

Q: Who was DCM at that time?

TAYLOR: Jack Matlock.

Q: Who later became ambassador.

TAYLOR: That's right. The first few months I was there it was Spike Dubs, who became Ambassador to Afghanistan. Then Matlock took over and ten years later was ambassador himself.

Q: Is there anything else that you think we should cover in Moscow?

TAYLOR: Oh, there are the normal funny stories.

Q: Well, tell me a funny story.

TAYLOR: One time a colleague and I on one of these book buying missions were out in Smolensk. We took the train out there and it was in the dead of winter with snow three feet high. We went to dinner at one of the approved restaurants, probably the only one in town that was open at that time and our KGB surveillance which had been with us all day long were at the table next to us. After dinner we were heading back to the hotel and needed to ride a bus back. We came out of the restaurant into a freezing cold blizzard and were about maybe 30 or 40 yards ahead of our surveillance. We saw the bus we needed pull up at the bus stop but then start to pull away very slowly. Totally inadvertently, not trying to have anybody lose his job with the KGB or anything like that, the two of us started running towards the bus and barely got to it before the door closed. Of course, our surveillance came bounding up and were pounding on the door, but the bus driver didn't stop. So we ditched our tail accidentally. I don't think those guys were too happy because they were not the surveillance the next day. They probably in effect were disciplined somehow. But they could have been very ticked off at us. Because the standard ground rules were don't be cute, we looked at each other on the bus and said, "God, what have we done? It was fun, but what have we done?"

ROBERT K. GEIS
Russian Language Study
Monterrey, California (1974)

Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Leningrad (1974-1978)

Robert K. Geis was born on October the 28th, 1939, in Havana, Cuba. He joined the Foreign Service in 1962. His assignments abroad included Buenos Aires, Bucharest, Guayaquil, Leningrad, Trinidad and Tobago, and Florence. Mr. Geis was interviewed by Lewis Hoffacker on April 21, 1999.

GEIS: In 1974, I was selected, after lobbying for the job, for the new branch public affairs officer position in the recently established consulate general in Leningrad. As a result of the policy of detente with the USSR, this consulate had been opened. So I started doing graduate work in Russian and Soviet affairs at Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies and also a course at George Washington University. Then, in the summer of 1974, we packed up and moved to Monterey, California, to learn Russian. This was to be a year course at the well-known Defense Language Institute in Monterey. Ours was an experiment based on the notion that was prevalent in USIA and in the State Department at that time than the training out at Monterey was better than the training at FSI, and while it was delightful to be in Monterey for a year, the DLI experience, as far as I'm concerned, was a mistake. We were a group of three USI officers with our wives and we were given a separate class and teachers, but we were being taught within a rigid system created for the army's needs for surveillance training, and thus emphasizing comprehension with little attention paid to conversation, and we had to constantly fight to get conversational training and to get away from the highly specialized military vocabulary. In other words, we learned such things as how to say "barbed wire entanglement," which we didn't expect to be using an awful lot while we were in Leningrad. However, we did get through the course, but to the best of my knowledge, after our complaints, this experiment was never repeated.

So we were off to Leningrad. It's hard for me to summarize briefly four years in that brooding and sinister yet beautiful and exhilarating Russian land. We were lucky to be in Leningrad, one of the great planned cities, whose grandeur remained even if somewhat tarnished, lucky also to be in an apartment in the heart of old St. Petersburg and not in a complex for foreigners, as many of our colleagues were, particularly in Moscow. We were two blocks away from the old Winter Palace, now the Hermitage, and one could not help but become a devotee of this great city, of its history, and its culture. At this time, U.S.-Soviet relations witnessed the heyday and the beginning of decline of detente. Shortly after my arrival, the Apollo-Soyuz docking experiment took place, and the Russians played this event to the hilt as proof of their technical equivalence with the U.S. They used the image of the docking of the space ships as a parallel with the 1945 meeting of the Russian and U.S. troops in Germany. And it was interesting, and my contacts in the Soviet media at the time were surprisingly friendly, emphasizing this remembrance of the war and our meeting and our being allies in the war. In fact, more than at any other time, particularly the media contacts were friendliest. The Cosmonauts and the Astronauts later visited Leningrad, with much fanfare, and I was involved in the first of many escort duties over the years.

Our educational and cultural exchanges were very active at this time, under a bilateral agreement between the two countries. We worked with the infamous Goskoncert, which is the Soviet State Concert Bureau. I was involved in implementing our exchange program, not only for Leningrad but also for the three Baltic republics of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. I came to know Tallinn, Riga, and Vilnius, their capitals, and their stalwart people very well. These republics were permitted a bit more cultural freedom of action by the Soviets, so that American touring groups often were scheduled there. I was, in fact, one of the few more senior officers who was permitted by the U.S. Government to visit these republics. Our consul general in Leningrad, for example, was not allowed to visit since we deemed that such a visit would come too close to recognizing the incorporation of the formerly independent republics into the USSR. At the time of my arrival, one of the more unique exchanges was in progress. It was the first Soviet-American film co-production. And at that time I met and assisted the director George Cukor and several of his stellar cast members, including Elizabeth Taylor, Cicely Tyson, Jane Fonda. Fonda was also in the cast, and I made a pointed effort to be cool toward her for her Vietnam activities. She thought the Russians would welcome her with open arms, which proved not to be the case. They apparently didn't like this radical, even if she was pro-North Vietnam. As it turned out, unfortunately, The Blue Bird, the film, was a resounding flop in the U.S. and was duly christened by the critics as "The Blue Turkey."

Leningrad at that point was selected for one of our major East-West exhibits. This was called "Technology in the American Home." It was in January of 1976, and we worked at that time with some old friends from USIA's Exhibit Division, but we also entertained them and their language guides who'd come over for the exhibit at the consulate's dacha on the outskirts of Leningrad. Like the villa in Romania, the dacha was a wonderful retreat from the Leningrad routine, both for cross-country skiing in the winter and for water sports out in the Gulf of Finland in the summer. But back to this exhibit. I wanted to mention that they were truly effective propaganda vehicles, well worth every cent we every spent on them.

In 1976, in the performing arts area, we had a major country music show headed by Roy Clark, and later we had the superb American Conservatory Theater (ACT) of San Francisco, which did productions of The Matchmaker and Desire under the Elms in Leningrad and Riga [Note: Another notable visitor around then was Jackie Kennedy Onassis. She was accompanied by Met Director, the redoubtable Thomas Hoving. They were arranging one of the exchanges between the Met and the Hermitage, a major exhibit of Russian costumes, for which Mrs. Onassis was writing the catalog. She was a sweet and rather shy woman and we talked about her children. The Fourth of July, 1976, we celebrated with a reception at the consul general's palatial residence, and then my wife and I snuck off. We had been invited to go sailing in the Gulf of Finland with the director of the Jubilee Sports Palace. We met this gentleman at the time of the Roy Clark performances, and he was a real character. He had been an Olympic champion sailor, and so he took us out on the gulf, and we toasted the Fourth with champagne, caviar, and flares shot up into the white nights, into the bright night sky of the Gulf of Finland. It was truly an unforgettable experience.

One of the most exciting aspects of life in the former Czarist capital was the history and culture of the city - the great museums, the Kirov, the summer palaces, theater, concerts, and above all for me the ballet, both classical and a certain amount of modern dance. We had some contact with official artists and performers but much more with the unofficial and dissident artists and intellectuals of the city and of the Baltic republics. One was almost able to have normal social contacts with these people, which was certainly not true of any other Russians, and they sort of helped to keep one's sanity in this land of constant surveillance by the KGB. I remember very fondly the artist Volodya Ochinnikov, whose Malevich-like art celebrated folk and later religious themes. We spent evenings with much vodka and eating potatoes at his mother's dacha outside the city. There was the talented Tolya Belkin, noted for his humorous drawings; Sasha and Tanya Danov, whose paintings and ceramics were rooted in his native Dagestan, which is one of the Caucasian republics, in fact, right next door to the infamous Chechnya. We had wonderful warm evenings with the Danovs, eating shashlik and drinking Georgian wine. The Dyshlenko brothers, Sasha the writer and Yuri the abstract artist, and their lovely wives. And last, but not least, the redoubtable Eugene Rukhin, noted as an abstract collagist and dissident. His untimely death in a studio fire in 1976 was attributed by some to the KGB, and he certainly suffered. He was Jewish and certainly suffered from KGB harassment for years. I had the pleasure of introducing American artists who visited during that period, such as Jamie Wyeth, Larry Rivers, and George Segal to these dissident artists and friends. I always attended their unofficial exhibits. It was interesting because the artists- (end of tape)

You mentioned, Lew, your interest in what anti-Semitism was like at that time. I certainly had contact with a number of Jewish intellectuals and writers and artists then, and there's no question that, I think, some of them were singled out as Jews for a certain amount of harassment; however, anti-Semitism was certainly not the policy of the Soviet Government, as it had been under the Czars. And indeed, there were prominent Communist Party members who were Jewish and had been ever since the Leninist era. But at that time, anti-Semitism in the population persisted. There's no question about it.

Q: It was endemic.

GEIS: It was endemic. It's always been there and probably always will be there.

Q: But no pogroms.

GEIS: There were no pogroms at all. Our policy at that time was trying to effect a greater exchange of Jews via the famous Jackson-Vanik Amendment, which you'll remember was being pushed to get more Jews being permitted to emigrate from the Soviet Union, and of course the whole idea of most-favored-nation treatment was dependent throughout that period on whether or not Jews were being given permission to emigrate. So that was very definitely affecting, in fact, having such an effect that it was part of the items that caused the decline of detente, which was going on during the time I was there.

But anyway, to go on, as I was mentioning these unofficial artists. They always had a feeling that their contact with official Americans was a positive thing for them and that they felt that they might not just suddenly be spirited away during the night if they knew Americans and if the Americans had contact with them. So they encouraged our getting to know them and to attend all their exhibits. And it was on one such occasion that I was going to visit an exhibit where the KGB demonstrated its dismay with me very clearly, displeasure, by what we called bumper-to-bumper surveillance. They were following my Volvo, and it was not a very happy experience, to say the least.

The USSR at that time took its toll in a more personal way. In the spring of 1977, my marriage began to fall apart. In order to keep our problems as private as possible in this land of surveillance, my wife and I sometimes actually went to use the secure area of the consulate for our discussions and arguments, but we did divorce in the summer of 1977 while I was on home leave in Texas.

As I mentioned earlier, I have Russian roots - in other words, Volga German roots. And on my arrival in the USSR, while I was in Moscow, I discussed with then Ambassador Walter Stoessel the advisability of sort of seeking out or searching out my roots. He was very encouraging, but I soon discovered that the ancestral villages were in off-limits areas near the city of Seratov on the Volga, so I essentially gave up the possibility of trying to look into that. However, in the spring of 1977, a colleague of mine in the West German consulate approached me and said that a person by the name of Geis had visited the consulate and had asked about me. I got goose bumps. I wasn't sure, was this a KGB setup, or was it a real encounter with the past? So I invited Viktor Geis to come to see me at my apartment. He had read of my name in copies of the Leningrad newspaper. His trucking co-op had a relationship with a co-op in Leningrad, and therefore he saw the Leningrad papers. And he turned out to be a very nice, simple man about my age, a truck driver. His family, which was of course German ethnically and had suffered during the war - they had been sent, deported, as many Germans were, to Central Asia, where Viktor was born - but then they had been allowed to return at a later date, and they now lived in the area that my family came from on the Volga. Although I later did some research at home, during home leave, I was never able to find any direct ties to Viktor. In fact, our grandparents were almost a generation apart in age. Viktor later on brought his family to Leningrad to meet me, and I ultimately decided that either he was real or he was one of the best actors in Russia. He was both naïve and very determined. I actually got my dissident artist friends to attempt to explain to him the potential damage to him of his contacts with me, but Viktor pressed on. Finally, as I was about to leave the USSR in 1979, he asked that I extend an invitation to him and his family to visit the U.S. - that is, to emigrate. I did this, and I also made arrangements for him to be received and assisted in the U.S. when and if he was able to leave. Unfortunately, we have never heard anything further from him at all.

In the summer of 1977, I returned as a bachelor to Leningrad. Kate, my daughter, was still with me while her mother established herself as a Pan Am employee in Moscow. I applied to the state agency which assisted the consular corps in Leningrad for a maid and a cook, and they sent over a buxom blonde to help me out. It turned out that she was lousy cook but she seemed to me to be the stereotype of what a KGB agent would find alluring. I was not allured, and I asked for a replacement. And this time they sent a good cook and a very nice married lady who helped me out. The KGB was all too obvious [Note: We have recently been intrigued to learn that the newly elected President of Russia, Vladimir Putin, was a KGB operative in Leningrad during the years we were there. Furthermore, he was involved in surveillance of Western diplomats! I guess if you must be spied on, why not by a future president!].

Q: Good for you.

GEIS: Our busy program continued with a documentary film director who called on me to discuss the prospects for a film on the Kirov's famous Vaganova Dance School, which had produced such luminaries as Anna Pavlova, Nureyev, Makarova, and Baryshnikov, among others. The result was an academy award winning film narrated by Princess Grace called The Children of Theater Street, where the school was located in Leningrad. Unfortunately, this fine film, which had been sanctioned by the authorities, was not acceptable to them ultimately in the final version, since it mentioned, albeit briefly, the great Kirov defectors. However, I had the good fortune that they sent to me a 16-millimeter copy of the film, and I was able to show it, once only, to the principal protagonist of the film, some of the major ballet people in Leningrad on a very quiet, private basis in my apartment one weekend. And so it was a very wonderful experience to be able to do that, but I'm sure now - I would hope, anyway - that that film is now being shown widely in Russia.

Jimmy Carter was now President, and with his emphasis on human rights policy, relations with the USSR cooled rapidly. We still had cultural presentations, but fewer. At that time, the Vice President's wife, Joan Mondale, visited, and as a result we were allowed to see the great Russian Museum's subterranean collection of the Russian avant garde artists, Kandinsky, Malevich, and Filonov among others. These people were not acceptable to the Russian authorities, whose standards, of course, were socialist realism for all art. At this time also, the wonderful Paul Taylor Dance Company visited Vilnius and Leningrad. I was their escort and became a great fan of this fine company. It was one of the first modern dance companies to visit the USSR. For some reason or other, because I once admitted to having attended the Baptist church in my youth, I became the "designated Baptist" at the consulate. So when noted Baptist senators, John Glenn and Sam Nunn, visited, I took them to visit the onion-domed church which had been turned over to the Evangelistic Baptist Christians in Leningrad. It was truly a memorable experience to see these two symbols of American democracy and achievement in space in this unusual setting. Although I'm not a believer, many of us in the consular community expressed our solidarity with the Russian Orthodox believers by attending Easter services and other such events. One really unforgettable event occurred when the consul general and I attended the funeral of the Archbishop of Leningrad and Novgorod. This sumptuous event, with its pomp and magnificent music, lasted some nine or 10 hours, during which we all stood and watched. I'll never forget that one. In 1979 the great blues singer B. B. King visited, and he was a great hit. He's one of the nicest people I ever met. During the four years of my stay in Leningrad, I had three local cultural assistants. One we were forced to let go because of alcoholism. A second, a very capable woman, became too useful to us, and the KGB pulled her out. So this was one of the crosses we had to bear with local employees in Russia. Shortly after I left the USSR - this was the summer of 1979 - I was once again misidentified in articles entitled "Mask" and "Sly Diversionists." I was alleged to be a spy [Note: In stark contrast to this Soviet misuse of the media was my experience with the American journalists resident in Moscow and in Leningrad, such as Chris Wren and David Shipler of The New York Times, Phil Caputo and Emil Sveilis of UPI. As Americans, we owe a lot to these talented analysts of the complexities of the Soviet Union, who labored under tough conditions for themselves and their families].

It had been an unforgettable experience with many ups and downs. I came away with a great affection for the voluble, romantic, and long-suffering Russian people. I would never have dreamed at that time that 10 years later the Berlin Wall would have fallen and the Soviet empire would begin to break up. I feel strongly that the seeds of all this were being planted during this time, which was the Brezhnev era, which would later be called by the Russians, the period of the Great Stagnation. It was called this during the period later on of the democratic Russia.

Toward the end of my Leningrad assignment, the new director of USIA, John Reinhardt, visited. He has been much criticized by agency officers as not sufficiently political and hard-information-oriented. In contrast, I liked him, approved strongly of his emphasis on two-way reciprocal communication with foreign cultures. In other words, the idea is that you're more effective as a communicator inasmuch as you get to know and involve yourself in the local culture, language, et cetera. Reinhardt called this the "second mandate," which, as I saw it, was something that most good agency officers did anyway in the course of business. Now it had official sanction, and Reinhardt also actually changed the name of USIA to the U.S. International Communication Agency. Maybe seeing in me a kindred spirit and in any case taking pity on me after the draining Soviet experience, Reinhardt gave me my first country PAO-ship. This was to the lovely country island Republic of Trinidad and Tobago. It would prove to be my most wonderful and my favorite assignment.

ARTHUR A. HARTMAN
Assistant Secretary of State, Bureau of European affairs
Washington, DC (1974-1978)

Ambassador Arthur Hartman was born in New York, New York in 1926. He received a bachelor's degree from Harvard University. His career in the Foreign Service included positions in France, Vietnam, and the United Kingdom (England), and an ambassadorship to the Soviet Union. This interview was conducted by Bill Miller on May 31, 1989.

HARTMAN: ... I stayed in EUR into the Carter administration and Cy Vance. I went with Cy to Moscow. I had, by the way, in the Kissinger period of course had been with him at all his meetings with the Soviets and at the summits of both Nixon and Ford.

Q: That was in the context of the allies.

HARTMAN: Well, it was in the context of actually negotiating with the Soviets; because we covered East Europe and the Soviet Union in European affairs.

Q: You had as a task the problem of informing the allies about what was going on?

HARTMAN: Informing the allies and working with them in certain cases on some of the negotiations, but also with the Soviets on all of the bilateral negotiations, and on the preparations on the Helsinki meeting for example; of settling the final issues on that.

Q: So you met the top Soviet leadership in that context?

HARTMAN: Yes, that's really my first exposure to the modern top leadership.

Q: How did it strike you? You had seen the great men of Europe, that post-war generation. What did the Soviet leadership look like to you upon close examination?

HARTMAN: Right out of primitive society, it was incredible. I mean to go into the Kremlin being led by these goose-stepping soldiers into the office where Brezhnev was, and the formality of the meetings, and the lectures from Gromyko and occasional bits of humor. Henry was great at pulling that out of people and Brezhnev in a sense used to show off for him, so we got more of that perhaps than was normal.

The whole primitive nature of that society, and of course the backwardness of the city. We did get to see the Far East under Ford which not many other people have, although they are now beginning to talk about opening up Vladivostok.

Q: Well that group of Bolsheviks, you saw the last of the Bolsheviks with Brezhnev and the group around him?

HARTMAN: I'm not sure it's the last of the dedicated Orthodox Communists, but I think you are right, the last of the Bolsheviks.

Q: With all of the shaping influences that seemed to happen for them. Was it a sense of ideas that had frozen in concrete?

HARTMAN: No, not at all because they were playing the game and this was the time when rather serious negotiations were going on in arms control. I arrived on the scene just after SALT-1 really because that was done while Henry was still over in the White House. The beginnings of, a framework for SALT-2, carrying out some of these agreements; the Helsinki negotiations, the emphasis on Human Rights.

Q: You were beginning to see quite a bit of Dobrynin?

HARTMAN: Yes, yes although as Assistant Secretary he was not fond of coming to see me. He did on a number of occasions but he had a special relationship with Henry and he wanted to keep it that way. He was treated very favorably and when I finally got assigned to Moscow, I luckily got an administration that had changed that and I was able to insist on a little more reciprocity for the poor man who was Ambassador in Moscow.

Q: Where was Brezhnev's office in the Kremlin?

HARTMAN: In the central building, the Council of Ministers building it's a sort of triangular building and it was up on. I remember they always had a small elevator so Kissinger and one other or two other people plus the General who was leading us could get in the elevator. The rest of us would have to dash up these two very long flights of stairs to be up at the room where we left our coats and be able to walk in with Kissinger when he walked into Brezhnev's office.

Q: When you were Assistant Secretary and working with Henry on the negotiations, was this the period when you mastered the intricacies of arms control, force levels, etc?

HARTMAN: Well I was never the principle person. Bill Highland, Sonnenfeldt, people like some of these very bright arms control people that we've had in the past worked on the detailed negotiations obviously with very close linkage to the negotiators themselves. I was sort of peripheral, but in on the discussions and also talking about them at my level with other people, and publicly presenting the results, and publicly presenting the arguments, and talking to the allies about it.

Q: Who from that period on the Soviet side continued on into your tenure as Ambassador?

HARTMAN: Well, Gromyko. I remember one of my last calls as I left Moscow was on the President of the country who was now Gromyko. Dobrynin obviously and he has now come back to Moscow and I used to see a lot of him there but in the Central Committee of the Communist Party. The man who was Dobrynin's Deputy, Korniyenko who was the Principal U.S. Desk Officer, and a very difficult individual to deal with, but one who I have come to respect and like over the years. He was very bright and he knows his stuff, although he tends to be very old fashioned in the way he negotiates. Varansoff who is now back there as the Deputy Minister and Principal Arms Control Negotiator was in the Embassy in Washington. I then knew him when I became the Ambassador in France, I saw him once when he was ambassador in India; but he is clearly of the new breed and very much in the sort of Dobrynin model and not in the old Korniyenko or Gromyko model.

Q: How did the assignment to Paris take place?

HARTMAN: Well, I went with Cy Vance to Moscow in March 1977. I was not enthusiastic about the position he was taking there. Les Geld was on that team along with a number of other people. I felt at the time, and we were not told much about the position until we got on the plane. This was one of the interesting things at the time because they were anxious to prevent leaks and so there was a little meeting at the White House and then we were all on a plane, and it was only at that point that I along with Les Geld and the others who were working even more directly on the policy were informed. I had the feeling that it was such a change from the previous position and that the Soviets were unprepared, and that we were going to run into heavy seas. Therefore it might have been better to continue with the old just to try and get that nailed down before going onto something else. Well we got blasted out of the water by Gromyko and I had a feeling that Cy was not totally behind what he was doing. I mean he was kind of ordered to do that out of a meeting that took place with Sprague and others. It was not a good show, but I am fond of pointing out to my Soviet friends that they shot out of the water the position that they took them almost ten years to come around to again, and now accuse us of not giving enough support to: namely deep cuts in strategic forces. So, the objective I had no difficulty with. I think deep cuts was a hell of a lot better than just trying to put caps on the programs that both sides had planned to do in any case. It took us along time to get back to that. With the Soviets it seems to me that you have to have a certain amount of continuity, at least you used to, maybe now you don't. We didn't have it at that point. In any case shortly after that time Cy called me in. I don't know if he was still uncomfortable with me being in EUR and sort of reminding him of old positions or what, anyway he said "How would you like to go to France?" I said "Gee I'd be delighted!"

THOMAS W. SIMONS JR.
Political Officer
Moscow (1975-1977)

Ambassador Simons was born in Minnesota and raised primarily in the countries of his father's Foreign Service assignments and in the Washington, DC area. He received his education at Yale and Harvard Universities and at the Hoover Institute at Stanford University. He also pursued studies in Europe. Entering the Foreign Service in 1963, Mr. Simons had several tours of duty at the State Department in Washington, DC and at the White House, dealing primarily with Foreign Trade and East European affairs. His foreign posts include Warsaw, Moscow, Bucharest and London. He served as United States Ambassador to Poland from 1993 to 1995 and as Ambassador to Pakistan from 1996 to 1998. Ambassador Simons was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2004.

Q: Well then, you left Policy Planning when?

SIMONS: I left in January of 1975 and started taking Russian here at FSI (the Foreign Service Institute, now NFATC) with my wife. It was a very unsatisfactory learning experience. I've learned three languages here, and two of them were wonderful and Russian was not.

Q: Why not?

SIMONS: Well, we had a brilliant teacher whom many people liked, but who didn't like me, and who didn't like my wife, who had to leave early in the day -- we had two small children -- early every day. She didn't like spouses anyway, and for both of us our unsightliness was compounded by the strong Polish accent that we started learning Russian with; some Russians will claim they find it charming, but they really don't. It took us most of our tour in Moscow actually to scrub the Polish accent out of our Russian. Anyway Madame de la Cruz was angry at me, short-tempered. I mean we just did it for six months, then we had to go out to post. So that was the first half of 1975.

Then we went to Moscow and arrived the day of the signature of the Helsinki Final Act. Gerald Ford signed in Helsinki, and he was savagely criticized by the right wing of the Republican Party for selling out. That was an election issue the next year in the primary against Ronald Reagan. But anyway there we were in Moscow. The way I got to Moscow took some Foreign Service conniving. There I was in Policy Planning in '74 without much of a job. I mean I've described the things I did, which were fine, but it was not particularly a full time job. And if you start in Eastern Europe in the Foreign Service in that day and age, and if you like Eastern Europe, you probably should be smart enough to realize that you can't build a career just on Eastern Europe. You have to attach it either to Germany, as many people did, or to the Soviet Union. In other words you had the same dilemma as Eastern Europe itself, you can't go forward on your own, you sort of come down to being somebody's client. For me the opportunity opened up because Walter Stoessel, who had been my Ambassador in Warsaw and who liked me and who had then came back as Assistant Secretary for European Affairs in those early years, was going to Moscow. It was very hard for somebody like me who had not been there before to get a job in Moscow at what had become my rank, because Jack Matlock was the Director for Soviet Affairs and was adamant that only people who had been there as junior officers should go back at what was then Class Three level. Warren Zimmerman had been an exception. He had taken the job as Chief of External Reporting in the Political Section, the head of the sub-unit that reported on Soviet foreign policy, even though he had also not been there. He had a Yugoslav background as I had a Polish background. So what I did was go to Stoessel through Joan Clark, who was Director of Personnel at that time in EUR, and I got him to ask for me; so that's how I got to Moscow in the summer of '75.

Q: So after Russian training you went to Moscow from when to when?

SIMONS: I went to Moscow from August of 1975 to February of 1977, so just 18 months.

Q: What was your job?

SIMONS: I was Chief of the External Reporting sub-unit in the Political Section. The section had about 10 people under a Counselor, divided into two units, one for internal reporting, domestic politics, and one for external reporting, foreign policy. Almost everyone who served in those units in that era later became an ambassador.

Q: Who was the head of the section?

SIMONS: Marshall Brement was the Political Counselor. Jack Matlock became the DCM (Deputy Chief of Mission), and Walter Stoessel was there as Ambassador. Matlock was DCM and later Ambassador. Marshall Brement, who was later Ambassador to Iceland having been Jeane Kirkpatrick's deputy at the UN (United Nations) for a while, was the Political Counselor with his wonderful new wife. He had been the Public Affairs Counselor in Saigon and had met there a journalist from Time or Newsweek named Pamela something and married her. They were there as kind of newlyweds. He had served there before. He was a China expert, a very, very bright man, a very fluent man, not a particularly active man, I should say, but maybe if you're a newlywed that happens.

Q: The External unit, who was in it?

SIMONS: I was the chief of External, and I tended to do Europe and what there was of Eastern Europe. Darryl Johnson, who is currently Ambassador to Thailand, was the China person and did Asia. The Middle East when I came was Jim Collins, who later became Ambassador to Russia. There was Dick Miles who is currently retiring from his fourth ambassadorship - he is now Ambassador to Georgia - and he came in to do Africa. I forget who did Latin America, I think maybe Miles did. Mike Joyce and then Ted McNamara did arms control. Anyway there were five of us. Similarly, in the Internal section you had Joe Presel who did dissidents. The head of it was Dick Combs who later became my deputy on the Soviet desk and then Art Hartman's DCM in Moscow.

It was a group of really very talented people. It was a joy to be there. Stu, this was the détente plateau. In other words the breakthroughs had been made, but they had opened doors in Moscow. You could call up and get appointments to see very interesting people and have lunch with people. At the same time not much was going on in relations, because the Soviets were starting to wait for the 1976 elections. They were watching. You know Nixon had resigned. You had Ford as sort of an interim president although he was going to run. But it was not a time for big bold negotiations. The last effort to do that was in February of 1976 when Kissinger made his last visit to Moscow to negotiate on SALT II. After he had left, the record later showed, Donald Rumsfeld as Secretary of Defense, at the time with political ambitions, had changed Kissinger's instructions, had just taken the guts out of Kissinger's instructions, so he was left there in Moscow high and dry sort of begging the Soviets for a gesture. I had a 104-degree fever for that visit and got up at four every morning to read and summarize the Soviet press for the party. But I did get to go with a fever like that to the lunch that Kissinger gave for Gromyko at Spaso House, and I can remember walking in with Bill Hyland who was a confidant of Kissinger's and having him say, "There's no one left in our government who has a sense of the national interest." So that was kind of the end of détente, for the time being at least, until through to the election. But for someone like me who was new to the Soviet Union -- I mean I knew a lot about it of course but was new to actually being there and dealing in Russian with the Soviets -- it was a wonderful time to be there, because the doors were open but I wasn't required to do things where I could stumble. It was a great learning assignment.

Q: Well here you are, I mean you had served in Poland so you got a feel for a socialist country and how it operated. Do a little compare-and-contrast when you went to the Soviet Union? What you were seeing about how things worked, didn't work and all that.

SIMONS: Well, I mean the Soviet Union was much more powerful and self-aware as a great power and much more monolithic because of the system. It was more concerned with discipline, it was more secretive, it was more frightening. People were more frightened. You got the sense of fear. It was also less developed. We travelled around the country as much as we could, and actually loved it and liked Russians, but there was kind of fearfulness about it you didn't have in Poland. It was more of a police state and more backward; there was less availability of goods and services. But Peggy and I are not people who care much about creature comforts so that didn't bother us very much. We thought they were a great and talented people living under a police regime that was chastened and subdued, but still a police regime.

Q: Were you able to get out and sample the Russian soul or anything? In other words, were there any places where you could go take a look and see what was going on?

SIMONS: From time to time you were able to do that when you travelled. Well, we had friends in Moscow. We had friends who were on the fringes of the diplomatic colony. They were mainly artists. Very many of them were kind of black-sheep children of senior officials, so that they would be sort of punished but only up to a point. I mean we had a dear friend who sort of drank himself to death while we were there, who was a very late son of the great Soviet novelist Konstantin Paustovsky, with his young wife and their child. He was an artist, not a very good artist; but he'd been sent out to Kyrgyzstan to dry out at a certain point -- you know, the end of the world -- but then he'd been let back and was still allowed, still given permission to see people like us. You know you go to their parties and sort of drink with them, and you assumed that there was a police presence, but you could still make friends with them.

I remember we gave a party in our apartment there and all these artists came and we were playing tapes of Vladimir Vysotsky, the great folk singer and cabaret singer, and people were smoking marijuana cigarettes in our little diplomatic apartment there. The next week Jacques Amalric, who was the correspondent for Le Monde -- he later became editor-in-chief of Le Monde in Paris -- was having lunch with me in the American Embassy cafeteria, and he said, "You know my nanny," i.e. the Soviet journalist who was assigned to cover him, "my nanny asks me why people are smoking pot in Tom Simons' apartment." So I said, "Well, let me see what I can do about that." So I went to a couple of these artists and I said, "If I ever hear about this again, none of you will ever sell a painting to a diplomat again." Of course it was a threat that I had no possible way of making good on, but I never heard anything again. The police were kind of all around, but you could still make friends.

You got more insights by travelling, because you didn't always have a policeman in your carriage. I can remember we were travelling in the northwest, Pskov and Novgorod, and there was a man there in our compartment who had been off trying to sell some Asiatic plaster casts that he made himself at home to some store. It turned out he was a magician, an amateur magician, son of a Polish aristocrat who lived over on the Estonian border in a town where one of Russia's greatest monasteries is, Pechory, and he said, "Come see us." I said, "Okay, well maybe we will." So when we were in Pskov and we finished sightseeing, we went down to the taxi bank and asked the taxi guy, "Can you take us to Pechory?" He said, "Sure." So we got in and we were not being followed. We looked this guy up, spent the night with him, went to the monastery. His little daughter came out in her tutu and did little magic tricks for us, and we talked to them about what it was like to grow up in a place like that. He is actually of Polish descent. So you could sort of get insights. We didn't press people to hate the regime. You just had more or less normal social interchanges and you do get some feel for what the country was like. It was a country that was not very dynamic. It had reached a certain level of prosperity. People were proud that Russia was respected in the world. They didn't much like living under a police regime, but that was the way things were and they were getting three squares a day, and it was better than before. So it was that kind of a place.

Q: Well, did you sort of -- you and the other officers -- realize that you were in a state of stasis or something like this? Often you don't know that until after you are away from it.

SIMONS: I think so. I think we did. The only serious negotiation that was going on was something on Peaceful Nuclear Explosions where Stoessel was the chief of our delegation. It was something that came out of those agreements in '72. I think we actually reached some kind of conclusion on that, but that maybe it was never ratified. But you know it went at a fairly stately pace, and you knew there was no umph. Then I was the control officer again for Governor Harriman when he came out in the summer of '76 on behalf of candidate Jimmy Carter to kind of assure the Soviet leadership that Carter wouldn't break any crockery, so that they didn't have to worry about a Democratic victory even though they had been very attached by détente to the Republican Administration. The Soviets tended to prefer the devil they knew. It's also true that Harriman later felt betrayed by Carter, because after he won Carter did start breaking a lot of crockery by writing letters to Sakharov and stuff like that. Yeah, I think people felt that not much was happening, but they enjoyed being there. They enjoyed the kind of access to the Soviet system that détente had opened up for us.

Q: Well, what about the Helsinki Accords, and particularly Basket Three that dealt with human rights, movement of people and the like, that eventually became a wedge that changed quite a bit of things in Eastern Europe and in the Soviet Union? But at that time was that seen as anything?

SIMONS: It was seen as a good small thing. In other words the day I got there Izvestiya, the government paper, the so-called government paper, published the entire text of the Helsinki Final Act. That was one of our requirements and that was great. Then you knew because you were in touch with dissidents. I knew most of the major dissidents through Joe Presel, who was the "dissident officer" back then.

Q: Whom I'm interviewing now.

SIMONS: That's great. He would kind of stagger in in the morning, red-eyed and hung over from his nights with the dissidents, and Mac Toon didn't like that when Toon became his Ambassador, but he'll tell you about that himself. The dissidents began to use the Helsinki Final Act as their cover for the kinds of objections and dissent that they were doing in Soviet society. I remember writing the cable, the analytical cable from Moscow when the Helsinki Final Act was signed, and I remember writing that the Soviets signed the Helsinki Final Act "with clear, dry eyes." They didn't expect whatever changes it was going to make in the way they operated were going to be intolerable to them, or were going to threaten the system; otherwise they wouldn't have signed it.

Q: Well basically what they got was stabilization of the borders.

SIMONS: That's right, and of the whole political status quo in Europe.

Q: Yeah.

SIMONS: I mean that was useful to them, but then they immediately went charging on the theme of following up on military détente with political detente. Then they of course had wanted the economic benefits too, and that was what Jackson and the Jackson-Vanik Amendment kind of brought to a screeching halt. If you remember, Helmut Sonnenfeldt was going to be an Under Secretary over in the Department of Commerce or the Treasury kind of running a vast expansion of U.S.-Soviet economic relations, and he couldn't get himself confirmed, and that just never happened. So I think the Soviets were disappointed, but I don't think they were afraid in any way. They thought they could control whatever effects Helsinki had. I think in the end there is something to it. They had trouble in Eastern Europe, but in the Soviet Union they managed to control their dissidents until the very end.

Q: Looking at their external affairs, were any other countries, you know Romania or Hungary or Poland or anything, or France or Germany, were things happening during this period?

SIMONS: We're talking about 1976, and 1976 of course was the death of Mao in China, a very important event, and we would report on that. It was very early days, it was very hard to tell. I think it meant a lot in the end but it was hard to tell then.

Q: Yeah, it was still too soon.

SIMONS: Yeah, very hard to tell what the impact of that would be. You had major struggles in Africa, which were a major issue in relations with the Soviets, because you had the decolonization of Portuguese Africa and Cuban troops in Angola and in Ethiopia I think, or in the Horn of Africa. That was a major issue in our relations with the Soviets. Kissinger kept warning them that you're not going to be able to sustain détente if you keep doing these things in the Third World that make it look as if you are carrying the struggle forward there. I remember talking to my best friend in the Soviet establishment, Yuriy Gankovskiy. He was an Afghanistan expert whose father had been shot in 1937, and he had rehabilitated himself by leading 50 infantry charges in World War II and surviving, and then he became a scholar of Asia because he couldn't get any closer to the centers of power. But he was a great Afghan expert, and became a great advisor later during their Afghanistan war. I remember saying to him, "You know, Yuriy Vladimirovich, we learned a lesson in Vietnam, but if you keep doing what you're doing in Africa we can unlearn it. You're doing well in the world and now is the time for statesmanship and your leadership is old." He looked at me and he said, "My dear Tom, I wish you for yourself what you're recommending for them, but think of it this way: they have no more appetite, they don't care about women, all they care about at their age is keeping power." So that was part of the Soviet stasis as well as the kind of adventurism in the Third World which we saw, because we covered the foreign affairs parts and the Internal section covered the internal affairs part of the 25th Party Congress, which was I think in February of '76. There you could see on stage these African revolutionaries shouting from the podium about how the world correlation of forces was shifting and they were the vanguard of socialism. And we saw Mikhail Suslov, who was the ideological guy on the Politburo, leaping out of his chair and pulling his translation plug out of his ear in his enthusiasm for this kind of thing. So they really had something going with national liberation movements, and it was dangerous to our relationship. So that was an element of things. But we were just watching that; we weren't doing anything.

Q: I'm not sure, when you were there what was the situation in Portugal? Was it still up in the air?

SIMONS: Portugal was still dicey.

Q: I mean I've talked to Frank Carlucci and others who were involved, a very important thing in that time. but what about the view from Moscow of that situation?

SIMONS: Well, I can remember Marshall Brement asking me. He had been on a vacation in the Iberian Peninsula and he came back and said, "Tom, we've got to write a cable on Spain and Portugal." I said, "Well, Marshall, we don't know anything about what the Soviet view is. Let me go see somebody; let me talk to somebody about what the Soviet view is of Spain." He said, "No, no, we've got to get it out right away." So I wrote it off the top of my head just from kind of reading the newspapers. So we did report on it. Our reporting was that if Spain and Portugal kind of go in a socialist direction the Soviets will be happy, but they're not promoting revolution in NATO's backyard. I think that was kind of where we saw it. So for them it was really sort of Africa, with China on the horizon, but the U.S. was the big apple. You know relations with the United States and the strategic equation were really sort of the main thing for them. That went cold after that visit by Kissinger early in '76. I was struck years later when the George W. Bush administration came to power and Rumsfeld was appointed Secretary of Defense again, and Kissinger was asked to comment. I read in the paper that he said, "I think it's a wonderful appointment because now he has no higher political ambitions;" because it was that that led him to undercut Kissinger there in early '76.

Q: Were we looking at that time at the Politburo, and as your Russian friend was saying, were we seeing these guys as a geriatric adventurous group? Often when people get older they get more cautious.

SIMONS: Well, we were seeing the people who were on it as geriatric, as aging, devoted to stability. I remember going to see Roy Medvedev, who was sort of a Marxist dissident. I mean he was from the apparatus. He was the one who wrote Let History Judge, anti-Stalinist things. But we had access to major intellectuals like that. I remember him saying to me, "Brezhnev is the best you are ever going to get, because he doesn't want trouble." Well, the truth is he didn't want trouble in relations with us, or in all the other major things, I mean in Europe or even with China. But I think that the revolutionary outlet was the national liberation movements.

But they also thought things were going their way, so they felt that they were just doing not much. We thought that they were going great guns, paying for the Cuban troops in Africa and the like, and that this was very adventurist. I think they just thought they were supporting national liberation as the way history was going. It turned out history wasn't going that way, and what they were doing was going to help to reverse that when Ronald Reagan came to power. It's just my feeling -- it's a theory that I've developed recently in trying to teach this period at Stanford -- that the establishments of both countries were forced toward stabilization of the international situation, but they were queasy about the loss of ardor and fidelity to principles, the national political principles, that this involved. In this country it took the form of fear of a sellout to Communism, and the way we kept our principles intact was to promote human rights. In the Soviet Union it was fear of a sellout of revolutionary ardor for proletarian revolution, and the way they kept their principles and consciousness intact was support for national liberation. They wanted to keep it kind of separate. I can remember during the '80s, working this brief from Washington, how hard they tried to say, we can talk about bilateral relations, we can talk about arms control, but regional crises are out of bounds. They are not a proper subject for conversation between the U.S. and the Soviet Union. We're merely supporting the forces of history that are out there. So they tried to put up a firebreak and isolate these things from each other, and of course we wouldn't let this happen, beginning also with Carter, beginning with Afghanistan.

Q: Yeah, well, I was going to say -- this is after your time there -- but this movement with Afghanistan was almost the beginning of the end. It was a little bit like the Athenians heading for Syracuse or something like that.

SIMONS: But that came at the end of the Carter Administration, which was a time when I was no longer in it; I was in Romania and then in London. I think it perplexed them. They couldn't figure the Americans out. We looked just so confused and incompetent that by the time they really felt under pressure in Afghanistan, they thought they were going to be losing a country that was near-socialist and a neighbor, and that they had to do something desperate, so they tried to do a Czechoslovakia. By that time I think they had kind of written off the Carter Administration, after the Cuban brigade incident, and after seeing how hard it was to get to the end of the road on SALT II which had basically been negotiated by Ford at Vladivostok in November of 1974. It took four years to turn it into an agreement. So I think they had kind of washed their hands of the Carter Administration and felt that whatever its reaction they still had to do what they had to do in Afghanistan. During my time, in '75 looking at Africa, '75 and '76 -- and the fall of Saigon was in April I think wasn't it -?

Q: April of '75.

SIMONS: ...in my time there they felt that things were going their way without much effort from them. Later on I think they thought that Afghanistan was more drastic.

Q: How was our Bicentennial, July '76, how was that celebrated in Moscow?

SIMONS: We had a party in Spaso House, and Gromyko came, and I can remember talking to the America desk officer in the Central Committee International Affairs Department, I forget his name. He had a gold tooth, he was very Soviet, old-fashioned Soviet, and he had written an editorial that day in Pravda about the American Communist Party, with its respected leader Gus Hall, as the vanguard of the American working class. I don't think I asked him whether he really believed that or not.

Q: You know the American Communist Party is a play thing of intellectuals and...

SIMONS: ...and of the FBI (Federal Bureau of Investigation).

Q: I think the FBI supported it.

SIMONS: Well, I think probably the majority of the Central Committee were FBI. Anyway we didn't know at that time about Operation Venona, or I didn't until much later, where we were tapping their files or we'd broken their code. But that was just the sign of the stodginess of the Soviet sort of thing. Then we had a very moving time at the American Embassy dacha outside Moscow, and I remember it especially because I was Master of Ceremonies, everybody else was on vacation. That was 200 years of the United States in a setting like that, sort of isolated and in kind of hostile territory. It made you appreciate everything we are. I should recount another aspect that ran like a thread through that tour in Moscow, which was the microwave crisis that broke during the time I was there. The Ambassador and DCM had kept it quiet while Kissinger, I think, but certainly the Administration had pressed the Soviets to stop it, to stop microwaving our Embassy. They had refused to do so, so at that point we had to break it to the staff. It caused a lot of fear and unhappiness, especially I remember Carol Niles, Tom Niles' wife, standing up in back and she's from Kentucky like him, I think, and had this rich sort of border-state accent, wailing "I conceived a CHI-ULD in this Embassy." So there was fear and I think there were lawsuits, there were later lawsuits.

Q: Oh yeah. Well, we didn't play that very well. This is the time when it was sort of "what you don't know won't hurt you."

SIMONS: It was, there was more of a stiff upper lip kind of thing, but we did break it, and we did sort of try to make a dialogue about it, getting it out and treating people who had been subject to it.

Q: Was there every any thought of saying, "Look, Soviets, if you want to play this game we're shutting our embassy down."

SIMONS: I don't think so, I don't think there was. I think that would have been the thought for Jesse Helms, but not for the Administration.

Q: But I mean the thing was serious enough.

SIMONS: Well, I think it is probably true. I mean Mrs. Stoessel won't say so, but in the end it probably killed Walter Stoessel, because he died of leukemia years later. Back then he had to go out and get treatment; he was bright red. It turned out that the two waves of microwaves crossed in his office. I don't think that was purposeful, I think they were trying to get at our machinery on the floor above. But if you're living through that it's hard to be sunny about Soviet society or the people that you are up against.

Q: Did you ever run across or deal with, or was he even a figure then, Arbatov?

SIMONS: Oh yeah, we dealt with him.

Q: This was an American-Canadian institute or something?

SIMONS: Yeah, Georgy Arbatov was head of the USA and Canada Institute of the Academy of Sciences, which was an institute that we considered a force for good and Lord knows he told us that he was a force for good. He had worked his way up, and he had a lot of expertise in the Institute. He was one of our regular contacts partly because people spoke wonderful English there. But even if they didn't they were knowledgeable and they had license to be with us so that was useful. Arbatov had gotten himself in the détente years into a position of I think quite a trusted advisor of the leadership on U.S. affairs. He attempted to continue that, but by the same token he was sort of ground down in the decline of détente, and had to get sort of nastier and nastier about exclusive U.S. responsibility for the decline of détente; so he got more and more orthodox as time went on. But at that time, no, he was a valued person who was considered a force for good.

Q: How about the art of Kremlinology, of reading the papers? Had that matured or was that almost a thing of the past?

SIMONS: No, no, we could still do it, it had matured too. Dick Combs was an expert at it, the head of the Internal section; for the Party Congress he predicted by the placement of people that there would be these departures and that these people we in trouble. But it only takes you so far. It was a very solidary leadership and very secretive.

Q: Well, from a practical point of view up to a certain point, you know, one of the great coups I'm sure in the political field was who was going to replace whom; did it make any difference? I mean until Gorbachev came along, but up to that point, looking back on it.

SIMONS: I think it did because it took until 1972 for Brezhnev to consolidate his position. I think he had to fire the Ukrainian Party chief who was the opponent of what they were trying to do with the United States, I forget the man's name, but he had been sent in there to quash Ukrainian nationalism, and they had to fire him for Brezhnev to reach the ascendancy that he reached in 1972, and it took that for us to be able to proceed with détente, with the treaties that we negotiated and signed, with the whole skein of cooperative agreements that were put in place. So Kremlinology was important then. Once Brezhnev was consolidated, his position was pretty good. I remember Stoessel presented his credentials to Podgorny and I got to go, or Toon did later on and I got to go to that, got my picture taken. No, it was not so important between Brezhnev's consolidation in 1972 and the really serious beginnings of Brezhnev's decline in the late '70s. So in my time it was not terribly important. I mean the party congress, the 25th Party Congress that I covered, was a very staged affair; like the Democratic Party convention next week, it was going to be a celebration of the status quo. It's going to be a celebration of Kerry in this case. No, at that time Kremlinology was not essential, but later on and earlier it was. So it was a skill that kind of needed to be kept up.

Q: Did you get any feeling -- we talked about this before -- by the time you left, that you might say that maybe the greatest analytical failure was not realizing how weak the Soviet Union was in many of the essentials, particularly its economy and the ethnic divisions; but was this apparent to anybody there? Were you thinking of the thousand-year Reich and the thousand-year Soviet Union?

SIMONS: The way that played out for us there was that it was more difficult for us than for other Americans to see the Soviet Union as really a dynamic threat to the United States. Now that didn't mean that we knew the economy was a third the size of ours, and I mentioned earlier in these interviews they were a very powerful military force, and that tended to skew judgments. But watching the Soviet economy work, the civilian economy, I mean even then it's a dual economy, with an efficient military sector and inefficient civilian sector. There were some aspects of that, sort of like Indonesia under the Dutch: you know, the plantation economy and then the native economy. It was very hard for us to see the Soviet Union overwhelming us or kind of overtaking us. I think that put us on one side of the argument about how to deal with the Soviet Union. I think most of the people that served there feel, you know, "steady as you go, treat them like adults, don't pamper them." You got a basic confidence that the United States is able to deal with whatever threat the Soviet Union poses to us. We certainly didn't feel that they were ideologically a threat. It was hard for us to see how they were examples to the rest of the world in anything but the military side. In other words, it was sort of the East European dilemma after 1968. Of course in our country there were people who for a whole variety of reasons that I think are just being researched were very afraid of the Soviet Union and really felt it was an up-and-coming threat, the thousand-year Reich as you put it.

Q: This is tape 4, side 1, with Tom Simons.

SIMONS: I mean I'll just tell two personal anecdotes. We put our daughter in a Soviet school, a Special School focused on English, and it was a wonderful experience. Once we got her in -- they didn't want to take her, we sort of had to lean on UPDK, the diplomatic administration, to get her in -- but once she was in she was treated like a queen. She was seven at the time. She learned Russian, wonderful Russian, by Christmas. We were treated just as parents. In other words we were called over when she had disciplinary problems, we were called over for the little festivities that take place on various occasions -- when you finish the first reading book all the parents are called -- things of that sort. And just being a parent it occurred to me, first, that it is a collective experience, because all the children are beloved by their teachers, and that allows the teachers to be draconian in terms of intellectual performance. It is sort of different from us where everybody is supposed to be at the top intellectually. That's not true there. But on the other hand everybody there knows that they are valued as a human being. It's a great virtue of the Soviet school. The other thing was that going to these little performances, like finishing the first book, I remember once saying to myself, with a shock of recognition, that this was like being in first grade in St. Paul, Minnesota, during the War, because three things were being celebrated there too: first, learning; second, upward social mobility -- learning will get you ahead; and third, by learning you serve the country. In other words that learning was going to make our lives better and serve the country. There is a lot of patriotism sort of built in. So you have that about the Soviets. Again, you know, we ended up sort of respecting a lot of things about the Soviet system but not being afraid of them.

Then at the very last, I think the Soviet administration kind of liked me. They thought I was constructive because we liked to go out and visit old churches, my wife and I, around the Moscow area but elsewhere too. We had been trying to get to a church in a place called Pereslavl-Zalessky almost ever since we had arrived, and we had always been refused permission by whatever route we put in for "for reasons of a temporary nature." Whatever route we put in for, whether we were coming from Vladimir-Suzdal or coming from Yaroslavl to get to this place in the middle of the Golden Circle, as it is called, the old cities around Moscow or northeast of Moscow, we were turned down. Then in January of 1977, just before we were leaving, with the temperature at 40 below -- and 40 below is where Fahrenheit and Centigrade cross -- we put in one last time, we were leaving in two weeks and we put in this last time to go by train, and they gave us permission. The train left Moscow at 14 minutes after midnight and got in at 5+ in the morning to this little town, and it came back the next night at midnight plus and got into Moscow at 5 a.m. plus. So we got into this town. I remember 40 below. Your spit froze before it hit the ground; you could not spend more than half an hour outside. You had to go into a local cafeteria, and it was a meatless day and when we went in there for lunch we were overwhelmed by police spies asking us if we were interested in military secrets. It was a town where time had stopped. The church was beautiful, by the way; it was a 14th century church with Persian motifs on the walls, a mystery how they got up there, lovely. But you felt the quietness of Russian country life; the shopping center, you know the place where they sold the household goods and stuff of that sort, must have been built in brick in 1880, and hadn't changed. Women were still washing clothes by cutting holes through the ice in that place. (We also discovered why it was so hard to get to: we went to a Hindi movie in the afternoon to get out of the cold, and were surrounded by skinheads, first-year soldiers; it was a training area for the Soviet Army.) You really got the feeling, partly of a world at peace (aside from the police spy) but also of a world that was not very dynamic. Again, why would our country, such a dynamic country, be threatened by this unless they sort of went crazy with their weapons? I think that that was sort of it.

Q: That was the great fear.

SIMONS: That was the nightmare. I never had any doubt myself that our country, if we got our own act together, could easily deal with the Soviet threat.

WILLIAM VEALE
Soviet Union Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1975-1977)

Mr. Veale was born in Washington, D.C. into a US military family and was raised primarily at Army posts in the US and abroad. Entering the military after graduating from Georgetown University, he served with the US Army until joining the Foreign Service in 1971. Throughout his career Mr. Veale dealt primarily with Political/Military and Disarmament affairs, serving both in the Department of State and the Department of Defense. Among his assignments, Mr. Veale was posted to Strasbourg, Berlin and Rangoon. He also taught in the Political Science department at the US Air Force Academy. Mr. Veale was interviewed by Thomas Dunnigan in 2000.

Q: After several years there you were transferred back to Washington and given an assignment on the Soviet desk. Who was your chief on that assignment?

VEALE: The Soviet Desk was part of the European Bureau (EUR/SOV) whose Assistant Secretary was Art Hartman. The EUR/SOV Office Director was Mark Garrison and there were three Deputy Directors. By the fall of 1976 they were Robert Barry, James Wilkinson (Exchanges), and William Edgar (Economic Affairs). But Sol Polansky was my first boss and the second was Wilkinson.. This period I found absolutely fascinating because what Kissinger was trying to do at this point – this was 1975-77 – was build a web of interdependence with various parts of the Soviet system. He constructed a series of intergovernmental agreements that would engage new and untouched parts of the Soviet system. The mother of these agreements was a science and technology agreement, which was basically spurred by the science advisory to the president. It spawned a series of agency types of agreements, with 11 in all, running from space, housing, agriculture, environment, transportation, to energy. The office I was in, on the Soviet desk, was charged with shepharding these. There was also a supplemental aspect of individual exchanges, which was run through the National Academy of Sciences.

I was required to write periodically reports aimed at gauging the progress. The controversial issue at that time was whether or not we were simply opening up our own society to Soviet spying, or were we getting benefits from it.

Q: Tit for tat

Towards the end of that assignment I was asked to do a cost benefits study for the NSC (National Security Council) staff. This was a very laborious project. Under each agreement there were various projects and there were project leaders for each one, so we were getting input from all these people and trying to decide what were the benefits that were flowing to the U.S. and what were the costs involved in maintaining these benefits. The study, I think, was fairly controversial because although it looked as though we were getting remarkable access into the Soviet system, the nature of the benefits that were flowing our way were very intangible and of a calculus that required more time then we were using to look at. So, this was potentially politically controversial and basically the NSC sat on the study and did not want it to see the light of day where it would become politically controversial.

Q: So, it didn't get to Congress?

VEALE: It didn't get out. The Ford administration basically wound up sitting on it. I have felt to this day that we were sowing, through those agreements, the seeds of the reform movement in the Soviet Union. The recognition that this anal-retentive approach to information in the face of the computer age and the management skills that the west was developing as a result of that were the kinds of things [inaudible] in the past. I think there were people who were aware of this in the state committee on science and technology. There were people who were interested to begin doing something about this. This was a system that had not successfully institutionalized the innovation process the way the west had and they could use espionage to steal but they couldn't seem to incentivize a system of innovation on their own. I found that fascinating.

In light of my prior military experience, one of the more mind-blowing things I remember is that I read the Penkovsky Papers (Editor's Note: Oleg Penkovsky, The Penkovsky Papers: The Russian Who Spied for the West, Doubleday, New York, 1966.). Igor Penkovsky had been a Soviet army colonel working at the State Committee on Science and Technology and I found myself in the course of this assignment and once in their negotiations in the offices of the State Committee on Science and Technology. This was back in 1975. I went on a delegation with Gifford Stevers, the president of Science and Technology at the time. We went to the Soviet Union for some negotiations in the State Committee on Science and Technology's offices and I remember being allowed to wander off to the men's room by myself and I thought, "My gosh, this may have been the place where Igor had visited."

Q: So you did get to Moscow?

VEALE: Yes, in 1975 for some negotiations. That was my first and only trip to the Soviet Union during that period. That was a benchmark for comparisons that I made later with my second trip which was not until December 1992. I saw vast differences.

Q: Did you have a feeling during your time on the Soviet desk that Secretary Kissinger was micro-managing our relations with the Soviet Union or did he leave the people on the desk and in Moscow some leeway?

VEALE: I don't know if micro-managing is the word that I would have chosen. Kissinger was running the Department through a very small group of people and Baker later did the same thing. But, he had a very deliberate set of plans and programs that he wanted to see executed and he wanted to make sure they were executed the way he wanted them to be done. When I was on the desk, a colleague in the bilateral affairs section of the desk interpreted a measure that had to do with either Jewish immigration or some human rights aspect in the Soviet Union and there was some miscommunication within the Department of State about how that issue should be handled. People didn't engage Hartman, and they should have at the time, so this counterpart of mine took some initiative and the roof fell down on him literally because of this. Basically what he was doing was structuring the situation where the U.S. seemed to be taking a much more forthright view on human rights issues with respect to the Soviet Union and I think this issue was not handled the way Kissinger wanted it to be handled so there was a considerable amount of flak that the Department took generally from the White House on that issue. That is my one recollection of an instance where things were being handled in a way that was different from ... [tape cuts out]

Q: Did you find your background in ACDA helpful to you while you were on the Soviet desk?

VEALE: Yes, because I understood the strategic weaponry backdrop against which the science and technology gambit with the Soviet Union was being played at that time. And, there was a whole other dimension to that assignment which was on the detective side, if you will. I sat in on interagency deliberations chaired by the Director of Central Intelligence -- this committee structure; there was a committee on exchanges -- that looked at all these exchanges with the Soviet Union: their implementation, intelligence, and so forth. There was a considerable amount of concern about shopping by Soviet spies. The Soviets would put people who were known to be engaged in intelligence activities on delegations and the question was politically whether or not to deny their visas and so forth. So having the background of strategic weaponry helped in that respect.

Q: Were you involved in preparation for the Helsinki conference where we signed the CSCE agreements?

VEALE: Yes, but not in this assignment. Not for the initial CSCE agreements, but later in a subsequent assignment I was involved in working out confidence-building measures in CSCE.

Q: How about the problem of the immigration of Soviet Jews. Did you get involved in that?

VEALE: Only in the incident I mentioned which was handled by the bilateral affairs section so I wasn't directly involved.

Q: It was about this time that President Ford refused to see Solzhenitsyn, did that cause us any heartburn in the Department or any problems?

VEALE: I think there was some surprise at that. I remember that distantly. I can't give you a thumbnail sketch as to what the Department's views were on that, but I remember being disappointed at that. I think the junior officers at the time were somewhat surprised as well.

Q: I guess my question is: had the Soviet desk recommended that he receive Solzhenitsyn or not?

VEALE: I can't remember that.

Q: What about the question of radiation in our Embassy in Moscow. Did that become an issue for you or not?

VEALE: I was asked if I wanted to go to Moscow on assignment. My wife and I had discussed starting a family at that point. I had a good friend who was had been in the Embassy during the period the radiation was taking place and I was not comfortable with the idea of going off to the Embassy based upon what I was hearing from people about the possible unknown impact of the radiation. There was a lot of concern about this, a lot of concern that the Department was not being forthright because of intelligence concerns about the use of this radiation to active micro bombs and things of that sort.

MARILYN P. JOHNSON
Russian Language Training
Garmisch, Germany (1975-1976)

Cultural Affairs Officer, USIS
Moscow (1976-1978)

Ambassador Johnson was born and raised in Massachusetts, graduated from Radcliffe College and served in the US Navy (WAVES) in World War II. She received further training at the University of Geneva, the Sorbonne and Middlebury College. Her Foreign Service experience include postings as Cultural Affairs Office, Public Affairs Officer and/or English language instructor in West Africa, Tunisia, Niger and the Soviet Union. In 1978 she was appointed Ambassador to Togo, where she served until 1981. Ambassador Johnson was interviewed by Ann Miller Morin in 1986.

[Note: Persis Johnson is Ambassador Johnson's sister, and was present for the interview.]

JOHNSON: Vulnerable, yes. Ready to pick up quickly with somebody else and a good easy target for them. So that was in the back of my mind, and one day when Hal Schneidman was away and I was attending a meeting of the area directors with Frank Shakespeare before he was leaving as director of USIA, Frank Shakespeare said, "Now I'm leaving USIA." He had had a very strong ideological bent on the difference between the iron curtain and the free world. He said that everybody should see what it's like there. That although he was leaving and perhaps people coming in would not be as strong as he, he said, "I want you to know that this ideological battle is going to be going on for another ten years and anybody who wants to become anybody, a senior top-level officer in USIA, had better have served in a post behind the iron curtain." When he finished I raised my hand and said, "This is fine, Mr. Shakespeare, but do you know that there are two groups of people anyway who cannot serve, who would like to, but cannot." I told of this experience and he didn't know about this. He turned to Kempton Jenkins who was a State Department officer serving as USIA director for the USSR and Eastern Europe, said, "Is that true?" He answered, "Yes, you know. It's a very difficult life for women over there, so we haven't assigned women." I said, "Look I don't think it's a difficult life. You probably feel women are more susceptible to compromise. A woman who is my age, a single woman, I think would be less susceptible to compromise than a married man. First of all, I would know, I think, why somebody was being particularly nice, and secondly there would be nothing [to it] if I had an affair." I didn't say, if I had an affair. I would be less susceptible to blackmail."

Q: Of course you would.

JOHNSON: From the blackmail aspect of it. Frank said, "Well, Marilyn, we'll look into that and when we send somebody you'll go to the Soviet Union." And he didn't forget. When I went to the Senior Seminar I knew that I would have an assignment as CAO in Moscow after the Senior Seminar. It worked out.

PERSIS: You had said to Mr. Shakespeare that there were two categories of people here who could never get ahead. And so he said, You'll be the first woman to go, Marilyn."

Q: That's terrific. So you went to an unpronounceable place to study.

JOHNSON: Garmisch-Partenkirchen. In the army, it's the United States Army Russian Institute, USARI.

Q: Is that the regular Garmisch that everybody goes to in Germany?

JOHNSON: Yes. It's a split city and Partenkirchen is on the other side of a main street, but Garmisch is where the US forces in Europe have a recreational center. It's a lovely, spot you know. I could do my skiing and my tennis. I took up cross country skiing there because I was going to Moscow.

Q: Now how long did you stay there?

JOHNSON: It's one year. It's a year course.

PERSIS: No, you stayed one year. It's a two- year course.

JOHNSON: For the military it's two years.

PERSIS: She was also taking Russian privately in Washington.

JOHNSON: I [was tutored during] the Senior Seminar.

PERSIS: They had said you cannot do anything other than the Senior Seminar. If you have to have your eyes examined or your teeth fixed, do it before you enter because it will be so rigorous. She said, "I can take the Russian."

JOHNSON: There was a Russian teacher that lived over in Arlington so I would go a couple times a week, I guess, before or after the Senior Seminar course just to brush up, because they wanted to have you be a 4-4. I didn't get to be 4-4 but I got the 3-3 there. That was a delightful year and also it happened to be right across the mountain pass from our friends in Innsbruck so we were like going home with our family there.

***

Q: Then you went to Moscow?

JOHNSON: Then I went to Moscow as cultural affairs officer.

PERSIS: And we drove to Moscow.

JOHNSON: And we drove. We still had the Malian who had worked for me. He came to the States with us. I couldn't keep on a full-time job with Persis unless I had somebody to help.

Q: What year was this? Let me get this straight. 1976?

JOHNSON: '76 I finished Garmisch. It was one of those things where you can't leave until the new fiscal year. We were still in the July fiscal year and they had to have the money for transfer. The PAO said, "She has to be here by the fourth of July," because you meet people at the reception, you know. So we had a very short time, but I wanted to drive and he had a car and I had a car, so we drove through Austria and Czechoslovakia and Poland and went in over the Brest-Litovsk border crossing.

Q: Your Malian, what happened to him while you were stationed in Washington?

JOHNSON: He came to Washington with me. We brought him in under the H-2 visa. As I say, that was wonderful because he could take care of Persis at home and run the house. They ran the house and I went to work. He was with us in Moscow. It's a long story we won't get into, but he wanted to come in under another visa and stay here. I said, "No, I brought you in under the diplomatic [visa] and you must leave. Unless you can transfer the visa while you're here you must leave when we leave." He did and then tried to come back under another visa and he couldn't get in, so he came back to us in Garmisch. Then he went to Moscow with us. That was when I was in Moscow that the great surprise to everybody, including myself, was, would you like to be ambassador to Togo? And I knew Togo. I had happened to have driven down through what was then Dahomey and Togo going to a budget conference in Ivory Coast to pick up Persis. Persis joined me in Niger and we drove back from Abidjan.

Q: So you were in Russia two years?

JOHNSON: Yes, from '76 to '78.

PERSIS: In the fall of '78.

JOHNSON: It was September I left. I was July to July and then I was planning to be a third year there. It was a three year tour, two and a half to three years, and the cable came and took everybody [by surprise.]

Q: You heard by cable?

JOHNSON: By cable.

Q: Before we get to that, would you describe your life in Moscow? You're one of the few women officers to serve there.

JOHNSON: Yes. You had no problem there because there are a lot of women in the government and our chief contact in the ministry of culture was a woman - a very strong, severe Madame Butrova, who had served in Washington, so she spoke excellent English. She was in charge of all of the cultural exchanges. Then we had somebody else on the educational side. This was a very good time for us. Detente was dwindling but we still had the programs so we had good exchange programs with American students. There were problems all of the time because the Soviets would not grant them access to certain archives, or they couldn't travel, or they went to one city when they wanted to be in another. But there was an educational exchange program going on, a full-blown one. We also had an IV [International Visitor Program] program with many... we had individual grantees and then we had groups of educators. American educators would come to the Soviet Union and Soviets would go to the United States and we were arranging these. Also we had a couple of exhibits from the Met that came over, one exhibit from the Met and then they were preparing for another. Shortly after my arrival, Jackie Onassis turned up at the airport. Walter Stoessel was ambassador and he asked me to go out and meet her. Although she was coming to deal with the Soviets, he wanted her to know that the embassy was there if she needed anything. I went to pass the message on. I guess I saw her...

PERSIS: They had a luncheon.

JOHNSON: Oh, yes, I arranged a luncheon at the residence for her.

Q: Why was she coming over?

JOHNSON: She was coming to research materials for the catalogue on the Russian costume exhibit. Remember when the Met had that wonderful Russian costume exhibit? Actually it was Diane Vreeland who did most of the work. But Jackie came over.

Q: She edited the book.

JOHNSON: Yes, she edited the book. Hoving [director of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York] came with her.

Q: Did he?

JOHNSON: They went to Leningrad and she saw the sleigh there. I remember it was absolutely necessary that they have a sleigh for one of the exhibits.

Q: Yes, indeed they did. Did you see the exhibit?

JOHNSON: Yes. We got to know some of the people who came over, the curators, and also the man in charge of the shipping and all, the logistics. We've kept in contact with him and he arranged for us to go one day when it was closed to the public, I think. We happened to be in New York on that day so we did see it. Persis could go around in a wheel chair with not too many people.

Q: Did you feel much sense of restraint while you were in Russia?

JOHNSON: You know that you're limited for travel. You're limited to twenty-five miles outside of Moscow and certain cities are open cities and other cities are closed cities. But I never had the impression of being followed at the time. Persis and I went over there saying we know that it's a different system and we know that we will be watched and listened to but we're not going to have it influence us psychologically. Some people would talk to a chandelier, or something. We just assumed that there were listening devices and we never consciously said anything we didn't want to be heard. But we did not worry about it or make a game of it. We arrived in July and we traveled a bit. Was Phoebe there that year?

PERSIS: August, yes.

JOHNSON: In August we went to...

PERSIS: We had the experience in August of knowing they knew exactly where our car was every minute.

JOHNSON: You mean Zagorsk? That wasn't that year. Was that August? We drove to this monastery city in Zagorsk. As we were going up to the churches I noticed the flower stand on the left and it was on the wrong side of the street and I said, "We'll stop on the way back and buy some flowers there." When we came back the stand wasn't there. We kept looking and we drove around and around trying to find it. Then I did spot some flowers and parked over by the station and went back to buy the flowers. When I came back there was a motorcycle cop by the car and he said, "What are you doing here?" I said, "Obviously I'm buying some flowers."

PERSIS: "Where are you from?"

JOHNSON: "Where are you from," I guess. I said, "Moscow." "This isn't on your itinerary. Get up and get out of here."

PERSIS: The whole circumstances, too. We were not off the main road, just like the cars parked down there. But we were also blocked so that nobody could see us, really. There was a train going through and the traffic was stopped. But this cop came from the far side and came right to us. He knew exactly where our car was. I mean he didn't see it because he couldn't see it. We figured that a bug was on our car. It had been put on and they knew where our car was. So we knew this was so, but it was all right. We weren't doing anything.

JOHNSON: We drove to Vladimir and Suzdal. There were two famous cities.

PERSIS: We also had the wonderful sense that if anything went wrong, or if we got lost, somebody would appear beside us.

Q: Yes, indeed.

PERSIS: And tell us we were on the wrong road.

JOHNSON: As I said, it didn't bother us. At Christmas time we flew to Austria to spend Christmas with our family, the Austrian family. When we landed in Frankfurt, it was amazing. It was as if a weight had been lifted off our shoulders. We were not conscious of this oppression that was hovering over us. But we got into Frankfurt and it's another world. It surprised us.

Q: You don't even know that you're experiencing this weight. I know exactly what you mean.

JOHNSON: Then, of course, when we went back, we got to know some of the people who were not out-and-out dissidents but had been friends of the Sakharovs and friends of Solzhenitsyn, the man that was supposedly the character of Rubin in Cancer Ward. A devoted communist who still believe in communism. We got to know him, Lev and his wife, Raisa, who had been the interpreter for Lillian Hellman when she had gone there a couple of times, and other writers and artists who were not members of the artists' union and couldn't exhibit. But some of them participated in the free - this was the time when they had those free exhibits that were not supported by the union but they allowed them to show some of their works. They came to the house. We were able to get films through USIA. I had a projector at home and they were avid for any information on the theater and the arts. I showed films and they came to our home for dinner and to read. They could borrow our books and things. The Soviets knew that. But as long as you didn't go too far, it's all right. One time a sculptor, a very fine sculptor, had a book about his sculpture written and published in West Germany. Several of his big sculptures are in cities in West Germany. But he couldn't get any copies of the book. We were going to Austria and his publisher said that he would send fifty copies and I would take them back when I went. Did I take them back or did I send them? I guess I had them sent to me.

PERSIS: We didn't have that many. We had just a few. We just brought them for his own use.

JOHNSON: Five or so. I don't know, anyway, some number.

Q: Did you bring them in the pouch?

JOHNSON: I don't think I did on the pouch because I didn't want to do that. We brought them ourselves. I guess they were in a suitcase and they didn't look through our suitcases. There was nothing subversive. It's just a book about his sculpture that he couldn't get. We were friends with some of the exchange students and one, doing his doctoral thesis in theater, was having a terrible time in the dormitory at the beginning and was going to have to leave because of the conditions. I went out to look at the dormitory and it didn't seem too bad by my standards. I guess he was a little bit more delicate than I. I said they'll get you some other dormitory, but he couldn't stand it, so I said come and stay with us until we get you relocated. So Sidney came and stayed in our apartment with us. He never did get relocated. He stayed with us. It was very good. He was very interesting.

We had made plans to go to the Kopelev's home together one evening but that day suddenly there was something wrong with my car. We assumed that somebody had tinkered with it. I know one time it was the tires. You can't use the telephone. We thought we were being discreet about our visit, but they knew that I was going to go out there and they fixed it so I couldn't have my car. This was a Sunday and I had some work to do in the embassy so I asked for an embassy car to come out and take me in to the office. On the way we were going to drop Sidney, who had the books we had brought from Germany, and he was going to give them to the sculptor. Then he and I would meet later on after I had done my work in the office. I would take the subway and we would meet at the subway stop near where our friends lived and go spend the evening with their literary friends. As I say, it was an embassy car. We didn't mention anything about the books and we dropped Sidney off and I said, "Bye, see you sometime." We didn't say anything about meeting in the metro. He was followed by somebody who came up and said, "What you doing? Where are you going?"

PERSIS: Also knew theater and...

JOHNSON: He knew theater and talked to him, so Sidney knew that this was somebody that they had set for him, and he said, "Come up to my place and we'll talk about theater." Sidney was trying to shake him. He couldn't shake him and Sidney got very shaken himself by then, because he knew that they were after him. And there was another time they sent him a letter and they used a middle name that he had never used except on his passport. They were trying to blackmail him. But this person obviously had been sent to waylay him and to frighten him. They like to let you know that you're being watched.

PERSIS: They know what you're doing. This shows the wonderfulness of the Russian people, too. When Sidney didn't show up at the sculptor's, the sculptor called our home. He would know that our phone was tapped and it would be known that he was calling. But he called me to ask where Sidney was. Then Sidney finally did get there, much later.

Q: With the books?

JOHNSON: With the books.

PERSIS: They called me again. In the meantime I guess you had called.

JOHNSON: I was at the subway station waiting for him and he hadn't come, so I called to know if there was a change in plans.

PERSIS: It's strange. You are very much aware that they know every single thing you're doing and thinking. They let you know. They call you on the phone... in ways you just know that they know.

Q: Is it a helpless feeling that you get?

PERSIS: I don't know. I don't think we reacted too much to it. You also have the security of knowing that nothing is going to happen to you that isn't planned.

Q: That's true.

PERSIS: You know that nothing could happen to you.

JOHNSON: Also there was nothing that was really wrong. We did help perhaps get a few manuscripts out and a few books in, but that was the extent. We were being friendly with these people and we were giving them the opportunity to talk with Americans, to see American films, to come to dinner and meet different people. I know I was there when they had the first international book exhibit when the Americans participated. I said, we should have a reception for them, the American publishers. But the chargé d'affaires said, no, that was their business. There was no reception. So I said, "I'll have something at my apartment for a few of them to meet." Because Nadezhda Mandelstam was still alive; she was a widow of a great poet, and [Robert] Bernstein and some others wanted to meet her, Bernstein, the Random House publisher.

So I invited the different Soviets that these publishers said that they wanted to see. They were able to get together in my apartment. There was a good exchange then. It was good for us because we got to see a lot of the interesting people and talk with them.

Q: Did you find that as things waxed and waned between the Russians and the government of the United States, it affected you directly?

JOHNSON: As I say, it was beginning to affect our exchanges. They were not so friendly at the end. We worked on a renewal of the exchange agreement. And we did, I think it was '78, that we signed another exchange agreement. At that time we were still working but after I left, people told me that activities diminished tremendously because detente was...

Q: You left, of course, before Reagan was inaugurated but that must have made things really...

JOHNSON: It made it worse in the beginning, but meanwhile it was Afghanistan, you see, December of '77. Then Carter cut out things.

Q: Did you have Russian servants working in your home?

JOHNSON: No, I was fortunate.

Q: How were you able not to? I thought they insisted.

JOHNSON: I had my Malian. I didn't need one.

Q: They didn't insist that you have one?

JOHNSON: No, because I had one.

Q: I thought they planted one anyway.

JOHNSON: No. Some people didn't have any. They got so fed up with them. We had them come in for parties. When we had receptions and dinners, they would come in and work. But they were ones that worked for other people. Persis went to the hairdresser that was reputed to be a colonel in the KGB. They're nice people. I feel sorry for the employees in the embassy and USIS over this present culture, it's called, in the Soviet Union. But they must have some feelings about the United States and Americans and yet they are Russians. They know they are working for their government. It must be tearing them apart inside if they're sensitive people. I know that the cultural assistant we had, everybody said, "She's also a colonel in the KGB." But she was a nice person and she was very interested in showing art. They did an inspection of the Soviet Union last September. Bob Rockweiler said our CAO assistant was very nice to him, Took him around to museums, bought him a book. I have to feel sorry for them.

Q: But everything is done for a reason?

JOHNSON: I guess so, but they are genuinely warm people.

PERSIS: Very kind to me.

JOHNSON: They were very kind to Persis.

PERSIS: They have a great respect for age and for any infirmities.

JOHNSON: Whenever we traveled and were going up and down steps, the men and everybody would come over and ask, "Can't we help? They were very friendly. In fact often they were friendly and wanted to continue to know us and I had to tell them for their own good they should not.

PERSIS: Had to do it diplomatically.

Q: How was entertaining? Was the social life much less rigorous than in other countries?

JOHNSON: I tried to entertain because it was a good chance... For instance, we had some American students over there, university students. We were starting some courses in the Pushkin Institute and other places. I would have them for Thanksgiving dinner. I don't know whether I asked any Soviets or whether it was just all Americans for Thanksgiving, but we would have, whenever there were exchange groups, we would try to get the Russians to come along with the Americans. It's not as easy, perhaps, as elsewhere, and you know that they name certain people to go, a certain level will go to certain people's homes.

Q: If they said, "Yes," could you count on them being there?

JOHNSON: If they said yes... This is one thing we found, too. In dealing with them, if you're having a negotiating session or you have an exchange agreement, if there is something down in writing, then they will abide by that. But it takes a lot of hard work and patience to get them to come to the table and say, yes, this is the way it will be. My experience was they would live up to the letter of the agreement.

Q: Did you find it frustrating?

JOHNSON: It was frustrating only sometimes, in one thing negotiating for the Paul Taylor dance company, I think. The dance people want certain things and the Soviets say, "This is our hall and it's this way. We can't change it." Or we would say, "You're supposed to take care of the trucking," and they say, "No, it wasn't in the agreement. We didn't say we would do the trucking." Then you have to go back and say, "It's going to cost this much more to truck the things from one city to another." I don't think I felt frustrated because you have to keep chipping away.

Q: Did your style of operating change? You couldn't be too spontaneous, I would think.

PERSIS: Oh, she is.

Q: I know she is, and I wondered if it could be under those circumstances.

JOHNSON: I think you have to think ahead and you have to have different positions. You have to be ready to give but not give too much, and expect them to give on certain things. You become exasperated sometimes with the bureaucracy of it and that they will not answer a note for a long, long time. But that's not peculiar to the Soviets. A lot of other bureaucracies don't answer notes.

Q: How did your servant feel about living there?

JOHNSON: There was a Marine club at the embassy. People from the friendly embassies all went there. That was the center of activities. They showed films a couple of nights a week. He had a red mustang car, a new car. He became very popular. He didn't mind it at all. He knew all the Finnish nannies.

PERSIS: And the Africans.

JOHNSON: Africans, the students at Lumumba university, you know.

PERSIS: And the ambassador's son and cousin or something or other.

JOHNSON: Emile enjoyed it there, I think. He didn't mind too much.

PERSIS: He didn't feel the color bar.

JOHNSON: There were black Marines there, too, and he was treated more like an American. He dressed like an American, spoke English.

PERSIS: By this time he was more American than African.

JOHNSON: He didn't want to go back to Mali.

Q: I can imagine. Then one day you got a cable.

JOHNSON: A cable came in and I took it to the PAO and he said, "You'd better take it up to the ambassador." The ambassador was shocked, and so was everybody else. He said, "Oh, you arranged this. I happened to know John Rheinhart, who was the head of ICA at the time. I'd known him when he was the director for Africa. He had been out to visit. I had gone along with him and the PAO to the meeting with the minister of culture. So the immediate thought was that I had arranged this with John Rheinhart when he had been there. I said, "No, I didn't arrange it with anybody. This is a complete shock to me." I said, "There's only one possibility that a friend of mine, one of my colleagues from Bamako had come out when Secretary Vance came to a meeting. He had a few minutes and I drove him out to the house to see Persis. As I was driving out I said, I'm not particularly happy with what the internal - it had nothing to do with Soviet side - but inside the USIS operation" and I said, "I may retire or ask for reassignment or something." He said, "Would you like a DCM job in Africa? There are lots of DCM jobs." I said, "No, I don't want anything. This is my own thing. I'll make up my mind. Don't do anything. I'm not interested in that." So what came to my mind when I got this cable was, David has gone back and it was equal employment opportunity and he probably said, "There's a woman out there if you're looking for an ambassador. This was my assumption. Nobody ever told me anything. When I went back to the State Department, one of the first days back there when I was getting ready for the assignment, I met the former political officer from Moscow. He said, "I was just on the panel for you and was happy to approve you." He said my name was on a panel and that's how I got it. I know that many of the ambassadors in my OERs [officer evaluation report] would write, "She would be a fine ambassador to the country." She does this, that, or the other thing. But those are things you don't take seriously. I never had any ambition to be an ambassador. I was happy to just go along my own way. I don't know whether I ever even saw David after that, but I wrote to him and I said, It seems to me that you're behind this." He said, "Marilyn, I did inquire when I came back but I found your name on the list from USIA as a possible candidate for appointments to Africa." So he inquired but my name was on a list that USIA had supplied to the State Department.

Q: That's because of Carter, of course.

JOHNSON: I think so.

Q: Carter demanded so many top women.

JOHNSON: Again it's where being a woman has worked for me.

Q: Definitely. Before we leave Russia, what lessons did you learn from your time there?

JOHNSON: Oh, gosh, Persis, what lessons did I learn from Russia? What I learned is that people are people. I'd always known this. We all had different political systems and different loyalties, but we should understand the other person's point of view. And certainly in negotiating you should know from what perspective that person is approaching the negotiations. You have to understand his position and background and his responsibilities to the people behind. We can't just say to a Russian, "Okay, now let's do this and let's do that." We saw with this walk in the woods in Geneva, it never came to anything because the powers that be are not ready to accept it. So we have to know their perspective and their limitations for negotiations. I think that if you understand more their premises and bases for thinking and for actions, then each person can do a better job.

I've always thought you have to find a mutuality of interests. We're trying to tell America's story, we're trying to have programs that will be of mutual benefit, or we're trying to get everything for our benefit, but I think the only way you can get something is to find an area in which both countries or both groups have an interest and want to get something. There is a point where you have a mutuality of interests, then you can agree there. We're not going to change their beliefs, they're not going to change our beliefs, but we can work together to get what each one wants, I believe.

I don't know that I learned any great lessons. You always do, but I'm not one to sit and question what I've learned from this experience.

I also did learn a lot about myself, that I had always been a very strong individualist person who said, "Any problems are your own," but I was having some problems within that made me unhappy. For the first time I was not happy in my work. I did not want to get up. I did not want to get up and go into the office. I liked the work but I did not want to go into that work atmosphere. I had some feelings that probably were like depression. It made me more understanding of people who have problems, nervous problems and depressions, and how people who are discriminated against can be cowed very easily. I think that probably the most important lesson was to myself. My own recognition of fallibility and how other people feel when they cannot cope. I've always been able to cope.

Q: This was your first feeling of...

JOHNSON: That was my first feeling of not liking where I was. And as I said, that was why I said to David, "I'm not happy and I'm going to do something," and he tried to help and I said, "No, I'll do it myself." Persis said it was the microwaves [It was believed by some that the microwave listening devices used against the embassy and the residences of embassy employees by the Soviet spy services were a source of cancer and other serious illnesses]. She thought that the microwaves were influential."

PERSIS: She had all of the symptoms.

Q: Is that right?

PERSIS: Yes. She was completely unlike herself. She would say, "I can't think, I can't think, I can't think." The symptoms were just there.

Q: Is it an unhappy post, generally speaking?

JOHNSON: Yes, it was a very unhappy post.

PERSIS: People were miserable there.

JOHNSON: Everybody was so ambitious. I've always worked where people worked together. Each one is doing his or her own thing. But there everybody was wanting to make his mark and this is what bothered me.

Q: All wanted to be George Kennans?

JOHNSON: That's right. They don't care whom they step on in order to go [first]. We had the ticker tape. They would rush in in the morning to see what was on the ticker tape and to read the traffic so they could report on it before the other officer could. That's a miserable way.

Q: Is this always true, do you think, of that post?

JOHNSON: I think it's known as that. It's known as an unhappy post.

PERSIS: It's ambitious people and they also think they're the elite. They think they're the bright ones that are chosen, and they're going to make their mark.

JOHNSON: There are some fine people. Now Bill Brown, who is now ambassador to Thailand, came in as political officer. It was his third term. He is a sweet man, very nice.

PERSIS: And Jack Matlock.

JOHNSON: Jack Matlock was a hard driver, but he was a fine honest man with integrity, too. He could see through a lot of the veneer of other people. There aren't many fine people but there are many people there that are ambitious and they only want to be known.

Q: Does it matter what cone they're in, or do we find most of them in the political?

JOHNSON: No, You found it in the political cone, you found it in the economic. I think I saw some of the science attachés out in...

PERSIS: Pakistan?

JOHNSON: No, China. We were talking about the consul general. He said it ruined his career there. As you mentioned, it was an unhappy post. People were always griping. And poor Mo Morin, who does everything for everybody and tries to make people happy, I guess he had a terrible time there.

Q: I can see where he might.

JOHNSON: He and Anne are people that are easy to get along with.

Q: Administrative work is a thankless job anyway.

PERSIS: And yet, I would love to go back.

Q: Really?

PERSIS: I would love to go back. I know we never would go back, but I would love to. People are just... and they have such courage. They did things for us that...

JOHNSON: That got them into trouble. There was one case of somebody that we knew that was convinced of the party [motives]. No question had ever come into her mind: Everything that they did was for the good of the people, and intelligent, and what you read from overseas were lies. Her party people were looking out for their best interests. She wanted to invite us to her home. We said, "No, because of my position." I knew what had happened to these friends who were up over last week with us. They had come to visit us in Moscow and met a girl on the subway. She said, "Come to the house." I went to deliver something and I could see that the girl in all innocence had invited them but the parents knew that there were problems, if it's somebody from the embassy, too. So we told this person, "No, we would love it, we appreciate the gesture but it's not good for you." But she went on and then they let it be known to her that they knew what she was doing and she'd better cease and desist.

PERSIS: She wasn't doing anything.

Q: It must have shocked her.

JOHNSON: Just becoming sympathetic to us. I was supposed to meet her and she had to call and say that she couldn't. We were going to go to a bookstore or something. Then she just couldn't. It's a very sad thing because it's breaking somebody's faith. It's almost like a religion to them, you see. Here has been the ultimate, like a god and, you're finding out that it's not what you believed.

PERSIS: It wasn't we who were trying to chase her in any way. It was her own system that showed her. I remember she wrote me a note right in the house. She had heard of these things but never believed them before. But never mind, they're marvelous people.

JOHNSON: They're very good people. Those who are not working for the KGB don't know what's going on. They hear only one side of the story.

Q: They're spoon fed, of course. Did you see people from other embassies much?

JOHNSON: I think probably less in Moscow than anyplace else. I did have to see the West German cultural attaché who lived in the same building and we became quite friendly with her. The DCM of the German embassy had been in Niger before. I had known him slightly through an artist there, so I was friendly with the West Germans in the cultural and some French, not too many. British and Australian, I knew some of the Australians through tennis. I played tennis with the Australians.

Q: Don't they have the usual national days?

PERSIS: Yes, they do.

JOHNSON: Yes, but I didn't go to them.

PERSIS: Life there at that time was so pressured with activity that you had no time. Even though Eva lived right below us we saw very little of her, much as we liked her and she liked us. It was a continual pressure...

JOHNSON: There was always some delegation coming. You have to prepare for them.

PERSIS: Everybody wants to come to Moscow.

Q: Oh, yes.

PERSIS: Which makes it very interesting. You meet all kinds of people.

Q: Were you able to go to the ballet?

JOHNSON: Oh, yes. Persis was, too. Persis loves ballet. That was magnificent. Then we went to the opera and Tchaikovsky Hall. They had marvelous contests at Tchaikovsky Hall. They had a ballet competition and there was a Japanese-American [who] won silver. For some reason she came to the house to telephone.

PERSIS: You see everybody wants to come to Moscow. They're always the top people in their field. Marilyn was in a very interesting position because of all these cultural people came through her. We met all tremendously interesting people.

Q: So you had to get ready for them.

JOHNSON: Alex Katz came.

PERSIS: Larry Rivers.

JOHNSON: Larry Rivers and then George Segal. I traveled with George Segal to Tashkent and Samarkand. Then Louise Gore, who was opening an exhibit in Uzbekistan. I went up to Alma-Ata with her.

Q: So you were able to travel?

JOHNSON: Yes. We also had this large international exhibit program of exchanges, that went off the track after Afghanistan, I think. And now it's just opened up again. Just beginning again under the new cultural agreement.

RICHARD M. MILES
Russian Language Training, Army Russian Institute
Garmisch, Germany (1975-1976)

Political Officer, External Affairs
Moscow (1976-1979)

Ambassador Miles was born in Arkansas in 1937. He earned an associate degree from Bakersfield College, Bachelor's degree from University of California, Berkeley and a master's degree from Indiana University. He joined the Foreign service in 1966. His overseas posts include Oslo, Belgrade, Moscow, Leningrad, Berlin, Azerbaijan, Bulgaria and Georgia. Ambassador Miles was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

Q: Where did you go?

MILES: I went off to the Army Russian Institute at Garmisch-Partenkirchen, Germany, for advanced Russian studies. You had to have an ongoing assignment to the Soviet Union in order to be selected as the one State Department officer who would get that training for the year, the academic year, and so I had my ongoing assignment to the Political Section in Moscow to do Soviet foreign policy. It was a bit like winning the lottery.

Q: How did you find that?

MILES: Oh, I thought it was excellent training. First of all, of course, it's an idyllic place to live. I mean, I give the Army full credit for selecting some of the best sites that the SS had owned. The SS was declared a criminal organization at the end of World War II and the American occupying power seized a good deal of SS property for its own use. We still had some of that property, including the facility used for the Army Russian Institute and the housing for the administration, the faculty and the students. You had to have a 3-3 level in Russian language to be accepted at Garmisch. The instructors were all émigré Russians and the classes were all taught in Russian; there were no classes in English. The Institute administration tried to conduct business in Russian, at least as best as they could, because you had some Germans in there and also some American officers and staff NCOs with only fair Russian. You were supposed to speak Russian 100 percent of the time, even in the appropriate extracurricular activities, until you were home, off duty. And the classes were—there were some actual language classes, but generally you were studying Soviet and Russian history, geography, economics, literature and so on, and those were all taught in Russian, so it was a fantastic experience. There were a few special sessions on Soviet military terminology, structure and weapons but more as a language acquisition tool than as professional military subjects. Anyhow, I thoroughly enjoyed it. I thought it was a fine program. The Army guys who went there, mostly captains and majors, had come out of a two-year course at Monterey, California, at the Defense Language Institute, which is why we civilians had to have the 3-3 in order to go to the Institute. Everyone except the State and USIA officers—there was one of each—stayed for two years at Garmisch, some of them going on to become defense attachés, most of them going back and supervising listening posts or DIA analyst positions. A very few people went to Detachment R, the so-called Potsdam Mission in East Germany. Later as we moved toward serious arms reduction agreements and monitoring with the Soviets, many Garmisch graduates were used either as members of our negotiating teams or as examiners out in the field. At this later stage in our relations, we had U.S. military officers stationed at weapons facilities in the Soviet Union just as the Soviets had their officers in the United States. But back in the 70s, there were only so many billets in the Soviet Union itself and that is one reason why the Army officers got this training. It was an effort on the part of the Army to bring them up to snuff on the real Russian language that they would be required to work with for much of their career. There were a few officers from other services and agencies there as well but mostly there were Army officers. So it was fascinating, really, plus the experience of simply living in Garmisch, one of the world's most beautiful places. As a family, we skied, skated, hiked and biked for a whole glorious year.

Q: Well, I think this is probably a good place to stop.

MILES: Yes, it probably is.

Q: And we'll pick this up in 19—

MILES: Yes, when I left in '76.

Q: Seventy-six?

MILES: Right.

Q: And we'll pick you up going to the Soviet Union.

MILES: Yes, that's good. Fine.

Q: Okay, today is the 22nd of March, 2007. Dick, you were in, what was it, Moscow?

MILES: Yes.

Q: You were there from when to when?

MILES: From the summer of 1976 until the summer of 1979.

Q: What sort of job did you have there?

MILES: I was in the Political Section. At that time the Section was divided—I think it still is divided—into two halves: an internal section and an external section. I was in the external section, which meant I was doing ordinary diplomatic work, trying to figure out what the Soviets were up to in the Middle East, Africa, Central America and a little bit with the United Nations—we didn't really focus on that very much—and then trying to explain U.S. policy in those parts of the world to Soviet colleagues and also to foreign diplomats. There were so many diplomats in Moscow; it was one of the few places where I have served where there truly was an international community.

Q: How would you describe, when you arrived in '76, relations between the Soviet Union and the United States?

MILES: Well, "arrived" is the operational word. This was still détente, the period of détente, and you heard good things about the relationship. For me, it was not an overtly hostile atmosphere in which to work. This was not true for many other members of the Embassy staff, of course. There was the usual skullduggery on the part of the KGB, the GRU [Main Intelligence Directorate of the Soviet military], and so on and you were constantly running up against the internal controls which the Soviet State had for decades imposed on its own people so you could not have close relationships, really, or if you did, you endangered the people that you were trying to have that relationship with. I'll give you an example of that later on. But '76, '77: this was pretty much a normal, reasonably benign period during the Cold War. In fact these were the waning days of détente, but people didn't quite know they were waning yet. The cooling of the relationship was just over the horizon. And then toward the end of detente, in '78, '79, when a number of things happened, the relationship went downhill fast.

Q: We'll come to that.

MILES: Yes. So this is what changed while I was there.

Q: Okay. Firstly, who was the Ambassador and who was your initial chief? Sort of describe your impression of the Embassy and personalities there.

MILES: Well, Walter Stoessel was the Ambassador when I first arrived and I forget when he left but he wasn't there very long while I was there. A very nice fellow, I liked him. Very much old school but also with those wonderful, old school qualities of politeness, dignity and style. We've lost much of that in modern times. And then Mac Toon came. Toon was also old school but rather more aggressive, I would say, and more vocally opinionated than Stoessel, if I may say so.

In the Political Section, let me see, Marshall Bremont was Section Chief but only had a few months to go when I arrived. He was later Ambassador to Iceland. Then Tom Simons came as the Section Chief. He then went on to be Ambassador to Poland and Pakistan and is now retired, up at Harvard. And, gee, I'm trying to think who the external section chief was. Ted McNamara, who had a fine career afterward, was the head of the external section for a while.

Q: Yes, I'm interviewing Ted now.

MILES: Are you really? Well, give him my regards.

Q: I will.

MILES: And I'm trying to think who—he wasn't there the whole three years I was there, but I can't for the life of me recall who the other fellow was.

Q: Well, who—this was Brezhnev?

MILES: Yes, right.

Q: How was Brezhnev and some of the Politburo viewed at that time?

MILES: Well, Brezhnev was considered sort of a joke almost and we used to try to listen to his speeches; we'd hear them live on television or whatever and they were very hard to understand. I mean, he mumbled so and his words were slurred and it was clear that he was really losing it.

He was a smart enough fellow in the early days and powerful enough, but, boy, he was certainly beginning to lose it by the late 1970s. But in the external section, we were all pretty busy there in Moscow, and so we didn't wander off into each other's areas very much. In my work I hardly paid any attention to what Brezhnev did or didn't do or said or didn't say, but rather spent time with the Foreign Ministry people, with a few Soviet media people, with the academics in the think tanks and so on. Quite a few people were accessible to us in that strangely closed world. You had to wait to get an appointment but almost always you would get it; there were very few people who wouldn't actually see you, and I met some interesting people at that time. I remember waiting almost three years for an appointment to see Aleksandr Dzasokhov, who was head of the Afro-Asian Peoples' Solidarity Organization. By the way, that meeting was disappointing when it did take place. Years later, when I was in Georgia, Dzasokhov became President of the Republic of North Ossetia.

I tried hard, and quite unsuccessfully, to cultivate a relationship with a few experts in the Central Committee apparatus because there was a parallel structure in the Soviet Union at that time. There was a governmental apparatus and then there was the Party apparatus, which sort of paralleled it, including in foreign affairs, but I was never able to gain access to the Central Committee. They kept themselves aloof except for diplomats from the so-called "socialist camp". Anyhow, part of the fun of living in Moscow at that time was that you could eventually wear down the resistance of some people who really didn't much want to see you. Some Western visitors would just pop in for a few days, pop out again, and would never have a chance of seeing some of these people. But if you worked at it, cultivated people, developed a reputation for discretion, then, after it became known that you were a sensible person, in time, you could see some rather interesting people.

Q: Well, let's take a look now at how things were at the beginning and how they changed.

MILES: They did change; they did change.

Q: How did we view the Soviet Union? I mean, by hemisphere or by policy or what? I mean, as far as the international side?

MILES: Well, I think that all American government experts—the diplomats, the defense attachés, the Agency analysts—considered the Soviet Union to be a hostile power. But we didn't spend a lot of time talking about the communist threat or international communism or anything like that and we didn't see very much of the 1940s and 1950s style of subversive and violent activity. But we certainly followed and were sometimes concerned about what these people were doing abroad, especially in Third World countries. I didn't follow Soviet policy in the member states of the Warsaw Treaty Organization. Someone else did that and that was an interesting area too, but I was following Africa so I did the best I could to determine what the Soviets were up to in Africa. Well, they were very active in Africa at that time. And we fretted about that and we sent our reports back to Washington and then the experts in Washington fretted about it. Cuba at that time was sending medical people and military people into Angola and so I wanted to know what that amounted to, who was behind that, what were they thinking and doing, was this planned or coordinated with the Soviet Union, how effective were they, what were the South Africans doing about it, etc. It was all pretty heady stuff, really.

And we had good access to people who knew a lot about these things. Gromyko's son—a decent fellow although not nearly as bright as his father, the Foreign Minister—ran the African Institute and I used to hang out at the African Institute all the time. And the African Institute had responsibility, in an academic sense, for the entire continent of Africa, so it wasn't just Sub-

Saharan Africa, but it was North Africa and even the Middle East up to the Suez Canal. And then there was the Oriental Studies Institute which was then led by Yevgeny Primakov, who later became head of the intelligence service and Prime Minister, a very powerful person. He's still around, by the way. I saw him several times subsequently so we established a kind of distant relationship at that time because I'd also hang out in his institute and he'd see me in the hall sometimes and we'd say hello. I didn't have much to do with him personally but I met him and got to know him and that was very useful. And these institutes had very good people. The Oriental Studies Institute followed the Palestinian question and also what was happening in Iran. And of course as Iran became more and more tense and in turmoil because of the overthrow of the Shah, I began to focus more and more on Iran.

I also got to know, Sergo Mikoyan, the son of Anastas Mikoyan. Sergo was head of the Latin American Countries Institute and Editor in Chief of their scholarly journal. A very sweet man and one of the very few Soviet officials I dealt with that I would consider a friend.

In the external section, we then divided the geographical world up—sort of like cutting an orange into halves. And so I took Iran and everything to the west and Dale Herspring and, later, Peter Tomsen, took Afghanistan and everything to the east; then we kind of met somewhere around the globe, which was a pretty good division, to tell the truth. Always reminded me of the Treaty of Tordesillas. As time went on we also began to be more and more concerned about Afghanistan and what was going to be happening in Afghanistan. And we had big arguments within our own group but also with Embassy Kabul and with Washington about what we thought the Soviets might do vis-à-vis Afghanistan. Those were pretty heady times.

Q: Let's talk about Africa. Cuba seemed to be sort of the surrogate Soviet Union in Ethiopia, Angola and all. Did you see the Soviets or did we see the Soviets having a major policy toward there or were they just fishing in troubled waters?

MILES: Well, I personally spent a fair amount of time trying to figure that out, to try to determine to what degree Cuba was acting independently. For sure there would have to be some vague coordination at the top but what kind of coordination? Would it just be informing each other what the other would be doing or would it be closer: "Why don't you get involved with the Angolans and we'll stay involved over here somewhere else?" Or, "Can we help pay for the transport of your people across the Atlantic Ocean or whatever?" We never figured out the degree to which Cuban activities were coordinated, if at all, by the Soviet Union. We assumed that there was this basic level of information sharing and an implicit acceptance of burden sharing in what they were trying to do but it was never clear to us the degree to which this was really worked out by the big shots and a plan drawn up of "You do this at this time and place and we'll do this at this time and place and we'll help you do this and you can help us do that." That was never clear to us and we tried hard to find out more about it but we were never very successful in that.

Q: When you went to the African Institute, what sort of answers were you getting?

MILES: Well, they weren't very forthcoming on what the Soviet Union was up to. They were totally unforthcoming on what anybody else might be up to—the Cubans, for example. They, of course, focused to a large degree on what we and the British and the French were doing, and so they imagined or professed to imagine all sorts of nefarious plots and conspiracies there. So I did spend a good deal of time trying to bat some of that down and put it in perspective. I spent a fair amount of time working on Horn of Africa issues and of course Egypt fell within the sphere of the African Institute too. There was a great shift, you recall, at that time, when Egypt ceased to have the Soviet Union as a patron and turned to us as a patron. And a very similar thing happened in the Horn of Africa with Somalia and Ethiopia. These were seismic shifts, so I tended to focus more on things that were actually happening rather than trying to ferret out what the Soviets might be up to in a particular country or in Sub-Saharan Africa, for example. They were active and they were spending a fair amount of money. It was something we did try to keep an eye on, but in a general way.

The African diplomats, by the way, at least at my level, were pretty much worthless in trying to help us scope out some of these activities. They just—they either knew nothing or they were busy selling icons or dabbling in black market currency exchange, or they were indeed doing things with the Soviet Union that they didn't want known and they certainly weren't about to tell an American diplomat about it. So while they were friendly enough, and Sharon and I attended some fantastic parties at the homes of these young African diplomats, it was all pretty much a worthless exercise in terms of actually learning anything.

Q: Let's turn to the Middle East. Did you sense an unease or discomfort in the fact that the Egyptians got onboard? It was Camp David and all that sort of American diplomatic energy. This must have been quite a shock to them.

MILES: The diplomats in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs were more guarded, but people in the African Institute had long since been disillusioned by Nasser and Sadat. My Soviet colleagues simply felt they were being taken for a ride. By Soviet standards, they were spending large amounts of money on the Egyptian military and some grandiose economic assistance projects and they were getting precious little in return for it. So I don't think the falling out with Egypt was a big shock to them. What they expressed to me was a considerable annoyance at the Egyptians for doing this so abruptly, just walking away from them. And they also expressed a kind of cynicism about the degree to which we would be willing to spend the kind of money that would be necessary to keep the Egyptians on our side. I remember one of them saying to me, "Do you Americans really have so much money that you can afford to have Egypt as a friend and an ally?" And I said, "Yes, you bet! Egypt being what it is and located where it is; yes, we can afford it and yes, we will spend the necessary money." That proved to be very true although my Soviet colleagues were right: it does cost a lot of money to have the Egyptians as friends.

Q: Okay. You were there; the Shah was going downhill rapidly and went down. What were you picking up about the Soviet view of Iran?

MILES: Well, that was some of the most interesting work I did, I think, and I really liked the Russian diplomats that I dealt with at that time. I felt they were serious people and not particularly ideological, and they had a dog in the fight because of their geographic location, you know. They had a long common border with Iran, and they were interested in Iran because of that and also because we were interested in Iran. But it was not an ideological struggle. There was not really any kind of a Communist Party in Iran. The Shah was as anti-communist as anyone on earth, and Ayatollah Khomeini was close behind him if not ahead of him on that score. So ideology didn't really enter into it; the Iran problem was one on which they could be a little more objective and a little more willing to enter into discussions. And so I had some good discussions with them.

The fear was, and I shared that fear, one of misapprehension on either side. For example, the Soviets feared that we would intervene militarily to prop the Shah up. We already had a strong military assistance program in Iran. We had military and other advisors and so on, but we didn't have any particular troop presence in Iran, so the Soviets were afraid that we would try to insert a troop presence in some way right on their southern border, which they didn't like. They wouldn't like it now—the Russians wouldn't like it now—and the Soviets didn't like it then. Our fear was something of a mirror image of that—that they might think we were going to intervene and would pre-empt us by inserting a Soviet military presence. And, as you know, there was a precedent for that back during World War II, when Stalin sent the Red Army in and occupied northern Iran for quite a while. They later declared a government there and only withdrew under a certain amount of pressure. So there was kind of a precedent. And it would be easy to do, logistically. The terrain is such that you can in fact do that relatively easily. And so my Soviet colleagues and I spent a certain amount of time trying delicately to feel each other out and in a way wanting to be able to reassure our respective bosses that there was no such planning—that there was sensitivity and unease, but that there was no real planning for a pre-emptive move on either side. I don't overestimate the role that I was playing. For one thing, I wasn't privy to any plans that we might have had to help the Shah militarily. But in my reading of the tea leaves, this was not something that we were gearing up to do. So maybe to some degree that objective dialog at a working level helped to keep the two sides calmed down and helped to prevent any hotheads from doing something we all might later have regretted.

Q: Well, in a way, when you're a diplomat in a situation like that—I mean, obviously your antennae are out trying to figure out what the hell the Soviets are up to. But somebody at the Soviet Embassy had to be trying to figure out what the Americans were up to, you know, back in Washington.

MILES: Oh sure, yes.

Q: And were you comfortable in assuring them we wouldn't put troops in or were you—?

MILES: Well, I wouldn't use the word, "assuring". After all, I was just discussing the situation with my Soviet colleagues. I wasn't delivering demarches or anything. But these were serious discussions albeit at the working level. In preparation for them I did read all the traffic I could get my hands on and I had to our defense attachés and others in the Embassy. Of course, real war planning is something you don't get into at the working level—or even higher than that. In my experience, only a small handful of people know precisely that offensive military action is about to happen. I did experience one exception to that rule. When we were about to go to war with Serbia in 1999; I did know that military action was imminent. In fact, we used the steps toward war which NATO was taking as a form of pressure on Milosevic to do what we wanted him to do vis-à-vis Kosovo.

However, I can also remember when we had the invasion, or whatever you want to call it, of Grenada. I was in the Politico-Military Bureau at that time and a Marine colonel who was working for me called up one of his military friends down in Florida who had some commanding role in that part of the world. His friend was out on the golf course at the time and it turned out in this guarded telephone conversation that he knew absolutely nothing about the imminent intervention in Grenada. The fellow from my office said something like, “John, are you aware of anything special that’s going on in your neck of the woods right now?” And “John”, whoever he was, a general, said, “No, no. I’m out on the golf course—a beautiful day here in Florida, and everything seems to be quiet.” My officer said, “I think you’d better look over your shoulder at the Atlantic Ocean and see if you can see or smell some stack gas over there, on the horizon. You’d better get back to your headquarters and do some looking around.” And so that was the first that this general, who had some responsibility for military operations in that area, found out that we were about to invade Grenada. So you don’t always know.

And events, as you remember, events in Iran happened very rapidly. I remember getting a copy of a cable that Embassy Paris had sent out because Ayatollah Khomeini was living in Paris at that time, and the reporting officer very nicely described the Ayatollah’s ideas and his thoughts and plans about getting ready to return to Iran because of this turmoil. And my boss at that time circled the subject line about the Ayatollah and sent it down to me with a little note saying, “Dick, who or what is an ayatollah?” And I wrote back and said, “Well, you know, we all probably should start learning these things.” And I was more prescient than I thought. I didn’t know, of course, that within about two weeks the Shah would flee the country, the Ayatollah would return, and a whole new chapter of Iranian and world history would begin to unfold.

There is an interesting denouement to my comments on Iran. At that time, when we shredded classified documents, the shredder cut them into long, narrow strips. They were not shredded into tiny, unreadable bits of paper the way they are nowadays. So, after the radical students had taken over the Chancery in Tehran, they gathered all these piles of shredded “strips” and laboriously matched and pasted those strips together, and they reconstructed quite a few of the classified cables and reports that had been in the Embassy files. Then they issued a set of books—14 volumes, actually—called “Documents from the Nest of Spies”. Several of the classified cables that I wrote from Moscow were in there, recounting my conversations with Soviet diplomats and other Soviets about the situation in Iran. I had, of course, sent copies to our embassy in Tehran and these had been duly filed away. I bought a set of those books and I can tell you that I read those cables very, very carefully to see if I had burned my Soviet colleagues in any way or if I had said things that were over the top. And, I’m very happy to say, they held up quite well.

Q: Well, you had left, I guess, by the time the hostages were taken? No, no, that was—

MILES: Yes, the students took over the Chancery in November 1979 and I had left earlier that year, in the summer. So I missed that and also the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in December. However, my wife Sharon and I were in the Embassy in Moscow when Spike Dubs was killed in Kabul. That happened in February 1979. Before Ambassador Dubs went to Kabul he had been the DCM in Moscow so he still had a lot of friends in Moscow.

Q: Did people like the Syrians and all—did they play much of a role? Not in the Iranian thing but just in the Arab-Israeli conflict?

MILES: We were very interested in what the Syrians thought. They had good diplomats; it was a professional foreign service and they were among the people that I stayed in touch with. I also stayed in touch with the Yemeni diplomats, who were very knowledgeable about regional events. I really liked the way the Yemenis made coffee. Often I would see the Yemeni Ambassador. Moscow is such a big place that our ambassador just didn't have time to pay attention to everyone and many of these foreign embassies were small. The Yemeni Embassy probably had no more than five or six people in it, so when I'd go over, I'd often be received by the Ambassador and it was usually the deputy that I saw in the Syrian Embassy. He was a very sensible person. This was an interesting time in Moscow because, while I was there, the situation turned 180 degrees around with regard to our relationship with the Egyptians and also with our relationship with the Ethiopians and the Somalis. So when I started my assignment in 1976, I was on reasonably good terms with the Ethiopians and not with the Somalis. With the Egyptians, prior to the shift, I had not had much of a relationship at all but, after the shift, I developed a very close relationship with the Egyptians, including the Egyptian Chargé, Farouk Shelbaya. He later came to Washington, was deputy at their embassy here in Washington, a very nice fellow. And I remember being in his apartment in Moscow when we both listened together to the famous speech when Sadat had gone over to Israel and had addressed the Israeli Knesset. Truly, that was a dramatic moment and it was an honor to be able to sit there with the Egyptian Chargé and listen to that speech.

Q: Were the Soviets concerned about what was happening at Camp David, you know, our strong involvement in the Middle East peace process?

MILES: I just don't recall the Soviet reaction to Camp David. I'm sure it was high on my agenda at the time, but, unfortunately, my memory is blank. I expect the Soviets were going through a confusing period trying to construct a revised Middle East policy from the wreckage left after they were ousted from Egypt. Egypt is such an important place, and to suddenly be replaced by the United States, that was quite a blow to their prestige. Of course, they retained their influence with the various Palestinian liberation organizations. But, in terms of state to state relationships, the "loss" of Egypt was a body blow.

Q: In a way, when you look at it, what would be in it for the Soviets in the Middle East?

MILES: Well, depending on which country you're talking about, the Middle East was either on or very close to Soviet borders, so there was a security angle there. We seem to have difficulty understanding Soviet and, now, Russian, sensitivity to their borders. The Middle East also provided the Soviets an increased capability either to keep things stable or unstable, depending on how they wanted to play the issues. Tension kept the West off balance and it also promoted the prospects for arms sales. An enormous quantity of armor, artillery, aircraft and air defense systems and small arms and ammunition were sold to the Egyptians. Training was provided as well. And of course Egypt is a strategically located country, sitting on the Suez Canal and on the Mediterranean Sea the way it is. It's had a strategic location for five or six thousand years.

Politically it meant a lot to the Soviets. Egypt was still important in the Non-Aligned Movement. But mainly, I think if their influence had been replaced by that of France or Italy, it wouldn't have bothered them nearly as much as it did to see their influence replaced by that of the United States. They do tend to think in terms of a zero sum game.

Q: This was your first time in the Soviet Union?

MILES: Yes.

Q: What was our—I realize you weren't dealing in internal affairs, but what was your impression of the system and how things were being handled? Did you get around at all?

MILES: I made a few trips, but I didn't travel a lot in the Soviet Union at that time. My work was pretty much in Moscow. My wife Sharon worked for the Information Agency while we were in Moscow and, actually, she traveled quite a bit. I remember going to Dushanbe in early 1979, down in Tajikistan. I was trying to ferret out what the locals thought about what was happening in Afghanistan which was only—the border was only about 150 kilometers from Dushanbe and Dushanbe was only 450 kilometers from Kabul, itself. Now, to a man—from the party and republic and city officials to the Grand Mufti of the Islamic community and on down to the taxi drivers and the market vendors—the Tajiks professed to have no knowledge of Afghanistan whatsoever. "Afghanistan?" they would say. "Is that where..." with the meaning of, "Is it on the moon or something?" They absolutely did not want to talk about Afghanistan with an American diplomat. Well, this ubiquitous silence was itself cause for concern. Clearly there was tension in the air. But as far as specific information was concerned, the trip was totally worthless. Of course, it was very interesting to be there as a tourist, but that was not the purpose of my trip.

I remember one of those lovely Foreign Service moments from that trip sitting outdoors on a "topjon"—a raised wooden platform—under the "chinar" trees. We call them plane trees. I was the guest of the Grand Mufti. The mosque was there, snowcapped mountains in the background—a beautiful day sitting there with our shoes off on Oriental carpets with lamb stew and tea and melons and so forth, just beautiful. And, of course, I wanted to talk about Afghanistan and also about Islam in Tajikistan. However, the first question the Grand Mufti had was whether the Senate would ratify the SALT-II agreement once it was reached. He had been primed by his KGB masters just as I had been primed, but unfortunately we wanted to talk about totally different subjects. Would have made a good movie scene.

One had the impression before going to the Soviet Union that it was a very formidable place, a world power, a nuclear power. After you were there a while, you could appreciate the resources and the power of the State and the size of the country. I remember being impressed just with the size of Moscow. Moscow is an enormous city and has a great subway system, very broad streets, tall buildings and so on. Some people thought that the massive size of the streets and buildings was to make people feel small and intimidated; I simply think that Russians think on a grand scale. But then, living there in those days—the mid-1970s—you began to see things that made you realize that things were not as they seemed, that this was not as powerful a state as they would have you believe. I remember early on, taking my kids out to the Park of National Economic Achievements—this was a permanent fairground near the outskirts of Moscow. Each of the member republics had a pavilion out there and they would display their wares. There would be a display of melons from Uzbekistan or a display of textiles from Estonia, whatever, and also exhibits of technical things. They had a model of the first satellite, the Sputnik, and so forth. So it was kind of exciting. OK, fine. And then the kids had to go to the bathroom, of course, so we took them into the public toilets there, and beside each toilet was a little stack of torn up squares of Pravda. I mean, they didn't even have toilet paper. An old Russian lady was actually snipping up the back copies of Pravda into little six or eight inch squares that she stacked very neatly next to each toilet. Well, at least the little squares were there. In many parts of Moscow and all around the Soviet Union, there were no little squares even of Pravda. I mean, everyone quickly learned to bring their own Kleenex or toilet paper in their pocket or purse when they went out traveling. And so, little things like that made you realize that this place was maybe not the industrial giant it was cracked up to be.

It was not easy to just travel freely in those days. We diplomats had to submit a diplomatic note if we wanted to go further than, as I recall, 25 kilometers from the center of Moscow. Because of détente, there had been a tiny liberalization in this travel regime. If you didn't get a negative answer to your dip note back from the Soviet travel people, you had permission to go. This actually did make travel easier although sometimes not. Sharon once took a five or six hour plane ride out to Akademgorodok to deliver some mail to a couple of American scientists out there. When the plane landed a guard armed with a sub-machine gun came on board and told her to stay in her seat. Everyone else got off and then the guard said that she did not, in fact, have permission to make this trip and that she would have to return to Moscow. The plane then returned to Moscow with her on board as the sole passenger. Admittedly this didn't happen very often.

There were a couple of spots near Moscow including one nice stretch of river bank which were available to the diplomats for recreation. The Embassy maintained an old dacha and grounds within the travel circle, and there were a couple of other spots available for picnicking. Except for our dacha, we found these places depressing because Soviets were excluded and we tended to avoid them. In short, one felt very hemmed in by the Soviet travel restrictions.

Because of the restrictive nature of Soviet society, Sharon and I had very few relationships that approached friendship. Sharon had more than I did because of her work in the field of exchanges and of culture but even then, we were careful about who we invited to our apartment. In the three years that we were there I don't suppose we entertained more than a handful of Soviets. I think the only Soviet that we had a real friendship with was a young radio announcer for what was called Radio Peace and Progress. It was kind of the Soviet equivalent of RFE or RL and technically was separate from the Soviet government. But I found out through him that when he lined up to get his pay, he got it from the same people that paid the employees of the ordinary state radio, so it was all just kind of a sham. I met him at one of the seemingly constant parties thrown by the young African diplomats. He was there because he was one of the broadcasters in English and Swahili over Radio Peace and Progress. And somehow we got to know each other. We'd be invited to the same parties and we enjoyed talking to each other. Sharon and I gave parties too, and we invited him over a couple of times. That turned out to be a mistake. For him, getting close to my wife and me was an unauthorized relationship. Because of his work, he was allowed, even encouraged, to have a relationship with the African diplomats and to go to their apartments and parties but he wasn't allowed to have a relationship with American diplomats. So at first his boss was warned by the KGB that this fellow was seeing me, an American diplomat, and that this was not desirable. His boss, who seemed like a decent person, although I never met him, was told to tell my friend to back away from this relationship with the Americans. He didn't back off. Then my friend was called in and asked whether or not he liked his job. If he wanted to keep it, he should back off. Nonetheless he kept our friendship going and then he was told something like, "The next step for you could be prison but what we probably will do with you is just send you out into exile somewhere 'beyond the mountains', as we say, and you can think about your sins out there. You will not be coming back to Moscow the rest of your life and so, if that is what you want, just go and see this American diplomat once again." So at that point he decided he would have to break it off. And I remember very vividly the last time he came to our apartment. He was crying; this grown man was crying. He came just in order to say goodbye to us, and it was a very sad business. He was visibly unhappy, was crying, thought he lived in a lousy system, and what kind of a place was this where you couldn't have a normal relationship with a foreigner. I forget how we had come together for that last meeting, but I remember distinctly driving him back to a place near his apartment in the early morning, it was like 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning after a night of drinking and crying in our apartment. I actually had him hide in the space between the rear seat and the front seat of the car so he wouldn't be seen by the building guards at the exit from our apartment parking lot—probably I brought him in the same way, I don't remember—and then I drove in a kind of a roundabout way through town and dropped him off quickly at a metro stop where he scurried down into the metro and went on his way. I never saw him again, but I heard from my African friends that he had been removed from the radio station and was working as a translator for fishing talks between the Soviet Union and West African coastal countries. That was the kind of a place that it was, even under Brezhnev.

There is an ironic twist to that story. At that time there was an American government program in which officers could buy books to give to Soviet acquaintances and you could get reimbursed for it by one of the information agency officers. I did this fairly often. Well, at one time my friend told me that his sister, who didn't live in Moscow, was studying the works of the American author Thomas Wolfe, the North Carolina Thomas Wolfe, and how hard it was for her to do her graduate work because all his books were in the "closed collection" and she had to get a pass signed and stamped in order to go into the closed collection. She could read the books there, take notes and then leave the books there, but she couldn't take the books out. Of course, this was a hellishly slow process for someone trying to write a dissertation. And I said, "Oh, we can fix that." So I bought him every paperback Thomas Wolfe novel available—it made a handsome, heavy, big box of books—and handed them over to him. He was absolutely delighted and, of course, his sister was more than delighted. Then I went to get my money back from the information agency's book procurement person, and this snotty woman, I will never forget it, sent me a note back saying, "We are unable to reimburse you for these books because Thomas Wolfe does not present a positive picture of American life." Isn't that ironic? And in the Soviet Union, too. Bureaucracy everywhere.

Q: That pretty well wipes out a whole generation of writers. I mean, you know, Dreiser, F. Scott Fitzgerald.

MILES: Or Mark Twain. I mean, good lord, I'm not quite sure who you'd have left if that's your criterion.

Q: Did you have any particular problems with harassment by the KGB or anything?

MILES: Not really. Once I was held under—I don't know what you'd call it—office arrest, I guess. It was innocent and, in retrospect, was kind of funny. Sharon and I were fairly active in getting around in Moscow. I enjoyed the hell out of it; I just thought it was a wonderful thing to be an American diplomat in the Soviet Union. Anyhow, I had an appointment. I was successful in getting an appointment over at the Soviet bureaucratic equivalent of USAID—GKES, they called it, Gosudarstvenniy Komitet po Vneshnim Ekonomicheskim Svyazyam, or the State Committee for Foreign Economic Ties. It covered a building about the size of the Pentagon. I mean, it was an enormous building and no American that I knew had ever been over there before. So I went to where I thought I was supposed to go. The drivers didn't know either. They had never taken an American there so they didn't know which entrance I should use. So I went to this enormous two block square building, went in one of the entrances and the guard there—you had to announce who you were to the guards at all these official buildings, show him your pass and say who you were there to see and so on. Well, in this case, the guard looked at me like I had crawled out from under a rock. He was armed, of course, and he said, "Sit here!" Then he began a long series of phone calls. Meanwhile I kept noticing my African and Middle Eastern and some Latin American military friends from the various embassies come strolling in wearing their uniforms and looking at me very strangely like, "What are you doing here?" And then I found out—I really didn't know—that there were two halves of GKES, this Soviet aid organization. There was the civilian half and then there was the military half. Needless to say, I was in the military half and I was definitely not supposed to be there. So the poor civilian bureaucrat that I was supposed to be meeting had to come all the way around the outside of the building—I guess there wasn't a connection between the two halves of the building inside. He had to come all the way out and around the building to get me. He was a little bit pissed off because he thought I had done this deliberately. Anyhow, he escorted me back around to his side of the building where we had a fairly short and uncomfortable conversation. I hope that poor fellow didn't get demoted for my mistake but, still, this was kind of funny.

But no, I personally wasn't bothered or harassed much. Others were; some severely so. At that time, you'd have to call the Soviet Union a police state. I mean, it wasn't terrible like the times of the political trials in the '30s, '40s and '50s. That period of severe repression had ended. But the KGB and the other police and "competent organs", as they called themselves, did keep an eye on things. They had so many people and they were so fearful of contact between Soviet citizens and foreigners that you kept running into them. Sharon worked in the cultural affairs section, and she would be out with poets and jazz musicians, free spirits who in those balmy days of détente were not so concerned about the police and their contacts, and she was constantly being hustled out of an apartment or a, I wouldn't call it a nightclub, but a club or some equivalent because they had heard that the police were on their way to check IDs and it would be better for everyone if she were not there.

And then I remember one incident with our son Richard. He was then about 12 years old, I guess, and he had developed a good friendship with a number of Soviet boys and maybe some girls too but mostly young boys, because when we first were assigned to our apartment we were in the middle building of three identical, brand new buildings. They were 16 story buildings, probably with 40 or 50 apartments in each building. Foreigners and diplomats mostly were in the middle building, but in the other two buildings there were Soviet managerial types, military officers, upper middle class people by their standards, which is sort of where we would fit in. And because the buildings were new when we moved in, the parking lot was not finished and they hadn't completed the fence around our building yet—a fence designed to keep people out. So, children being children, the kids proceeded to make friends without regard for citizenship and so on. From Norway and Belgrade, our son had learned that one way to make friends was to take his Matchbox cars outside and just begin playing with them. For the other young boys in the neighborhood, this was like exposing flowers to bees. The process did play hell with his Matchbox collection since the cars tended to disappear, but it was a good way to make friends. Russians are inherently friendly and hospitable people and Richard would be invited up to the Soviet kids' apartments for tea or soup or whatever and we didn't try to interfere with any of that. We didn't try to exploit it; we didn't try to interfere with it. So he quickly developed a number of friends and they had a lot of fun together, including some weird Soviet-type experiences. He told me once later, I didn't know it at that time, but some drunks who were sitting outside one of the nearby apartment buildings to play chess and drink decided to build a fire. Then they put an old door on top of the bonfire and would lift the little boys up and have them dance on top of the door. I'm glad I didn't know anything about that at the time.

But one incident that I did know about was this. Some of the boys had been used to coming into our building, and a couple of them had been up in our apartment, so they continued trying to do it even after the fence went up. They would climb over the fence or under the fence or through the fence or whatever, and they would come on in. The police, the KGB basically, who stood guard in front of our apartment building, kept trying to chase them out and would talk to their parents to keep them out of the building where the foreigners lived. And so at one point the police actually conducted a little boy raid. They blocked the doors and conducted a kind of raid through the stairwell and the hallways of the building. They rounded up about 10 or 12 of these little boys and took them off to the police station. Then they systematically called their parents, one after the other, to come down and pick up their kid and get a lecture about keeping their kids away from these foreigners. By then our son spoke fairly decent Russian; I mean, he learned it all from these Russian kids so it sounded Russian. Well, they finally got around to him and they said, "Where does your papa work?" And of course he was scared out of his wits; he said his father worked at the American Embassy. The cop probably thought, "Uh, oh! Somebody's going to get it for sure!" And then he said, "Well, what does he do?"—thinking he was one of the Soviet local employees of the Embassy. And our son said, "I don't know; he's a diplomat." Oh boy! All of a sudden they sat him on the desk; they went out and bought him ice cream; they asked if there was anything he needed; they drove him home. And they asked him if he would please not tell anybody about it. Of course he did tell us, but they had treated him very well; there was no rough stuff or anything so we never raised any fuss about it. But that just shows you the extent to which contact with foreigners was controlled.

There is another amusing story involving our children and their close relationship with Soviet society. Moscow was so safe in those days that we let our kids ride the public transportation all around the city. The trolleybus that connected the Chancery and our house ran by Gorky Park and our children would often get off there and explore the park. Our son Richard became friends with the fellow who ran what we would call the bumper car concession. Now in Moscow, people didn't bump into the other cars during their ride; they just drove around clockwise in a big circle. Anyhow, the concession manager let our son stay on the public address system and call out every few minutes, "Na levo, na levo, tovarishchi, na levo!" Imagine! The son of an American diplomat urging the good Soviet citizenry and their children to "Stay to the left, comrades, stay to the left!" This was our son's first "job" and, even though he was only paid in "ponchiki" [Russian donuts], he was very proud of his job.

Here's one more story. Embassy officers used to go to these Znaniye [Knowledge] Society lectures. These were held frequently and what they were was a public meeting in a public building. There would be an announced speaker on a particular topic. All sorts of different people would give these lectures: sometimes someone from the Central Committee apparatus, sometimes a professor from a university, or maybe someone who had just written a book or had come back from living in Ethiopia or Somalia or some place. He or she would talk about it and then would answer questions from the audience. Since these lectures and especially the follow-on question and answer sessions gave us a rare glimpse into Soviet public opinion, someone from the American Embassy would try to attend each one of these lectures. We didn't ask questions; we tried to be very quiet and discreet. After the lecture, people would write their questions on a piece of paper and pass them up front where a moderator would select those that the speaker would then try to answer. Sometimes the questions were quite blunt, even provocative, and sometimes the speaker would answer in an equally blunt way. Sometimes the moderator, who was, after all, a Party official, would look at the slip of paper and say, "Comrades, this is a very provocative question and not suitable for this forum," and he would toss it aside, wouldn't even read it out loud and so you thought, "What the hell was that? I would love to know what that was." But anyhow, it was the closest thing in the Soviet Union to a public forum, so we would sit there and take notes of these questions and answers, and they always made an interesting cable.

I was sitting there one evening at the main building used by the Moscow Znaniye Society, which, incongruously or maybe deliberately, was located cater-corner from the KGB headquarters, the famous Lubyanka building. There were maybe 200 people in the hall. People would be assigned to come to these lectures from their apartment building, their block area, or they would be assigned to come from the organization or from the factory shop where they worked. They were supposed to take notes and report back to the organization which had sent them in the first place. It was part of the required political work that everybody had to do from time to time. Well anyhow, I was sitting there taking my notes and this young kid sitting next to me, he was probably 16, 17 years old, was just fascinated with what I was doing. I don't know, maybe he just realized I was a foreigner, dressed like a foreigner or whatever, and so at the end of the event he asked if I were a Russian? And I said, "No, I'm not. I'm a foreigner." And he asked, "Well what kind of a foreigner? Where are you from?" And I said, "I'm American." And he asked, "What are you doing here?" Not hostile but just curious. Anyhow, there was no secret to it. I said, "I'm from the American Embassy. We attend these affairs and I'm interested in what's going on in your country." So he said, "I am really interested in America. Can we go somewhere and talk?" I said I really didn't think it was a good idea for him to do that: his teachers and his parents wouldn't like it and the authorities wouldn't like it. He said, "No, no, it's okay, times have changed, and it's not like the old days." I said, "Well, in many ways it's still like the old days and, no, I'm not going to go and talk to you somewhere." Then he asked, "How are you going home?" I said that I would take the trolleybus and he said, "Can I get on the bus with you and ride to your home? We can talk on the bus." And I said, "Well, I can't prevent you getting on the bus if you want to do so." So he did and we had a fairly good chat. He was just curious: how much does a worker make in the United States? Does everybody have a car? What does a car cost? Can you have a cow? You know, that kind of thing.

And then we got to where I was going, to where I lived, and I said, "Now I'm going to say goodbye to you here and thank you for the conversation." I never did tell him my name. And anyhow, he said, "Can I come up and see your apartment? I would really like to see an American apartment." And I said, "Look, I hate to be the one to tell you these things but you don't live in a society in which this is tolerated. This kind of curiosity is just going to get you in trouble. I'm sorry but, no, I'm not going to take you in and show you my apartment." He got very upset and said, "You don't understand our society. We are changing; we are not like we used to be." I said, "I'm sorry. I think I do know enough about your society to know that this would not be good for you and, no, I'm not going to do it." Well, that was not a very happy encounter. So you kept having experiences like that all the time in the Soviet Union. Restaurants and trains were just about the only places where you could have a conversation with an ordinary citizen. That was because everyone knew that these were chance encounters and most unlikely ever to be repeated.

Now, people who were trying to ferret out state secrets, like our defense attachés or whatever, or the people who were doing the internal affairs work, where they were in touch with the so-called "otkazniki" or refuseniks or the dissidents and so on, they were harassed a lot by the authorities. I mean, to the point of people breaking in, well, entering their apartments and making sure they knew that they had been entered, using the toilet and not flushing it or leaving a cigarette butt in an ash tray or even in a cup and saucer of coffee which they had made for themselves. They just wanted our people to know that they were there. But that kind of a thing, well I don't doubt for a minute that our apartment was searched periodically, the telephones tapped and all that. We assumed all that and it just didn't bother us a whole lot. This was the Soviet Union, after all. But while other people in the Embassy absolutely were harassed, we were not. Because we knew that the apartment was bugged, we had to warn our children not to talk openly about their Russian friends—to call them by name or to mention what their parents did for a living—to protect their friends from getting into trouble with the Soviet authorities. That was a real hardship because we, like most American parents, wanted our children to share their experiences with us and to be open about discussing their activities.

This was also the time when the Soviets bombarded the Embassy with microwaves and we and others in the Embassy were rather concerned about that. The microwaving of the Embassy had been going on for several years but it became public knowledge only while I was still at Garmisch. There were two of us who were going on to Moscow from Garmisch: Marilyn Johnson, a senior USIA officer, and me. The Department gave us the option of backing out of the assignment if we wanted to, but neither of us wanted to do that: we both wanted to go on to Moscow. Sharon wasn't happy about it, but she went along with it and so we did go to Moscow. I don't think our family ever suffered any health problems as a result of the microwaving that was still going on, but there was a big fuss in the State Department about this because a lot of people—particularly pregnant women—felt that their health was impaired by that microwaving and even Ambassador Stoessel's health was felt by many to be impaired by the microwaving. When the Johns Hopkins study, which the State Department paid for, came out and in essence said there was no real evidence of a direct link between the microwaving, which definitely had gone on, and the health problems, which definitely had occurred, there was great skepticism among the Moscow Embassy veterans. I'm skeptical about this study myself, to be blunt. Sharon and I attend an annual reunion of people who were in the Embassy at the time of the big fire there. At this gathering people still talk about the health problems which they firmly believe were caused or at least exacerbated by the microwaving.

Q: At the time you had left, how had things developed with American-Soviet relations?

MILES: Well, by 1979, things had begun to deteriorate. I can't point to any one thing that would provide clear evidence of the deterioration of the relationship or even a cause of the deterioration but, with hindsight, you can see that the impending invasion of Afghanistan was a major factor. As you remember, the Soviets went into Afghanistan in a big way in December of '79, five or six months after I left, but the turmoil in Afghanistan was such that we all felt that there was an increasing possibility of Soviet military intervention long before that. Actually, in the Embassy in Moscow, we didn't think that way at first and we used to have stiff arguments about it with our colleagues in the American Embassy in Kabul. But by mid-1979, when the objective situation in Afghanistan was seriously beginning to change for the worse and when you could see that the Soviets were increasingly concerned, the chances for intervention had clearly increased rather than decreased. Up until 1979 or thereabouts, Embassy Moscow felt that the Soviets probably would not intervene because it would destroy détente, which was very important to the Soviets and because intervention carried certain risks. Any military adventure of that sort carries its risk, as we know—or should know. It does seem to be a difficult lesson to learn, doesn't it? Embassy Kabul had been saying all along, "Well, that all may be true, but we see the signs here of serious and worsening internal difficulties and commensurate Soviet concern and we rate the probability of intervention as high." The Soviets had already sold some armor and other equipment to Afghanistan; they had quite a few military advisors there, plus there was the fact that Afghanistan was on the Soviet border. The significance of that last point also seems to be something that Washington policy makers have a very hard time absorbing. So without being able to say that Embassy Moscow saw this clearly in, let's say, 1978, we did come around in 1979. So the Soviet invasion in December 1979 was probably not a great surprise. And we were right about one thing. The invasion certainly tore détente in half and it never really recovered after that.

Q: You were in Moscow, I believe, when Spike Dubs was killed.

MILES: That's right. Yes, I was.

Q: Of course Spike had been a Soviet hand.

MILES: And my predecessor in my job in Embassy Moscow was down there with him in Kabul, although, happily, not in the hotel room where Ambassador Dubs was killed.

Q: And I heard talk through interviews that many people point a very firm finger towards the KGB as far as the killing goes.

MILES: I've read several accounts of that incident and they perhaps could have restrained the Afghan authorities from all that shooting and saved his life. I mean, they were shooting into a closed room so—

Q: Yes, but also that he was shot by what appeared to be a Soviet weapon. But you know who knows? But the point being, while you were there, what was the—was there any sort of supposition about the killing of Spike? Why he was killed?

MILES: Well, of course, Soviet weaponry is all over the world. I wouldn't read anything into that. And certainly the Soviets supplied the Afghans with weapons. But, no, I don't recall much speculation about the Ambassador's death. We did wonder whether it was a deliberate act or a bad accident or just recklessness on the part of the KGB or GRU or whoever was working with their Afghan friends. Anyhow, I'm not aware of any inside information that would indicate Soviet complicity in his murder or death.

RAYMOND ELLIS BENSON
Press/Cultural Affairs Officer, USIS
Moscow (1975-1979)

Raymond Benson was born in New York City in 1924. He served in the U.S. Army between WWII and the Korean War. He graduated from the University of Wisconsin and attended the Russian Institute at Columbia University. He joined the United States Information Agency (USIA) in 1957. His overseas posts include, Zagreb, Belgrade, Hamburg, Turkey, and Moscow. Mr. Benson was interviewed by Robert Daniels in 2000.

Q: Then after Turkey in 1975, you finally got to Moscow.

BENSON: Yes, via a direct transfer. My predecessor had to leave, because of his next assignment, prior to my arrival. My availability for transfer was keyed to the arrival of my successor in Turkey, so there couldn't be an overlap in Moscow. So, they sent me to Moscow under TDY (temporary duty) orders for a week, 10 days. I went up in April, I guess it was, of 1975 and spent a week there, getting briefed and talking to my predecessor. Under my official transfer orders I went directly to Moscow from Ankara in June arriving June 21st--a day that will live in infamy, right?--to find Moscow in a state of great excitement because the Apollo-Soyuz link-up, they were about to blast off [Ed: launch for Apollo and Soyuz 19 was July 15. The two craft docked July 17; last undocking was July 19. Soyuz landed on July 21 and Apollo landed July 24, 1975] . So the place was full of newsmen, NASA officials. It never happened again, but it was appropriate to the time. It was a time of euphoria. Most people now, I suspect, wouldn't know it, and I think that we would forget it.

Q: You mean détente was flourishing.

BENSON: Well, 1975. You know who was in office here. But this was an event that was both literal and symbolic, the link-up and stehofka, handshake, in space. We had a space art exhibit opening soon after I arrived. They had one arranged by the Smithsonian--and they had one at the Smithsonian probably years later--as part of the NASA agreement. Of all things, it was put into some paragraph, and everybody paid attention to that one. It was a very interesting show.

It was a time of great confusion in the USIA office, I should say USIS office. Of all of the officers at USIS, Moscow and Leningrad that summer all but one were transferred. This is an absolute disastrous personnel upheaval. It's just all wrong. It included secretaries, I mean American secretaries.

Q: It just happened by coincidence?

BENSON: There's nothing coincidental about it. It was just bad, careless personnel planning. In the Foreign Service this cannot happen, should not. Two years prior somebody should have been calculating when peoples' tour expired. So during that summer the one person who would be returning to the post was on home leave, in Vermont, by the way.

Q: Who was that?

BENSON: Lynn Noah. He lives in Eden in the oldest asbestos mining area. He was gone that summer. And as my staff melted away and new ones came in, we literally didn't know where the files were. We would call Washington at the end of the day and ask them to find in the area office something that we thought might be there, because we couldn't find it in Moscow. Well, we got a good staff soon and put the place in order, but it was something else. The ambassador then was Walter Stoessel [Ed: who served from March 1974 to September 1976].

Q: What was his style of operation like?

BENSON: Well, I sensed it immediately, because of my unique security clearance situation. The arrangement with the Security people back to Washington again, I told them that this was something that I had to do; they didn't ask me to do it, was I would go into the Ambassador and say, "Have you read my file? Have you been informed? Do you know who I am?" And if not, I would tell him everything I could, and I would tell him, you know, "I have a sister here in Moscow, half-sister, whom I've never seen, never been in touch." And the Security people were very relaxed about that, and I said, "I do not intend at the beginning of my tour to look her up. I know the address. She lives in the same house I lived in when I was there from 1931 to 1933." The return address was on that envelope I got in Bethesda.

Q: Where was that address in Moscow?

BENSON: Well, it's the street that's the first street past Prospekt Mira heading in the same direction. It's (Name of Moscow Street). If you're heading toward the railroad station square, you go past the turn-off to Prospekt Myra. The next block you go in about 300 yards and there are these high-rises, and she lives in one of them. So anyway, I told them, “Your attitude is relaxed. You’ve cleared me. I can go in and do whatever I want. If anything happens, you trust me to report to the embassy, to the security officers if there are some pressures being placed on me. I don’t think I have the nerves during my first tour there, during my tour there--I didn’t know how many I would have--to have a nice, warm relationship with my half-sister. I don’t know her family; I don’t know her mother, my father’s second wife; and I don’t know her husband. I don’t know anything. And I just sort of think I can handle that, and I would so tell the Ambassador.” They said, “It’s up to you,” and that’s what I told Stoessel. Well, it turned out that he had heard, and he had a few questions to ask. I don’t remember what they were, but he was clear in his mind when I had been there as a child, and what my father did. He was interested. He was a substantial expert in the field, went to school at Stanford, very bright. He was one of those, though slightly younger, who with Bohlen, Thompson and Kennan...

Q: This is Monday, May 8th, 2000, and we are returning to our conversation with Ray Benson. We are now coming back to chronological consideration of Ray’s career with his first arrival in Moscow in 1975 and his work under Ambassador Stoessel and Malcolm Toon.

BENSON: I think, Bill, we spoke a bit about my arrival as the Apollo-Soyuz mission was about to be launched, in a period of euphoria in Moscow at that time. Fill it in a bit when we get the final text about that early period. You asked, I think, when we were at the conclusion of that interview session, about Walter Stoessel, his mode of operation and so on. Now, Walter Stoessel was an old Russian hand, or Soviet hand. His knowledge of Russian was good, it was very good, and he worked at it. He got up early every day, he read the newspapers, and every day he read a bit in The Master and Margarita by Bulgakov. He spent a lot of time at it. He didn’t read very much every day, but he read every day. He was a very calm and very soft-spoken person, very gentle, very well mannered, and really a pleasure to work with. We spoke, maybe I’ve already mentioned this, we spoke soon after my arrival about my security file and I asked him if he was aware of all of the complications. He said he was. And I said that I would, of course, report anything untoward if I ever was aware of anything untoward--we were all expected to do that--but that I had not changed my mind since my last interview with the security people--I didn’t know if he knew about it, and it turned out he didn’t--in which I told them that I would not be looking up my half-sister until toward the end of my tour. He said, “Fine,” and I said, “When I think I might want to do that, I’ll speak with you first.” He said, “Fine,” and that’s the way we proceeded on that issue. He left, was transferred, replaced by Malcolm Toon [Ed: who presented his credentials on January 18, 1977 and served until October 1979], before that came to pass.

Malcolm Toon, who arrived--bless his heart--on New Year’s Eve of 1976, was a very different kind of person. His knowledge of Russian was, if anything, better than Walt Stoessel’s. It was really very good. I don’t think he read in Master and Margarita, but before he came to the office, he’d look through Pravda and would have Izvestia, which was an afternoon paper, read the evening before. He was well informed. He was a very aggressive person, could be irascible. His relations with the media were very, I shouldn’t say “in your face,” but were less gentle and genial than Walt Stoessel’s. The reason I mention this is because it was a tradition in Moscow to have a once-weekly press conference for Americans, Americans only, and we had a press corps of some size. So attitudes to the American press were quite visible almost immediately.

Q: When you say that Toon was confrontational, this was dealing with the American press or Soviet press people or both?

BENSON: Well, I was thinking of the American press, but Toon was extraordinarily confrontational in dealing with the Soviets period, not only the press corps.

Q: But wasn't that a period, as I recall, when détente was at its warmest?

BENSON: Détente is a modus vivendi which doesn't change its practical pragmatic conclusion on which you base an easing of your policy of confrontation, but it doesn't change the basic nature of the Soviet regime and the fact that they posed great danger to us--I would be quoting him here--there is very much of this that I believe in myself. You have to get along more easily. Détente would have us do that. We would trade more, we would exchange more scholars, we would increase money to exchange of cultural groups and have more exhibits and all of that sort of thing, not to have a congealed relationship.

Q: Let's leave the Front Office and talk about the grunt work of USIS in the Moscow environment.

BENSON: Well, thinking about it now, you know, the way that we've been working, what happens is that I'll go along here and then I'll go home and I'll remember other things and we'll pick it up. It's just the nature of remembrances of things past.

USIS in the Soviet Union at that time was called the Press and Cultural Service, P&C. For some reason or other which escapes me now, USIS was not allowed into the Soviet Union. The Soviets did not want to have the American Information Service propagandizing its people--God forbid--and so we didn't have a USIS in the Soviet Union until many, many years later. We had a Press and Cultural Service. It was divided in the embassy into two parts. One was upstairs, and one was downstairs.

Downstairs was theoretically unclassified, and upstairs was behind the Marine guard in the classified area of the embassy. In the downstairs there was a little library there. Theoretically the Soviet citizens could come in and use the library or come in and talk with USIS officers without--at that time in the history of the American embassy--without being cleared by American officers or Marines. You recall yourself--you were there at your time--you went under the arch. There are two archways which open onto the street you walk through. You walk past the Soviet militiamen, but then if you took the first door to the right, you were in the Press and Cultural Service, P&C down. We had an active program of trying to interest the Soviets, who would not come in, in loan books. We gave books away. We had a film program; we tried to lend them to Soviet institutions. They would be less propagandistic than the films I referred to that were ferried around Yugoslavia after World War II in that film unit. These were didactic, but they weren't pedantic. They were information on aspects of the United States, its history and so on and so forth. We prepared the wireless file. You may know what that is. It came in by teletype, and it was a series of news items and information on the personnel and management of USIS, which were for us only, and we would produce this in many copies for the embassy--it took quite a while--and for other embassies and for certain Soviet offices as well. We had a very active and very worthwhile program of contacts with cultural and media people. The kind of contact I refer to that we had in Yugoslavia was also the case here.

Q: Where you were able to have personal political discussions with people from the Soviet press and intelligencia?

BENSON: Yes. Well, with the intelligencia, especially on the cultural side, they were less interested in the political discussions. With the media people it would be at lunches, and though they weren't confrontation in the 'up yours, Mac' kind of way, they were not as free flowing, quite obviously, as was the case with the Yugoslavs.

Q: Where did you have these lunches and other meetings?

BENSON: Well, they would be in restaurants or at our embassy quarters occasionally, although that was generally in the evening. The cultural affairs officer lived off campus, if you want to call it that, as did the press attaché. There was a woman on my staff who lived in the embassy, but she lived there because she was married to the chief security officer, and he had to live, had to live, on campus.

Q: When you had Russians for groups like this at lunch, was there anyone who clearly appeared to be a security officer who tried to blend in with the group but didn't quite.

BENSON: No, no. We had a certain number of lunches at the embassy, because we had a staff, cook and so on, to help, so it wasn't a great burden. If you had people from Pravda, Izvestia, or Tass, you were not really worried about somebody else who would be along who would be watching them. These were all people who were perfectly capable of reporting on us and these lunches.

Q: Did you have anything to do with the make-up of Soviet delegations coming to this country for various purposes?

BENSON: Well, let me pause and say parenthetically--we'll come back to that in a minute--one of our main points of contact was the Institute for the Study of USA and Canada, the Arbatov Institute.

Q: Was Arbatov the head of it in your time then?

BENSON: Arbatov was the head of it in my time. His deputy was Radimir Giorgiovich Bogdonov, who became a rather good friend, he with his rich GRU history. GRU is the intelligence arm of the Russian military [Ed: the Intelligence Directorate of the Soviet Army General Staff of the Soviet Union].

Q: Right. And, of course, the USA Institute, like the other Russian regional institutes, was presumed to be somewhere between an academic enterprise and a research branch of Soviet central intelligence.

BENSON: Well, it was attached, as all institutes were, to the Academy of Sciences. You knew that. The Latin American Institute, the African Institute, and so on and so forth were all separately located and they were institutes administratively within the Academy of Sciences. The institutes had graduate students assigned to them. Graduate students of substantial promise from Moscow State University and a few other academic institutions, who would, as they were preparing their articles after the Candidate degree and were working toward the time when they would publish the book and become true Ph.D.s, do work at the USA Institute. Later on, when I worked at Middlebury--which at the very end of this we should talk of very briefly since it's outside of the purview of being in the diplomatic corps--we developed an agreement, I did, with Bogdonov by which young scholars of the USA Institute, i.e., those who were working both substantively there to earn their bread and trying to complete their work for mostly Moscow State University, would come to Middlebury and use the Middlebury library and so on, and Middlebury faculty would go to the Soviet Union on a month-by-month equality basis. These were interesting young people post-1987 when I came here and prior also. There were people in the USA Institute who clearly worked for the factory over there, the KGB [Ed: abbreviation for Committee for State Security, the premier Soviet internal security, intelligence, and secret police organization], and others who were less clearly directly involved with that sort of thing.

But let me return to the Soviet media. Some say that contact with the Soviet media was essentially hopeless because any attempt to be convincing was really quite useless. Therefore the more productive relations with Soviet media would be by political officers, because messages could be passed through some of the media people, when one didn't want to go to the Foreign Office to pass a message. Going to the Foreign office was a much more formal act, to ask for an appointment at the Foreign Office, and to go over, and make a statement, leave a paper and that sort of thing.

Q: So it was assumed these messages transmitted to Russian media people would be passed along through their own channels.

BENSON: Oh, yes. And that was not my function at the embassy, you know, that sort of thing. I had, increasingly in my time in Moscow from 1975 to 1979, a reporting function on cultural matters. But that's different from handling the media quite obviously. Here I was led by Jack Matlock. Matlock lived two floors down from us. He was the Deputy Chief of Mission. You know him well. He is totally bilingual and bi-cultured and loved to have cultural people, especially literary people, coming to his apartment for lunches.

Q: He had in fact taught Russian language and literature at Dartmouth before he went into the Foreign Service.

BENSON: Precisely right. He was, in fact, an editor of the Current Digest of the Soviet Press, and he left off being that--we've talked of that before--he left off being that, I believe, a half year before I joined it. He and my wife, present wife, then still a translator at the Current Digest worked together and were very fond of each other as colleagues. He had an amazing library of materials on Russian culture and Russian literature. His weekends were spent very often going through the old bookshops looking for that book by Turgenev which he didn't yet have, and that sort of thing. He steered me to several stories which were breaking in the paper on cultural events, suggesting that, especially in the theater world, the concert world, where, strange as it seems to the ordinary American, there were political implications, there were great political implications, to what was happening in the new production of Tchaikovsky's Queen of Spades, a most amazing thing. He did read a story about a fracas going on in Pravda, called me in and said, "I want you to follow up and report on this." Without necessarily going it all here because this may be too much detail, it took a lot of terribly interesting work for me to get to the bottom of what was going on, and I did, and reported it. He thought it important for the Department to have this even if ultimate implications were not drawn but just as evidence of how these matters, a new staging of the Queen of Spades, for heaven's sakes, were being handled by the Ministry of Culture.

Q: You saw some signs of a certain thaw in Soviet cultural controls, say allowing more experimentation?

BENSON: Well, you could see things happening, a certain loosening and a certain greater freedom, let us say, in theater life, but it would not be possible to say that this was going on, with the approval of the party, or that there were articles which recommended it. What was happening was that there was a gradual absence of the ultimate sanction, which was to close a play down or to throw somebody out of the party; or to have a critical article which would blast it, which would be a mark against the director, the stage designer, everybody connected with it. So you had more wiggle room, and you know that area well and you know that they, the creative intelligencia, were always on the border pushing and they could sense and feel that more would be possible and more was happening. So there were more theater pieces which were critical of life in the Soviet Union. There were not many critical pieces, except by two people I'll come to, of party control of life in the Soviet Union. The two people were (Mikhail) Shatrov and (Alexander) Gelman. Shatrov was an unreconstructed Leninist.

Q: He's the author of that play about the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk in the 1980s where Trotsky reappeared in literature for the first time in decades.

BENSON: Yes, precisely that, and he and Lenin were friends, Trotsky and Lenin, which fact had been ignored in history and certain in the theater. The name of the play will come to me.

Q: I think the play is "The Peace of Brest-Litovsk," about the unfavorable treaty that the new Soviet government signed with Germany to extricate itself from World War I, was written in 1962 but not staged until 1987 because its characters included Trotsky and Bukharin.

BENSON: Yes, that could be, but the point is that here was an alternate way of organizing things or thinking about things in the mouth of Trotsky, who was a nonperson, and suddenly there it was. However, it was in the context of describing Lenin as wise, prudent, collegial, a good leader. Later under Stalin, this wisdom and collegiality was done in, so later what we had was a travesty of Leninism that was Shatrov.

(Alexander) Gelman wrote a series of plays which were really very, very good on the relationship between the party and what was going on in real life, for example, putting a factory into production before it was really ready, because the plan had to be fulfilled here, in this place, in this town, because we all need bonuses, don't we; and for reasons we had no control over, the factory can't be put into production; but if we don't put it into production, no one is going to believe us about all these reasons, which are not our fault, so we've got to put it into production. So they put it into production, and catastrophe ensues. It's the fault of the system. No individual fingers are pointed. The Protokol Odnogo Zasedaniya, or the Meeting of the Party Committee, was a beautiful play, again on party life and the difficulty of maintaining sensible, again collegial, productive human relations. Misha Roshin wrote a series of plays on the social effects of life out there. These were milder, but critical. They were terrifically popular, the Russian plays especially. They were played all over the country in various translations.

Q: So as in 19th century Russia, literature became a vehicle for smuggling in a certain degree of political criticism?

BENSON: Well, yes, even more than smuggling. Once you allow the creative intelligencia, especially the literary types, to move five feet ahead, they'll do it, and within limits which they are clever enough to see, they do magnificent things. You had (Yuri) Lyubimov, the director of the Taganka Theater, who adapted many literary works--including Master and Margarita and Crime and Punishment--for the stage, and collections of short stories, which were critical of collectivization, for the stage, in very sharp productions with very modern stage design.

Q: The meetings, lunches and contacts that you and your colleagues had with people in the Russian intelligencia--this is perhaps hard to answer--do you sense that these meetings had some value in giving the Russian participants new perspectives, a sense of assurance in where they were going? What kind of effect did you think you had on them, not necessarily immediate, but were you laying the groundwork for anything?

BENSON: Well, the short answer is yes, there was value. but that's not really quite enough, because the implications of 'yes' to the question as you pose it are rich. A Soviet intellectual had to make the choice to come to the lunch. Having done that, welcoming that, having looked forward to that, and now it is coming, the time is here where I can accept this invitation.

Q: You presume that they were vetted by their respective organizations and given to understand that it was okay to participate?

BENSON: Well, you know how it worked. Some would timorously inquire; others would go without timorously inquiring and wait to see whether there would be any spin-off. Somebody would visit them, somebody from within the theater who was in charge of the party committee of the theater. The theater's political commissar, who could be five layers down from the head of the theater, visits him, closes the door, and says, "Hey, guy, you're being invited to," let's say, the American public affairs officer or the German cultural affairs officer or whatever, and the commissar and theater notable have a discussion, and the fellow, the director of the theater, in the course of two, three, four, five weeks realizes that nothing has happened other than the commissar's visit. And he, being a citizen of the Soviet Union and having been over this before, says to himself, "Ah ha, a tiny little corner I've gone around, and everything's all right." And that's the way it happens. Word gets out. He talks to people. And that was going on. After all, Brezhnev died in 1982, so we're talking about years before he died during the time when no controls were really officially loosened, but it was the time, as they said, of stagnation. Nothing was happening. Of course, some people, who went really too far, would go into the concentration camps and there would be trials, but basically things were imperceptibly loosening up. Again, quantity and quality: they loosened up imperceptibly until it became apparent that, by golly, much has happened in the last year or two that we were not aware of really.

Q: However, this was the time of the rather dramatic efforts to repress dissidents or even expel them from the country. Such as (Aleksandr Isayevich) Solzhenitsyn, or the story of Zhores Medvedev being put in a mental hospital, which he wrote a book about and then lost his citizenship after he had been allowed to visit London. Did you have any contact with dissidents or direct experience in how dissident were being treated?

BENSON: Well, there are dissidents and then there are dissidents. There was a whole artistic community, I mean artists, painters, sculptors, who were suffered. Some were members of the artists union; some were not members of the artists union. Some made their living essentially by selling their works to foreigners. They didn't live well. They may have another job; it could be firing boilers. They didn't challenge the regime the way Solzhenitsyn did writing about the gulag or Yuri Semyenov and others ended up in prison. You see, if you tried to create a movement of any kind, a social grouping, an association, or to develop a program which would threaten in some way the established order, you could be really taken care of and away you would go. Sakharov ended up in Gorky in internal exile. Before they sent him to Gorky Sakharov was holding constant press conferences. Sakharov was visiting the American embassy.

This was at the time I was there, but I never met him. He left various statements and various letters to the American media which ended up in the offices of the American media. Sakharov pulled up in front of the embassy in a car with chauffeur which came from the motor pool of the Academy of Sciences. You knew this? He did. He, as a senior academician, member of the Academy of Sciences, had the right to call the motor pool and say, "I would like to have a car for two o'clock today," and they would say, "Yes, sir, academic Sakharov." He would get in the car and tell the driver to drive him to the American embassy, and the driver would say, "Yes, sir, academic Sakharov." And there he would be, big, black Volga parked in front of the embassy with Sakharov inside.

Q: In your first tour there were there any dramatic troubles of the American press in Moscow with the police? I'm thinking of, for instance, what happened to Nick Daniloff, I think, later on in the 1980s. He was arrested and accused of espionage.

BENSON: Well, we had several cases that I can remember. I may be confusing first tour and second tour, but it wouldn't matter significantly, and I'll try to straighten it out in the final draft, but one was George Krimsky, George Krimsky in the AP, who--this was first tour definitely--who was accused, as he was packing to leave, by a cleaning lady. You know, all the cleaning ladies, the cooks and bottle washers, what have you were all hired from one office. The businessmen, the journalists, and all diplomats hired all the people whom they wanted to hire, be it a tennis coach or a cook, from the office which was a unit of the Foreign Office and, you might say, intimately connected to the KGB. These people came from that central office. So this cleaning lady reported to her folks, they said, that she was suspicious that Mr. Krimsky was selling things on the black market, and George Krinsky was forbidden to leave the country. George Krinsky came to us and said, "I have this problem."

In cases like this, the media, I would be the action officer representing the embassy if we chose to be helpful. We always chose to be helpful. We had no statutory responsibility for such people. He wasn't a diplomat; he had no diplomatic cover or, should I say, diplomatic rights. So I went to the spokesman. The spokesman of the Foreign Office also was responsible for liaison with foreign press. His office was a big office. At that time his name was Sofinsky. In any case, I went to him and I said, "This is all wrong," and I won't go through all the conversations if I could remember them literally, but finally George was allowed to go. They made him absolutely miserable. I think he went off to Cyprus and we ended up sending him some of his personal books and things like that. These things take an awful lot of time. Craig Whitney of the New York Times and Hap Piper from the Baltimore Sun were accused of writing articles which were slanderous to the Soviet state because they reported that as they were viewing and taping a TV program--do you remember the name (Zviad) Gamsakhurdia?

Q: Oh, yes, a noted Georgian dissident who became its first elected president.

BENSON: Replaced by Shevardnadze, in opposition to Shevardnadze, led a revolt against Shevardnadze, and he is now buried in Georgia. But at that time he was a dissident, and at the end of June 1979, Gamsakhurdia was released from jail and pardoned in controversial circumstances after serving only two years of his sentence. The authorities claimed that he had confessed to the charges and recanted his beliefs; a film clip was shown on Soviet television to substantiate their claim.

Craig Whitney and Hal Piper made a tape of this interview in their news offices, and they played it back and they played it back, and they became convinced that it had been cut and spliced--and they reported that it had been cut and spliced and, therefore, from the Soviet point of view there was a sequential story but something was missing and there was something rotten in the state of the Soviet Union, and the American reporters were visited with a suit, but criminal suit for slandering the Soviet state.

Goodness gracious, this was a substantial offense. There were hearings. There were depositions taken. You just can't believe what a back and forth there was about this. The New York Times and the Baltimore Sun supported their man obviously to the hilt. They wrote editorials about it and so on.

Again, I was the action officer and hung in there with them is really what I did, you know. I visited with them, they would visit with me, they would tell me what was happening, reports would be written by me, and the State Department was terribly concerned about this. They were not ultimately expelled. Their wrists were slapped, and that was that. Now, one of the reasons is that we handled such affairs very properly. There was a quid pro quo. Had they expelled Whitney and Piper, we would have kicked out two Soviet journalists. There's simply no question. It would have happened fast. Their journalists were, to a man, employed by the KGB. Ours, to a man, were not employed by the CIA. So there's something very unequal about their loss, and they chose not to take it.

Q: Did your relations with the Soviets, in terms of contacts with the press and intelligencia or pressure on our press people, get noticeably worse after the Carter Administration took office in 1977 with the conflicts that were developing over the Portuguese colonies in Africa or the Horn of Africa?

BENSON: No. I suppose the Portuguese embassy had two extra guards in front of it to keep out the unruly mobs if they would ever appear chanting "Down with Portugal," but no.

Q: I wonder what impressions may have filtered down to you about working with the Kissinger State Department up through 1976 and then Cyrus Vance and Zbigniew Brzezinski under Carter.

BENSON: Well, it really didn't affect our work at all, USIS's work or the Press and Cultural Service's work. Cyrus Vance came in, and he visited several times with his inevitable press corps and his new press secretary, who was Hodding Carter. I obviously had, and my press people, information people, had an awful lot to do at a time like that just on the level of care and feeding of troops. But the effect on our work on the exhibits which were traveling the country and the cultural groups which were exchanged according to the cultural agreement, no, it wasn't that major.

Q: I've forgotten the dates as to when these cultural agreements were concluded that allowed for the exchange of the performers and the exchange of academics.

BENSON: Well, January 1958 was the first one. It was the so-called Lacy-Zarubin Agreement. [Ed: the Agreement was named after its two chief negotiators, William S. B. Lacy, President Eisenhower's Special Assistant on East-West Exchanges, and Georgi Z. Zarubin, Soviet Ambassador to the United States, September 1952-January 1958.] Zarubin, by the way, died within the year the Agreement was signed. After Washington he became a deputy foreign minister. He was along in years then, so he lived to be a ripe old man. These cultural exchanges were renewed regularly and changed, expanded, expanded as a totality and yet the interior texts in some cases became more general. See, the old agreements would be contracts for the exchange in part, contracts for the exchange of specific cultural events.

Q: Such as the contracts with IREX (International Research & Exchanges Board) that allowed for the exchange of a specified number of scholars each way each year?

BENSON: That may have been in the early days in the agreement. I think it was actually; later it was a matter of outside parameters and negotiated by us with the help of Allen Kassoff and Dan Matuszewski of IREX. But back to the first contracts or agreements, that's when Sol Hurok was beginning to bring to the United States these big things, the Bolshoi Ballet.

Q: He did some of that entirely apart from these agreements, didn't he?

BENSON: Yes, he did, sure he did, but he had to have the help of the United States government to facilitate it, and the United States government felt that, if we were going to have in the United States all these high profile, famous cultural groups with such wow, we would like to have ours over there. The Soviets were not about to pay--they perhaps couldn't really pay--to bring over the huge American troupes with American wages and all of the travel costs, and so on and so forth, so the American government had to pony up a subsidy to get this reciprocity, and it did. Later as the agreements matured over the years, it would be specified as reciprocal subject to the financial and scheduling capabilities, etcetera and so forth, much more general, allowing, I can tell you, for an awful lot of negotiation. On my staff, on the staff of P & C down, was a staff member whose sole reason for being was to negotiate with Gosconcert, the state concert agency of the Soviet Union.

Q: That job had to with negotiating the terms both of sending the Soviets out and bringing Americans in?

BENSON: Yes, exactly, and if you wanted to have the St. Paul Philharmonic or whatever it was called, St. Paul Chamber Orchestra, visiting and you thought it might be a good thing, we would, that they visit the Baltic States and the Soviets would think, as they would, that it would not be a good idea for them to go to the Baltic States, you have a negotiation which has politics at the basis, never mind the costs, which is also going to be there.

These cultural agreements were both fun, took up a lot of our time, brought us into close contact with various ministries, the Ministry of Culture--interesting people there--cultural groups who were going to go, organizations and places which were going to host our groups coming over, and maximized the contact possibilities, the talking, the lunching, back and forth immeasurably. The agreement--and this comes to my second tour, and we should proceed, I suppose, seriatim, but I should say that the umbrella agreement lapsed in 1979. By then it was three documents, the overall principles, the program, and then so-called implementing principles. It lapsed in 1979 because of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. I was out of the country already, having been transferred.

Q: When did the Fulbright program extend to the Soviet Union? Was it in place during your first tour in the 1970s?

BENSON: Yes. When I got to Moscow in the 1970s, in 1975, the--I should be precise here, but it's not a question of drenching things up from memory, because I just don't know--the agreement was reached in a very different way from Fulbright agreements with other countries, because this was the Soviet Union and the thought of having a bi-national commission, a selection commission, was preposterous. But some sort of agreement had been reached, and we provided opportunities for a certain number of Soviets to go to the United States, as faculty people. The program was at the university level at that point. The other many possibilities inherent in the Fulbright agreement were never thought of as far as the Soviet Union was concerned. It was just faculty, never mind students or lawyers, or what have you. Some few Soviet faculty could go and do research, and we provided to Moscow State University every year a historian.

Well, it worked very simply. They came and they taught in English. They were housed well on campus in Moscow State University and tried to behave as if they were teaching in Frankfurt, in Germany. In a certain sense it worked just that way. The students were overwhelmed, favorably, at having an American instructor. (E. David) Cronon of (the University of) Wisconsin, I think, was the first. Cooper of Wisconsin came later. There were others.

Q: I met a historian from Missouri. It was in 1984 when I was on the Fulbright Committee, and he was having a great time because all these children of the higher-ups who were taking his course. They could get him tickets to things that he couldn't get into any other way. When did study-abroad programs for undergraduates begin? Or, should I say, did you have any experience with programs for undergraduates during your first tour in the 1970s, like the Middlebury program?

BENSON: There was that program. There was the ACTR program, American Council of Teachers of Russian, which had somewhere around 10 people. Had the Pushkin and Student Moscow. There was a CIEE program, the Council for the International Educational Exchanges. They were in Leningrad. There was a SUNY (State University of New York) Albany program, which was reciprocal.

Q: And these exchanges were operating by your first tour in the 1970s?

BENSON: Yes, the SUNY Albany program was signed into being by the chancellor of the SUNY system, Ernest Boyer, in 1975 just as I arrived. There was a program which was run by Leon Twarog--you may have known him--from Ohio State/Purdue Consortium. Those were not reciprocal. The SUNY program was reciprocal, the only one. All of them had a resident American in Moscow to look after their students. They were always getting into some kind of trouble.

Q: That's my next question. What did your office have to do to help them with their problems?

BENSON: Our office was again the action office, where anything could happen between these groups and Soviet institutions, as we were for the press insofar as these exchange programs wished to call something to our attention. The same as with the media; the media has no obligation at all to tell us of any of their problems. We ourselves would have been very irritated with them if they had not, because we would like to be able to extract some kind of reciprocity.

Q: Continuing the afternoon of Monday, May 8th, 2000. We are finishing up the discussion of Ray Benson's tour in Moscow between 1975 and 1979. We were talking, about American student groups in the Soviet Union and what you had to do to help them get out of trouble.

BENSON: Well, there were all kinds of incidents, which were inconsequential in any other country except the Soviet Union. I'll list a few little things, lest we go on forever. My contact point was the Ministry of Education, and one would go there to complain or ask for an explanation. The students did various things they shouldn't have done, such as urinating on Soviet money with the likeness of some of the Soviet leaders of the past. This is literally what happened at the end of a party. They were found, and this was lese majeste. A young woman in St. Petersburg--and was in Leningrad--was discovered to have on her bookshelf many books which were not considered proper in the Soviet Union, literature, you know, printed by Ardis, printed by the YMCA Press in Paris.

Q: Were these translations of America literature?

BENSON: No, no, I'm talking about (Andrei) Platonov, I'm talking Solzhenitsyn.

Q: Oh, these are émigré editions of Russian work that they didn't like...

BENSON: Yes, all published in the meantime but not then. Ardis did a lot, Ann Arbor. I could go on and give a rather anecdotal scope, but the point is that the students would get into trouble, and there would be great criticism. Either the student, in this case, herself, in Leningrad was about to be thrown out of the country, it was thought. We would go over and say, "What is going on?" Of course, she wasn't thrown out of the country. There were other incidents when students would get in trouble because they would be accosted by Soviet men. This was not purposeful, this was not a provocation, this was bad stuff. One near rape was interrupted simply by happenstance. We would ask for an investigation. They would say they will do what they could. We would revisit, and they would say, "We don't have any more data," and on and on and on.

Q: But did you find sometimes that you would get American students or other exchangees out of trouble simply by showing that you were watching the situation and were interested?

BENSON: Well, there was this woman in Leningrad who I think was going to get into real trouble, certainly her program might have. You see, there is concern about what books they have. There is surveillance of the books. There is a complaint. All of this is being done at the level of the people who were watching this exchange program.

Q: Like Vladimir Kutin in Leningrad.

BENSON: Much lower. He was in charge of foreign relations at St. Petersburg state.

Q: But before that, before he went to Germany, he was doing something like this in Leningrad, surveillance over foreign students.

BENSON: Could very well have been then, you know. Brought to him, let's say, by somebody even lower than he. He says, "Ah ha, we cannot put up with this," and the thing begins to stew and begins to be a problem. Everybody begins playing a role, and no one is willing to say at that level that this is really not useful for us, comrades, because it doesn't get us anywhere. And they don't know what to do about excessive low-level vigilance, and the issue is defined, the lines are drawn, and it becomes very, very difficult for anybody one or two steps outside this little circle to change the direction of this, let's say, process. At this point in the process in the 1970s I go to the Ministry, and there somebody could say, "Oh, for heaven's sakes, what have they done?" The ministry has the authority and the power, because they're that many steps higher, to call Leningrad and say, "For goodness sakes, stop it, leave her alone, put her books back on her shelf"--literally what happened, by the way. She had books on her shelf. Yes, we did useful work.

Q: What about your relations with Voice of America in that period?

BENSON: Well, the Voice of America both was and wasn't jammed, you know, depending on the period. We listened to it. I didn't listen to the Russian much. I listened to the English, because you listen to it for the news, and everybody at the embassy really did listen to it. Some people at the embassy listened to the Russian and critiqued it for substance to make sure that they didn't get too carried away with the message, which was that the Soviet system was terrible. But the true listenership, I believe, at that time that was important for us--this is sort of betraying my organization, the USIA--was Radio Liberty. Radio Liberty broadcast out of Munich.

Q: That was my next question.

BENSON: Well, they go together. I knew it would be, but they do go together. Radio Liberty was jammed all the way through. In fact, most of the time we were in the Soviet Union, the Voice of America was also jammed. You know, this cost extraordinary amounts of money and power, huge towers to jam, but in the suburbs of Moscow you could listen to Radio Liberty freely. There are some people, for example, in Piti Yeltin, the artists' colony, which is a suburb not far out of Moscow, came in clear as a bell. They didn't have a jamming tower there. There were some people who spent hours on the weekends listening out there to VOA, to Radio Liberty, and both VOA and Radio Liberty knew that. Weekend programs were very rich. Next time we'll talk about the Metropol Almanac. You know what that was? The literary almanac published by Vasily Aksyonov and other writers who got together. We're talking about something that was in 1978/1979. It became quite clear once. I was having lunch with them, with the editorial board, in Aksyonov's apartment. I'll talk about this more when I'm with you next time. This came into the New Yorker recently. Anyway, I'll put it together coherently then. And somebody knocks on the door and came in. It was one of their friends, and he had just driven in from Piti Yeltin--this was during the week--and said, "Do you know what has happened? Yuri Shanokovski"--I think he's teaching at Wesley now--"is in Munich, and he gave an interview, and he said the following." It had to do with the Metropol Almanac.

Q: So that's the way the word would come in and get around.

BENSON: The word really did get around, and they decided, I should say, at that time that they thought he ought to shut the hell up. He was leaving the country, it was clear, and he didn't sort of appear in Munich, to their surprise. I didn't realize that he had gotten exit permission and he was going away. But they did not want him at that time to sit there and blab away, so we wrote a telegram to Munich, and they stowed his interviews for later use. But that's the way word would get around.

Q: Did VOA have a correspondent in Moscow at that time?

BENSON: No, VOA had correspondents who lived in Munich, who would apply for short term visas. Mark Hopkins was one who came in for years. He did all sorts of other things in Munich. But he knew some Russian, more than casually. VOA correspondents were not allowed to be permanent correspondents. That came later, after my day.

Q: What do you think of the general impact of VOA and RL on the opinion of the Russian intelligencia whom you knew at the time?

BENSON: Well, it was, from one point of view, profound; from another point of view, unnecessary, because the point of view of the intelligencia whom I knew was not in the making. That is to say, it was established. They were Westernizers. Of the intelligencia whom I knew, only (Vladimir) Soloukhin among the writers and a few more who didn't declare themselves would be considered Slavophiles and not friendly to the West. So these people didn't need, as far as forming their opinions, the VOA or the RL, but for information on political events and social events there was nothing else.

Q: This is Robert Daniels interviewing Ray Benson on June 8th, 2000 on his USIA career, and we are adding some additional points about his experience in Moscow from 1975 to 1979. We have begun to touch on some questions about the cultural life and various incidents that you were involved in or knew directly about, starting with the so-called Metropol incident.

BENSON: The Metropol Group, gathered around Vasily Aksyonov, who began putting together what became an almanac, a compendium of works by the Metropol group in 1978. It was their idea that they should be able to produce a work, this compendium, of literary pieces which would be in a sense nonpolitical. They would not be critiques of the sociology of the Soviet Union or of its society except in the sense that they would be informed. They would take literature beyond that which had been approved or had previously been published. There would be more explicit sexual references. The style would be modern or post-modern. This was not socialist realism. There were no articles which were specifically critical of socialist realism. It was as modern in form as was being produced at that time in the Soviet Union. Some of the works were produced by writers who were not members of the writers' union. Some were produced by writers who were very well established in the writers' union, like Aksyonov or Vaznisenski Achmedulina. Their idea was to produce the work in a certain number of copies below the number above which you had to get official permission to produce them. I think it was 12; it may have been 13. If you produced above that number of copies and gave them out, you were violating Soviet law about having published a work without official permission. Below that level, 12 or 13, you could do it without violating the law against publishing a work without permission. But you're then subject to prosecution for producing works which were pornographic, or were inciting racial or ethnic or religious antagonisms, or espousing war. There were a whole host of other criteria by which this would be evaluated within Soviet law. They thought they were beyond criticism for those purposes or those accusations. They tried to avoid them, not that they self-centered, and off they went to produce this group work. It took them months to put it together, and they did it in a most interesting way. We had no computers in those days, and so everything had to be done by typists. It was "secret" as they didn't publicize it. It was quite clear, as matters went along, that the writers' union knew all about it and that certain people, who were friendly to the writers' union and not to this group which had gathered, knew all about it. And there were some people in foreign embassies who were told what was going on.

Q: This was essentially a Samizdat publication?

BENSON: Yes, it was Samizdat, but it was to be up to that level. See, Samizdat earlier would have one or two copies, three.

Q: Oh, I thought as many carbons as you could get in the typewriter.

BENSON: Well, six or seven, but not 12 or 13, which required two or three typists.

Q: They did it with carbon copies or mimeograph?

BENSON: Carbons. They did it with carbons and they had several typists. What they did was take a--I have a funny feeling that some of this we have already gone through--they took a sheet of paper rather thick and large, large enough to have pasted on it four typed sheets, and they would paste onto this sheet of paper or cardboard or whatever you call it four typewritten sheets, turn it over, they would paste another four. So this large, I'm searching for the word, it's not cardboard, but anyway it looked like thick blotting paper, the kind of paper you have in a photo album. If you held one up, you had eight pages on it, four on one side and four on the other. They involved in their work certain graphics artists: (Anatoly) Brusilovsky was rather a pornographic; Barice Maserer, who was Achmedulina's husband, was a very famous set designer and graphics artist; and other people who chipped in who were never given credit because of putting all this together it took an awful lot of people. Barovsky, who was Lubimov's stage designer, set designer, and now lives, I believe, in Boston, also contributed some of the graphics. In early 1979, having produced this enormous volume--you can imagine something--it's now between boards. It's between, as I recall it, plywood covers, each the size of four sheets of paper front and back. Inside are innumerable sheets, each with eight pages pasted on them, four front and four back. They have 12 or 13 of these monster volumes. This is Metropol. And they had a credo, which I won't attempt to paraphrase now. I have it at home, and it may not be relevant here. But the point is that they very specifically said that they had no intention of violating the law.

What they were trying to do was live free and produce freely as creative artists and writers. The representatives of the group went to the writers' union and presented them with at least one copy of this now finished volume. At the same time they tried to hold a sort of press conference which announced that they had finished their work and had done this. They hired a Moscow restaurant in which to do this, and they sent out invitations to an awful lot of people in the cultural world of Moscow. Of course, this became known, obviously. It was a very public act. Preparing for it was a public act, and they were preparing to mount a public act. People who received the invitations were very important, for example, Oleg Yefremov, who died two weeks ago. They sent them to the Moscow art theaters. Lubimov, the head of the Taganka Theater, and others were called by various official bodies and told they best not appear at this event. And, in fact, the event never took place, because other officials thought it would be too risky to let it happen, even if some of the people invited would not appear, and so the authorities went to the manager of this restaurant and said, "On this day you will close and we will have a sanitary inspection of your kitchen facilities, count the cockroaches, what have you." When invitees appeared at the restaurant in the afternoon, they found a notice on the door saying that the restaurant was closed. It was what they call in Russian sanitarnyy den', the sanitary day, day of examination of their bona fide cleanliness of the facility. The event never took place.

Many correspondents were invited and went there and found it closed. In the article in The New Yorker that you and I have discussed by Victor Erofeyev, he paints the picture of practically a cordon of officers and other clearly visible persons from various control organs. I don't know if they were there or not, or whether this was off-putting or not. I myself did not go down to that event. I was the person at the United States Embassy which was following all of the trouble, run up the months and months of their meetings and so on, and reporting on them. Jack Matlock, who was then the Deputy Chief of Mission, was keenly interested in having as much as possible on the record of the State Department's, the Soviet office (Eur/Sov), on this effort. He knew all of the participants as well as I, some better, some not as well, but he was the other person at the embassy who was really forceful in getting me to report on this. What happened at the writers' union is indicative of just how these things were done in the Soviet Union at that time. What I mean, Bill, is that, at that time, one was beyond the period when five or six or eight of these persons would have been...

Q: This is June 8th, 2000 and we are continuing our conversation with Ray Benson's Moscow assignment, 1975 to 1979, focusing on cultural matters. We were still discussing the Metropol group and then DCM Jack Matlock's interests in the cultural sector.

BENSON: I think we got to this point. The Writers Union--you have to imagine such a thing--took this volume, which I described as being as large as it was, you know, and pretty darn heavy. They put it on a table in a small room in the Writers Union Building, which was very large indeed, and they locked it up. And they then invited a series of members of the Writers Union to enter the room and to read in Metropol in this volume, perhaps not all of it but to read some of it anyway, and to offer their judgment of the suitability of this material for publication. This was not censorship. This was judgment by one's peers. And these verdicts or judgments were then published in the internal newspaper of the Writers Union, which all members of the Writers Union got. It was a weekly publication, Literaturnaya Gazeta.

In this house organ, which obviously was given to all members of the union including 90 percent of the members of Metropol--and therefore we got a copy, and therefore I read every issue at that time--there were judgments. Perhaps not every judgment was printed, but many were considered worthy, and of course they were all very, very negative. It was then announced that, according to the judgment of this peer group, this Almanac, this compendium was not worthy of publication and the Writers Union would, therefore, not support its publication and, therefore, it would not be published, and it wasn't in the Soviet Union at least.

At the same time a copy was given to a gentleman who worked at the French embassy and a copy was given to me one Sunday at Vasily Aksyonov's girlfriend's dacha. I won't pause to go into who she was or what kind of dacha this was and all of that. As I had said that I would be willing to take it--please let me have it--and we would see what we could do about having it appear in the United States. I did not say it would go out by pouch. One didn't say certain things. So I put this great big thing in the trunk of my personal car and drove home. My car was parked inside the embassy, and I took it upstairs and put it in my office, which was behind the Marine guard, meaning in the classified section of the embassy, and on the next day I called Ambassador Toon and said, "I have something to show you." He said, "Come on up," so I dragged this thing up to him and I told him what this thing was. Now, he had, of course, been reading the cable traffic and he knew there was such a thing as Metropol. I said, "Can we move this on?" and he summoned into the office the head of security of the embassy, and he said, "Have the CBs (Navy unit-Construction Battalion) build a box to fit this into so that it isn't damaged." A box was built--I didn't see it--and Metropol was fit within the box, sent off to EUR/SOV, the Soviet office, from which it made its way to Ardis Press. [Ed: Ardis Publishing (the name of the original company is Ardis Publishers) began in 1971, as the only publishing house outside of Russia dedicated to Russian literature in both English and Russia.]

Ardis Press was located in Ann Arbor, Carl and Ellendea Proffer ran it. Carl now deceased, soon thereafter actually--marvelous man. It was published in the United States, it was published in France. It was published in Russian first and then in translation and later in the United States was given over, some arrangement whereby I think Norton & Company published it as a hardback book. It was published finally in Russia, most recently, or recently after--I don't know the dates--but after all that nonsense was over with.

Q: Under Gorbachev or under Yeltsin?

BENSON: I don't really know. But by then the Metropol gang had scattered. Aksyonov was living in the States. (Yuz) Aleshkovsky was living in the States. Some were in Germany. They were gone. There was no need any longer for such an elaborate effort. You could have published whatever you wished, whether it was post-modern in style or very explicit sexually, and one could say a great deal more of the individual fate of the individuals involved.

The New Yorker article that you and I have discussed separately outside of the context of this interview project refers to the effect on Victor Erofeyev [Ed: Metropol editor] himself and on his father, who was a senior and most respected member of the Soviet foreign service of ambassadorial rank, the effect on him of the fact that his son was involved in this project. When we review the text later, if you feel it would be useful to put some of that in here as an aside, we could do it, but let me proceed, as you wish, to other aspects of the situation.

I think it worth mentioning, though, and there is a place here--I've said it a few minutes ago--a place to single out and praise the understanding of the Soviet situation, not quite in quotes, by Jack Matlock and Malcolm Toon, both true Soviet hands. Where the political and social effects of what was going on in the cultural world were fully understood, and to the extent possible, they tried to get embassy reporting to cover this aspect of life in the Soviet Union so that the interested people in the Soviet Bureau and other readers in Washington. You understand that the CIA analysts would also be reading this, as far as the evaluation of trends within the Soviet Union is concerned, since there was a broad range of analysis going on in town. These were data which were interesting, and they made sure that, insofar as possible, the embassy acquired the data and reported with that encomium to my colleagues of the past. I think it should be, here anyway, a matter of record.

Q: Would you want to add anything more about your work with Matlock in 1975 to 1979 when he was DCM? Was he there the whole time with you under both Stoessel and Toon?

BENSON: Yes, he was there. He was a tough task master, very pedantic and very didactic and very appreciative and very learned and extremely knowledgeable--I've said this--and it never seemed to me that this toughness and didacticism and pedanticism was personally directed, though there were many people who felt that it was. I never did. He guided me and directed me and encouraged me to follow certain events, one of them being the Metropol case, if you will, that we've referred to.

There was another occasion that was very close to him intellectually and to me, when one day Pravda had an article by a man named Juritis, who was a conductor at the Bolshoi Theater, which was very critical of Yuri Lyubimov and Gennady Rozhdestvensky and Alfred Schnittke, who were preparing a new version of the Queen of Spades for the Paris Opera. They were going to change a bit the original score by Tchaikovsky, and they were going to produce, I think Barovsky--I've mentioned him--who was David Davidovich, who was Lubimov's chief set designer, was also producing the sets, and they were going to lay heavy hands on Tchaikovsky on this great work in the canon of Russian musical history and presently on the stage in Moscow. They were out of the country going to violate all of the traditions, the norms, etc., etc., etc. So Jack asked me if I had read it, and in fact we were reading it practically at the same time that morning, and he said, "Well, you know Lubimov." In fact, I did. "Why don't you go over to him and ask him what in heaven's name is going on, and see what you can find out, and we'll see if this is of any interest." So I did. I visited Lubimov then, I don't know 15 or 20 times as this episode played out. In addition, there were newspaper reverberations, that is to say certain aspects became public and I included that in my reporting on what I could find out from Yuri Lubimov. At the same time the American press, especially Craig Whitney, bless him--he's now one of the managing editors of the (New York) Times--he followed the story, and we would run into each other there. Others did too. It was very interesting to see that newspapers could afford coverage of such an event. For the embassy, the interesting aspect of it was the degree to which the Ministry of Culture, the Central Committee's Committee on Culture, on Music, the Composers Union, you know, which was then under the control of Tikhon Khrennikov. You may remember that Tikhon Khrennikov was appointed by Stalin in 1948.

Q: He even hung on under Gorbachev.

BENSON: He left practically in his senility, you know. He ran a very conservative with strange bursts of freedom allowed in certain contexts, which I won't go into here. In any case, in this matter one was trying at the embassy to find out whether it was freelancing by Khrennikov, whether it was the Ministry of Culture, in which case it would have been Lemechev, who incidentally changed the ending of Swan Lake. He ordered the Bolshoi Theater to change the ending of Swan Lake because he did not think that the Soviet people wanted this great piece of music, this great ballet, to end tragically. So the ending, it was ordered, would be happy. He and his committees of review absolute tortured poor Lubimov every time before a Taganka production would be released for the public. A committee would come to Taganka, the most advanced Soviet theater of the day, view the work practically in-camera, and suggest revisions. There would be a violent scene. Sometimes Lubimov would win; usually he wouldn't. And he was watched like a hawk, so was Schnittke, by the Composers Union. He's recently deceased. Lubimov is still alive. Rozhdestvensky lives mostly outside of Russia. He's a conductor. And we sort of figured out who was calling the shots in the Queen of Spades dispute. It was Lemechev and the Ministry of Cultural and the cultural committee, I suppose it was, of the Central Committee. Beyond that Jack and I had fun finding out what was going on, and we hope other people are interested in it. In any event, the Paris Opera did not put on the production.

Q: Due to Soviet pressure on the French?

BENSON: There was Soviet pressure on the French, by the way. I'm glad you bring that up. Thank you for flagging my memory. The Paris Opera was told by the Ministry of Culture, i.e., Lemechev's bailiwick, that they could forget about any cooperation with the Bolshoi Theater or any musician, singer, dancer, or troupe from the Soviet Union coming there, or any one of theirs, coming into the Soviet Union--not going to happen. Gosconcert, the official booking agency impresario of the Soviet government, sent a parallel message which said exactly the same thing. So there were pressures put on. Now, I don't know if this is the place to speak about various productions of the Queen of Spades, which had become controversial within the Soviet Union at that time, but if you think we should later, I can do so. But the Queen of Spades strangely became the focus of attention in Moscow, and now, for heaven's sakes, look what's going on in Paris.

I spoke later to a person at the Ministry of Culture and I said, "What in heaven's name is going on?" and she said, "Well, we didn't know what in heaven's name was going on, but the way these people were handling a new staging of the Queen of Spades, we didn't know whether the countess after all was going to kill Gherman in the second act." This is what she said and, of course, it's absurd. It's just another example--and we'll touch it up a little in the final draft--of the degree to which Jack Matlock felt that a manifestation of central control over all aspects of Soviet life could be made literal by focusing on a cultural event. For me it was sheer joy and a pleasure to be asked to follow up, and increased and enhanced measurably my credibility and the embassy's credibility--and Jack knew that--among these people who were in the advance guard of the cultural elites.

Q: There were a couple of other episodes in the cultural area during that tour. You spoke about the bulldozer incident.

BENSON: Well, the bulldozer incident occurred just before I came or before I came. It's the incident in which a group of Soviet artist, most of them not members of the Artists Union, tried to erect an outdoor exhibit--I think it was in the Smilevski Park--and they found a clearing there and they brought pallets on which they put various of their works and very quickly erected their exhibit. I don't know how many works were on display, I repeat I was not there. Now the event had been generally advertised, certainly by word of mouth and maybe 200 people, including newspaper correspondents and representatives of embassies were there. And then, around the corner came a couple of bulldozers, and they leveled the playing field. It might very well have been a playing field. That was the bulldozer incident, and it was widely reported. Let's say there were newspaper reporters there besides Moscow, and they reported on it. It was terribly embarrassing. By the time I came to the Soviet Union in June of 1975, they had decided, the authorities, that they had to handle this a little differently. There was an outpouring at that time of creative energy among the plastic artists, the graphists, sculptors. Moscow was alive with creative energy. What they did--and they couldn't continue having bulldozer incidents; it was just not useful--so what they did was give--you're not going to believe this--the beekeepers pavilion of the Vedanha [Ed: Pchelovodstvo pavilion of the VDNH (Beekeeping Pavilion of the Exhibition of Economic Achievement).] It's an ongoing permanent exhibit in the grounds given over to it. It's located a little bit out of town, but there's a big subway stop right there.

Beekeeping is a big deal in the Soviet Union, and they had a beekeepers pavilion, which they emptied out. It's permanent exhibit, you see, which they emptied out, and they allowed a group of artists and individual artists. I'm not certain the administrative niceties of this, but the Artists Union was officially empowered to be helpful, and they did, so that a variety--it was a huge exhibit--could be shown. Press and TV came from Scandinavia, from France, from Germany, Austria, to cover the opening and to cover the crowds which lined up. There were police officers, KGB out there. You couldn't get in for the crowds. People would wait. We're talking about an art exhibit. Bill, both of us are smiling. We know what this is political art.

Now, as opposed to Metropol, which we've already talked about, which occurred several years later, the images in the art which was depicted in the beekeepers pavilion, many of them anyway, had certain political implications. Some were not approved. Others were narrowly approved. And they bore the same relationship to the control apparatus that Yuri Lubimov's Taganka Theater productions did. They pressed against the line of what would be allowed in substance, which the Metropol Almanac, which have already discussed did not really do. In the Metropol there was form; content, yes, but it was mostly sexual, which was troubling to the authorities.

But the beekeepers pavilion's exhibit did have images which were not very explicitly but certainly implicitly very, very critical on one's solitude or aloneness, or the use of colors to emphasize certain gestures. Works of art, as you very well know, thinking back to early Christian art, offer powerful messages and images. It was fascinating. There were, I think, two of these. There might have been three, one here after the other. By the time they had had the second, I guess, the authorities had decided that there had to be another way of handling this phenomenon, which was the creative energies of the Moscow artists, the interests of the public, foreign publicity, a stir within the Artists Union, and so the graphics section, it was called, of the Moscow Union of Artists spun off an unofficial, I guess you'd call it, a unit.

A man, whose name I now forget, became the manager of what became known as the Malaya Gruzinskaya Gallery. Malaya Gruzinskaya is a street not far from the American embassy. There several rooms on two, or where there three, floors in a building, which was owned by Moscow City. There rooms were made into exhibit halls, and a group of artists, some of whom were members of the Artists Union and some of whom were not, were allowed to exhibit. These were phenomenally successful--you know, lines around the block, police, order was being maintained in the line. Obviously we could go in because we had diplomatic identity cards, became very friendly with the artists, very friendly with this guy who ran the outfit. He had an office in the back. It was always suspected that he told the artists that he would encourage them to sell but he thought that a gallery director usually got about 30 percent and that he would not mind being treated as a gallery director. Once again, Matlock thought this was terribly interesting, and once again we reported on it. I was helped in this case by Jack Harrod, who was on my staff. He knew some of the artists, and Ray Smith, who was a State Department officer, also became interested in this phenomenon; remember it was not too far from the embassy. He became very friendly with some of the artists, he and his wife. It was, of course, a fascinating aspect of our years in the Soviet Union. The exhibits here were endless. There was one after the other, one opening after the other, good stuff. You see here in this, of course, an outlet for energies that the Soviet authorities were now more intelligently trying to release slowly and in a controlled way as opposed to putting a total damper on it.

Q: So in a way this is a foretaste of Gorbachev's perestroika, culturally speaking?

BENSON: I think very definitely, very, very definitely. But, you know, as the phrase goes, the appetite grows with the feeding on it, if you know the reference, which we won't go into, but it percolated about and around. It was a time of stirring. It was a time of movement from below and accepting of it from the middle and above.

Q: Did this movement get any protection from some of the younger and more intelligent elements of the party hierarchy?

BENSON: Well, obviously or it wouldn't have happened, but I cannot tell you who would be distinguished in this matter. I do know that--you will find this cute--before the exhibits, vernissage, people from the various organs would come down and look at the works, and even suggest that they might like to buy. 'Vernissage' is the French word for 'opening'. As it was being hung, there would be representatives of the cultural organs, just as they would visit Yuri Lubimov's theater in the pre-dress rehearsal to see whether this would pass, so too would these exhibits be visited. And many people were, we heard, collecting these works on their artistic merit. Yes, it was a period that prefaced or presaged Gorbachev's glasnost very definitely, and followed Khrushchev's thaw.

Q: Right, with the support of the so-called 'men of the '60s'. Anything else in general about the experience in Moscow 1975-1979 or the circumstances of your moving on in 1979? What about the USIS exhibits that were touring the Soviet Union in the late 1970s?

BENSON: Bill, I'll have to look at my records, my little pocket calendars, to see what were the names of the exhibits and give them credit in the form of this interview, and I will do that in that in a post-scriptum. They visited six Soviet cities, each of them for a month, each with a month between cities, so it took a year for them to play their way through the Soviet Union. Then there would be a bit of down time, and then would come the next one. During the life of the first one mentioned, there would be advance work on where one would place, and how one would place, the next exhibit. It was a permanently ongoing effort. It cost millions of dollars of USG money. It was an extraordinary effort, and we should speculate a bit later on the effect. But it came to be a traveling USIS program effort which was very broad in its approach. We would have an exhibit on a given subject. There would be people who would be visiting the exhibit and they would see the exponents on the wall. They would get an enormously attractive, really beautifully done, brochure, which was really a magazine, on the exhibit, four color printed, so on. There would be certain handouts that commercial exhibitors would have given to USIA, and some of their machinery or some of their tools or whatever would have been part of the exhibit. There was a library in the core of the exhibit which had books and materials on the theme of the exhibit, to which the general public had no access, but important people and institutions, other libraries in the city in which the exhibit took place would be invited. We had experts on the subject of the exhibit who would be sitting within this library and who were hosts to the people who would come.

Q: Would you make copies of this material available to the libraries, assuming that they could accept them?

BENSON: Sometimes we did and could. The USIA had a budget, separate from the exhibit budget, for the presentation of printed materials, and we could “take orders” or offer a list to USIA and procure materials and, yes, we could do that. Further, as the use of the exhibit as a venue for programming developed, we would use this library as a conference room. The library would be configured so that it had conference tables. Again, the USIA would recruit and bring in people who were expert on the theme of the exhibit, and we would have a person from my staff who traveled with the exhibit. There was always a person from the P&C staff in Moscow, the USIS staff in Moscow, Press and Cultural Service, who traveled with the exhibit. It was a Foreign Service Officer, and this person would make contact in the city with groups presumably interested in the subject of the exhibit, and informal meetings with experts from the United States, and rather more formal seminars would be developed.

An agricultural USA exhibit, for example, in Kiev had some of Iowa’s, Indiana’s, and Illinois’ greatest experts in growing of hybrid corn and the raising of pigs, hog raising, brought in to meet in very formal sessions with their counterparts from the Republic of Ukraine. Finally, as we developed this program extension, we would have the cooperation of the host organizations. The seminars were held outside of the exhibit and were very extensive. The ones in Kiev were exemplary. I learned more about the genetics of hogs and how much cholesterol you can ingest from pig meat as compared with cow meat and became convinced that it was better to eat pork. And then there was feeding. These were experts, true experts. The United States Department of Agriculture contributed some, as did American agricultural schools. In fact, we found out in this particular exhibit that they knew of each other because they read each other’s scholarly scientific literature.

Thus, these exhibits, as they moved through the Soviet Union for a month in each city, if we did our work right and energetically, were extraordinarily impactful. It is my feeling that we got our money’s worth, considering how closed the Soviet Union was at the time. We went to Tbilisi, Odessa, Irkutsk, and Kiev. There were many cities, of course, which were closed at that time, as you know. We were in Tashkent, we were in Baku later on, we were in the Baltic States, which offered special problems. In fact, I think we decided not to go there finally. You know, we couldn’t fly the flag in the Baltic States.

Q: Because of the American non-recognition policy.

BENSON: That’s right. And the question then was can we have an American exhibit which doesn’t fly the American flag, and the decision was no. So we contented ourselves with very low-level programming in the Baltic States. We went to Minsk and St. Petersburg, which were proximate, and tried through VOA to advertise the proximity of the American exhibit, which led to terrific, let’s say, crowd control problems for the Soviet organs of authority, especially in Minsk. Busloads would be chartered from the Baltic States. We always advertised on the VOA that here's this exhibit in Minsk, for example, and that there would be Estonian speaking, Lithuanian speaking, and Latvian speaking guides, who also spoke Russian. Come on down and you will find people who speak your language. So, busloads would come. Now they had control apparatus up in the Baltic States too, but, nevertheless, somehow or other, busloads would arrive.

Today is June 19, 2000, and this tape is to provide some addenda to the general discussion of Ray's experiences in Moscow. We have some additional topics to look back on. First would be the microwave incident that occurred, I believe in 1976, shortly after you began your first tour in Moscow.

BENSON: A little less than a year later, yes. It was under Ambassador Walter Stoessel. The decision was made that the fact that the Soviets were beaming microwaves at the embassy for over a decade--may have been closer to 15 years, I can't recall exactly--that this was in danger of leaking, and rather than having it leak, it would be announced. Our side knew about this from the very beginning whenever they started it, because we measured. We had apparatus at the embassy that would measure--don't know how to put it--would react to, be aware of, such waves. This goes back at least to the early 1960s and there was a whole record of protests to the Soviets about this, who say they cannot imagine how this could have happened. The embassy would point out that our apparatus had measured the locations--1, 2, 3, 4, whatever they were, they had names--and the strength of these microwaves. The Soviets will say they can't imagine how we could be in such error about what was going on, and this went on for that length of time.

Q: What was the presumed purpose of the microwaves they were beaming?

BENSON: The presumed purpose, as far as I know it--there may have been a final determination at one point but I don't know that--the presumed purpose was to interfere with our (a) transmissions and (b) monitoring of ambient messages in Moscow.

Q: In a sense it was jamming of your communications?

BENSON: That was one of the possible, if not even probable, uses of the microwave. The third possibility, which was mentioned, is that it can be very damaging of health and that it was an attempt to sicken the embassy. The microwaves were directed at the upper floors of the embassy. That's where our communications were. That's where the attaché's office was with its communications, and that's where, it was presumed, our inward communications, i.e., our listening on the Soviets, was located.

Q: Was there any evidence of people actually being sickened by this?

BENSON: Well, that's a very, very big and long story. There were data which showed that the females, women, who worked in the upper floors of the embassy, notably in the Defense attaché's office, where spouses, who had clerical skills, would be employed. Among this group there was an unusual concentration of breast cancer among such women, if you took the data back awhile. There were other more anecdotal--the breast cancer could be determined statistically--but there were other, more anecdotal, evidence from people who had served in the embassy. For example, my predecessor, David Nalle, reported, as this was made public, that he felt headaches, insomnia, tension as you were trying to go to sleep--therefore insomnia--restlessness. This was, of course, public information as one of the effects of microwaves, and he reported that he had suffered from just that in the last two years of his tour. He had a four-year tour prior to mine. He had my office, and his desk, as mine, was across the wall from one of the major sources. It was a shack on the building across Tchaikovsky Street...

Q: Which was the main drag out in front of the embassy.

BENSON: Yes, that's what it was called at that time. There's a new name now, don't know what it is, but it was Tchaikovsky Street, and there was a shack on the roof of the large apartment house across the street which was, we had determined, one of the sources of the microwaves.

You might as well put on the list of things you want to ask about, the tunnel. These were exciting days. This was the second tour. We had a great deal of concern expressed by the people at the embassy and by people who had served there for many tours over the years. There were, of course, legitimate accusations that the State Department didn't pay sufficient attention to the possible health effects of these microwaves on the employees. There was research which was adduced showing that microwaves can be injurious to your health. In due course, there was a medical survey that the State Department initiated trying to get data from people who served in Moscow and from people who were in Moscow on the effects on them, what ailed them if anything, what was their medical history. There were experts whom the State Department hired who came out to Moscow to talk with us. The basic message of all of this was not quite that microwaves were good for you but it was almost that. Some of us at the embassy were rather furious at the whole effort, and yet what could one say? Are we right? Are they right? What do we know? This went on for a long time. We were all subject to very frequent blood tests. We all became amateur hematologists. We would sit in the snack bar and ask each other, "How are your eosinophils [Ed: white blood cells that are one of the immune system's components] today?" There was all manner of testing. We were encouraged to have blood tests more frequently for years to come. Leukemia was a possible effect.

Q: Was that only feared, or was there any evidence of it?

BENSON: Well, you know, all of us got finally some paper or other on--I think it was Johns Hopkins, the epidemiological folk, were hired to collect all the surveys, collect all the data that could be collected, and to come up with a judgment. And the judgment that we were allowed to see, I suppose--let's not say there was any other--but the result of the survey was the there is nothing they can lay their hand on. [Ed: see <http://www.scribd.com/doc/13616226/The-Moscow-Embassy-incident>]

Q: How did this come to a head in February 1976?

BENSON: Well, all I know is that there was good evidence that it was about to leak. It could have been to a Congressman or the press, I'm not sure, but a door was about to open.

Q: And then there would be a scandal because the State Department presumably hadn't taken the problem seriously enough.

BENSON: Well, had taken it seriously, you could show there was evidence of how many times they had complained, but they hadn't made it public and tried to use the weight of that revelation as a pressure against the Soviets and, therefore, to help terminate it. In fact that's what happened in February 1976. In fact, I did not attend that first press conference. Ambassador Stoessel called me to his office and said we were supposed to go off this evening to Minsk with Senator Ed Brook to open the USIS exhibit there. "I'm going to have a press conference tomorrow. I will not go to Minsk. You probably have some remarks." I did." He said, "Expand them by a paragraph, introduce Brook, and you two will open the exhibit." Brook was the honored speaker. We would just do the introduction. And then he told me what was going to happen, and it did happen. I wasn't there for the outcry which the press made. "How come...?" and so on and so forth.

Q: Shall we go on to the next little crisis you had in 1977 with the fire at the embassy?

BENSON: That was an interesting one. It happened in the summer, I think July, of 1977. A fire broke out. It was on the upper floors down the hall from my office on a Friday evening. The economics counselor, who had a large office at the end of the hall, left his coffeepot on. He left the electric coil-wire heating unit under the coffeepot on, and it burned a hole in the floor and started a fire. The embassy was essentially closed and empty. And as you know the American embassy there--we're talking about the eighth floor--the flames went up the eighth, ninth, tenth, and then you have the mansard or the attic in which there was a lot of equipment, and then you have the roof on which there was a lot of equipment. The fire went up, which is a normal thing. It burned down too, but basically it went up. The Soviets had in Moscow some extremely up-to-date equipment. The fire department in the Soviet Union--I have no idea what it is now--was a unit of the Ministry of Internal Affairs.

Q: The Ministry of Internal Affairs, of course, was the uniformed police.

BENSON: The uniformed police, yes. Very serious business, the uniformed police in the Soviet Union, and they had an amazing, it turned out, amount of data on the interior construction of the American embassy. These were the days when the char force, Soviet char force would clean the eighth floor and the ninth floor, not the tenth or the attic--no, seventh, eighth, and ninth.

Q: They'd clean the secret area, but not the top secret area.

BENSON: Well, we had top secret in our safes too. But accompanied on their rounds by Marines. But the location of every piece of furniture and every safe and who sat where was available to the Ministry of Interior on a map, or a plan. Well, the fire broke out, the fire was hot, and the fire moved down the halls of the embassy, moved down the hall of the eighth floor away from the economics counselor's office. The hall had just been refurbished, with plywood wall panels which were separated from the old wall by one-by-two boards, so there was a hollow space between the new plywood wall panels, which had a wood-grain veneer. There was a one-inch space between this plywood panel and the old wall.

Q: Just right for the fire to move through.

BENSON: Precisely what happened. It roared down the hall. This was post factum analysis. Well, pretty soon the flames were licking out of the top floor windows. The police cordoned off the street. Muscovites gathered. People were evacuated from their housing areas, like we from the north wing were all on the sidewalk, were all in the street, looking up. Water was being poured in enormous quantities into the embassy. In fact, cascaded down the inside of the building. As you are aware, half of the damage of a fire is the water damage. It took out the seventh, the sixth, and the fifth floors, which were at that time residences for the senior attaché staff. All of their clothes were ruined, all of the furniture ruined. There was a point here with Ambassador Toon had to make a decision about whether to invite the Soviet fire fighters into the embassy. They told him that the building was going to be devoured totally if they were not allowed to go in with their pickaxes and do the right thing, break it apart. They would go in with hoses, up the staircase all the way. After a bit he decided to let them in, which he was quite criticized for later, because the floors affected were all the classified floors.

They went in with representatives of the embassy's security staff and chief administrative officers and did not go into the tenth floor and the attic. They did go into the lower floors, seventh, eighth, ninth, and kept the fire from going down. They shot a lot of water up above, and they shot water from these enormous stepladders they had, also up above, that came down so the top floors eventually the fire was put out leaving gaping holes in the roof. As soon as daybreak came, lo and behold, there were helicopters hovering over the embassy taking pictures of everything they could. It was amazing, Bill. As the fire was put out and they evacuated the area, several of us went up to the top floors, those of us who were not earlier escorts of the fire folk. It was carnage. I have pictures of my melted typewriter. I was one of the persons at the embassy who reported losses. On the left top desk drawer I had a series of small address books and appointment books which went back to my previous tours. I always did that because I could keep up with my friends and things like that. The top two books were missing; both covered contacts from my Turkish tour. They were gone.

Q: Oh, do you presume they were lifted by one of the Soviet fire fighters?

BENSON: Oh, yes, of course they were lifted. They were there earlier Friday, and they weren't there in the wee hours of Saturday morning. Toon took a certain amount of guff but not seriously. I was unaware that anything of true classified worth was missing. Saturday morning we had no communications. By Saturday night we had communications. It was the most amazing thing I ever saw in my life. Where they came from, I think Frankfurt, with a--I forget the name of the kit, something like 'go ready' or whatever.

Q: Oh, you mean some American personnel came flying in that day?

BENSON: Absolutely, either that day or the next, but I think that day. They set up--it was an absolute miracle--in what used to be the basement mail room a jerry-rigged series of apparatuses that sufficed to put the embassy on line so that it could both receive and send encrypted material. Then we sorted out the problem of what to do. The USIS offices on the top, in other words those that were around my office, the classified offices, were totally unusable. So we moved down into the USIS downstairs offices on the first floor. We moved in eight Americans and two ticker machines, one the TASS ticker and the other the AP (Associated Press) ticker. We assumed we were going to be there for four months. We were there for a little over a year. Our office moved out three Soviet employees which were crammed into closets and things like that. They read the newspapers and that sort of things, not very much more. Eight of us, including myself--I was a PAO--and seven others from the top floor moved into that space. It was absolutely unbelievable, and it was a fine hour for the people who worked under those conditions. They could not replace certain wiring until the whole building would be rewired. I never had a phone that allowed me to connect with my secretary for all those months. I had to yell through the door, "Matilda!" Several of the assistant officers worked on their laps. Amazing.

Q: But this illustrates how people in a difficult post like that under adversity will pull together.

BENSON: Absolutely. Whether it illustrates anything about the American character--where if a barn burns down the community rallies behind to help that farmer to put up a new barn--I would be willing to say yes. It was a fine period in the embassy's life, and we ended up with better offices.

Q: Now, the problems of security continued to plague the embassy. I recall one or more episodes involving Marine guards.

BENSON: Let me talk about that in a minute, but go back to the period under the heading of security, the period after the fire. We had one break-in that I will call immediately to your attention. It was of the Pentecostals.

Q: Oh, these were Russian Pentecostals who were seeking political asylum and camped out in the embassy starting on June 27, 1978.

BENSON: About eight of them. The embassy at that time had open arches, which you recall, for vehicular traffic. The Soviet guard would be walking up and down the sidewalk outside. With Marine guard under the archway, in the archway, not standing there looking out from the archway to the sidewalk. Eight of these people somehow or other got right by the Soviet and passed the Marine, took the first door to the right and, lo and behold, they were in the waiting room of the consulate. There were some doors to the right, and that was our offices where all of the USIS staff. As I said, three Soviets out, eight Americans in. That's where we were after the fire.

So there they were and they sat in the consulate on the leather benches, crammed next to each other, reading their Bibles to each other. We didn't know quite what to do, I mean 'we' the embassy not 'we' USIS. Various officers came down and tried to talk them out of the embassy: "This is no way that you're going to get to the United States." They wouldn't budge.

Q: However, having gotten as far as they did would mean immediate arrest if they left the embassy.

BENSON: They knew that, yes, and so they stayed there. Gradually some of the Evangelists, or some of those of the Evangelical Church persuasion in the embassy, led by the Baptists, created a duty roster to bring food and drink to these people and, of an evening when the consulate would be locked up, to come down and pray with them. This went on for weeks and months. Ambassador Toon was terribly frustrated. He would not grab them and throw them out. He tried to reason them out. People from the consular office and from the political office would talk with them and reason with them. They didn't budge. Finally space was found within the embassy. There was a small apartment, a studio apartment, for the courier who brought in the classified pouch to overnight for a day or two. It had a tiny little gas stove, or electric stove, and it had a shower, and it had a john and a bed and an easy chair. And into this studio they moved eight people. It was called the dungeon because it had a small window opening onto the sidewalk about eight inches high and two feet long and bars on the window. So they were now out of the consulate, but here they were in the dungeon. State Department assigned a small amount of money to the embassy to pay for food, so individual officers in the embassy were no longer on a duty roster. They were fed by the embassy snack bar. Eventually the barber's office--there was a Russian woman who was the barber--next door to this apartment was taken from her and she was put elsewhere, and the apartment was expanded to be a little larger. To come to the end of the story, they did not leave until 1983. They were there for five years. When we came in on our second tour, they were gone. They had left that morning and immigrated to the U.S..

One could go into what one knows of the negotiations with the Soviets to let them out. An important role was played by Olin Robinson, again, of Middlebury. He was asked by the State Department, because of his Baptist Church connections, to come in and deal with the Soviet authorities who were, shall we say, in liaison with the Russian Church. He did that, and it was not to any effect.

Q: The solution to let them out of the country must have occurred before the Korean airliner incident in 1983, which would have soured relations?

BENSON: Oh yes. KAL occurred the night of October 30 to September first. This occurred in June and was the product of much diplomatic negotiation.

Q: Do I recall another episode of someone getting in the embassy and taking asylum, or am I thinking of another country?

BENSON: There were two incidents which occurred in 1979. By then we have now left our temporary quarters down there next to the consulate and were back up in the remodeled eighth floor. Somebody came into the consular section, now expanded in space, and announced that he had an explosive device attached to his belt, he flashed the device, and he would go to the United States through the courtesy of the embassy or he would blow himself and them up. Well, this went on for quite a while. The press somehow or other, bless their hearts, the American Press, heard about this. They gathered. We are getting calls upstairs in my office for a statement by the embassy on this. We were in touch with Ambassador Toon, who says, "For now, no comment." He was in touch with the Soviet authorities. I cannot say that I had then perfect knowledge or that I have now perfect recollection, but later in the evening--the weather was warm, the temperature's pretty summery--the press is gathered in the inner courtyard of the embassy. I and my staff are trying to hold them back. Looking straight ahead are the windows of the consular general. It's in the north wing, the first floor. Mac Toon invited into the embassy to that point either a sharpshooter or two sharpshooters from the Ministry of Interior, who crawled along the protruding stone baseboard, of the embassy and fired into the inner room where this fellow was holding several senior officers hostage. They did not, to my recollection, kill him but they wounded him badly, and his apparatus went off, and wounded him further, but it was not sufficient to hurt other people. He was taken out and given to the Soviets. Did we know what happened? I certainly do not. The place smelled of teargas for a long time.

The second event was in perhaps May when I and the DCM, who was by then Mark Garrison, were going to go off to Novgorod. As he on the third floor and my wife and I on the eighth floor--or were we on the seventh?--were preparing to pack our bags, there were several sharp noises down in the embassy courtyard which sounded like backfires. We all looked out, and there was quite a scene there, so we tore down the stairs. In the courtyard was a taxi. There was a guy. He had come here in a taxi by placing a revolver against the back of the driver's neck, and he said, "Into the embassy you will go." The guy said, "I can't do that. What is the alternative?" So the guy came down Tchaikovsky Street, gunned his taxi, went right through the archway past the astounded Marines. Have to make a fast left there. He did and came up against the wall between the embassy and the other apartment building. As the car crashed into it, the guy jumped out of the back seat with his pistols and fired them at the wall of the embassy and waited to be apprehended. What he had was apparently a very valuable set of 19th century double-barreled fowling pieces, and he had shot a bunch of shotgun shells from these fowling pieces against the embassy wall. Well, Mark Garrison and I were standing around, and he called Mac Toon, and Mac, who was really very cool, said, "Have the Marines escort the man out of our building." Mark said, "We're already working on that, sir." And, in fact, the fellow very shortly, surrounded by the Marines who didn't lay a hand on him--I should say, everything having happened as it did--rather meekly walked out. Mark calls the Ambassador and says, "Sir, request your permission to continue with the trip with Ray Benson." And he says, "Go ahead. Novgorod's a wonderful city." So off we went.

Donald B. Kursch was born in New York in 1942. He graduated from Harvard University in 1964 and served in the U.S. Marine Corps from 1964 to 1965. His assignments abroad after entering the Foreign Service in 1966 included Zurich, Budapest, Moscow, Frankfurt, Bonn and Brussels. Mr. Kursch was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2003.

KURSCH: I took Russian.

Q: So, you were really in studies until '77, around?

KURSCH: No. In fact, I got shortchanged. There were openings in Moscow, and I bid on a Moscow job. I wanted the economics course—I felt I had to have it as an economics officer—so for the second half of the year they put me in a six-month Russian language course and assigned me to a job at the US Commercial Office that only required a 2S, 2R in Russian. This is how I managed to fit in the economics and Russian language training in one year.. So, I took six months of economics and six months of Russian, which wasn't enough.

Q: So you got out there in '76.

KURSCH: I got out there in August of '76.

Q: And, you were there from '76 to when?

KURSCH: I left in January '78 because I was declared persona non grata by the Soviet government.

Q: Well, we'll come to that. But you went to the... your job was what?

KURSCH: We had, under the US-Soviet commercial agreements that were signed by President Nixon and Brezhnev in 1973, a stand-alone commercial office in Moscow that was across the street from the embassy. We were part of the embassy, but we were a separate entity. It was actually quite a unique operation for the United States at the time there.

Q: When you went out there in '76, what was the state in relations between the United States and the Soviet Union?

KURSCH: Well, there had been hope for an improved bilateral relationship when we signed these agreements in 1973. Then you had the Helsinki Accords, that were signed in 1975. Nixon and Brezhnev had exchanged visits. I think that there had been hope for an overall increase in contacts. On the Soviet side, there was the desire for greater trade and technological exchanges. We were hoping to increase our export markets. The Soviets believed that they could isolate increased trade and scientific contacts from other elements, such as cultural exchanges and other infectious elements from the West. But, there had been some disappointment because of our inability to deliver Most Favored Nation trading status to the Soviets, which had been promised in 1973. As you will recall, we also had the question of Soviet immigration policies, particularly the problems particularly with Jewish immigration and the link between that and Most Favored Nation treatment. During the time I was there, I would say disappointment began to set in, although it got worse after I left.

Q: Who was the ambassador when you were there?

KURSCH: Walter Stoessel was Ambassador when I arrived, he must have been there about a month or so, and then Malcolm Toon was the ambassador afterwards. And Jack Matlock was the DCM. He was the person I answered to.

Q: How did you find ambassador Toon? Was he interested in the commercial side?

KURSCH: He was very much interested in our presence. He loved our events. He loved to come down and open them up. We had a good arrangement with the Soviet Chamber of Commerce and Industry. We would pick out eight or nine thematic events a year, and every month we would do a particular trade promotion event that we would organize on a thematic basis. So, we had something, for example, on equipment and technology for treating air pollution, water pollution, heart disease and even raising poultry. And we'd bring over companies that sold these products, and we had what we'd call seminar mini-exhibits. We'd give everybody a little bit of exhibition space, a translator, and then we would have an opening event. The ambassador would come over and open the event and he'd have to push his way through all these Soviets who were in our little trade office. For the Soviets, it was really a bit like a little trip to America, it was a very pretty office. So, when the ambassador would get back to the embassy, and then he'd turn to some of the other sections, particularly USIA, and say, "Why can't you pack them in like that?"

Q: [[laughter]

KURSCH: He liked opening our shows.

Q: You mentioned all this equipment, but did many sales result from these, or could there?

KURSCH: Well, we sold things, certainly, that were licensable, I mean everything that we dealt with were in the quote, "nonstrategic" area, so a lot of medical equipment, equipment related to agricultural production, anti-pollution equipment, these kinds of things. I think it was kind of hard to tell how much sales really resulted and numbers produced were a bit of a scam by the Commerce Department. At the end of each of our shows, we asked each of our exhibitors how much they expected to sell in the coming year, and they'd put a number down. We'd send those back to Washington, and Commerce would collect them all and add them up. But how much was really sold was pretty hard to verify. But what was extremely useful, was the opportunity to do some market research in the Soviet Union which at the time probably was next to impossible. This was a very inexpensive way for a company to come over, we charged them $600-800, for this week in Moscow. We brought in an audience because we cooperated with the state trading companies who were the buyers and we would bring them into our office and have this intensive contact. So, if people were curious about trading with the Soviet Union, it seemed to me to be a good way to find out something about the place.

Q: I was wondering on this, a lot of our equipment requires... you know, you get a heart machine, or an anti-pollution machine, usually means there's an awful lot of equipment behind that piece of equipment, you know, a whole infrastructure to use. And for somebody to just get a particular piece of equipment really doesn't let it operate the way it should, because it assumes you have a whole series of knowledgeable people and equipment behind when there wouldn't be in the Soviet Union.

KURSCH: Well, I think that would have depended a lot on the industry concerned. Certainly in oil and gas we did a lot of business in the energy field in those days. The oil and gas equipment manufacturers were there big time. We even had large, specialized shows in Moscow for that equipment. The way the Soviet system worked Soviet companies or state organizations would say, for example "We need certain kinds of equipment for our hospitals, and we need this specialized equipment from the West." If a Soviet organization, had the money, certainly the Kremlin hospital probably had the money, they would make an application to the appropriate state trading company which would then go out and try to buy that piece of equipment. So, how it functioned later would be, a question how well the supplier was going to service the equipment, after setting it up.. And in many cases, they bought the equipment because the money was there and it was a prestige thing. Such equipment may not have been used very effectively.

Q: Did you have much follow-through? I mean where people who sold the equipment saying, "They didn't pay.", "They're not using it.", or this sort of thing? Or were there problems on the Soviet side where our people were delivering?

KURSCH: The Soviet market was a difficult market to penetrate. Of course, they had a monopolist's power, or only one buyer, so the buying companies, the state agencies could play off the various foreign suppliers against each other. Although what we did discover is once you cracked the market, the possibility of getting repeat orders was pretty good. So companies would take the chance. You had one outstanding example, I remember. Pepsi-Cola, which cracked the market ahead of Coca-Cola, was widely sold in the Soviet Union. Pepsi then concluded a big deal to bring Soviet vodka to the United States. They gave this vodka a spiffy image and put nice labels on the bottles and successfully marketed it to Americans as a premium product.. So we had those examples of success, I think it was certainly a fact that the Soviet Union fascinated people, and the market appeared to be sizable. And their needs were certainly there.

Q: How did the Soviet trade officials treat you? Were they tolerant?

KURSCH: I'd say on the whole, we were treated pretty well, because we had something that they wanted. In the Soviet eyes, there was this first of all fascination with the idea of reverse engineering our products. They felt that if somehow they could only figure out how we made this stuff, they might be able to copy it and grab secrets from our companies. Indeed, a fair amount of equipment was bought for that very purpose. The Soviets would buy a couple of prototypes, take it out to their laboratories, and try to figure out if they could make something similar. I don't think they were ever terribly successful doing that. I even wonder how successful they were in the military sphere. There they seemed to solve problems in their own ways. On the whole, our relationships were certainly correct. Generally contracts were honored. If companies did sell things, they got paid. Specifications were important. But for most of the time, our relations were correct, if not, particularly cordial. It was very hard to make personal friendships there. And that was the great disappointment, because my wife and I, when we had been in Hungary, had figured out to make friends with young Hungarians. But we got to Moscow and it was a much more tightly controlled system. I guess that's one of the things I guess I remember most clearly, how the KGB would do nasty little things such as when you would go away on a trip, they would turn the electricity off in your house, so all the frozen food in your refrigerator would melt and spoil.

But, they then would turn they would turn the electricity back on before you got returned home again so you wouldn't know the food was rancid until you tried defrosted it again and tried to cook it. Or they'd flatten the tires on your car so you'd get a flat tire about 200 meters away from the house in the freezing cold. That happened to me about five times during the first months I was in Moscow. There was a good deal of petty harassment like this. Russians were not allowed to your home. I tried to invite my Russian teacher to come and watch a movie. I knew that she would report on us, but she couldn't get permission to come.

One incident, in fact, with this Russian teacher demonstrates the paranoia that must have existed in the country at the time. We became rather friendly, because as I told you already, I had only six months of Russian before coming to post, so I took a lot of Russian lessons in Moscow in an effort to reach minimum proficiency. My teacher and I agreed that we were going to avoid political articles: instead I wanted to read humorous stories, , When we had these trade shows, she would try to help me out with specialized vocabulary. In this connection she was always asking me if I knew her father-in-law who had been a senior engineer in one of the Soviet industrial ministries. One day, she told me, that this father-in-law next weekend was having his 70th birthday and that she and her husband were having a big party in their apartment. She said "You probably know him because he used to be the senior engineer in such and such a Ministry. But I didn't know him. She said, "we're going to have a surprise gift for him. The surprise gift is going to be a case of Coca-Cola because we got this from the embassy as a New Year's present. We have kept this case of Coca-Cola, wrapped it up, and we're going to present it to him. We've also written this letter from President Jimmy Carter congratulating senior engineer Ivanov on his 70th birthday." Actually, she continued, "I even have the old translator from his ministry. She's going to come and translate the letter from English into Russian."

I thought, that is kind of cute. Maybe the Russians have some humor after all. After a couple of weeks, I'd realized I had forgotten to ask about the birthday party.. During my lesson I said, "You know, Tamara, you never told me about your father-in-law's birthday party?" She said, "Oh, it was a disaster." I responded, "What happened?" She replied, "Well, first of all the translator wouldn't translate this message because she thought that it must be an important message of state and her English wasn't so good any more." So, my teacher said, "I had to get up and do the translation myself." Then my sister started shouting, "Call the police. Call the police. See, Tamara you talk so much in your class that those Americans find out everything." So I said, "Well, does your father-in-law understand that this was a joke and that this message really wasn't from President Carter?" And she responded, "Well, it took my husband a week to convince his father, but he now understands that this letter wasn't genuine." But she added, "these people have never forgotten the terror of Stalin's times, and still remain so afraid of contacts with foreigners."

And I'm thought to myself, if someone like my teacher, a rather sophisticated Muscovite with a doctor's degree from Moscow State University, has a family that is so paranoid, what must it be like out in the country?

Q: Oh, boy, yeah. I'd think we'd want to put trade oil equipment shows down in Batumi, places like that. Were you able to get out and do these things?

KURSCH: I was able to get around the country a moderate amount.. It was true that most of the decisions at the time were made in Moscow because everything was highly centralized, and the in nominally independent Soviet republics, the ministries took their orders from the central authorities. But we did participate in some small shows in the Soviet hinterlands. I visited in Uzbekistan, we had a catalog show on heart disease in Tashkent. Then I went down to Tbilisi Georgia, a favorite destination at the time, to a food equipment show. Interestingly, I went out to the Ural regions with the American delegation from the Tennessee Valley Authority that was studying pollution problems from coal-fired power plants. What I remember most distinctly is that the level of pollution from the Soviet plants after treatment was higher than ours before treatment. Their favorite method was blowing the smoke as high up in the sky as they could. But at that time, it was difficult to get out there because it was a closed area, and they almost never approved applications for our diplomats to travel into closed areas. The delegation from the Tennessee Valley Authority was not affected by this policy and could get in. Because President Carter had recently received the Chairman of the Soviet State Committee on Science and Technology, the Soviets made a rare exception and approved my travel. But their approval came at 11:00 pm in evening prior to the morning of my scheduled departure. I immediately packed and was at the airport early the following morning for the flight to Sverdlovsk (now Ekatarinaburg). It was the only time I was ever on an internal Soviet flight with empty seats and they must have kicked off ten people to make room for me. But I made it out there and was treated very well.

Q: How did this commercial enterprise fit with the embassy? I mean were you able to make contacts or were they asking you for information, or were you getting information for them, or what have you?

KURSCH: We did a limited amount of reporting, I think we could have done more. I'm not sure it was coordinated as well as it might have been. We were there to do trade promotion. This was in the day when the State Department, before the creation of the Foreign Commercial Service, had the lead on trade promotion. Our goal was to make contacts with businessmen, to offer businessmen who came into our trade center support, and to plan trade shows. The Commerce Department backed us up very well. They supported us materially, we all had our own little Russian cars to drive around. We acquired these cars so we would be able to support our participation at the annual Soviet trade fairs properly and cost effectively. But when I think of the traveling opportunities we had and our opportunities to meet people, we probably could have had more interaction with the rest of the embassy in terms of reporting.

Q: One of the big questions that one has to ask in light of subsequent events of anyone who served in the Soviet Union is how do we feel about the Soviet economy? Because the Soviet economy was probably the Achilles heel of the Soviet system. It just wasn't kicking through. But were we seeing that, do you think that it really wasn't working?

KURSCH: Well, the difference standards of living was obvious. I don't think we appreciated, first of all, how much the Soviet economy was distorted by the enormous inputs that went into the military. People estimate that 15%-30% of GNP may have gone to the military. So what was left over for the consumer sector was not great. But the inefficiencies in the retail sector were very obvious. There was a slipshod approach towards everything. Construction was terrible. The quality of construction, the quality of apartments was very poor. There was a very negative, casual approach towards work by the majority of the work force. This dominant idea among Soviets was "They pretend to pay us and we pretend to work." One of the interesting things that I had not appreciated until I got there was the informal black or gray market sector that existed side-by-side with the Soviet economy. I remember running into that in Tashkent where we were out for this trade show that I mentioned previously. I was in the hotel dining room one night with my wife.. We dined communally because of space reasons. Anyway, this young man sat down with an attractive woman next to us and began ordering champagne and caviar. He was pulling out hundred ruble notes, which was a lot of money then. We struck up a conversation, and I asked him "What do you do?" He replied, "I'm a trader." I followed up, "Well, what trading company do you work for?" He laughed and said, "No, no. I'm a trader." And then he explained. He said, "We've got a whole lot of us out here. We come from all parts of the Soviet Union, we come here every year and we trade excess goods from our home regions, goods that are produced over plan, and we trade them for cotton goods that are made here in Uzbekistan." And he explained how they had to buy winning lottery tickets to show that they'd made money "legally" so that they could buy cars and other luxury products.. The potential for corruption in such a system was obvious. Indeed it was true, the room was full of people like him and he introduced me to a few of them. I thought of this afterwards because now, with the new economy, I mean, this must be where many of the "new" businessmen come from. There was a whole group of them. The Brezhnev period was a time of very high corruption.

Q: Was there a feeling that you were getting from your colleagues or from the Soviet side, concern about... you were approaching the end of the Brezhnev period at the time, I think.

KURSCH: Yes.

Q: His circle around him was practically using walkers. Did you get a feeling that this was not a very dynamic organization?

KURSCH: Yes, but you also had the feeling that they'd insulated themselves pretty effectively, because they gave off this façade of power, indeed from the military perspective, they certainly had it. If you looked at the balance of our conventional forces, the forces they had in central Europe, the Red Army was a very scary operation for us.

Q: Yeah.

KURSCH: The weaknesses in the system were obvious. One would not want to live in a system like that. Of course, the Soviet citizens were so isolated from the rest of the world, they were not allowed to travel, they were not even allowed to travel to Eastern Europe. We had a wonderful Foreign Service national who worked in our commercial office and we tried to get her to go to a conference that Commerce had arranged in Poland for Foreign Service Nationals. Not only did the Soviet authorities not let her go, they fired her. The Soviets terminated her contract with us. So people couldn't get out and they didn't know any better. They'd come up to say to you, "It really is better here, isn't it?" I don't know whether they really believed this, or whether they were trying to convince themselves, but the internal propaganda had a lot of effect at that time.

Q: Were you able to see any of the fissures in the nationalities group?

KURSCH: Yes, I mentioned my trip to Uzbekistan. What hit me for the first time is what a classic colonial situation it was. Because, of course, these colonies were contiguous to Russia, I don't think they registered in most Americans' minds the way the former colonies of the British and French empires did. But, certainly, going out there at the time and one could see and feel a certain tension between the indigenous people and the European Russians. I remember going to the market in Tashkent early one morning and walking around with my wife. We were the only European-looking people there and the local people were giving us some pretty dirty looks. The city of Samarkand had a clear European quarter that had probably been set up by the Russian military at the time of the czars, and you had a sense that these places were quite different from the rest of the city.

Q: Were there any particular events while you were there, before we move to the persona non grata business? Any great visits, or something happening?

KURSCH: Well, let me think, you're putting me on the spot here to come up with special events. I mean we had a very active trade promotion program.. The high point, I guess, that stand out were these trips I took around the country: to Georgia, down to Tashkent, out to central Asia, and out to the Ural regions. I can't remember being involved much in high policy making at the time. We were an action-oriented office. I did get a bit involved later, in a job in the State Department where I was the deputy director of the Office of Soviet affairs. It was a wonderful time though, in terms of being able to explore the country in a way that few Americans could, because while half the country was closed, the other half of it was open. You could drive out in the countryside on the weekends. We went out Vladimir and Suzdal, we went to Leningrad. We went to Kiev a couple of times. It was quite fascinating.

The other thing we discovered was when you got out of town, people were less afraid of you. People were more curious, they hadn't been as conditioned to be afraid of foreigners. They were more willing to talk to you. One thing I remember is we had a young assistant in Tashkent at this trade fair I'd participated in and he came to visit us in Moscow and snuck past the guard into our apartment. He had dinner with us. He started looking at the books on my shelf. I had the Gulag Archipelago from Solzhenitsyn, and he was eyeing it. I said, "Would you like it?" He said, "Can I have it?" I said, "Yes, you can have it. I can get another one." He took it as if it was a piece of gold. I do remember that. Actually those moments were quite nice. We had a couple of Russian friends, including this very interesting man who had married an American girl, who was also our babysitter and was in Moscow studying Russian. He was a very resourceful fellow who had been trained as an engineer and built his own house. But he had dropped out of the system and was living at its margins. He and wife finally emigrated. These were the kind of creative people, who if had they been able to prosper, might have made things turn out quite differently for the Soviets.. For all the trials and tribulations that Russia is going through, my sense is that these kinds of creative people are now able to do a lot more.

Q: Huh. Oh yeah. They're working their way through something. They haven't ever had essentially, ever had a real democratic society, and you know these things are still... arise like a phoenix. They take a while. Well, how did you get... what did you do that got you kicked out?

KURSCH: Well, the thing I didn't do, was that I got the chance to go after a year into the economics section of the embassy, and I decided not to do it because, of course, it takes a while for you to learn your job, and I was starting to hit my stride after about six or seven months, so I thought "It's kind of crazy to change jobs now." I'd actually taken Russian with the economic consular, Ken Skoug, and we were on pretty good terms, but I decided to stay in the commercial office a second year. We had only four American officers and two secretaries in the commercial office. We also had a couple of spouses as support personnel. However, under our agreement with the Soviets on the establishment of our respective commercial offices, each side was allowed to have up to 25 staff members. So the Soviets immediately sent to 25 people to their Washington office, and staffed many of these positions with intelligence officers, which we made clear we were not. We had no classified material at all in our office. We had a pro forma lock on the door, but no Marine guards, or any special security other than the Soviet policeman who stood at the front door. Anyway, in late December of '77, we had caught a Soviet here in the act of buying documents from an FBI agent. I didn't know about this, of course, but we caught the guy and we'd expelled him. Right after Christmas, the Soviets called one of our people in and with the request that I be removed for activities inconsistent with my diplomatic status. Of course, it came in kind of a funny way. It was on the day after New Year's, which was a holiday for us that year but not for the Soviets. Ken Skoug, the economic counselor called me up and said, "I have to see you right away. Can I come over?" I said, "No, Ken, I'll come over to your place." So I went over to his apartment,. First of all, he walked me into his study and closed the door.. He then showed me this Soviet diplomatic note requesting my expulsion.. Since we couldn't talk in the apartment, we then went out for a walk around the block. It was January, and more than a little bit cold outside, but since everything was bugged, you didn't talk in the apartments. He then explained to me, what had happened.

He said, "Jack Matlock (then the charge) is as mad as can be, and he's not going to take this. He feels that the Soviet action is outrageous given the large size of their Washington office. Jack is recommending to State that if you can't stay, ten Soviets from their Washington office should be expelled." Ken then added, "But, of course, you can't tell anybody about this because if it became public there's no possibility of making a deal with them" So I said, "Can I tell my wife?" He said, "Yes, you can tell your wife, but nobody else." So the next morning I went in to see the DCM who I normally didn't interact with all that much.

Q: Who was this?

KURSCH: Jack Matlock. He was charge at the time. And Jack is very, very competent, really one of the top Soviet expert of his generation; a superb Russian speaker. He wasn't normally that interested in our trade promotion work, but he got really interested in this. In fact, we got to know each other pretty well in the next coming weeks. So, he sent in his recommendation, and I sat tight. We waited for an answer. He said, "Actually, I think that if Washington accepts my recommendation, your chances of staying are about 50%. I think they'll back down." So, we waited, and a week later the answer came back from the State Department. They said "no, we're not going to throw out ten Soviets, but we'll throw out another Soviet, and if the Soviets then retaliate, then we'll get nasty."

So Jack looked at me and said, “Your chances of staying just dropped from 50% to 10%. But we have to continue to play the game.” But at that point, we started to make preparations to leave. We sold off a couple of things, including my wife’s ceramic kiln that never worked anyway, and we started getting ready to go. It went on for another week. The Secretary of State, who at the time was Cyrus Vance, used to meet with Dobrynin, the Soviet ambassador, every week on Saturday morning. Indeed, in that second week Dobrynin was going to ask for my immediate departure, it was apparently among his agenda items, but before he could get to that, the Secretary raised the matter and said that he hoped that it could be handled amicably. Dobrynin said he’d look into it again but wasn’t too confident. So, Matlock saw that and said “Well, your chances of staying are still about 10%.

Anyway, Senator Stevenson, the son of the presidential candidate, who was then the chairman of the subcommittee that handled the Export Import bank, was in Moscow that week. The Soviets were interested in qualifying Export Import Bank credits.. Stevenson was there from Monday until Wednesday. The moment he got on the plane, the foreign ministry called up and said, “Get Kursch out of here immediately.” So, I had 48 hours to leave. I was right in the middle of preparing for this trade show, and I just said goodbye to the businessmen and said, “I have to leave now.” I went home and we started making our final preparations. Jack Matlock organized a farewell party for me that Thursday night. Bill Brown who was the head of the political section, and who later became ambassador to Israel, led a whole team out to the airport to see me off. It was quite impressive. They had this big sendoff for me. My wife and I, our three year old daughter and our young Swiss nanny, all showed up in Frankfurt airport with our Russian fur hats. I looked like Nanook of the North. Somebody got a picture of us which we still have, and a little bit of publicity. There was an article in the New York Times.. But, yes, we were gone. I have to say, my wife hated the place. My wife was in the fashion business, and everything about the Soviet Union, the cold climate, and the lack of fashion was quite unattractive to her. She was not unhappy at all to leave. I suppose leaving in January also made it easier; it was not the best time of year to be in Russia. So that was the end of that. I thought I’d never see the place again, but quite to my surprise, I came back.

Q: Well, your final one was '84 to '86?

KURSCH: Yes, I came back to the office of Soviet Affairs, and I didn’t expect to do that because I’d been told that when I came back from Moscow, I could forget about serving in Eastern Europe or the Soviet Union. I was on this black list. Well, anyway, a colleague of mine from Moscow, Ken Yalowitz, who subsequently became Ambassador in Belarus and in Georgia, had that job, and he approached me. He said, “Are you interested in succeeding me?” And I said, “Well, yes.” as at the time I certainly didn’t have a better offer. I was looking around and had somebody who was trying to recruit me for a job in EB. I said to Ken, “You know, I’m damaged goods from the Soviet PNG action” We then went to see Tom Simons, who was then the office director for Soviet Affairs. Tom was later Ambassador to Poland and Pakistan and a very distinguished officer. Tom said to me, “Well, let’s see what the Soviets do. Let’s see what happens.” So, anyway, they hired me. It was a good time to be in that job, because after Ronald Reagan was reelected in 1984, he decided to try and improve relations with the Soviet Union, and particularly in the economic area. We actually won battles with the Defense Department. State and Commerce together actually seemed to be winning more often than we lost. I remember going back to Moscow in January 1985 to a planning meeting for the US-Soviet Joint Commercial Commission whose activities had been suspended following the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.. I was part of the State group in a large interagency team that included, USTR, Commerce, USDA and others. The leader of our group was Lionel Ulmer who was then the Undersecretary of Commerce. . I do remember coming into Moscow and seeing all those old revolutionary slogans on the buildings, except this time they were signed by Constantine Chernenko. When I saw that, I thought, “If a man from Mars came down and was looking for a revolutionary society, he’d put this country in last place.” The whole idea of Chernenko being a revolutionary leader was so patently ridiculous that, at that point, you thought, “This can’t go on much longer.” We did a number of things for the first Reagan-Gorbachev summit of 1985. As I recall, several of the agreements that were announced at the summit came out of our little office. We had an agreement on Safety of Life at Sea (SOLAS), that involved the US Coast Guard. We had an agreement on safety of air traffic in the Northern Pacific, which was meant to try and deal in a small way with the Soviet shootdown of KAL 007, which took place in 1982.

Q: That’s when a KAL plane was shot down going over the Kamchatka Peninsula.

KURSCH: That’s the one. Well, we basically told the Soviets that they couldn’t again fly to the United States unless they acknowledged took some responsibility for that tragedy. Simons’ idea was that we would get them to apologize by signing this accord on North Pacific Air Safety, to put some system into effect that would make it impossible for something like KAL 007 to happen again. So, we put together rather interesting trilateral agreement between ourselves, the Japanese, and the Soviets to set up a monitoring station and something equivalent to a hot line. After a fair amount of negotiation, we were able to get that signed; at which point, then we said we would negotiate a bilateral aviation agreement, which we knew that the Soviets wanted. Typically they were somewhat difficult about working out the details for the aviation bilateral talks and only agreed at the very last minute to sit down with us prior to the summit. We then had to get Secretary Shultz to call up Secretary Elizabeth Dole, who was then the Secretary of Transportation. I remember writing a decision memo arguing the need to proceed and having my boss, deputy assistant secretary, Mark Palmer, go up to Shultz’s office. We persuaded Shultz to call Dole, and to ask for her cooperation. Dole had her people from DOT in my office the next morning with their Soviet visa applications. They clearly didn’t want to go like this and were visibly unhappy. Although this was very much a last minute thing, we got the aviation agreement completed just in time as the summit meeting was braking up. The other thing I remember when we were out in Moscow, was to tell the Soviets that their Aeroflot office could not have more than four Soviet citizens.. They didn’t like this but accepted our terms. The Soviets were great stallers and enjoyed dragging out the proceedings even for an agreement where they had been the demandeur. On Wednesday night we had 30 outstanding points. I’d sent a cable off to the Secretary’s party in Geneva where the Summit was being held saying, “I don’t see how we can wrap this up by the end of the week. We’re making no progress on the following 30 points.” The next morning, the Soviets caved in on every one of them. So we did get it done. That was an interesting time, and I guess it was also satisfying for me because I have never been a big fan of trade sanctions as a substitute for policy, and particularly the kind of sweeping trade sanctions that are often used much too often. I have a great respect for Secretary Shultz. I can recall, by the way, how the people in the Pentagon would battle even after interagency decisions had been made. Weinberger would try to go through the back door to send appeals to the President to change his mind but the President did not change on the issues I handled. So we did make some good progress in those years. We also beat back attempts to put even more restrictions on trade. People wanted to keep out Soviet products because they were allegedly made with slave labor and things like this. DAS Mark Palmer, whom I later worked for in Budapest, was one of the few people that would take on these unpopular issues involving the Soviets, and go up and testify before Congress.

Q: You know, it does seem that trade sanctions, it comes down to if another, and I'm speaking from the American perspective... if a country is doing something we don't like, but we really can't do much about it... it's don't just stand there, do something, and trade sanctions seem to be one of the easiest things to do. It seems like you're doing something.

KURSCH: Well, it's a substitute for serious policy.

Q: Yeah.

KURSCH: If they're done unilaterally, they have no real impact at all, unless you're the sole supplier of the product. But at the time, you still had this sense, that we had much more ability to supply a product that others couldn't supply than was actually the case. Maybe in 1948 that was true, but it certainly wasn't the case true in 1978 or 1984.. And also, there was the sense that we should stand up for principle, even if we're wrong. We should stand up for principle even if others are going to make the sale, we shouldn't dirty ourselves. There's also this notion that trading is a privilege. Now, fortunately we've changed this unfortunate term of Most Favored Nation treatment to "Normal Trade Relations" and I think that this is an important change. Because the old term promoted the idea that we were somehow doing people a favor by trading with them. The appeal of trade sanctions seems to be much less strong today than it was then.

Q: Were you able to get industry to come and say, "Hell, they're not letting us sell our widgets and they're buying Australian widgets."

KURSCH: Industry was always a bit careful when dealing with the Communists.. You had certain businessmen like Armand Hammer, who had made his reputation doing big deals with the Soviets. But most US companies, and when I was in Moscow many of our biggest companies had representatives there, would be somewhat cautious in terms of being too much of an advocate for trade with the Soviets. They were fearful of how it might hurt them elsewhere. I mean there were exceptions to that. For example, Don Kendall of Pepsico was an exception. Behind the scenes quietly, I think they were certainly pushing. But much of the change of our policy then, from what I've read, was really President Reagan himself. He became fascinated with Russia. He had these well known authors, Robert Massie and his wife, who were giving him a tutorial on Russia. When he won his second term in office, there seemed to be this interest, "How can we increase communication between Americans and Russians?" And then the advent of Gorbachev, of course, really helped a great deal, when you had a new generation of Soviet leadership. As Margaret Thatcher said, "This is somebody I can do business with." That made a very substantial change.

Q: Well you mentioned the pipeline. Did this come up during this time?

KURSCH: No. I think the pipeline, as I remember it, was done and built by then. Rather this was at a time when we were trying to catch up to what some of the others were already doing in the Soviet Union. In terms of what kind of big business deal we did, I can't think of anything offhand. We never were able to give the Soviets Most Favored Nation treatment. Although, to a great extent, that was more symbolic than real because they didn't have that much to export.

Q: Yeah.

KURSCH: And, we also had restrictions on export/import bank credits. Those kinds of things.

Q: How about China? Did it come under, in those days, was it much of a player?

KURSCH: I was never really involved with China, at all. The only Chinese contact I've ever had were in Budapest. When I went back there, I did develop relationships with the Chinese DCMs because on my second assignment we could have contact with them. Whereas, on my first assignment, we didn't have any contact at all. What was a bit curious was that my common language with the Chinese in Budapest was Hungarian. What I did deal with in the office of Soviet Affairs was the effort to define our maritime border with the U.S.S.R. in the Bering Sea. We had these series of negotiations on this Soviet-US border, which I believe we may have finally settled. I dealt a lot with the office of legal affairs on that. We had some crazy Americans who were claiming Wrangel Island in the Arctic Ocean as US territory. That attracted the support of some extremist elements, even in Congress, who claimed we were giving away American patrimony. So I did have some interaction with those items.

Q: How was that? What did we do? Was Wrangel pretty much within the treaty... the Seward Purchase?

KURSCH: No, it's on top of Siberia. It's not even close. But there was some guy who worked in the agriculture department who had claimed to own the place and insisted that we'd given it away. His claims appealed to those individuals and elements who would believe ill of the State Department. But they were so far out. I remember Liz Verville, then the Deputy Legal Advisor and I went up once to brief a Congressman known as "Bullet" Bob Dorman, who was one of the more right wing members of Congress from California. Even he had to agree with us that these claims were far-fetched. But they were a nuisance, and the mail... we would get tons of mail on this from the hinterlands.

Then there was fishing. We had fishing problems, although not so many with the Russians. I do remember one, when I first came into the job, I was asked by the office of fisheries if I wanted to go to one of their regional meetings up in Alaska, and I did. I used it as an opportunity to consult with the Coast Guard in Alaska on maritime safety and rescue talks with the Soviets. We had this joint US-Soviet fishing venture out in Washington State. Anyway, I went up to this fisheries meeting in Anchorage, and there was a tough looking bunch of guys there. When the break came around, I cautiously introduced myself and asked if there were any problems they were having with the Russians that I ought to know about. The fisherman said, "Nah, no problems with the Russians, but get those Koreans. Or get the boats from Taiwan, those are the ones that are causing the problems.” At least that was one Soviet-US problem we didn’t have.

Q: Now, during the Balkan initiative, you didn’t mention Russia. Russia’s always had this, these are Slavs, had this feeling... Did that play any factor?

KURSCH: I’m glad you asked that question. The Russians were original members of the Stability Pact as were all the countries of the EU, the countries of southeast Europe, the former Yugoslavia, plus Albania, Turkey, Hungary, Romania.. And Russia was an extra country. Interesting enough, Switzerland, Norway, Canada, and Japan initially were only facilitators. They were not originally members, and we tried to change that because the Swiss basically said, “You want our money, you make us a full member.” The French didn’t want them in because they didn’t want to empower the initiative. But, we isolated the French on this, so they finally gave in. (I found when the French were singularized, they usually would give in on something like this.) But the Russians were members, but they didn’t have any money, and they had to be a donor. Strobe Talbot initially wanted to extend the Stability Pact to Ukraine. But again, the Ukrainians didn’t have any money to give, and the Ukrainians had more people than all of the rest of the Balkans, so that didn’t go anywhere. So, that what we tried to do was avoid doing things that would give the Russians grief. A couple of times, we had to have some frank discussions with them. I remember something we did, this media charter for southeast Europe that they didn’t like much, but the Germans faced them down, and they basically said, “We’re going to do this anyway whether you like it or not.” But they weren’t active....Bodo went to Moscow a couple of times as a courtesy. Overall the Russians weren’t a problem.

KENNETH N. SKOUG
Economic Counselor
Moscow (1976-1979)

Kenneth N. Skoug was born in North Dakota in 1931. He attended both Columbia College and George Washington University. His career included positions in Germany, Mexico, Prague, Moscow, and Venezuela. Mr. Skoug was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in August 2000.

Q: So you were in Moscow from when to when?

SKOUG: I was in Moscow for three years, from August 1976 to August 1979.

Q: What was the situation in 1976, when you arrived?

SKOUG: Well, the big issue was the one that was frightening all the people studying Russian and frightening a lot of people who were on the staff. They had just discovered that there was radiation which seemed to emanate from Russian transmitters. In other words, in addition to bugging the embassy or perhaps in order to bug the embassy, they were radiating the place. And of course they denied it, but it was tested, and it was clear that radiation was coming in. Screens were installed on embassy windows. Art Hartman for a long time didn't want to concede that this was an issue, but there was so much public outcry from the ranks that finally a study was made. There had been many people who had fallen ill. As a matter of fact, Walt Stoessel, who was the ambassador there and who left shortly thereafter, was very ill and when he came back to a senior post in the Department, he died soon thereafter. As to whether or not there was any connection between disease among our employees and what the Soviets were doing isn't clear. It was said that the screens placed on the windows reduced the amount of radiation that was coming in. To my knowledge it never was determined whether this radiation was really harmful or not, but it was thought to be harmful. A lot of people were unhappy, particularly those who lived in the embassy. Now those were not too many, because most of us did not live in the embassy. We lived elsewhere. But that was certainly the situation. Otherwise, the first thing of note, really, was that there was another election in the United States and Carter won it. Ford left office. The Soviets were always a little concerned at any change. They got to know people. I guess they knew Ford and Kissinger. There was an effort to maintain detente that had begun with Nixon. This had been offset somewhat by the Jackson-Vanik Amendment, which made it impossible to give the Russians most-favored-nation treatment and raised the issue of Jewish "refuseniks" who were not allowed to leave the country. This became an issue between the United States and the Soviet Union. That was already going on, and then it became a bigger issue under Carter. Although the Soviets thought at first that Carter might be more agreeable, they found after the first visit by Secretary of State Vance that it wasn't going to be so easy to get along with him. But still, there were a lot of negotiations, in the political area in particular. Economically, the most interesting issue was Soviet oil production. I sought to get to know the Soviet economy - as well as an outsider can get to know something that was kept under wraps - by looking at what I could, making what visits I could, and developing contacts. The CIA made an estimate that Soviet oil production would peak and then start down, and Marshall Goldman of Harvard-MIT challenged this, and he was a frequent visitor. It was a lot of fun dealing with him dealing on his visits. Soviet officials didn't want to give out much information. Trying to get it was hard. You would request a meeting with a senior Soviet official, and they would usually delay it if they could for months. When you finally cornered them, they'd tell you at the last minute, all right, 9 o'clock tomorrow you have an appointment for an hour. And then the guy would have a prepared text which he would try to read throughout the whole time. You had to quickly learn that you've got to stop that; otherwise, all you do is hear a recitation of irrelevant statistics, you don't get to ask any questions - after you've been waiting two months for a meeting. It was sometimes easier to engage Soviet officials if they appeared at public receptions. You had to prepare yourself for unexpected opportunities to pose a few key questions.

Q: This is something that over the years, our people have gone to the Soviet Union and come back and said that the damn system doesn't work, and yet at the same time we were treating the Soviet Union as an economic colossus. You'd been in Czechoslovakia, but the Czechs are a different breed of cat. What was your impression of the Soviet economy?

SKOUG: There was a saying in my time in Moscow that were it not for the Red Army, the Soviet Union would be a joke. There was substance in that aphorism. The USSR focused its substantial human and material resources on building a powerful state with a formidable military establishment and a remarkable, goal-oriented space program. The military always had first call on production from the best Soviet factories. In my own factory visits, which were not to plants normally regarded as strategic, I frequently observed Soviet officers walking about to inspect production. The civilian economy and especially the consumer goods industry were orphans by way of comparison. Although the Soviet Union could never have caught up with and overhauled the U.S. economy, per Nikita Khrushchev's vainglorious boast, it most certainly was a fierce competitor in terms of military strength. It was indeed not a joke.

The Soviet economy, which had undergone very little real reform, was still directed toward continually augmenting its output of basic commodities such as iron, coal, steel, and particularly oil and gas. The entire economy was based on central planning, and the Soviet leadership was very proud of this steady growth of output. Oil was especially valuable because it, along with weapons and gold exports, essentially paid for essential imports from Western Europe and Japan. Despite a CIA study correctly forecasting future problems for the oil industry, as it pressed deeper into producing areas and further afield for new supplies, the Soviet Union was in no danger of economic collapse. Some of my Soviet interlocutors even expressed appreciation to the CIA for having called attention to problem areas, which could be and - to some extent - were remedied. Its biggest shortcoming was the lack of market factors which might have identified the true economic costs and benefits of current production. Although the average Soviet citizen, especially those who did not reside in Moscow, Leningrad, or other "hero cities," lacked meat and many of the commodities available in even the more advanced Communist countries of Eastern Europe, he or she was normally warmly clothed and sufficiently housed. The low standard of living which we observed around us was slowly advancing, not contracting. Aside from minority groups, the average Russian took pride in his country's strategic parity with the United States and in the unchallenged dominance of its athletic teams. There was a deep sense of patriotism and a timeless capacity to endure privation. It was other basic problems, the most prominent of which was the war in Afghanistan which did not directly involve the Soviet Union until the very end of the 1970s, that caused the later collapse of the USSR. Repressed nationalism in the non-Slavic areas existed in the 1970s, but until Gorbachev allowed Eastern Europe to plot its own course a decade later, the breakdown of the Soviet Union was not on the horizon. While Gorbachev, who became a party secretary under the Brezhnev leadership, could never have reformed Soviet society or created a progressive economic system, there is no reason to suppose that the Soviet state would have collapsed on economic grounds alone.

In the 1970s, then, Soviet production was measured mainly in terms of quantity of output. There was relative inattention to quality, especially since there were no market factors by which to measure it. Distribution was poor, particularly because so little attention was given to transportation and roads. Agriculture was barely sufficient to feed the population. Importation of wheat and corn was a constant, with only the amount in question based on the adequacy of rainfall in Kazakhstan. This was one of the few areas where trade with the United States had become a necessity for Moscow, and it gave us some limited insight into one of the greatest problem areas of the Soviet Union, since we had a bilateral grain commission which met semi-annually to discuss trade. In sum, the country lived badly, but the population had no basis for comparison except for the horror stories its government told it about life in pre-Communist days. It was not an economic colossus and could never have become one as long as the military and space programs had top priority on national output, but it was not about to collapse until exogenous factors began to develop in the 1980s.

By the way, some latter-day academic critics in the United States have faulted the CIA for overrating the Soviet economy. In fact, the guidance we received from that agency was, to the contrary, to seek out every indication that the economy was in difficulty. We devoted great energy to that task and hunted every sign that things were not as rosy as the Soviet authorities pretended. But the most diligent search for weaknesses in the economy would never have told us that the whole thing would collapse in less than fifteen years.

Q: You were saying you could see the lines in front of the Czech and East German stores.

SKOUG: Yes, because there they would have a chance to get some quality goods - in their terms. There was no hope of getting consumer goods from Western countries although all Western countries would have been very happy to sell them that sort of good, but the Soviets would buy only strategic heavy industry goods from say Germany and Italy and France. What they wanted was Western investment capital, to a certain extent ours as well, although to a much lesser extent, in return for which they would export oil and gold and not much else.

Q: Early on, when you were there they appointed Ambassador Watson, didn't they?

SKOUG: No, not during my tour. What happened was very interesting. When Walt Stoessel had to leave, President Ford named Malcolm "Mac" Toon, who had been ambassador previously in Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and Israel, to replace him in late 1976. Mac Toon had the reputation of a no-nonsense Foreign Service officer. He came from a well-to-do Eastern family. He told me his brother was president of the Pennsylvania Railroad. When Toon arrived in Moscow and the chief embassy officers met him at the airport, he greeted us all by name. He was a very, very impressive gentleman. But it was clear that he was Ford's appointee, and after Ford lost the election it was well known in Washington and in Moscow that Carter might pick this up and appoint somebody else, perhaps Watson. He didn't particularly want to appoint Toon, who had been ambassador under a number of Republican administrations.

The Russians knew that Mac Toon was no sucker - and they like suckers. The Russians really liked to have a businessman or a romantic come out there as chief of mission. They could pull the wool more easily over his eyes. They never could pull the wool over the eyes of the Bohlens and the Kennans and the Stoessels and the Toons. So they hoped that this would happen, and they didn't accredit him. And Mac Toon just stuck it out. It became an issue in the press as to whether or not the President would recall his appointment and appoint somebody else. Toon used to tell us that he'd had a very interesting and rewarding career in the Foreign Service; if it ended right there, that's the way it was. If it didn't, he'd be glad to be ambassador. And well, Carter lacked the nerve, I guess, to recall him, so he stayed. And he was ambassador throughout much of the Carter Administration. I don't think he got utilized in negotiations as much as he would have liked, particularly some negotiations that took place in Vienna and other places. But he was there as the main eyes and ears of the U.S. Government for all the time I was there, the rest of the time. I started with Stoessel, but Mac Toon was still there when I left three years later.

Q: Did you get involved in wheat sales?

SKOUG: Yes, I was present when the Joint Commission met to discuss wheat and other farm issues. We were very interested in knowing as soon as possible what the wheat crop was going to be so we would have an idea of how much the Russians would buy because this had an effect on American prices. They might buy so much that it would cause a very substantial price spike. And knowing this, they wanted to buy wheat, naturally, at a lower price, so they would try to conceal the fact that they needed it. And yet we negotiated certain parameters where they would have to buy so much and they could buy so much more. And they had to do that because it could be that, you know, there would be a worldwide demand for wheat, and there wouldn't be enough wheat for them. So they knew that they had to have a floating scale in there. The guys from USDA came out from Washington to lead those negotiations. Some of the talks were back in Washington. I always participated in the negotiations in Moscow. I wasn't invited to go back to participate. The people in Washington would follow that. But of course we enjoyed that because it gave us access to ministers - or vice-ministers. We didn't get access to ministers. But those contacts were very important. Without contacts in that part of the world, you are dead.

Q: Well, what about contact? I would think you would just end up in that type of situation they would recite the figures to you.

SKOUG: That's true. They'd recite what you read in the press and so forth. There was a term, as a matter of fact, that we used. It was called "reading down to the adnyaka." Adnyaka is "however." I don't know what it is in Serb, but anyway, the column: "this was fulfilled" and so forth and so on, "this was beautifully done," blah-blah-blah, and finally, way down here, you'd see "Adnyaka..." and then you'd know that "However..." potatoes weren't so good or something like that. And so a lot of reporting was done from the press. I didn't do that because I had two guys who were covering - one on the foreign trade side, one on the domestic. It was easier on foreign trade, obviously, because you had Western countries which would give you some supplemental information, although even there trade, being competitive by nature, was a sensitive matter. We had a group of counselors who would meet - Germany (Ambassador Stulpnagel, who had been an ambassador in Africa), Italy, France, and Britain were included, and I think Canada got in. I happened to like the Canadian very much. I had known Ian Wood in Czechoslovakia, and he was a minister, of all things, a great big guy, about six feet six inches tall. So the six of us used to meet, but everybody would be holding back, and of course I had very little information to give anyway because our trade was limited by Jackson/Vanik, our strategic controls, lack of MFN, etc. We had less trade than any of them, except maybe the Canadians. The Germans had the most, and they were always competing for projects, and they were always trying to figure out what their rivals were up to. Of course, I also wore the economic defense hat, and we had to try to keep things from being sold that violated COCOM standards (COCOM being the international committee of Western countries which cooperated in maintaining such embargo as there was on trade in strategic commodities with the Soviet Union and other states). There was a lot of fun in that in dealing with your Western colleagues.

But you had to have the contacts with the production ministries. It was easier, for example, with the Ministry of Civil Aviation because we did have active commercial subjects to discuss. Pan Am went in there, and Aeroflot was flying to the United States. Constantly we were having problems. There was a standing commission which met periodically. That gave us entrée. We knew the people we were talking to, and that's a big help. You've got to know them personally in those countries, or the chances of getting anything are not very good. Then the same was true in maritime matters because theoretically we would like to have had the wheat carried in American bottoms, but there never were enough American bottoms around. The Russians preferred to use their own ships or those of third countries. It saved them precious hard currency. And so we were always trying to see to it that we got as much as we could. And that involved discussions with Morflot, the Soviet merchant marine. I was able to draw, for example, on those good contacts with Morflot when I made a trip to Vostochny Port (East Port) on the Pacific Ocean, at the other end of the Soviet Union, in early 1978. Speaking of having to stay a week, this was a situation where you could take a flight to Khabarovsk, which is a city seven time zones from Moscow, and you still aren't there. If you've flown seven time zones and you stay in Khabarovsk, then there's a boat train that goes from Khabarovsk to Nakhodka. That's the town. Vostochny Port is the port area there, East Port. You get to Nakhodka and the next night train (for foreigners) is not going out for a week. So you've got a week to spend in Nakhodka. Well, since I and my colleague, Bill Farrand, my deputy who ran the Commercial Office, both spoke Russian - despite my problems I did speak Russian - they were not anxious to have us hanging around in Nakhodka for a week. We insisted that we be permitted to ride the day train back to Khabarovsk. They gave their consent although the train ran past Vladivostok, home base of the Pacific submarine fleets, where nobody could go. That was a closed area. Well, you couldn't see anything. I saw Vladivostok from such a distance. And then the train crawls along the Chinese border, but you would have to be right on the Chinese border, and even there you probably wouldn't see anything. They were just so super-suspicious. But anyway, I had a useful schedule in Nakhodka. We stayed there, I think, two days, saw a lot of people. It was all arranged because of our contacts in Moscow. Otherwise, you'd be frozen. You could go there and walk around, but you wouldn't be able to do anything.

Q: Well, were we having any problems about the quality of the wheat which was being delivered, because I've heard criticisms sometimes that the shipments of the wheat were... There was too much... Well, not edible stuff in the wheat. Was that an issue that arose?

SKOUG: Yes, the Russians did complain. I can't say that the complaint was such that they threatened to stop buying our wheat, but they did let us know when they got bad shipments of wheat, and I'm not quite sure what we could do in those situations except to promise we would try to police it better. Again, those talks, the agricultural talks, were very useful, and the civil air and the maritime. In other areas, you had to develop the relationship, stressing mutual interest. Again, management and technology were of interest to the Russians, as they were to the Czechs. In most discussions, the Soviet side was led by Gvishiani, son-in-law of Premier Kosygin, just as it had previously been Adzhubey, who was the son-in-law of Khrushchev. So it seemed to be a job for bright sons-in-law. Gvishiani had an office where he had all the latest technology which could be bought or produced, not much of it produced in the Soviet Union. What was produced in the Soviet Union was for military or space. Their best production was clearly going into the military.

Q: Well, did you feel you could over time establish a certain rapport, or was it all pretty official relations?

SKOUG: Well, it was not the rapport that I had in Czechoslovakia. In Czechoslovakia they called me the Czech equivalent of tovarish. They called me "comrade" because I knew them so well and we got along well, despite the fact that I was representing the chief capitalist power - but I understood them and they understood me. That relationship did not exist in the Soviet Union. No one ever called me tovarish, and no one ever answered me by saying, "You know more about that than I do" or "You're better informed than I am about that." They didn't say that. But there were some good conversations. In particular, the Soviets had an official named Mordvinov in Gosplan, the economic planning bureau, who was really a wonderful guy. He had a younger deputy named Dvarets - and they were a joy to be with. It was always fun. Lunch with those guys was very pleasant. Even in the hard times - and there were some hard times when inevitably there were problems, and I'll get into some of these problems - our personal relations were excellent.

Q: Maybe this might be a good time to stop, don't you think?

SKOUG: Yes. I'll just finish with what Mordvinov told me. After one of those meetings when bilateral relations were exceedingly bad, he looked at me with a mischievous smile and he said, "Well, it can't be said that we exchanged information. We exchanged views."

Q: Well, I think we might stop at this point. If you'll sort of make a mental note to yourself, you were talking about some hard times. In our next session, I'd like to talk about the specifics of those hard times during this time in Moscow.

SKOUG: Right, right, one of them being the Crawford case, another one being the Korean airliner that was shot down.

Q: Great.

***

This is the 16th of November, 2000. Ken, in the first place, you were in Moscow from when to when?

SKOUG: I went to Moscow in mid-August 1976, and I served just about exactly three years - a few days over. I left in August of 1979.

Q: Okay, we were talking about the hard times. You mentioned the Crawford case, and what was it, CNN?

SKOUG: The KAL.

Q: Oh, the Korean Airlines.

SKOUG: Well, most of this period was the Carter Administration dealing with the - let's say - mature, even ageing, Brezhnev régime in the Soviet Union. Brezhnev had come to power in 1964, so he'd already been in power 12 years when I got there, in the twilight of the Ford Administration. Brezhnev in general was less adventuresome in foreign policy than Khrushchev, but as we know in Czechoslovakia he was quite willing to use military force. And at home, there was a tightening up, so that people began to go on trial in the Brezhnev Administration who might not have gone on trial under Khrushchev. And the same people were in power in the Soviet Union for a long period of time, people like Brezhnev, Kosygin, Suslov, and Podgorny for a while, although he was forced out as president because Brezhnev wanted to be president himself and made himself president, and Podgorny became virtually a non-person for resisting his own demotion. Now when the Carter Administration came to power, it focused on human rights to an extent that the previous Nixon-Ford administrations had not. There was a human rights function in the Department of State-

Q: It had been mandated by Congress.

SKOUG: -mandated by Congress, but it was not applied generally as much as it would be under the Carter Administration. And early in the Carter Administration the Secretary of State, Vance, came to the Soviet Union, and at that time, and as I recall even in the period before he arrived, there was, of course, emphasis on human rights which would also apply to human rights in the Soviet Union. This new approach was very badly received in the Soviet Union. When Vance came, and the first meeting took place in late March of 1977, so Carter had been in power a couple of months at this point, and the Soviets were very angry. Gromyko made a toast at a lunch, which I attended, and said that - I'm not sure I can quote him, but what he said was, "Non-intervention in domestic affairs is essential in bilateral relations." In other words, it was quite clear that he would see emphasis on human rights as intervention in Soviet domestic affairs. And the Soviets quickly determined that this primarily, although not exclusively, concerned the Jewish question. They quoted triumphantly Senator Ribicoff to that effect, that human rights was the Jewish emigration question. This question was a little older than Carter, of course. It was in the Jackson-Vanik amendment, that as long as there wasn't freedom for Jews to emigrate, we would not give the Soviet Union most-favored-nation treatment and they would also not get commercial credit. So you had a serious economic issue already existing. There wasn't much trade between the United States and the Soviet Union. They were very bitter about that, but they had somehow been able to... They thought they were working around it under Kissinger, but with Carter and Vance they suddenly realized that they had a new administration they had thought would probably be softer in foreign affairs but was sticking on this question of human rights. That in itself didn't mean a crisis, but it meant a cooling of relations.

Q: By the way, at the embassy, did you all feel that human rights meant the Jewish question exclusively, or was it bigger than that?

SKOUG: Oh, it was broader than that. The people who were being put on trial were frequently Jews. There was an Orlov, who was on trial and, I think, unjustly convicted, and then the famous Sharansky case came up. That was clearly Jewish. Obviously there were Pentecostals and there were a lot of other people who were suffering from violations of human rights in the Soviet Union. You could say the whole Soviet population was denied the most basic essential human rights. It was a tight Communist dictatorship. But the people who seemed to feel it the most, at least the ones who were willing to do something about it, were frequently Jewish dissidents. They called them refuzniki. They had been refused permission to leave the Soviet Union. And that's where most of the issue came, although the question of freedom, if you want to put it in those terms, for the Soviet Union meant everybody. It meant people in Russia itself, people in the parts of the Soviet Union that were dominated by the Russians - the Ukrainians, the Georgians, the Balts - everybody. Everybody was suffering. And we, for example, refused to visit the Baltic states at a senior level because we never regarded them as lawfully part of the USSR. More junior officers could go there, but nobody of senior rank could go there because this could be interpreted as acknowledgment of the Soviet claim that they were sovereign in the Baltic states.

The next incident was an arrest. I happened to get involved in it because I was the ranking substantive officer, and Toon had me go in with a protest. I helped write the protest. It was the arrest of a journalist named Toth, I think of The Los Angeles Times. And it turned out that he was accused of currency manipulation. I should explain that the Soviets had everyone who was living there under close scrutiny. There were a lot of American journalists and other journalists; there were a lot of American businessmen, perhaps 30, representing American corporations; there were American scholars over there, exchange students - there was a certain community - and they all were... many, I would say, not the exchange students, but certainly the businessmen and the journalists had maids and so forth, and the maids would be paid in rubles, but they also wanted to be paid in coupons, which would buy seven times as much as a ruble and didn't cost the American any more. He got a ruble coupon for the same price he paid for a ruble. You weren't supposed to give it to anybody else, but in practice everyone had to because that's the only way they could hire and retain servants. All of this was organized by and known to the authorities. So the KGB had a tank full of people swimming around, all of whom were somehow violating Soviet law because that was the only way to exist in the Soviet Union. And so whenever they wanted to spear somebody they could do it. For some reason they picked on Toth. Whether Toth was more indiscreet than others or whether they simply didn't like what Toth was saying or writing, he was arrested. It ended up that he was expelled, although there was a little go-around about it, where I presented a protest and they refused to accept the protest and gave me a counterprotest on something else. That's the way the Soviets are - or were. You never could pin them down and say, "I protest." You know: "I reject your protest, and I have this to say." They always would. They were fierce in argumentation, particularly when you had to do it in Russian. So anyway, there was this Toth case. That wasn't the last of the issues between us and the Soviet Union.

I can put the dates in perspective as far as incidents. There was a visit by Vance the following spring, that is, April of 1978, when things were perhaps a little better, but there was really very little progress, and I believe it was the first Vance visit since the one of March 1977, after which Gromyko went on television as soon as Vance had departed. We could observe him up at Vnukovo Airport as he was pacing around, pacing, pacing. He was preparing to meet the Soviet public on television, which he didn't do very often. In fact, we hadn't seen him on television very often. But he went on with a long presentation, without any notes that were obvious, about the perfidy of the United States and all the adverse things that could be said about the United States and bilateral relations. It was devastating, a devastating attack, and so that's what really set the tone for our relationship, because he revealed to the Soviet population this perfidious American administration which had so much to learn about how to deal with the Soviet Union as an equal and sovereign state and so forth. It was really a performance that most of us did not realize Gromyko was capable of. I happened to have sat with him at lunch about that time when Ambassador Stoessel was leaving, and a few of Stoessel's staff were there, and a lot of top Soviets under Gromyko. It was amazing how witty and sharp, but in a cool sense, this fellow could be that Khrushchev used to refer to as their "donkey" who would go out and bray when they told him to.

Q: He was a survivor, of course.

SKOUG: Yes. He was about the only foreign minister the postwar Soviet Union ever had.

Q: I know.

SKOUG: From 1948 or so. He was indeed a survivor, and he had learned a lot, forgotten nothing, but it was always with a malevolent approach toward the United States. He could be debonair if he wanted to be briefly, but his attitude was not a warm one, and that's why I think when Gorbachev later came to power, Gromyko was one of the first to go. He got rid of that limitation on their foreign policy.

Well, anyway, Vance came for the second time, they were really talking about arms limitation. And I must say that I never got much involved in Vance's visits because they had nothing to do with business or economics, with the exception that on the first trip he came and he wanted to sign a couple of agreements - civil aviation and maritime - and there was no basis for a civil aviation agreement. Our relations with the Soviets in that domain went down steadily until Pan Am eventually was forced to conclude its operations. It couldn't make a cent. Maritime may have reached a formal agreement that I'll get into separately. It was very difficult, and this concerned mainly shipments of grain from the United States, on which bottoms they would go, and so forth, and marine insurance. There were special talks on that. But that was not what Vance was there to talk about. So my only connection to Vance was essentially, after inevitable lunches and arrivals and so forth that would take place.

Q: Did you all at the embassy get the impression that Vance, when he first arrived ( I think it was March of 1977 or so), came sort of with a half-baked idea of maybe a new relationship or something and he came out with a bloody nose?

SKOUG: He came out with a bloody nose, yes, definitely. Gromyko totally rejected him and the agreements were insignificant. The maritime agreement, whatever it was, was totally insignificant. It had no real importance. And there was no civil air agreement, and there was no agreement on anything. When Vance came back the second time to talk about arms control, I suppose some progress was made, because they were moving towards an agreement which they reached the following year, but at this point there happened the first Korean Airline incident, the one that's generally been forgotten, but unfortunately was a harbinger of what happened later. In April of 1978, just as Vance was there, a Korean airliner coming out of Paris wandered over the Kola Peninsula in the northwest corner of the Soviet Union. It flew over the Norwegian border and into Soviet territory. The Soviets tried to warn it off. It kept on flying, and so the Soviets opened up with machine gun fire, and they killed somebody on the airplane. One person was killed by the machine-gun fire. So then the pilot and the navigator followed orders to land. It must have been a miraculous landing because they landed in an area not anywhere near an airport. They landed, I think, on a frozen field or something in Karelia.

Q: A frozen lake, I think.

SKOUG: A frozen lake, yes. It was a very difficult landing, and one person was killed in the landing. It's lucky that no more were. It must have been a very able captain. I always dealt with civil aviation matters, and there was no rivalry about this, because other people in the Political Section were dealing with Vance and disarmament. My first contacts with the Soviets-

Q: Wait a minute. There was obviously no South Korean representative.

SKOUG: There was no South Korean representative at all in the Soviet Union. I kept thinking back to the case I mentioned when I was in Prague, where a Korean journalist following a Korean sports team in Czechoslovakia disappeared, and I learned when I was in Korea with the National War College - I was at a small dinner - I mentioned the incident, and the man I was having dinner with said he knew that man very well, he was a close friend and he had disappeared and been turned over to the North Koreans, and that was the end of him. Or if he's still alive there, he's suffering, I'm sure. I had that in mind, and I said to the Soviet officials I was dealing with that we wanted everybody out, "passengers and crew." And I won his agreement. They either weren't focusing on this or the people I was dealing with were anxious to resolve a question while Vance was in the country. So anyway, I got an agreement over the telephone with the officials I was dealing with that everybody would be allowed to get out, and I was arranging the repatriation of these people. But then it turned out that they decided that the captain would have to be prosecuted. He had flown over Soviet territory and refused orders and so forth. And then they wanted the navigator as well, so we had a dustup with them about that. And I wanted to use Vance, and Vance was leaving that day. And Vance had been, as you know, head of Pan American Airlines. He had an interest in civil aviation. I tried through Marshall Shulman, who was with him, to get Vance to make some statement of his own concern or to take it up with Gromyko on their way out to the airport, but he didn't do it. He didn't, I guess, want to endanger whatever he was working on in the arms control area by bringing in this Korean question. So I essentially took the position - stretched my liberties a little - and told the Russians, in effect, that I assumed Vance was very upset about this thing. He wasn't going to raise it, but he was really, really concerned about it. Well, the result was that the pilot and the navigator got out. And so it had a happy ending, except for the two people who did not survive it. I felt that if the captain and navigator had been interrogated, they might eventually have been turned over to the North Koreans, who would only have been too happy to see that.

Q: Yes.

SKOUG: Of course, in the mixed up world of Soviet justice, they might have been executed for violating Soviet territory and then "causing" the death of two people. Well, that was that case. And then relations then took another downturn because of the connection between intelligence activities by the Soviets and the at-risk status of Americans in the Soviet Union. I'm not sure Toth's arrest was connected to any espionage, but I rather thought it was. I thought that Toth had been arrested pursuant to some problem with Soviets in the United States, but it was very clear in the next case that it was.

Just about the time of the Vance visit, as a matter of fact, just before it, a very senior Soviet official, Shevchenko, who was the deputy under secretary for political affairs in the United Nations, defected to the United States. I was curious because Jim Sutterlin, my old boss, was his deputy. And Shevchenko was running an operation, and Sutterlin later found out they gave it the code name "Jim." He thought it was for him. But anyway, the FBI arrested a couple of culprits caught red-handed in May, about a month after this second Vance visit with Gromyko. And these guys did not have diplomatic immunity in our view, and so they were going to be put on trial, convicted, and sent to jail. I don't think they were allowed out on bail.

Q: These guys were-

SKOUG: They simply worked for the United Nations, you see. They were not on the Soviet delegation to the United Nations; they were employees of the United Nations, but like all Soviet employees of the United Nations, they worked for the Soviet Union, and they were engaged in espionage activities. So the Soviets did not like this, obviously. And a couple of weeks later - I think on about June 12, 1978 - an employee of International Harvester named Francis J. Crawford (he went by the name Jay), who happened to be engaged to the American secretary in our commercial office, had attended a function in the commercial office, and the two of them were driving to their homes. They came to a red light that stayed red. They couldn't go through it. The red light was there. And then the Soviets pounced on them. And they roughed her up, and they grabbed him and arrested him. And again, I believe they got him on currency violation or something - anything that they could have got him on. They also knew... They were very clever. They had this group of Americans, and they picked out one of the most vulnerable ones. Although he worked for International Harvester, they knew he was not very significant. He was the number-two man for IH there, and he was thinking of resigning, planning to resign or had quit. He was sending telexes out of the commercial office that revealed their plans. The commercial office let businessmen use our telex, and the telexes, or course, were monitored by the Soviets and had no protection whatsoever, obviously. They knew that he was not of much importance to International Harvester. They knew he was connected to an employee of the U.S. Government, planning to marry her. They knew they had something they could charge him with. So they thought they had somebody that they would hold for these two Soviets. And the first question was, Who's going to be the second one? We figured there would be another one. The business community was worried, but spineless. They were not willing to say much because each of them was afraid for himself. There was a U.S. Trade and Economic Council there, whose representative said that the Council would try to help Jay Crawford. He told Jack Matlock and me that Crawford would probably be sentenced to eight years in jail; they would try to get it reduced to two. We didn't think that that was very helpful. International Harvester had had as its local representative a New Zealander named Brian Reardon, but then he showed up on this occasion and was very busy and came to see me. I thought he was going to tell me what he had been doing on behalf of Crawford. The first thing he said, however, was that by dint of his efforts he'd established that International Harvester's business operations would not be affected by this incident - you know, washing their hands of Crawford. Large American corporations didn't understand what was going on because, seen from afar, it just looked like a case of corruption. He wasn't being accused of espionage at this point, although the hint was that maybe there was more than just his corruption. Americans could posture and say, Well, American businessmen have to obey the laws of the country they're in. That's essentially the position that they started to take. And International Harvester itself hosted at precisely this time a Soviet high-level delegation of commercially interested ministers in the United States. The delegation was received by several American companies. So it looked like the American business community was trying to wash its hands of this low-level guy. Well, I must say that Bill Farrand, who was my deputy and headed the commercial office, and I didn't see it that way, and we got Jack Matlock, who was the DCM, engaged, and then we got Ambassador Toon on board. And Toon was willing to go and tell a press conference that International Harvester ought to cut its business operations in the Soviet Union until its employee was released. Well, that isn't what they were looking to hear. But we got Shulman engaged, and by the time I-

Q: Shulman being?

SKOUG: He was the advisor to Vance, a Harvard professor - excuse me, I think a Columbia professor - and expert on the Soviet Union. And he was hired as advisor to Vance. I forgot what his... He wasn't the counselor of the Department, but he was Vance's man. He must have become engaged because later on he wrote us and said that he had been blamed along with the embassy by Caterpillar for harming U.S. business prospects. Caterpillar was playing a big role - in fact a much bigger role than International Harvester - in the Soviet Union. They were building a lot of the tractors that were used on the gas pipeline in Tyumen in the far north, and they were in competition with the Japanese for a lot of the business that was foreseen in Siberia in addition - Yakutia and other large developments. Apparently Caterpillar believed that our defense of Jay Crawford's rights as an American citizen was bad for business. Well, there was a reception at Spaso House in August. It was August 25th.

Q: Spaso House being the ambassador's residence.

SKOUG: Spaso House being the ambassador's residence. Yevgeni Shershnev, who was the deputy head of the so-called Arbatov Institute, the Institute for the USA and Canada, engaged me there in a long discussion about how Crawford was clearly guilty, but he then said at the end that due to the spin the embassy had put on the matter, the amazing thing was that even Armand Hammer appeared to feel that Crawford was innocent. And this was a telling blow because Hammer had earlier in the year made a speech about the great Lenin and the great leader Brezhnev and so forth, but Hammer came down on this issue in support of Crawford. By this time, not only thanks to the embassy but thanks in part to the Chicago Tribune (which didn't like International Harvester and is right next door to it), the correspondent (I think his name was Carmichael) of the Chicago Tribune was giving International Harvester a very bad name for the activities of its officers in receiving the Soviet delegation and in just trying to protect its commercial interests, paying no attention to Crawford. So the business community was turned around, and that was very important to getting the Soviets to back off. But finally, the dénouement was that Hammer paid a visit to Brezhnev at Yalta, and he came flying back to Moscow, and I was to meet him at the airport to get Brezhnev's decision. I met him after midnight at Sheremetyevo Airport as he came back from his meeting with Brezhnev. Hammer told me, "This guy is guilty, but they're going to kick him out of the country." I said, "Thanks a lot, Dr. Hammer. We don't have the same opinion as to whether or not he is guilty, but I'm glad to hear the good news." And so we got Jay Crawford out. All these things had a price. Obviously I was not the most beloved person in the Soviet Union as far as they were concerned because, although I was economic and commercial, I also got involved in these messes.

Q: I can't think of his first name, but Carter had sent Ambassador Watson out there, who was from the IBM Watsons. What was his first name?

SKOUG: Tom, I think.

Q: But my understanding was that it was being done in order to open up business relations, and that's why a businessman was sent there. And so I would have thought that you would have... I mean, how did you find yourself working with the ambassador? You know, you are the economic-commercial officer.

SKOUG: After Walt Stoessel's departure in 1976, our ambassador all the remaining time I was there was Malcolm Toon. Watson came later.

Q: Oh, he came after.

SKOUG: Yes, Toon was a hard-line Foreign Service officer, and no fool. He was in his fourth ambassadorship, three of them to Communist countries, and he was a tough guy. He supported business, but he also, as I have said, in cases where human rights were involved, such as the arrest of an American businessman, he took the same position that we had taken for Kazan-Komarek in Czechoslovakia. We came first of all to the defense of an American citizen, and then after that there was business. The business community's relationship with the Soviet Union was an interesting one, and I might say that a lot of the top business executives that wanted business with the Soviet Union, particularly Donald Kendall of Pepsi-Cola, did not have a high opinion of Ambassador Toon and in fact tried to undermine him. An incident at the Trade and Economic Council session in Los Angeles in November 1977 illustrates this point.

The Soviets were represented in Los Angeles by Patolichev, the minister of foreign trade, a very, very tough guy. His counterpart was Donald Kendall, who was retiring as American co-chairman of the Council.

Ambassador Toon had sent with me a letter of support for the Trade and Economic Council, but it was not the fulsome, effusive sort of praise that some would have liked to see. It was more of a cautious message because we did have this other aspect of dealing with the Soviets, the strategic rivalry, not to mention human rights concerns. I brought the letter to Kendall, who took it and looked at it and put it in his pocket without comment. It was clear to me that Kendall, whom I asked to read the letter at the session, was not going to do it. So I had to work around him and try to get somebody to read the thing. But it never was read, although it was announced by one of the people on the American side that Ambassador Toon had sent his greetings to the meeting. But they didn't read his message because, I suppose, they didn't like his message. Certainly Kendall didn't like it. Eventually, we got the Council to publish the letter in the document that it sent out on the proceedings in Los Angeles. But this incident was sort of symbolic of the relationship. A lot of American business leaders that wanted to export to the Soviet Union would rather have had a businessman ambassador than a professional diplomat who was aware of all of the aspects and who knew the Soviet Union very well. It was Toon's third tour in the Soviet Union. As far as I know, Watson had never been in the Soviet Union, or at least not very often.

Q: Was it the feeling that you were getting that for the business people business is business and we don't give a damn about anything else?

SKOUG: There was certainly that feeling. Now the guys who were actually on the spot didn't entirely share that feeling. Their outlook was influenced more by fear and helplessness. They knew more than their bosses about the grim reality of life in Brezhnev's USSR. What can we do to help Crawford? We're all in this ourselves. What we encouraged them to do was to inform their home offices of the reality of the situation. In order better to represent their genuine concerns, I worked very hard to set up a forum in Moscow to parallel the forum which the Soviets had with the Department of Commerce in Washington. Our people in Commerce were very attentive to the Soviet trade people, led by a man named Mkrtumov. He had no trouble in getting to senior people in the Department of Commerce, whereas it wasn't easy for me to get to even a deputy minister, not to speak of Patolichev. I could never get to Patolichev. Even Ambassador Toon only got to him one time. I did see the various deputy ministers of foreign trade, but only with a major effort. Therefore, I tried to set up a panel of regular meetings with Deputy Minister Manzhulo to talk about problems that American business had in the Soviet Union - one example being Caterpillar's need or desire to bring in a D-10 tractor, which was a brand-new model at the time. The D-10 was too heavy for Soviet roads, supposedly, and yet there was no other way to get it in except to drive it. We did get it in. But the Soviet side resisted having this forum established. They said that I could meet at a lower level; I could meet with a man named Melnikov, who had an intelligence background and was a minor figure with very little clout in trade matters. I had to get to a higher level, like Manzhulo. So my counterpart, who was the head of the East-West Trade Office in the Department of Commerce, Alan Reich, informed Mkrtumov in Washington that they would not have their meetings unless I could meet with Manzhulo. Well, the Soviets didn't like that, and it led to a great protocol question, was I was reaching too high to get to a deputy minister of foreign trade? Eventually they gave in. We had a meeting. The atmosphere in the meeting was frosty, but we did discuss various issues with some resolution of them. Then they delayed holding another session. There were only three such meetings in a year, but at the end, Manzhulo acknowledged that they had been quite useful. He was probably not free to meet. He probably would have been willing to meet himself if he had been a free man, but he was held back by the Soviet system.

There also was competition among the Soviet deputy ministers as to who would really be responsible for relations with the United States. Manzhulo, who was a veteran foreign trade man, lost out to a younger guy named Sushkov, who was a crook, actually, and finally went to jail in the Gorbachev period. But he was Patolichev's man, and Patolichev loved Sushkov. Sushkov really was the counterpart to Kendall and his successor, Miller, I think, as head of the U.S. side of the Trade and Economic Council. There was always a certain friction between the Trade and Economic Council, which was totally business-oriented, and the embassy, which had the overall national interest to represent.

Q: What were the Soviets after? I mean, obviously they needed wheat, but were they after prototypes and then they'd copy them or was it a real trade relationship?

SKOUG: Well, they would have liked, yes, the latest computers and so forth, and there always was COCOM, which theoretically governed trade in strategic goods. It was clear to the Soviets that the U.S. was tougher than, say, France on controls of Western equipment that could be used for military purposes. The United States also tried to discourage its Western allies from selling this sort of thing to the USSR. There was a lot of jockeying around among the economic-commercial counselors or ministers of the major Western countries. Although we discussed many things, those supporting major deals by their own nations would hold back. The Italian counselor later told me with a laugh: "We fought like tigers to protect our trade." The Soviets did want access to the latest technology in the West. There is no question about it. Essentially the Soviet Union was organized in a way to support first of all the military power of the state, and the military would have first call on almost anything. And if they could get access to the latest technology, so much the better. They did have other interests. Their interest was in obtaining a sufficient amount of grain when their grain harvest was not good, and two of the three years when I was there it wasn't good, so they did need to buy more than the agreed minimum tonnage. They wanted permission, and there was always a flexible range. They could buy so much, and they had a possibility of buying so much more. These were negotiated out essentially with the Department of Agriculture in the United States sending out a representative for regular biannual meetings with the Soviet. There was no clearly political side to this problem because it was established that food was food, and we were ready to sell it to them if we had enough. The other question was what ships would carry this, and it usually turned out that we didn't have ships available to do it, and so their ships carried it, or it was carried on the bottoms of third countries. They did technically agree that one-third of this should go preferably on U.S. ships, but we didn't always have those ships available. Our people wanted them to buy our marine insurance. They were very resistant to it. They didn't, of course, want to spend any hard currency if they could avoid it, preferring barter. Those were the sort of issues that we discussed.

In civil aviation, we tried to establish conditions where Pan Am could operate profitably. It soon turned out that it was so unprofitable they had to give up, and Pan Am ceased to fly to Moscow in 1978 except on charters. We also had an issue with the Soviets on charters other than Pan American because essentially we had no flights in there then except charters. They wanted the Foreign Ministry to receive a note before every charter flight, which made it very, very difficult because it added an element of delay when you ought to be dealing with the Ministry of Civil Aviation. These are typical of the sort of issues that sound small but nevertheless were very time-consuming and important and sometimes led to heated discussions.

Q: Well, this is the web and woof of relations between relations between countries, particularly countries such as the Soviet Union, where everything had to be spelled out very carefully. What about life in the Soviet Union, getting around? Was it possible for you?

SKOUG: Well, travel was very interesting, also very difficult. I like to travel. I think I mentioned that in early 1978 I went to Nakhodka on the Pacific. Maybe I didn't mention that.

Q: I'm not sure if you did.

SKOUG: I made a trip to Khabarovsk and to Nakhodka with Bill Farrand, the commercial attaché. We wanted to look at the operations of an American company there that was doing business with the Soviets in fishing. They had an operations in Washington State, and they also had one man in Nakhodka, which is on the Pacific Ocean not far from Vladivostok, on Wrangel Bay, the biggest bay in the entire Pacific, I think. The Soviets were building what they called Vostochny Port - East Port, Siberia, out there. Now you had to get there by flying to Khabarovsk, which is right on the Chinese border, and there was a nine-hour flight from Moscow through seven time zones, so Bill and I left Moscow at night, and reached Khabarovsk in the morning. Now Farrand unfortunately had checked a bag. I was carrying a little bag, so we could get away from the airport quickly and spend the day in Khabarovsk. We knew the train was leaving that night for Nakhodka. It was a once-a-week night train, and they had permitted us to go down there. And we would theoretically have to stay a week in Nakhodka to get the next night train back. Since they had Bill's bag and wouldn't disclose where it was, we were their prisoners, and we had to waste our day in the train station in Khabarovsk. We normally would look all over a town at what was going on, look at the meat market, etc., but this time we got to see very little because we were held by the missing bag. We did, however, take the occasion to shed a little light on the local scene. We had copies of Amerika, the magazine put out by USIA - and it looked just like Soviet Life or Soviet Woman or Soviet Culture, except it was quite different in content. We had nothing to read that day except their propaganda, but when we departed on the train we left a few Amerikas buried in the stacks in the depot. We knew that they would find it out eventually, but we thought that before they did somebody might have the chance to read something interesting. Then we boarded the train to Nakhodka. We spent a day or two there. We were then allowed to come back by a day train. The day train comes within distant sight of the tightly closed city of Vladivostok and follows the Chinese border, which was very tense at that point, but you don't see much from a train. It was interesting, however, to have ridden that train, to see how people meet the train at little stops. It wasn't an express train; it was a local, one might say. Travel by train in daytime was totally contrary to normal procedure in the Soviet Union. All of our travel to Leningrad or to Helsinki, for example, was by a night train. When we went to Kiev, we went by a night train. They didn't want you to see the country. Why, I don't know - how much could you see from the train anyway? But we did have an opportunity to jostle Soviets and watch them selling food and selling articles on the train when it stopped, buying tea and so forth. When we got back to Khabarovsk late in the day, they were waiting for us because we had pulled this little trick on them. They'd pulled a trick on us with the bag, and we pulled a trick with the Amerikas, and now they were ready to do another trick. A close surveillance. We were under discreet surveillance at all times, but a close surveillance was when they want you to know you're being surveilled. We were in the hotel, and as we got in the elevator - there was an elevator for eight persons, and I was the eighth person. There was a lady standing beside me in the elevator, and the KGB surveillant wanted to get on. He was a big burly guy, and he got in there, too. Then there were nine persons in an elevator for eight, so it wouldn't go, of course. The KGB man then took the little woman by the shoulders and put her out, and then he rode up to the first floor with Bill and me, where there was also a dezhurnaya waiting. A Soviet hotel always has to have such a person, whose task it is to observe anything taking place in the corridors of the hotel or other lodging facility where she is assigned. It was probably true in Yugoslavia-

Q: No, but I did see it. They had it when I was in Bishkek, in Kirghizstan in 1994.

SKOUG: Ah, I see. The dezhurnaya was to watch everybody on our floor, so in addition to her and this guard, Farrand and I were well covered. We entered our room, and we stayed there a while. It being evening, they apparently thought us there to stay. Then we looked out, and the coast was clear. Instead of taking the elevator we went down the stairs. Outside the hotel building we hailed a taxicab. We asked the taxicab driver where there was something going on in Khabarovsk, and he said, well, the other hotel. We went to the other hotel, and here were many young people who were building the BAM, that is, the Baikal-Amur-Madzhistral, the main-line track that they were building to parallel the Trans-Siberian Railroad. So we spent the evening drinking and talking to people who were out there working, asking them what they thought, checking on conditions. Thus, we did eventually see a little bit of Khabarovsk. A little after midnight, we walked back to our own hotel. We walked through Khabarovsk back to the other hotel, came in, and they were surprised to see us. "We thought you'd gone to bed."

The next day, we faced what they called the bran. Branirovan is 'to reserve' in Russian, and paying the bran means you pay an extra day for a hotel room. And this happened in other hotels in the Soviet Union. I always fought it, and I fought it there, and the lady in charge finally backed down and said, "All right, we won't charge you for the bran, but I'm accusing you before the such-and-such committee meeting in Moscow for exceeding your diplomatic..." I never heard of that again, but they did take the air out of my tires when I got home. There was always some prank being played like that. The pranks would have been worse if I had been of lower rank. Some of our guys were given rough treatment, but they never did that to me because I was a counselor. But they did take the air out of my tires.

Inevitably, the KGB would get involved in these trips, and even with my children, because frequently when I had a chance to travel and they had some vacation from school, the four of us would go, my wife and the two kids. My daughter was only 13, 14, and 15 there, but they still tried to take advantage of us. Someone would always ask her to dance. Someone would always be trying to see her. There would be phone calls. The KGB never lets you go, and certainly you know they're there. They want you to know you can't do anything without their being part of it. But the program nevertheless was very broadening.

I never was in a Soviet home in all the time I was in the Soviet Union except in Armenia. We had a session in environmental economics in Armenia in October 1977. I was a member of the delegation led by Sid Geller of Commerce, mainly people coming out of Commerce, Interior, and EPA. We flew down to Yerevan, Armenia. We then were driven by automobile to Tsakadzor. Tsakadzor is a town about 8,000 feet above sea level, just about the height of Mexico City, and it was where the Soviet Union's team had trained for the Mexico City Olympics, to get the same altitude. It was interesting because there were a lot of Armenians present at the meeting, and the Armenians had a different point of view than the Soviets. I'm skipping. I was in Armenia twice. First of all, I was telling about being there with my children. I might mention one thing. We took a trip to the Caucasus. We went to Soviet Georgia, which was very interesting. We were there at Easter and watched their services in a Georgian church. We took the train from Georgia to Armenia to spend a couple of days there. In the Soviet Union, when you arrive at one point, you immediately try to confirm your reservations to the next point, because they are not taken for granted, and I had a train ticket from Armenia to Baku, in Azerbaijan. I went to the hotel in Armenia, and I said, "I have the ticket, but I don't have the hours written in." She said, "There's no train." I said, "I know there's a train because I've got tickets on this train." We argued for a while, and then she said, "All right, there is a train, but you won't be on it. You can't ride that train." Sometimes in the Soviet Union, you can win by being tough; sometimes you win by knowing when to quit. I recognized that it was time to quit. That train ran right through the Nagorny Karabakh, you know, the area of Azerbaijan which is populated by Armenians. Tension was high there, but at that time the problem wasn't so well known. The reason I could not travel by train was that it would have gone through that part of the country, so we had to fly to Azerbaijan instead. And I considered myself lucky because they arranged all the air tickets. Otherwise, I would have had to spend all my time in Armenia arranging my travel out of it.

Going back to the second trip to Armenia, the one to Tsakhadzor, which was with the Department of Commerce, the KGB had a big hand in that, but the interesting thing was that the Armenians were really concerned about the environmental disruption going on there. Lake Sevan, I think, had dropped 18 feet, a beautiful lake that is very romantic in Armenian history. Armenian history is really focused on Lake Van, which is now in Turkey, but Lake Sevan was the modern equivalent. The lake had been seriously depleted to provide for electrification in the area, so they were very concerned. At the meeting, Dr. Olga Dzhugaryan, who was their representative on the commission, hosts of the meeting, and the wife of a noted architect who had built the sports stadium in Yerevan, invited us to her home: Russians, Armenians, and ourselves. We sang songs and drank Armenian cognac, and it was a very pleasant evening. It was the only time I was ever in a Soviet home. I saw Dr. Dzhugaryan later when she visited the Commercial Office in Moscow. I was sure she'd paid a price for having invited us into her home. She probably paid a big price. But she said nothing about it, knowing only too well that the Commercial Office was thoroughly bugged.

Q: Did you ever get involved with the ongoing contacts with the Jewish dissidents and not only the Jewish dissidents but others, the Pentecostals and all that?

SKOUG: Well, Pentecostals did break in during my period, and there was a great issue then as to how they were to get out, because the Russian position was that they would have to walk out the door the way they came, and then they'd be arrested. They wouldn't go, and we took the position we wouldn't force them. Usually, you know, you don't permit that to happen, because if the Russians had wanted to, they could have sent thousands of people in there who would have been glad to come in there and not come out. But because of the situation being what it was, the Pentecostals occupied, I think, the area which a barber had been using in there. For the rest of the time I was in Moscow, the Pentecostals were still there on the embassy grounds. Eventually they did get out, however, in a way that they could migrate. I think they did emigrate.

There was another incident. A fellow came in who said he had a bomb on him, and he demanded to be allowed to leave the Soviet Union. The Russians were informed in this case, and they sent people in, persuaders to try to deal with him. He was sitting in the Visa Section. Of course we evacuated the Visa Section. The outcome of that wasn't so good because they could not persuade him to surrender, so they pounced on him, and he did have a bomb which was to explode outwardly, and it went off, but it was not of the capacity to destroy the Visa Section. However, he was badly injured, and they carried him out. We never knew what the end of it was. It certainly wasn't a good one. They either shot him or he died. That was one sort of incident.

Speaking of the refuseniks, we had a fellow in the political section who was working specifically on the Jewish dissidents and the other critics of the Soviet system. He came to dress like them and to let his hair grow long and his beard and so forth, but one day the Soviet police at the embassy grabbed him as he tried to enter. They claimed that he looked like a suspicious character trying to break into the American Embassy. Now whether they really thought that or whether they just wanted to rough him up, anyway, they did rough him up. I've forgotten whether he shaved and cut his hair after that or not. They could play hardball.

Q: This wasn't quite in your bailiwick, but by the time you left there in '79 - it happened after your time, but there was a lot of speculation about how come Brezhnev and company decided to move into Afghanistan. I mean the guy was getting old, and this was a geriatric Politburo, and they wanted one last move, and the just went a little bit gaga. Was there any feeling about Brezhnev at that time, that he was losing it, while you were still there?

SKOUG: Oh, yes. There was considerable speculation about his health. I'll comment on the Afghan thing in a minute, but as far as Brezhnev's health, I saw him at two dinners in the Kremlin that he gave for American businessmen attending the trade and economic sessions in Moscow in 1976 and 1978. The Soviet elite thought they were really dealing with their counterparts when they dealt with American captains of industry. They invited to these dinners chief executive officers of 40 or 50 major American firms and banks. Well, Brezhnev was sort of a hero on these occasions. The first time Brezhnev spoke, everybody was standing up cheering. American labor leaders wouldn't have done that, but some of the American business tycoons did. When he left the dinner a little early, he made a little pirouette, and he went out. How the capitalists cheered! That was 1976. The second time, in 1978, he did essentially the same thing, except when he made his speech, he spoke for a short period of time, and then the interpreter would speak for much longer. He was reading a little, and then the interpreter would read a lot more. It was very difficult for him to speak at this point. He was already having clear physical problems, but whether that meant that he also had mental problems I don't know. He had physical problems. I think his mental faculties were probably still normal. There was criticism of him sub rosa. For example, he made his son, Yuri, a deputy minister of foreign trade for maritime affairs, and everyone thought the guy knew nothing about the subject, and they more or less laughed about it. There were jokes about Brezhnev's supposed senility at this point. In fact, though, Brezhnev's colleagues dreaded change so they were content to carry on as if everything were normal.

As for Afghanistan, I think that essentially the Soviet leadership was reacting to outside events it could not fully control. The Politburo thought that Soviet power was rising, not declining. They still felt a little bit - not nearly as much as Khrushchev - but they still felt that in military affairs, particularly after Vietnam, they were becoming the paramount world power. They were snookered by the Cubans into supporting the Angolan side in the civil war, but that didn't involve commitment of much Soviet military power. When it came to the Horn of Africa - I happened to be in Moscow at that time - I remember dealing with the Somali ambassador, who was just amazed at the Soviets' sudden change of position. The Soviets reacted to Mengistu's coup in Ethiopia by switching sides in the Somali-Ethiopian conflict. They only sent a senior military officer there, but they got several thousand Cuban troops under his command to help the Ethiopians win the war with the Somalis. When it came to Afghanistan, where they already had a big stake (they were heavily involved), it probably looked to them like consolidation of a régime by a little bit of manipulation. There turned out to be more manipulation than they were anticipating, and this time they didn't have their Cuban allies. The invasion took place after I left.

Q: Yes, in December of 1979.

SKOUG: The Russian interest in Afghanistan is an old one. They must have underestimated the risk in 1979. I remember, I used to be involved in debates in our embassy about how the leadership would move as the situation in Afghanistan became ever more complicated in 1979. We debated the subject frequently in the embassy, and the primary spokesman for non-intervention, that the Soviets wouldn't do it, was Peter Thompson, a very bright guy who'd served in India and knew that area well. Peter said that if they went into Afghanistan, they would really be caught. They'd find somebody who wouldn't back down. And I would cite the example of Czechoslovakia. I said, "Well, don't conclude that the Soviets won't do it because if they see their interests in jeopardy, they'll take the risk." And Thompson would reply, "Well, but the risks are so much greater. If they do it in Afghanistan, they'll be caught. They'll be up to their knees in it." Ambassador Toon would listen, and Toon essentially thought, well, the Czechs were so gutless that they don't count as an example. He hadn't seen the Czechs the way I'd seen them. He wasn't in Prague in August 1968. But anyway, here I was arguing that they might very well do it, and here was Thompson saying they won't do it because if they do it they'll really get hooked. And I've seen Thompson since then, and he points to me and says, "You were right," and I say, "No, you were right." We both were right.

Q: This was one of the great blunders, which in a way helped to lay the foundations for... or helped shatter the foundations of the Soviet Union.

SKOUG: Oh, absolutely.

Q: It wasn't the thing, but you could point to this as being one of the major blunders.

SKOUG: You can, and furthermore, I don't think that... It's commonplace now to say that the Soviet Union was collapsing, but it wasn't collapsing at that time. It had problems. It had problems that it could have overcome. But the involvement in Afghanistan was a major burden, and if they had avoided that, they would certainly have been able to stagger on for more time than they did.

Q: Well, looking ahead, 10 years after you left, the Soviet Union was in the process of falling apart, and one of the major things was the economy, and yet we - particularly looking at the military's work, so overestimating the Soviets economically, I think because of the concentration on their military production - why weren't we - or maybe we were seeing it correctly, but it looks like - why weren't we getting a true feeling for the weakness of the Soviets in the economic field?

SKOUG: Well, we were of course under, not pressure, but we were stimulated to report every weak side in the Soviet Union we could because, of course, everything you would read and see, unless you read down to the adnyaka, the 'however,' would be that great glory of the Soviet Union, this plan was fulfilled and overfulfilled, and the Soviets would never give you any information which would lead you to assume that they had a problem. But we knew they did have problems, and one of them was in the famous oil study by the CIA, which came out in the late 1976 and predicted that Soviet oil production, although it was one of the highest in the world, way up on a level with the Saudis, would peak and then head down. And Marshall Goldman of MIT, I believe, made a small part of his career out there criticizing the CIA estimate and trying to show that oil production would continue to be higher than they thought, although not as high as it was. The Soviets obviously listened to that. One Soviet official told me they owed the CIA some gratitude for pointing out problems for which they could find a remedy. We did our best to get hard facts. I remember calling on a deputy minister of oil with Jack Carlson, who was the vice president of the American Chamber of Commerce. That's how we got in to see the deputy minister. And anyway, he was very careful with what he said, but as we left, we were taken to the door by a stolid, square-jawed KGB guy who had been in the meeting, and Carlson said sportively, "We'll go back and tell the CIA their estimate was wrong." And the guy responded bluntly, "You can go back and tell the CIA you didn't get any statistics." That's the way it was. It was very hard to get any statistics.

Well, we looked at the Soviet economy. We looked at how they lived. We reported their shortage of meat and vegetables. Cabbages sometimes seemed to be the only thing they had to eat. We reported on accidents, aviation accidents, if we could find out about them. For example, one day - it was Christmas day in 1976 - my family and I saw ambulance after ambulance after ambulance and a fleet of fire engines headed in complete silence toward what could only be Vnukovo Airport. The silence was to limit public attention to what was obviously an air disaster. They finally had to reveal there had been a major accident out there, because there were foreigners involved. If they'd only been Russians you never would have known. They tried to conceal all information possible about social or economic problems, but still, along with the downside, there was the side that they produced all this steel, they produced all this coal, they produced all this iron ore, they produced all this oil. And by hook or crook, they managed to keep it going. They were producing a steadily rising amount of natural gas. They seemed to have tremendous resources, and although they needed Western equipment to get it out, nonetheless, somehow they were able to pull this thing together. So I think that that's why I say I don't think the Soviet economy would have collapsed without other things like Afghanistan. The Soviet economy would have made it difficult for them to continue the space race, and so forth, but they essentially did themselves in by devoting so much to the military side. This started right after the missile crisis in Cuba 1962, this buildup of the Soviets armed forces, which they always denied - they always maintained that their military budget was something like nine billion rubles or something when it was ten times as much. I was present at a meeting between Premier Kosygin and Secretaries Blumenthal and Kreps in 1976 where Blumenthal asked this question, and Mrs. Kreps followed up somewhat indiscreetly, and Kosygin shouted at her. It was very impolite for him to have shouted at a woman who was a member of President Carter's cabinet. Kosygin asserted: "Why don't you believe us when we say this is our military budget? This is what it is!" He was very agitated. Well, of course it wasn't the truth. It was the emphasis given to the military side and to space, I suppose, the attempt to play the great world power, that put the additional strain on the economy so that changes were needed. Gorbachev was coming along at that point as a new Communist Party Secretary. And he did not share all the views of the Brezhnev Politburo. I saw him in 1979 as he came through an exhibit I was running at Krasnaya Presnya. He came in, and the reason that he did so was the Vienna meeting between Carter and Brezhnev was coming up. There they would sign SALT II. So, there was a window of opportunity, an opening when the Soviets showed a friendlier face to us. As a sign of temporary favor, a high level Soviet government and Party group came through and looked at our exhibit at a fair called Melyoratsya, which is 'improvements,' you know, improvements in technology. Gorbachev was with them, and he was not like any Soviet Communist Party Secretary I'd seen. Party secretaries seemed to observe but say little. They were dour, and their business was the Party's business, and they certainly didn't have any public relations functions. But he was talking and, you know, gesturing, and was much younger, practically a generation younger than all these old guys in the Politburo. It appeared that he had a fresh outlook. And a lot of the younger Soviets that I was dealing with did have that. It looked like a change in generations, and I think he saw himself, in a way, as a reformer. He thought he could make the system work. That's essentially what he would later try to do, to make it work. He was not willing to intervene to protect the Soviet empire in Eastern Europe, and he certainly did not foresee what was going to happen.

Q: No. Did the computer generation, word processing, all that, was beginning to build up in the United States and Western Europe, particularly in the United States. Were you getting any glimmers that this thing might prove to be a difficult one for the Soviets to handle? We're really talking about information more than anything else.

SKOUG: Yes, well, I can't say that I would have been able to predict in 1979 what happened in the United States in the 1990s and the year 2000, but the Soviets were attuned to it. Gvishyani, the son-in-law of Kosygin who was the deputy chairman of the Soviet Committee on Science and Technology, was very interested, and the chairman, vice premier, Kirillin, was highly intelligent and one of the nicest senior Russian officials I ever had a chance to talk to at length. On one occasion in July 1977, I went out to Sheremetyevo Airport to see Kirillin off to the United States, and since they were delayed, I had about an hour with him. And in that chat he conceded that the USSR did indeed have an energy problem, saying, "We all have an energy problem." And Gvishyani was very bright. He was an Armenian? Georgian, I guess. I think that he was Georgian. They were very much attuned to getting the latest technology, mainly, of course, from the Western Europeans, and he had gadgets in his office of all sorts. They were brilliant. I mean, one can't say that the Soviets didn't have technical capacity. They just didn't have enough of it. And they did not have the sort of system that could turn invention into innovation and then into serial production.

Q: Also, the technical capacity opened up fields of information and things that allowed you to print things and do all sorts of things without some control.

SKOUG: Yes, well, that's true. They were very concerned about control. But there wouldn't have been the danger, perhaps, in the Soviet Union. In Czechoslovakia you had a broad range of people who were qualified and able to use technology and who could, for example, make those radios operate when the Soviets came in and could do other things. You wouldn't have had that spontaneity in the Soviet Union because it just had no history of that. There weren't enough people who were trained to think like that. They didn't have enough. They had some good ones, but not enough.

Q: Is there anything else we should cover on the Soviet Union? If there is something we should discuss, I would be happy to.

SKOUG: Well, there's one little vignette. Probably my best source, or one of them, in the Soviet Union was Yevgeny Shershnev, who was the deputy director at Arbatov's Institute for the Study of the United States and Canada. He was assigned in 1979 to a senior position at the United Nations, one of the Soviets delegated to work there. On one occasion, shortly before he left, he told me about a trip he had taken to Iran, and this was at the time when the Bakhtiar Government was trying to hang on there. The Shah was already in a lot of trouble, but the worst had not yet happened. Shershnev said that he had been in Iran the previous fall as the guest of Vinogradov, the Soviet ambassador, a good friend of his. Shershnev, who was not a boastful man, said that he could see the problems that were going to bring down the Shah. He said he could see that the street and the Islamic clergy wielded a tremendous power there, and that the Shah was going to fail. He said that Ambassador Vinogradov didn't see that at all. Vinogradov argued with him. He liked the Shah. He even supported the Shah. Of course, the Shah had sent back to the Soviet Union a Soviet flier who had defected in a MIG aircraft. The interesting thing is that the Soviet ambassador was no more able to predict what was happening than anybody else, whereas Shershnev said that he could foresee it, and he said this even before the clerics really came in. I warned at that point that it would be going back to the middle ages, or could be, and he said, well, if they had to go back a little bit, it wouldn't matter. The future would be brighter. Obviously, he was thinking that the Tudeh Party would inherit power once the "Middle Ages" were over.

Would vignettes would be of interest?

Q: Go on, because it helps give a feel for the times.

SKOUG: Right.

I might mention a dinner my wife and I attended at the Uzbekistan Restaurant in Moscow in July 1977. The dinner was hosted by Pan American Airline to see off a senior Soviet civil aviation official, a man named Samorukhov, who was going to the United States to be Aeroflot's North American director of operations. Beside him sat a senior and very tall (about six foot six inches tall) American official from Pan American's West European division, whose name I won't mention. Then there were others at the table, including a man named Smurov, who was clearly a KGB watchdog, and the dinner went on, and there was dancing and a lot of vodka was drunk because it was Samorukhov's farewell. And he was having a lot to drink, and a lot to say, and he was talking to the tall Pan Am official next to him, having toast after toast together. We began to know what was going to happen, and I was watching Smurov, and Smurov was watching me. Smurov was shaking his head in despair, and finally Samorukhov said to Smurov, "You're KGB - I'm KGB, too." And Smurov kept shaking his head about the levity. Finally, though, the evening ended on a bad note because as the tall American and Samorukhov jumped up to make a toast - and sometimes when you've had a lot of vodka a sudden movement can do it - the American passed out at the table and fell with a mighty crash. He almost fell on my wife. My wife's a little woman. She would really have been crushed. Anyway, here we were with everyone looking at us then because it made a lot of noise when a man that big falls over. We had to carry him out. Samorukhov, although he was plastered, was able to make it out under his own steam, but we had to carry out the American contender, and we got him out on the street, and there was his car. The car for him was a Volkswagen Beetle. We had to fold him to get him in the back seat of the thing, and off he went. That was life in the Soviet Union - a lot of drinking.

Drinking, of course, was one of the things that Gorbachev tried to crack down on and didn't succeed. Drinking vodka was one of the things they permitted because, like sports, it was a way out. Get people drunk and get them home and they won't make trouble for the Party. I used to go out early in the morning and run. You'd find in the morning that there would be all these poor figures lying in the street, no matter how cold it was, who had been out drinking at night and were lying there in the morning. Perhaps the alcohol kept them from freezing.

Q: Let's go back to Moscow. Talk about the embassy fire.

SKOUG: Yes, on the night of August 27, 1977, which was a Saturday, the American Embassy caught fire, and it was a major blaze. Now on that day I had received the local Pan American Airlines representative, who was smoking cigarettes. Right outside my office was a lot of equipment that had been brought in to improve the firefighting capacity of the American Embassy, which the inspectors had recognized to be at risk. I had a hotplate, which was used for making coffee and so forth in the Economic Section of the embassy. So when the fire broke out and it was said that it was started somewhere around the Economic Section of the embassy, I was concerned. I wasn't able to get in there during the fire, but immediately after, I ran for the hotplate, and the hotplate was still there but not plugged in. So the hotplate was not the cause. Someone who lived in the embassy or who worked in the embassy building had noticed a sort of a spark on the television set, some indication that there had been a loose connection. My office had a false ceiling and a thick carpet, and it all went very fast, and it was very, very hot - the fire. Our family went down to the embassy and watched it burn. The Soviet firemen fighting the fire showed a tremendous amount of courage, going up there to keep the roof from burning off. We knew if the roof burned off that would be a disaster for us. But it did burn despite their efforts, and I must say that those were certainly professional firemen doing their best to put out the fire, but they didn't succeed. I went back in as fast as I could the next day, early in the morning, and in my office there were seated about seven persons in the uniform of firemen. My thought was that not all of these men were firemen. There were other people there.

Q: All of a sudden a bunch of people in brand-new fire uniforms showed up.

SKOUG: Yes. They were all watching me as I went over to my desk, blackened by the heat of the blaze. I had a lot of things in that desk. And I pulled slightly open a drawer with these gentlemen watching me, and I could see there wasn't much in that part of the drawer. The wooden desk was totally burned on the outside, but inside - wood is not a good conductor of heat - it was not. I pulled open the drawer a little further, and there sat my diary among other things and all sorts of pieces of information that these guys would love to have had - reports, nothing classified of course, but still a lot of things they would like to have got their hands on. I had brought a little gunny sack with me, and I loaded these things in the gunny sack while these guys watched. I knew that they had gone through the other parts of the desk, but they hadn't realized that there was this "inner compartment." You could pull the desk out and there was another set of drawers. So I rescued what I could from the office. In the meantime, the files were just the opposite. The file cabinets, being metal, looked normal, but inside everything was cooked to ashes. It was just totally destroyed inside. The stench of charred paper was sickening, and it did not soon go away.

Well, because the roof was off, we were in terrible shape. There wasn't a crane in Moscow available to us that could be used to work on this, and we were facing, of course, the Russian winter. This was only August, but still, it takes a long time even under the best of circumstances, and snow starts falling in late September. Well, Ambassador Toon went with me to open the American part of an international exhibit at Sokolniki Park, the fair grounds, and there the ambassador spotted a 34-meter-high Harnischfeger crane which was on display. He said this would be wonderful to put the roof back on the embassy. Harnischfeger had no problem with this. Well, the Soviets sort of agreed that this could be done, but in practice, they wouldn't let the crane out of Sokolniki, which has gates around it, barred. The enterprising deputy chief of the commercial office, Steve Sind, was out at Sokolniki, and he noted an open gate. The gates were open for something. He drove out on the Harnischfeger crane, dashed with the huge crane through the streets of Moscow - it's a long way from Sokolniki to the embassy - and he got the crane there, and the crane was used, and we got a roof over us. The Russians were mightily upset by this, contending that it had damaged the streets.

All of us transferred our activities, including the ambassador and Jack Matlock, the DCM, to the commercial office, which was a discrete building not far from the embassy. The ambassador had not been there more than a day or two when we learned that Department of Commerce officials were threatening to complain to Congress about the alleged misuse of the commercial facility in Moscow. They were asserting that the purpose of the U.S. Commercial Office is to promote trade and business, not to be used for extraneous matters. So they're telling the ambassador of the United States, whose building has just been burned, that he shouldn't be doing business in the Commercial Office. Well, Toon and Matlock got out, and they went back into the embassy, but I relocated myself in the Commercial Office for two or three months. Since my office on the eighth floor of the embassy was totally gutted, I worked out a deal with the chief of the Political Section on the seventh floor. His office, though badly burned, still could be used, and it was being used because a hole was drilled in the wall and people repairing the embassy came through there. He offered a little alcove to us, so I put three of my economic officers and a secretary in that alcove, and I worked with them, but I also worked out of the Commercial Office - except, of course, you couldn't send anything classified out of there. Finally, I went back over to the unheated embassy itself, and we sat every day in the winter with our coats on, with our shapkas (that's the Russian for "fur hat"), and gloves, sitting and carrying on business as usual through the whole winter. But we wouldn't have been able to do that without the roof.

Q: Well, you left there in, what, the summer of 1979?

SKOUG: Yes.

Q: Where to?

SKOUG: Well, hah, that was a good question. I had been expecting, had been bidding - I think the new system was just being set up - I had expected to go as DCM in one of three points, and my fallback was consul general in Vancouver, Frankfurt, Düsseldorf, or Barcelona - places where I spoke the language. At the time I went to the Soviet Union in 1976, I had been offered either the Soviet Union or consul general in Munich. Bob Sayre, who was advising me at that time, strengthened my own view that I should go as a counselor to Moscow rather than be the big fish in a smaller pond.

Q: Oh, sure. Moscow was the big enchilada.

SKOUG: It was the big enchilada. I was number four on the diplomatic list. It was better than being number one in Munich. So I felt that going as a consul general from Moscow would not be as interesting as being DCM. It turned out that there were no DCM-ships available for me. And I had had a lot of good ratings. For example, the CIA, which was the primary end-user of our economic stuff, said that they couldn't in their memory recall any comparable record over the three years that I was there. I later found out that that sort of information couldn't be in my personnel file or be made available to promotion panels. And there were other comments like that that apparently didn't get in. The long and the short of it was I did not get any of the DCMships which were supposedly available, nor did I get any consul general position. So although I was going to be promoted the next year, I wasn't getting an appropriate assignment. They finally came up with a diplomat in residence at Lehigh University, which I really did not feel was appropriate. Here I was, how many years into my career, 22 and a half years in the career, and suddenly I didn't find any interesting positions being offered to me. Well, I finally accepted the diplomat in residence, but the next day they came up with economic-commercial counselor in Caracas. Technically, the job in Caracas was rated one level above the one in Moscow, believe it or not, but it wasn't-

Q: But it wasn't of the same caliber.

SKOUG: It wasn't, and furthermore, where the job in Moscow was essentially economic and secondarily commercial, it now suddenly mattered that the job in Caracas was going to be overwhelmingly commercial and only secondarily economic because the Department of Commerce was taking all those slots away from us. So I took the job as economic-commercial counselor in Caracas, returning then to Latin America after 16 years away.

MALCOLM TOON
Ambassador
USSR (1976-1979)

Ambassador Malcolm Toon was born in New York in 1916. He received a bachelor's degree from Tufts College and a master's degree from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy. He served in the U.S. Navy from 1942-1946. His career in the Foreign Service included ambassadorships to Israel, Yugoslavia, and the Soviet Union. Ambassador Toon was interviewed by Dr. Henry E Mattox on June 9, 1989.

Q: You were picked by President Ford to go to the Soviet Union. Moscow would not accept you at first, is that correct?

TOON: Yes, but let me tell you a little about what I call the saga of my appointment to Moscow. I was first appointed ambassador to Moscow by Nixon in 1973 when I was serving as ambassador in Belgrade. I received a telegram over the weekend in what we call the agrément channel, which pertains to ambassadorial appointments, from the Under Secretary of Management, who said that President Nixon had decided to send me to Moscow as ambassador, that they were updating my FBI check, but that the Department wanted to know now if this gave me any personal problems before going further down the road.

Well, it did give me a really serious personal problem. That was my wife's attitude. We had spent, I would say, at that point, about five years in the Soviet Union under very difficult conditions. I was there first as a third secretary when Stalin was running the show. We had no maid. The tap had been turned off by Stalin. Since my wife spoke no Russian then, I had to do the shopping. It was a very unpleasant time. It was a little bit better when I was counselor of embassy in the '60s, but not much. One still felt one was surrounded by the enemy. So that I knew that I would have a problem with my wife.

Well, when I received this telegram, I gave my wife a ring at home -- it was a Saturday. I said, "Look, I am coming home for lunch, since we have a very serious problem to discuss. Why don't you crank up a few martinis, and we will get to it." So I went home for lunch.

She said, after a martini or two, "What is the problem you want to discuss with me?"

I said, "Well, President Nixon wants us to go to Moscow as ambassador."

And she said, "Over my dead body."

I said, "Well, I am not willing to pay that price." I finally convinced her that it was very difficult for an ambassador to say no to the White House. If the President wants you to go somewhere, you go. I said, "After all, you and I have been partners in this difficult diplomatic business for years now. I don't think you should say no."

Well, she said, "All right, but only for two years."

I sent a message back to Washington that weekend saying, "Flattered, honored, and so forth. Let me know as soon as possible when I can tell Tito," I had a very good relationship with Tito and I felt he should know as soon as possible that I would be leaving. I said, "He is going to be pretty mad if he learns first from the press that I am going to Moscow as ambassador, so make sure that I can tell him before this is publicized."

And I got word back on Monday saying that they understood my relationship with Tito, and they would get word to me as soon as possible. That afternoon, I got another cable from Washington saying, "There has been an apparent change of signals at the White House. It is doubly important that you tell no one about this appointment. We will clarify the situation and get word to you, as soon as possible.”

I called in my secretary, and I dictated what undoubtedly would be regarded as a very irascible message to Washington saying that, in effect, “If, as I suspect, the Soviets have tried to muck-up this appointment, I want my day in court before the final decision is taken.” And I said to my secretary, “Send it off. I don’t want to see it in draft. Just send it, I don’t want to change it.” And the message went as dictated.

Then I got a telegram back the next morning, which was Tuesday, saying in effect: “You are wrong. The Soviets have nothing to do with this. Understand your concern, will clarify the situation as soon as possible and let you know.” I received no further word from Washington about that appointment. And we went without an ambassador for a whole year in Moscow. Spike Dubs was chargé for the most part. And then Walt Stoessel, who was then Assistant Secretary of State, was appointed in December as ambassador in Moscow.

Now I tried to find out from Bill Rogers, who was the Secretary of State, and Walt Stoessel, who was his Assistant Secretary to European Affairs, what had happened to my appointment. They couldn’t find out. They just kept putting my name before the White House, and the answer was dead silence from the Oval Office. I finally discovered from correspondents, whom I knew well and who were covering the Washington scene, what had happened.

Henry Kissinger was then National Security Advisor in the White House. When Nixon had decided to send me to Moscow as ambassador, he had a drink with the Soviet ambassador, Dobrynin. Kissinger said, you know, “The President has decided to send Mac Toon to Moscow as ambassador.”

Q: So to continue. Kissinger had a drink with Dobrynin.

TOON: And Kissinger said to Dobrynin, “The President has decided to send Mac Toon to Moscow as ambassador.”

Dobrynin said, “That’s the end of detente,” which was nonsense. Now matter how powerful an ambassador you are, you don’t carry out your own policy. The policy at that time happened to be detente. Therefore, obviously, I would carry it out.

But Kissinger sent a back channel message to Moscow, “Don’t ask for agrément for Ambassador Toon until you hear further from me.” And that was the end of it. When Kissinger became Secretary of State, he revived the whole idea of sending me to Moscow.

Q: He must have had a bad conscience.

TOON: No, I think he probably recognized that it was time to send somebody there who, in the first place, could report back accurately what the Soviet positions were and, secondly, who could be tough and outspoken with the Soviets, if necessary.

In any case, you are right. What happened was that the Soviets sat on my appointment, my agreement, for almost three months. That's unprecedented, as you know. In fact, it is almost unprecedented for any host government to turn down an ambassadorial appointee unless he happens to be a convicted felon or something like that. But they didn't turn me down; they just did not act on it. The assumption was that if they just sat on their hands and quietly passed the word that Toon was not really the ideal man for the Moscow job from their point of view, that President Ford would change his mind. And Kissinger would change his mind. But to their credit, the President and the Secretary of State stood firm. They said, "Under no conditions will we change the appointment."

Then it was assumed that what the Soviets were doing was waiting until the election. As you know, Carter beat Ford. So it seemed likely that the Soviets would just wait it out, and Carter would appoint somebody else.

What happened was -- again I behaved in my usual cantankerous and irascible way -- I called in my secretary in November to send a personal message to Kissinger. "What the Soviets are doing is absolutely unacceptable conduct. Don't misunderstand this message. It has nothing to do with me personally. I've had a good career. I've headed three embassies, important missions, and I have no complaint. But what is at stake is the good name of the United States. You simply cannot tolerate Soviet refusal to accept an appointment by the President of the United States. My advice to you is to call in Ambassador Dobrynin -- he was then, I think, in his twenty-third year as ambassador -- and tell him that unless we, the United States, receive positive word on Toon's appointment within forty-eight hours, you, Mr. Ambassador, will pack your bags and go home and we will get along without ambassadors."

Well, within forty-eight hours, I received a telephone call from Washington at 4:00 in the morning -- Washington never has had a clear understanding of time differentials -- saying that the Soviets had accepted me. The President and Kissinger wanted me back in Washington in time to arrive in Moscow before the end of the year.

Q: This was late '76?

TOON: Late '76. And so when I got back to Washington, I was met at the airport by a junior officer who said, "The Secretary wants to see you right away."

I said, "Sure." I went in to Mr. Kissinger's office, and I said, "What happened?"

"What happened? We followed your advice."

This is a very interesting development, because it meant that the Soviet Union attached great importance to having Dobrynin stay on in Washington. After all, he was a very effective guy. As I have said publicly, he snookered so many Presidents and Secretaries of State down through the years, that the Soviets felt they could not, you know, pay the price of having him leave. They were willing to accept me in exchange for keeping Dobrynin down in Washington.

Q: I dare say Dobrynin sent a very persuasive cable back.

TOON: Probably.

Q: You were appointed in January. The Senate confirmed you, oddly, in June, because the Congress was out of session for a while. When did you actually go to Moscow?

TOON: Well, that's not quite accurate. I went to Moscow in December of '76. I presented my credentials to Podgorniy, who was then head of state, in January, and I was then the ambassador.

Now when Carter came in -- well, before Carter came in, when he was trying to arrange his administration, he was advised -- I found this out later -- by people I thought were good friends of mine but who turned out not to be -- to like Governor Harriman -- dump me as the ambassador and replace me with a businessman in order to convey a positive gesture to the Brezhnev leadership. I heard about this through the grapevine -- again mostly from correspondents.

Then shortly after Carter was inaugurated and entered on duty as President, the brains from Plains around Carter -- as I have described the President's staff -- discovered that there were fifty-six interim appointments about to be confirmed by the Senate. As you know, interim appointees had to be confirmed within five days of the reconvened Senate, or the appointments lapse. So the people around Carter decided that they better pull these names back. And they did.

Of these interim appointees, there were four ambassadors; all the rest of them were purely political appointees for domestic jobs. But there were four ambassadors. One was a purely political appointee; I think he was ambassador to Jamaica. Another was the ambassador to Botswana -- another was the ambassador to Malta -- neither was an important post. And the other one was myself.

Overnight, there were headlines all around the world, "Carter cancels Toon's appointment." I began receiving phone calls from my Ambassadorial colleagues in Moscow saying, "Gee, sorry, old man, that you have to go. We are just establishing a good relationship."

I said, "What a minute. I'm not going anywhere. As far as I'm concerned, this is a pure technicality, but we will have to wait and see." But it took Carter, I would say, at least two months to decide to keep me on.

Meanwhile, I was in limbo in Moscow. I had not met the President -- I hadn't really ever heard of him before he became President. I knew some of the members of the Cabinet, Harold Brown and Vance in particular, but I had not met them as members of his Cabinet. I had not been privy to the formulation, for example, of our arms-control package, which later turned out to be a complete fiasco. I felt out of things and somewhat in limbo. I kept saying to Vance in my cables: "Look, I would like to come back and talk to you and give you the Moscow ambassador's point of view on what the nuances of our policy should be toward Brezhnev and his regime."

"No, it would be very awkward at this time until the President decides what to do," Vance replied.

Well, Carter finally decided to keep me on, but later I found out -- primarily from Jody Powell -- that the only reason he decided to keep me on was that he was told through Jody Powell by the American press that if he dumped me, he would be accused of being soft on the Soviets.

Q: How long before you came back to meet him?

TOON: I think it was in early June of '77. Meanwhile, Vance had come to Moscow. And I had about forty minutes with the President -- a private conversation in the Oval Office. I found him to be a very warm, decent human being, but a man with some rather strange ideas about the Soviet Union. I came out of that conversation and went right to Brzezinski's office -- I had known Brzezinski for years -- and I said, "You've got a big problem on your hands. You've got to teach this man the facts of political life. He thinks that there is a warm bond of friendship between Brezhnev and himself. And he thinks that he and Brezhnev are pursuing basically the same political objectives: peace and stability throughout the world." I said, "That's not true." So I said, "You've got a big job ahead of you." Frankly, I had to deal with this problem in my relationship with President Carter, and to a lesser extent, with Cy Vance throughout my entire stewardship.

Q: Well, the two were known for opposing views -- Brzezinski and Vance -- on the Soviet Union and on U.S.-Soviet relationships. Therefore, you would, I gather, come down on the side of Brzezinski on these conflicts.

TOON: Philosophically, I think Brzezinski and I were much closer soulmates than Cy Vance and I were. I am very fond of Cy Vance. He is a great human being. But, again, really a Pole has a much better understanding of the Soviet Union than a Brahmin from Yale -- and that is Brzezinski's background. But Cy and I simply didn't see eye to eye on a lot of things. And Carter and I didn't agree on a number of issues. Finally, I decided that I was not really getting through to Washington the way I thought I should. Furthermore, I had had almost three years of ambassador to Moscow. My wife and I had spent almost eight years in that benighted capital. I decided that it was time to move on to retirement.

Q: I can't let this go. You spoke of arms-control fiasco. Is that SALT II?

TOON: No, I thought the SALT II agreement was a good agreement. I had in mind the first arms-control package that Vance brought to Moscow in March 1977. As I told you before, Vance had told me by cable and by telephone that it would be awkward for me to come back to Washington, but he did want to get my slant before coming in to Moscow. Would I meet him in Brussels where he was going to brief the North Atlantic Council before meeting with the Soviet leadership?

So I went out to Brussels, and Vance and I sat together on the plane on the way to Moscow. He said, "Well, what do you think of the arms-control package that I am bringing to Moscow?"

I said, "I would be in a better position to answer that question if I knew what was in the package."

He was shocked. He said, "Didn't Brzezinski send it to you?"

I said, "No, I don't have a clue." Well, then he described it in great detail. And I said, "Now, Mr. Secretary" -- even an Ambassador doesn't call the Secretary of State by his first name -- I said, "This is not going to fly. The Soviets are going to reject this out of hand. Frankly, I think what you are doing is what your predecessor once said was a very dangerous thing to do to the Soviets, you'll spook them."

Vance was shocked to hear this. He presented it to the Soviets in Moscow, and they did exactly what I told Vance they would do. So then my credibility, I think, went up somewhat in Washington after that happened.

Q: It certainly would help. I am not going to take much more of your time. I would like to get, though, for the record, your impressions of Brezhnev.

TOON: Well, you have to understand that throughout my stewardship as ambassador, Brezhnev was not in good shape. He was seriously ailing to the point where, at the end, his colleagues had to sort of prop him up in order to permit him to make a speech. I saw him eight times, which is more than any other American ambassador in Moscow had seen the top man in the Soviet leadership for years. But I can't say that I ever had a good give and take with the guy, and I speak fluent Russian, of course. He always read from a position paper. Half the time, he didn't make any sense. Half the time, the interpreter, who was usually Sukhodrov, would interpret something which didn't come out of Brezhnev's lips at all. That was one of the advantages of knowing the language. There were times when he seemed to be in reasonably good shape, but I would say that, basically, he was not a very healthy man while I was ambassador.

Gromyko, of course, I dealt with regularly. Gromyko I could see within an hour's notice. He knew that I was not going to waste his time. He knew that I would be speaking under instructions. I have great respect for Gromyko as a professional diplomat. I disagree with everything he has said and done down through the years, but he was a real professional. He would tell you, in no uncertain terms, that "I was there. I attended that conference. And I know what went on." Usually we didn't even have an adequate record of what went on. So he had a leg up on certainly every ambassador in Moscow, and a leg up on, I think, every Secretary of State or every foreign minister in the Western world because of his vast experience and his involvement in principal policy issues for over forty years.

But with Brezhnev, it was, you know, a good formal relationship in the sense that I could see him frequently, but I never felt confident that he was really on top of things.

Q: By the time you got there in '76, detente of previous years had pretty well collapsed anyway, had it not? Perhaps in the final days of the Vietnam War.

TOON: Well, certainly, we did not have the sort of chummy relationship that had existed between the Nixon-Kissinger team on our side and the Brezhnev-Kosygin-Podgorniy group on the other side. But if you mean by detente a continuing dialogue with the Soviets, a continuing attempt on the part of both sides to bring about increased stability in our relationship, I think detente continued. And after all, we did, during my years in Moscow, negotiate the SALT II treaty, which, of course, was never ratified, primarily because of Soviet misbehavior. I would think that down through the Ford and Carter years we had a relationship which I think is absolutely essential in Moscow. That is, a relationship which would provide for a continuing dialogue with the Soviet Union primarily to make sure that they don't make a mistake in judgment and get our two countries in a position of military confrontation, which in my view would inevitably result in a nuclear exchange and the end of civilization.

Now we did have that sort of relationship under Ford and Carter when I served as ambassador, but not the sort of chummy relationship that existed under Nixon-Kissinger, which I think, frankly, was misguided. The problem with the relationship when Nixon and Kissinger were in office was that detente was oversold to the American public. I think Henry Kissinger today would admit this. The idea got across to our fellow Americans that, we were dealing with a basically changed Soviet Union. That was not the case at all. So what happened was, I think, a much more sensible and sensitive assessment of the Soviet threat in the Ford-Carter years than we had under toward the end of the Nixon-Kissinger regime.

Q: I am not, even by implication, trying to be critical of your stewardship. I am raising it because detente really, as I think of it anyway, is an aura, an atmosphere, a feeling. It was chummy, as you said, at one time. It became less chummy. Now it is chummy in spades again. What is your opinion, now in 1989, of the Soviets?

TOON: Well, I would agree it became chummy in spades again under Mr. Reagan. I think Mr. Reagan never really understood what was going on. Gorbachev was on top of Reagan at all the summit conferences, and I think, frankly, most of us who know something about the Soviet problem were very uneasy with Mr. Reagan at the helm in dealing one-on-one with Gorbachev.

Now I don't feel that way with George Bush. I've known George Bush for many years. I know that this is a guy that does his homework well. He doesn't have laid-back weekends at Camp David the way Mr. Reagan did. He doesn't spend his evenings watching class-B movies. He is a very serious guy. Therefore, I feel reasonably confident -- don't misunderstand me -- I don't agree with many one-on-one meetings with the Soviet leadership, but I am not uneasy about Mr. Bush meeting with Gorbachev. I think we probably have a safer relationship now. I would hope we would not revert to the sort of chummy relationship that we had under Mr. Reagan.

Q: In October 1978, you made a speech in Atlanta in which you called the Soviets paranoid about China, and you brought up the radiation question, bombarding the American Embassy with radiation. You had words to the effect that the Soviet Union is a highly racial society.

TOON: Racist.

Q: Racist. You brought up the problems of the African students. You were criticized for this. This is something for which we were criticized in the Soviet press, I guess. Acknowledging that it may all be correct or true, is it terribly wise, diplomatically, to make such a frank speech when you are still ambassador in a given country?

TOON: Probably not. And perhaps with the benefit of hindsight, I would have said different things, or least said them differently than I did. But I think it is important to make clear that most of these points that I made and you cited, I made in response to questions, not in my formal remarks.

Now with regard to the racist question, I was asked by one of the correspondents if I agreed with President Carter's assessment, which he made in a speech, I think, in the state of Washington just a week before, about the racist attitude of the Soviet regime. Well, I found myself in the position of either rebutting the President or speaking the truth. I knew there would be problems back in Moscow. I think the same thing is true of some of the other things I said. But they were in response to questions primarily. I have always felt that it is an ambassador's responsibility, particularly the American ambassador in Moscow, to be perfectly straight with his own countrymen as to what is going on inside the Soviet Union and not to cover-up in an effort to promote detente, if you want to call it that, or, in any case, a chummy relationship between ourselves and the Soviets.

Now, perhaps it would have been wiser if I had been less abrasive in my remarks. But if you look carefully at the speech that I made in Atlanta, you will find that it is a very strong endorsement of a continuing close relationship with the Moscow leadership. When I got back to Moscow -- I had been blasted by Pravda the day before I arrived -- I held a press conference in which I said that I'm just sorry that the Soviet leadership and the Soviet media did not choose to read the entire text of my remarks, because I think inevitably they would have concluded that I was trying to endorse what I think is the sort of thing that they want to see happen. That is, a good, close relationship with Washington.

Q: You recall, I'm sure, that the same thing happened with George Kennan at one stage.

TOON: I was there when that happened. I was a third secretary in the embassy under George Kennan. Let me if I may, give you the nature of the relationship between myself and George Kennan. I, together with another junior officer, wrote a paper called, "After Containment, What?" Now, we wrote this paper before we knew that Kennan was to be our ambassador. I may have been brash, but I wasn't stupid. I certainly would never have written this paper if I had known he was going to be our ambassador. The paper was submitted to the serious essay contest in the Foreign Service Journal.

Kennan was then named the ambassador. This other young officer and I were just quaking in our boots as to what would happen to us. "Friends" of ours in Washington gave the paper to Kennan to read during his briefings. Kennan's reaction was, in effect: Get the scorpions off the premises. He started the wheels turning for our transfers. I was transferred before my term was up. I was transferred after eighteen months. But I stayed there a lot longer than George Kennan, because he was booted out, as you know.

But the interesting thing is that the only time that I was in the foreign office was when I went down with the Chargé d'Affaires, who I think was Jack McSweeney at the time, to receive the note from Vishinsky, who was then foreign minister -- he was a terrible character who presided over the purge trials in the late 1930s -- declaring George Kennan persona non grata. That was the only time I was in the foreign office in my first tour of duty in Moscow.

Now since then, Kennan and I have developed a very good, close relationship. We don't agree on a number of issues, but we see each other frequently. As he told me in Berlin after he had retired -- you will recall that he was ticked off, he was finished, and he went to Princeton. He came to Berlin, when I was stationed there, to deliver the Ernst Reuter memorial lectures, which he did beautifully in fluent German. I was sort of his escort officer. He asked to see me privately. He said, "You know, Mac, some of us who think we are adults, behave like children. I want to apologize to you for my behavior toward you in Moscow."

Instead of having the grace to say, "Gosh, that's great, Mr. Kennan," I said, "Well, I'm just sorry you didn't feel that way in Moscow, because my career is just about ruined." There is no question that I had a very difficult time recovering from my transfer from Moscow and from the efficiency reports that were written on me at Kennan's instigation. I finally was reasonably successful. But since then, we have developed a good personal relationship, and all the sordid past is forgotten.

Q: That's a fascinating sidelight. Even way back then, I think Kennan was declaring that large elements of what we had known as containment was not really what he meant, and he disagreed with certain NSC 68 conclusions and that sort of thing.

TOON: Well, he felt -- I have never been entirely sure that he was right about this -- that his views were misinterpreted by people back in Washington who wanted to translate them into the need for building up a strong military posture and developing a military alliance such as NATO. He claims that he never had that in mind at all. If you go back and read the Mr. X article or the long telegram from Moscow, it seems to be more or less inevitable that you could come to that interpretation of what he said.

Q: I have read them many times, and I was puzzled about that myself.

You left. Thomas Watson, Jr. succeeded you in Moscow. You criticized the appointment of a nonprofessional. You criticized, at that time, the Washington practice of using Dobrynin as a major channel of communication with Moscow. This is similar to what happens, I understand, all the time in our relations with London. The British Embassy in Washington is used as a channel for communications.

TOON: But there, there is a good reason for it. Usually we don't have a very competent man serving as ambassador to London.

But let me just say a word about, as you correctly pointed out, my criticism of the Watson appointment. I made clear that this was not directed at Watson personally. I knew the guy well. He was head of the Arms Control Advisory Committee when I was ambassador in Moscow. I would see him every time I came back to Washington. I had known him in other capacities. He is a very decent human being and a terribly nice guy. But not a guy with any obvious qualifications for the Moscow job. I felt strongly that this job, which had been in career hands for something like twenty years, ought to remain in career hands, because it was terribly important, I felt, from Washington's point of view to know or to have an expert's assessment as to what was going on inside the Soviet Union, what the views of the Soviet leadership were. You cannot do this without knowing the language. You have to be able to read what the Soviets are telling their own people and so forth. It was for that reason that I felt it was a misguided appointment.

Now Watson, in fairness to him, never really had a chance to demonstrate that a businessman could run a good mission in Moscow, because shortly after he got there, the Soviets invaded Afghanistan, and our relationship went down the drain. But I still feel strongly that our interests are far better served, frankly and speaking completely subjectively, if we had a career man serving in every mission overseas. Now that is totally unrealistic, I recognize, given the nature of our political process. But at least in those sensitive posts where it is terribly important for us to try to know exactly what is going on, we ought to have a real professional. I think, frankly, we made a mistake by sending Watson to Moscow.

Now as far as my criticism of Washington's dealing with Dobrynin is concerned, I have always felt that if you are speaking to a government which doesn't have a really good understanding as to your political process, which is true of Moscow -- less true now under Gorbachev, but certainly true under Brezhnev -- who don't really understand how Washington operates, then you are far better off if you speak through your ambassador to make sure that your point of view gets across without any embellishment or distortion. You are in a position, as the American ambassador, to explain what your policies and your positions are. Now, as for speaking through Dobrynin, I can't prove that he distorted what he heard or was told, because we don't have access to that sort of information in Moscow. But I do know, on the basis of my many conversations with Gromyko, that he didn't understand some of the finer points involved in the SALT II negotiations, primarily because Dobrynin himself didn't understand.

Now Dobrynin, as you know, never had any note-taker with him. He always liked to be one-on-one with the American Secretary of State and with whomever else he was dealing. Now, that is a big mistake on our part.

ROBERT WILLIAM FARRAND

Chief, US Commercial Office

Moscow (1976-1978)

Soviet Desk Officer

Washington, DC (1978-1980)

Mr. Farrand was born in Watertown, New York in 1934 and graduated from Mount Saint Mary's College. He entered the Foreign Service in 1964. He served in numerous posts including Kuala Lumpur, Moscow and Prague and was named ambassador to Papua, New Guinea in 1990. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

Q: In '75 whither, you left there at an early time, how did that come?

FARRAND: In '75, I left there at an early time because Henry Kissinger and President Nixon's administration had struck an arrangement with the Soviet Union or at least they thought they had struck up an arrangement with the Soviet Union, it was detente. About 1973, either late '73 or early '74 they opened in Moscow a commercial office to really expand trade between the United States and the Soviet Union. This was part of a multipronged effort to probe the system and maybe with a series of agreements, to have linkages across a spectrum of things. The university exchanges, etc., that would in time of tension hold, you know, that would be an inhibitor to an all out strike or an all out war, whatever the thinking was. Part of that, the serious part of it was a commercial effort and so where they had never done this before; they opened a commercial office in downtown Prague. Did I say Prague? I meant Moscow. They opened a commercial office and it wasn't downtown. It was about a city block away from the U.S. embassy. They found the building that had a large area, it was a high rise apartment building, but on the ground floor there was a large area all opened by windows that would have been used as a trading house of some sort. Not a trading house, but one of those import type things. So, the Commerce Department, the U.S. Commerce Department took that over and renovated it top to bottom. They brought in a design expert and made this into kind of a western style and put cubicles in for businessmen to come in, various things of the day, a typewriter, a telex machine and then had a staff of an American officer in charge of it at the O-4 level, today O-2 level in those days, actually O-1 level. They were looking for somebody to go do that. I had had two and one-half years, almost three years experience in Prague doing it. There was no question; I wanted to go back. I applied for it and got the job. So, they yanked me out and I have to learn that I have to get my Russian back on stream again if I'm to do this. So, they sent me to two and one-half months of language training at Rosslyn. They sent me to a couple months of language brush up along with Ken Skoug, Don Kirsch, a couple of others that were going out. So, I had a staff of about three or four officers. I had a Congress department guy and two or three State Department officers who worked with me and we, for me it was a brand new thing. I had never really done anything quite like it because this was high intensity. I mean you had Commerce Department pushing trade missions on you, you had, they had trade exhibits, we had a big enough area right there that we could put on what we called mini-trade shows. We invited a dozen firms and they could all have a little desk about this size here. They could sit here and they could put their displays out. Anyway, it was high intensity for two years. I got the job. I followed Thomas Myles. He opened it.

Q: Yes, I knew Tom. You were there from '75 to when?

FARRAND: '75 to '77. No, wait a minute, yes, yes. Well, I got there in the summer of '75 and I left in the summer of '77. That's right.

Q: In the first place, who was our ambassador in '75?

FARRAND: Walter Stoessel.

FARRAND: Malcolm Toon.

Q: How did these men treat the trade side of the embassy?

FARRAND: All political officers in the Department of State knew high policy questions and high policy issues and the most crucial aspect of foreign affairs. Political officers by nature, look askance it would seem to me those aspects of foreign affairs, yet don't meet the standard of what I just said. This is part of their work and it's part of their, it's the way it is. For example, a science and technology officer, I don't think a political officer would ever apply for a job as science and technology officer in an embassy anywhere. Even though, I mean, you know, you should have people who know something. You should have physicists or chemists or biologists or someone that would take those jobs and that's hard to find in the Foreign Service. So, you'd have to go outside, so maybe science and technology is not the best place, but when it comes to commerce, commercial, this is considered working with businessmen who are not known to be really up to speed on great grand issues of politics. They are more short-term maximizers of profit, etc. They don't fit. So, therefore, now I am making general comments here. I haven't answered your question. I would say that Stoessel and Toon were broadly supportive of the process of detente. I would say that they would see the role of U.S. industry and business in helping to do this was very important and they would lend support to my work. They did. They did. They would have things that, Stoessel house was the ambassador's residence, they would hold events there. So, I have no complaints. The Deputy Chief of Mission, Jack Matlock, was someone who got it. I mean Jack Matlock got it. He was a political officer, he had all these other things. He understood. He would come down if I asked him and he would support. He would address the businessmen. He would give up his time to do that.

Q: How did you find, let's talk about trying to run a commercial place in Moscow in '75 to '77 years. How did it work? How did you see it?

FARRAND: Right. Oh, by the way I think I went to '78 because, I think I did because I got there at a half-year point. I have to figure this out. Well, anyway, how did I find it? The Soviets insisted on putting a guardhouse on the front stoop of this, for Moscow, very modern establishment, colorful, lights, glitter. The gray Russian would be walking by outside, trudging home in the middle of the dark hours of winter and he'd look in and see these windows ablaze with lights and it was quite a thing. But, they put an interior department guy down at the front door. They watched everybody who came in and everybody who came out and then they hoisted Russian employees on us who would report to them.

Q: How did it work, what were we trying to sell and what was your experience?

FARRAND: From the Russian point of view, here again was almost the same as in the Czech Republic, Czechoslovakia, not the Czech Republic, Czechoslovakia. From the Russian point of view what they were interested in was we would call them technical trade seminars. They were interested in aspects of industry that, of course, they always were interested in having a trade show, having us pull together and then put out on a trade show that would go to one of their sectors of industry that they were anxious to find out as much as what was happening in the west as possible. So, they would have a tendency to want electronics, to want computer related, computers were just in their infancy back then. They would be interested in all kinds of technology having to do with energy, with heating aspects, heating units, heating industry, how you do all of that, how you. They didn't have air conditioning, but the heating aspect. No air conditioning in the Soviet Union in those days. So, all of these things they would be interested in. Now, really for our part we would be interested in farm equipment because we knew that they had this massive, massive amount of land under agricultural. We'd be interested in showing them ways of harvesting their timber, processing wood. We'd be interested in bringing food processing equipment, equipment that would help make restaurants and eating establishments much better. We'd do all of that. That's what we'd be interested in. But, they were interested in the other. Now, if we put on one of these shows of food processing they'd come, of course, but we would always have the firm bring a sales person or somebody on that side of the house and an engineer. So, the products would be explained to the Soviets in a series of seminars and the engineers would get up and explain the product and then they could make a sales pitch. The more technical it became the more Soviets showed up. What they were interested in doing was milking American firms. They would send engineers because they would perk up when the engineers from the American firm would start talking. The trouble with engineers is they don't get out of the back room very often and they love to talk when they get a chance. So, I always had to say to them, "Be a little careful here. That you're not giving away some things that you shouldn't give away, you know in your technical slides and all the other stuff." I don't know if that answers your question, but that's essentially the way it was. They would keep the actual purchases to a minimum and they were hoping to suck the knowledge out of the American.

Q: It sounds in a way like this calculation was to put it in the upper level to make a gesture towards what we were trying to do, in opening up things. But, in the long run this wasn't really helping us a bit.

FARRAND: Well, it's not true that things weren't sold. There were sales. They weren't of a major kind. I don't think any firm really had major firms. IBM came and opened an office there. Citibank came and opened an office there. Morgan Guaranty Trust came and opened an office downtown. I think Morgan Guaranty Trust. PepsiCo under Donald Kendall opened an office there because Pepsi Cola is the republican drink. Coca-Cola is the democratic drink. Coca-Cola was in Atlanta when Jimmy Carter was president and Coca-Cola was being pushed. I think in those days it was viewed that way. The PepsiCo came, oh, good lord, there must have been ten or twelve Armand Hammer, what was his firm called? Occidental Petroleum? They opened an office. I've already said IBM. Hewlett Packard opened a big office in Moscow and sent a permanent resident. All these firms sent permanent representatives. I dealt with all of these firms. They were my constituents. I was trying to help them with the Soviet ministries. I don't think under the Soviet Union. American Express was there and had been for years and had done a reasonably good business. Pan American was there, of course, the airplane, the airline. They had done business, they had done business, but it was never the huge business that they were looking for. McDonald's came later after I left. Now McDonald's is booming over there. One of the problems was the hard currency. You couldn't get the hard currency. You could take what it was in rubles, but you couldn't get it out in hard currency.

Q: Were there many American firms that came, tried for a while and left and said, "The hell with this"?

FARRAND: It took time. There were, but it took time and at any time a large organization or firm commits itself to a market, it doesn't leave right away even in the face of negative news. It stays, it sticks, but yes, yes, some just after a point left. However, the consensus was you know, International Harvester was there. I think International Harvester no longer exists, but I think it exists now and the name of the firm is called Navistar. I think it's out in the Midwest somewhere. International Harvester was it. What the Soviets did there, they took the technical representative. There was both a corporate type and a technical rep and the two of them represented with the office. They picked this technical rep up on the street and they sent him, they just took him and yanked him out of his car and whisked him off to Botierska Prison and he became a cause celebre for about three and a half to four weeks. He was a friend of mine and when he was imprisoned like that everybody became concerned. Headquarters of International Harvester way back in Chicago or wherever it was, sent out one of their top people, executive vice president or maybe even their chairman came out to plead the case for this guy. The Soviets charged him with espionage. It was all nonsense. Now, I will say this, that this particular fellow did get into a lot of Soviet industrial activities and told me about them later. He would go off into the Arctic; he would see what the Soviets were doing by drilling for oil up there in the middle of the dead of winter. One of the most remarkable stories he would tell would be how they would start up their heavy equipment in the morning, in the Arctic morning. How they would keep it alive. They would build bonfires under the engine block. Bonfires to get the heat up, under a machine, you build a bonfire. But, anyway, they put him in prison. Well, this became a great big thing. Carrator had an office there and I found out that a lot of businessman began to question whether businessman showed their lack of political acumen by saying, "Yes, maybe he did it. Yes, maybe he was doing it." American businessmen, his colleagues, would say, "You know I always wondered about him." I would say, "Gentlemen, ladies, please, please." What happened on the Garden State Parkway in New Jersey just a month earlier yet the eyes swooped down on two Soviets at the Soviet Mission to the United Nations that were trying to suborn a lieutenant commander in the United States Navy and he notified the FBI so they set up a sting operation and they were waiting for them and he went to meet them and bingo. They got him. This was only retaliation.

Q: In a way did you kind of wonder what you were doing, did you feel you were advancing any cause?

FARRAND: I think the presence of so many corporate executives from the United States on the streets of Moscow for the first time in I don't know how many years, I don't know how many decades, I don't know I guess you could go back to the interwar years. No, you'd have to go back earlier than that. So, the very first time that modern corporate America got to see the Soviet Union and got in some cases inside their factories and began to realize just how lopsided was the Soviet industrial capability that it was very good when it came to defense, it was very good when it came to missile technology and to space exploration. It was terrible in the medical field; it was terrible in anything having to do with energy and environment, anything of that nature. Just deplorable. So, I think that this was good and I think that it helped to influence because these people were very powerful particularly within the Republican Party and helped to influence the thinking within political circles back home, but it wasn't decisive. It wasn't decisive. What we were pushing is trade and it was very hard. It was uphill all the way. We got a lot of exposure out of it though and those of us who did it had a heck of a lot of fun.

Q: Was there talking among yourselves, I mean, everybody knew it, but somehow it just didn't seem to get translated into our calculations that the Soviet Union was essentially falling apart economically? But, was anybody around talking about you know this thing can't last much longer or not?

FARRAND: Yes. Marshall Goldman at wait a minute now, Marshall Goldman is not at Harvard, he's not MIT, is it Vasser, no. He's at a major school, one of the seven sisters up in Boston. What would that be?

Q: Well, Radcliff it used to be, which is now Harvard.

FARRAND: Okay, okay, it was that part of it. It was the Radcliff Harvard situation and he was up there. He formed a Soviet studies unit up there. Marshall was saying for a long time that this thing is not doing well. The CIA, and he accused the CIA. It was a lopsided debate. Marshall would make his claims and the CIA wouldn't respond. But, he would say that they were just reading it totally wrong. They were reading as maximum threat, you know, in those days, the CIA. They were touting the strength of the Soviet Union and he was saying it's not strong at all. That's as quick an answer as I can give you. I'll tell you this. Those of us who were there would openly deride the system amongst ourselves and we'd say where is this going, how can we be afraid of these people? Well, you have to be afraid of such a people who has a massive missile inventory and it's shown that they can put rockets into space and they've shown they can do it. I mean, you know, the fact that they can't produce Kleenex for the people and they can't produce toilet paper in enough quantities or they can't do anything of this nature, well. I mean, you know.

Q: Did you run across any Soviet engineers or people who came who were concerned or who had come and obviously take a shine to what we're doing and be interested in how they could improve things in the Soviet Union?

FARRAND: Yes, but the system worked against them. This would happen. This would happen and occasionally, if you could have a conversation with somebody on the side, they would let you know that this is very, very good. What you're showing here is very, very good, but we just, (a) we don't have the money for it and (b) we can't get approval. This is really marvelous what we're seeing here. I mean, he's not going to say that in front of anybody and he's going to be careful that he's not saying it in an enclosed room. So, you don't have that much. I didn't have, I served in the Soviet Union two times. I served earlier of what I've talked about and I served this time. I didn't have a friend, a Russian friend; I didn't have a Russian friend. Maybe a few people that I felt friendly around and we would trade jokes and things of this nature, maybe in the bureaucracy. But, as far as a friend is concerned, somebody I correspond with to this day, no. In Bosnia, where I just came back from three months, they gave me a Russian deputy who was an active diplomat at an ambassadorial rank and he is now currently an ambassador for Russian somewhere in the world. That man and I have a friendship and that has survived and we correspond by e-mail and one future day sometime we will get together somewhere. I know we will because he's a good fellow. That's the only one. You know, trying to get inside that puzzle, that enigma, that closed state was very difficult and to have them say what they thought about your products would be few and far between, but of course, they had nothing to compete.

Q: Was there a type of the Soviet side that would sell things to the United States?

FARRAND: Oh yes, sure, that was the big thing. The only way that they would do business with you is if you could work out some sort of a compensatory deal that would bring in the same amount of money, so it would be a wash. They called it barter. What did they have to barter? Well, they had some timber. They had lots of natural resources. I'm talking ores. It was difficult to work out these kinds of deals, very difficult. Some got into them, I think PepsiCo got into them. What were they taking? Oh, everybody wanted the vodka trade. Everybody wanted the caviar and the vodka trade so that was overburdened with these, they had a word for it and I can't remember it right now. They had a word for it where you bounce this off and I can't think of the word right now, of the phrase. Everybody wanted at the vodka and at the caviar. That could, you know, a couple of firms, one firm out of New York bottled all of that up and maybe PepsiCo did some of it, but big outfits like International Harvester or Caterpillar. What would these guys, these are heavy equipment manufacturers, what would they do if they had a shipload of vodka arrive at port? They don't know how to market vodka. They don't know how to market liquor so they would sell it off to somebody else and it would cut into their profits.

Q: Did you have any problems with the KGB while you were there?

FARRAND: Oh, well, this businessman that was picked up on the street, that was a KGB operation, all of it and that disrupted our operations heavily as I weighed in, helped the embassy up the street, the consular section, helped them build, you know, they're making their demarches and stuff like this. It affected the morale of all the other businessmen. They became very skittish. Jack Matlock had told me, he said, "You better tell all the businessmen to be the alert." I was waiting to get them all together. I often got them, all the businessmen together at a time of a breakfast meeting with coffee and stuff. I was waiting for such a thing to happen. I shouldn't have waited. I shouldn't, but I had to let twenty offices know and I had to do it individually. I couldn't do it over the phone. It was just, I wanted to get them all in a room and say, "Be on the lookout, one of you may be a target." Well, not only businessmen may be a target, but the exchange students could be a target and people that were there like visiting professors and others could be a target, so it wasn't only the businessmen, but it Matlock's caution turned out to be the right one. Regrettably, between the time he told me and the time it happened, I didn't, I either had to go around to twenty offices which took time in Moscow traffic and tell each one individually or I had to get them together and there was no occasion for that.

Q: The man was released or what?

FARRAND: He was released after about a month in prison, maybe three weeks in prison. Then he had to leave the country. He ended up marrying my secretary and I was best man at their wedding years and years later up in Pennsylvania. Months later, not years.

Q: Well, then in 1977 you left? Maybe '78?

FARRAND: Yes, I'm trying to think. I didn't get there. You know what, you know what? It was February of 1976, not February of 1975 that I went back to Washington to study Russian to get ready. I got there in the summer of '76 and I left in the summer of '78. I was there from '76 to '78. Yes.

Q: The Carter administration had come in by that time and I guess Ambassador Watson came out? Now, did he, in a way, Carter when he first came in was, he was really going to open up things with the Soviet Union.

FARRAND: That's right.

Q: My understanding is that Ambassador Watson was put out there to promote the new spirit of the times in early Carter. How did that affect you when he came out?

FARRAND: Watson didn't, I was there for about six months with Stoessel and eighteen months with Toon. Toon had his, Malcolm Toon had his two years to run out so Watson wasn't there, but what I did I was recruited to go back onto the Soviet desk and to work on the Soviet desk. This time on the political side and I did that. Watson then came out. I met Watson later, but Watson came out and I think it was an acknowledgment on the Carter administration side that this particular initiative the detente was not a bad idea. I mean, I look at that in retrospect. I haven't done much thinking on it over the years, but I think it was pretty good, not bad because by putting Watson out there they were imitating what the Nixon people had done. Watson was not a professional diplomat and Moscow had already been in the hands of professional diplomat. Stoessel, Kohler, Jake Read, Thompson, Boland, Toon, all had been professionals and he was not a professional and this of course, immediately Soviet hands in the Department of State now began to question whether this was a good idea or not. He brought energy to it. I don't think he was able to crack it. He wasn't able to crack it, but there was an effort to do it. There was an effort to up the stakes, but he wasn't able to crack it.

Q: You came back to Washington, then is that right?

FARRAND: Yes, to the Soviet desk.

Q: You were there from?

FARRAND: '78 to '80.

Q: What part of the action were you given?

FARRAND: I was given their four parts of the Soviet desk in those days. It was under an office director by the name of William Schinn, Bill Schinn. He had a deputy by the name of Sherad McCall and it was Sherad who recruited me to the job. There were four parts to the desk. There was the kind of the political side of it, which was divided into, multilateral and bilateral. Then there was the economic unit and there was an exchange unit. There was an officer, Ed Herwitz, responsible for exchange. Then Martin Gwenick was responsible for economic and then the political was divided into two. There was the multiside, which was Gary Matthews, and the bilateral side which was Farrand. Now, by bilateral what are we talking? Are we talking politics, are we talking administration of the Soviet account within the U.S. government? It was more of the latter. I dealt with situations, which ranged from everything that was going around here under the rock, under the stones of the city. FBI surveillance of Soviet diplomats here, CIA interests in dissidents or in defectors, defectors, I dealt with all defectors. I dealt with any ham handed tactics that the Soviets were using in town to try to recruit. I don't want to sound like I'm, I don't want to sound like a cold warrior, but it was all that sort of thing. Soviet parking tickets, I mean good God, they would go anywhere and they would park anywhere. They would build up these enormous amount of parking tickets. They'd park in places where they shouldn't park and then the D.C. police would get all upset. The D.C. police would come in and say you know, you can't do this because the neighborhoods are complaining. Well, what are we going to do? Then the Soviets wouldn't pay their parking tickets the D.C. police would there. They didn't have to pay. In Moscow, our diplomats, there were no parking meters and there were no parking police. So, our diplomats would and it's a huge city and there weren't a lot of cars, now there are. Now the place is choking with automobiles and trucks, but in those days it wasn't quite choking. From the American Embassy it was a dog's breakfast for parking out there, but we found places. The Soviets didn't have any places downtown so they just took advantage of everything it was a real running sore. Soviet women at their embassy would, the Soviets would never hire anybody, never hire an American. We hired Russians all the time at our embassy in Moscow and they would do things. They were Xerox operators and all sorts of things. You know, probably it was a mistake. I mean they were probably doing games on us all the time.

Q: It probably didn't make a hell of a lot of difference.

FARRAND: It didn't make a hell of a lot of difference at the end of the day. We were doing most all of our stuff upstairs and we were doing it behind closed doors and we had Americans up there for that. If we had tried to have our motor pool all run by Americans and every other aspect of it, the State Department could never have gotten that amount of money out of the Congress or the White House.

Q: Well, you wouldn't have gotten the job well done because if you have local people doing it, they can get things done within, they speak the language.

FARRAND: Yes, they speak the language. Our people would never have spoken the language and you were upped the number of recruitment attempts against our staff and you would have upped the number of drunken things on a weekend and altercations of every kind.

Q: When you hire basically lower class people, I mean, I hate to put it in those terms, but it's true, they're not as controllable.

FARRAND: Oh boy, oh boy, but in any way, the Soviets, what they would do. No one would be hired from the local economy back here. Everyone they would bring in. Now, what did they do? They pressed into duty all of their spouses, all of their spouses. So, even the ambassador's wife, maybe she was freed of it, but everyone else's wife would take turns coming in and manning the vacuum cleaners and cleaning the embassy. They brought over their own drivers, they brought over, they were a very closed, secretive type outfit. As events of recent months have shown, I mean look, they were worried that we were going to try to penetrate their embassy in any way we could and we were. So, they chose the other route. So, what would happen on a weekend or during the week, they would get a van together and they would take the van and go out to a place called, it's no longer running. K-Mart up in northern Virginia somewhere.

Q: It's a discount, big department, not really a department store, but a general store lower prices. Old Crusty outfit I think.

FARRAND: Bulk items. Is that Old Crusty? Is that what it became? That's an interesting thing. You see, I learned something. They would get a van together about once in a period of time, once in a while and they would take all of these staff wives, spouses, to a K-Mart and they would give them a little bit of money, a little bit of hard currency. They would go into these stores and go crazy because back in the Soviet Union there were hardly any consumer goods worth exporting surely. They would be stunned when they walked into these stores. What would happen, happened one night. The guard at the gate of the K-Mart asked this Russian woman who was about to walk out, she had a big overcoat on and it was a big overcoat... Well, he stopped her, opened up the overcoat and you know, she was laden with all kinds of things she was stealing, taking from the store. Well, she was taken into custody, then of course, telephone calls come and we got her released. She goes back and then the case is against her. We have to work on situations like that. All manner of ugliness that went on here between the FBI, between the DC police department all over the country when defectors would come in, when people would come in, Russian citizens would come into a police station in Chicago, Illinois and say, "I want asylum, I don't want to go back to the Ukraine. I don't want to go back. I have nothing." We would get involved and then we would have to work it out as best we could before it hit the press and once it hit the press, of course, it was katie by the door. Then it becomes this great big circus, you know.

So, the construction of the new embassy in Moscow... We had to work on that. We had to work on tracking where the Soviets went, they tracked us, we tracked them and everybody had to have a travel note. All travel notes in the Soviet Union came to my unit and then they had to be looked over. This is the first secretary, he says he wants to go to Phoenix, Arizona. All right, when's he going? What flight? Where? When? So, everybody knows along the way. One time a Soviet comes in and this happened over several, several months before we got onto it. They'd say they wanted to go to Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania and we'd say okay and they'd say, how and they'd say by air on a certain date. Fine. We had to tighten this up, but it went on for a couple of series of such trips that this particular Soviet would go out here to Leesburg to one of these little airports and he would rent a pilot, but he would rent one of these little four seaters. They'd take off and fly to Pittsburgh at 4,000 feet or 8,000 feet and he'd be looking down and taking photos and doing all this la la stuff and he'd land in Pittsburgh. He went there by air. Well, we had to close that thing. You know, this was before the satellites were doing all that stuff. I mean all of this is so silly. Some of it was cops and robbers, katzenjammer kids. Tit for tat. As a result of all of this, Jack Matlock came up with the idea because over there in Russia they had a thing which all of us used to call UPDK, Uproblema Diplomatiostroya Corpus. In other words, it was the body set up over there to control all diplomatic travel inside Russia, to control all licensing of vehicles inside Russia, to control all internal documents, everything having to do with diplomats and employees. Everything and all was under the KGB and it just blanketed the diplomatic community. So, Jack Matlock said why don't we do one back here? Now that was a rather bold idea because it was going to cost money, right, nobody likes to cost money. Except when the security boys back here get smelling something like that, the FBI jumped onboard, said, yes, yes, we need one of those. Of course, they'll have to ask for it; Langley would be on that and on all of them. All of them said, hey, let's get going. So, we formed a thing, which exists to this day in diplomatic security, and you'll see all these red, white and blue license plates of diplomats around town with little codes on them. You know, you've seen them. They're issued by the Department of State. Why do you think they exist? Why do they have to have every diplomat put on? Why, because we couldn't single out the Russians, but our purpose was to get a license tag on every Russian diplomat vehicle, Soviet, that we would know by looking at it, you know, that's a Soviet, right? But, you couldn't do it, just one, so we had to do it for all. It's not a bad system.

Q: No, I know. When I was in Yugoslavia all Americans had a 60-A and then a number. The Soviets had a 10-A; Canadians had 63 and Poles I think were 12. Those things I remember to this day.

FARRAND: Amazing things to remember.

Q: Yes, so I used to keep a little list. I'd see a car and I knew exactly where it came from. It was kind of fun.

FARRAND: Well, I'll tell you what's kind of fun, if you don't know it, I don't think they hand them out like candy, but there is little book you can actually buy them in a bookstore, but you have to ask for them. It was this little book put out by the State Department with all those codes. So, I have one for each of my cars and I'm driving down the road and there's a guy sitting next to me and I see LR. So, I look inside, Bosnia Herzegovina. I was amazed. LR. It was a big Lincoln; they can't afford them back there. They can have one here. I see AF is Japan. I can tell you that. XZ is Australia. PD is the United Kingdom. I can tell you that and I look so I know that guy's from San Salvador or El Salvador. They don't know who I am, but I know who they are.

Q: You were there until '80. After the Soviets invaded Afghanistan in December of '79, was there a major change in how we treated the Soviet Union? That was the end of the Carter effort to play nice.

FARRAND: Yes, that brought it all down. Marshall Schulman, do you know the name?

Q: I've heard of it.

FARRAND: Well, he was a professor at Columbia. He ran the School of Soviet Studies at Columbia and he was brought in by Vance and Carter to be the Soviet guru at the Department of State. He had this effecting habit of wearing a green eyeshade; a green eyeshade is the old fashion thing that goes around. Bookkeepers and accountants wore them. He wore it in the Department of State. I guess, I don't know why. Professor Schulman, there was Marshall Goldman and Marshall Schulman, but Marshall Schulman was a very strong influence on the Soviet desk and he had working as his assistant a fellow by the name of Curt Cammen. He was a very bright Foreign Service officer who, after all this, many years, Curt had experience in the Soviet Union and Curt was a quiet man, but highly intelligent. Schulman is sitting on the seventh floor of the Department of State would look down, Curt would be his emissary to those of us, and we were on the fourth floor of the Department of State if I'm not mistaken. Then, of course, the deputy assistant secretary and the assistant secretary were on the sixth floor. The office director was Bill Schinn. He was a Princeton graduate, a scholar of Russian literature and a student and a man thoroughly devoted to Soviet studies. He had several offices that were working, and this is a very big office, I mean you probably had thirty officers in there. I had about eight, six or eight officers of my own in this bilateral unit. Some of them were deeply educated in Soviet affairs like Sean Burns and others like me had not been deeply educated in it, but we had served there and we had had particular expertise that we brought to the job, plus talking about it everyday amongst each other so you build up a lot of knowledge, some of it good, some of it not so good. Schinn was a and he's retired now I think, God bless him, wherever he is, he bridled I think a little under this watchdog thing that came down from the Schulman office upstairs. In between there was a deputy assistant secretary named Robert L. Barry. Barry has just come back from Bosnia here last week as head of the OSCE operation in Sarajevo. Before that he was ambassador to Indonesia and before that ambassador to Bulgaria. Barry and Schinn did not get on, did not get on. Both were and are highly intelligent people. Schinn probably took more, however, to the Schulman approach to things than Barry. I'm going to say that. Barry, I worked for him as consular officer in my first year in Moscow years back. So, Bob and I are friends, but Barry is a very realistic, oh, Barry is a person that isn't swept away by emotions of the moment. I mean he saw the Soviets for what they were. Schulman, the word that came down from Schulman was this, for my desk and the desk in general, to "stop being all arms and elbows with the Soviet, let's try another approach. Let's try to put out our hand and get on with it." That marked the underlying philosophy of my two years on the desk. Even though I would see the Soviets kick us in the groin regularly.

Q: Was there a change though after December '79?

FARRAND: Oh, absolutely. Absolutely. Went south. Yes. Went south. All sorts of things stopped. The commercial office that I had departed from became just cobwebs. Another fellow went out to run it, but just cobwebs, nothing moved.

WILLIAM ANDREAS BROWN
Political Counselor
Moscow (1977-1978)

Ambassador William Andreas Brown was born in Winchester, Massachusetts in 1930. He joined the "Holloway Program" which was part of the Naval Reserve Officers Training Program and went to Harvard University, graduating with a Magna cum Laude degree. In 1950 he went to Marine Corps basic training in Virginia and later served in Korea. His Foreign Service career took him to a multitude of places including Honk Kong, Taiwan, Singapore, Malaysia, USSR, India, the UK, and Israel. His career includes an ambassadorship to Israel as well as several positions in the State Department, Environmental Protection Agency. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in November of 1998.

BROWN: Yes. Let me say that my second posting to Moscow, as well as my timing, were unique. First of all, why did I go to Moscow? I went for the needs of the Foreign Service. That is, Marshall Brement was the Political Counselor of the embassy. He had been declared persona non grata in retaliation for our having declared a Soviet spy assigned to the UN persona non grata. The Soviet official was of about the same rank and status as Marshall Brement. I think that the Soviet official at the UN was on leave when we declared him persona non grata, so he couldn't come back to New York. It so happened that Marshall Brement was on home leave, at that time, so the Soviets retaliated against him in that way. This was considered foul ball. After all, Marshall Brement was not an intelligence officer, but a regular Foreign Service officer assigned to the embassy, but that was the temper of the times. The embassy needed a replacement for Marshall Brement.

Now, I had served there in the embassy in Moscow from 1966 to 1968 as a Sino-Soviet watcher. My basic job was following Sino-Soviet developments. In 1967 I had witnessed the 50th anniversary of the Great October Bolshevik Revolution. Brezhnev had taken power in 1964, overthrowing Nikita Khrushchev. However, Brezhnev was newly in power when I went to Moscow in 1966. I could speak and read Russian. More recently, from the end of 1973 to the end of 1976 I had been running the world's largest, environmental agreement, the one between the Soviet Union and the United States. In that capacity I had done considerable travel, both in the Soviet Union and in the United States.

Prior to that I had spent a period of about two years studying Mongolian. However, I was not assigned to Ulan Bator because the Mongolian Government did not agree to our opening up an embassy there. I had studied the history of the Mongolian People's Republic and translated into English the history of the Communist Party of Mongolia. Harvard University published this history, with the help of the FSI, I might add. So I was up on things Soviet, and I suppose that I was a logical choice to be assigned to Moscow as Political Counselor, there being no one else available. So I went to Moscow on very short notice.

Q: Excuse me, I always like to get when and where. You were in Moscow this time from 1977 to...?

BROWN: I was there in Moscow from January, 1977, through late June or early July, 1978, when I was transferred to Taiwan, Republic of China. Now, we had a very interesting situation in Moscow at the time. To draw in the big picture, and I'll come back to that, I read in today's New York Times a review of Henry Kissinger's latest volume of memoirs, Years of Renewal, which is well and favorably reviewed. I haven't yet had a chance to read this book but I would commend the possible listener or reader of this interview to that book for Kissinger's view of U.S.-Soviet relations, in which he played such a prominent role, under Presidents Nixon and Ford.

In early 1977 President Carter entered office, having just been elected in November, 1976. I was just leaving for Moscow. Carter was about to be sworn in as President. Late in the Ford administration, after a protracted and acrimonious exchange with the Soviets, President had nominated and the Senate had confirmed Malcolm Toon as the new Ambassador to the Soviet Union. That appointment was initially resisted by the Soviets. One story that I heard was that Secretary of State Kissinger said to Anatoli Dobrynin, the Soviet Ambassador to the United States: "If you want to remain as Soviet Ambassador to the United States, you'd better arrange to have Malcolm Toon receive agreement from your government as Ambassador to the Soviet Union." Ambassador Dobrynin had been Soviet Ambassador to the United States since the Kennedy administration and was considered a very influential representative. I don't know whether he was Dean of the Diplomatic Corps in Washington, but he had tremendous access everywhere in the U.S. Government and in U.S. society more generally, including the White House.

Q: This was only logical, but what was the problem holding up Toon's agreement?

BROWN: Well, the problem was that Malcolm Toon had previously served in the American embassy in Moscow. He was a highly professional diplomat but he had a strong reputation for being tough as far as the Soviet Union was concerned. He had seen tough times when he was Political Counselor in the American embassy in Moscow. He had been denounced personally by Pravda at that time.

Anyway, Toon eventually received agreement and was confirmed by the Senate. He arrived in Moscow in early 1977, just as I did. We were then faced with the situation that it was widely reported that President Carter was uneasy or unhappy about the appointment of Toon as Ambassador to the Soviet Union. There were all kinds of rumors and reports that President Carter was reviewing the appointment of Toon and five or six other Ambassadors. The others had been appointed to countries of much less significance than the Soviet Union.

Sargent Shriver was reported to be visiting Moscow amidst rumors that Ambassador Toon was going to be rapidly withdrawn from Moscow and that Shriver would become the next Ambassador to the Soviet Union.

I remember accompanying Ambassador Toon on a call on Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko. I guess that this was after Ambassador Toon had presented his credentials. All of these stories were swirling around, and the press was playing with them. In his typically churlish, sour, and sarcastic manner in talking to an American Ambassador, Gromyko's first words to Ambassador Toon were: "Are you still here in Moscow?" This was downright insulting.

Anyway, Ambassador Toon was very unhappy as the stories continued to circulate that the Carter administration was cool and negative toward him and was considering a replacement for him as Ambassador to the Soviet Union. This was understandable and was quite evident in the first press conference that Ambassador Toon held in Moscow for the American press. The press conference was "off the record" and wasn't long. Ambassador Toon said, in effect: "Look, I don't like the Soviets, and they don't like me. That's fine with me, and that's the way it ought to be, given the current state of our bilateral relations." Someone asked him about the story that Sargent Shriver had been in Moscow. Ambassador Toon said something like: "Look, I have nothing against Sargent Shriver, but that would be a disaster. What we need here in Moscow is a senior, qualified person." The conference went on like that.

As the press conference broke up, one of the better known correspondents turned to me and said, "Boy! My notebook is burning!" I said, "Stick it in your pocket and let it burn, buddy."

Remember, this conference is off the record.”

So this was the situation. The DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission] in Moscow at the time was Jack Matlock, a fine and experienced, professional diplomat. He was well read and fluent in Russian. He was a very serious scholar of Russian, Belorussian, and Ukrainian affairs, as well as Soviet questions. Ambassador Toon was rather dour to begin with and was not in the best frame of mind, to put it mildly.

I would call your attention to Henry Kissinger's most recent book, which I haven't read or reviewed. However, let me now talk about the overall Soviet-U.S. relationship as I saw it, as the new Political Counselor of the embassy in Moscow.

At this point [1977] Brezhnev had been in power since 1964. He had solidified his position. He had been unwell. There were reports of his illness, but he was very much in power. Now the 60th anniversary of the Great Bolshevik Revolution was coming up [in November, 1977]. With it, of course, came the near deification of Brezhnev. He had been the equivalent of a Brigadier General or Political Commissar of an Army Division [during World War II]. You were now beginning to see works published which made it seem as if he had won World War II all by himself!

The Soviet-U.S. relationship had soured. The U.S. had suffered a major setback in terms of prestige and morale in Vietnam. We were still very much suffering the aftermath of that. To a significant degree, the U.S. military were demoralized in that respect, suffering from the Vietnam Syndrome. The military establishment was being downsized.

As we perceived them, the Soviets were expanding their influence around the world at our expense. In Africa, they switched from supporting Said Barre in Somalia to Mengistu, the brutal, new dictator in Ethiopia. Ethiopia was in a fascinating position in terms of population, size, potential influence, and ideology. The switch of Soviet support from Barre to Mengistu was very upsetting. Fidel Castro of Cuba became involved in Angola. We learned that the Soviets were not happy about this Cuban involvement as such. Reportedly, the Cubans had not asked the Soviets for permission to involve themselves [in Angola], although they depended on Soviet sea and air transport to maintain Cuban forces in Angola. In their own way the Soviets were using their involvement in Latin America to expand their influence. There was rising concern in Washington about Soviet mischief-making and contacts in the Caribbean area and elsewhere in Latin America.

In Asia, you may remember, the Soviets looked mighty powerful at that time. Clashes had taken place along the Sino-Soviet during and after my first tour in Moscow [1966-1968] in which the Chinese communists did not come out at all well. Soviet muscle was very much in evidence. There was the ongoing nuclear missile arms race between the Soviet Union and the United States. This was the situation as President Jimmy Carter entered office. He had a new agenda and a new Secretary of State.

Q: You mean Cyrus Vance, the new Secretary of State.

BROWN: Yes. President Carter had a new agenda in which there were several elements deemed of major importance by the new administration, vis-a-vis Moscow.

Human rights was a very big issue. I would like to dwell on that at some length here. Of course, we continued with the policy of containment of the Soviet Union but we hoped to open up a new dialogue. The arms control issue was very high on the agenda of the early part of the Carter administration. Finally, there was another, significant item on the Carter administration agenda, and that was China. We could sense and feel that this new President intended to complete the normalization of relations with China. We still hadn't reached closure on this issue, even after the Shanghai Communique of 1972.

Q: We had not exchanged Embassies.

BROWN: There were Liaison Offices in Beijing and Washington. We had some very important people involved in this process but we did not yet have a full, diplomatic relationship and all that that would mean. However, one could sense that the new, Carter administration meant to pursue this matter.

Q: As you were looking at it, did the Korean situation come to your attention?

BROWN: Oh, yes. How would the Soviets respond to the changing situation? If there were a pullout or downsizing of American forces in South Korea, how would that affect the balance of power in terms of the big game, that is, relations between the U.S., the Soviet Union, China, and Japan? These were major issues at the time.

Several of these relationships overlapped, and there were tensions and conflicts or elements of conflict, if you will, between them. Our job, as I saw it and as the American embassy in Moscow saw it, was to sort these relationships out and try to give them their due weight. It wasn't very long before we got into a real pickle on some of them.

In the human rights field President Carter's statements had given great hope to the dissidents in Moscow, including Sakharov and company, the Jewish dissident community, the refuseniks, and so forth. This rapidly led to a KGB [Soviet secret police] crackdown. When I arrived in Moscow, the KGB was starting to roll up the dissidents.

Then in February came a real stunner, a bolt out of the blue. I think that this happened on either a Saturday or a Sunday. Ambassador Toon called me in on very short notice. We met in the "Tank" [conference room built of plastic for highly classified meetings]. The Ambassador laid on the table a brief instruction from Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, "You will deliver the following message to Andrei Sakharov from the President." It was a first person message from President Carter dated February 7. It was a brief but very poignant statement of support for virtually everything that Andrei Sakharov had said. Ambassador Toon asked me what my reaction was. Now, I was not Ambassador Toon, and he was not I. We had never served together before and didn't know each other too well. We came from different backgrounds. However, we were both professional Foreign Service Officers. I looked at the message and said, "I'm very, very concerned." Ambassador Toon said, "It's a disaster, an utter disaster!" We both focused on the fact that from our view as professional diplomats, the prospects for the arms control initiative, which the Carter administration was widely reported to be preparing to take to Moscow, would be negatively affected. There was no surer way of souring the atmosphere for that major undertaking than to deliver a message which could only be taken by Brezhnev as a direct, first person insult.

I mention this because of the dilemmas which you can run into when you are involved in the big, diplomatic game, and you have all of these cross currents in play, some of which are in conflict. Ambassador Toon said, "What do you recommend?" I said, "I recommend that we send a message to the Department of State saying that, of course, we stand ready to deliver this message as soon as possible. We should add, however: 'We assume that Washington is aware that this message could have a major, negative impact and be misinterpreted by Brezhnev as insulting thus souring the atmosphere for a major, Carter administrative initiative, arms control.'" We sent a back a message along these lines and got a reply shortly thereafter from Secretary of State Vance, who was on a visit to the Middle East. In effect the reply from the Secretary was: "You've received your message. Deliver it."

So Ambassador Toon called me back into the "tank." We sat down, and he said, "What do you recommend?" I said, "Well, Mr. Ambassador, we could try a cutout, a friend of a friend to deliver this message. There are various, possible intermediaries. However, no matter what we do, the Soviets are going to know exactly what we are up to. They have us and Sakharov so bugged that they will know what we are up to. My recommendation is: just deliver the message straight out in the open. Call Sakharov down to the embassy, and he'll come. Then give him the message." And that's what happened.

The Political Section in Moscow had two sub-sections: the Internal and the External Units. Both units were headed by wonderful guys who did very, very well in the Foreign Service. They were real, professional diplomats. The head of the Internal Unit at the time was Dick Combs, later to become DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission] in Moscow. I talked the matter over with Dick, who phoned Sakharov. Although Sakharov had been publicly pilloried and disgraced by the Soviet Government, he was still a member of the Soviet Academy of Sciences. As a member of the Academy of Sciences, he phoned down to his motor pool. The result was that he was driven down in a proper, black limousine to the embassy, in front of which a great crowd of KGB goons had gathered, with cameras. As he stepped out of the limousine, the cameras were put about a foot in front of his face, with many flashbulbs going off.

Sakharov came into the embassy. Dick Combs read to him from the copy of the President's message which we had typed up. He said that the original copy would be coming in the Diplomatic Pouch. Sakharov said immediately: "Do you have a xerox machine?" Combs said we did, and ran off a dozen or so copies of this statement. He expressed tremendous gratitude and satisfaction and went out, faced the camera flashes, got into his limousine, went home, and held a press conference. So we were then in the soup. Brezhnev and company were obviously very angry. Sakharov and company were delighted.

This was now about February, 1977. President Carter had recently been installed in office. It was arranged that I would meet with a group of Soviet dissidents in the apartment of our key, contact officer for such matters, Joe Pretzel, who is still very active and has been a roving Ambassador in the whole Caucasus area and that part of the world. Joe arranged this meeting. Attending were my wife, Sharansky, and several others, including a number of non-Jews who were nonetheless dissidents. It was a fascinating evening. Our guests were showering praise on President Carter. It got to the point where I said, "You know, my reading of history is that dissident movements, throughout history, essentially make it or fail on their own and have no need for outside help. Now, you could argue that there are exceptions. Here you are in Moscow, the capital of an enormous country. I would like to ask you, and it may sound strange, coming from me, whether you really believe that this kind of support from President Carter is going to help your cause? The way I look at it, one of you who is missing tonight has gone underground. The KGB is arresting dissidents, and all of you stand to be incarcerated by the KGB."

They said, "That's right. Keep it up. Keep the pressure on the Soviet Government. Increase the pressure." They said, "You see, Mr. Brown, you don't really understand Soviet society. There is no other way than to pressure this kind of regime. Put the pressure on, keep it on, if you can, and increase it." Well, it was an interesting exercise. These dissidents were all "rolled up" [arrested] soon after. Within a few weeks trumped up charges had been pressed against Sharansky, who was jailed. I didn't see him for another nine years. This was a prime agenda item for the Carter administration which, I think, very much enjoyed the publicity. This incident was very much on the agenda of human rights constituencies, including Members of Congress.

I'll give you another example of the kinds of dilemmas we would get into. The Armed Services Committee of the U.S. House of Representatives was then led by Congressman Mel Price [Republican, Illinois], who was well on in years. He was coming to visit Moscow at the time of the Congressional Easter Recess in 1977. We received a cable from Congressman Price, which said, "I'll be coming your way." Then followed the usual "laundry list." He said that he wanted to see members of the Soviet Politburo; the top Soviet leadership; the Chief of Staff, General Orgakov; and other top Soviet military leaders, since he was the Chairman of the House Armed Services Committee.

I took this cable down to the Soviet Foreign Ministry. They said, "We didn't invite them. This is a self-invitation. They want to come to Moscow at Easter time? Well, you can go down to Intourist and make arrangements. We're not inviting them and we're not giving you any guarantees whatsoever that they'll be seen by any of the Soviet officials they have mentioned." This gave me a real problem. I ended up doing something unusual, because throughout my career I had developed great respect for Congressional Delegations and their power in a variety of ways, both observable and unobservable. I had been named Control Officer for CODEL Price [Congressional Delegation Price]. I flew to meet them in Copenhagen. They had their own Air Force plane.

I went to Copenhagen at my own initiative. I sent a cable and was told that this group of Congressmen would be touring the Castle of Elsinore, in Denmark, but I could meet with them in the evening and then fly with them to Leningrad [now St. Petersburg] and then down to Moscow. I wanted to have a good session with these Congressmen because I figured that this was a very important trip and at a very difficult time.

Well, I got to the Control Room of Congressional Delegation Price in Copenhagen and was told:

“Well, maybe one or two members of the Delegation can see you.” However, as things turned out, the word got around, and I met with a great number of them in Congressman Mel Price's suite. The Executive Director of the House Armed Services Committee at the time was John Ford. He had long been Executive Director of the House Armed Services Committee. He said to me: “You'd better lay it on the line with these people, because some of them have some pretty interesting ideas.” I soon found out that, among these Congressmen, were both members of the Committee and other Congressmen who were self-invited and who were there to pursue the primary agenda item of human rights. Some of them were there for both military matters and human rights issues.

I won't go into names of these Congressmen, but one of them, a distinguished gentleman from California, had a list of the dissidents and refuseniks that he wanted to meet on arrival in Leningrad. Others on the delegation wanted to attend church services and meet with dissidents of this or that stripe. There were many different varieties of dissidents in those days.

I said, “You know, this will be on your arrival in the Soviet Union. You'll be there in Leningrad for a day or two, and then we'll go on to Moscow. You hope to meet with the top Soviet leadership. Thus far we have absolutely no, positive response on that. If you have any hope whatsoever of having a constructive dialogue with the Soviet leadership, you have to bear in mind that the KGB will be following each and every one of us, day and night, as well as all of those that we contact. By contacting dissidents you run the risk of souring the whole atmosphere.” However, they were determined. They had made many commitments to constituents back home.

So I did what I could to get dissident addresses. I alerted our Consulate General in Leningrad, I arranged for some of the members of the Delegation to attend church services, and others to meet with dissidents, both Jewish and non-Jewish. When we arrived in Leningrad, Arabatov was there to meet us. This was a pleasant surprise, not that he was a pleasant personality. However, he was a well-known specialist on U.S.-Soviet affairs.

Q: Wasn't he at the time the head of the North American Institute, or something like that?

BROWN: Right.

Q: His name was Georgi Arabatov.

BROWN: Right. His son now holds forth as a current expert on North American affairs in the Soviet Union. Arabatov made some sour remarks, and off we went. It was a brief, fascinating tour to Leningrad. I accompanied several of the Congressmen to a Baptist, Easter service, where the congregation was so moved that the congregation, if not speaking in tongues, was at least speaking out from the floor. I found it fascinating that one member of the congregation at this service was in a Soviet Army private's uniform. The Members of Congress were put right up on the pulpit, right up on the stage, as it were.

That evening I got together with Georgi Arabatov, who was drunk. I met him up on the top floor of the Leningrad Hotel. He gave me “hell.” He said, “We know where you and your people have been. And you expect me to help them, etc.” I talked pretty tough back to him. I said, “They are what they are. They are members of a very important Committee of the United States Congress. They ought to be of very considerable interest to you.” He said that they had asked to meet the Soviet Defense Minister, but he was sick and was not available. I said, “Well, at least they ought to meet the Chief of Staff, Orgakov.” Arabatov said, “He's got a bad cold. He's been on maneuvers,” and so forth. I said, “Well, put him in a wheelchair and roll him out! You owe it to yourselves as well as us to have a dialogue develop.” I had to help Arabatov down to his room, he was so drunk.

We then flew on to Moscow. No appointments, of course, had been granted by the Soviet political leadership. Further meetings were held with Jewish and non-Jewish dissidents. We had a meeting with Chief of Staff Orgakov, the first official American delegation to have met with him. He received the Congressmen with a huge staff to his left and his right. He took their questions himself, made notes, and, of course, fed them the line that the Soviet military budget was infinitely small, compared with the U.S. defense budget. Of course, it was unbelievably small, because much of it was hidden under other budget headings.

General Orgakov conducted this briefing suavely and with finesse. Our Military Attaches had never seen a performance anything like this. They had never been able to see him. They had always been blocked off by phalanxes of Soviet officers. Here they had him on full display. I saw an Orgakov who was a soldier-diplomat.

Then we went down to Kiev. There were more meetings with dissidents, refuseniks, and so forth. The Congressmen asked me to leave various things which they hadn't been able to deliver. They would give this stuff on me, asking me to deliver it to so and so at such and such an address. It was just incredible. However, it shows you the kinds of things that we can get into, as we get into these missionary modes and if the Congress, let alone other human rights constituencies, bless such initiatives.

I consider myself a human rights advocate as such. I've done a lot in that field. However, there is a dilemma facing a professional Foreign Service Officer in this connection. I'll say that former Congresswoman Pat Schroeder, now that she's out of Congress, came out of that trip to Moscow with a somewhat lurid reputation for what she had done. It wasn't long after that trip that I received a lengthy clipping from a newspaper, to the effect that she had smuggled out in her brassiere and panties tape recordings of her interviews with Soviet dissidents. This wasn't exactly the best way to go about dealing with such matters and then publicizing them in that way.

A word on our assessment of the situation in the Soviet Union at the time, as the Sharansky trial was being prepared in Moscow. He was labeled a U.S. spy. His roommate or a close associate of his was a KGB agent. The Soviet authorities trumped up the charges against Sharansky.

We got into a real fuss about such matters. From time to time it was useful to try and step back and estimate what the Soviet public thought about all of this. We regretted having to conclude that the Soviet man in the street just didn't give a damn. (End of tape)

Q: You were saying that Sharansky was...

BROWN: Frankly speaking, he was an unknown, apart from a select circle of the Soviet intelligentsia and fellow dissidents. Of course, he got great publicity in the United States and in the West more generally. Incidentally, I think the world of him. He is a wonderful person.

My conclusion, and those of my colleagues, was that this issue came down to being a U.S.-Soviet confrontation. In that configuration, the Soviet public supported the Soviet regime hands down. First of all, it didn't give a damn about someone like Sharansky. Secondly, if this were portrayed as it was as a U.S. intrusion in Soviet affairs, it was just another negative from the viewpoint of Soviet public opinion, whatever that was.

Q: I just wanted to ask what was the effect of the visit of this Congressional Delegation?

BROWN: I think that such visits can be extremely useful. There was an important audience in the Soviet Union listening to Members of Congress, regarding our concerns and how to handle the Soviet-American relationship. I was delighted that for the first time until then, they at least had a formal session with General Ogarkov. We hoped that this would give us the leverage, the precedent, to have such dialogues in the future.

Early on in the Carter administration we learned that Secretary of State Cyrus Vance and Paul Warnke, the new head of ACDA [Arms Control and Disarmament Agency], were planning to come to Moscow for arms control discussions. Ambassador Toon, suffering from the slings and arrows of his situation at the time, managed to set up a meeting with Secretary Vance in Brussels, so that they could get to know each other and to prepare more effectively for Vance's visit to Moscow. Toon told me that Secretary Vance asked him: "What do you think of the package?" Toon told me that he replied: "I could give you a better opinion if you would show it to me." In other words, the Department had not shown the American Ambassador in Moscow what they were bringing for discussion with the Soviets!

Then, having absorbed as much of the package as he could, and this was very complicated material, Toon told me that he had said to Vance: "Look, if this is what President Carter wants and which you all have decided on, then I'll do everything that I can to advance it. However, I can tell you straight out that in the current atmosphere in Moscow, this is not going to fly."

Well, Secretary Vance and Paul Warnke came to Moscow with that package anyway. Vance was a unique Secretary of State. He visited the embassy, wearing a blue, woolen sweater. He spent some time in our terribly cramped quarters, and gave us all a pat on the back, and that was very good for morale.

Vance also initiated a new approach with the press. That is, at the end of each day's discussions with the Soviets, he would have a press conference. Well, the discussions with the Soviets had been very acrimonious and unproductive. This was inevitably reflected in the press conference. On the next day or so the Soviets began holding their own press conference and blasting us. So the whole visit was a flop and a shock.

Now, Ambassador Toon had wisely said to Vance and Warnke: "Look, in view of the bugging of the hotels, I offer you my nearby residence. Then you can work here in the embassy.” The Soviets had offered them a beautiful villa in the Lenin Hills area. Vance and Warnke declined Ambassador Toon's offer and went to the villa offered by the Soviets in the Lenin Hills area. As the Political Counselor at the embassy, I went out there with them. The Vance Delegation was deeply concerned and, I would say, in a state of semi-shock. Vance and Warnke were walking around the great, gravel driveway, so that, hopefully, they could have a private conversation with each other. This was a rather simplistic view, shall we say. We had warned all of the members of the Delegation that everything they said and did in their rooms would be recorded by the Soviets. I entered some of their rooms at this villa, where there was classified material scattered all over the place. Delegation members were getting on the phone back to the State Department in Washington, speaking in the clear, and expressing dismay that this visit had failed and that they had been stiff armed by the Soviets. Of course, since Ambassador Toon had warned them in advance, this should not have come as a surprise. So we were off to a tough start.

Q: Can you talk a little bit about what you were picking up? Cyrus Vance and Paul Warnke were not novices. They were not like William Jennings Bryan coming out of Nebraska. You had this peculiar Carter administration in that you had Zbigniew Brzezinski there as National Security Adviser, who hated the Russians. You also had the sort of evangelical peace side of President Jimmy Carter. Were Vance and Warnke talking to other Soviet experts? Did they know what they were getting into?

BROWN: Frankly, I do not know. I can only suppose that they had expert briefings back in Washington, but this certainly didn't come across. I say that with the deepest respect for them individually as public servants of great stature and integrity. However, I felt that they just weren't equipped at that time for the task at hand in terms of a realistic approach. But they were loyal, senior civil servants of President Jimmy Carter.

Q: This is one of the things that one hears as we do these interviews. We hear of the disaster of Secretary of State Cyrus Vance going out on a mission which would not be successful. This is not a good way to start an administration.

BROWN: Well, look, today we are talking in March, 1999. If I were to have Sharansky here, who is now a cabinet minister in the Israeli Government and if he were seated over in that chair between us, I am sure that he would look back and say, “You did exactly the right thing. Look, the Soviet Empire toppled, the whole human rights approach was vindicated, and we're all the better for it.” I cite this in terms of the dilemmas that a professional Foreign Service Officer runs into in such matters. What weight should you give this agenda item as against that agenda item? If you think that the administration is wrong, how do you try and educate them and, at the same time, be seen by them as loyal messengers and servants of a new administration? This is a very difficult question.

Now, there is another question that your remark brings up, and that is the position of Zbigniew Brzezinski. It was known that Brzezinski hated the Soviets. Most of us did. It also became apparent that Brzezinski wanted to come out himself and deal with the Soviets. The State Department was determined to prevent this.

One of the means used at the time was an instrument called the “Informal.” Embassy Moscow and the Soviet desk in the State Department had found, over the years, that in order to cope with leaks more efficiently and to cope more effectively with those people back in Washington who might disagree with this or that professional approach by the Soviet desk, an Informal channel of communications was set up which functioned concurrently with the regular telegrams. These messages were labeled “Informals,” and they were very closely held. These messages would be signed off in the Ambassador's office in the embassy in Moscow, but there was no easily available file of them. Similar precautions were taken back here in the State Department in Washington. I remember on one occasion that we received the text of a proposed Brzezinski operative plan regarding the Soviet Union, which involved going after what was described as the soft underbelly of the USSR. That is, go after the minorities in the Soviet Union, the Ukrainians, the Georgians, the Armenians, and so forth. In other words, stick it to them.

The Soviet desk in the State Department used the Informal channel to ask for information to critique this reported Brzezinski approach. So we used the Informal channel in a fairly lengthy reply. It was not to be the kind of thing which was then intended to surface. The idea was: “What is the best way of coping with Brzezinski?” I must say that Brzezinski didn't visit Moscow during my time in the embassy.

I'd like to talk about our analysis at the time of the Soviet economy and society. Bear in mind that our local sources in Moscow were extremely limited. The Soviets were not about to give us their statistics or any particular help in discovering their weaknesses, economic or otherwise. It was a real challenge to collect material on these subjects. An awful lot of the material we collected was anecdotal in nature. Bear in mind that on the one hand I was a non-economist arriving in Moscow for a second tour of duty, although this was some years after my first tour there.

During my second tour in Moscow I could see that in big places like Moscow and Leningrad there were more things to buy in the shops than had previously been available. There was a greater variety of goods. At the same time the goods available were still of fairly poor quality and very uneven in availability. When we traveled out in the countryside, we found that even many of these items were not available. This was particularly noticeable on a seasonal basis. During the winter, for example, the Soviets were desperately short of meat. It was so bad that my Yugoslav colleagues used to comment on the situation.

The Yugoslavs were really good observers. It was in their national interest to do this. The Yugoslav officials to whom I refer spoke fluent Russian and often had their children attending Russian schools. They were able to buttress our observations by telling us about other aspects of the situation.

Invitations were being issued among the intelligentsia in Moscow in the dead of winter: “Come out to my dacha for a night of lamb” or beef or whatever, meaning, “Bring the meat with you.” I used to jog in those days very early in the morning. I used to see crowds of people coming into Moscow from the hinterland at the railway stations, carrying what looked like empty laundry bags over their shoulders. They were coming in to buy whatever they could in terms of canned goods at what was for them very stiff prices. They would then load up with these canned goods like Santa Claus and take the merchandise home on the train. We knew that there was a lot that was wrong with the Soviet economy. However, we didn't have the sense of the collapse that was to come over the next 10 years or so. [See Melvin Goodman's piece, "Who Is the CIA Fooling? Only Itself" in the Washington Post Dec 19, 1999. A former career CIA analyst. Goodman, asserts that, "CIA analysts had tracked the early stages of decline of the soviet economy from 1976 to 1986 but [CIA Director ]Gates would not circulate most draft assessments that pointed to Soviet weakness. As a result, CIA estimates overstated the size of the Soviet economy and underestimated the economic burden of maintaining the Soviet military."]

I may have mentioned this before, but there were some currents stirring in terms of religion in this controlled society. I mentioned dissidents, both Jewish and non-Jewish. On the religious front, if you went to the Baptist service on the occasion of Easter that I attended in Leningrad, or in Moscow, as I did later on, you would see people who, in Soviet terms, were members of the underclass. These people were absolutely jamming the churches. These people were waiting outside, often in bitterly cold weather. You could witness really religious experiences by going to such churches.

Then, of course, there was another manifestation. One day late in the afternoon Ambassador Toon called me up to his office and said, "Look, there's been a group of Seventh Day Adventists down in the Consular Section all day. They have refused to leave. Now, you are a senior officer and have a bit of gray hair on your head. Go down there and tell them that it's time for them to go home." So I went down and met with them in the very crowded Consular Section. There must have been eight to 10 of them sitting there on benches and so forth. The men had long beards. I said to them in Russian: "You know, you've been here all day. We deeply appreciate your courage in forcing your way through the guards in front of the embassy and barging in here. However, you know that there is no way that we can get you to the United States, even if we wanted to. You have to have the approval of the Soviet authorities. You need an exit visa and so forth." I said, "You know, it's now 5:00 PM. The staff of the Consular Section has been working hard all day. It's time for you to go home. So I'd suggest that now is the time for you to leave the embassy."

The leader of these Seventh Day Adventists looked at me and said, pointing upwards in the air, that "God has spoken to us. God has told us to leave this terrible Soviet society. God has chosen YOU [emphasis supplied] as the instrument of our departure." So I went back up to the Ambassador's office, and I said, "We've got a problem here." I don't know whether it was a year or a year and a half later before they finally left. They camped in the American embassy.

Q: I think that they were Pentecostals.

BROWN: They were Pentecostals, not Seventh Day Adventists. This was a truly gripping story. I had to deal with other people who simply barged into the Consular Section, Georgians or whatever. Charging through these huge, Soviet guards outside the embassy by creating a disturbance and then fighting their way in took an awful lot of courage. Of course, I had to urge them very hard to go out, at the end of a long day. These people then faced an immediate and very grim experience. They would go around the corner and be picked up and rather severely handled by the Soviet police, shall we say. Some of them had done this more than once and described to me the water hose treatment they had received from the Soviet police.

You could see that some elements of Soviet society were in ferment. People were seeking some other outcome than the standard, communist propaganda answer to their lives.

Another factor that one could see, and it began to hit me later on, toward the end of my second tour in the embassy in Moscow, was corruption. We had a Soviet contact who was a bit of a maverick. He was the husband of one of our Russian language teachers. He was a cinematographer. We rarely saw him. We figured that his wife had been co-opted by the KGB. This was one of the circumstances of the time. All of our local employees had to report to the KGB, whether they were formally agents or not.

I remember meeting with Sergei. I never pressed him for information because I didn't want to hurt him. He would be remarkably frank with me in a certain way. I remember once, over a glass of vodka, he said to me: "You know, you're the distinguished Political Counselor of the American embassy. With all due respect, you don't know what in the world is going on out there. I travel this country, because I'm a cinematographer. Let me tell you. If you travel 100 miles out of Moscow, or any city, into the countryside, you wouldn't believe the way that the people live, their standard of living, and the way things are done."

Another source was a German correspondent who had been in Moscow for about 15 or 20 years. He was leaving at this point. During a farewell conversation over drinks he said to me: "You know, the level of corruption, even in Moscow, is just unbelievable now. You go to buy a pair of socks, or nylons, or a dress or something nice like that. You end up trading this for that, with money passing under the table." He said, "The Soviet Union is really corrupt." So it seemed to me that there was already something quite rotten in Soviet society, both in Moscow and elsewhere.

Before I forget it, I want to turn to the Middle East in this context. You know, there had been an effort, following the 1973 Yom Kippur war, to broker some kind of joint approach to peace in the Middle East. Material has been published on this in Vienna and Geneva. The Carter administration and Moscow came out with some kind of joint approach, heading toward something like an international conference. That was just what the Soviets would want, because their great obsession, among many others, was always to try and display parity with the U.S. and to demonstrate that, while they had been behind, they were catching up, and so forth.

Well, in the midst of all of this came the surprise visit to Jerusalem of Egyptian leader Anwar Sadat. One of the outcomes, given Moscow's obvious rancor at this surprise, was to send Phil Habib [then Deputy Undersecretary for Political Affairs in the State Department] out to Moscow on a lightning visit. I was his Control Officer for this visit. It was a typical Phil Habib operation. He arrived in Moscow one morning and left in the afternoon of the following day. In between he had major meetings with Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko, Deputy Foreign Ministers, and so on. First Habib met with a Deputy Foreign Minister and then he saw Foreign Minister Gromyko.

For this visit the notetakers at the various meetings were Dick Miles and myself. Dick is now an Ambassador and a wonderful guy. He has since been Ambassador to Armenia. He was then in the External Unit in the Political Section. As Habib moved his hands in their usual gesticulations and was laying out his position to Gromyko, he tried to assure the Soviet Foreign Minister that we had not played any games. He said that Egyptian President Anwar Sadat's trip to Jerusalem was a surprise to us as well as to the Soviets. Gromyko interrupted him to say, "Mr. Habib, I can barely restrain myself from laughing in your face!" He said it just like that. Habib said, "Oh, no, it was a surprise to us, and we haven't been doing things behind your back."

Well, that was a fascinating business. Habib was eager to join Secretary of State Vance, who was now traveling in the Middle East. Habib met with various Soviet officials all day long. He said to me: "I want all of this verbatim." When he ended his meetings at about 5:00 PM, Dick Miles and I got two secretaries and dictated memcons [memoranda of conversations] all night long. We had them typed up, and I think that we finished the job at about 3:00 or 4:00 AM. So I was up all night. I delivered the memoranda to Habib at breakfast. He said, "Great. Now, make sure that we get the follow-up, because my flight leaves at 2:00 PM this afternoon. We have another meeting, and I want to make sure to have the complete record." So we went in, bleary-eyed, for the early morning sessions the second morning. These meetings went on for a couple of hours. Then Miles and I dashed back to the embassy, dictated the memcons, and had them typed up. I rushed Habib out to the plane. He had a transcript of his meetings as nearly full and verbatim as possible. That's the way Habib was, and that's the way we operated in those days. We were damned proud to do it.

The story that we heard was that Habib joined Secretary of State Vance in the Middle East. They did their business, involving a bunch of shuttle trips and so forth. They went straight back to Washington. Habib went straight to work at 6:00 or 7:00 AM and shortly after that he collapsed. Habib's life was saved by a coronary fibrillator on call in the State Department. He had had a major heart attack. He was so dedicated to his job. That was the way he was. I was to deal with him at great length in a later incarnation in the Middle East. That was quite a story. I'll never forget that.

Q: How was the Camp David meetings arranged? Were the Soviets...

BROWN: They were furious. This series of meetings at Camp David cut them out completely. Here was Anwar Sadat who had, in effect, dismissed the Soviets. Sadat launched what came to be called the Yom Kippur War with Israel. Sadat used the Soviets in a desperate attempt to survive the Israeli counterattack across the Suez Canal. Now, having gone through the motions of approving an international conference and so forth, Sadat had independently assessed that this was not what he wanted. He wanted a breakthrough with the Israelis on his own terms. So Sadat went to Jerusalem and met Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin.

By the way, Ambassador Toon had previously been Ambassador to Israel. When the news that Sadat had gone to Jerusalem broke, I'll never forget what Ambassador Toon said. Like the rest of us he was taken by surprise. I remember his saying: "I know Menachem Begin. I dealt with him as Prime Minister of Israel. I'll tell you something. He will NEVER give back the West Bank of the Jordan River [emphasis supplied]." He was right. Begin would not give the West Bank back to the Palestinians - or anyone else. Look at Begin's disciples even now.

The Soviets were furious at this development. Here President Carter got all of this publicity and put on a grand show, which was very dramatic. You remember the famous handclasps and so forth at the White House. And the Soviets were left high and dry. In strategic terms the Camp David meetings must have been a tremendous jolt for the Soviets because they had bet so heavily on their relationship, and a very expensive relationship, with certain Arab clients. In the Cold War atmosphere behind all of this, anything that we supported the Soviets opposed. And vice versa, too. We had provided major quantities of military supplies to the Israelis, and the Soviets had given major quantities of military supplies to Egypt and Syria. The Soviets had become involved in a budding relationship featuring the supply of arms to Iraq. The Soviets were, of course, stunned at what was left.

I remember calling on the newly-installed Director of the Institute of Asian and African Studies in Moscow. His name was Yuri Primakov. Of course, I knew something about him. Namely, that he was a KGB agent and correspondent for years, writing for PRAVDA. He spoke Arabic and was on the best of terms with the likes of President Hafez al-Assad in Syria, Saddam Hussein in Iraq, and other such people. Now Primakov was the head of this prestigious Soviet institute, and I thought that I should pay a courtesy call on him. He gave me a polite reception, but he was obviously rather sourpussed, and he wasn't prepared to give me much new wisdom, if I may put it that way. Little did I think at that time, and this was in 1978, that I'd be talking about Primakov in 1999 when he was the Prime Minister of Russia. Well, that's one great thing about the Foreign Service. If you last long enough in office, you see some remarkable changes.

Q: I've always thought that it was an article of faith with American policymakers: "Don't let the Soviets into negotiations over the Middle East." It sounds as if you were up against a new administration with a different view. When you were sitting around and having a drink after work, was there concern about the new, Carter administration and its backbone in dealing with the Soviets?

BROWN: Speaking personally, I was very concerned. You have to bear in mind that I didn't have all of the facts at hand, but you didn't have to be a rocket scientist to perceive that the Soviets were out to extend their influence as far and wide as they could. The Soviet Navy, while no match for ours, was nevertheless becoming a blue water Navy, able to operate on the high seas. Their submarine force, with its nuclear capabilities, was a subject of very serious concern. The Soviets were putting out newer and better missiles of greater accuracy, with longer range and much greater, destructive power.

The Soviet Navy had become involved in various escapades, as we saw them, in Nicaragua and other places. They had an ideology and a propaganda apparatus which made it very clear that they intended to overtake us. They were dedicated, if you will, to the eventual destruction of capitalism, as they termed it. They were trying to undermine us at every turn. Of course, we reciprocated. It was a real contest. I remember summing things up in a kind of annual wrap-up, listing Soviet efforts in the African, Latin American and Asian situations at the time. The situation looked pretty menacing and pretty discouraging to many other people. I tried to put myself in the position of a diplomat from a Third World country, given our efforts in Vietnam and our own self-flagellation. As against that, I mentioned in this review that Soviet society was increasingly corrupt. Apart from the facade as far as showcase, Moscow-Leningrad imagery was concerned, the Soviet Union had deep economic problems and great inefficiency. One wondered at what cost this great colossus was maintaining itself. However, I did not have the feeling that the Soviets would be so involved in their internal concerns that they would no longer be an external threat to the U.S.

That takes me back to a conversation I had with Mark Garrison, who had been instrumental in arranging for my assignment to the embassy in Moscow. Mark later left the Foreign Service. He had been DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission] under Ambassador Watson, the IBM [International Business Machines] executive. Mark should have been appointed Ambassador somewhere. He had an outstanding background and a tremendous grasp of Russia, including Russian history and the Russian language. The Soviet Union had been his career. He was a very dedicated, serious person. In about 1974 or 1975 I called on Mark when he was Political Counselor in Moscow. I told him that I realized that I was out of the mainstream of the Foreign Service. Here I was on detail to Russell Train, Administrator of EPA, running the US-Soviet Environmental Agreement. I said, however, that in that capacity I got to see places in the Soviet Union that he would never get to. So I said to him: "Let me ask you. As I talk with the military attaches here in Embassy Moscow, they sure don't see a process of serious detente or decay in the Soviet Union." Mark said, "Well, the Soviet Union faces a lot of problems, and one hopes that they will focus themselves and address their internal problems, so that they won't pose the same threat and problems to their neighbors and to our interests, externally." I said, "Good luck!" I had no idea that I myself would be involved in these issues not too long thereafter. I just didn't believe that the Soviet Union was headed for a breakup.

Nonetheless, it was a very disturbing situation. The Soviet Union became involved in Afghanistan...

Q: In December, 1979.

BROWN: Yes. Then there was the whole Iranian situation which fell on us at that time. I can't say that I predicted all of this. No. But there were disturbing signs at the time, and I was one of those who were very concerned about American policy and the Carter administration's handling of it at that time. Maybe I was completely wrong.

Q: One of the things that I have wondered about is whether we were concentrating too much on Kremlinology. In other words, who was moving up in the Politburo in terms of the other members, rather than looking at Soviet society as a whole. Perhaps we were concentrating too much on the leadership, which we could get from the newspapers, rather than looking at Soviet society and saying: "Ye gods, this system doesn't work." We could have looked at Soviet society from that perspective, rather than looking at the relative standings of the leadership.

BROWN: A tremendous effort had been going on for decades in the intelligence community and among very qualified people who had devoted a great deal of effort to learning Russian, studying Russian society, and so forth. Still, we were terribly deficient in terms of crucial statistics and analysis [See Goodman, op. cit]. I think that I may have mentioned before, to take one example, the agricultural scene. The Soviets wouldn't give us their agricultural statistics. They didn't want us to have a true picture of their agriculture. So, in the 1960s, and right on virtually to the end of the Soviet Union, we were forced to send an Agricultural Attaché and another person to accompany him on trips designed to get a better picture of the state of Soviet agriculture. During my first tour in Moscow (1966-1968), I went along with the Agricultural Attaché on one of these trips and did random sampling of the crops through areas of the Ukraine and the Caucasus that the Soviets would allow us to visit.

With the information derived from these trips, plus the data we obtained from our satellites, we would try to put together an estimate of the size of the Soviet crops. The Soviet economy was terribly vulnerable to weather changes. The weather can seriously affect the crops, for better or for worse. It is very vulnerable, particularly when you get out to such problem areas as the so-called "virgin lands" of Soviet Central Asia.

Let's face it. We had all of this study going on. Kremlinology, for lack of anything better, was considered terribly important to us at the time. Of course, we needed to consider the question: "Will Brezhnev survive?" However, I recalled for my staff of the time wasted thinking of obituaries for Mao Tse-tung, who died in 1976 at age 83. Still, I warned them to be alert to developments. We were now in a new, technical era, since we had television. If Brezhnev hadn't been seen on Soviet TV for the last three to five days, this could mean something. I'll never forget coming into the embassy one morning and realizing that Brezhnev hadn't been seen on Soviet TV for a week or two. Later that day, at the Country Team meeting in the "Tank" [classified conference room] I remember stating this. Then to Ambassador Toon I said, "I saw Brezhnev at a reception last night. I was in the room with him." I had gone to a hockey match and I saw Brezhnev there, up in his special box, with two or three people blowing smoke past him. So we were able to conclude that Brezhnev had survived.

While I'm at it, let me tell you of a meeting with Brezhnev. In the midst of this sour atmosphere that I have described, there was a time when Ambassador Toon was instructed to arrange a call on Brezhnev and lay out President Carter's views on arms control. The request for the call was made, and I accompanied Ambassador Toon into the Kremlin. After cooling our heels for a considerable period, we were finally shown into the Conference Room where Brezhnev received people. He was flanked by the inevitable interpreter, a youngish and very dapper Soviet official who had interpreted for Soviet leaders for years. Brezhnev was also accompanied by two aides. Brezhnev was well dressed but didn't look so well. His complexion was very florid. He had, as you know, a jaw or a mouth problem. He spoke with a sort of a slur which sometimes could mistakenly be interpreted as meaning that he was under the influence of alcohol. The doctors had ordered Brezhnev to stop smoking. So he would pull out a cigarette and put it up to his nose and sniff it. He ordered one aide to light up the cigarette and blow some smoke past him. Then Brezhnev broke out in a tremendous coughing spell. I swear that he went on for something like five minutes, hacking and coughing. We all sat there just frozen, ourselves and Brezhnev's aides. We didn't dare say, "Would you like a glass of water" or something like that. We just stayed quiet. Finally, Brezhnev recovered. I said to myself: "This man is obviously not well."

The conversation began, but it was not particularly productive. Brezhnev informed us that he was for peace and that the whole country wanted peace. The Communist Party wanted peace, and all Soviet citizens wanted peace. He said that he was doing everything he could do to achieve peace. However, he said that it would take a corresponding effort on our part, and so forth. At the end of this passage, Ambassador Toon, bless him, said, "Before I go, Mr. President, there is one thing that I would like to raise with you, more or less on my own." Brezhnev said, "What is this?" Ambassador Toon said, "There is this question of the microwave beams being directed against our embassy. This is a matter of real concern for my embassy and my staff. We'd like to see this taken care of." Whereupon Brezhnev said, "No such thing is happening. I'm an engineer. Don't tell me that we're beaming microwave radiation against your embassy. There are hospitals in Moscow, just like in every other city around the world. They have x-ray machines, some of these machines emit x-rays, and maybe some of them, somehow, go this way or that way. Moscow is a big, modern, industrial city with various emissions and so forth, but nobody is targeting your embassy."

With that, we left. I said to myself ever after that: "This was a bald faced, straight out lie." That leads me, Stuart, to dwell on this subject at some length. Various leaders in various societies throughout history have lied when faced with unpleasant news or developments. I shouldn't have been shocked, but it was somehow shocking to me the way Brezhnev handled it. I would have expected that he might have said, "This is new to me, and we'll have somebody look into it. I can assure you," and so forth. Instead, Brezhnev gave Ambassador Toon an abrupt, curt dismissal of this question. Beyond that, it takes us to the question of morale in the American embassy at that time and the evolution, if you will, of developments on the Moscow front of the Foreign Service.

When I first went to Moscow in 1966, after serving in Borneo and Southeast Asia, I fought tooth and nail to be assigned to study Russian, so that I could be assigned as the Sino-Soviet specialist in Moscow. For me, with the mentality of that period, this was a great challenge. This was the front line in the heart of the country of our adversaries. That's the way we looked at things in the Foreign Service in those days.

I have to tell you what a shock it was in about 1972 or 1973 to wake up to the great, microwave scandal and to find that Secretary of State Henry Kissinger and his associates had kept from us the fact that for years we had been bombarded by microwave apparatuses, directed straight at the embassy in Moscow. I remember being one of a small group of officers in 1972 or 1973 when news of this development broke. We raised our voices in despair, dissent, and so forth. We were finally ushered into a room where Larry Eagleburger, Kissinger's Special Assistant at the time, briefed us and made some sort of presentation, assuring us that steps would be taken, and so forth. He said that medical studies were under way, and the evidence thus far was that these microwaves had not been deleterious to our health. This was somewhat reassuring until, at the end of the meeting, Larry Eagleburger said, "Now, rip up all of your notes and give them to me. Nobody can leave with notes on this discussion." One said to oneself: "What in the hell is going on here?"

It turned out that the Soviets had been bombarding us with microwaves, beginning in about 1964 or 1965. Why they had done this remained a mystery. How they had bombarded our embassy remained somewhat of a mystery, as well as why they had done so. Also a mystery was what was the response. We were furious. We felt betrayed by the leadership of the Department of State and by the Secretary of State himself. (End of tape)

I'm speaking now of the microwave radiation scandal, as I would call it, of the early 1970s, which harked back to the early 1960s. Many of us who had served in the embassy felt betrayed as people who had put so much into our efforts and who had volunteered to serve in Moscow. We probably would have volunteered anyway to serve in Moscow, even if we had known about this. However, we learned only years later that this had happened and that information on it had been kept from us. Foreign Service physical examinations routinely include a blood test. Unbeknownst to us, the Department of State was testing our blood to see what, if anything, had happened to us as a result of the microwave radiation. This was a pretty jolting realization.

Now, at that stage we were assured that there was no evidence whatsoever of damage to our bodies. You know, so many people had been given physical examinations. In an atmosphere like that stories soon began to come out that so-and-so had developed cancer. There was a story circulating that a former leader of the Marine Security Guard detachment in Moscow, who was married and had children, had filed a suit against the State Department and that this suit had been settled out of court for alleged damage to one or more of his children.

Wow! Let me tell you. When I went back to the embassy in Moscow in 1977, this situation had become a matter which affected staff morale. Now I was going back, if you will, as the third-ranking officer in Embassy Moscow. I was of equal status with the Economic Counselor, but in the third-ranking position in the embassy. I had become a part of the management of the mission. By this time we had meters to measure microwave emanations. In the interval something like summer screens had been installed on the windows. I remember once gathering a group of officers with this meter and showing them the effect of taking the screen off. The needle on the meter jumped noticeably. Then we put the screen back on the outer window, because the microwave beam was coming in directly from the front. When we did this, the needle on the meter dropped down. Not all the way, but it faded significantly. So I then said to them, you can see the effect yourselves, but we are now told that this radiation is less dangerous to your health than living near one of the radio stations in Chevy Chase, Maryland, or something like that.

I had just been administering the environmental agreement between the Soviet Union and the United States. I had seen studies by Soviet scientists in an entirely different field which highlighted the deleterious effects of microwave emissions, such as emissions from high voltage electric wires.

It wasn't long before another scare broke. It turned out that the studies of our blood samples over the years of people who had served in Moscow showed that something like six months after a person arrived in Moscow, his or her white blood counts rose significantly. Some people speculated that this had to do with the water supply. A team led by a doctor was sent out from Washington to look into the matter. I can't recall his name now, but he had earlier pooh-poohed the notion that the radiation the American staff was receiving was deleterious and now he was visiting Moscow again. He announced to us that his group wanted to meet with Soviet medical authorities to discuss with them the epidemiology of the Moscow population, because we had now found significantly higher white blood counts in the blood of the Americans who served in the embassy in Moscow. The idea that the Soviets would sit down and talk with such a medical team about the blood counts of typical, Russian residents of Moscow, in epidemiological terms seemed so naive. Can you imagine the concern of Russian medical authorities about a story that Moscow was an unhealthy place to live? In fact, environmentally speaking, Moscow was an unhealthy place to live, in several ways. So the Soviets ignored this request.

All of this fermented, and the American press played it up. We had a real scare in Moscow.

Q: And rightly so!

BROWN: I raise that matter in terms of lessons learned. Lord knows what the future will bring in the Foreign Service.

Q: Before we leave that matter, was consideration ever given to our saying to the Soviets: "If you keep up this nonsense, we will close our embassy in Moscow?"

BROWN: Or, we could say, if the Soviets kept up this nonsense, we would do exactly the same thing to the Soviet Embassy in Washington. But, oh, no, that would have been nasty, and nothing like that was done. We felt pretty strongly about this.

BROWN: It affected morale and assignments to positions in the embassy.

Q: What was the purpose of what has to be regarded as this campaign by Soviet authorities against the health of members of the staff of the American embassy in Moscow? Did they think that if they aimed these microwave radiations at the embassy, they would eventually be able to understand what our people were talking about?

BROWN: This takes you into realms that I'm really not qualified to discuss. I was aware of various theories and of measures and countermeasures that might be taken. However, the point is that microwave emissions were being beamed at us. This point came home to me particularly one day when a visiting technician from the State Department came with equipment and said, "Do you mind if I set this up in your office?" I said, "Okay, but why here? Why in my office?" He said, "Because actually there are at least two beams being directed at the embassy. One comes in from the front of the embassy building, and one comes in from that great, white building over there, which is called the 'White House.' You know, where the Russian Parliament meets."

Q: That's the building which was in flames at one time.

BROWN: Yes. He said, "One beam comes this way, and the two beams intersect right here at your desk. So I'd like to set this up." I thought: "My God! It makes you think." But the Soviets weren't turning these beams off.

This was a disturbing development. As I said, it affected assignments to positions in the embassy in Moscow, as well as other things. The Foreign Service had now a much less glamorous view of serving in Moscow. It was a dirty, unattractive, hostile city. It was difficult to persuade a middle ranking senior officer of superior quality to come back to Moscow. Over and over you encountered a whole variety of excuses, such as: "I'd love to return to Moscow. Don't misunderstand me. However, my wife would object, or my kids' schooling situation would be a problem.” In those days it was very disturbing to me to deal with such attitudes. I myself had not volunteered to go back to Moscow. However, once there, I threw myself into the job. So service in the embassy in Moscow was a unique experience in many ways.

That takes me to another factor that I haven't really discussed. That is, the China factor. Since my first tour in Moscow as a Sino-Soviet specialist I had seen the great breakthrough of the Nixon and Kissinger visits to China, the issuance of the Shanghai Communiqué of 1972, as well as further, high level visits and exchanges. Clearly, the handwriting was on the wall. There was, if you will, a bipartisan view in the United States that we should further develop our relationship with Chinese and regularize and normalize it, but at not too great a cost to our national interest.

Certainly, as one viewed the Carter administration coming into office, there were early signs that, for a variety of reasons, including strategic considerations, because this was driving so much of it, this new administration was determined to move that whole process along. With the departure of President Nixon and the incumbency of President Ford, the further development of our relations with China had been sort of sidelined because of the transition of administrations, the elections of 1976, and all of that.

While I was in Moscow during this tour of duty, among the many professional visitors that I had was Harry Thayer. Harry was then the senior officer on the Peoples Republic of China desk. He came to Moscow, and we discussed relations between the Soviet Union, China, Japan, and the United States. Then Harry said to me: “Look, we have this small Liaison Office in Beijing. I'm thinking of proposing you for the number two position there. We need to have somebody who is senior, a solid performer, and so forth.”

That faced me with a real dilemma. In professional terms, an assignment to Beijing was just what I wanted. I hadn't particularly wanted to go to Moscow this time. But an assignment to Beijing was right up my alley. I could speak Chinese. However, I felt morally bound to decline, because I'd only recently arrived in Moscow, albeit that I had accepted the assignment to meet the needs of the service, and so forth. I just felt that I was morally bound to stick it out and complete my tour there. So, on those grounds I regretfully declined the assignment to Beijing that was offered to me. So J. Stapleton Roy was the Foreign Service Officer who was the right man for this assignment, and he got it. He was an excellent man for the job. A first class officer.

More time went by, and then I had a communication from an old friend and professional colleague, Roger Sullivan. Roger had been in the same Foreign Service Institute class with me. He had succeeded me in the following class at the Chinese language school in Taichung. He had succeeded me as Political Officer in Singapore. Then I had brought him into the China Shop in 1972-1973, and he succeeded me there as the Deputy Director on the Peoples Republic of China desk (ACA). Now he was elevated, during the Carter administration, to be Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs, under Richard W. Holbrooke.

Roger got in touch with me by telephone and said, in a guarded but understandable way, that something was afoot, and they therefore proposed that I go to Taipei as the Deputy Chief of Mission. The idea was that I would be placed there so that if something which was under consideration developed further, I would be in a position to deal with it and the inevitable consequences, which clearly implied the departure of the American Ambassador from Taipei. So I said, "Okay. When do you want me to go?" The answer was: "Now."

So in the summer of 1978, after a year and a half in the embassy in Moscow, my wife Helen and I got on a plane and flew to Tokyo. After a few days' consultations in Tokyo, we flew down to Taipei. Ambassador Leonard Unger was the Chief of Mission at the time. Now, do you want to take this further, or...

Q: I would like to ask a couple of more questions about the Soviets. Then we'll stop and pick up on your assignment to Taipei.

Now, at this time, how did we feel about Brezhnev and his leadership of the Soviet Union? We're talking now about one of the chief things that the Political Section in Moscow was doing in those days. We're talking about a period only a couple of years before we were asking what the political leadership of the Soviet Union was doing in getting the USSR involved in the war in Afghanistan. This was an absolute disaster for the Soviets, and it seemed to be almost an off the cuff and reckless decision. Who was leading in the Soviet Politburo as we saw it at this time? How did we view the Politburo and Brezhnev at that time?

BROWN: Our sources were limited. However, the picture that we had was that Brezhnev was physically in decline. We could also see that he was surrounded by a bunch of other people who were old and suffering from physical ailments of various kinds. Brezhnev's Minister of Defense, Ustinov, was very ill. Gromyko, the Foreign Minister, had been in that position ever since 1962. These were not healthy men. They were men who had lived lives of great tension and stress, and the ravages imposed by time and stress were taking their toll. The constant question was how long would Brezhnev survive, and then what? And we would go around and around, as far as likely successors were concerned. There was no clear successor in view.

Indeed, the succession to Brezhnev happened after I left, and look at the spiral that developed. First Andropov and then Chernenko. These guys were dropping like flies! Access by the embassy to members of the Politburo was practically non-existent. Access by other sources was almost non-existent. Western and other powers dealing with the Soviet Union dealt with the front side of the Soviet bureaucracy, that is, the cabinet ministers and so forth. In other words, the official, governmental side. As we knew and know now, the real power was in the Communist Party. You never got to see them at a party level.

When it was decided that Ambassador Toon should begin a program of travel in the Soviet Union, he charged me with arranging for him to see a Communist Party figure in Leningrad. There was no way that he could do that. We went up to Leningrad and got to see the Mayor of Leningrad and the head of the local branch of the Foreign Ministry in Moscow. He also got some tours of the sights, some nice meals, and so forth, but he didn't get to see the Communist Party boss in Leningrad.

Then Ambassador Toon asked me to arrange a trip to Kiev, in the Ukraine. Toon wanted to see the senior Communist Party boss of the Ukraine. We got to Kiev. We knew this wasn't going to happen. I really tried to set this up and argued with local Soviet officials. I got what everybody else got, for a distinguished, Western Ambassador, and that was an appointment to see the Foreign Minister of the Ukraine. Remember, Ukrainia had a seat in the United Nations.

Q: Oh, yes. White Russia, Ukrainia, and another Soviet republic...

BROWN: Was it Georgia? These Soviet republics had been granted seats in the UN. Initially, we considered them Soviet puppets. However, this was later an excuse for us to open up American Embassies in their capitals. I think that we were able to arrange a courtesy call on the President or the Deputy Vice President of the Ukraine. That is, governmental officials. We also saw the Mayor of Kiev, as well as an array of gray-faced bureaucrats in between. That was it. We never got to see the boss.

There was another occasion, when I was accompanying a Congressional Delegation to Kiev. After this Congressional Delegation left the Soviet Union, Helen and I stayed on in the Ukraine for a few days. We wanted to visit the home of Bulgakov, the famous writer of the 1930s who perished during the terror of the Moscow purges in the late 1930s. Helen wanted to paint a picture of his home. We had lots of wonderful stories about this. Bulgakov's home had been on a hill, close to a famous, old church. Helen wanted to visit his home. She was outside his home, painting the church. All of a sudden, there were no cars and absolute, dead silence. Then came the sound of a loud siren and screeching of tires. It turned out that the Communist Party boss was returning to his home or his office, which was near by. I saw this great cavalcade of limousines and heard the sound of sirens. This great, security entourage flashed past us, and that was that. I said, "Wow! There's the local boss!" [Laughter]

We were denied access to all of that. You therefore couldn't establish any kind of dialogue or rapport with local leaders. We couldn't measure these guys. They were encased in security arrangements, and contact with them was very, very difficult.

Q: Looking at the decisions that were coming out, you'd have to say that these Soviet officials really weren't with it. We have these kinds of security arrangements with our own officials in the White House and other places, but...

BROWN: Moscow was a rolling mill. There were all kinds of people, all the time, and there was a lot of chicken feed around, too, you know. But all of the foreign representatives were watching and comparing and so on. When all is said and done, we had pretty limited access to these figures.

Now, as far as speculation as to the succession to Brezhnev and others is concerned, of course we analyzed that, as much as we could. It was clear that Brezhnev had not chosen a successor, nor would he. You didn't do that in that kind of a society. If they did that, pretty soon they would get rid of the man in power. We have seen that happen many times in history. However, it was then, and it remained, quite a challenge to determine what might happen.

Q: Now, as chief of the Political Section, how useful did you find what was being produced by the CIA [Central Intelligence Agency]? Obviously, Moscow was the major target, as far as the CIA was concerned.

BROWN: We didn't get much locally as State Department consumers because that was a different scene, both operationally and so forth. CIA studies would be sent out to us. Remember, I was a fan of the FBIS [Foreign Broadcast Information Service] from previous experience. So I was constantly flipping through the latest, FBIS reports or accounts of Soviet broadcasts and so forth. We received prestigious studies from the CIA and other intelligence agencies. They tended to confirm our own views. However, you see, we were all in the same swim, as it were, and particularly in terms of economic analysis. I mean no disrespect either to the CIA or to our own economists, but we just didn't have a grip on the situation. [See Goodman, op. cit.]

My own, gut feeling, which I often expressed to others, was that there was a lot wrong with Soviet society. It was inefficient in so many ways. It was corrupt and increasingly so. Our people were spending such a disproportionate amount of our limited resources on the Soviet military and putting out good analysis.

During my second tour in Moscow a very senior officer from the Defense Intelligence Agency came out to Moscow. We had been together at the National War College some five years previously. He had gone on to greater things in his own agency. I remember discussing my view of the Soviet Union with him. He said, "Bill, what you're telling me is that this Soviet economy is lousy, that things are rotten here, and so forth. But I've got to tell you, Bill, from my end of things, the Soviets are producing first class, modern, nuclear weaponry, in very significant amounts, and with a very high level of sophistication." I said, "Okay, I can't challenge that. I'm just telling you that, at the street level, there are potholes, shortages, alcoholism, disaffection, disillusionment, new stirrings among the people, and Soviet youth is disaffected. From anecdotal material there are great shortages of meat. There are, at times, terrible shortages of meat and other produce. God knows what conditions are like in the hinterland of the Soviet Union which we still can't get to. From all of our accounts, the Soviet economy faces major problems." So we had a kind of standoff here.

Q: What about your feelings on Marxism and Leninism? I was talking to one person who said that he was in Poland at this time. He said that there were maybe three people in all of Poland who really believed in Marxism. Did you see any evidence of that?

BROWN: I think that as far as the great bulk of the masses were concerned, they were loyal, Soviet citizens, doing their jobs and struggling to make a little better place in their lives. You could say that they were getting the crumbs, but automobiles were beginning to become more available. The automobile population was growing, the cars were junky and broke down frequently, but at least the elite and sub-elite, the upper classes of Soviet society, now had wheels. Restaurants were better, and there was more merchandise in the shops. The power of the Soviet regime was incontestable. At the same time, more and more people had visited, heard of, or could read about the West and all of its delights. I think that the European miracle, let alone the achievements on the American scene, were increasingly evident. The reach of radio and, on the periphery of the Soviet Union, foreign TV broadcasts was increasing. Finnish TV could now be seen in Estonia. More travel abroad was being allowed. There was the whole business of Western dress and attire, blue jeans, and the beginnings of narcotics addiction. The birth control pill had enormous impact. Alcoholism was a major problem, as it always had been.

There was, if you will, a greater perception of the West and of the contrast between conditions in Soviet society and the West. Relatively few Soviet citizens would ever be able to travel in the West, but you should bear in mind that the system of awards for internal travel existed within the Soviet Union. I once went with my wife and daughter to Sochi.

Q: Is this near Yalta?

BROWN: It is on the Black Sea, across from Yalta and just North of the border between the Russian Federated Socialist Republic and Georgia. It is on the other, eastern coast of the Black Sea. Visiting Sochi was like moving from night into day. Sochi is a warm, seaside resort. Thousands of people were in bikinis there, sunning themselves on the lovely beaches. Pepsi-Cola was available there! Ice cream and Pepsi-Cola were being consumed. There were nice coffee and snack bars. This is where the trade union and other leadership elite of the "heroic workers," the party bosses and union achievers, and so forth went. A visit to Sochi was a status symbol. In Moscow, on the shelves of many a senior bureaucrat was an unopened bottle of Pepsi-Cola. The label said "Pepsi" in Cyrillic letters, because Pepsi now had its own bottling plant in Sochi, thanks to Richard Nixon and Pepsi-Cola. What this bottle meant was: "I have been to Sochi and I have had Pepsi-Cola. Here is the bottle to show it!" That bottle was right next to the ritual copy of the "Collected Works of Lenin."

Q: In Yugoslavia I used to see copies of the "Collected Works of Tito." They were constantly in sight, obviously.

BROWN: Everybody had those collections. The rituals were all there, including the parades and so forth.

One had the sense that there was minimal enthusiasm about this. I'm not saying hostility, but there was minimal enthusiasm and a growing amount of cynicism as to what it all meant. I don't want to put too much of an edge on this but I was struck at the signs of a kind of religious movement. There was enough missing in enough people's lives that numbers of Russians were going to church, searching for something else. Even though the Russian Orthodox Church was under the thumb of the regime, one could sense that there was some outreach to the people by the Orthodox Church leadership. There were signs of some contact with Russian Orthodox communities abroad.

The Russians carried in their intellectual baggage a tremendous sense of inferiority vis-a-vis the United States. We had our materialism, as we have a materialistic society. However, with the Vietnam conflict over, the drumfire of really virulent, anti-American propaganda which I had been exposed to some 10 years previously in Moscow was noticeably absent. Soviet media had often carried pictures of American troops in Vietnam, using napalm against the local people, and so forth. That had lost its edge. So there was continuous competition but no sense, certainly at the lower, public level, that the Soviets had overtaken us. There still was that Slavic sense of inferiority which manifested itself in peculiar ways.

Q: My last question on this subject. You were sort of a China watcher par excellence. What about the China-Soviet relationship, and how did that play out during the time you were there?

BROWN: Let me tell you. The evolution in our relationship with China since the time of my first tour in the Soviet Union had reached the point that at diplomatic functions the Chinese Charge d'Affaires in Moscow, Mr. Wang, at times would say to me in front of other Western diplomats: "NATO must be strengthened! Don't go soft on the Russians! Make yourselves stronger! The only things that they understand are pressure and power." Incidentally, Sino-Soviet relations were so bad that they didn't have Ambassadors in each other's respective capitals. They just had Charges d'Affaires, but these had the personal rank of Ambassadors. Wang would make these remarks in front of representatives of other NATO countries. I said to him: "We really should make you an honorary member of the NATO Society."

There was another, interesting time when Wang and I were sharing old memories of the Nixon-Kissinger-Mao Tse-tung-Zhou En-lai breakthroughs and so forth. I confided to him that at the time of the Nixon visit to China I had been Deputy Director of ACA and had prepared these Secret books for these visits in which we cautioned our people, based on our own knowledge of the Chinese and on our readings, to be careful not to put their arms around the shoulders of Chinese officials or slap them on the back. Kissinger and his people came back from Beijing and said to us: "What's the matter with you people? The first thing the Chinese did was to put their arms around our shoulders, ask us to have a drink, and so forth." Whereupon Mr. Wang said, "Don't you think that we were preparing our own Secret books?" He had been involved in the preparation of similar books for his superiors.

Q: Was there any concern among the Soviets about their ability to take care of the Chinese?

BROWN: Oh, no, not in terms of conventional warfare. So deep had the mutual hostility between the Chinese and the Soviets become that they had the worst possible images of each other. Remember, in 1969 they had an armed clash along the Ussuri River [along the border with Eastern Manchuria], near Khabarovsk. The Soviets said that all that was left of the Chinese soldiers on that occasion were their belt buckles.

Clearly, in any hypothetical conflict the People's Liberation Army of China would be no match for the Soviet Army in full array, with all of its tanks and nuclear weapons. However, a lot had happened since this border clash. The Chinese were absolutely determined to continue modernizing militarily. They had now developed a breakthrough in their relations with the U.S., although it was still in the early, formative stage. However, the background music was that U.S.-China relations could be and would be improved. Certainly, that was unpleasant music in Soviet ears. For their part the Chinese remained driven in their concern about the Soviets, whatever their public remarks. We'll come to that in a later session, because that fear of the Soviets and the Chinese determination somehow to counter them through the relationship with the U.S., if necessary, was clear.

We're now talking about my time in Moscow in 1977-1978. In fact, that was abundantly clear through 1985, when I was later Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of State dealing with the Chinese, and discussing our relationship with them.

THOMPSON R. BUCHANAN
Consul General
Leningrad (1977-1980)

Thompson R. Buchanan was born in Beverly Hills, California in 1924. He received a bachelor's degree from Yale University. He served in the U.S. Navy from 1943-1946. Mr. Buchanan's Foreign Service career included positions in Germany, France, Russia, Burundi, Gabon, and Norway. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on March 15, 1996.

Q: You were in Leningrad from when to when?

BUCHANAN: From October, 1977 until August, 1980.

Q: How long had the consulate general been in existence?

BUCHANAN: It opened in July 1973 with Culver Gleysteen and his wife living in the Astoria Hotel for many months while our construction crew rebuilt our future consulate. As I told you, the Soviets responded to my request for a building on the former Furchatskaya, then Petra Lavrova, and now again Furchatskaya street, opposite our former chancery before the revolution. The man I replaced, Joe Neubert, had formerly been on the policy planning staff. He made a major effort to get to know and understand the Russians. After his retirement, he became the American representative in Moscow of the Soviet-American Trade Council.

With my background I tended to see the Consulate General more as an important intelligence and political reporting post than a consular post. We certainly could not compare with visa mills like Frankfurt and Munich. Leningrad provided a different vantage point from which to view this vast country. If Leningrad lacked the dynamism of Moscow -- a "Museum city" as the Muscovites called it -- it had a more civilized atmosphere. For some reason, the series of lectures in the so-called Znaniye or Knowledge Society, and particularly the questions and answers were more revealing than in similar lectures in Moscow. And it was the base of a vast consular district extending from the Baltic States to Murmansk and Archangel on the Barents and White Seas, offering other insights into this great land..

Q: When you are talking about lectures, what are you talking about?

BUCHANAN: On weekends, partly because my Russian was better than that of some of the staff members, and they often had children and I didn't, I would take the weekend shift and go to these lectures on different aspects of Soviet life organized by the Knowledge Society, lectures delivered by very experienced lecturers who were specialists in their own fields. The lectures might be on anything from the Middle East to the economy, to agriculture, etc. The Bermuda triangle was one of the most popular lectures in Russia. "Is there life in outer space?" was another popular theme. There were lectures on civil defense, you name it. As I say, these lectures would last two or three hours and the lecturer often would not look at a note. Very impressive.

After the lecture we would write a cable summarizing the main points, particularly the questions and answers. That was one of my more time-consuming activities.

The issue of Soviet Jews was very important at that time. We kept getting messages from the Department saying, "Would you please check into what happened to Abramowitz. We understand he is in jail." And very often they were correct. We would send somebody down to the local synagogue and check with one or two of our regular contacts down there. We knew Washington had heard about it because the relatives in Leningrad would phone to their blood relatives in New York and tell them. It was curious that these phone calls from this police state could still go through. The Soviets were very frustrated for they didn't know how to handle the whole Jewish question. It remained a thorn in their side and was to some extent a constant irritant in our relations. They tried to deter us from having contact with Jewish or other dissidents.

One of my consular officers was a regular source of contact with the various dissidents. He was a little guy who was a marathon runner. He used to run about 18 miles about three times a week. The Russians, of course, wondered what this American was doing running all over Leningrad. They were highly suspicious. They didn't have anybody who wanted to run and keep up with him. But, what they would sometimes do, would be to wait until he was crossing a street and then run a car at him which would come to a screeching halt about three feet from him in an effort to intimidate him. And, at least, on one or two occasions, "citizens" beat him up after he had visited a dissident, but very professionally with no visible damage, nothing very serious, but just a "don't come back" message. That really didn't work because we, of course, had our orders to continue to maintain these contacts. But it was a game, an irritant.

Q: One thing about being a consular officer is you have much more access, you can go to anyone you want, as opposed to being an embassy officer where you are sort of trapped by working through the foreign ministry, the rules of the game are different. Did you ever feel that you could go to say the head of the KGB in Leningrad and say, "Come on, cut this out. You know what we are doing and we know what you are doing, can't we stop this before it turns...?"

BUCHANAN: Well, I would do that to the foreign ministry, too, in Moscow. But, yes, I complained.

Q: But you can go more directly as a consular officer sometimes too.

BUCHANAN: Oh, I was constantly protesting to the Diplomatic Agency about one problem or another. The head of the Agency, Yefimov, was, as far as I knew, a former political hack from the Leningrad Oblast apparatus, not KGB. But his deputy was certainly KGB. Koslovski was a very sophisticated agent, who had served in East Germany. I became aware within the first weeks of my arrival that he was KGB, by accident. The diplomatic corps was invited to a celebration of what I recall was Brezhnev's version of the Soviet constitution. As we entered October Hall, Koslovski met us to direct us to our seats. As he passed the security guards, he was greeted as an obvious colleague. He scowled and pretended that he had not heard. They blew his cover, not that I had any great doubts. In fact, he was not only a civilized person with whom to deal but, on two occasions, extremely useful.

On one occasion, we had a Fulbright scholar, John Pratt, sent to us as a lecturer on American literature. The fact that he was a colonel in the Air Force, who had served in Vietnam, disturbed me. We had problems enough, including friction regarding Vietnam, without his presence. The Soviets would, of course, assume that he was a spy, which they did initially. I agreed to have him come because my deputy PAO, Criss Arcos (incidentally, a tremendous officer, who had an impressive career later in Latin America), reassured me. "When I was in Portugal," Criss said, "Pratt came and lectured and he is superb, don't worry." When Pratt arrived, he was promptly taken in hand by the professor of American Literature at Leningrad University, as I recall a tiny, little man, very bright, called Kavalyov. John told us that he felt like he was defending his doctoral thesis during his first dinner at Kavalyov's house. Kavalyov asked him about the most obscure American writers of the 19th and 20th centuries. At the end he was apparently convinced that John was the real thing and not a CIA agent. John had lectured on American literature at the Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs, and is a prolific writer himself. Kavalyov warned John, however, that Leningrad was not the US and he should not expect the sort of professor-student dialogue to which he was accustomed. John bet Kavalyov that he would get the students talking, and he won. Actually, while John lectured in English, and no Russian, he had people coming out from the suburbs, who were English speakers, to listen to him. He told me how amazed he was by the knowledge of American literature on the part of his students. Some would walk with him after class and ask him questions about the latest book by, for example, John Updike, which they were not supposed to have read, but somehow, presumably as children of the Nomenklatura, they had managed to get hold of.

Well, back to the point of my story about Koslovski. At around 11 p.m. one night I got a call from my consular officer saying, "John Pratt is in the hospital here. I am calling from the hospital. John has apparently a kink in his colon, and they will have to operate very quickly or gangrene will set in." The consul described the hospital room as being, as usual, "pod remontom" (under construction), with large, dirty blankets hung as curtains over the windows. I arranged a three-way conversation with our doctor at the Embassy in Moscow. The doctor explained that what was most important was that the operation should take place in a sterile environment because the intestines would in fact, be exposed. The description of the operating room was not reassuring. We did not know what to do. Happily, at that point, an older, more senior doctor appeared, looked at the X-ray and said that this was not a kink in the colon but a tumor in the lower bowel, what he called the "lucky tumor," because it is easily operable. Since there was not the same urgency to operate, we had time to get John out to Helsinki. The embassy doctor said he assumed that plastic tubes would be inserted into John's extremities to relieve pressure during his transport to Finland, but the Russian doctor claimed his hospital had no plastic tubes, probably because he was hoarding the few that he had and he had no confidence that they would be replaced. I then arranged to have John sent with a couple of our consular officers up to Helsinki. The problem was that it was by now 1:00 in the morning, and we had to open the frontier. This is where we will get back to Koslovski in the KGB. I called him and in half an hour he had opened the Soviet-Finnish border, which is closed at night. The problem then was that, on the Finnish side they had all gone to bed. And so, in fact, when our people got there they had to wait until the Finns appeared at work about 5 or 6:00 in the morning. This was the first of two times that Koslovski opened the border. Footnote: John was tremendously impressed by the operation of the Finnish doctors, as we all were. Finnish doctors and dentists were superb. And John is living happily now in Fort Collins, Colorado, teaching at the university there. He keeps in touch with Kovalyev.

The other occasion was when General Rooney, the right-wing general put into the SALT delegation by conservatives in Congress, came to Leningrad. I thought this would be a good opportunity for me to be briefed since we were not on distribution for SALT traffic. So, I took the general into our little secure room and he gave the most pompous performance I had ever seen. He told me less than I could read in the New York Times. "It is very secure, you know." Well, that same evening, also late, about 11:00, he was called from Washington and told that he should be at a noon briefing the following day in Washington. Now there was one possibility of getting him there. He could make a plane connection from Helsinki which would get him on the Concorde out of London. Frankly, after listening to him I wondered if it was in the national interest to get him on that plane. But, I decided it wasn't my job to make that decision. Our administrative and consular officers drove him up to Helsinki. Again, Koslovski came through and opened the Finnish border, again the Finns couldn't be found, and they barely made it to the airport. An amusing footnote: On the way, nature called but the General refused to stop the car, asking, "Don't you have a Pepsi Cola bottle or something that I could use?" When our staff returned from Helsinki, we debated, given the General's pompous concern for security, whether we should not have sent the bottle and its contents, "Top Secret" to the Pentagon!

Q: Did you find the Leningrad society different from the Moscow society?

BUCHANAN: There is something you could call old Leningrad or St. Petersburg manners...more gracious, better mannered, less likely to knock you down standing in line. Yes, there was a difference. Leningrad treasured its historic cultural traditions. Within a week or two of our arrival, I heard there was going to be a concert at Catherine's Palace: an amateur choir was singing to do a Schubert mass. I felt that sounded interesting, so my wife and I were driven out. This took place in the outer hall of the chapel there. The ladies in the choir came in silver lame evening dress, the men were all in tails. It was a superb choir. The choir master worked at the professional Kapella, the choral group founded in Moscow by Ivan IV and transplanted to St. Petersburg. On another occasion, we attended an Italian baroque opera sung in the green marble room of Pavlovsk Palace, with all the singers and ushers in period costume. If the plays put on at the Gorky theater were not quite as avant garde as those at the Taganka theater in Moscow, the choreography and acting were superb. At the Kirov theater, we never missed a performance when our friend, Valiya Galibalovna, danced. Her Giselle was a delight. With her help one evening, we put on six hours of American ballet at the residence on video. Bolshoi ballerina Maksimova was among the 16-odd leading lights of Soviet ballet who attended. We were, of course, quite spoiled by the cost of attending the theater or musical events, the equivalent of $3-4, and correspondingly shocked when we bought tickets for the Kennedy Center upon our return.

Petrinin, who was number two in the Gosispolkom's (city government) cultural section, was not a particularly cultivated gentleman himself, but he took pleasure in showing off his city. Knowing my wife's interests, he arranged one weekend for us to visit a man who was a restorer of icons. We went there, however, not to see his icons but his collection of paintings and engravings of the pre-revolutionary nobility and Royal family. We were told that he had been essentially a worker at the time of the revolution, who took advantage of the New Economic Policy period to buy up some of the great Russian painters like Repin and Serov, as well as ceramic works and silver from the impoverished aristocracy. In the '30s he inexplicably decided to get rid of his Russian masters and concentrate instead on an area that no one was collecting. He told the story of one choice small engraving of a countess, which he spied in an apartment when he was walking. The old woman who owned the engraving resisted his argument that her countess would feel more at home in his apartment surrounded by her noble friends, until one day she knocked on the door, and was ready to sell, sensing perhaps that she did not have long to live.

Another time we were taken to the home of an elderly lady who had relatives in Paris, and who obviously had political connections because she went out to Paris periodically. She had created a total Parisian apartment. She was living in the past. She reminded me of the time that we attended a concert in Moscow given by Prince Volkonsky, who had studied in Paris and returned from emigration with his father after the war. When permitted, he gave concerts of his modern compositions. That particular evening, he performed with his baroque ensemble. What was fascinating was to hear elderly couples behind us, dressed in what had been once well tailored clothes, introducing friends to one another...Count so and so, you must know Baron X, etc. People who had obviously survived under Socialism by keeping their head down. In Leningrad, this lady who had been a member of the old nobility, was allowed to live a Bourgeois existence, and keep up her relations with France, in exchange perhaps for providing information on her contacts.

More moving in many ways were our visits to dissident artists, often arranged by a good friend the sculptor Grisha Israelovich. He had apparently some political protection, as a member of the Artists Union, since his father had been in charge of sanatoria on the Black Sea. His former wife and daughters had emigrated to the U.S. After we left, the authorities took away his wonderful gate house studio.

To get some feeling for the religious life of Leningrad, I attended, of course, special holy days at the synagogue and the various Orthodox churches. On one occasion a Baptist church service began with my being introduced to the bearded 18 members of the Council, who all insisted on kissing me, Russian style!

Life in Leningrad was not, of course, all fun and culture. There were problems with our Soviet staff. We felt that we should treat the daughter of the cultural honcho of Leningrad with kid gloves, despite her fairly obvious efforts to entice her American GSO boss into bed. She would sit so provocatively in her office, I learned, that the wife of the GSO brought in a screen to put between them to reduce temptation. On the other hand, we had one lovely lady, who was enormously helpful whenever visitors came to Leningrad. She knew many of the artists and what was worth seeing around town -- the sorts of things that no American local would ever know. Unfortunately, she apparently became too visibly fond of her job and Americans, without perhaps adequate reporting on her part, so that she was suddenly removed one day and demoted to a menial job with Intourist.

Our biggest problem in 1979 was handling the 8 CODELS, congressional delegations that descended on Leningrad, typically on weekends. Each delegation usually consisted of two plane loads of congressmen and senators and their wives and staff, none of whom was often very interested in being briefed about Leningrad. They were there for a good time. They offered an opportunity, however, for us to meet local officials, who were otherwise unapproachable. I took particular satisfaction in persuading the Ribicoff-Bellman delegation that it should try to meet with the First Secretary of Leningrad, Grigoriy Romanov, a tough little ideologue, very combative, a Napoleonic disposition. I knew him only from occasional verbal bouts with him on November 7, or May First. The Politburo obviously wanted the delegation to meet a much smoother member, Masherov, of Belorussia, but, on my urging, the delegation pressed to meet with Romanov. Ambassador Malcolm Toon supported my request, and accompanied the delegation when it met with Romanov. What Romanov told us about his personality during this visit suggested that, had he won out in the power struggle that followed Brezhnev's death, rather than Gorbachev, we would not have had an end to the cold war, but rather the reverse.

Small examples. Ribicoff spoke without notes, just off the cuff. It was always rather difficult for an interpreter to follow. In the middle of a long speech by Ribicoff, our interpreter, instead of referring to the "tomb" of the people who had died during the blockade of Leningrad, he referred to their "grave." Romanov interrupted to chastise the interpreter saying, "If you are an interpreter you should know the difference between a tomb and a grave." He was feisty and bad mannered.

Bellman started talking about trade, trying to be polite to supplement what Ribicoff had said. Romanov interrupted saying, "We don't need your trade." After dinner, where Romanov had all the fine artists of Leningrad perform for them at the guest house, I heard him talking to the senators saying, "And you mustn't believe the things your Consul General writes about me and about Leningrad."

Well, I knew that we were probably bugged because my French and German colleagues had warned me saying they had found bugs in their offices in the ceiling. I had, in fact, requested Washington to "debug" our consulate. The operation happily took place when I was on leave; my poor deputy had to suffer through all the dust. Our people didn't find that bug until long after I left. The Soviets were obviously monitoring what we wrote about them and they didn't like it.

Some of the things they probably didn't like was the accuracy of our reporting on their economy. Moscow was reporting the economy was in fairly good shape. We had, I think, a more realistic view from lectures that were franker than those in Moscow, and from little incidents like the time one of our Russian speaking wives was standing in line and the woman ahead of her was weeping and telling a friend that her daughter had called that morning and had said, "Mother, you know, I was able to find some kasha (a cereal) for the family for breakfast, but I don't know what I am going to find to feed them for the rest of the day." From these little incidents, one knew that life out in the sticks, what the Russians call the "periphery," was a far cry from what it was in Moscow or Leningrad. So, we were reporting that there were more economic tensions in the country than perhaps were generally admitted.

The Soviets also, of course, didn't like the role the consulate played in trying to monitor the shipbuilding activity in Leningrad. Our naval people would come up, or British or Canadian naval officers. In a sense, we represented the Commonwealth, and we provided what assistance we could.

Q: They didn't have posts there?

BUCHANAN: No, they didn't. There were some nasty incidents. The Russians seized our naval attaché who was clandestinely photographing a new cruiser that was being built in the shipyards. We naturally protested their uncivilized behavior in seizing this naval attaché and removing his camera.

So, there were lots of little tensions, and the Soviets got back at us in their own way, sometimes personally. For example, we had a wonderful chef from the liner Pushkin who had been provided to my predecessor. Because he had been a chef on a liner you could call up and say, "Sasha, tomorrow we are going to have a cocktail party for 150 people," and it didn't phase him at all. He also took the side of my wife against the two women harridans on the residence staff. One was an embittered old woman, who had lost all of her family during the blockade. The other, a rather plump version of Marilyn Monroe, was a slick KGB operator, but a very good housekeeper who loved the residence and took a lot of pride in it. My wife thought that she went out of her way on one occasion to demonstrate the speed of her hands, to warn us not to leave things around. When Soviet-US relations were particularly tense, the two ladies might claim to be sick and unable to work. On one such occasion, Sasha insisted that he would vacuum our "palace," rather than my wife. We should have known better than to tell the walls how highly we thought of Sasha, instead of cursing him for his protection.

So one day, just on the eve of a large delegation coming, Sasha came to me with tears in his eyes and said he had a better job. I took him out in the courtyard and said, "Sasha, what happened?" He said, "They didn't tell me, but let me go quietly." Then he said in French, "c'est la vie." I didn't let him go quietly, I complained bitterly. The Russians made it very plain that they assumed that I would get another Russian chef, but I said, "No, I am not going to be dependent on you people. I am going to get someone from Finland." They said, "What? That is going to be very expensive."

So, we got probably the finest chef we ever had. He had been chef to the Finnish ambassador in Paris and we have never eaten better in our life. Pretty soon, he was being importuned by our Marilyn Monroe lady, who wanted to marry him so he would take her out of the country, and apparently they were quite close. But, ladies were not our chef's primary interest, so it didn't quite work out that way.

Another time, just to be nasty, we suddenly found the residence had only boiling water coming out of all our faucets. This went on for three days. The "diplomatic agency" would send over a "plumber" who came up with a lot of ridiculous suggestions. Our whole furnace area was about the size of the Queen Elizabeth's engine rooms, so an amateur couldn't go in and figure out what valves were what. I finally was able to get a local city plumber to come and it took him about 30 seconds of looking around to say, "Who was the idiot who turned that valve?" Just petty harassment.

Q: We are talking about a difficult period with the Soviets. I would have thought Leningrad in someway a bad place to monitor what was happening, it was a sophisticated area close to Western Europe, etc., when all hell was breaking loose out in the hinterland. Did you find in many ways it might have been better to have somebody in Volgograd or some place like that?

BUCHANAN: Oh yes, but we had no option. Officers traveled, of course, to the extent they could to places like Volgograd, but Leningrad remained our only permanent outpost.

Q: Well, were you seeing the real Russia or not?

BUCHANAN: Oh yes, we were seeing small bits of the real Russia, although they tried to prevent us from doing so. We had a somewhat different perspective on Russia than the one obtainable in Moscow. In some ways security controls were tighter than Moscow but in other ways we were better off than Moscow. The lecture series, for example, were franker. The consular district was also very large, extending from the three cities in the Baltic north to the Barents and White Seas, with a variety of places in between that we managed to visit at least once. Our visits to enterprises and institutes and meetings with local officials were, of course, rather controlled and formal, but they nevertheless provided some insights into Soviet life, adding small pieces to the much larger jigsaw puzzle.

One could also do some investigative reporting in Leningrad itself. We had serious friction in our administrative office between the Administrative Officer and his new GSO, who was the wife of the consular officer, and an economist, who considered herself much smarter than her boss, and told him. I accordingly converted her into an economic officer and had her do a study of unemployment in the city. There were notices all over Leningrad of people seeking employment. By pulling this together, she was able to identify areas where there were shortages and what appeared to be under-employment.

Administrative officers had probably the best opportunity of anyone to experience the frustrating, seamy side of Soviet bureaucracy. If they had served in the Third World, they tended to be more effective. My first administrative officer, an African hand, apparently understood that if he wished to get our shipments through customs he would have to pay off the appropriate officials. I assume that vodka, cognac, jazz tapes or “Playboy” passed hands, but I never asked. I suspect that the reason we began having problems after his departure was because his successor, a quite competent Europeanist, insisted on operating by the book.

Q: You left when in 1980?

BUCHANAN: That summer.

Q: So you were there at the time of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. Were any of you ready for it? Were there any signals? What was the reaction of the people in your area to this?

BUCHANAN: Well, to cite an example, at one lecture, at a factory, the lecturer was speaking about historic military figures. At the end of the lecture a workman got up and basically said, “Comrade lecturer. Can you tell us what the hell we are doing in Afghanistan?” Stories began to spread around about the number of bodies coming back. Definitely there was all sorts of exaggeration about the number of coffins. But it was a sign of the times. There were stories about discrimination in the sort of people they were bringing into the military to fight in Afghanistan, for example, Jews or people from the Baltic States.

There was a very interesting woman who ran the Dostoyevsky Museum. Her husband, I never knew exactly, but I think was a leading doctor in the Soviet Armed Forces. He would travel surveying military establishments. They were obviously in shock because a doctor friend of theirs was sent out to work with Amin, the Afghan leader. (Somebody had reportedly tried to poison him.) When the Russians decided to knock off Amin, and their paratroopers attacked the palace, they killed the doctor friend along with Amin. By then I had gone up to Moscow and we had all discussed with Ambassador Watson and particularly Mark Garrison, the DCM, what should be our reaction. One of the proposals which we made strongly against our personal self-interest -- because all of us were looking forward to seeing the Olympics -- was that we should boycott the Olympics because we knew how important they were psychologically to the Russians. All of these measures were announced: the trade cut off, boycott, etc. I had a cocktail party and very few people came. But this Russian lady came, despite a bad cold. She spoke to me privately, virtually in tears, saying, "What do you think you are doing? When you push the bear into a corner, he will fight back." She seemed genuinely upset and quite frightened of where the confrontation would lead. I still believe that it was a genuine response and not a KGB-orchestrated scene, but who knows. In fact, everyone was upset, and nobody was more upset than all the Intourist guides, because suddenly there would be very few tourists. The reason they had selected to become Intourist guides was to have a feel of the West, an opportunity to travel to the West, or at least to meet Westerners. But our boycott meant that they weren't going to meet any Americans. Instead, they were given jobs translating obscure texts into English.

I had gone down to Tallinn where the Mayor had taken Nan and myself on a boat to see sailboats in training for the Olympics. We visited the very fancy marina which the Estonians had built for the occasion, which we later visited ourselves after I retired, and we went sailing in the Baltic Sea with an FSO friend. We had looked forward to returning to Tallinn for the Olympics.

So, I was directly involved in the Embassy recommendations on how to respond to the invasion of Afghanistan. President Carter's decision has certainly been much criticized, with hindsight, notably his embargo on grain shipments to Russia, perceived as an inequitable burden on the American farmers. Others have attacked the mixing of sport and politics. But I still think that our boycott of the Olympics served its purpose to underscore the inadmissibility of a great power invading its neighbor. On the other hand, I did not agree with the commonly held view that the invasion represented an offensive move toward the Persian Gulf. That seemed to me to be nonsense. I saw the invasion as primarily a defensive reaction by a paranoid regime with a 1700 mile border dividing a Muslim fanatic state from its own Muslim areas of Central Asia. Soviet lecturers claimed that the decision to intervene was only undertaken very reluctantly following fourteen pleas for assistance by the desperate leftist regime in Kabul, as it lost province after province to the rebels. Talk about a cloudy crystal ball, or wishful thinking. At the dinner given for me by the head of the Diplomatic Agency, Yefimov, before our departure, he assured me that, "Don't worry, Mr. Buchanan, in a few months all will be quiet in Afghanistan." To the extent that the much touted "convergence" between the US and the USSR was a reality, it was in our mutual Great Power arrogance. At least the Afghan invasion spared us a continuing deluge of delegations overwhelming our poor little consulate.

Q: Yes, with the Olympics coming.

BUCHANAN: It would have been terrible. I should have mentioned the most amusing delegation I had. Soon after I arrived in Leningrad, we got a message that Mrs. Mondale wanted to come to Leningrad on an unofficial visit to see the avant-garde art collection in the Russian Museum that the head of the National Gallery had described to her. This resulted in a three-day negotiation by me with the head of the city government

Q: Mrs. Mondale, by the way, was the wife of the Vice President.

BUCHANAN: She was given very bad advice by her staff. You can't be the wife of the Vice President and sneak in and have an unofficial visit. Certainly not in a highly protocol society like Russia. What she chose to visit was closed off to everyone except a few Russian art students. I had tried to visit the avant garde collection a number of times and been refused. Selfishly I was delighted that she was asking for this, but it was not an easy thing. She also wanted to have a private meeting with someone who produced ceramic work. We had a three-day negotiation arguing whether this should be an official-unofficial visit or an unofficial-official visit. We finally agreed, I think on an "unofficial-official" formula.

The issue of what was official or unofficial was joined right at the outset, on the way from the airport to my residence. It was an almost hallowed tradition that visitors stopped on Victory Square to pay their respects to those who fought and died to save Leningrad. Victory Square contains an enormous monument with some interesting figures, and a museum underneath where a very moving film is shown, depicting the suffering and heroism of the population during the blockade. While I would have liked Mrs. Mondale to see the film, it was not on the schedule for what was supposed to be this "unofficial" visit.

Q: This was a traumatic time for Leningrad.

BUCHANAN: It was indeed. Everybody in Leningrad still relived those days, just as so many of the older generation of Russia continued to relive, throughout all the time that I was in Russia, World War II, which for the men was their heroic period and the period that had most meaning in their lives. The war was constantly on films, plays, you name it, and in the minds of the people. As a result the word "peace" had enormous psychological significance for Russians, stronger than for most Americans.

To return to Mrs. Mondale, standard practice is that you lay flowers at the eternal flame at this monument. Mrs. Mondale was determined not to do this. She had been told to do nothing official. I tried to persuade her, but the issue was taken out of our hands. I had planned to drive Mrs. Mondale in my official car, but the Soviets offered their own much more luxurious Zil, which meant we were essentially in their hands. So when we came close to the monument, our Zil slowed and stopped. We were faced with a fait accompli. If I had known Mrs. Mondale had a bad cold I could have argued that she should not be standing in minus 30 degree weather in this open air monument. But she had to go through a ceremony which lasted much longer than it should have outside.

When I talked about ceramic works I could see the eyes of the city officials sort of roll. I was convinced that they were going to show us the ceramics but not the artist. To my pleasure and surprise, we were taken to a six-story building. The Secret Service that was accompanying Mrs. Mondale refused to let her go up the elevator so we walked up the six flights of stairs to the apartment of a very attractive couple with a large brown poodle and a very pretty young daughter, with her little pigtails. They were both ceramicists who had exhibited at the Bienale in Venice. They weren't on our list of local artists. It was the best part of the whole visit. They served cognac and coffee and showed some quite interesting ceramic pieces. The couple would occasionally accept invitations after that but not often. They were pretty cautious about their relations with Westerners.

The high point, of course, was the visit to the basement of the Russian museum where the paintings of Malevich, Kandinsky, Popova, Chagall, Goncharova, etc., all these forbidden artists, were hung one on top of the other on panels. We wandered down narrow corridors between the panels, looking at all these treasures. What was interesting and touching was the knowledge and pleasure with which our guide talked about the paintings and the authors. The museum obviously highly valued its collection of avant garde art, and was just waiting for the day when it could be brought up from the basement -- which happened with "perestroika."

The museum to the great Russian basso, Chaliapin, tells another story of Soviet intolerance. After Chaliapin emigrated to Paris in the 1920s, he became a persona non grata. His secretary, however, remained in Leningrad and looked after Chaliapin's apartment, which contained all his memorabilia. When the secretary died during the blockade, the neighbors went to the Theater Museum, told the officials there that Chaliapin's apartment contained all his costumes and music, and asked what could be done to protect them. The staff of the Theater Museum, who were doubtless on the verge of starvation like the rest of Leningrad, went to the apartment and loaded all the singers' effects on sleds and dragged them across town to their museum. It was only in 1975 that they finally received permission to open a museum dedicated to Chaliapin where all his memorabilia could be shown. When you visited the museum you heard Chaliapin's voice played on his huge, golden Victrola with its funnel speaker.

Q: Did you in this late, late Brezhnev time feel that when you came back to the Soviet Union that there was any change?

BUCHANAN: Yes, there was some physical change. A little better choice of clothes. Some of the things in the theater were perhaps a little more daring. But the difference between 1973 and 1977 was not very great. There were the same smells. The same old ladies were breaking up the ice. No, not a great deal of change, and in some ways, the atmosphere was more depressing. With the negotiations over SALT and the meeting between Brezhnev and Carter in Vienna, there was some improvement in our bilateral relations, but then came Afghanistan and our relations went rapidly downhill.

On the business front, however, there was some progress. The Swedes built a huge hotel, the "Prebaltiskaya" on Vasiliyev island, in the area where Romanov was rumored to have his mistress. And business tycoons like Armin Hammer, were able to exploit their long-standing relations with the USSR, going in his case back to the time when he met Lenin, to negotiate profitable contracts. Ever the shrewd entrepreneur, Hammer arranged to exchange a not very good Goya painting, since the Hermitage had none at the time, for a more valuable Malevich. One of his big projects, with which I became involved, consisted of exchanging potash fertilizer from mines, which I had visited south of Murmansk, for urea, which he imported from Florida. When I decided to visit the huge warehouse, which Hammer was building in Ventspils, Latvia, I do not believe that I knew about the poor state of morale on the part of the young, American construction crew. I quickly learned, however, that the local police were harassing the Americans when they tried to meet Latvian girls. I told the local political boss at the warehouse that the men were simple Joes, who had been there a long time and needed a bit of recreation, and he seemed to understand. In fact, one of the men eventually married the girl whom he had been dating, who was perhaps unjustly described as a prostitute. We failed to discourage him.

My meeting in Ventspils was discussed in a two-part article entitled “the Mask” which appeared in Leningradskaya Pravda. The article purported to be an expose of our consulate as a nest of spies. The official in Ventspils was alleged to have protested over my effort to browbeat him, to facilitate spy activity on the part of the local American workers. A close reading of the article made it clear, it seemed to me, that the real target of the article was not our consulate but Soviet scientists, notably nuclear scientists, who were being warned to stay away from the Americans.
